The case of Dunn v. Lumber Co., 172 N. C. 137, 90 S. E. 18, is also directly in point, and strongly supports the view that upon plaintiff's evidence, if accepted as true by the jury, which was done here, he was entitled to recover for the injury he suffered. We have so fully and exhaustively discussed in that and Ensley v. Lumber Co., supra, the general and prevailing principles applicable to this class of cases that we forbear to prolong this opinion by any further reference to them. We held, in the recent case of Ammons v. Manufacturing Co., 165 N. C. 449, 81 S. E. 452, that repeated adjudications had established the rule we have stated, and that an employer of labor, in the exercise of reasonable care, must provide for his employees a reasonably safe place to do their work, and supply them with machinery, implements, and appliances reasonably safe and suitable for the work in which they are engaged, and to keep such implements, etc., in safe condition as far as this can be done by the exercise of proper care and supervision. Pigford v.

Railroad, 160 N. C. 93, 75 S. E. 860, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 865; Young v. Fiber Co., 159 N. C. 376, 74 S. E. 1051; Alley v. Pipe Co., 159 N. C. 327, 74 S. E. 885; Patterson v. Nichols, 157 N. C. 406, 73 S. E. 202; Mercer v. Railroad, 154 N. C. 399, 70 S. E. 742, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 1002; Marks v. Cotton Mills, 135 N. C. 287, 47 S. E. 432.

[10] The remaining objection is equally untenable. The change in the machine, by putting up guards to keep the boards in their place, was shown by the plaintiff, not to prove an admission that the groover was defective when he was hurt, but to show merely the difference in conditions in order to support plaintiff's testimony that they were not there when he was hurt by the saw hurling the board against his body. It was defendant's object to contradict him as to the guards not being there when he was operating the machine, and we have held frequently that this may be done for that purpose, and not as an admission of negligence. Such evidence, for the purpose just indicated, was held to be competent in Pearson v. Clay Co., 162 N. C. 224, 78 S. E. 73; Boggs v. Mining Co., 162 N. C. 393, 78 S. E. 274; McMillan v. Railroad Co., 172 N. C. at pages 856, 857, 90 S. E. 683, and Muse v. Motor Co., 175 N. C. 466, where it is said at page 469, 95 S. E. 900, at page 901:

"It was competent to show that the repairs were made afterwards, not that the repairs were evidence tending to prove negligence, but simply to prove their date to contradict the defendant's witnesses"—citing Tise v. Thomasville, 151 N. C. 281, 65 S. E. 1007; Westfeldt v. Adams, 135 N. C. 591, 47 S. E. 816.

But West v. Railroad Co., 174 N. C. 125, 93 S. E. 479, is exactly in point, and fully sustains the judge's ruling. It is there said by the court (174 N. C. at pages 130 and 131, 93 S. E. at pages 481 and 482):

"The question of evidence raised by the defendant, which is, that the court admitted incompetent evidence as to the condition of the track and roadbed at the time of the injury, and its reparation since that time, is founded upon a misapprehension of the true nature of that evidence. It was not admitted as an implied admission of negligence on the part of the defendant, but as tending to corroborate the plaintiff, as a witness in his own behalf, as to their condition at the time of the accident, and the instructions to the jury clearly show that the evidence was let in solely for such purpose. In that view, it was competent, as we have held"—citing Shaw v. Public Service Corporation, 168 N. C. 611, 84 S. E. 1010, and the cases in this opinion, supra.

The remaining exceptions, which are not merely formal, are considered by us to be without any real merit, and were not stressed in this court.

The case has been fairly and correctly tried, and we find no reason for disturbing the judgment.

No error.

NALL et ux. v. McMATH et al. (No. 98.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR §230—OBJECTIONS—TIME—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where neither of the parties, although they had notice that the jury was not satisfied to find dividing line as contended by either, made opposition to departure from contentions, or requested instruction that jury must find as contended by one or the other, the contention that there is no evidence to sustain the verdict will be overruled where made after return of verdict establishing line different from that contended by either.

2. BOUNDARIES §37(1)—DIVIDING LINES—VERDICT—EVIDENCE TO SUPPORT.

Evidence held to support verdict establishing dividing line equally distant between lines claimed by plaintiffs and defendants.

3. JUDGMENT §199(1)—JUDGMENT NON OBSTANTE VEREDICTO.

Motion for judgment non obstante veredicto can only be granted when it appears from the pleadings and the verdict, and not from the evidence, that the party is entitled to judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Chatham County; Daniels, Judge.

Special proceedings by J. J. Nall and wife against M. B. McMath and others, before the clerk for the establishment of a dividing line. Plaintiffs appealed from the decision in favor of defendants, and the cause was transferred to the trial docket. Judgment in accordance with verdict, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This is a special proceeding instituted before the clerk for the establishment of the dividing line between the respective parties. The case was heard before the clerk after the survey had been made and the surveyor had filed his report, and he decided in favor of the contentions of the defendant. The plaintiffs appealed, and the cause was transferred to the trial docket, and when the same was called for trial before his honor he referred the same to R. H. Dixon, Esq., as referee to hear the evidence, find the facts, and report his finding of fact and conclusion of law. The said reference was a compulsory one. The referee made his report to the court, again finding in favor of the defendants. To this report the plaintiffs filed exceptions, proposed an issue, and demanded a trial by jury thereon, and the cause came on for hearing on the said exception of the plaintiffs. After the jury had retired for some hours, one of the jurors approached the judge, and after a short conference the judge called counsel for both parties to the bench and told them that the juror wished to know if they had a right to disregard the contentions of both parties and to establish the line at a point different from that contended by either, the judge asking the counsel what they thought should be his instruction, if anything, whereupon the counsel for the defendant suggested that under the word of the issue he thought all he could tell the jury was that they could begin the line where they chose, and found from evidence to be true point; that it was their duty to find from the evidence what was the true dividing line and to so declare. This proposition was not objected to as to the judge's duty in response to the juror's inquiry, but neither side consented as to where they should find the line, nor did either side consent that they should find the line, except as to where they should find it under the evidence. There was no consent on either side or suggestion as to what the verdict should be, or where they should find the line, and there was no request for such consent from inquiring jurors as to his province. When the jury returned they stated to the court what they had decided, and the court in helping the jury with its findings asked them if they meant to divide the disputed land, to which they replied in the affirmative. The attorneys for both sides aided the court in suggestions as to what they understood the jury wanted to do while the jury was standing in the bar waiting for the court to aid them in getting their answer as they wished it, but there was no consent or intimation of consent from either side that such should be their verdict or that they were satisfied with it. The evidence of the plaintiffs tended to prove that the true line was from 6 to 7 on the plat, and that of the defendants that it was from 9 to 10. The jury returned a verdict establishing the line equally distant from 6 to 7 and 9 to 10. The defendants moved to set aside the verdict upon the ground that there was no evidence to support it, which motion was refused, and defendants excepted. Judgment was entered in accordance with the verdict, and the defendants appealed.

Siler & Barber, of Siler City, and R. H. Hayes, of Pittsboro, for appellants.

W. P. Horton, of Pittsboro, and Fred W. Bynum, of Rockingham, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. [1] The principle is well established that an objection that there is no evidence to support a verdict will not be considered when made for the first time after the verdict has been returned (State v. Leak, 156 N. C. 643, 72 S. E. 567), and there is no reason for refusing to enforce the rule when it appears, as it does in this record, that both parties had full notice that the jury was not satisfied to find the true line to be as contended for by either party, and when, not only was there no opposition to a departure from these contentions and no request to instruct the jury they must find according to the contention of one or the other, but, on the contrary, counsel on both sides aided the court and jury in framing the answer to the issue, without suggesting that there was no evidence to support this finding until after the return of the verdict.

[2] We have, however, examined the evidence, and cannot say that the jury has not established the true line between the parties. It is true that most of the evidence was directed to the lines according to the respective contentions of the plaintiffs and the defendants, but the surveyor testified that the acreage of the plaintiffs and defendants exceeded that called for in their deeds, and a number of deeds were introduced by both parties, which required allowances for variations in the compass, and as to the deeds of both plaintiffs and defendants the distances in order to reach their respective claims required more than was called for in the deeds.

We would not be understood as holding that the jury has the right to compromise the claims of litigants; and, if it clearly appeared that they had done so, and had returned the verdict with nothing to sustain it, and that there was no notice of the purpose to do so, the parties would be entitled to relief.

[3] The motion for judgment non obstante veredicto has nothing to sustain it, as this motion can only be granted when it appears from the pleadings and the verdict, and not from the evidence, that the party is entitled to judgment. Baxter v. Irvin, 158 N. C. 277, 73 S. E. 882.

The judgment must be affirmed.

No error.

WELDON v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY.
(No. 100.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 5, 1919.)

1. TRIAL ¶365(1)—CONSTRUCTION OF VERDICT.

A verdict must be interpreted and allowed significance by proper reference to the testimony and charge of the court.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ¶217(26)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—BRAKEMAN.

Railroad's brakeman did not assume risk of injury when railroad caused its train suddenly to stop in so extraordinary a manner as to cause brakeman to be violently thrown off car, he having had no opportunity to know of conditions or appreciate dangers.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT ¶240(4)—INJURIES TO SERVANTS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where railroad's freight conductor locked door of caboose, thereby forcing brakeman either on platform or steps, and brakeman stood on steps that he might alight to open switch, holding onto grabiron, and was thrown from train by sudden and unusual stoppage, he was not negligent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Warren County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Minnie J. Weldon, administratrix, against the Seaboard Air Line Railway. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. No error.

This is an action brought by Minnie J. Weldon, administratrix of the estate of Claude T. Andrews, to recover damages for the death of Claude T. Andrews, which was alleged to have been caused by his being thrown under the wheels of the car by the sudden stopping of a freight train on which he was employed by the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company as flagman at Norlina, N. C., on November 1, 1917. The leg of the plaintiff's intestate was run over by the wheels of the caboose on defendant's freight train and so mangled that amputation was necessary. He was carried from Norlina to Raleigh, his leg was amputated, and he died as the result of the injury on November 4, 1917.

The intestate was a flagman on the train which was preparing to stop in order to put it on a siding at Norlina. The train was in charge of C. L. Jeannette, conductor. As the train approached Norlina, the conductor and the intestate were in the caboose. Both of them left the caboose, and the conductor locked the door.

The conductor, a witness for the defendant, testified, among other things:

"As we neared the switch, Andrews and I came out of the caboose. He was first and went down on the step, and I stood above him. As we got near the switch, I held my hand over Andrews' shoulder and gave the signal to slow the train. * * * When he fell, there was no jolt of the train that I could discover, and I was standing on the step above him; he was standing on a lower step preparing to get off. It was his place to get off and open the switch; his duty was to get off on the ground safely as I was to do."

The evidence for the plaintiff tended to prove that the train was moving at a high rate of speed and was stopped so suddenly and with such violence that the intestate was thrown from the train and was injured, while the evidence of the defendant tended to prove that the intestate jumped from the train.

His honor charged the jury upon the issue of negligence as follows:

"If you find from the evidence, and by its greater weight, as I have defined to you, that the defendant carelessly and negligently attempted to stop its train upon which plaintiff's intestate was brakeman, and while so attempting to stop its train, caused said train to suddenly and violently check up or stop in such an unusual and extraordinary manner as to cause plaintiff's intestate to be violently thrown off the car upon which he was riding, or preparing to alight from, and under the said car, and find that this said negligent, violent, and sudden stopping or slowing up of said train was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's intestate being ejected from the train and run over, then you will answer this first issue, 'Yes.' If you do not so find, you will answer, 'No.'"

There was no exception to this charge.

This is the only charge upon the issue of negligence, except certain general charges defining negligence and proximate cause.

The court also instructed the jury on the second issue, as to contributory negligence, as follows:

"Now, as to this issue the burden shifts to the defendant company to satisfy you by the evidence, and by its greater weight as I have defined the same to you, that plaintiff's intestate's injuries and subsequent death was due to his own negligence, in that he carelessly and negligently stepped off defendant's moving train and was thrown down and under same and his leg was cut off, from which injury he died a few days thereafter; if you so find, then you should answer this issue as to contributory negligence, 'Yes.' If you do not so find, then you should answer, 'No.'"

The defendant excepted to this charge upon the ground that it made the contributory negligence of the plaintiff dependent on his jumping from the train, and left out of consideration the allegations of negligence in the answer that the intestate assumed a position on the steps of the caboose while the train was in motion and before it had come to a full stop, and that he failed to hold to the grab iron on the caboose.

His honor also instructed the jury on the third issue, as to assumption of risk, as follows:

"The burden is upon the defendant to satisfy you, and by the greater weight of the evidence, that plaintiff's intestate assumed the ordinary risk and hazards incident to his occupation and employment, and which are known to him and are plainly observable, and that the occurrence which threw him from the train was a risk or hazard which he assumed, ordinary and incident to his employment in some degree. If you so find, you will answer this issue, 'Yes'; if you do not so find, you should answer this issue, 'No.'"

"If you find from the evidence, and by its greater weight as I have defined the same to you, that plaintiff's intestate was injured by the negligent conduct of the defendant company, or its agents or its employees in stopping or attempting to stop its train in such a manner as to violently throw plaintiff's intestate off the train, you should answer this third issue, 'No,' for this doctrine does not include extraordinary risks which an employé does not assume, and has no application to injuries which an employé may receive from a negligent act of his master or that of another to whom the master had delegated a duty as his employé."

The defendant excepted.

The ground of exception to these instructions upon the third issue is that his honor confined the doctrine of assumption of risk to those that were ordinary and usual, and did not tell the jury that the intestate under certain conditions assumed extraordinary risks of the employment.

The jury returned the following verdict:

"1. Was the plaintiff's intestate, Claude T. Andrews, injured by the negligence of the defendant, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"2. Did plaintiff's intestate, Claude T. Andrews, by his own negligence contribute to his injury? Answer: No.

"3. Did the plaintiff's intestate, Claude T. Andrews, assume the risk of injury? Answer: No.

"4. What damage, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover? Answer: $5,000."

Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff upon the verdict, and the defendant excepted and appealed.

Murray Allen, of Murray, for appellant.

Chas. J. Katzenstein, of New York City, Tasker Polk, of Warrenton, and W. E. Daniel, of Newbern, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1] As stated in Jones v. R. R., at the last term, 176 N. C. 260, 97 S. E. 48, "It is the accepted principle in our procedure that a verdict must be interpreted and allowed significance by proper reference to the testimony and charge of the court," and when so considered the verdict in this case establishes the fact that the plaintiff's intestate had gone upon the steps of the caboose in company with the conductor and in the performance of his duty, and while on the steps he was thrown to the ground and under the train because the train was checked and stopped in an unusual and extraordinary manner.

[2] The court charged the jury that they could not answer the first issue in the affirmative unless the defendant "caused said train to suddenly and violently check up or stop in such an unusual and extraordinary manner as to cause plaintiff's intestate to be violently thrown off the car upon which he was riding," and the finding upon the first issue in response to this charge disposes of the defendant's exceptions to the charges on the issue of assumption of risk, because, as held in the Jones Case, supra, the employé does not assume the risk "in cases of unusual and instant negligence and under circumstances which afforded the injured employé no opportunity to know of the conditions or appreciate the attendant dangers. This doctrine of assumption of risk is based upon knowledge or a fair and reasonable opportunity to know, and usually this knowledge and opportunity must 'come in time to be of use.'"

Substantially the same objection was made to the charge of the court in the Jones Case, and the court, dealing with the exception of the defendant, said:

"But, having restricted the fact of liability on the first issue to the single question whether the engineer made the flying switch negligently by bringing his engine to an unnecessary and unusual and sudden stop, and this having been determined in plaintiff's favor, the court, under the authorities, was justified in ruling that there could be no assumption of risk, and his definition was without appreciable significance and should not be allowed to affect the result."

This fits the facts of the present case, and would have justified his honor in going further than he did, and in instructing the jury that if the intestate of the plaintiff was thrown from the train by reason of an unusual and extraordinary stop, which is the finding on the first issue, there would be no assumption of risk.

The authorities supporting this principle are cited and discussed in the learned and valuable opinion of Associate Justice Hoke, and the case of Boldt v. R. R., 245 U. S. 442, 38 Sup. Ct. 139, 62 L. Ed. 385, on which the defendant relied, is considered and distinguished.

[3] The exception to the charge on contributory negligence, in that the court failed to submit to the jury the alleged negligence of the intestate in going upon the steps and in not holding to the grab iron, is not supported by the evidence, as the conductor testified that he had locked the door of the caboose, thereby forcing the intestate either upon the platform or the steps, and that the intestate was standing on the steps in order that he might alight in the performance of his duty to open the switch, and the evidence shows that he had hold of the grabiron when he was thrown from the train. We see nothing in this tending to prove negligence.

No error.

HARVELL v. HAYNES AUTO CO.
(No. 99.)

1. EVIDENCE §468 — PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITING—SALE OF AUTOMOBILES.

In action to recover from automobile company deposit made on contract for purchase of cars, testimony of plaintiff that company's agent stated to him that certain type of car would not be furnished held admissible, its effect not being to change or alter contract, but to corroborate plaintiff's contention that contract had not been complied with.

2. EVIDENCE §244(7) — STATEMENTS OF AGENT ADMISSIBLE AGAINST PRINCIPAL.

In action to recover deposit on contract for purchase of automobiles, statements to plaintiff after contract was made, of agent of the auto company, who was acting by its authority, in regard to the subject of his mission, were competent.

3. SALES §391(7)—DEPOSIT ON CONTRACT—RIGHT TO RECOVER.

Where automobile company, without assent of buyer of cars, altered contract, all cars actually delivered having been paid for by buyer, failure of company to perform contract as made entitled buyer to recover deposit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by H. A. Harvell against the Haynes Auto Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. No error.

This was an action brought to recover a deposit of $250 under contract 16th March, 1917, made by plaintiff with defendant's agent for the purchase of ten cars, two of which were delivered, and eight of which were never delivered though demanded. The contract was signed in Weldon, but was not to be binding until accepted by the defendant in Atlanta. When the duplicate of the contract was returned from Atlanta it had been materially altered, and Harvell did not accept the contract as altered, but demanded delivery upon the original contract. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Appeal by defendant.

W. E. Daniel, of Weldon, for appellant.

George C. Green, of Weldon, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The first issue was, "Did the defendant alter the contract of 16th March, 1917, after execution by the plaintiff and without his consent?" To which the jury responded, "Yes."

[1, 2] The only question necessary for determination is whether there was error as to this issue in that the court permitted the plaintiff to testify as to a conversation with Turnage, the agent with whom he made the contract, and three months after it was made, when, after a dispute had arisen, Turnage was sent to adjust the difference with the plaintiff.

The plaintiff testified that on that occasion Turnage stated to him that the "Little Haynes Junior" car, which was one of those stipulated for in the original contract, would not be furnished, and that he (the plaintiff) asked Turnage about the $250 deposit, and Turnage stated that as soon as he got to Atlanta he would have the check for the $250 sent back to plaintiff.

At the time the plaintiff made the deposit of $250 he had bought two light Haynes cars.

Later he wired the defendant to hold up the shipment of the two touring cars, though he was not canceling the contract. The evidence by him is that he did not cancel the order for the two cars named, but merely was asking that the shipment of them should be held up. There is no testimony in the record that the plaintiff ever recognized the amended contract, or ever purchased any cars other than the two ordered 16th March, or that he ever ordered any cars except the Haynes Junior, all three of which were called for in the contract of 16th March.

The effect of this testimony is not to change or alter the contract, but to corroborate the plaintiff's contention that the contract had not been complied with. Turnage was acting by authority of defendant at the time, and his statements in regard to the subject of his mission were competent.

[3] The jury having found upon competent testimony that the contract had been altered by the defendant without assent of the plaintiff, and there being no controversy that all the cars actually delivered had been paid for, the failure of the defendant to perform the contract, as set out in the written agreement, entitled the plaintiff to recover the $250 deposit, both because made under the contract which the defendant vitiated by the alteration as found by the jury, and because of the failure of defendant to comply therewith. The defendant holds it without any equivalent rendered therefor, and should return it.

No error.

In re SAUNDERS' WILL

ARNOLD et al. v. WINDLEY et al.

(No. 172.)

1. WITNESSES §158 — COMPETENCY — TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENT.

Grandson of testatrix and devisee under will was competent to testify that when will was opened it contained erasures in question, and that he did not make them; Revisal 1906, § 1631, disqualifying parties in interest from testifying only as to personal transactions with deceased.

2. WITNESSES §158 — COMPETENCY — TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENT.

Testatrix's daughter and devisee under will was competent to testify that she had not seen will before her mother's death, and did not make erasures in question; Revisal 1906, § 1631, disqualifying parties in interest from testifying only as to personal transactions with deceased.

3. WILLS §290, 297(4)—ERASURES—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Declaration of testatrix that she had stricken out a part of will was competent, and the burden was on the parties claiming to hold under the erased part to show that it was not erased by testatrix.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Whedbee, Judge.

Proceedings by James T. Arnold and others against Mary E. Windley, executrix, and others, to annul the probate of the will of Eliza J. Saunders, deceased. From decree rendered, caveators appeal. No error.

A. D. Ward and W. F. Ward, both of Newbern, for appellants.

Abernethy, Henderson & Willis, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. The will of the testatrix has been probated both in common and solemn form. The only question presented was as to whether certain words which had been erased with pen and ink were erased by the testatrix or some one else at her request, or whether it was done without authority. When the will was opened, the erasures were in the will. There was testimony that the testatrix had told the witness that these names had been marked out by her, and that the propounders, her daughter and grandson, would get all the property.

[1, 2] The exceptions are solely to the competency of the grandson and the daughter, devisees under the will. The grandson, Elias Windley, testified that when the will was opened these erasures were in the paper, and that he did not make them. Mary E. Windley, the daughter of the deceased and also a beneficiary in the will, testified that she did not see the will before her mother's death, and that she did not make the alterations. These were matters which occurred after the death of the testator and which were not transactions or communications between her and the witness.

[3] The declaration of the testator, after he made the will, that he had stricken out any part thereof, was competent, and the burden was on the parties claiming to hold under the erased part that it was not erased by the testator. Barfield v. Carr, 169 N. C. 574, 86 S. E. 498.

Under Revisal 1631, formerly Code 590, the parties in interest are disqualified from testifying only as to personal transactions with the deceased. For instance, such party could testify that a paper writing was in the handwriting of the deceased (Hussey v. Kirkman, 95 N. C. 65; Armfield v. Colvert, 103 N. C. 147, 9 S. E. 461; Sawyer v. Grandy, 113 N. C. 42, 18 S. E. 79), or as to any independent fact which was neither a transaction nor communication with the testator (McCall v. Wilson, 101 N. C. 600, 8 S. E. 255; Cox v. Lumber Co., 124 N. C. 78, 32 S. E. 381; Davidson v. Bardin, 139 N. C. 3, 51 S. E. 779). The subject is fully discussed with citation of authorities. Johnson v. Cameron, 136 N. C. 243, 48 S. E. 640; Brown v. Adams, 174 N. C. 502, 93 S. E. 989, L. R. A. 1918C, 911. The latest case on the subject is Sutton v. Wells, 175 N. C. 3, 94 S. E. 688, which holds that a party in interest may testify to any substantive fact which is independent of any transaction or communication with the deceased or is based upon independent knowledge not derived from such source.

HARTSFIELD v. BRYAN et al. (No. 171.)

1. PARTITION ⇐107 — PETITION TO SET ASIDE JUDGMENT — CAPTION — TITLE OF CAUSE.

As there are no terms of court where special proceeding in partition is pending before clerk, each case having its own return day, a petition entitled in the original cause, but addressed to clerk, to set aside judgment rendered therein, is not demurrable because not giving term of court or any court in caption.

2. PARTITION ⇐107—SETTING ASIDE JUDGMENT — PLEADING — PERSONS INTERESTED — SUFFICIENCY.

A petition or written motion in partition proceeding to set aside judgment entered by clerk, properly entitled, but stating, "Your petitioner R. W., attorney at law and in fact, for and in behalf of W. I. Hall, and many others (naming them), heirs at law of John Haywood, deceased," sufficiently showed that persons named were heirs at law of particular John Haywood whose property was being partitioned, and that R. W. appeared for heirs and not for himself.

3. PLEADING ⇐193(5) — COMPLAINT — DEMURRER.

A complaint will be sustained as against demurrer, if any part presents facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, or if facts sufficient for that purpose can be gathered from it under a liberal construction of its terms.

4. PLEADING ⇐18 — CONSTRUCTION OF PLEADINGS—STATUTES.

Although pleadings are now under the Code construed favorably to pleader to effectuate main purpose of having cases tried upon their real merits, pleadings must be so drawn as to present clearly the issue in the case, and all facts going to make up a cause of action must be stated as plainly and concisely as is consistent with perfect accuracy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Whedbee, Judge.

Proceeding for partition by J. L. Hartsfield against James A. Bryan and others. From a judgment overruling a demurrer to a petition to set aside judgment ordering lands sold, the petitioner appeals. No error.

This is a petition, or written motion, in the above-entitled special proceeding for partition, to set aside the judgment rendered therein on February 6, 1900, by the clerk of the superior court, by which the lands were ordered to be sold. The sale was made to James A. Bryan, one of the defendants, and confirmed by the clerk.

The petition to set aside the judgment is entitled as of the original cause, but is addressed to the clerk of the superior court of Craven county, as follows:

"Your petitioner, R. E. Whitehurst, attorney at law and in fact for and in behalf of W. I. Hall and many others (naming them), heirs at law of John Haywood, deceased, and on behalf of all other persons having a like interest as heirs of John Haywood, deceased, respectfully petitions the court as follows:"

Then follows a statement of the facts upon which the motion is based, it being alleged, among other things, that the publication of the summons was defective, and that the judgment was not indexed and cross-indexed, as required by the statute, and the petitioners have had no notice of it until recently. It is then further alleged:

"That your petitioner, R. E. Whitehurst, is attorney at law and in fact for a portion of the heirs at law of John Haywood, owners of more than one-third ($\frac{1}{3}$) of the undivided interest in the estate of John Haywood, and that this petition is brought on their behalf as well as on the behalf of other persons having a like interest with them."

The defendant James A. Bryan demurred to this petition upon the grounds:

1. That said petition is deficient in law for that it appears on its face—

(a) It does not give any term of court or any court in the caption to which it is applicable.

(b) That it is not made or filed in the name of the real parties in interest, to wit, the heirs of John Haywood, deceased.

(c) For that it appears that it is filed by R. E. Whitehurst, an attorney at law and in fact, and that the said R. E. Whitehurst has no interest in the subject-matter and is not the real party in interest.

2. That it appears on the face of said complaint that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute the cause of action.

(1) For that it does not appear in any allegation of the complaint that R. E. Whitehurst, the petitioner, is the real party in interest.

(d) For that it does appear on the face of the complaint that R. E. Whitehurst, the petitioner, is not the real party in interest and has no interest in the subject-matter.

(e) For that it does not appear in any of the allegations of the complaint that the real parties in interest are filing the petition or making the application.

(f) For that it is not alleged in any allegation of the complaint that the persons named in the paragraph immediately preceding the first allegation are the heirs at law of John Haywood, and the heirs at law of the particular John Haywood referred to in the title of the cause, or are in any other respect owners of the John Haywood interest in the lands referred to in the petition.

The clerk overruled the demurrer, and the defendant James A. Bryan appealed to the superior court, and in that court the judgment of the clerk was affirmed, and the same defendant appealed, and assigned the overruling of his demurrer as error.

O. R. Thomas and R. E. Whitehurst, both of Newbern, for appellant.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] There are no terms of court where a proceeding is pending before the clerk. He has no stated terms or sessions, and each case has its own return day. The petition is therefore sufficiently entitled, if any defect of the kind indicated would be the subject of demurrer.

[2] We are of the opinion that there are sufficient allegations as to the real parties in interest and as to those who are named in the first paragraph of the petition, being the heirs of John Haywood. The specific allegation is that the petitioners for whom Mr. Whitehurst appeared as attorney at law and in fact are "the heirs at law of John Haywood, deceased," and also that he appeared "on behalf of all other persons having a like interest as heirs of John Haywood, deceased." Here is a clear statement that the said parties are heirs at law of John Haywood, and that they are the persons who are really interested in the special proceeding.

[3, 4] The objection that Mr. Whitehurst brings the suit in his own name, although for the parties named, and is not himself interested in the proceeding, is untenable, as he does not, in fact, sue for himself, or set up any interest in the property which is in dispute, but brings the suit only in behalf of those parties. It is substantially the same as if he had first named the parties, and then stated that they appeared by him as their attorney, which would have been the better form. The error, though, is formal only, and not at all material, as the true character of the proceeding appears with sufficient certainty.

A complaint will be sustained, as against a demurrer, as we have held, if any part presents facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, or if facts sufficient for that purpose can be gathered from it, under a liberal construction of its terms. Blackmore v. Winders, 144 N. C. 212, 56 S. E. 874; Bank v. Duffy, 156 N. C. 83, 72 S. E. 96; Eddleman v. Lentz, 158 N. C. 65, 66, 72 S. E. 1011; Hendrix v. So. Ry. Co., 162 N. C. 9, 77 S. E. 1001. We said in Bank v. Duffy, supra, that a complaint will not be overthrown by demurrer unless it is wholly insufficient; that is, if from all its parts we can see that there is a cause of action and sufficient ground for relief in law or equity. But it must not be supposed, as was said in Eddleman v. Lentz, supra, that because pleadings are now under the Code construed favorably to the pleader, to effectuate the main purpose of having cases tried upon their real merits, it permits the pleader to disregard the ordinary and familiar rule requiring pleadings to be so drawn as to present clearly the issues in the case. The Code provides that the cause of action shall be plainly and concisely stated, but this does not mean that essential fullness of statement shall be sacrificed to conciseness, but that all the facts going to make up the cause of action must be stated as plainly and concisely as is consistent with perfect accuracy, and that no material allegation should be omitted. Looseness in pleading and inadequacy of allegation are as much condemned by the present Code of Procedure as they were under the former strict and exacting system of the common law. It is form and fiction that have been abolished, but the essential principles of good pleading have been retained. Blackmore v. Winders, supra, and Bank v. Duffy, supra.

We think the petition in this case is framed with such substantial accuracy as to disclose a good cause of action. Brewer v. Wynne, 154 N. C. 467, 70 S. E. 947; Womack v. Carter, 160 N. C. 286, 75 S. E. 1102. But, while we sustain the judge in overruling the demurrer, we can well see that, if the petition had been drawn with more regard for the rules as to certainty and precision, the demurrer would not have been interposed, and this appeal would have been avoided. Consequently both parties were at fault, and for this reason, and in the exercise of our discretion, we divide the costs of this court. The plaintiff will pay one half, and the defendant James A. Bryan the other half thereof. The defendant will be allowed to answer, when issues can be framed and the case tried upon its merits. He will then have an opportunity to be heard upon all the facts, without prejudice from the overruling of the demurrer.

No error.

ADAMS et al. v. HARDIN MOTOR CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 24, 1919.)

DAMAGES ⇨190—SPECIAL DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

In action for actual and special damages for failure to repair automobile within time agreed upon, evidence held to show no basis upon which jury could estimate special damages as to loss of profits.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; M. S. Whalen, Judge.

Action by Jess Adams and another against the Hardin Motor Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed, and case sent back for entry of nonsuit.

J. Hughes Cooper and Wm. N. Graydon, both of Columbia, for appellant.

C. S. Monteith, of Columbia, for respondents.

FRASER, J. There is evidence in the record that one Lula Niles owned an automobile and left it with the defendant, in October, 1917; that the defendant agreed to do the work within a week or 10 days; that a few days thereafter the plaintiffs bought the automobile and went to see the defendant, and notified it that he had bought the car, and that the defendant's agent renewed the promise to do the work within the 10 days; that the defendant was notified that the automobile was to be used in the transfer business in the city of Columbia; that the defendant did not complete the repairs and deliver the car until the 23d January, 1918. This action is brought for "actual and special damages," for the failure to repair the said car in the time agreed upon.

There are eight exceptions, but appellant treats the first four together, and thus states the question:

I. "We submit that the motion for a nonsuit as to special damages ought to have been granted. In order to recover for special damages for the breach of a contract, it is necessary to allege and prove that the defendant had notice, at the time of making the contract, of the special circumstances from which the damages might reasonably be expected to result." It is true that the first contract was made with Lula Niles, but there is evidence from which the jury might have found that the plaintiffs and the defendant made a new contract, after the purchase, containing the same provisions. If the jury took that view of the evidence, then it was a new contract, and there was evidence that the defendant was notified of the special circumstances at the time of the making of the new contract between the plaintiff and the defendant.

II. The second ground for a nonsuit was that there was no evidence as to special damages upon which to base a verdict. This exception must be sustained. The plaintiff said that he had "never run a transfer, and did not know what transfer people made." It is true he said he thought "that a car running in good order could clear $10 or $15 a day." That was a mere opinion, based on nothing. Joel Jackson, another witness for the plaintiff, who was in the "transfer" business, said that for three days he had rented his car to some drummers for $15 per day. Those were exceptional days, and could form no basis from which the rental value of an automobile could be inferred. The record shows no basis from which the jury would have estimated the special damages.

The other questions need not be considered, as the judgment must be set aside.

The judgment is reversed, and the case is sent back to have a nonsuit entered.

VICKSBURG, S. & P. RY. v. DE BOW.

DE BOW v. VICKSBURG, S. & P. RY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. RAILROADS ⇨33(2) — PERSONAL JUDGMENT AGAINST FOREIGN CORPORATION—DOING BUSINESS IN STATE.

It is essential to the legal rendition of a personal judgment against a foreign corporation, otherwise than by its voluntary appearance, that the corporation be doing business within the state.

2. RAILROADS ⇨33(2) — PERSONAL JUDGMENT AGAINST FOREIGN CORPORATION—"DOING BUSINESS" IN STATE.

A foreign railroad corporation, which neither owns, leases, nor operates any line of road within the state of Georgia, is not "doing business" within the state, in the sense that liability to service is incurred, because it maintains an office and employs an agent, resident in the state, for the merely incidental business of soliciting freight, especially where the transitory cause of action did not grow out of, and had no connection with, business so initiated.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Doing Business.]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨329—CROSS-BILL OF EXCEPTIONS — PARTIES DEFENDANT — WAIVER.

Motion to dismiss cross-bill of exceptions for want of necessary parties defendant in error, who were formal parties in trial court, will be denied, where leave to amend was asked and parties omitted consented in writing to be made parties, waived service, and agreed to hearing of case on merits.

4. CORPORATIONS \Leftrightarrow 665(1)—SUIT AGAINST CORPORATION AGENT—JURISDICTION.

A corporation can be found in any jurisdiction where it carries on business through agents resident or located therein, and suits may be maintained against it in that jurisdiction, if the laws thereof provide a method of perfecting service upon its agents.

5. CORPORATIONS \Leftrightarrow 642(4½) — "DOING BUSINESS."

The taking of orders by an agent, subject to approval of foreign corporation at its office outside the state, constitutes "doing business" within the state, so as to subject it to the jurisdiction of the state courts, in view of Civ. Code 1910, § 2258.

Certiorari from Court of Appeals.

Action by J. D. B. De Bow against the Vicksburg, Shreveport & Pacific Railway. Judgment for plaintiff, his motion for new trial overruled, and he excepts and brings error, and defendant filed a cross-bill of exceptions; and from a judgment of the Court of Appeals (21 Ga. App. 732, 95 S. E. 261), reversing upon the main bill of exceptions and affirming the judgment upon the cross-bill, the Supreme Court granted a writ of certiorari. Reversed and remanded.

J. D. B. De Bow, a citizen of the state of Tennessee, filed his suit in the superior court of Fulton county, Ga., against the Vicksburg, Shreveport & Pacific Railway, a nonresident corporation, as an initial carrier for hire, to recover $20,000 alleged to be the value of a certain hog shipped by him in interstate commerce from Shreveport, La., to Montgomery, Ala. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant received the hog at Shreveport for transportation, and undertook faithfully to transport the hog to the plaintiff at Montgomery, and issued to the plaintiff its receipt and bill of lading in due form; that in the course of the transportation the special car, provided at the expense of the plaintiff, for the purpose of transporting valuable live stock, was delivered by the defendant to its connecting carrier at Meridian, Miss.; and that through the negligence of the connecting carrier the hog received an injury from which it died. One of the allegations of the petition was:

"The said defendant company has and maintains an office and place of business in the said county of Fulton, in said state of Georgia, and has an agent who therein transacts business for and on behalf of said defendant corporation."

A deputy sheriff made the following return:

"I have this day served the defendant by delivering a copy of the within petition and process to J. F. Hardin, the agent of the defendant company, in person at Room 404 in the Equitable Building in the city of Atlanta, Fulton county, Georgia, the same being the place of transacting the usual and ordinary public business of said corporation within said county. This 7th day of May, 1910."

At the first term the defendant, without submitting itself to the jurisdiction of the court, filed a traverse to the return of service, and prayed that both the sheriff of Fulton county and the deputy sheriff making said return be made parties thereto, and that the return of service be quashed and the case be dismissed. The ground of the traverse was as follows:

"This defendant says that it has never been served with any notice or process in said suit; that J. F. Hardin is not its agent in the sense that service upon him would be served upon it; that it has never done and does not now do any business in the state of Georgia; that it has never owned or operated and does not now own or operate any line of railroad in said state; that it has never had and has not now within said state an agent for transacting its usual and ordinary public business; that it has never had and has not within said state a place of transacting its usual and ordinary public business; and that it has never had and has not within said state of Georgia an agency for the transaction of its usual and ordinary public business."

At said term the defendant, insisting upon its traverse to the return of service in said cause, made its special appearance for the purpose of pleading to the jurisdiction of the court. In its plea to the jurisdiction the ground contained in its traverse to the return of service, quoted above, was repeated, and in addition thereto the defendant alleged that it, in connection with two other named nonresident railroad corporations, maintains an office in the city of Atlanta "for the said John F. Hardin, and pays him a monthly salary for his services as a commercial agent only. As such the said Hardin has no authority on behalf of this defendant to issue bills of lading for it, nor make contracts of affreightment, nor sell passenger tickets, nor to make contracts of carriage with passengers; but he is solely a soliciting agent, and his duties and authority are to endeavor to have freight moving from or into the Southern territory pass over the lines of defendant, such lines being wholly without the state of Georgia," and that the attempt to bring this defendant into the jurisdiction of said court is in violation of that portion of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which declares:

"No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

The traverse, plea in abatement, and plea to the jurisdiction were duly verified. The court, to whom the issues on the traverse and plea were submitted without the intervention of a jury, found against the traverse and against the plea, entering a judgment striking the traverse and plea, and ordering the cause to proceed. To this judgment the defendant excepted pendente lite. Not waiving its right to except to the judgment upon the traverse and plea to the jurisdiction, the defendant filed its answer to the petition, contending that upon the facts pleaded it was not an initial carrier, and that it was not liable for the full value of the plaintiff's hog, and, if liable at all, it was not liable in any sum in excess of $10, the agreed value of the hog as stipulated in its bill of lading. The verdict in favor of the plaintiff was for that sum; the court having in effect so limited the recovery. The plaintiff filed his motion for new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted. The defendant filed a cross-bill of exceptions, and therein assigned error upon its exceptions pendente lite. Upon review the Court of Appeals of this state reversed the judgment of the lower court upon the main bill of exceptions, and affirmed the judgment upon the cross-bill. De Bow v. Vicksburg, Shreveport & Pacific Railway, 21 Ga. App. 732, 95 S. E. 261. Upon application of the railway company, the Supreme Court granted a writ of certiorari to review the judgment of the Court of Appeals.

Anderson, Rountree & Crenshaw, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Atkinson & Born, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

GEORGE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [3] 1. A motion was made to dismiss the cross-bill of exceptions for want of necessary parties defendant in error, to wit, the sheriff and his deputy, who were formal parties in the trial court to the traverse of the return made by the deputy, as shown by the record. This motion was met by a motion to amend the cross-bill, so as to make the sheriff and his deputy defendants in error therein. The sheriff and his deputy consented in writing to be made parties, waived service, and agreed that the case be heard on its merits. This is sufficient, under the ruling in Bullard v. Wynn, 134 Ga. 636, 68 S. E. 439.

[1, 2] 2. In the view we take of this case, the traverse to the return of service should have been sustained, and the action dismissed. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to set forth the evidence contained in the record upon the merits of the case. It is proper to say that the trial court, in ruling upon the traverse to the return of service and plea to the jurisdiction, was controlled by the decision of the Court of Appeals in Bell v. New Orleans, etc., Railroad Co., 2 Ga. App.

812, 59 S. E. 102. Doubtless the Court of Appeals recognized its former decision as binding upon it in the present case. The question has not been passed upon by this court; and we have with great hesitancy reached a conclusion contrary to that reached in the Bell Case. The formal reasons set forth in the report of the Bell Case required the judgment there rendered; and in this view of the matter the ruling there made upon the question here presented was perhaps unnecessary to the decision of the case. It is conceded, however, that the question was considered and directly passed upon in that case. We have not, therefore, in our consideration of the question, treated the ruling there made as obiter dictum. On the contrary, it is our duty and disposition to regard that case, reaffirmed as it is by the decision of the Court of Appeals in this case, as entitled to great weight and credit upon the question for decision. The facts in the Bell Case are not materially different from those in the instant case.

Hardin was the commercial agent of three nonresident railroad companies, including the defendant, with an office at 404 Equitable Building in the city of Atlanta, Fulton county, Ga. The expenses of the office were prorated by the three companies. The office was maintained in Atlanta as a matter of convenience. He was paid a monthly salary by each of the companies. His duties and authority were to solicit and to endeavor to have freight moving from or into the southern territory pass over the lines of the three companies represented by him, including the defendant company. He had no authority, and did not undertake on behalf of the company, to issue bills of lading, nor make contracts of afreightment, nor to sell passenger tickets, nor to make contracts with passengers; but he acted solely in the capacity of soliciting agent for the company, which neither owned, leased, nor operated any line of road within the state of Georgia. The agent kept no books or records in his office, not even a record of his office expenses. He did not solicit passenger business. All correspondence soliciting shipments of freight was sent out from the office in Atlanta. He did not name the rate, and was not in position to do so. He had nothing whatever to do with the issuing of bills of lading. So far as appears, he did not submit tentative agreements to the roads represented by him. The office furniture, consisting of a desk, typewriter, and chairs, was provided by the railroad companies.

[4] Section 2258 of the Civil Code provides that service of process necessary to the commencement of "any suit against any corporation in any court," with certain exceptions which are not material to this decision, "may be perfected by serving any officer or agent of such corporation, or by leaving the same at the place of transacting the usual and orinary public business of such corporation, if any such place of business then shall be within the jurisdiction of the court in which said suit may be commenced." It is now well settled that a corporation can be found in any jurisdiction where it carries on business through agents resident or located therein; and suits may be maintained against it in that jurisdiction, if the laws of the same provide a method of perfecting service upon its agents. 12 R. O. L. 108. It is equally well recognized that a valid personal judgment cannot be obtained against a foreign corporation, save upon voluntary appearance by it, unless the corporation is "doing business" within the state. A clear statement of the doctrine is found in North Wisconsin Cattle Co. v. Oregon Short Line Railroad Co., 105 Minn. 198, 117 N. W. 391, 392:

"Whether such a corporation is doing business in the state is a question of jurisdiction, and in its last analysis it is one of due process of law, under the Constitution of the United States."

It was said by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of International Harvester Co. v. Kentucky, 234 U. S. 579, 583, 34 Sup. Ct. 944, 945 (58 L. Ed. 1479):

"It has been frequently held by this court, and it can be no longer doubted, that it is essential to the rendition of a personal judgment that the corporation be 'doing business' within the state."

This court, in Reeves v. Southern Railway Co., 121 Ga. 561, 565, 49 S. E. 674, 676 (70 L. R. A. 513), recognized the doctrine:

"A corporation is not always present where its officers are, but it is present in any place where its officers or agents transact business in behalf of the corporation under authority conferred by it. The weight of modern authority seems to support the proposition that a foreign corporation may be sued on a transitory cause of action in any jurisdiction where it can be found, in the sense that service may be perfected upon an agent or officer transacting business for the corporation within that jurisdiction, and that the residence of the plaintiff and the place at which the cause of action arose are not material questions to be determined to maintain jurisdiction if the corporation can be found and served."

We are clearly of the opinion that our statute makes it necessary that the foreign corporation be "doing business" in this state, before a valid personal judgment can be rendered against it in an action commenced by the service of process upon its agent located or resident within the state. As we conceive it, it is at all events the duty of the court to so construe the statute, because, as indicated above, the question is at last one of due process of law under the Constitution. What is meant exactly by the requirement "doing business" is not easily determined. As pointed out in Kendall v. Orange Judd Co., 118 Minn. 1, 136 N. W. 291, the question as to whether a foreign corporation is "doing business" in the state, so as to be subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of the state, is entirely distinct from the question as to whether such a corporation is "doing business" in the state within the purview of the act prescribing the conditions upon which such corporations may be allowed to do business within the state, and that it does not follow that business which, by reason of the interstate commerce law, does not bring the corporation within the latter statute, may not nevertheless bring it within the statute providing for the service of process. A long line of cases, from probably every state of the Union, might be cited, in which a foreign corporation has been held not to be doing business within the state, so as to subject it to the requirements imposed upon such corporations doing business within the state. Where the interstate commerce law is the basis of the decision, this fact must be kept in view. See Auto Trading Co. v. Williams (Okla.) 177 Pac. 583.

[5] There is some conflict of opinion as to whether the taking of orders by an agent, subject to the approval of the corporation at its office or place of business outside of the state, constitutes "doing business" within the state, so as to render the corporation liable to suit. The weight of judicial authority, state and federal, is to the effect that this is "doing business" within a state, so as to subject the foreign corporation to the jurisdiction of its courts. International Harvester Co. v. Kentucky, supra, affirming the decision of the Kentucky court in the same case in 147 Ky. 655, 145 S. W. 393. To the same effect, see Ryerson v. Wayne, 114 Mich. 352, 72 N. W. 131; Toledo Computing Scale Co. v. Miller, 38 App. D. C. 237; McSwain v. Adams Grain, etc., Co., 93 S. C. 103, 56 S. E. 117, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 981. At least the service upon an officer or agent of a foreign corporation located or resident within the state is generally considered effectual as to suits growing out of contracts entered into or to be performed in whole or in part within the state, as in the case of trading or manufacturing corporations. Where a foreign trading or manufacturing corporation has a resident agent within this state, who through solicitation obtains an order from a person within the state, although such order is taken subject to the approval of the corporation at its foreign office or place of business, such corporation may be required to answer in this state to such person for a cause of action arising out of business or transactions so initiated. This is the effect of the ruling in Armstrong v. New York & R. Co., 129 Minn. 104, 151 N. W. 917, L. R. A. 1916E, 232, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 335, and many other cases.

While a foreign corporation, with a soliciting agent within the state, may be required to answer here for a breach of contract or duty arising out of business so procured, the mere solicitation of business within the state, "unaccompanied by a local performance of contract obligations," is not "doing business" within the state, so as to bring the corporation within the jurisdiction of the courts of the state. This view is supported by the clear preponderance of judicial authority, state and federal. "A railroad company which has no tracks within the district is not doing business therein, in the sense that liability for service is incurred, because it hires an office and employs an agent for the merely incidental business of solicitation of freight and passenger traffic." Green v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 205 U. S. 530, 27 Sup. Ct. 595, 51 L. Ed. 916. To the same effect see St. Clair v. Cox, 106 U. S. 350, 1 Sup. Ct. 354, 27 L. Ed. 222, and cases infra; St. Louis, etc., R. v. Alexander, 227 U. S. 218, 33 Sup. Ct. 245, 57 L. Ed. 486, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 77; Philadelphia, etc., Ry. Co. v. McKibbin, 243 U. S. 264, 37 Sup. Ct. 280, 61 L. Ed. 710. In the recent case of Peoples Tobacco Co. v. American Tobacco Co., 246 U. S. 79, 38 Sup. Ct. 233, 62 L. Ed. 587, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 537, Mr. Justice Day, delivering the opinion, said:

"As to the continued practice of advertising its wares in Louisiana, and sending its soliciting agents into that state, as above detailed, the agents having no authority beyond solicitation, we think the previous decisions of this court have settled the law to be that such practices did not amount to that doing of business which subjects the corporation to the local jurisdiction for the purpose of service of process upon it."

The decisions in the lower federal courts accord with the view taken by the Supreme Court of the United States. Wall v. C. & O. R. Co., 95 Fed. 398, 37 C. C. A. 129; Fairbanks v. Cincinnati R. Co., 54 Fed. 420, 4 C. C. A. 403, 38 L. R. A. 271; Maxwell v. Atchison, etc., R. Co. (C. C.) 34 Fed. 286; Boardman v. McClure Co. (C. C.) 123 Fed. 614. We have not overlooked the fact that the cases cited above originated in the federal courts. However, in North Wisconsin Cattle Co. v. Oregon Short Line R. Co., supra, the Supreme Court of Minnesota decided (1908) that a railway company not having any line in the state is not, by reason of its employment of an agent whose business it is to solicit passenger and freight traffic and its maintenance of an office with clerical assistance for his use, doing business within the state and as such liable to suits therein. The Supreme Court of Tennessee, in Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Richardson, 121 Tenn. 448, 117 S. W. 496, decided (1908) that a foreign railroad corporation having no line within the state is not brought within the jurisdiction of the local courts by service of process upon a traffic solicitor in a suit upon a cause of action not arising within the state, nor out of any transaction had in whole or in part within the state. In Berger v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 27 R. I. 583, 65 Atl. 261, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1214, 8 Ann. Cas. 941, the Supreme Court of Rhode Island held (1906):

"A foreign railroad company having no transportation line within a state is not doing business there, within the meaning of a statute providing for service of process on foreign corporations doing business within the state by serving its agent, by maintaining within the state an agency to solicit shippers to direct the local carrier, to whom property is delivered for transportation, to bill it over the line of such foreign corporation."

The Constitution of the state of Alabama fixes the venue of suits against a foreign corporation in any county where it does business, by service of process upon an agent anywhere in the state, and a provision of the Alabama Code, in any county in which it does business by agent. The Supreme Court of that state, in Abraham v. Southern Ry. Co., 149 Ala. 547, 42 South. 837, held (1906) "that the act of" a railroad company "in constituting agents, with no power or authority to bind it, but simply to solicit traffic for it, is not 'doing business,' within the constitutional or statutory provisions" noted above. The facts in the Alabama case, and indeed in all the cases cited, are not materially different from the facts in the instant case. For similar rulings, see, also, Booz v. Texas, etc., R. Co. (1911) 250 Ill. 376, 95 N. E. 460; Marcus v. Nashville, etc., R. Co. (1912) 174 Ill. App. 242; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Rogers (1903) 52 W. Va. 450, 44 S. E. 300, 62 L. R. A. 178. The Supreme Court of Washington, in Macario v. Alaska Gastineau Mining Co. (1917) 96 Wash. 453, 165 Pac. 73, L. R. A. 1917E, 1152, decided that a foreign mining corporation was not present within the state, so as to subject it to a suit for a transitory cause of action, although it maintained an office within the limits of the state for the purchase and forwarding of supplies to the mines, and "for such incidental transactions, as the purchase of transportation for corporate officers and caring for injured employes, as may be necessary." Bell v. New Orleans, etc., R. Co., supra, was decided in 1907. That decision, upon exactly the question here presented, so far as our investigation has extended, is supported by the following cases: Tuchband v. Chicago & Alton R. Co., 115 N. Y. 437, 22 N. E. 360; Denver, etc., R. Co. v. Roller, 100 Fed. 738, 41 C. C. A. 22, 49 L. R. A. 77; Bristol v. Brent (1910) 38 Utah, 58, 110 Pac. 356.

The case of Armstrong v. C. & H. R. Co. (1915) 129 Minn. 104, 151 N. W. 917, L. R. A. 1916E, 232, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 335, held that a foreign railroad corporation keeping and maintaining a soliciting agent within the state might be made answerable to a suit in the state brought by a citizen thereof on account of a breach of contract or duty arising out of business so procured. To this extent that case accords with the Bell Case. In the Utah case, cited above, it will be observed that while the resident commercial agent of the company had no authority to issue bills of lading or sell passenger tickets, he nevertheless did take from prospective shippers "routing orders" which were signed by the shippers and by him sent to the nonresident corporation. In the federal case cited, the soliciting agent was clothed with the power and in fact issued bills of lading on behalf of the foreign corporation. In the New York case the facts are not fully set forth, but the decision is predicated upon the ground that the foreign corporation had an office within the state, "in which a substantial portion of its business" was transacted. The foreign corporation also had property in New York, and in the opinion we find that this property consisted of tickets and other articles in its office. But see Doty v. Mich. Cent. R. Co. (N. Y. Super. Ct. Spec. T.) 8 Abb. Prac. (N. Y.) 427.

Whether the facts of the cases noticed distinguish them from the instant case we do not decide. We think it may be conceded that the facts in the cases noted are similar to the facts in this case. The effort of the resident soliciting agent of the corporation to obtain business within this state to be done elsewhere was a mere incident of the corporation's business, important though it may be; and it cannot be affirmed that merely soliciting business within the state to be done wholly outside of the state is "doing business" within the state, so as to give the corporation a presence within the state for the purpose of service of process. Before we can yield to the suggestion that the view here taken is a narrow one, which can result only in the denial by this state of the right of the citizen to obtain personal judgments against foreign corporations in cases where resident soliciting agents can here be found, we must be prepared to accord full faith and credit to like judgments obtained upon such service by a citizen in the courts of another state against a corporation of this state. In determining this question we have, therefore, attempted to keep in view the broad principle of interstate comity. Both judicial decision and legislative act must be assumed to reflect that comity where the question of jurisdiction is involved. For a full discussion of the question involved, see note to Okura v. Forsbacka Jernverks Aktiebolag, 6 B. R. C. 792.

For error in affirming the judgment on the cross-bill of exceptions, the decision is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceeding in conformity with this opinion.

All the Justices concur, except ATKINSON, J., disqualified.

HOLLIDAY v. STATE. (No. 10147.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Feb. 11, 1919.)

1. BURGLARY \S 42(1), 46(7)—"PRESUMPTION OF FACT"—UNEXPLAINED POSSESSION OF STOLEN GOODS.

The unexplained, or the unsatisfactorily explained, possession of stolen goods—the fruits of a recent burglary—raises a presumption of guilt against their possessor. This presumption, however, is one of fact, and not of law. Accordingly, while it is error for the judge, in such a case, to charge the jury, in effect, that such possession raises a presumption of law of the defendant's guilt, it is not error to instruct them merely that such possession raises "a presumption of his guilt" (citing Words and Phrases, Second Series, Presumption of Fact).

2. CRIMINAL LAW \S 1064(1) — MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—SUFFICIENCY.

Under repeated rulings of this court and of the Supreme Court, a special ground of a motion for a new trial must be complete within itself, and will not be considered when a reference to the brief of evidence, or to some other portion of the record, is necessary to enable this court to understand the assignment of error.

3. CRIMINAL LAW \S 824(4)—ALIBI—CHARGE.

It is only where the defense of alibi is sustained, or where the evidence is close on this issue, that the trial judge is required to charge the law of alibi, in the absence of a request so to do.

4. CRIMINAL LAW §822(1)—GROUNDS—ERRONEOUS CHARGE.

Where excerpts from the charge of the court are subject to some slight criticism, a new trial will not be granted therefor if no error appears when they are considered in the light of the entire charge.

5. BURGLARY §42(4) — CRIMINAL LAW §1160—POSSESSION OF STOLEN GOODS—PRESUMPTION OF GUILT—CONVICTION.

Upon a trial for burglary, where the evidence shows that the accused was found in recent possession of stolen goods, the fruits of the burglary, and his explanation of his possession of the goods is not satisfactory to the jury, a presumption arises that he is guilty of the offense of burglary, and unless this presumption is overcome by other evidence, a verdict of guilty is authorized and cannot be set aside by this court if no error of law appears to have been committed upon the trial.

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; G. H. Howard, Judge.

Homer Holliday was convicted of burglary, and brings error. Affirmed.

D. H. Riddle, of Talladega, Ala., and Frank D. Foley and Love & Fort, all of Columbus, for plaintiff in error.

C. F. McLaughlin, Sol., Gen., of Columbus, for the State.

BROYLES, P. J. The plaintiff in error was convicted of the offense of burglary. The undisputed evidence showed that, shortly after the commission of the burglary, the stolen goods—the fruits of the burglary—were found in the defendant's possession. The defendant made an explanation of his possession of the goods. It was entirely a question for the jury whether this explanation was satisfactory to them.

"Where a burglary has been committed, and property which was in the house at the time of the burglary is soon thereafter, or recently thereafter, found in the possession of one who is unable to account satisfactorily for his possession (of which explanation you are the sole judges), it raises a presumption of his guilt."

We do not think the judge erred in giving this instruction, especially when, immediately after the excerpt just quoted, he charged as follows:

"All of these matters are for the jury under all the facts and circumstances of the case, considering the nature of the property, the length of time which had elapsed after the alleged burglary, the explanation offered by the defendant, if any, for his possession, if he was recently in possession of them, or any of the articles, if you should believe the property was stolen from the house at the time, and that a burglary was committed as charged in the indictment, as previously stated to you."

We concede that some confusion has arisen in the books on this subject. This confusion seems to have grown out of the fact that in some cases it has been held error to charge that the recent possession of stolen property, unexplained, raises a presumption of law of the defendant's guilt, while in other cases it has been held that possession raises "a presumption of his guilt," and that to so charge is not error. A careless reading of these cases, without noting the distinction between a presumption of law and a presumption of fact, might lead one into doubt as to the correct rule. There is, however, as can readily be seen, no conflict between these decisions when this distinction is kept in mind. The confusion is also partly caused by the fact that some of these decisions hold that the word "inference" should be used by the trial judge, instead of the word "presumption." A presumption of fact, however, is really nothing more than an inference.

"Presumptions are either of law or of fact. The former are conclusions and inferences which the law draws from given facts. The latter are exclusively questions for the jury, to be decided by the ordinary test of human experience." Pen. Code 1910, § 1014.

"Presumptions of fact are inferences as to the existence of some fact drawn from the existence of some other fact; inferences which common sense draws from circumstances usually occurring in such cases." 1 Phil. Ev. 436; Black's Law Dictionary, p. 933.

"Presumptions of fact," says Prof. Greenleaf, "are in truth but mere arguments, of which the major premise is not a rule of law; they belong equally to any and every subject-matter, and are to be judged by the common and received tests of the truth of propositions and the validity of arguments. They depend upon their own natural force and efficacy in generating belief or conviction in the mind, as derived from those connections which are shown by experience, irrespective of any legal relations. They differ from presumptions of law in this essential respect, that while those are reduced to fixed rules, and constitute a branch of the particular system of jurisprudence to which they belong, these merely natural presumptions are derived wholly and directly from the circumstances of the particular case, by means of the common experience of mankind, without the aid or control of any rules of law whatever. Such, for example, is the inference of guilt, drawn from the discovery of a broken knife in the pocket of the prisoner, the other part of the blade being found sticking in the window of a house, which, by means of such an instrument, had been burglariously entered." 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 44.

In deciding the case of Insurance Co. v. Welde, 11 Wall. 438, 20 L. Ed. 197, the Supreme Court of the United States defined a "presumption" to be:

"An inference as to the existence of a fact not actually known, arising from its usual connection with another which is known."

In Jones on Evidence (2d Ed.), in section 10, it is said:

"Since these inferences, sometimes called presumptions of fact, are mere permissible deductions from the evidence, it has often been suggested that they are in fact not presumptions at all, but they are constantly recognized [as such] in the decisions, although often in a confused and inaccurate manner."

"Presumptions of fact' are but inferences drawn from other facts and circumstances in a case, and should be made upon the common principles of induction." 3 Words and Phrases, Second Series, p. 1167.

In Tucker v. State, 57 Ga. 505, it was held as follows:

"That part of the charge of the court to the jury, to wit, 'Whenever it is established that a larceny has been committed, and the stolen goods are immediately afterwards found in the possession of a person, that fact is presumptive evidence that the person is guilty of the larceny of the character charged to have been committed,' was unobjectionable."

In McGruder v. State, 71 Ga. 864, the Supreme Court approved the following charge:

"If the evidence satisfies the jury that the burglary was committed as alleged, and afterwards the stolen goods were found in the house and room occupied by the defendants, this would be presumptive evidence of their guilt, unless explained [italics ours]; and any statement made by either of them, explanatory of the goods being there at the time they were so found, and while they were there, must be duly considered, and may relieve the suspicious appearance."

In Davis v. State, 76 Ga. 16, it was said in the headnote that:

"Where a burglary has been committed, and a short time thereafter some of the property which was in the house broken open before and at the time of the burglary is found in the possession of the accused, if the possession of the property is not accounted for, this affords a presumption of guilt." (Italics ours.)

And in the opinion in that case Mr. Justice Blandford said:

"Certain exceptions are taken to the charge of the court, and specific assignments are made thereon. But a careful examination of the charge of the court fails to show any foundation for the exceptions. The charge is correct, as we understand the law. The whole charge and the part excepted to is free from any exception. The whole of it is, as we understand it, that where a burglary has been committed, and a short time thereafter some of the property, which was in the house before and at the time of the burglary, is found in the possession of the accused, in such a case, if the possession of the property is not accounted for, this affords a presumption of guilt. This has been the law time out of mind. The decisions of the English courts, from whom we derived our law, and of all the courts in this country, fully establish this principle." (Italics ours.)

In Lundy v. State, 71 Ga. 360, the first headnote is as follows:

"Where a burglary has been committed, and money, goods, or other property which was in the house at the time of the burglary is soon thereafter found in the possession of a person who is unable to account for his possession, it raises a presumption of his guilt, and the jury would be authorized to find a verdict of guilty."

In August v. State, 11 Ga. App. 798, 76 S. E. 164, the fourth headnote is as follows:

"The following instruction was abstractly correct and warranted by the evidence: 'The exclusive and unexplained possession of stolen property recently after a burglary, in the commission of which a theft was perpetrated, may raise a presumption of fact that the party in possession is the burglar, where the burglary has been established beyond a reasonable doubt; and the burden would be upon the person in whose recent possession the goods, if stolen, were found to explain such possession. It is a presumption arising out of fact, and is therefore a matter for the jury—what would be recent possession is a matter for the jury, as is the satisfactoriness of the explanation. The presumption being one of fact, before it arises the state must have established the facts from which the inference is drawn, beyond a reasonable doubt; and whilst the burden is upon the defendant, if such facts have been established beyond a reasonable doubt, to explain the possession to the jury, such explanation may be drawn from any evidence in the case which demonstrates it, or from the statement of the defendant, if such statement satisfies the jury upon that point.'"

See, also, to the same effect, 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 34; Jones on Evidence (2d Ed.) §§ 9, 10; 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 845; Griffin v. State, 86 Ga. 257, 12 S. E. 409; Falvey v. State, 85 Ga. 157, 11 S. E. 607; Jones v. State, 105 Ga. 649, 650, 31 S. E. 574; Lester v. State, 106 Ga. 372, 32 S. E. 335; Cuthbert v. State, 3 Ga. App. 600, 60 S. E. 322; Bryant v. State, 4 Ga. App. 851, 62 S. E. 540.

The holding in Gravitt v. State, 114 Ga. 841, 40 S. E. 1003, 88 Am. St. Rep. 63, is not only not contrary to the present ruling, but supports it. In that case it was held that the possession of stolen property, not satisfactorily explained, does not create a presumption of law against the accused, but Mr. Justice Lewis, who wrote the opinion, clearly stated that the presumption was one of fact, and not of law. The charge of the court in that case was held to be error because the court stated, in effect, that a presumption of law that the accused was guilty was created by the recent possession of stolen goods unaccounted for. This distinction between a presumption of law and a presumption of fact is clearly set forth by Mr. Justice Cobb in Lewis v. State, 120 Ga. 508, 48 S. E. 227. In that case the following charge (which is substantially the charge complained of in the instant case) was approved:

"Where a burglary has been committed, and money, goods, or other property which was in the house at the time of the burglary is soon thereafter found in the possession of a person who is unable to account for his possession, it raises a presumption of his guilt, and the jury would be authorized to find a verdict of guilty."

Judge Cobb, in that case, like Judge Lewis in the Gravitt Case, distinctly held, in effect, that the recent possession of stolen property, unaccounted for, raises a presumption of guilt against the possessor of such property, but that this presumption is one of fact and not of law. We think, from the authorities cited above, we have conclusively shown that the charge complained of in the instant case was not erroneous.

[2] 2. The first two special grounds of the motion for a new trial are not complete within themselves. Before this court could understand the assignments of error made therein, a reference to the brief of evidence, or to other parts of the record, would be necessary. Therefore, under the ruling stated in the second headnote, these grounds cannot be considered.

[3] 3. It is only where the defense of alibi is sustained, or where the evidence is close on this issue, that the trial judge is required to charge the law of alibi, in the absence of a request so to do. Moody v. State, 114 Ga. 449, 40 S. E. 242; Smith v. State, 6 Ga. App. 577, 65 S. E. 300; Throckmorton v. State, 23 Ga. App. —, 97 S. E. 664. Under the evidence in this case the court did not err in failing to so charge.

[4] 4. The instructions of the court upon the subject of "reasonable doubt," and of circumstantial evidence, when taken in connection with the entire charge, were not erroneous.

[5] 5. Under the ruling stated in the fifth headnote, and the facts of this case, the finding of the jury, that the accused was guilty of burglary as charged in the indictment, was authorized by the evidence. It was entirely a matter for the jury to determine whether the explanation given by the accused, as to how he came into possession of the stolen goods, was satisfactory to them. They determined that it was not. The presumption then arose that the accused was guilty as charged. There was no other evidence in the case which overcame this presumption, and as the verdict has been approved by the trial judge, and no error of law appears to have been committed upon the trial, this court is without jurisdiction to set aside the verdict. Judgment affirmed.

BLOODWORTH, J., concurs.

STEPHENS, J. (dissenting). There is not a particle of evidence in this case tending in any manner to connect the defendant with the alleged burglary other than an alleged recent possession by him of some of the goods stolen unsatisfactorily accounted for. His conviction is therefore dependent upon the rule of law that upon the trial of a defendant charged with burglary, when a breaking is shown and the defendant is found in recent possession of the goods stolen, the possession unexplained to the satisfaction of the jury, the jury is authorized to infer his guilt. The judge charged the jury as follows:

This portion of the charge instructed the jury that it was their duty as a matter of law to convict the defendant on such evidence. The charge in this respect was erroneous and contrary to law in that such evidence did not demand a conviction, but merely authorized the jury, in its discretion, to convict. This error was not cured by the judge immediately thereafter further stating in his charge that—

Since the defendant's guilt depended entirely upon a proper application of the rule of law which the judge attempted to give here in charge, the charge in this respect should have been clear and free from any ambiguity or misconstruction. The additional qualifying language was susceptible to the construction that if the jury were not satisfied with the explanation of recent possession offered by the defendant, then the jury should find him guilty, and it would be obligatory upon them to bring in a verdict to that effect, whereas the true rule is that under such circumstances the jury would only be authorized, in its discretion, to find the defendant guilty. The law is well settled that such prima facie evidence of guilt merely authorizes and does not demand a conviction. Such evidence is not of itself necessarily proof of guilt. It creates no presumption of law against the defendant, and does not, as a matter of law, require his conviction. In the case of Gravitt v. State, 114 Ga. 841, 40 S. E. 1003, 88 Am. St. Rep. 63, where the court below charged the jury that where under such a state of facts, the accused failed to account for the alleged stolen property "to the satisfaction of the jury, the law presumes that he is the guilty party," this charge was held to be error. Mr. Justice Lewis, in that case, referring to this language, said:

"This charge states too broadly the rule applicable to recent possession of stolen property, and it was error manifestly prejudicial to the accused."

This language was identical in substance and effect with that portion of the charge referred to and excepted to in the instant case.

After all, it is purely a question of a construction of the judge's charge. Do we or do we not construe the language as submitting to the jury the proposition as a presumption of law, or as a presumption of fact? From an inspection of the original record in the Gravitt Case, cited supra, the language of the charge as a whole comes nearer submitting the proposition as a presumption of fact than does the charge in the case we are now called upon to decide. As I plant my dissent upon the authority of the Gravitt Case, I quote at length from the charge in that case:

"A rule of law is that when there has been a larceny, a breaking and entering and taking away the goods of another, and some party is found to be in the recent possession of these goods soon after they were stolen, soon after the burglary is committed, or larceny was committed, then if he fails satisfactorily to account for his possession to the satisfaction of the jury, the jury has the right to presume he is the guilty party, but if he shows satisfactorily to the jury that his possession is lawful, then nothing may be presumed against him as to his guilt. Now, in weighing the subject all that the defendant said is to be considered by the jury. What did he say? Did he make different statements? Did he say who he got them from, and always say the same, or was there a difference about it? Was there any reason for telling it different? Examine it all. If it is satisfactory to your minds, if he made satisfactory explanations, then possession would not be proof of his guilt, but if it is not satisfactory, then possession would be proof of his guilt, but if it is not satisfactorily explained, then the law authorizes you to presume that he is the guilty party, because if he got them lawfully he could account for their possession, and if he did not the law presumes he is the guilty party; what I mean to say is this, if he has the goods in his possession, then he must account for that possession, and when he does, when he accounts for it to the satisfaction of the jury, then there is no presumption against him that he was the guilty party, but if he fails to account for it to the satisfaction of the jury, the law presumes he is the guilty party."

Nota bene the following expressions in the charge in that case:

"If he fails satisfactorily to account for his possession to the satisfaction of the jury, the jury has the right to presume he is the guilty party. * * * If it is satisfactory to your minds, if he made satisfactory explanations, then possession would not be proof of his guilt, but if it is not satisfactory, then possession would be proof of his guilt, but if it is not satisfactorily explained, then the law authorizes [italics mine] you to presume he is the guilty party."

I am willing to stand with Mr. Justice Lewis, the great jurist who wrote the opinion in that case. I feel that my position is well fortified when I can rely upon him as authority.

This rule is easily misunderstood, and in cases of this kind, where a conviction depends entirely upon its proper application, it should be clearly stated to the jury. There should be no language in the charge from which the jury might infer that, as a matter of law, such testimony would establish guilt, or would, in the language excepted to, "raise a presumption of guilt." The judge in his charge laid down an erroneous proposition of law, and in his subsequent language failed to correct it or so far explain it as to clearly deprive it of its erroneous meaning. This was highly prejudicial to the rights of the accused, and a new trial should for this reason be granted.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2
Feb. 12, 1919. On Motion for Rehearing,
Feb. 28, 1919.)

1. NEW TRIAL ⇐68—GROUNDS—INSUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In the record there is no evidence authorizing the defendant to have, as against the plaintiff's claim sued on, a set-off for the rents on the lands in question for the years 1916 and 1917. The jury, by their verdict, having found that the defendant was entitled to have the rents for those years set off against the plaintiff's claim, the court erred in overruling the general grounds of the plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

2. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

Under the foregoing ruling, it is unnecessary to consider the special grounds of the motion for a new trial.

3. PLEDGES ⇐28—TRANSFER OF LEASE CONTRACT AS SECURITY—OBLIGATION OF PAYEE.

Where lease contract was transferred as collateral for note in suit, the fact that holder of note agreed to collect rents every year did not bind him to keep the lands rented, but his only obligation was merely to collect and account for the rents.

Error from Superior Court, Pike County; W. E. H. Searcy, Jr., Judge.

Action by J. L. Kennedy against Mrs. M. E. McCook. Judgment for defendant, motion for new trial overruled, and plaintiff brings error. Judgment reversed.

BROYLES, P. J. Judgment reversed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

BROYLES, P. J. [3] The fact that the lease contract for certain lands was transferred by Mrs. McCook to Kennedy as collateral security for the note sued on, and that he agreed to collect the rents every year, does not show that it was his duty under the law, or that he obligated himself, to keep the lands rented. The undisputed evidence was that when the lease contract was transferred there was a tenant upon the lands; that he continued there during the years 1914 and 1915, and that Kennedy collected the rents for those years and accounted for them to Mrs. McCook; that the tenant left the lands at the end of the year 1915, and that they were not rented to any one for the two following years. There was no evidence which authorized a finding that Kennedy was responsible for the tenant leaving, or that it was his duty to secure another tenant and keep the lands rented. In our view of the case, his obligation was merely to collect the rents from any tenant that might be upon the lands and to account for such rents.

Rehearing denied.

ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. v. NEVES.
(No. 9149.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 20, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

NEW TRIAL ⇐ 158—REINSTATEMENT OF MOTION—EQUITABLE GROUNDS.

The motion to reinstate the motion for a new trial was properly overruled, as it showed no legal or equitable grounds authorizing the court to set aside the judgment dismissing the motion for a new trial.

Error from City Court of Blakely; R. H. Sheffield, Judge.

Action by J. E. Neves, administrator, against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Verdict for plaintiff, motion for new trial dismissed, demurrer to motion to reinstate motion for new trial sustained, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Pope & Bennet, of Albany, and A. H. Gray, of Blakely, for plaintiff in error.

Glessner & Collins, of Blakely, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. This case was before this court at the March term, 1917, on exceptions to a judgment in the city court of Blakely sustaining a demurrer to the petition, which judgment was reversed. See Bryant v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 19 Ga. App. 536, 91 S. E. 1047, where the substance of the petition is set forth. Upon the trial of the main case there was a verdict for the plaintiff for $500. The defendant made a motion for new trial, which was set for hearing on June 18, 1917. On June 16, 1917, John D. Pope, a member of the firm of Pope & Bennet, division counsel for the railroad, received from the court reporter a transcript of the record of the trial of the case. When the motion for new trial was called on June 18th, there was no appearance for movant, and the motion for new trial was dismissed. On the first day of the next term of the city court a motion to reinstate the motion for new trial was filed, in which it was alleged that John D. Pope, of counsel for the railroad, had entire control for the movant of the motion for a new trial; that at the time said motion for new trial was set for a hearing his partner, Bennet, was engaged in the Supreme Court, and that the local counsel, Gray, had then no connection with the case; and alleging further that because of certain reasons, stated in the petition and which need not be repeated here, the said Pope was in great distress of mind and his mental and physical efficiency was impaired, which neither Pope nor his partner realized, and on account of which his client was entitled to a continuance of the hearing of the motion for a new trial.

"By reason of the foregoing facts, and by reason of the great distress of mind under which he was suffering, the said Pope entirely overlooked the fact that said hearing was to be had on said 18th day of June, and therefore overlooked the fact that he should make a showing before the court and ask for a continuance of said hearing until he could complete said brief of evidence."

The petition was demurred to on the grounds: (a) The city court of Blakely was without jurisdiction to set aside the judgment. (b) The motion to reinstate set forth no legal or equitable grounds authorizing the court to set aside the judgment. (c) The attorneys for the railroad were chargeable with lack of diligence in not prosecuting said motion for new trial at the June term of court, and in not then and there pressing their grounds for a continuance of the hearing of the motion. The demurrer was sustained, and petitioner excepted.

Granting that the motion to set aside the judgment dismissing the motion for a new trial was made in time, and that the city court of Blakely had jurisdiction to entertain said motion, we think the demurrer to the motion to reinstate was properly sustained on the second ground thereof, which alleges:

"Said motion to reinstate does not set forth any grounds, legal or equitable, authorizing the court to set aside its said judgment of dismissal, and to reinstate said motion for a new trial."

The most that can be said of the allegations in the petition is that, because of the "distress of mind and impaired physical condition of said Pope," he forgot—"overlooked"—the fact that the motion for a new trial was to be heard on the 18th of June, and—"overlooked the fact that he should make a showing before the court and ask for a continuance of said hearing until he could complete said brief of evidence." (Italics ours.)

There is no suggestion that at that time Pope was either mentally or physically unable to complete the brief of evidence, and, if able to do this, was he not able to prepare his motion for continuance? On Saturday, the 16th, Pope received from the court reporter the transcript of the evidence in the case, and was not this enough to have reminded him of the hearing set for the 18th? There is no evidence that his partner, Bennet, was not at home then, and no evidence of any sudden change in the mental or physical condition of Pope between Saturday and Monday. It is true that the petition alleges:

That "said distress of mind and impaired physical condition on the part of said Pope continued throughout said day on which said hearing was set to be had," and that "by reason of the foregoing circumstances, existing on the day when said hearing was set to be had, said Pope's condition of mind had become such that he was not at himself, or in condition to attend to business and remember business engagements, though neither he nor his partner realized this fact."

But according to the petition this condition of Pope had existed for some time, the two partners had discussed the troubles of Pope, and Bennet had insisted that Pope should go on with his work and thus keep his mind on business affairs—

"so as to keep it as much as possible from being distracted by thoughts of his son's circumstances; the said Bennet having no reason to suspect that said Pope's efficiency had been impaired to any extent by his said troubles."

If Bennet, consulting with his said partner, did not discover or suspect that Pope's "efficiency had been impaired," then how could this be shown on a motion to reinstate the hearing of the motion for new trial? There is no suggestion in the record that Pope's condition was known to any other person, nor that his condition could be proved in any way. The fact that Pope "overlooked" the engagement was not enough to show that he was not in such a condition mentally or physically that he could not have looked after this case.

"Error will not entitle a plaintiff in error to the reversal of an adverse judgment, unless he also shows that he was injured by it."

There is not even an allegation in the petition that the motion for new trial was a meritorious one. This case seems to be one in which the attorney simply forgot his engagement, and we have often heard it said that "there is no law against forgetting." To reinstate this case on the showing made would be for the court to "make a law in favor of forgetting."

Judgment affirmed.

HARDISON v. GUERRY, Judge.
(No. 10349.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 1, 1919.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW \S 1092(10), 1129(1)—APPEAL—DISMISSAL OF WRIT OF ERROR—CERTIFICATION OF BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—MERITS OF ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR.

"In passing upon an application for mandamus to compel a judge to certify a bill of exceptions which is presented in proper form, this court will not look into the merits of any assignment of error therein made; but mandamus will not lie to compel the trial judge to sign and certify a bill which is so defective in form as to necessitate a dismissal of the writ of error, in case it should be certified and brought to this court." Sistrunk v. Pendleton, 129 Ga. 255, 58 S. E. 712 (1).

(a) Where no sufficient assignment of error is contained in a bill of exceptions, the writ of error will be dismissed. Fidelity & Deposit Co. v. Anderson, 102 Ga. 551, 28 S. E. 382; Kimball v. Williams, 108 Ga. 812, 33 S. E. 994; Peavy v. Atkinson, 108 Ga. 167, 33 S. E. 956; Wheeler v. Worley, 110 Ga. 513, 35 S. E. 639; Collins v. Carr, 111 Ga. 867, 36 S. E. 959; Carter v. Jackson, 115 Ga. 676, 42 S. E. 46; Patterson v. Beck, 133 Ga. 701, 66 S. E. 911; Willingham v. Cedartown Supply Co., 11 Ga. App. 464, 75 S. E. 823; Joiner v. Stovall, 12 Ga. App. 19, 76 S. E. 753.

2. CRIMINAL LAW \Leftrightarrow 1092(10) — CERTIFICATION OF BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—MANDAMUS—CONSIDERATION OF MERITS.

"There are three exceptions to the general rule that this court will not consider the merits of the bill of exceptions upon the application for mandamus: One is where an extraordinary motion for new trial has been made. Another is where all of the points made in the bill of exceptions have been passed upon by the appellate court, or where the bill of exceptions is so defective in form as to necessitate a dismissal of the writ of error, should it be certified. And the third is in that class of cases in which the reviewing court is without jurisdiction. In the latter case, of course, a dismissal necessarily results. * * * Barring three exceptions, * * * the appellate court, upon an application for mandamus, will not itself consider the merits of the bill of exceptions, though it will decline to make the mandamus absolute if the judge in his answer presents a sufficient reason for not having certified the bill of exceptions." Pelham Manufacturing Co. v. Scaife, 7 Ga. App. 446, 67 S. E. 111.

3. CRIMINAL LAW \Leftrightarrow 1092(10) — CERTIFICATION OF BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—MANDAMUS—DEFECTS IN BILL.

Under these rulings and the facts of the instant case, if the bill of exceptions tendered to the judge should be certified and brought to this court, a dismissal of the writ of error would result. This court, therefore, will not by mandamus compel the judge to certify the bill of exceptions.

Stephens, J., dissenting.

Petition for mandamus by R. G. Hardison against Dupont Guerry, Judge. Mandamus absolute denied.

Robt. W. Barnes, of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

BROYLES, P. J. The petition for mandamus alleged: That on January 13, 1919, a bill of exceptions which was in due and legal form, and which was true and correct, was tendered to the trial judge; that three days later, on January 16, 1919, the judge returned to counsel for petitioner the bill of exceptions uncertified, together with the following written statement:

"Being of the opinion, after consideration, that I have neither the legal authority nor legal right to certify it, I hereby respectfully decline to do so. Dupont Guerry, J. C. C. M."

The bill of exceptions, as set forth in the petition, was as follows:

"Georgia, Bibb County. R. G. Hardison, Plaintiff in Error, v. The State of Georgia. In the Court of Appeals of Georgia, January, 1919. Error from the City Court of Macon. Accusation for Violation of the Prohibition Law, and Plea of Guilty.

"(1) Be it remembered that on the 11th day of January, 1919, the regular the December term, 1918, of the city court of Macon, before the Honorable Dupont Guerry, judge presiding, there came on to be heard the case of the State v. R. G. Hardison, the same being an accusation charging the defendant with a violation of the prohibition laws of said state.

"(2) The defendant waived arraignment and entered a plea of guilty to the accusation, whereupon the court imposed a sentence of eight (8) months' imprisonment in the state farm, four (4) months of which he might be relieved upon the payment of a fine of $200.00.

"(3) Judgment of the court was entered accordingly.

"(4) To this sentence and judgment of the court, the defendant excepted, and now excepts, and assigns error on the same, upon the ground that the same was contrary to law; was cruel and unusual; was in violation of article 1, paragraph 9, of the Constitution of Georgia, prohibiting cruel and unusual punishment; and upon the ground that the penalty attached to and provided in said law is contrary to law, in that the same is cruel and unusual, and in violation of article 1, paragraph 9, of the Constitution of Georgia, prohibiting cruel and unusual punishments.

"(5) Plaintiff in error specifies as material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of the following portions of the record in said case, to wit: (1) Affidavit and accusation. (2) Plea of guilty. (3) Sentence and judgment of the court.

"And now comes the plaintiff in error, within the period allowed by law, and presents this his bill of exceptions, and prays that the same may be signed and certified, in order that the errors complained of may be considered and corrected.

"This 13th day of January, 1919."

The answer of the trial judge to the mandamus nisi was as follows:

"To the Honorable Court of Appeals of the State of Georgia:

"In answer to the order to show cause before the honorable court why I should not be required to sign and certify the bill of exceptions in the above-stated case, I most respectfully submit the following statement of facts and reasons, which I then believed and now believe legal and sufficient:

"The bill of exceptions was true in its recitations of fact, except the usual recitation in paragraph 4 of the bill of exceptions, that 'the defendant excepted'; the first and only exceptions being those contained in the bill of exceptions. The statement in paragraph 4 of the petition, that 'to this sentence and judgment of the court, your petitioner did then and there except and object to upon certain named grounds and reasons, set forth in his bill of exceptions to said sentence and judgment, which was in due and legal form tendered to said court, the Honorable Dupont Guerry,' is denied.

"The plea of guilty was entered on January 11th to an accusation containing two counts for violations of the prohibition law, one for 'selling' and the other for 'possession,' and the court thereupon asked Mr. Barnes, counsel for defendant, if he desired to say anything in reference to the sentence, and he responded in an appeal for clemency, and was joined therein by the defendant and two others, who said the defendant was a man of good character. The court thereupon sentenced the defendant as set forth in the bill of exceptions, and no question of constitutionality or other question was raised or mentioned before the sentence was pronounced or upon its being pronounced. An hour or more after that, and on the same day, January 11th, while the court was in recess, 'the defendant, being dissatisfied with the verdict (when there was no verdict) and the judgment of the court,' tendered a motion for a new trial (when there had been no trial), on the sole ground, 'Because the judgment and sentence of the court is cruel and unusual punishment and in violation of article 1, par. 9, of the Constitution of Georgia, in that the sentence and judgment of the court is cruel and unusual, and that the penalty attached to and provided in said law, which petitioner is charged with violating, is cruel and unusual.' A full copy of said motion is as follows: 'And now comes the defendant in the above-stated case, through his attorney of record, and, being dissatisfied with the verdict and judgment of the court, moves for a new trial, on the following grounds, to wit: (1) Because the judgment and sentence of the court is a cruel and unusual punishment, and in violation of article 1, par. 9, of the Constitution of Georgia, in that the said sentence and judgment of the court is cruel and unusual, and that the penalty attached to and provided in said law, which petitioner is charged with violating, is cruel and unusual. Wherefore the defendant asks that these, his grounds for a motion for new trial, be inquired into, and prays a new trial may be granted to him.' The court refused to recognize the same, on the ground that a motion for a new trial could not be made in a case in which the defendant had pleaded guilty, and because the ground alleged therein was not a ground for a new trial.

"On January 13th the bill of exceptions was tendered as alleged, and, after such consideration as was practicable (the court being at the time engaged in court matters), I refused to sign and certify the same on February [January?] 16th, for the reason then given in writing, as follows: 'Being of the opinion, after consideration, that I have neither the legal authority nor legal right to certify it, I hereby respectfully decline to do so.' Upon such refusal the court on the same day returned the bill to Mr. Barnes, notifying him of such refusal. Eight days after this, on 24th of January, Mr. C. A. Glawson, attorney for the defendant, presented an application for a modification of the sentence, and the court, by written order, refused the same, for the reason that it regarded the sentence a moderate one, and because the defendant had on the 21st of January been taken to the state farm, where he was serving his sentence, and the court had no power to modify the same. Since then the defendant has filed an application for executive clemency with the prison commission, and I have been requested by the same to say whether there was any reason why the same should or should not be granted, and on the 3d inst. I responded, giving reasons in the negative. So far as I am informed or believe, that application is still pending in the executive department of the state. For one offense under each count the defendant was punishable under the law by sentence to the state farm or the chain gang 12 months, by imprisonment in jail 6 months, and by fine $1,000, so that for the two offenses he was punishable by 24 months to the state farm or the chain gang, 12 months in jail, and by fine of $2,000. He was sentenced to 8 months, with the privilege of paying a fine of $200 and being thereupon relieved of 4 months. Should he pay the fine, it would be only one-tenth of the full amount in which he was finable for the two offenses, and the remaining 4 months would be only one-sixth of the time he could have been sentenced, and he would suffer no jail imprisonment. If he should not pay the $200 fine, the 8 months' sentence to the state farm would be only one-third of the period for which he could have been sentenced for the two offenses, and he would not pay any fine or suffer any jail imprisonment. When the difference in hardship and disgrace between state farm sentence and a chain gang sentence is considered, it may be safely said that his sentence is not more than one-tenth of the full measure of punishment provided by law.

"Of course, any defendant in any criminal proceeding in the city court of Macon may except to any sentence pronounced by that court; but, as I understand, he must except in accordance with law, and his exceptions must be to some decision made by the court below, and upon some question that the reviewing court has jurisdiction to review. With neither of these requirements did the bill of exceptions comply. The first assignment is that 'the sentence is contrary to law,' and, in view of the contents of the bill of exceptions, this is of itself no assignment at all, because there is no distinct specification of a point on which error is assigned, and no error is plainly and specifically set forth. It is not a case in which a general exception to a final judgment is sufficient, because error is assigned on previous controlling rulings, or on any rulings at all. General and vague exceptions make no issue of law that can be passed on by the reviewing court. Neither in this exception, nor in any other exception in the bill, is there any allegation that the court erred in any decision or ruling, or that the court made any decision or ruling.

"The second assignment is that the sentence was cruel and unusual. The sentence of the court shows that the punishment was neither cruel nor unusual, but quite to the contrary, and there is no specification as to how or why or wherein it is cruel and unusual. Giving the phrase used its constitutional signification, the very mild punishment imposed is clearly excluded therefrom. If, however, these views are incorrect, how can the honorable Court of Appeals pass upon whether the sentence is cruel and unusual or not? Upon what data could it act in declaring that the same is cruel and unusual? If the honorable court should decide that the punishment is cruel and unusual, how could the court decide to what extent the same is cruel and unusual? What could it do or direct to be done? What jurisdiction would it have to do anything, or direct anything to be done?

"The third and fourth assignments are as follows: The sentence was in violation of article 1, par. 9, of the Constitution of Georgia, prohibiting cruel and unusual punishments, and the penalty attached to and provided in said law is contrary to law, in that the same is cruel and unusual, and in violation of article 1, par. 9, of the Constitution of Georgia, prohibiting cruel and unusual punishments. These two assignments have the infirmities of their two predecessors, and other infirmities. The Supreme Court of Georgia holds that, if the question of constitutionality is not made in the lower court, it will not be passed upon by the appellate court; also that, if the question of constitutionality of a statute is not presented in the lower court, it will not be considered by the Supreme Court. This honorable court has held that it will not certify a constitutional question to the Supreme Court, unless raised in a lower court. As has already been stated, no constitutional question was ever mentioned in the city court before or upon sentence. Before pleading guilty the defendant had opportunity to raise such question. If he could have raised it after plea, and before or upon sentence when orally pronounced, or before it was reduced to writing and signed, he did neither. Afterwards, during the recess, he sought to raise such question by a motion for new trial, and the court refused to recognize the same as before stated, and the defendant 2 days afterwards tendered his bill of exceptions, in which he makes no exception to such refusal. Assuming that the exceptions in the bill of exceptions would be valid in a case in which they could be legally taken, they are legally impossible in the instant case, because there is nothing to which the defendant can legally except in a bill of exceptions. It may be said that the city court of Macon, in sentencing the defendant, decided by implication that the law under which the sentence was imposed was constitutional; but the defendant makes no assignment of error on such decision. If such decision by implication in a criminal case can be excepted to, and the judge of the court below must certify the bill of exceptions and thereupon grant a supersedeas, the end of litigation in criminal cases would certainly be made more remote. The rule would apply to sentences in all criminal cases, from murder down to the most trivial misdemeanor, and upon verdicts, as well as upon pleas of guilty. A fair and reasonable presumption is that the defendant is seeking a reduction of the punishment imposed on account of its severity, but this court and the Supreme Court have both held that they have no jurisdiction to act on such a subject-matter by review. Such a question, it is manifest, appertains to the executive department, under the Constitution.

"I assume the case will turn on the bill of exceptions I refused to certify, and not on allegations in the application which are denied. My view was that I had no authority to sign the bill of exceptions, because it was not a bill of exceptions, because it contained no exceptions, and the recitations therein showed that there was no decision or ruling excepted to or that could be excepted to; and, separating (perhaps illogically) the question into two questions, that of authority and that of right, I believed I had no right to certify the bill of exceptions presented and cause it to be transmitted to the honorable court. The judge of the lower court cannot exercise any discretion, either in certifying a bill of exceptions or in refusing to do so, and under my conviction as to the law it was my duty to the honorable court as well as otherwise, to refuse.

"Most respectfully, Dupont Guerry,
"Judge of the City Court of Macon."

[1-3] We think the answer of our learned brother of the trial bench, even when shorn of those paragraphs which may bear upon the merits of the assignments of error in the bill of exceptions, gives several sufficient reasons (and one is enough) why he should not be required to certify the bill of exceptions which was tendered him.

When properly construed, the bill of exceptions contains but a single assignment of error, in effect as follows: The judgment and sentence of the court, and the penalty attached to and provided in the prohibition law of the state, are contrary to law, in that the same are in violation of article 1, § 1, par. 9, of the Constitution of Georgia, prohibiting cruel and unusual punishments. This exception attempts to raise a constitutional question. If the question were raised, this court would have no jurisdiction to entertain the bill of exceptions, but would transfer it to the Supreme Court. It is obvious, however, that no constitutional question is raised, and therefore, there being no other assignment of error, the bill of exceptions presents no question for determination by this court, and, if it were certified and brought up, the writ of error would necessarily be dismissed. This ruling is not in conflict with the decision in Taylor v. Reese, 108 Ga. 379, 33 S. E. 917, and the other numerous decisions of the Supreme Court and of this court, which hold that in passing upon a petition for mandamus the reviewing court will not consider the merits of the questions presented by the bill of exceptions. As was said by Mr. Justice Candler in Willis v. Felton, 119 Ga. 634, 46 S. E. 857:

"This case is, of course, clearly distinguishable from those where this court has held that it will, without inquiring into the merits of the case, issue a mandamus absolute to require a trial judge to certify the truth of a bill of exceptions complaining of the overruling of a motion for a new trial or of any ruling which necessarily controlled the verdict of the jury. It belongs rather to that class of cases where the merits of the questions sought to be reviewed have already been determined, and a further consideration of them would be futile." (Italics ours.)

Furthermore, we do not think that any of those decisions ever conceived of a bill of exceptions so wholly without even the shadow of a meritorious assignment of error as the one now under consideration. As was said by Mr. Justice Cobb in Rawlins v. Mitchell, 127 Ga. 24, 55 S. E. 958, in referring to the decision in Taylor v. Reese, supra:

"While in the case just cited some very broad language is used by Mr. Presiding Justice Lumpkin in the opinion, the case that he was then dealing with must be kept in mind, and it was a case where the first bill of exceptions after a trial and verdict was tendered to the judge. It is worthy of remark, in passing, that it afterwards developed that the bill of exceptions presented a meritorious case, the judgment being reversed when the case was finally passed upon by this court. See Taylor v. State, 108 Ga. 384 [34 S. E. 2]. * * * While no party will be deprived of a hearing on the merits of his case, no matter what may be its character, whether an extraordinary motion for a new trial, motion to set aside a judgment, or other proceeding after verdict, the judge of the superior court will not be compelled to certify a bill of exceptions in such proceeding, unless it is made to appear to this court that the applicant has been denied some right guaranteed to him by law. * * * But the case will not be prolonged by requiring the bill of exceptions to be certified, when it is apparent from the averments of the petition for mandamus and the bill of exceptions that an affirmance of the judgment complained of would in any event be the inevitable result. * * * The ruling now made is in line with the view of the majority of the court in Willis v. Felton, 119 Ga. 634 [46 S. E. 857]. The writer dissented in that case on the idea that the case of Taylor v. Reese, supra, was controlling; but upon further reflection and investigation he is of the opinion that that case did not go to the extent then contended for, and he is therefore prepared to concur in the view above set forth [italics ours]."

In the same case (Rawlins v. Mitchell) in a concurring opinion, Justices Evans, Lumpkin, and Atkinson said:

"We concur in the ruling in this case, and the result reached. We think, however, that, while generally a first bill of exceptions which is true and duly prepared and presented in accordance with law, and which assigns error on a final judgment, should be signed, yet it is not an arbitrary and invariable rule that this court will by mandamus compel the signing even of a first bill of exceptions, wholly regardless of what it contains."

It has often been said by law-writers, and quoted approvingly in numerous decisions of both of the reviewing courts of this state, that "the law does not require the doing of a vain thing." The bill of exceptions in the present case is upon its face so absolutely and utterly devoid of any merit whatsoever that to require it to be certified and brought to this court would be merely a waste of time and "an idle and useless ceremony."

Mandamus absolute denied.

BLOODWORTH, J., concurs.

STEPHENS, J. (dissenting). "Either party in any civil cause, and the defendant in any criminal proceeding, * * * may except to any sentence, judgment, or decision. * * * Such bill of exceptions shall specify plainly the decision complained of, and the alleged error. * * *" [Italics mine.] Civ. Code. § 6139.

If the bill of exceptions be true, and contain a valid assignment of error presenting a question within the jurisdiction of this court, and does not fall within the exceptions mentioned in Pelham Mfg. Co. v. Scaife, cited and referred to in headnote 2, and if it be the first bill of exceptions presented to the trial judge after the rendition of the judgment or sentence complained of, the trial judge should by mandamus absolute be ordered to certify to the bill of exceptions, in order that the merits of the questions presented in the valid assignment of error may be determined by this court in the manner regularly provided by law.

The bill of exceptions before us assigns error upon the sentence upon the ground that it "was contrary to law, was cruel and unusual, and was in violation of article 1, § 1, par. 9, of the Constitution of Georgia, prohibiting cruel and unusual punishment." Whatever may be the merits of the question here raised, the assignment of error is good and presents a question for determination. It is well settled that this court will entertain a direct bill of exceptions to a final judgment, even though no objection was made to its rendition in the court below. Epping v. Columbus, 117 Ga. 264, 43 S. E. 803 (10); Kelly v. Strouse, 116 Ga. 874, 43 S. E. 280 (8c); Wyly v. Burnett, 43 Ga. 438 (2).

The constitutional amendment of 1916 fixing the jurisdiction of this court provides that the Court of Appeals shall have certain jurisdiction, except in "cases that involve the construction of the Constitution of the state of Georgia or of the United States, or treaties between the United States and foreign governments; [and] cases in which the constitutionality of any law of the state of Georgia or of the United States is drawn in question." So far as this assignment of error is concerned, the applicant does not seek to raise any question as to the constitutionality of any law of the state of Georgia or of the United States, nor does he raise a question that involves the construction of the Constitution of this state in the sense in which the expression "construction of the Constitution" is here used. Under the constitutional amendment of 1906 creating the Court of Appeals, which was in this respect substantially the same as the above-quoted language from the amendment of 1916 now fixing the jurisdiction of this court, this provision was construed by this court in the case of Fews v. State, 1 Ga. App. 122, 58 S. E. 64, where the following language was used by Judge Powell:

"The constitutional amendment creating this court provides that 'where, in a case pending in the Court of Appeals, a question is raised as to the construction of a provision of the Constitution of this state or of the United States, or as to the constitutionality of an act of the General Assembly of this state, and a decision of the question is necessary to the determination of the case, the Court of Appeals shall so certify to the Supreme Court, and thereupon a transcript of the record shall be transmitted to the Supreme Court, which, after having afforded to the parties an opportunity to be heard thereon, shall instruct the Court of Appeals on the question so certified, and the Court of Appeals shall be bound by the instruction so given.' Acts 1906, p. 26. It will be seen from the above that, since the question presented in this case does not involve the constitutionality of an act of the General Assembly, it must appear that it raises a question as to the construction of a provision of the Constitution, before this court is required to certify it to the Supreme Court. A case that involves merely the applicability of a concededly unambiguous clause of the Constitution to a given state of facts raises no question of construction. Likewise, where a clause in the Constitution has been construed by the Supreme Court as having a certain meaning and intentment, and such fixed judicial construction is unchallenged, there is still no question raised as to the construction of a clause of the Constitution. The excerpt from the constitutional amendment creating this court, quoted above, is also to be construed in pari materia with another provision in the same law, that 'the decisions of the Supreme Court shall bind the Court of Appeals as precedents.' Therefore, if the identical question of construction has been before the Supreme Court, and that court has judicially given a construction to the clause in question, it is unnecessary to certify and to continue to certify such a question to the Supreme Court every time a party may seek to raise it."

See Cox v. State, 19 Ga. App. 289, 91 S. E. 422; Atkins v. State, 7 Ga. App. 202, 66 S. E. 479; Tilton v. State, 5 Ga. App. 60, 62 S. E. 651.

The section of the Constitution of this state, which the applicant in his assignment of error refers to, has been construed by the Supreme Court of Georgia as being a limitation upon legislative authority. See Whitten v. State, 47 Ga. 301; Plain v. State, 60 Ga. 284; Loeb v. Jennings, 133 Ga. 796, 67 S. E. 101, 18 Ann. Cas. 376; Allen v. Jennings, 134 Ga. 338, 67 S. E. 883. This clause of the Constitution having "been construed by the Supreme Court as having a certain meaning and intentment, and such fixed judicial construction is unchallenged, [and as] there is still no question raised as to the construction of a clause of the Constitution," a question is presented in the bill of exceptions for determination by this court. That this court would be compelled, upon an inquiry into the merits of the question presented by this assignment of error, to decide against the applicant's contention, does not affect his right, under the repeated rulings of the Supreme Court and of this court, to have his bill of exceptions certified and the case brought regularly to this court, where the question can be decided upon the bill of exceptions after a hearing, rather than upon an application for mandamus without an opportunity to be heard.

The cases of Willis v. Felton, 119 Ga. 634, 46 S. E. 857, and Rawlins v. Mitchell, 127 Ga. 24, 55 S. E. 958, relied upon in the majority opinion, relate to a bill of exceptions presented to the trial judge after the case had already been once reviewed in the appellate court upon a former bill of exceptions. Such cases have always been regarded as exceptions to the general rule requiring a mandamus to compel the trial judge to certify to a first bill of exceptions, when it speaks the truth and contains a valid assignment of error. The question seems to me to be settled by Taylor v. Reese, 108 Ga. 379, 33 S. E. 917, where it was held that upon a presentation to the trial judge of a first bill of exceptions, which was true and contained a valid assignment of error, the court, without inquiring into the merits of the question presented by the bill of exceptions, would by mandamus absolute compel the trial judge to certify the same. This case has never been overruled. It was commented on by the Supreme Court in the opinion rendered by Mr. Justice Cobb in Rawlins v. Mitchell, supra. Justice Cobb there said:

"When a case has been tried in the superior court and a verdict rendered therein, the losing party is entitled to make a motion for a new trial, and to bring to this court for review the decision of the judge overruling the motion. * * * When a bill of exceptions, in such cases, is tendered to the judge, and the averments therein are true, it is the duty of the judge to certify the same, in order that the case may be brought to this court, according to the usual practice governing such matters. When in such a case the judge refuses to certify the bill of exceptions, and an application for mandamus is made to this court to compel him to certify the same, the only question that will be determined on such application is whether the bill of exceptions is in due form and it is shown by the petition for mandamus that the averments therein are true. The merits of the assignments of error therein will not be dealt with. In such cases it is immaterial whether the assignments of error are meritorious. The case must reach the Supreme Court in the ordinary way. * * * It will be seen that there are two classes of cases relating to the duty and authority of this court upon an application for mandamus to compel the judge to certify to a bill of exceptions. If it is the first bill of exceptions after verdict, the merits of the case will not be considered upon the application for mandamus. * * * The case now under consideration is not a case of the first bill of exceptions after verdict. * * * But it is to a ruling relating to a motion to set aside a judgment made after the term at which the judgment was rendered, but within three years from the date of the judgment. Shall a case of this character be classed with those which are embraced in the rule in Taylor v. Reese, supra, or shall it be classed with those embraced in the rule laid down in Malone v. Hopkins, supra [49 Ga. 221], and the numerous cases following it? The reason at the foundation of the latter class of cases is undoubtedly that there must be a termination of a criminal case; and while no party will be deprived of a hearing on the merits of his case, no matter what may be its character, whether an extraordinary motion for new trial, motion to set aside judgment, or other proceeding after verdict, the judge of the superior court will not be compelled to certify a bill of exceptions in such proceeding, unless it is made to appear to this court that the applicant has been denied some right guaranteed to him by law."

The case of Malone v. Hopkins, 49 Ga. 221, was a case where the trial judge refused to certify to a bill of exceptions complaining of a ruling upon an extraordinary motion for new trial. When brought to the Supreme Court upon application for mandamus, a mandamus was refused. In the case of Rawlins v. Mitchell, supra, just quoted from, three of the Justices, while concurring, stated obiter that in their opinion:

"It is not an arbitrary and invariable rule that this court will by mandamus compel the signing even of a first bill of exceptions."

Be that as it may, the doctrine of Taylor v. Reese, as above stated, has not been overruled. In my opinion the doctrine there laid down controls the case now before us.

Whether or not there appears to be any merit in the questions raised in the bill of exceptions exhibited to us in this case, I do not think that we should close the door of this court in the face of the applicant, and deny to him the privilege of at least one hearing on the merits of the questions presented in his bill of exceptions, after a proper certification thereof, and upon its being regularly submitted to this court. The doors of courts are supposed to be open, not barred.

Even though, under the law as at present announced, the contention of the applicant may not be meritorious, he unquestionably has the right to a hearing, wherein he can seek to have overruled the decisions which confront him. The latter can be accomplished only upon a review on a bill of exceptions regularly bringing the case up. It cannot be done on an application for a mandamus to compel the signing of the bill of exceptions.

While it would be a great relief to this court, could we refuse to grant a mandamus absolute in any case where the questions raised in the bill of exceptions were palpably without merit, yet under the liberal practice obtaining in this state, allowing an appeal to this court as a matter of right to every litigant cast in the court below, it would seem that we should not refuse, except in extraordinary cases, to allow a losing party, upon his first complaint of a decision of the court below, the right to regularly come to this court and have his case here once reviewed. Such relief should be granted by legislation, rather than by a refusal on our part to issue a mandamus for the purpose of having certified a bill of exceptions which presents no meritorious question for our review.

For the above reasons I feel constrained to hold that a mandamus absolute should be granted, and therefore must dissent from the judgment denying it.

1. CHARGE OF COURT—TRIAL—INSTRUCTION—REQUEST.

None of the excerpts from the charge, when considered in the light of the evidence and the entire charge, are erroneous for any of the reasons assigned.

2. NEW TRIAL ~~6~~40(4)—GROUNDS—REFUSAL OF INSTRUCTION—REQUEST.

The ground of the motion for a new trial, which excepts to the failure of the court to give certain specific instructions to the jury, is without merit. The charge given covered the particular issue, and, if more specific instructions were desired thereon, a proper and timely written request therefor should have been made.

Plaintiff's suit not having been instituted by an indorsee, assignee, transferee, or the personal representative, of a deceased person, it was error to exclude the testimony of a witness for the defendant upon the ground that his testimony purported to be as to transactions or communications with a deceased person. *Cody v. MEANS v. AMERICAN BONDING CO. OF BALTIMORE. (No. 9738.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 18, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. GUARDIAN AND WARD \Leftrightarrow 177—BOND—SURETY'S PETITION FOR DISCHARGE—SUFFICIENCY.

The court did not err in overruling the demurrer, or in failing to instruct the jury as requested by counsel for the defendant, or in thereafter directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

Under Civ. Code 1910, § 3052, permitting surety on guardian's bond to be discharged on complaint of "any misconduct of his principal in the discharge of his trust," or "for any other reason show his desire to be relieved," former term exhausts all mismanagement of estate or nonperformance of duties, and following term relates to some other ground of relief, not ejusdem generis.

Error from Superior Court, Houston County; E. D. Graham, Judge.

Petition by the American Bonding Company of Baltimore for its discharge from liability on the bond of L. M. Means, guardian, opposed by the guardian. Guardian's demurrer to petition overruled, pending case on appeal from court of ordinary to superior court. From a directed verdict for plaintiff, defendant excepts and brings error. Affirmed.

The American Bonding Company presented a petition in the court of ordinary of Houston county, alleging:

"That heretofore, to wit, on the 9th day of November, 1912, it became surety upon a bond in the penal sum of ten thousand ($10,000) dollars, given by Lilla Mae Means, as guardian of the estate of Sallie Mae Means, a minor, and conditioned as required by law for the faithful performance of her duties as guardian. And whereas, your said petitioner desires to be released from further liability by reason of having executed the above-mentioned bond, as it is advised that the said guardian has personally borrowed the funds of the estate, and although the said guardian has offered to secure said loan by executing a real estate mortgage, your said petitioner does not believe this is a proper investment for trust funds."

The petition was amended as follows:

"That said Mrs. Lilla Mae Means used her ward's money in paying the purchase price of certain lands, the title to which she took in her own name, and not in the name of her said ward, and that said Lilla Mae Means appropriated to her own use the funds of her said ward."

To the petition a demurrer was filed as follows:

"Because said petition does not allege any misconduct of respondent as guardian in the discharge of her duties, nor set forth any other reason which in law entitles petitioner to be relieved as surety on respondent's bond as guardian. Because it is not alleged that respondent has mismanaged or wasted the estate of her said ward, nor is it alleged that respondent is not amply solvent, nor is it alleged that the estate of said ward is in jeopardy or at all liable to be wasted, depreciated, or diminished by any act or conduct on the part of respondent."

While the case was pending in the superior court on appeal, the judge presiding overruled the demurrer to the petition.

The answer of defendant contained the following:

"Respondent admits that she has personally borrowed the funds of the estate of her said ward, and has secured the payment of said loan by executing to herself as guardian a promissory note, secured by a mortgage on real estate situated in said county, of the market value sufficient to amply secure said loan, and she says that under all the circumstances said investment is safe and to the best interest of her said ward. For further answer respondent says that the estate of her said ward was in cash money, and by depositing the same in a savings bank, or making a time deposit thereof in a bank on a certificate of deposit, she was unable to earn for her said ward more than 4 per cent. per annum, and that very little, if any, more than such per cent. could be obtained for said money when invested in bonds specified in the Code of Georgia for investment of trust funds. That respondent is a widow, and her said ward is her only child and sole heir at law. Respondent owns in her own right 698 acres of farm lands in said Houston county, Ga., of the fair market value of fifteen or twenty thousand dollars. She likewise owns two houses and lots in Elko, said county, of the value of $3,000, and a storehouse and lot in Elko, of the value of $500, and six town lots in the town of Elko, of the value of $150. That respondent owns personal property of greater value than all of her debts and liabilities, except her debt and liability to her said ward. That there was a balance due of $5,000 on the purchase price of her farm lands, and it was greatly to her interest and to the interest of her ward, as her sole heir at law, that she keep and hold said farm lands, which have greatly increased in value since she purchased them, and which lands will continue to increase in value in respondent's judgment and belief. Respondent deemed it to the best interest of her said ward, considering the estate of the ward only, and also considering the interest of her said ward as respondent's sole heir at law, to use her ward's money in payment of the balance of the purchase price of said farm lands, and she did use the same for said purpose, and thereby became indebted and liable to her said ward for said money, for the use of which respondent has paid to said ward interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, thereby greatly increasing the income of her said ward and preserving an estate in realty of large value for the benefit of said ward as respondent's sole heir at law. Although respondent is amply solvent, owning realty of the value of at least twenty thousand dollars, respondent as an individual has executed to herself as guardian of her said ward a mortgage on a lot of land containing two hundred seven and one-tenth (207.1) acres, being part of the lands in said Houston county, to secure the estate of her said ward; said lands so mortgaged being of greater value than the estate of her said ward. Save and except the mortgage to secure the estate of her said ward, as aforesaid, respondent's individual estate in the lands and tenements aforesaid is absolutely free and unincumbered. Respondent further says that she has not been guilty of any misconduct in the discharge of her duties as guardian; that she has not wasted, nor mismanaged the estate of her ward; has kept and is now keeping and will keep the estate of her said ward safely and account for the same according to law and as in duty bound; and that there is no lawful reason authorizing her surety to desire to be relieved, or authorizing her surety to be relieved, as surety on her bond as guardian."

The bill of exceptions shows that upon the trial of the case—

"the plaintiff put in evidence the defendant's answer to said petition, which said answer is a part of the record in said case, and then and there admitted in judicio in open court the truth of all of the facts set forth in the defendant's said answer, and waived proof of the facts alleged by the defendant in her said answer, and said case was submitted to the court and jury on the pleadings and the admission in judicio aforesaid. Thereupon the plaintiff moved the court to direct a verdict in its behalf, and the defendant submitted to the court in writing certain requests to charge the jury as hereinafter set out."

The trial judge refused to submit the case, to the jury and give in charge the requests to charge as made by defendant, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and defendant excepted.

John P. Ross, of Macon, and M. Kunz, of Perry, for plaintiff in error.

Hardeman, Jones, Park & Johnston and R. Curd, all of Macon, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The court neither erred in overruling the demurrer, nor in failing to submit the case to the jury and give instructions to them requested by counsel for defendant, nor in directing a verdict for the plaintiff. Section 3052 of the Civil Code (1910) is in part as follows:

"The surety of any guardian on his bond, or, if dead, his representative, may at any time make complaint to the ordinary of any misconduct of his principal in the discharge of his trust, or for any other reason show his desire to be relieved as surety; thereupon the ordinary shall cite the guardian to appear at a regular term of the court, and show cause why such surety shall not be discharged; and upon hearing the parties and their evidence, the ordinary may, at his discretion, pass an order discharging such surety from all future liability, and requiring such guardian to give new and sufficient security or be discharged from his trust; such new sureties shall be liable for past as well as future waste or misconduct of the guardian. And such discharged surety shall be relieved only from the time the new security shall be given."

[2] Under the above statute, it will be seen that a surety on a guardian's bond can obtain relief in two distinct contingencies: First, in case of misconduct of the guardian in the discharge of his trust; second, when for any other reason the surety desires to be relieved. In National Surety Co. v. Morris, 111 Ga. 307, 36 S. E. 690, presiding Justice Samuel Lumpkin, said:

"The words, 'any misconduct of his principal in the discharge of his trust,' are obviously exhaustive of all acts, whether of commission or omission, which pertain to the guardian's mismanagement of the estate or the nonperformance of any of the duties devolving upon him in his office. It follows that the words, 'any other reason,' which the surety may allege as constituting the basis of 'his desire to be relieved' from the bond, must relate to some ground or grounds of relief not ejusdem generis with those which arise from the guardian's official misconduct. Want of personal integrity, lack of business capacity, extravagant or reckless living, indulgence in vicious or immoral habits, criminality, and scores of other things which might be suggested, would certainly afford good reasons for 'a desire to be relieved as surety.'"

Granting that the estate of her ward had not suffered by her conduct in its management, still we think her conduct as shown by the record was embraced in the "scores of other things" which Presiding Justice Lumpkin says "would certainly afford good reasons for a desire to be relieved as surety." In Rogers v. Dickey, Guardian, 117 Ga. 819, 45 S. E. 71, the third headnote is as follows:

"Even for the benefit of the beneficiaries, a fiduciary cannot hazard the trust fund in speculation, business, or any form of investment not authorized by the deed of trust, the statute, or an order of a court of competent jurisdiction."

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 26, 1919.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS §173—OFFENSES
—KEEPING LIQUOR FOR SALE.

Under the present prohibition laws of this state there is no independent crime of keeping for sale intoxicating liquors, as separate and distinct from the crime of having, controlling, and possessing such liquors.

2. CRIMINAL LAW §395—EVIDENCE OBTAINED BY UNLAWFUL SEIZURE—ADMISSIBILITY.

"Articles taken from the person or premises of the accused, tending to establish his guilt of the offense of which he is charged, are admissible in evidence against him, notwithstanding the articles were discovered by an unlawful search and seizure."

Error from Superior Court, Crawford County; H. A. Mathews, Judge.

C. E. Corley was convicted of an offense under the prohibitory law, and brings error. Affirmed with directions.

Jno. R. Cooper, of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

John P. Ross, Sol. Gen., of Macon, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. 1. Defendant was tried under an indictment containing two counts. The charge of the court restricted the jury to the consideration of the first count, which alleged that the defendant did "have, control, and possess intoxicating liquors," and that portion of the second count which alleged that he did "keep for sale alcoholic liquors." Section 1 of the act of the General Assembly passed at the extraordinary session in 1917 (Acts Ex. Sess. March, 1917, p. 8) names the following liquors:

"Any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented or intoxicating liquors, or any of the prohibited liquors or beverages, as are defined in the act approved November 17, 1915, being 'An act to make clearer and more certain' the prohibition laws of this state, etc., or any alcoholic compound or malt or liquors whether intended for beverage purposes or not, but which can be diluted, and when so diluted may be used as a beverage and will produce intoxication"

—and then provides that:

"It shall be unlawful for any corporation, firm, person or individual * * * to have, control or possess, in this state, any of said enumerated liquors or beverages whether intended for personal use or otherwise."

[1] The words, "whether intended for personal use or otherwise," are exclusive, and, no matter for what purpose intended, it is unlawful for any person to "have, control or possess" any of the liquors enumerated in said section; and, where an indictment charges that such liquors were kept for sale, the words "for sale" may be stricken as immaterial, as they are not "descriptive of the identity of that which is legally essential to the claim or charge." This being true, the two counts of the indictment were practically the same. Under the present prohibition laws of this state there is no independent crime of keeping for sale intoxicating liquors, as separate and distinct from the crime of having, controlling, and possessing such liquors. From the above it will be seen that the two counts under which the defendant was tried charged the commission of one offense in two different ways. Section 1 of the act of 1917, supra, making it a misdemeanor to have, control, or possess intoxicating liquors, is so general in its terms that it embraces the crime of keeping for sale, as provided by section 2 of the act passed at the extraordinary session of 1915. See Acts Ex. Sess. 1915, p. 80, § 2. Although the judge told the jury that the charge in one of these counts embraced the charge in the other, he also told them that they could convict on both counts of the indictment, and they returned a general verdict of guilty; and, while the judge imposed only one sentence, in imposing it he may have taken into consideration the fact that the verdict was on both counts, and made the sentence heavier for that reason. Though convicted on two counts, he was convicted of but one crime. The defendant made no statement, and the evidence for the state absolutely demanded a verdict of guilty of "having, possessing and controlling intoxicating liquors." It is therefore ordered that the judgment be affirmed, with the direction that the trial judge may, in his discretion, re-sentence the defendant as having been convicted under the first count only of the indictment.

[2] 2. The court did not err in allowing evidence as to the whisky found at the home of the defendant, the objection to the introduction of the said evidence being that the same "was the fruits of an illegal search and seizure," and on the ground that the witness had not seen the defendant commit any crime in his presence, and he had no search warrant to search his home, and it is in contravention of both the state and federal Constitutions." "Articles taken from the person or premises of the accused, tending to establish his guilt of the offense of which he is charged, are admissible in evidence against him, notwithstanding the articles were discovered by an unlawful search and seizure; and this rule of evidence is not violative of the constitutional prohibition of unreasonable searches and seizures. The ruling in the case of Williams v. State, 100 Ga. 511 [28 S. E. 624, 89 L. R. A. 269], does not conflict with that of Evans v. State, 106 Ga. 519 [32 S. E. 659, 71 Am. St. Rep. 276], as is clearly pointed out in Duren v. Thomasville, 125 Ga. 1 [53 S. E. 814]."

FIRST NAT. BANK OF COLQUITT v.
MILLER. (No. 9637.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 18, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EVIDENCE ⚡34—PLEADING ⚡193(5)—
JUDICIAL NOTICE—DEMURRER.

"As courts must take judicial notice of general laws of the United States, defendant's claim, depending on such a law, as the complaint does not set out a cause of action, is properly raised by demurrer."

2. BANKS AND BANKING ⚡251, 253—CASHIER OF NATIONAL BANK—TERM OF OFFICE—SALARY—DISMISSAL.

Under the National Bank Act, cashiers of national banks hold their office subject to dismissal at the pleasure of the board of directors.

(a) Where the cashier of a national bank is elected for a fixed time, and is dismissed prior to the expiration of the period for which he was employed, he cannot recover his wages for the unexpired period, even though dismissed without a cause.

Error from City Court of Miller County;
Ben M. Turnipseed, Judge.

Suit by J. M. Miller against the First National Bank of Colquitt. General demurrer to petition overruled, and defendant excepts and brings error. Reversed.

N. L. Stapleton and P. D. Rich, both of Colquitt, for plaintiff in error.

B. B. Bush, of Tucson, Ariz., and B. W. Fortson, of Arlington, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. Plaintiff sued the First National Bank of Colquitt, alleging:

That it "is a corporation organized under and by virtue of the laws of the United States"; that plaintiff was "employed by said bank by and through its board of directors to serve them in the capacity of cashier for the year 1917"; that "he served as such cashier and performed all the duties of such cashier, as he was employed to do, until a few days before June 1, 1917, at which time he was discharged by said bank without any legal cause or right, but that said bank paid your petitioner for services rendered up to June 1, 1917"; that "since June 1, 1917, and up to October 1, 1917, he has made continuing tender of his services to said bank"; that "during said four months he has been out of employment through no fault of his, but on account of the illegal breaking of the contract by said bank."

Plaintiff prayed for judgment for the amount of his services for four months. A general demurrer to the petition was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

[1] 1. Defendant in error insists that the question at issue should have been raised by special plea and not by demurrer. This contention is without merit. In Case v. First National Bank of the City of Brooklyn, 59 Misc. Rep. 269, 109 N. Y. Supp. 1119, where practically the same question was at issue, the first headnote is as follows:

"As courts must take judicial notice of general laws of the United States, defendant's claim, depending on such a law, as the complaint does not state a cause of action, is properly raised by demurrer."

[2] 2. Under the pleadings in this case, the question to be determined is whether a cashier of a national bank, who is employed for a year and discharged before the expiration thereof, can recover this salary from the date of his discharge to the end of the year, or until he obtains employment prior thereto? The determination of this question turns upon the construction of the following section of the United States Revised Statutes, to wit:

"Fifth. To elect or appoint directors, and by its board of directors to appoint a president, vice president, cashier, and other officers, define their duties, require bonds of them and fix the penalty thereof, dismiss such officers or any of them at pleasure, and appoint others to fill their places." Act June 8, 1864, c. 106, § 8, 13 Stat. p. 101; Rev. St. U. S. p. 998, § 5136 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 8455, 8456; U. S. Comp. St. § 9661).

From this section it is clear that a cashier of a national bank is an "officer" thereof. In Harrington v. First National Bank of Chittenango, 1 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 361, the headnote says:

"A national bank cannot hire one of its officers for a specified time."

In Westervelt v. Mohrenstecher, 76 Fed. 118, 22 C. C. A. 93 (34 L. R. A. 477), the first and second headnotes are as follows:

"The office of cashier of a national bank is not an annual office, but the term of the incumbent continues until he resigns or until he is removed or a successor is appointed by the board of directors of the bank.

"Since the national bank act expressly provides that the cashier of a national bank shall hold his office subject to the pleasure of the board of directors, a by-law providing that a cashier shall hold his office for one year, and shall be elected annually, is nugatory, as is a reappointment in accordance with such by-law at the beginning of each year."

In the decision in that case Circuit Judge Sanborn said:

"The act of Congress under which this bank was organized provided that its board of directors might appoint a cashier, require bonds of him, and fix the penalty thereof, and dismiss him at pleasure, and appoint another to fill his place. Its articles of association provided that the board might appoint a cashier, fix his salary, and continue him in office, or dismiss him, as in the opinion of a majority of the board the interests of the association might require. It is plain that, in the absence of any other regulations, a cashier once appointed under this act of Congress and these articles of association would hold his office until he resigned, or until the board of directors * * * dismissed him. A subsequent appointment of the same man to the same office would have no more effect upon him, or upon the term of his office, than a second deed to the same property by one who had already conveyed it to the same grantee would have. The only act of the board of directors that could affect the tenure of his office, under the act of Congress, would be his dismissal. It is, however, contended that the by-laws (which provided that the cashier should be elected at the annual meeting in January in each year, should give a bond in the sum of $10,000, and should hold his office for one year, and until his successor was elected and qualified) made this an annual office, and limited the term of the office of this cashier to the unexpired portion of the year for which his predecessor, Vieths, was elected. But how could the by-laws of this bank repeal or modify the act of Congress and the articles of association under which they were enacted? The act of Congress expressly fixed the tenure of office of the cashier of this bank. It expressly provided that the board of directors might dismiss the cashier and certain other officers 'or any of them at pleasure and appoint others to fill their places.' It provided that this cashier should always hold his office subject to instantaneous removal at the pleasure of the board of directors. Nor is it at all probable that this provision of the National Bank Act was inserted without purpose or consideration. Observation and experience alike teach that it is essential to the safety and prosperity of banking institutions that the active officers, to whose integrity and discretion the moneys and property of the bank and its customers are intrusted, should be subject to immediate removal whenever the suspicion of faithlessness or negligence attaches to them. High credit is indispensable to the success and prosperity of a bank. Without it, customers cannot be induced to deposit their moneys. When it has once been secured, and then declines, those who have deposited demand their cash, the income of the bank dwindles, and often bankruptcy follows. It sometimes happens that, without any justification, a suspicion of dishonesty or carelessness attaches to a cashier or a president of a bank, spreads through the community in which he lives, scares the depositors, and threatens immediate financial ruin to the institution. In such a case it is necessary to the prosperity and success—to the very existence—of a banking institution that the board of directors should have power to remove such an officer, and to put in his place another, in whom the community has confidence. In our opinion, the provision of the act of Congress to which we have referred was inserted, ex industria, to provide for this very contingency. In any event, it is there, and it clearly provides that the cashier of a national bank may be dismissed at the pleasure of the board of directors, and that it may appoint, not the same man again, but another in his place. National banks are the creatures of the act of Congress. Under familiar principles they have no powers beyond those expressly granted, and those fairly incidental thereto. The Omaha Bridge Cases, 10 U. S. App. 98, 174, 2 O. C. A. 174, 51 Fed. 309; Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 2 C. C. A. 174, 230, 51 Fed. 309, 316. It follows from this principle that, since the act of Congress expressly provides that the cashiers of national banks should hold their offices subject to the pleasure of the board of directors, neither the bank nor its board can make time contracts or appointments in violation of that provision. Harrington v. Bank, 1 Thomp. & C. [N. Y.] 361; Boone, Banking, § 353; Ball, Banks, 65. What, then, is the effect of these established rules upon the by-laws of this bank? It is that that part of these by-laws which provides that the cashier shall hold his office for one year, and that he shall be elected annually, must fall, and the cashier of the bank must hold his office under the act of Congress, subject to immediate removal at the pleasure of the board of directors, until he resigns or is removed."

In the above quotation it is distinctly stated that:

"It is plain that, in the absence of any other regulations, a cashier once appointed under this act of Congress and these articles of association would hold his office until he resigned, or until the board of directors of the bank dismissed him. * * * The only act of the board of directors that could affect the tenure of his office, under the act of Congress, would be dismissal. * * * But how could the by-laws of this bank repeal or modify the act of Congress and the articles of association under which they were enacted? The act of Congress expressly fixed the tenure of office of the cashier of this bank. It expressly provided that the board of directors might dismiss the cashier and certain other officers 'or any of them at pleasure and appoint others to fill their places.' It provided that this cashier should always hold his office subject to instantaneous removal at the

The first headnote in London v. City of Franklin, 118 Ky. 105 (80 S. W. 514), is as follows:

"Ky. St. 1903, § 3619, providing that the marshal and certain other city officers shall be appointed for a term of two years by the city council, but may be removed at the pleasure of the city council, does not limit the power of such council to removals for cause only."

In the opinion of the court which was written by Judge Hobson, is the following (118 Ky. 108, 80 S. W. 514):

"It is insisted for appellant that under the constitutional provision officers of cities and towns may be only removed for cause, and that section 3619 of the statute, above quoted, must be construed to refer only to removals for cause, or, if not so construed, is unconstitutional. The language of the statute is that the officers named may be removed at the pleasure of the city council. These words have a well-defined legal meaning. The right to remove at pleasure is an entirely different thing from the right to remove for cause. To hold that the statute only authorizes the council to remove for cause would be to deny the words used by the Legislature their ordinary meaning. This cannot be done."

See, also, Rogers v. Congleton (Ky.) 84 S. W. 521; Stebbins v. Police Commissioners of City of Springfield, 196 Mass. 365, 82 N. E. 42; Commonwealth v. McGann and another, 213 Mass. 213, 100 N. E. 355.

Applying the principles announced in the foregoing cases, it is apparent that the National Banking Law gives to the directors of national banks the authority "at pleasure" and without cause to dismiss cashiers and other officers, and all resolutions and by-laws of the directors in conflict with this law are void. There is no conflict in the decisions above referred to and the decision in Rankin v. Tygard, 198 Fed. 795, 799, 119 C. C. A. 591, 595. In the opinion in that case Sanborn, Circuit Judge, said:

"An election or appointment to an official position for a fixed term is, it is true, inconsistent with a removal during the term without cause, in the absence of a precedent reservation of the right to make such a removal during the term. But an election or appointment to the office for a specified term, subject to the precedent expressed condition that the elective or appointive power may remove at will at any time during the term, is consistent with such a removal without cause, and it is as much an election or appointment for a legal term as an election or appointment without such a reservation. It is an election or appointment for a fixed term, subject to recall, and the legal term is the time the person elected or appointed will hold his office if the power to recall is not exercised."

Indeed, instead of being in conflict with the decisions referred to above, it supports them, and is in thorough accord with what is decided in the instant case. The board of directors of the First National Bank of Colquitt having no authority to employ a cashier for any fixed term, and the law providing that they could dismiss the cashier "at pleasure," the petition set out no cause of action, and the court erred in overruling the demurrer thereto.

ROBINSON v. WOODRUFF MACHINERY MFG. CO. (No. 9735.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Feb. 12, 1919.)

1. SALES \S 429—NOTICE OF DEFECT—CONDITIONS—RIGHT OF ACTION.

J. M. Robinson gave to Woodruff Machinery Manufacturing Company three notes for the purchase price of certain machinery. Title to the property was reserved in the vendor. Robinson signed a separate agreement, of even date with the notes, containing the terms and conditions of the sale, one clause of which is as follows: "It is hereby agreed and understood by both lessor and lessee that no complaint shall be made by the lessee after he has been in the possession of the machinery 30 days." Robinson having failed to pay the notes, an attachment against him was issued and levied on the property, and a declaration in attachment filed. Robinson filed a plea in which he admitted signing the notes, but denied indebtedness, and alleged fraud and failure of consideration. The case proceeded to trial, and a verdict in favor of plaintiff was directed by the court. The bill of exceptions assigns error upon the direction of the verdict, and upon the overruling of a motion for new trial, which was based on the general grounds. There was no plea and no evidence that Robinson made complaint of any kind in reference to the machinery prior to having been in possession thereof for 30 days. Under numerous decisions of our courts of last resort, under the clause of the contract above quoted, notice before the expiration of the 30 days was a condition precedent to recovery by the defendant, and the trial judge properly directed the verdict and overruled the motion for new trial. 1. LIABILITY OF HUSBAND—STATUTES.

"The husband is bound to support and maintain his wife, and his consent shall be presumed to her agency in all purchases of necessities suitable to her condition and habits of life, made for the use of herself and the family. This presumption may be rebutted by proof." Civ. Code 1910, § 2906. "The husband is bound for necessities furnished to the wife when separated from him, subject to the limitations hereinbefore provided. If the wife be living in adultery with another man, the husband is not liable; but notice by the husband shall not relieve him from liability, if his wife is separated from him by reason of his own misconduct; if she voluntarily abandons him without sufficient provocation, notice by the husband shall relieve him of all liability for necessities furnished to her." Civ. Code 1910, § 2907.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE \S 235(2)—LIABILITY FOR MEDICAL SERVICES—SEPARATION—STATUTE.

Upon the trial of a suit against a husband for medical services rendered by plaintiff to defendant's wife, evidence that before the date of the rendition of the services by plaintiff, defendant left the state as a fugitive from justice, carried his wife with him, and that she later returned to the former community and lived upon land belonging to the husband, the husband still remaining away, does not necessarily demand the inference that the parties were living in a state of separation as husband and wife under such circumstances that the husband would not be liable for necessities, such as medical services furnish by plaintiff to the wife.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨728(3)—ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

The assignment of error complaining of the court's refusal to allow plaintiff, while on the witness stand, to testify along certain lines set out in the assignment is too indefinite and defective to raise any question for the consideration of this court, it not being shown therein that any pertinent question was asked, and that the answer was ruled out, or that the court was informed at the time what the answer would be, or that the testimony would have benefited the plaintiff in error. Griffin v. Henderson, 117 Ga. 382, 43 S. E. 712 (2); McKee v. Hurst & Co., 21 Ga. App. 571, 94 S. E. 886 (1), and cases there cited.

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇨235(2)—MEDICAL SERVICES TO WIFE—EXTENSION OF CREDIT—SEPARATION—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Whether credit was extended to the husband or to the wife, and whether the parties were living in a state of separation as husband and wife and under such circumstances as would make him liable for necessities furnished her, were questions for the jury.

APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1099(7)—FORMER DECISION—LAW OF CASE—NONSUIT.

The award of a nonsuit was not error.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; H. A. Mathews, Judge.

Action by the Central of Georgia Railway Company against the Macon Railway & Light Company. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

R. C. Jordan, of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

John R. L. Smith and Hatcher & Smith, all of Macon, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, P. J. Upon the previous appearance here of this case this court affirmed a judgment of nonsuit. Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Macon Railway & Light Co., 9 Ga. App. 628, 71 S. E. 1076. That decision became the law of the case, so far as concerned the case laid and the case made upon the trial then under review. Upon the trial now under review a nonsuit was again awarded. If the two petitions and the evidence upon both trials were in all material respects substantially the same, a judgment of nonsuit was the only legal one possible. We have carefully compared the two petitions and the evidence adduced upon both trials. We find that upon the first trial the evidence was much stronger in favor of a recovery by the plaintiff than it was upon the last trial. As to the two petitions, both charged the defendant with not only negative negligence but with positive acts of negligence, and they are substantially the same in all material respects, except that the last petition contains an additional allegation of an act of positive negligence by the defendant which was not in the first petition. This does not help the plaintiff, however, or change the relative circumstances between the two petitions and the evidence adduced in their support, since the evidence upon the last trial failed to sustain this averment of the petition. On the contrary, the evidence clearly showed that when the electric apparatus was installed it was in a safe condition, and that the damage was not the result of any positive act of negligence on the part of the defendant, but resulted from the passive joint negligence of both the defendant and the plaintiff in failing to properly inspect the apparatus and to maintain it in a safe condition.

This ruling is not in conflict with the decision of the Supreme Court in this case (Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Macon Ry. & Light Co., 140 Ga. 309, 78 S. E. 931). That decision held, in substance, that although "as a general rule one of two or more joint tort-feasors has no right of action over against those connected with him in the tort, for either contribution or indemnity, where he alone has been compelled to satisfy the damages resulting from the tort," yet the facts alleged in the petition were sufficient to show an exception to the general rule, viz. that "in some cases one who is liable as a tort-feasor because he has failed to exercise due diligence to discover a defect or danger in machinery, appliances, or place where the injured person is required to work, and has been compelled to pay damages for injuries growing out of the tort, may have a right to recover over against another whose negligence produced or brought about the defect or dangerous condition in the machinery, appliances, or place, which defect was the proximate cause of the injury." In other words, the Supreme Court merely held that the facts as alleged in the declaration made a case within the exception to the general rule. Upon the last trial, however, the evidence failed to sustain these allegations of fact in the petition, but, on the contrary, showed a case within the general rule. In our opinion the judgment of nonsuit was proper.

Judgment affirmed.

1. BILLS AND NOTES ~~§~~517, 537(2)—CORPORATIONS ~~§~~414(6), 432(12)—NOTE SIGNED BY OFFICER—PLEA OF NON EST FACTUM—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Without authority to do so, the manager of a corporation engaged in the wholesale grocery business, and who is "the purchasing agent for the company," and secretary and treasurer thereof, cannot bind the corporation by signing notes for stock in another corporation. Where such a note was signed and given in the name of a corporation by the manager thereof, and a plea of non est factum was filed, and it was not shown either that there was a course of dealing from which authority to sign the notes could be implied, or that the seal of the corporation was affixed to the note, or that the act was ratified by the corporation, or that express authority to sign the note was given to the manager, but, on the contrary, he testified that: "This transaction was not discussed with our directors, I have never advised them anything of it. * * * I do not hold anything at all representing the stock we got from the Lewis Bear Drug Company at the time this note was executed"—the note was properly rejected as evidence upon objection that the execution thereof was not proved, and that it was not shown that the manager had authority to sign it. In addition to the above, while slight evidence is sufficient to lay the foundation for the admission of a note, the execution of which is denied by a plea of non est factum, still the sufficiency of this evidence is for determination by the court. Patton v. Bank of La Fayette, 124 Ga. 965, 53 S. E. 664 (5).

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ~~§~~662(2) — BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—PRESENTATION.

Where a bill of exceptions, duly certified as true by the presiding judge, recites that it was tendered within the time allowed by law, and there is nothing in the bill of exceptions or certificate of the trial judge in denial of such averment, this court must conclude that the bill of exceptions was tendered and presented within the time allowed by law, although the date on which the bill of exceptions purports to have been certified was beyond the statutory period allowed by law for tendering and presenting a bill of exceptions. Civ. Code 1910, § 6187; Jones v. State, 100 Ga. 579, 23 S. E. 396; Pennington v. Sparta, 15 Ga. App. 287, 82 S. E. 828(1). In this case it also affirmatively appears from the certificate of the presiding judge to the bill of exceptions that the failure on his part to sign and certify the same within the time prescribed by law was, not caused by any act of plaintiff in error or her counsel.

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES ~~§~~68(2)—MENTAL PAIN AND SUFFERING—FAILURE TO DELIVER TELEGRAM—DAMAGES.

A telegraph company is not liable in damages for mental pain and suffering caused by negligent failure to deliver a telegraphic message, in the absence of any physical damage or pecuniary loss.

3. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES ~~§~~69—DELAY IN DELIVERING TELEGRAM—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

The only reasonable legal construction of the allegations set forth in the petition of the plaintiff is that the damages complained of resulted from a grossly negligent failure on the part of the defendant's servants in the performance of their ordinary public duties owing to plaintiff. There is nothing in the petition which will authorize a recovery for punitive or exemplary damages growing out of "willful misconduct, malice, fraud, wantonness, or oppression, or that entire want of care which would raise the presumption of a conscious indifference to consequences." Southern Railway Co. v. O'Bryan, 119 Ga. 147, 45 S. E. 1000.

4. DAMAGES — DELAY IN DELIVERING TELEGRAM—GENERAL DEMURRER.

The petition sets forth no grounds to warrant recovery of special damages. It sets forth, however, a breach of public duty owing by the defendant company to the plaintiff, and since the plaintiff therein prays for nominal damages, it was error to dismiss the action on general demurrer. Civ. Code 1910, § 4397; Gurr v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 8 Ga. App. 556, 69 S. E. 1085; Glenn v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 1 Ga. App. 821, 58 S. E. 83.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT — 96(1), 97(2) — INJURY TO SERVANT—LIABILITY—NATURAL AND PROBABLE CONSEQUENCE.

While a master may be liable for an injury to his servant resulting from the master's negligence, although the master, in the exercise of ordinary care, could not have foreseen that his negligence would result in an injury of the particular kind produced, or in the particular servant being injured, yet he cannot be held liable unless the injury sued for was the natural and probable result of his negligence. He is not liable unless, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, he could have reasonably apprehended that his negligence would or might result in injury to some one of his servants. *Mitchell v. 2. APPEAL AND ERROR — 1099(6)—DECISION ON FORMER APPEAL—LAW OF THE CASE.

The former ruling of the Court of Appeals in the same case that plaintiff's petition was not subject to demurrer is the law of the case binding upon that court on a subsequent appeal.

3. COURTS — 99(2)—LAW OF THE CASE.

Where petition in servant's action for injury from a new lever so long that it was easily struck so as to force steam into a "cake former" was not wholly sustained by the evidence, a ruling that under the evidence plaintiff could not recover did not conflict with former ruling that petition was not subject to demurrer.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT — 276(1)—ACTION FOR INJURY — VERDICT — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In servant's action for injury, where he offered no other witness than himself, and where his testimony was so self-contradictory and improbable as to require its construction in light most unfavorable to him, and where defendant's evidence showed a complete defense, a verdict for plaintiff was unauthorized.

L. D. McGregor, of Warrenton, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, P. J. [1] This was a suit against a master for personal injuries sustained by his servant, and was based upon the alleged negligence of the master in not providing a safe place of work for the servant. In the plaintiff's petition the only reason given why the place was not safe was that it contained a defective machine. The undisputed evidence clearly showed that the defect in the machine was a very slight one, and one not dangerous in itself, nor apparently dangerous in conjunction with any other instrumentality in the place; that the defect did not directly cause the plaintiff's injury, but that it was only the indirect and remote cause thereof; and that the master could not, by the exercise of ordinary care, have reasonably anticipated that such an injury, or that any injury at all, would or might result from the defect. The master is not an insurer. He is not required to provide an absolutely safe place for his servants to work in, but only a reasonably safe place. In this case there is no evidence in the record which authorized a finding that the place provided by the master was not a reasonably safe one for the plaintiff and the other servants to work in, or that the master, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, could have foreseen or reasonably apprehended that the defect in the machine would probably cause such an injury as that sued for, or any injury at all, either to the particular servant injured, or to any other of his servants. It follows that the plaintiff was not entitled to a recovery, that the verdict in his favor was contrary to law and the evidence, and that the court erred in overruling the general grounds of the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The above ruling being controlling in the case, it is unnecessary to consider the special grounds of the motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

BLOODWORTH, J., concurs.

STEPHENS, J., concurs dubitante.

On Motion for Rehearing.

BROYLES, P. J. [2] In deciding that under the evidence adduced upon the trial the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, this court did not overlook its former ruling in the same case (20 Ga. App. 549, 93 S. E. 169) that the plaintiff's petition was not subject to demurrer. That ruling, of course, became the law of the case, and as such is binding upon this court.

[3] However, the evidence upon the trial did not affirmatively establish all the material allegations of fact set forth in the petition. The petition and the proof showed that the plaintiff's injuries were caused by a lever being knocked over upon his arm, on September 6, 1915, and paragraph 7 of the petition is as follows:

"(7) Petitioner further avers that on or about the 4th day of September, 1915, the said Southern Cotton Oil Company placed a new lever into the 'cake former' which controlled the steam, and that petitioner stated to the superintendent or vice principal that said lever was too long, whereupon the superintendent, who was vice principal of the Southern Cotton Oil Company, [said] to petitioner that [he] knew said lever was too long, that he would have it cut off, and commanded petitioner to work with said lever until it was cut, but that the said lever was not cut off, and the same being so long made it easily touched and knocked up, thereby turning on the steam into the 'cake former'; this being the lever which was knocked up by the 'charger' which caused the above injury, in the manner and form alleged."

[4] Upon the trial the only evidence tending to support the allegations of this paragraph of the petition was the testimony of the plaintiff, as follows:

"I did hear Mr. Creason [the superintendent of the defendant company] say he was going to have the lever cut off, because it was too long."

It is obvious that this testimony did not sustain all of the material averments in the paragraph. Nor was there any evidence which tended to show that a new lever had been installed, or that the superintendent or vice principal had ordered the plaintiff to work with the lever until it was cut off, or that the length of the lever contributed to the injury sued for. The present ruling, therefore, is not in conflict with the former ruling (20 Ga. App., supra). Moreover, the only witness presented by the plaintiff, to prove his case as laid was the plaintiff himself, and his testimony was so self-contradictory, vague, equivocal, and, in some material respects, so improbable, as to require that it be construed in the light most unfavorable to him, and, there being no other evidence tending to establish his right to recover, and the version of his testimony most unfavorable to his cause showing that the verdict should be against him, and the evidence for the defendant, which was perfectly consistent with this version, establishing a complete defense, the verdict for the plaintiff was unauthorized. Western & Atlantic R. R. Co. v. Evans, 96 Ga. 481, 23 S. E. 494; City of Thomasville v. Crowell, 22 Ga. App. 383, 96 S. E. 335 (1b), and cases there cited.

Rehearing denied.

STEPHENS, J. (dissenting). In the judgment of reversal I concurred dubitante. On the motion for rehearing the cases of Ga. Ry. & Elec. Co. v. Norris, 135 Ga. 838, 70 S. E. 793, A. & W. P. R. R. Co. v. Hudson, 123 Ga. 108, 51 S. E. 29, and Loveless v. Standard Co., 116 Ga. 427, 42 S. E. 741, 59 L. R. A. 596, as well as Mitchell v. Schofield's Sons Co., 16 Ga. App. 686, 690, 85 S. E. 978, supra, were brought to my attention. After a consideration of the same, I am of the opinion that the questions of negligence were, under the evidence, matters entirely for the jury. I think a rehearing should be granted, and that the judgment should be affirmed instead of reversed.

McNEAL v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. CO.

WEATHERS v. SAME.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2
Feb. 20, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

CARRIERS — NEGLIGENCE — DAMAGES — RECOVERY.

There can be no recovery of damages because of mental pain and anguish alone, which resulted from mere negligence, when there has been no physical tort resulting in injury to person or purse.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Separate suits by Gensie McNeal and by Annie M. Weathers against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company. Demurrer in each case sustained, cases dismissed, and plaintiffs except and bring error. Affirmed.

Paul Donehoo, of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error.

Brown, Randolph & Parker, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. Miss Gensie McNeal and Mrs. Annie M. Weathers were daughters of J. M. McNeal. Both sued the Seaboard Air Line Railway, the petition of Miss McNeal alleging, in part, that on or about August 26, 1917, the defendant received and accepted for shipment the corpse of her father at the Atlanta Terminal Station, Atlanta, Ga., to be transported to Luxomni, Ga.; that full fare was paid for the transportation thereof; that plaintiff and the funeral party boarded a train of defendant due to leave said terminal station about 8:45 a. m., and on which train the corpse of her father should have been carried; that when the funeral party reached Luxomni it was learned that said corpse was not aboard the train; that owing to the failure of defendant to transport said body as per agreement, the funeral had to be postponed from 11 a. m. until about 3:30 in the afternoon, necessitating petitioner's remaining in Luxomni an additional space of time, under a terrible strain; that the failure of the defendant to have the body at Luxomni when the funeral party arrived inflicted upon petitioner a severe mental and nervous shock, resulting in a spell of illness from which petitioner did not recover for several days; that the failure of the defendant to ship said corpse was due to the negligence of the agent in charge of the terminal station in Atlanta, and that the same was in reckless and wanton disregard of its duty as a common carrier, and of the rights, feelings, and sensibilities of your petitioner. She prayed for judgment for $3,000.

The petition of Mrs. Weathers was the same as that of Miss McNeal, except that instead of alleging that the severe mental and nervous shock resulted "in a spell of illness from which petitioner did not recover for several days," the petition of Mrs. Weathers alleged, "By reason of which she remained in an unstrung condition for several days." The petition of Miss McNeal contained the additional allegation "that petitioner was the youngest daughter of her father, the only child remaining at home at the time of his death, and the only constant companion of her father." A demurrer to each petition was filed, containing both general and special grounds; the general demurrer in each case was sustained and the case dismissed, and the plaintiffs excepted.

These two cases are almost identical, and both are controlled by the principle announced in a number of cases decided by the Supreme Court of our state, among them Chapman v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 88 Ga. 763, 15 S. E. 901, 17 L. R. A. 480, 30 Am. St. Rep. 183; Giddens v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 111 Ga. 824, 35 S. E. 638; *Sappington v. E. 136; Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Wallace, 141 Ga. 51 (2), 53, 80 S. E. 282, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 429, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1076. See, also, Southern Express Co. v. Byers, 240 U. S. 612, 36 Sup. Ct. 410, 60 L. Ed. 825, L. R. A. 1917A, 197. In the Chapman Case, supra, Mr. Justice Samuel Lumpkin said:

"The law protects the person and the purse. The person includes the reputation. Johnson v. Bradstreet Co., 87 Ga. 79 [13 S. E. 250]. The body, reputation, and property of the citizen are not to be invaded without responsibility in damages to the sufferer. But outside these protected spheres, the law does not yet attempt to guard the peace of mind, the feelings or the happiness of every one, by giving recovery of damages for mental anguish produced by mere negligence. There is no right, capable of enforcement by process of law, to possess or maintain without disturbance any particular condition of feeling. The law leaves feeling to be helped and vindicated by the tremendous force of sympathy. The temperaments of individuals are various and variable, and the imagination exerts a powerful and incalculable influence in injuries of this kind. There are many moral obligations too delicate and subtle to be enforced in the rude way of giving money compensation for their violation. Perhaps the feelings find as full protection as it is possible to give in moral law and a responsive public opinion. The civil law is a practical business system, dealing with what is tangible, and does not undertake to redress psychological injuries."

We are not unmindful of the fact that this court has said:

"While mental suffering, unaccompanied by injury to purse or person, affords no basis for an action predicated upon wrongful acts merely negligent, yet such damages may be recovered in those cases where the plaintiff has suffered at the hands of the defendant a wanton, voluntary, or intentional wrong the natural result of which is the causation of mental suffering and wounded feelings." Dunn v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 2 Ga. App. 846, 59 S. E. 189 (3).

The Dunn Case is easily differentiated from the one now under consideration. While the negligence of the railroad company in the instant case was alleged to be "in reckless and wanton disregard of its duty as a common carrier, and of the rights, feelings, and sensibilities of your petitioner," this is but a conclusion of the pleader. The recital of facts upon which plaintiffs base their claims for damages makes a case of negligent omission only. "If a tort is committed through mistake, ignorance or mere negligence, the damages are limited to the actual injury received."

Judgment affirmed.

SOUTHERN COTTON OIL CO. v. FARKAS.
(No. 9652.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2
Feb. 12, 1919.)

1. SALES \Leftrightarrow 413—VARIANCE.

Plaintiff having declared on an oral contract, and the proof showing a written one, the court properly directed a nonsuit.

2. PLEADING \Leftrightarrow 354(2) — STRIKING PLEA — RULING.

In buyer's action for value of shortage of cotton seed purchased refusal to strike a plea denying each and every paragraph of petition on ground that it was in effect a plea of general issue was not erroneous, in view of Civ. Code 1910, § 5634.

Error from City Court of Albany; Clayton Jones, Judge.

Action by the Southern Cotton Oil Company against Paul Farkas. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff excepts and brings error. Affirmed.

The Southern Cotton Oil Company sued Farkas, alleging that it entered into an oral agreement with the defendant, whereby he sold to it 50 tons of sound cotton seed at $65 per ton, and was to ship the seed, with draft attached to bill of lading for each car; that pursuant to said agreement the defendant shipped two cars of cotton seed from Albany to Dawson, Ga., with sight draft attached to the bill of lading, and, after payment of the draft, the plaintiff discovered that the two cars were short 6,370 pounds of seed, of the value of $207.02; that it purchased 50 tons of cotton seed from the defendant and received only 76,930 pounds, and that under the contract he was still due to it 23,070 pounds of seed, worth at the time of bringing the suit $10 per ton more than the contract price, making him due the plaintiff therefor $115.35, "being the difference in the contract price and the market price of 23,070 pounds of cotton seed." The total amount sued for was $322.37. Defendant filed a plea as follows: "Defendant denies each and every paragraph of said petition." Plaintiff moved to strike the plea, on the ground that it "is in effect a plea of general issue." This motion was overruled, and the case proceeded to trial. At the conclusion of the evidence for the plaintiff a nonsuit was granted on motion of defendant's counsel, and the plaintiff excepted.

R. R. Jones, of Dawson, for plaintiff in error.

Milner & Farkas, of Albany, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. (after stating the facts as above). [2] 1. The court committed no error in refusing to strike the plea. Civ. Code 1910, § 5634.

[1] 2. Upon the trial of the case C. E. Ragan, sworn for the plaintiff, testified in part as follows:

"My occupation is manager of the Southern Cotton Oil Company, at Dawson, Ga. My duties as such manager are buying cotton seed, selling the by-products, just general management of the plant. * * * I employ agents over the country to buy seed for us. I employed Mr. Davis of the Davis Grocery Company in Albany the past season to represent us. His duties were to buy seed under my instructions upon my quotations from Dawson. * * * Mr. Davis made this contract that we are now suing on, with my authority. I don't know what the contract was, except what he told me over the phone. As a matter of fact I think the contract is in writing. I think I have it right here in court. The only contract I have ever had in reference to these seed from Mr. Farkas is a contract Mr. Davis made, and that contract is in writing. * * * After the discussion came up about the seed he sent me this memorandum and confirmation of sale. It was signed by Meyers. This memorandum and confirmation of sale is the contract we are now suing on, the verbal contract over the phone. I told Mr. Davis over the phone to buy them. I only claim one contract with Paul Farkas. * * * I know that represents the particular trade we are now suing on [witness here referring to the confirmation of sale signed by Joe A. Meyers]."

J. C. Davis testified, in part:

"I was in the employ of the Southern Cotton Oil Company in the fall of 1917, in Albany, in the capacity of buying cotton seed. * * * I bought these seed from Mr. Farkas through Mr. Meyers. * * * Me and Meyers reduced that contract to writing. The contract is in writing, and right here in court."

J. A. Meyers, for plaintiff, testified:

"I contracted with Mr. Davis for these seed. * * * My contract was reduced to writing. * * * I sold those seed to Mr. Davis for the Southern Cotton Oil Company; made that contract for Mr. Farkas. * * * The contract was one contract for 50 tons, and that was reduced to writing."

Plaintiff introduced the following writing, dated September 15, 1917:

"This is to confirm sale of 50 tons sound cotton seed at $65.00 per ton f. o. b. cars Albany. Shipment as soon as possible. [Signed] Joe A. Meyers."

In reference to this writing the bill of exceptions says:

"The same being the contract in this case about which witnesses testified had been reduced to writing, and being the only writing in reference to the contract between the parties in this case."

It may be that the record in this case does not show all the facts, but as the record comes to us it shows only one "contract," and that is the paper dated September 15, 1917. In the brief of plaintiff in error he insists:

"The proof does not show a written contract. The most that can be said of the writing introduced in evidence is that it is evidence of the contract. The writing itself fails in many essentials of being a contract. It is not signed by both parties. It is not addressed to anybody. It was simply a confirmation of the sale, written down by one of the parties, but not assented to by the other party to the contract. The writing was unilateral. It no doubt embodied the terms of the contract that had been made between the parties, but the Southern Cotton Oil Company did not sign it, nor did it assent in writing to its terms."

Had there been no performance of this "contract" the argument of the plaintiff in error would probably be good. But the evidence shows that the agents of the contracting parties reduced the contract made to writing, each agent acting for his principal, and that the principals acted on and ratified the contract made by the agents, cotton seed were shipped and accepted in accordance therewith, and for this reason the incomplete contract was perfected. In Harris & Mitchell v. Amoskeag Lumber Co., 97 Ga. 465, 25 S. E. 519, Mr. Justice Lumpkin said:

"We do not think that the correspondence between Harris & Mitchell and the lumber company, tested by any recognized legal rules of construction, ever amounted to a fully completed and binding contract. Nevertheless, the evidence shows unmistakably that the parties so treated it, and this amounts to the same thing, in law, as if this result had been successfully accomplished by the letters themselves."

See, also, Spence Drug Co. v. American Soda Fountain Co., 11 Ga. App. 475, 476, 75 S. E. 817.

Both principals, having acted on the contract as written, incomplete though it is, are bound thereby. Plaintiff having declared on an oral contract and the proof showing a written one, the court properly ordered a nonsuit. "In a complaint founded on an account, it was proven by the plaintiff's witness, on the trial, that there was a written contract between the parties, touching the subject-matter of the account. Held, that the plaintiff could not proceed, and that the defendant was entitled to a nonsuit." Blue v. Ford, 12 Ga. 45. The facts of the instant case clearly differentiate it from those cases in which our courts of last resort have held that:

"Where there is a special contract which has been performed on one side, and there is nothing left to be performed but payment on the other, a recovery can be had either upon the contract, or upon a general indebitatus assumpsit or quantum meruit." Hill v. Balkcom, 79 Ga. 444, 5 S. E. 200.

LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇄330(2)—VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⇄85—RENTAL BY PURCHASER—TRANSFER OF RENT CONTRACT TO VENDOR—LIEN.

Where a vendor of land executed to the vendee a bond for title, and delivered to him the possession of the land, and thereafter the vendee rented the land and transferred the rent contracts to the vendor, the only legal effect of the transfer was to place the title to the rent contracts in the transferee and "carry the liens as a necessary incident thereof," as provided in Civ. Code 1910, §§ 3345, 3346, and with the right in the transferee to enforce the liens arising under the contracts, as provided in section 3347 of the Code.

(a) The fact that the transferee of the rent contracts was also the vendor of the land did not cancel or rescind the original contract of sale, or create the relation of landlord and cropper between the vendor of the land and those cultivating it under contract with the vendee, nor did it place the title to any portion of the crop in the vendor.

Error from City Court of La Grange; Henry Reeves, Judge pro hac.

Action by W. A. Ward against I. M. Scott & Co. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

In the fall of 1913 Ward sold certain lands on credit to Hogg, taking notes for the purchase price and giving bond for title. On January 24, 1916, Hogg executed and delivered to Ward the following paper:

"For value received I hereby transfer and assign to W. A. Ward my landlord's liens for the year 1916, on all crops of the tenants hereinafter named, and also transfer and assign to W. A. Ward the rents due me by the following named tenants for the year 1916: Said tenants being Major Cooley, one-horse farm on halves; Geo. Lynch, one-horse farm on halves; Peter Brooks, one-horse farm on halves; Sam Lovelace, alias Sam Sherman, one-horse farm on halves; William Lovelace, 1½ bales of cotton, standing rent; William Lovelace, Jr., 2 bales cotton, standing rent; J. W. Ward, 2 bales cotton, standing rent; Richard Key, 2 bales, standing rent; Abb Copeland, 600 pounds lint cotton, standing rent; Tom Winston, 4 bales, standing rent; A. F. & S. F. Ward, 4 bales, standing rent, said bales to be 500 pounds each of middling cotton, packed in merchantable bales, delivered in West Point; also all rents of all tenants on the Palmer home place, on which there will be run a four-horse farm on halves. These rents are due and payable October 15, 1916. These rents are given for the land purchased by me from W. A. Ward, and are for the rent of the lands for the year 1916, and are to be turned over to W. A. Ward, to be credited to the indebtedness I am now due him for the purchase of said lands. It is the intention of this paper to transfer and assign all my rights and liens as landlord, so that W. A. Ward may enforce his landlord's lien for rents and supplies and advances he may furnish said tenants to make crops for the year 1916. Witness my hand and seal this January 24, 1916."

Hogg applied to Scott & Co., who were merchants dealing in farm supplies, to furnish his tenants for the year 1916. Scott & Co. agreed to do this on condition that Ward would waive a certain amount of rent for each of Hogg's tenants. This Ward did on April 6th. There were six of these "waivers," and all were alike, except as to name of tenant, amount of land to be cultivated, and amount of rent cotton to be waived, and of which "waivers" the following is a sample:

"In order to enable W. F. Hogg and Perry Green to get mule, guano, and supplies to make a crop on my farm, which I have rented him for the year 1916, I agree to let him use first 3,000 pounds middling lint cotton, completing my rent for two-horse farm on place known as * * * farm for the year 1916. All other farm products to be subject to indebtedness with Scott & Co. I also agree not to furnish him anything as landlord for the year 1916."

After receiving these "waivers," Scott & Co. furnished the tenants and charged the account of each tenant to him and Hogg. In the fall of 1916 Hogg and his tenants delivered certain cotton and cotton seed to Scott & Co. Ward claimed that half of the cotton and cotton seed delivered to Scott & Co. belonged to him as landlord, and upon their failure to make settlement with him therefor filed a petition against I. M. Scott & Co., alleging that he was the owner of the lands upon which this cotton and cotton seed had been raised, that he was farming thereon, that said lands "were operated by croppers of petitioner," and that "defendant agreed to furnish the croppers of petitioner during said year, on condition that petitioner would waive his rights as landlord, so that the croppers could secure the defendant for supplies furnished, which condition was met by petitioner, he waiving in writing his rights as landlord, for the purpose of having said croppers buy such supplies as was necessary, for the purpose of making a crop." Plaintiff further alleged that his croppers delivered to defendants the cotton and cotton seed raised by them, and a half of the cotton and cotton seed of each cropper was sufficient to pay the indebtedness of that cropper, and the other half of the cotton and cotton seed belonged to him.

Defendants filed a plea denying liability, and further pleading that the plaintiff was not landlord, but that Hogg was the owner of the land and in possession thereof, and that the supplies they furnished were to Hogg and his croppers, and were so charged on their books, "all of which was done with the knowledge of said W. A. Ward." Defendants further pleaded that they had made full settlement with Hogg and his croppers. The issues raised by the pleadings were submitted to the jury, which rendered a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendants excepted.

B. J. Mayer, of West Point, for plaintiffs in error.

M. U. Mooty, of La Grange, and Watkins, Harwell & Watkins, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. (after stating the facts as above). The plaintiff testified, in part, as follows:

"I sold the property to Hogg in the fall of 1913, and gave him a bond for title. I don't know where the bond for title is. I gave it to him, and it is his property, and still his property. It is my property, but his bond. I have not paid taxes on it since then, and haven't given it in for taxes. Hogg hasn't paid me for it, and I still hold his notes. When this transaction took place, Hogg was in possession of the property. In 1916 he came to me and told me he was unable to go further, and was unable to furnish his hands, and was unable to meet his payment and he went into this written agreement under this contract. I didn't consider that Hogg was still the landlord. My attorney told me I was in possession under this contract, and that Hogg was not under the bond for title. I signed the waivers to furnish certain hands and W. F. Hogg, which was done at the request of Hogg."

The "written agreement," referred to in the evidence just quoted, is the paper copied in the statement of facts, and dated January 24, 1916. A copy of the "waivers" referred to will also be found in the statement of facts. A part of the evidence of Hogg is as follows:

"I hold land that I hold under bond for title that I purchased from W. A. Ward. I held this land in 1916. I purchased the land from W. A. Ward in 1913, and I was in possession of the land in 1916, and am in possession of it now. I know Sam Lovelace, Major Cooley, Whit Davidson, Perry Green, Peter Brooks, and Geo. Lynch. They were tenants in 1916 on the lands I purchased from W. A. Ward. They were working that year on halves. I. M. Scott & Co. furnished them at my request. * * * I paid the taxes on the property, 1916 and 1915. * * * I made the agreements with these negroes for the year 1916, and Ward did not make them, and he never had anything to do with them."

Under the foregoing facts it is quite clear that the relation of landlord and cropper never existed during the year 1916 between Ward and those who cultivated the land sold by him to Hogg. The evidence shows that Ward sold the land to Hogg, gave him bond for title, which Hogg still held, and Ward held the notes given for the purchase price of the land. In Broxton v. Ennis, 96 Ga. 792, 22 S. E. 945, it was held:

"Where, under a contract for the sale of land, the vendor executes to the vendee the usual bond for titles, and delivers to him the possession of the premises, even if the latter fail to pay the purchase money at maturity, he may nevertheless retain possession, either by himself or his tenant, until such time as he shall be legally evicted therefrom by the vendor; and the tenant who enters under the vendee cannot, without first surrendering his possession to the latter, attorn to the vendor upon any supposed right of the latter, without the consent of the vendee to rescind the contract of sale."

In the case of Guin v. Hilton & Dodge Lumber Co., 6 Ga. App. 488, 65 S. E. 332, this court referred to Broxton v. Ennis, supra, and said:

"This decision is in effect a holding that the vendee in possession under a bond for title is to all intents and purposes the owner of the land until the vendor, in some manner prescribed by law, recovers possession of the land."

Applying the rulings in those cases to the facts of the one now under consideration, we must hold that Hogg was landlord, and that the only legal effect of the paper of January 24, 1916, was to transfer to Ward the title to the rent contracts and "carry the liens as a necessary incident thereof," as provided by sections 3345 and 3346 of the Civil Code of 1910, with the right in him to enforce the liens arising thereunder as provided in section 3347 of said Code. It did not cancel or rescind the contract of sale of the land made by Ward to Hogg, nor did it change the relation between Hogg and the tenants and make Ward landlord, nor did the "waivers" signed by Ward have this effect. It will be noted that in the agreement of January 24, 1916, Hogg transfers to Ward his liens for 1916, "on all crops of the tenants hereinafter named," and also transfers and assigns to Ward "the rents due me by the following named tenants for the year 1916." This transfer also says:

"These rents are due and payable October 15, 1916. These rents are given for the lands purchased by me from W. A. Ward, and are for the rent of the lands for the year 1916, and are to be turned over to W. A. Ward to be credited on the indebtedness I am now due him for the purchase of said lands."

As the petition was based upon the allegation that plaintiff was the landlord and that the parties cultivating the land were his "croppers," and as the evidence clearly establishes the fact that he was not the landlord, and that the persons cultivating the land were not his croppers, and that he had only a lien on the cotton and cotton seed raised by the tenant, and not title thereto, the evidence fails to support the allegations of the petition. The verdict is therefore contrary to the law and the facts, and must be set aside. Under this ruling it is unnecessary to consider the special grounds of the motion for new trial.

Judgment reversed.

Error from City Court of Macon; Du Pont Guerry, Judge.

Suit by the Georgia Casualty Company against the Dixie Trust & Security Company and R. L. Wilson. Wilson to original and amended petition sustained, and suit dismissed, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

P. F. Brock, of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

Hardeman, Jones, Park & Johnston and R. Curd, all of Macon, for defendants in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. The brief of counsel for defendants in error is such a clear and fair presentation of the issues involved in this case, and so fully in accord with our opinion of the principles of law involved, that we adopt it almost in its entirety as our opinion in the case.

The Dixie Trust & Security Company issued two certificates of deposit, dated February 26, 1915. These certificates were signed by the trust company, through two of its officers alone. No other party appeared as joint maker, security, indorser, or otherwise thereon. The company was chartered in Crisp county, and had its principal office and place of business in that county. Subsequently, on March 1, 1915, R. L. Wilson executed a contract wherein he agreed to indorse these certificates and to guarantee the Georgia Casualty Company against loss thereon. This contract was signed by Wilson alone. The trust company was not a party thereto in any way, and, so far as shown on the face of the contract, was not interested therein beneficially or otherwise. Wilson was a resident of Bibb county, Ga. The Georgia Casualty Company, the holder of these certificates, sued the trust company and Wilson jointly in the city court of Macon for their full face value with interest, attaching copies of the certificates and contract to the petition. The trust company demurred to the petition, on the ground that it affirmatively appeared that the court was without jurisdiction as to it. Wilson demurred on the grounds that it affirmatively appeared that he was a guarantor against loss only; that he was not a party to the certificates nor liable thereon, and could not be sued jointly with the trust company; and that he could not be sued individually on the contract of indemnity until it was shown that the holder had been unable to recover from the maker of the certificates. On the hearing the plaintiff filed an amendment, which was allowed, alleging that the consideration for the contract executed by Wilson was extension of time and indulgence granted by the plaintiff to the trust company and another upon these certificates and other indebtedness, and that it was the intention of the parties that Wilson should become surety for said debts. This amendment was demurred to on the ground that it was an attempt to vary the plain terms of the contract set forth, was directly contradictory thereof, and that the same could not be changed or varied by any alleged intention of the parties. The court sustained the demurrer of the trust company and also sustained the demurrer of R. L. Wilson to the original petition and to the petition as amended, and dismissed the entire case. The correctness of the court's rulings upon all of the demurrers depends primarily upon the terms of the contract between plaintiff and Wilson. The material portions thereof are:

" * * * Whereas the Georgia Casualty Company has on deposit with the Farmers' State Bank the sum of $7,710.00 * * * and also holds the following certificate of deposit issued by said bank: * * * Now, therefore, in consideration of $5.00, * * * the said R. L. Wilson hereby agrees to indorse the above-named certificates as well as the other two certificates of deposit held by the Georgia Casualty Company and issued by the Dixie Trust & Security Company, * * * and to likewise indorse any renewals or extensions of the above-named certificates of deposit. And for the consideration aforesaid the said R. L. Wilson does also guarantee the said Georgia Casualty Company against loss on account of the above-named certificates of deposit * * * or the above-mentioned deposit with the Farmers' State Bank, and guarantees to the said Georgia Casualty Company the faithful payment of all amounts due or owing by said Farmers' State Bank to the Georgia Casualty Company. * * *"

[1] 1. After fixing the venue of divorce cases, land cases, and equity cases, the Constitution of Georgia provides:

"Suits against joint obligors, joint promisors, copartners, or joint trespassers, residing in different counties, may be tried in either county." Civil Code 1910, § 6541.

"Suits against the maker and indorser of promissory notes, or drawer, acceptor, and indorser of * * * inland bills of exchange, or like instruments, residing in different counties, shall be brought in the county where the maker or acceptor resides." Civil Code 1910, § 6542.

"All other civil cases shall be tried in the county where the defendant resides. * * *" Civil Code 1910, § 6543.

It is not contended that Wilson was a joint maker. He was not an indorser in the technical sense. If he had been, a joint suit could only be maintained in Crisp county. If a guarantor, there could be no joint suit in either county. Both parties would have to be sued independently in the county of their respective residences. Musgrove v. Luther Publishing Co., 5 Ga. App. 279, 63 S. E. 52; Manry v. Waxelbaum, 108 Ga. 14, 33 S. E. 701; Renfro v. Shuman, 94 Ga. 153, 21 S. E. 373; Lewis v. Close, 91 Ga. 302. Was he a surety? There is no connection whatever on the certificates of deposit themselves, either on their face or elsewhere, between the trust company and Wilson. They are promises to pay by the trust company alone, independently of any one else, and the company is not a party to any other agreement by any other persons relating to them. The difference between the contract of surety and guarantor is thus stated in a decision of this court:

"A surety and guarantor have this in common, that they are both bound for another person; yet there are points of difference between them which should be carefully noted. A surety is usually bound with his principal by the same instrument, executed at the same time and on the same consideration. He is an original promisor and debtor from the beginning, and is held ordinarily to every known default of his principal. * * * On the other hand, the contract of guarantor is his own separate undertaking, in which the principal does not join. It is usually entered into before or after that of the principal, and is often founded on a separate consideration from that supporting the contract of the principal. The original contract of the principal is not the guarantor's contract, and the guarantor is not bound to take notice of its nonperformance." 1 Brandt on Suretyship (3d Ed.) § 2. The surety joins in the same promise as his principal and is primarily liable; the guarantor makes a separate and individual promise and is only secondarily liable. His liability is contingent on the default of his principal, and he only becomes absolutely liable when such default takes place and he is notified thereof. 20 Cyc. 1400 et seq.; Childs on Suretyship and Guaranty, 7." Musgrove v. Luther Publishing Co., 5 Ga. App. 281, 63 S. E. 53.

The distinction is thus stated by the Supreme Court:

"One difference is pointed out by our Code. It says that a contract of suretyship 'differs from a guaranty in this, that the consideration of the latter is a benefit flowing to the guarantor.' Civil Code, § 2966. * * * In brief, we understand the difference to be this: A surety binds himself to perform if the principal does not, without regard to his ability to do so. His contract is equally absolute with that of his principal. They may be sued in the same action, and judgment may be entered up against both. A guarantor, on the other hand, does not contract that the principal will pay, but simply that he is able to do so; in other words, a guarantor warrants nothing but the solvency of the principal. Before an action can be maintained against a guarantor, therefore, it must be shown that the principal is unable to perform. The surety says to the creditor: If your debtor will not pay, I will pay. The guarantor says to him: Proceed first against the principal, and, if he should not be able to pay, then you may proceed against me. It has been said that there is no instance in the books of a guarantor contracting jointly with his principal. Much has been written upon this subject, but we think the above expresses the true distinction between the two classes of contracts." Manry v. Waxelbaum, 108 Ga. 17, 33 S. E. 703.

Measured by the rules laid down in the decisions cited, whatever may be the particular nature of the obligation entered into by Wilson, it was not that of a surety. The obligations were evidenced by different instruments executed at different times and upon different considerations. Wilson was not a debtor from the beginning, and has at no time ever been primarily liable upon the certificates. Under no view of the transaction could the city court of Macon have had jurisdiction of the trust company.

[2, 4, 5] 2. By the terms of the writing signed by Wilson, the casualty company bound itself to nothing. Wilson agreed to three things: (a) To indorse all the certificates of deposit. (b) To guarantee the Georgia Casualty Company "against loss on account of the above-mentioned certificates of deposit," or the deposit with the Farmers' State Bank. (c) To guarantee to the Georgia Casualty Company the faithful payment of all amounts due or owing by said Farmers' State Bank to Georgia Casualty Company.

(1) Wilson merely agreed to indorse. He did not indorse and is not sued as indorser. He could not be held as indorser upon a mere promise to indorse. He might be sued for breach of his agreement, but then plaintiff could only recover by showing loss. National Bank v. Leonard, 91 Ga. 805, 18 S. E. 32; Birdsell v. Brown, 96 Mich. 213, 55 N. W. 806; 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. (6th Ed.) § 689. If one agrees to give a note, can you bring a suit against him on the note which he fails to give? See Adams v. Williams, 125 Ga. 430, 54 S. E. 99. (2a) An indorsement may always be explained. Civil Code 1910, § 5796.

If Wilson had indorsed the certificates, what kind of indorsement would he have placed thereon? The contract answers the question. He was to indorse on the Farmers' State Bank certificates a guaranty to faithfully pay. He was to indorse on the Dixie Trust certificates a guaranty against loss. Otherwise, why did not the contract stop with a simple agreement to indorse?

(2) Under the authorities quoted from in the first division of this opinion, Wilson was a guarantor. Under the terms of the specific contract in question here, his guaranty was against any loss on the Dixie Trust Company certificate. This was an agreement to indemnify only.

"A guaranty of a note is a covenant to pay it, breached by failure of the note's maker to do so; while an indemnitor's covenant is merely to make good any loss from nonpayment." Eckhart v. Heier, 37 S. D. 382, 153 N. W. 403.

"So, in general, there is a well-settled distinction between an agreement to indemnify and an agreement to pay, or a covenant to do a certain act. In the latter case a recovery may be had as soon as there is a breach of the contract, whereas in the case of a covenant of indemnity strictly—that is, of an indemnity against loss—no right of action accrues until the indemnitee has suffered a loss against which the covenant runs." 14 Ruling Case Law, 44.

See, also, Wicker v. Hoppock, 6 Wall. 94, 99, 18 L. Ed. 752, 753; Wilson v. Stillwell, 9 Ohio St. 467, 75 Am. Dec. 477; Henderson v. Shillito, 64 Ohio St. 236, 60 N. E. 295, 298, 82 Am. St. Rep. 745; Bain v. Arthur, 129 La. 143, 55 South. 743; Poe v. Philadelphia Casualty Co., 118 Md. 347, 84 Atl. 476.

"A guaranty of collection or a guaranty against loss as the result of the failure to collect a debt places upon the one for whose benefit the guaranty is made the duty of making a reasonable effort to collect the debt from the principal debtor, and a cause of action does not accrue thereon until after such effort has been made and proved unavailing. There is no right of action upon such contingent liability immediately upon the failure of the principal to perform." Burton v. Dewey, 4 Kan. App. 592, 46 Pac. 325.

See, also, Allen v. Rundle, 50 Conn. 9, 47 Am. Rep. 599; Allison v. Waldham, 24 Ill. 132; Bosman v. Akeley, 39 Mich. 710, 33 Am. Rep. 447; Osborne & Co. v. Thompson, 36 Minn. 528, 33 N. W. 1; Northern Ins. Co. v. Wright, 76 N. Y. 445; Woods v. Sherman, 71 Pa. 100 (2); Evans v. Bell, 45 Tex. 553; Day v. Elmore, 4 Wis. 190; Parker v. Culvertson, 18 Fed. Cas. 1122, No. 10732.

[6] Inasmuch as there has been no effort (prior to the present suit in a court without jurisdiction) to collect from the Dixie Trust & Security Company, and that company is not even alleged to be insolvent, the liability contracted for has not arisen. The contract of guaranty is stricti juris, and the guarantor may stand upon the precise terms of his contract. Williams Valve Co. v. Amorous, 19 Ga. App. 155 (1, 5), 91 S. E. 240.

(3) The language used evidences a clear intention to guarantee against loss only on the Dixie Trust & Security Company certificates. Wilson therefore was not subject to a suit upon his undertaking until efforts to collect out of the trust company were exhausted or some reason shown why such efforts would prove fruitless.

[3] 3. No relation between Wilson and the trust company is mentioned in the writing. The sole consideration therefor recited in the agreement was the payment of $5. If this was not paid, then there was no consideration flowing from the casualty company for the contract. It neither did anything nor agreed to do anything. While the consideration of a contract may be inquired into, an executory consideration different from that expressed in the contract cannot be proven. It does not appear how any agreement to extend the time for payment of the Farmers' State Bank certificates could have been of any benefit to the Dixie Trust & Security Company or could have furnished any consideration for Wilson's agreement to indorse or guarantee the trust company's certificates. But even if so, and if the alleged extension of time on the trust company's certificates constituted a consideration for Wilson's agreement, this could not be shown by parol to vary or add to the writing. Smith v. Newton, 59 Ga. 113 (5); Atkinson v. Lanier, 69 Ga. 460 (2); Burke v. Napier, 106 Ga. 329, 32 S. E. 134; Wellmaker v. Wheatley, 123 Ga. 203, 51 S. E. 436 (2); Coldwell Co. v. Cowart, 138 Ga. 236, 75 S. E. 425; Brousseau v. Jacobs Pharmacy Co., 147 Ga. 189, 93 S. E. 293 (1); Kehoe v. Southern Paving C. Co., 7 Ga. App. 236, 66 S. E. 547. In no event could it have changed the contract from one of guaranty to one of suretyship in the face of the specific provisions to the contrary in the agreement itself. The demurrers, including the demurrer to the petition as amended, should have been sustained and the case dismissed as to all parties, and the court was clearly right in so doing. See Adams v. Williams, 125 Ga. 430, 54 S. E. 99.

WASHINGTON EXCH. BANK v. SMITH.
(No. 9634.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 1, 1919. On Rehearing, Feb. 27, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨231(3)—OBJECTIONS IN LOWER COURT—STATEMENT OF GROUNDS.

This court cannot say that the admission in evidence of the deed from R. M. Smith to Sallie L. G. Smith was error. The only objection made at the time of its admission was that it was "inadmissible." This objection was too general and indefinite. Some specific ground or reason why it was inadmissible should have been stated.

2. MORTGAGES ⇨114—PROVISION IN NOTE—SECURITY.

Under the agreed statement of facts, the court, passing by consent upon all questions both of law and fact, did not err in finding and adjudging that the $5,000 note was the only note sued on, which was secured by deed, and that the $447 note was not so secured. The deed in question, which secured the $5,000 note, was executed prior to the execution of the $447 note. The $447 note was, however, executed prior to the execution of the $5,000 note, and was held by the plaintiff bank at the time of the making of the latter note. The $5,000 note did not specifically refer to the $447 note (both notes being executed by the same person), but contained the following provision: "And it is hereby agreed and understood that any excess of security upon this note shall be applicable to any other note or claim held by said bank against me." No parol evidence was introduced to show that the $447 note was secured by the deed given to secure the $5,000 note, or that this was the intention of the parties, and the language just quoted from the $5,000 note was insufficient in itself, to establish such fact.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1071(1)—INTEREST
⇨50—TENDER ⇨16(2)—HARMLESS ERROR —NECESSITY OF TENDER.

The court erred in finding that the defendant made a legal tender of the amount due on the $5,000 note. The agreed statement of facts clearly shows that no such tender was ever made. This error, however, was harmless to the plaintiff, as the undisputed evidence showed that the plaintiff stated to the defendant, when the latter offered to pay the $5,000 note, that it would not accept the amount due on the $5,000 note unless the amount due on the $447 note was also paid. "A formal tender is unnecessary, where express declarations are made by the party to whom money is payable that he will not accept it, if tendered. The law takes one who makes such a statement at his word, and does not thereafter require the doing of a vain thing." Arnold v. Empire Life Insurance Co., 3 Ga. App. 685 (5), 708, 60 S. E. 470, 480; Southern Life Insurance Co. v. Logan, 9 Ga. App. 503 (2), 507 (2), 508, 71 S. E. 742; McLeod v. Hendry, 126 Ga. 187 (2), 171 (2), 54 S. E. 949; Irwin v. Askew, 74 Ga. 581 (4). Under the facts of the instant case, a tender by the defendant would have been "a mere idle and useless ceremony," and it was therefore unnecessary.

(a) The plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount of the principal due on the $5,000 note, with accrued interest thereon to the date of its refusal to accept payment of such note and interest from the defendant.

4. JUDGMENT ⇨222—DEFINITENESS.

The judgment is too general, in that it does not specifically designate the amount due the plaintiff on the $5,000 note. The court below is directed to amend its judgment to cure this defect.

*On Rehearing.(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)5. INTEREST ⇨50—CONTINUING TENDER—RUNNING OF INTEREST.

The rule that a tender to prevent running of interest must be continuing is not applicable, in case where no legal tender was ever made.

6. INTEREST ⇨50—REFUSAL TO ACCEPT TEN-DER.

Where a debtor made a bona fide offer to pay a note, and intended and was able to make payment, but offer was rejected by creditor, he was not entitled to interest on note after rejection of tender.

BROYLES, P. J. Judgment affirmed, with direction.

BLOODWORTH and STEPHENS, JJ., concur.

On Rehearing.

BROYLES, P. J. [5, 6] In our judgment the principle of law stated in Gray v. Angler, 62 Ga. 597, that "a tender, to prevent the running of interest, must be continuing," is not applicable in a case where no legal tender was ever made. In the instant case, as decided by this court, no legal tender was made; but the evidence authorized a finding that a bona fide offer to pay the $5,000 note was made by the debtor to his creditor on March 14, 1917, that the former really intended and was able to make the payment, and that this offer was rejected by the creditor on the following day. Under these circumstances the creditor was not entitled to interest on the note after the latter date, to wit, March 15, 1917. "Where a debtor is really and bona fide ready to make payment, and intends to do so, but is prevented from so doing by the act or omission of his creditor, the latter will not be entitled to interest." 15 R. C. L., 33, § 30; Hart v. Brand, 1 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 159, 10 Am. Dec. 715. "If the failure to make payment of the principal debt is due to any improper act of the creditor, or to such conduct on his part as prevents the debtor from complying with his contract to pay, interest on such debt is generally suspended during the time the debtor is so prevented from making payment." 22 Cyc. 1554, § 2, note 93.

Feb. 12, 1919.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨230(2) — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—AGE OF CERTIFICATE.

A servant 19 years old, "of fair education and training," is chargeable with the same degree of diligence for his own safety as an adult engaged in the same work.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨217(13)—DEFECTIVE TOOLS AND APPLIANCES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—LIABILITY.

"A master is not responsible in damages to his servant for injuries sustained by the latter while in the employment of the former, in consequence of defects in a tool furnished by the master, which the servant was using at the time of the injury, when the defects were such that they were known to the servant, or could have been known by the exercise of ordinary care on his part."

3. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨155(1) — DANGERS INCIDENT TO EMPLOYMENT—WARNING.

"The duty of a master to warn his servants of dangers incident to his employment does not embrace an obligation of the master to anticipate that the servant may perform his task improperly, and to warn him of an obvious danger resultant from such improper method of performing his task."

4. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨258(11)—TOOLS AND APPLIANCES—WARNING—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

Petition alleging that deceased servant, 19 years old, was employed to sell and deliver gasoline from a truck, the platform of which was too high to remove cans, that defective covers permitted spilling of gasoline on his clothing, as result of which it caught fire as he was standing near cigar lighter, and a failure to warn of dangerous machinery and inflammable character of gasoline fumes, stated no cause of action.

Error from Superior Court, Baldwin County; J. B. Park, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. Leah V. Hearn against the Texas Company and another. General and special demurrers to petition overruled, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Mrs. Leah V. Hearn sued the Texas Company, alleging, in substance, as follows: That petitioner is the mother of Cline Hearn, who in his lifetime contributed to her support; that on December 29, 1916, the said Cline Hearn, then a minor 19 years old, was employed by the defendant, and while engaged in the discharge of his duties was killed as a result of the negligence of defendant and its agent, Homer A. Massey; that prior to December, 1916, the said agent employed the deceased to drive a truck and to sell and deliver gasoline; that said agent furnished the deceased, for use by him in performing his duties, an automobile truck and a number of 10-gallon oil cans, to be carried on said truck, for the transportation of oil and gasoline; that the platform of the truck upon which the cans stood was 40 inches above the surface on which the truck ran, and the cans were 24 inches high; that it was Hearn's duty to carry these cans, filled with gasoline and oil to the point of delivery, and take them from the truck and pour their contents into the tanks of dealers to whom he sold; that a number of the cans furnished Hearn had defective covers, in that the covers did not fit the opening of the cans tight enough to prevent their falling out when they were tilted; that on the date of his death Hearn drove his truck to Gordon, and there made a sale of gasoline for his employer to a dealer, and, in taking the can of gasoline from the truck for the purpose of delivering it, tilted the can, and the defective cover came off and gasoline poured out over the said Hearn's body and clothing; that within five minutes after making this delivery he was in the drug store of Dr. Evans, at Gordon, standing at the counter near a cigar lighter, which was burning a small flame, and standing more than 12 inches therefrom, when the fumes of gasoline from his clothing caught fire from the flame, and the fire was communicated to his gasoline-soaked clothing, and the burns therefrom caused his death; that Cline Hearn never handled gasoline until after his employment by the defendant, which was less than 4 months prior to his death; that he had no knowledge of the danger attending the handling of the same, and that he had no knowledge of the inflammable nature of its fumes, while the defendant well knew of the dangers incident to his employment, and of the inflammable nature of the gasoline; that the defendant well knew the youth, inexperience, and lack of knowledge of Hearn about his business; that the truck and cans furnished Hearn were defective and dangerous tools, in that Hearn was only 5 feet 4 inches tall, the floor of the truck was 40 inches above ground, the top of the can 24 inches above the floor of the truck, and the cans, when full, weighed more than 100 pounds, and, in order for Hearn to remove the cans from the truck, it was necessary to tilt the can until he could encircle it with his arms; and that Hearn had no opportunity to learn of the dangerous character of the tools. It is alleged that the defendant was negligent in furnishing Hearn with dangerous machinery and tools, with a machine whose floor was too high for him to safely remove therefrom cans of the character furnished him, filled with gasoline, with cans having defective covers, that permitted the spilling of gasoline on his body and clothes, with a truck and cans which necessitated the tilting of the cans in unloading; in failing to warn him of the dangerous character of the machinery and tools furnished him, of the dangers attending his duties, of the dangers of spilling gasoline upon his clothes, and of the inflammable character of the fumes of gasoline, and in failing to instruct him to use the machine furnished and handle the gasoline in a safe manner. Demurrers, both general and special, were overruled, and the defendant excepted.

Ryals & Anderson and B. S. Deaver, all of Macon, for plaintiffs in error.

Hines & Vinson, of Milledgeville, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] That the deceased was only 19 years old when the burning which resulted in his death took place cannot avail the plaintiff. The petition distinctly alleges that he was "of fair education and training." In Skipper v. Southern Cotton Oil Co., 120 Ga. 942, 48 S. E. 360, Mr. Justice Lamar said:

"The petition stresses the fact that the plaintiff was a minor and inexperienced, but that he was only 19 years of age was immaterial. The case is to be treated as though he had attained majority; for there is no suggestion that he was not chargeable with the duty of using due care, nor that he was incapable of appreciating the danger of stepping into the midst of moving machinery."

As illustrating the principle above announced, see Muscogee Mfg. Co. v. Butts, 21 Ga. App. 558, 94 S. E. 821 (1); Vinson v. Willingham Cotton Mills, 2 Ga. App. 53, 58 S. E. 413 (2); Wilder v. Miller, 128 Ga. 139, 57 S. E. 509 (1); Evans v. Josephine Mills, 119 Ga. 448, 46 S. E. 674 (6); Central Railroad Co. v. Phillips, 91 Ga. 526, 17 S. E. 952 (2); Central

[2] 2. From the foregoing statement of facts it will be seen that the petition alleges that the defendant was negligent, because the deceased was low of stature and had been furnished with an auto truck too high for him to remove the cans of gasoline therefrom without tilting them, and that some of the cans had defective tops, which allowed the gasoline to spill when the cans were tilted. It does not appear from the petition that the truck and cans were not equal in kind to those in general use and reasonably safe for all persons who operated them with ordinary care and diligence, and there is no allegation that the servant made complaint to the master in reference thereto, nor is there any charge that there were any latent defects in the truck or cans. The plaintiff by the petition seems to attempt to place this case in a special class because deceased was "low of stature." From the very character of the complaint as to the alleged defects of the truck and cans, these defects were patent and obvious to the deceased. It also appears from the declaration that the servant for nearly 4 months had been using the truck and cans, and his opportunity of knowing of "the defects or danger in the machinery supplied" was equal, if not superior, to that of the master. See Williams v. Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Co., 18 Ga. App. 120, 89 S. E. 158, and cases cited, and Beck v. Tumlin Co., 13 Ga. App. 618, 79 S. E. 587, and cases cited. Even if it be conceded that the truck and cans, as related to the low stature of the deceased, were dangerous because of the alleged deficiencies therein, the deceased, with full knowledge of these deficiencies, assumed the risk and continued voluntarily to use them, and the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover for any injury resulting solely from such use. It is apparent, from the allegations in the petition, that the saturation of the clothes of the deceased resulted from his own failure to perform with due care the work assigned him, and was not the result of any negligent act or omission of the defendant, and that the master is not liable for providing the truck and cans used by the deceased.

"A master is not responsible in damages to his servant for injuries sustained by the latter while in the employment of the former, in consequence of defects in a tool furnished by the master, which the servant was using at the time of the injury, when the defects were such that they were known to the servant, or could have been known by the exercise of ordinary care on his part." Banks v. Schofield's Sons, 126 Ga. 667, 55 S. E. 939.

"The servant seeking to recover for an injury takes the burden upon himself of establishing negligence on the part of the master, and due care on his own part." McDaniel v. Acme Brewing Co., 113 Ga. 80, 38 S. E. 404 (1).

See, also, Civil Code 1910, § 3131; Musco-gee Mfg. Co. v. Butts, 21 Ga. App. 558, 94 S. E. 821 (2); Short v. Cherokee Mfg. Co., 3 Ga. App. 377, 59 S. E. 1115.

[3, 4] 3. The petition alleges that the deceased had never handled gasoline until he was employed by the defendant, "had no knowledge of the inflammable nature of the fumes of gasoline," and "had no knowledge of the dangers attending the handling of the same," and that the defendant failed to warn him of the inflammable nature of gasoline, and failed to instruct him "of the dangers of permitting gasoline to get upon his person and clothing." Generally it is the duty of the master to warn the servant of the dangers incident to his employment, yet this duty "does not embrace an obligation of the master to anticipate that the servant may perform his task improperly, and to warn him of an obvious danger resultant from such improper method of performing his task." Howard v. Central of Georgia Ry. Co., 138 Ga. 537, 75 S. E. 624 (2). See Commercial Guano Co. v. Neather, 114 Ga. 416, 40 S. E. 209 (2). The saturation with gasoline of the clothes of the deceased was not an incident to the proper performance of his work, but clearly resulted from an improper performance thereof, and was the causa sine qua non, the cause without which the burning could not have taken place. The proper performance of the duties of the deceased would not be attended by extraordinary hazard or danger.

"The failure of the master to instruct the servant how to perform work which any person of ordinary intelligence can perform without instructions, and the performance of which is unattended by extraordinary hazard or danger, is not such a breach of his duty to instruct as will give a servant injured while performing the work a right of action for damages." Howard v. Central of Georgia Railway Co., 138 Ga. 537, 75 S. E. 624 (1).

It follows from the decisions above quoted and cited that the defendant was under no legal duty to warn the deceased of the danger resulting from the improper performance of his task. In addition to the above, the petition shows:

That at the time his "clothing caught fire he was in the drug store of Dr. Evans, at Gordon, Ga., standing at the counter near a cigar lighter, which was burning a small flame," and that "the fumes of gasoline from his clothing caught fire from the flame, and the fire was communicated to his gasoline-soaked clothing, and the burns therefrom were the cause of his death."

There is no allegation that he was in this drug store delivering gasoline, or that in the discharge of his duty it was necessary for him to be standing near the cigar lighter from which the "fumes" of gasoline caught fire, and which resulted in his death. See Kennedy v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 9 Ga. App. 661, 72 S. E. 66; Savannah Electric Co. v. Hodges, 6 Ga. App. 470, 65 S. E. 322; Strange v. Wrightsville & Tennille R. Co., 133 Ga. 730, 66 S. E. 774; Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. McWhorter, 115 Ga. 476, 42 S. E. 82; Whitton v. South Carolina & Georgia R. Co., 106 Ga. 796, 32 S. E. 857; Central Railroad & Banking Co. v. Chapman, 96 Ga. 769, 22 S. E. 273; Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Ry. v. Ray, 70 Ga. 674 (4). Taking into consideration all the allegations of the petition, we are convinced that the death of Cline Hearn was not due to the failure of any duty due him by the defendant, or to any negligent performance of any such duty, and that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the petition.

Judgment reversed.

AMERICAN NAT. BANK OF MACON et al.
v. ANDERSON. (No. 9566.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 18, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

BANKS AND BANKING — 283—CONSOLIDATION—SUIT FOR SERVICES ON LIQUIDATING COMMITTEE.

The court erred in overruling the general demurrer to the petition.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County;
H. A. Mathews, Judge.

Suit by W. T. Anderson against the American National Bank of Macon and the Commercial National Bank of Macon. General demurrer to petition filed by the American National Bank of Macon overruled, and it brings error. Reversed.

Hardeman, Jones, Park & Johnston and Harry S. Strozler, all of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

Hall & Grice, of Macon, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, P. J. W. T. Anderson brought suit jointly against the American National Bank of Macon and the Commercial National Bank of Macon, Ga., for the recovery of an amount alleged to be due him for services rendered both banks as a member of the liquidating committee of the Commercial Bank in assisting the American Bank to reduce to cash certain assets of the Commercial Bank which had been transferred to and taken over by the American Bank. The theory upon which the petition was drawn was that under a certain written contract (a copy of which was attached as an exhibit to the petition), entered into between the two banks on August 11, 1914, a consolidation or merger of these banks resulted, and that the surviving bank, the American Bank, was liable for the debts of the absorbed bank, the Commercial, and especially, as in this case, for services rendered upon the request of both banks, although the services were performed under employment by the absorbed bank. As the petition is drawn, there can be no recovery against the American Bank unless there was a consolidation or merger of the two banks; and this question depends upon the proper construction of the contract of August 11, 1914. That contract was as follows:

"Georgia, Bibb County.

"Articles of agreement for the liquidation of the Commercial National Bank of Macon, Georgia, by the American National Bank of Macon, Georgia, both being National Banking Associations, made and entered into between said banks as the contracting parties.

"Whereas, on the 1st day of August, 1914, the board of directors of the Commercial National Bank at a meeting of said board duly and regularly called, adopted a resolution which authorized the officers of the said association to commence proceedings for the liquidation of said association under section 5220 and 5223 of the U. S. Revised Statutes for consolidation with said American National Bank and to transfer to said American National Bank all the assets of said Commercial National Bank, which assets were by said resolution so transferred and assigned in order to fully protect and secure said American National Bank for all moneys advanced or to be advanced by said association in the assumption and payment of the liabilities of said Commercial National Bank shown by a list of said liabilities hereto attached and identified as 'Exhibit A' and by the signature of the parties hereto; and which said resolution further provided that said American National Bank should take over the business of said Commercial National Bank, liquidate said assets, and account to the shareholders of said Commercial National Bank for any overplus which might remain after paying the depositors and other indebtedness of said Commercial National Bank in full, and the expense of realizing on the assets so transferred, the said American National Bank to charge nothing for its services in so doing; and which resolution further authorized and directed the officers of said Commercial National Bank to make such contract with the American National Bank as might be necessary or appropriate in order to carry out the general purposes of said resolution, the details of said contract to be left to the discretion of said officers; and

"Whereas, on the same date, the board of directors of the American National Bank, at a meeting of said board duly and regularly called, adopted a resolution whereby said American National Bank assumed the payment of said depositors and other liabilities of said Commercial National Bank, shown by the list of libilities set out in Exhibit A hereto attached and hereinbefore referred to, upon condition that the assets of said Commercial National Bank should be transferred to said American National Bank sufficient in amount and in value in the estimation of the officers of the American National Bank to fully protect and secure said association for any and all amounts payment of which was assumed under said resolution; and which resolution authorized the officers of said association to make such contracts as might be necessary to carry out the purposes of said resolution, the details to be left to the discretion of said officers; and

"Whereas, the preliminaries and conditions in said resolution mentioned have been complied with, and the assets of the Commercial National Bank have been delivered to said American National Bank;

"Now therefore these articles of agreement, witness:

"I. That said Commercial National Bank has transferred, assigned, conveyed and confirmed, and does by these presents transfer, assign, convey and confirm unto the American National Bank of Macon, Georgia, its successors and assigns all of the assets of every kind and description including cash and cash items on hand at the close of business on August 1, 1914, bills receivable, bonds, real estate and personal property and interest therein, and choses in action of all kinds including all the United States bonds now on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States as security for the circulation of the Commercial National Bank of Macon and for deposits of United States deposits; to have and to hold the same unto it the said American National Bank of Macon, its successors and assigns, in fee simple, forever; and the title to said assets and each and all thereof said the Commercial National Bank of Macon for itself and its successors hereby warrants unto said the American National Bank, its successors and assigns, against the claims of all persons whatsoever.

"II. That in contemplation of the liquidation of said Commercial National Bank under sections 5220, 5221 and 5223, U. S. Revised Statutes, said Commercial National Bank by its officers and directors, will call a meeting of the shareholders of said association to be held at Macon, Georgia, on August 12, 1914, and on the date or dates to which said meeting may be from time to time adjourned, and will procure proper resolutions by said shareholders and a sufficient majority thereof to comply with the law in such cases made and provided, liquidating said association and consolidating same with the American National Bank of Macon by the purchase of the assets of said Commercial National Bank by the American National Bank but without providing for stock in the American National Bank to be issued to the shareholders of the Commercial National Bank; and ratifying and confirming the action of the board of directors of said Commercial National Bank as herein recited; and ratifying and confirming this contract.

"III. That said Commercial National Bank will also procure proper resolutions to be passed by said shareholders, appointing said American National Bank as liquidating agent for said Commercial National Bank in said liquidating for consolidation as aforesaid, said liquidation to be conducted in accordance with law and under the supervision of the board of directors of said Commercial National Bank.

"IV. That said Commercial National Bank, until the final liquidation of its affairs and final settlement with its shareholders, agrees to maintain its corporate existence, and that its directors and officers will at all times when called upon so to do by said American National Bank execute and deliver in the name of said association all other and further writings of all kinds which may be necessary to fully effectuate the transfer of said assets, the liquidation of said association, and this contract.

"V. That in consideration of the foregoing acts and agreements by the Commercial National Bank, said American National Bank hereby agrees that it will, and it does hereby assume and promise to pay the same when and as the same are presented for payment, the depositors and other liabilities of said Commercial National Bank of Macon shown in Exhibit A hereto attached; and that in addition thereto, it will and does hereby assume the redemption of the circulating notes of said Commercial National Bank; and that it will procure such resolution to be passed by its board of directors as may be necessary for it to so assume the redemption of said circulating notes.

"VI. That said American National Bank will accept the appointment as liquidating agent of said Commercial National Bank and will proceed with all due and reasonable diligence to liquidate said association and to collect and reduce to cash all the assets of said association all of said assets to be held as security by said American National Bank for all advances made by it in paying the depositors and other liabilities of said Commercial National Bank and the actual expenses incurred by said American National Bank in realizing on said assets, and that after deducting from the proceeds of said assets the actual expenses incurred by said American National Bank in liquidating said association and acting as liquidating agent and in collecting said assets and realizing upon the same, it will apply said proceeds, first, in repaying to itself all amounts advanced by it hereunder, with interest thereon at the rate of seven (7%) per annum; next, in discharging the liabilities of said Commercial National Bank which shall not have been paid by advances made by said American National Bank; and that when all of said liabilities have been fully [dis]charged it will account to the shareholders of said Commercial National Bank and from time to time pay over to said shareholders pro rata of the surplus remaining in its hands from the proceeds of said assets; said American National Bank to act as such liquidating agent without compensation for its own services.

"It being distinctly agreed and understood that in the event the said liquidating should be interrupted or discontinued for any reason beyond the control of said American National Bank, then and in that event said American National Bank shall and does hold all the assets of said Commercial National Bank as security for the advances which may have been made by it, up to the time such liquidation may be so discontinued.

"And it being further agreed and understood that neither the resolutions of said boards of directors of said associations nor this contract shall relieve the shareholders of the Commercial National Bank from their legal liabilities as shareholders to respond in the event, it may be necessary to have recourse upon such shareholders' liability, for any deficit which may remain after exhausting the other assets of said association in the payment of its liabilities.

"In witness whereof, the parties hereto have caused these presents to be signed and delivered in duplicate by their proper corporate officers, and their corporate seals to be hereto affixed this 11th day of August, 1914."

The liability sued on in this case was not included in the list of liabilities set out in Exhibit A.

It is contended by the learned counsel for the defendant in error that this contract and the performance under it, as set out in the declaration, showed consolidation or merger of the two banks, and that the contract entered into and performance under it did not result in the creation of the relation of creditor and debtor between them. As was said by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit, in passing upon this identical contract in the case of American National Bank of Macon v. Commercial National Bank of Macon, 254 Fed. 249 (opinion filed November 15, 1918):

"Provisions contained in the contract give some color to this contention if they are considered by themselves without due regard to the remainder of the contract, the situation with which it dealt, and the conduct of the parties to the contract while performance under it was in progress evidencing what each of them understood was the effect of a compliance by the American Bank with the obligations imposed upon it by the contract. The provisions referred to—viz., the one as to the transfer of the assets, the one in regard to liquidating the Commercial Bank and consolidating it with the American Bank by the purchase by the latter of the assets of the former, and the one in regard to making one of the banks liquidating agent for the other—lose the significance sought to be attributed to them when they are considered in connection with other provisions contained in the contract and in the light of the situation existing when the contract was made and for some time afterwards, and of the construction of the contract by both parties to it as disclosed by what was done under it. * * * The contract contains expressions and provisions which do not seem to us to be reconcilable with the existence of an intention other than that the making by the American Bank of the agreed disbursements in taking care of the liabilities of the Commercial Bank was to have the effect of creating a debt or debts owing by the latter to the former. * * * The concluding provision of the contract was to the effect that neither the contract nor the resolutions authorizing it 'shall relieve the shareholders of the Commercial National Bank from their legal liability as shareholders to respond, in the event it may be necessary to have recourse upon such shareholders' liability, for any deficit which may remain after exhausting the other assets of said association in the payment of its liabilities.' It hardly is conceivable that this provision would have been inserted in the absence of an intention that the making by the American Bank of the disbursements it obligated itself to make would result in creating a liability of the Commercial Bank for which the latter's shareholders would be individually responsible."

We do not think that the petition as amended showed a consolidation or merger of the two banks. On the contrary, the averments of fact in the petition, when considered in the light of the contract attached thereto, showed that the relation of creditor and debtor existed between them; and in this ruling we are, in effect, sustained by the decision cited above, in which the contrary ruling of Judge Evans of the United States District Court, Southern District of Georgia (248 Fed. 187), was reversed.

From what has been said it follows that the plaintiff's petition failed to set out a cause of action against the American National Bank, and that the court erred in overruling its general demurrer to the petition.

Judgment reversed.

MYERS v. MUTUAL LIFE INS. CO. OF NEW YORK. (No. 3551.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Feb. 18, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INSURANCE — 265 — LIFE INSURANCE — REPRESENTATIONS OR WARRANTIES.

The declarations and statements made by the insured in an application for a policy of life insurance are, according to their nature and effect, either representations or warranties.

2. INSURANCE — 266 — LIFE INSURANCE — "WARRANTIES."

"Warranties" in such a policy of insurance constitute part of the contract and stipulate for the absolute truth of the statement made. They must be strictly complied with, else the policy may be avoided.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Warranty.]

3. INSURANCE — 253 — LIFE INSURANCE — "REPRESENTATIONS."

"Representations" are not, strictly speaking, part of the insurance contract, but are collateral thereto. They are statements made to the insurer before or at the time of making the contract, presenting the elements upon which the risk is either accepted or rejected.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Representation.]

4. INSURANCE — 265 — LIFE INSURANCE — REPRESENTATIONS OR WARRANTIES.

Such statements or declarations will not be construed to be warranties unless the provisions of the application and the policy taken together leave no room for any other construction.

5. INSURANCE — 256(2) — LIFE INSURANCE — REPRESENTATIONS — EFFECT.

A policy of insurance issued upon an application containing statements and declarations which are treated as representations will not be avoided because of the falsity thereof, unless they are untrue in a material regard, and are made with the intent to mislead or deceive, or are a statement of some material fact as true without its being known to be true, and which has a tendency to mislead.

6. INSURANCE — 265 — LIFE INSURANCE — REPRESENTATIONS — STATEMENTS IN APPLICATION.

Statements or declarations made by an applicant for insurance as to the condition of his health, as to his habits in regard to the use of intoxicating liquors, as to his previous condition of health, and as to his having consulted or not consulted physicians within a prescribed period, will be treated as representations, unless it plainly appears that the parties intend them to be warranties.

7. INSURANCE — 255 — LIFE INSURANCE — REPRESENTATIONS.

The answer of an applicant for insurance to a particular question directed to him will be treated as a material representation. The fact that a specific answer is sought and obtained in regard thereto is proof that the parties consider the matter material.

8. INSURANCE — 291(6), 292 — LIFE INSURANCE — TREATMENT BY PHYSICIAN — VALIDITY OF POLICY.

In determining whether or not an applicant for insurance has been treated by a physician so as to render voidable a policy of insurance issued to him upon the representation that he had not been so treated, prescriptions for slight temporary ailments will not be considered; neither will such slight temporary ailments be taken into consideration in determining the truth or falsity of a representation as to diseases or maladies with which the insured may have been afflicted.

9. INSURANCE — 297 — LIFE INSURANCE — USE OF INTOXICANTS — VALIDITY OF POLICY.

A policy of life insurance issued upon an application in which is contained a representation of the insured that he did not, at the time of making said application, use intoxicating drinks, and had not used any for more than a year, but that he had been intoxicated twice within the preceding five years, will not be avoided by proof that the insured more than two years prior to the application for the insurance had used intoxicating drinks, and had been under the influence thereof on at least two occasions.

10. INSURANCE — 292 — LIFE INSURANCE — TREATMENT BY PHYSICIAN—AVOIDANCE OF POLICY.

A policy of insurance, issued upon an application therefor, in which the representation is made, in answer to a question asked, that the insured had not consulted nor been treated by a physician within five years next preceding the making of said application, will be avoided at the instance of the insurer upon a showing that the insured within said time had been treated for several consecutive months for a chronic malady with which he was then suffering.

11. INSURANCE — 291(4)—LIFE INSURANCE—HEALTH—AVOIDANCE OF POLICY.

A policy of insurance will be avoided at the instance of the insurer, where the insured, in answer to a question in his application for insurance, states that he had since childhood only suffered from certain named complaints, from which he had fully recovered, when the evidence shows that he had been treated for several months at a time long subsequent to the complaints mentioned by him for a disease with which he was then suffering.

12. EVIDENCE — 482—ACTION ON POLICY—OPINIONS.

Upon the trial of a suit to recover upon a policy of life insurance, where the defense is that the insurer has the right to avoid the policy because of alleged false representations made by the insured in his application therefor, the opinion of the medical director of the insurer as to what action would have been taken upon such application had all of the representations therein made been in accordance with the truth as contended for by the insurer, or as to the general custom of insurance companies in passing upon an application containing such representations, is not admissible as evidence.

Error to Circuit Court, Wetzel County.

Action by W. O. Myers, committee, etc., against the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

Brown, Jackson & Knight, of Charleston, Thos. P. Jacobs, of New Martinsville, and Frederick L. Allen, of New York City, for plaintiff in error.

Edwin O. Kelfer, of New Martinsville, for defendant in error.

RITZ, J. This writ of error seeks the reversal of a judgment rendered upon two policies of insurance issued by the defendant upon the life of Columbus J. Myers. The policies in question were issued on the 15th day of April, 1912, and Myers died on the 14th day of December of the same year. Prior to the issuance of the policies, Myers made to the company written applications therefor. In these applications he made certain statements as to the condition of his health, both at that time and previously, as to his having consulted a physician, or physicians, within five years previous thereto, and as to his habits in regard to the use of intoxicating liquors. In answer to a question contained in the application, Myers stated that he had had three attacks of pneumonia in 1887, 25 years prior thereto, and two attacks of typhoid fever in 1876 and 1896; that his recovery from all of those illnesses had been complete. And in answer to a specific question he replied that the above were all of the illnesses, diseases, or injuries with which he had been afflicted since childhood. He was also asked to state every physician who had prescribed for him, or whom he had consulted in the past five years, and to this question he answered that no physician had prescribed for him, and he had consulted none within that time. In answer to a question as to whether or not he was in good health, he answered that he was, and that there was no impairment of his health. He further replied, in answer to a question as to whether he had any bodily deformity, that he had none. He was asked in the application whether or not he used wine, spirituous, or malt liquors, and replied thereto that he did not. In answer to a question as to what kind of such liquors he had used within the past year, and how much in any one day, he replied that he had used none within that time. In answer to a question as to whether or not he had been intoxicated during the past five years, he answered that he had been so intoxicated twice within that time. He also replied that he had never taken treatment for the liquor or drug habit, and that he was a total abstainer and had been such for several years. It is charged in the statement of defense made by the company that the answers made by Myers above referred to were false; that in fact and in truth he had had other illnesses since childhood than those referred to; that he had consulted physicians, and had been prescribed for by physicians within five years next preceding the making of the application; that he was not in good health at the time he made the application; and further that he was at said time, and had been for a long time prior thereto, addicted to the excessive use of intoxicating liquors, and because of these alleged untruthful and false representations the defendant sought to avoid the payment of the amount of the policies.

The evidence offered in support of these contentions shows that Myers was formerly a resident of Wetzel county, W. Va.; that several years prior to the making of the applications for these policies of insurance he removed to Oklahoma; that he resided there for awhile, and about the year 1907 or 1908 he removed to New Mexico, where he resided for about two years, returning to Oklahoma in the fall of 1909 or 1910, where he resided until a short time after the issuance of the policies, when he returned to his old home in Wetzel county, W. Va., dying there in December, 1912. In regard to the use of intoxicating liquors, it appears that during the two years that Myers lived in New Mexico he drank intoxicating liquors to some extent. This is shown by a number of witnesses. It appears that he lived at some distance from a town where intoxicating liquors were sold, and went to that town some two or three times a month, and that on those occasions he drank intoxicating liquors. No witness, however, testifies to seeing him under the influence of such liquors during this time on more than two occasions. There are some witnesses introduced by the defendant company who testify that on some occasions after Myers returned to Oklahoma from New Mexico he appeared to them to be under the influence of intoxicating drinks, but no witness testifies that he ever saw him take a drink after he returned from New Mexico. A great many of his intimate business and familiar associates testify that Myers was not only a temperate man, but that during the time he lived in Oklahoma, after his return from New Mexico, they never knew him to take a drink, or to be under the influence of liquor. We think it may safely be said that the evidence proves without substantial contradiction that Myers did use intoxicating liquors while he was in New Mexico, which was more than two years before the issuance of the policies of insurance, but that he had been a total abstainer therefrom after his return to Oklahoma.

It is also shown that during the time Myers was in New Mexico he had been treated by Dr. J. T. Stone. This treatment was during the year 1909. Dr. Stone testifies that Myers came to him and complained of his stomach hurting him, and gave him the history of his case, from which he pronounced the disease chronic gastritis, and administered to him treatment therefor. He testifies that he prescribed for him for this trouble off and on for several months, and he thinks he was also treated by other doctors for the same trouble. It is also shown that after his return to Oklahoma, and just a few months before he applied for the policies of insurance sued on in this case, he was treated by Dr. Schrader. This physician testifies that in February or March, 1912, Myers came to his office and consulted him in regard to his condition, complaining of his kidneys bothering him, and asked the doctor to give him something to relieve him; that, after making no examination of the patient other than to ask him some questions in regard to his troubles, he prescribed for him, and this was the only occasion upon which this physician treated him. No attempt is made to show that Myers was not, apparently at least, in good health at the time of the making of the applications.

defendant for avoiding the payment of the amount of the policies? Declarations and statements made by a person desiring insurance in his application for a policy therefor are, according to their nature and effect, distinguished as representations or warranties. "Representations" are in their nature no part of the contract of insurance. Their relation thereto is collateral. They are facts presented to the insurer before or at the time of making the contract as a presentation of the elements upon which the risk is to be accepted or rejected. They furnish a basis for the contract on the faith of which it is entered into, and if false in any respect material to the risk the contract may be avoided. A "warranty," on the other hand, is a part of the contract itself. It defines by way of particular stipulation and condition the precise limits of the obligations which the insurer undertakes to assume, and no liability can arise outside of such limits. As to whether or not the statements made by Myers, which it is contended were false, were warranties or representations, there can be little doubt in this jurisdiction. Declarations of the same character made in applications for life insurance were involved in the cases of Schwarzbach v. Protective Union, 25 W. Va. 622, 52 Am. Rep. 227, Logan v. Assurance Society, 57 W. Va. 384, 50 S. E. 529, and Marshall v. Insurance Association, 79 W. Va. 121, 90 S. E. 847, and in all of those cases were held to be representations and not warranties. That conclusion is not only fixed by those decisions, but is well supported by the authorities. 3 Cooley's Briefs on Insurance, p. 1931, etc.; 3 Joyce on Insurance, § 1882, etc.

We conclude, therefore, that these declarations were representations made by Myers to the defendant company as a basis upon which it might determine the acceptance of the risk, and, if accepted, upon what terms. Their effect upon the policies of insurance is determined substantially by the same rules as representations made in the procurement of any other contract. If they are false in a material respect to the knowledge of the one making them, they will afford ground for the avoidance of the contract at the instance of the party defrauded. The rule has been stated that to avoid a policy of insurance by misrepresentation the false statements must have been made wilfully, and with intent to deceive, and must have been relied upon by the insurer. It necessarily follows from this that a misrepresentation made innocently will not avoid the policy; neither will a false representation as to a fact not material. The trouble arises, however, in the application of these general rules to particular cases. It may be said that where a representation is made by one in an application for insurance of a fact peculiarly within his own knowledge, and it turns out to be untrue, it will be held to be a fraudulent representation. In many of the cases it has been argued that where such a representation is false, but it did not appear that the insured had not acted in perfect good faith in making it, it would not be treated as a fraudulent representation. But the correct rule in this regard seems to be that laid down in Schwarzbach v. Protective Union, supra, to the effect that, as to those representations peculiarly within the knowledge of the insured, if the statements are untrue he is guilty of a legal fraud, though he may not have intended to deceive, and he will be bound by the effect thereof. Logan v. Assurance Society, supra; Marshall v. Insurance Association, supra. The doctrine of these cases seems to be that where a representation is made as to the existence or nonexistence of a certain state of facts which, from their peculiar nature, the assured is bound to know about, he will be bound by the representation, notwithstanding for the moment he may not have recalled the facts, or have overlooked them.

[5-9] Difficulty is also encountered in determining what representations are material in such an application. In this regard it seems to be firmly established by the authorities that by making inquiry in regard to the existence or nonexistence of a particular fact, or facts, the same is made material; it is brought into prominence by the very force of the fact that information is sought concerning the particular matter, and for this reason the courts with practical unanimity treat answers to such specific inquiries as material representations. 3 Joyce on Insurance, § 1914; Schwarzbach v. Protective Union, supra; Logan v. Assurance Society, supra; and Marshall v. Insurance Association, supra. Applying these rules to the representations made by Myers, which it is charged here were false, it may be said that they were material representations. They were statements which the insurance company had a right to rely upon as being true, and further they were in the main statements of facts or circumstances within the knowledge of the applicant, and, if they were false within the meaning of the law, then the defendant could avoid the policies of insurance for that reason. 14 R. C. L. p. 1068, etc.; 3 Joyce on Insurance, § 1884, etc.; 3 Cooley's Briefs on Insurance, p. 1959, etc.; Masonic Life Association v. Robinson, 149 Ky. 80, 147 S. W. 882, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 505; Knights of Maccabees v. Shields, 156 Ky. 270, 160 S. W. 1043, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 853; Quinn v. Mutual Life Insurance Co., 91 Wash. 543, 158 Pac. 82; Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Solomito, 184 Ind. 722, 112 N. E. 521; Germania Life Ins. Co. v. Klein, 25 Colo. App. 326, 137 Pac. 73; Price v. Phoenix Mutual Life Ins. Co., 17 Minn. 497 (Gil. 473), 10 Am. Rep. 166; Thorner v. John Hancock Mutual Life Ins. Co., 164 App. Div. 34, 149 N. Y. Supp. 345; Burruss v. National Life Association, 96 Va. 543, 32 S. E. 49; Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Moore, 231 U. S.

543, 34 Sup. Ct. 186, 58 L. Ed. 356; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Hilton-Green, 241 U. S. 613, 36 Sup. Ct. 676, 60 L. Ed. 1202. Many more authorities might be cited to the same effect, but these representative ones will serve to illustrate the principles controlling in this case.

The question therefore remains: Were these representations false and fraudulent? The representation made by Myers in regard to his use of intoxicating liquors was that he did not at the time of the application for the policies of insurance use any intoxicating liquors, and that he had not for a year; in fact, had been a total abstainer for several years; that he had within the five years next preceding, however, been intoxicated on two occasions. From the recital we have before made of the facts proved in this regard it will be seen that the statements made by Myers at the time he made the applications were very nearly, if not quite, the facts proved as to his habits in this regard. It sufficiently appears, we think, that he was a total abstainer for more than two years prior to the time the applications were made, and it does not appear from the evidence that he was ever intoxicated on more than two occasions within the five-year period, while it is shown that within that five-year period, but more than two years prior to the time of making the applications, he had been an occasional drinker of intoxicating liquors. We find that the proof on this question does not show the falsity of the representations made by the assured.

As to the representation that the assured was in good health at the time of the making of the applications, there is no evidence to the contrary. It is true, it is shown that a short time before that Dr. Schrader had prescribed for him on one occasion, and that more than two years before he had been treated for several months for chronic gastritis; but there is no showing that he was to his knowledge affected by any disease at the time he made the applications for the policies. In fact, the proof of those who knew him most intimately is that he was in apparent good health without any indication of disease of any kind.

[10,11] It is shown, however, beyond question, that he had consulted physicians at least twice within the five years next preceding the issuance of the policies, and that he had suffered from an illness during that time not disclosed by his applications. It is argued that not every consultation with a physician or every temporary illness will make such a representation false, and no doubt this is the law. Many times physicians are consulted to furnish relief from slight temporary indispositions, such as headaches and colds, and it is held that such consultations are not within the purview of a representation of this character, nor are such diseases within the same. 3 Cooley's Briefs on Insurance, p.

2163; Logan v. Assurance Society, supra. But can we say that the evidence in this case justifies the conclusion that the malady for which Myers received treatment while in New Mexico covering a period of several months was such a slight indisposition? The insurance company was entitled to have Myers act fairly and honestly with it. He was bound to know when these questions were asked that the insurance company would act upon his answers, and his concealment of the treatment he had received during a period of several months cannot be looked upon in any other light than that it was fraudulent and deceitful and calculated to mislead the defendant. The treatment received by him from Dr. Schrader on the one occasion testified to by that physician may have been for only a slight indisposition, as it seems not to have been followed up, and we think it might well be said that his trouble at that time was of such character as not to fall within the terms of the question asked. We cannot say this, however, in regard to the treatment undergone by him while in New Mexico. It extended over a period of several months; he was prescribed for by a physician a number of times, different remedies being prescribed on different occasions to meet the varying phases of the trouble with which he was suffering. Clearly it was the duty of Myers in answering this question to have informed the company of his treatment by this physician, and the malady with which he was then suffering. There is no attempt made to contradict in any way the testimony of the doctor offered on this phase of the case, and the jury could not be allowed to disregard it, nor could the jury be allowed to say this misrepresentation in this regard was immaterial.

[12] The defendant assigns as error the action of the court in refusing to allow its medical director and his assistant to testify as to what action would have been taken upon the insured's applications if he had answered the questions correctly to which it is contended he made false answers, and also as to the custom of insurance companies generally in acting upon such applications. It was entirely immaterial what the opinion of these witnesses at this time might be. The parties fixed the materiality of these inquiries and the answers thereto, and the opinion of any witness as to what would have happened had the answers been different, or as to the custom of insurance companies generally in regard to passing upon applications, would have proved nothing that would in any way enlighten the jury. At most, such answers were merely the opinion of the witnesses, not dependent upon scientific knowledge or skill, and there is no rule of law which permits the admission of such opinion as evidence.

Schwarzbach v. Protective Union, 25 W. Va. 622-651, 52 Am. Rep. 227.

For the reasons above pointed out, we reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict of the jury, and remand the cause for a new trial.

BROWN v. BROWN et al. (No. 3727.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 18, 1919.)

1. PARTITION — 12(4) — JURISDICTION — SALE OF CONTINGENT INTERESTS OR ESTATE — STATUTE.

The purpose of the Legislature in enacting chapter 17, Acts 1911 (Code 1913, c. 71 [secs. 3766-3777]), was to empower courts of equity to make a valid sale and conveyance or lease of lands of persons whose interests or estates therein are of such contingent or uncertain nature that good title thereto cannot be passed in the usual modes of conveying by such parties themselves, but it was not intended that the interests of such persons, who are sui jura, should be sold without their consent.

2. PARTITION — 12(5) — LIFE ESTATES — STATUTE.

One to whom a several or joint estate, for life, in land is given by will, contingent upon the death, without lawful issue living at the time of his death, of a life tenant then in possession, with remainder in fee likewise conditioned to vest, upon the same contingency, in a class of persons of a certain description, is authorized by subsection (b) of section 24b2, c. 71, Barnes' Code (Acts 1911, c. 17; Code 1913, c. 71 [secs. 3766-3777]), to file a bill praying for the sale of the land.

3. PARTITION — 12(4) — JURISDICTION — SALE OF CONTINGENT INTERESTS OR ESTATE — STATUTE.

Any person having such interest in land as entitles him, by virtue of said section 24b2, c. 71, Barnes' Code (Acts 1911, c. 17; Code 1913, c. 71 [secs. 3766-3777]), to file a bill praying for a sale or lease thereof, may, when a party defendant to such bill, prevent such sale or lease by refusing to consent thereto.

4. EQUITY — 247 — PARTITION — 14 — JURISDICTION — SALE OF CONTINGENT INTERESTS OR ESTATE — DEMURRER — AMENDMENT.

Courts of equity are vested with large discretion in determining whether or not the existing facts and circumstances are sufficient to justify a sale or lease of lands in such case; and where a demurrer to the bill is filed by a person whose consent is essential to the court's right to sell, and the facts and circumstances averred in a bill praying for the sale of valuable farming lands do not show that any waste is being committed, or that the land contains minerals of a fugitive character which are in danger of being withdrawn therefrom, or that any other facts and circumstances exist indicating a liability of the land to depreciate in value, the court is not justified in decreeing a sale. In such case, it is not error to sustain the demurrer and dismiss the bill without leave to amend, on the ground that such bill cannot be cured by amendment.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County.

Suit by Charles L. Brown, as trustee of William J. Brown, against William J. Brown and others. Demurrers to bill filed by part of defendants sustained, and bill dismissed, and plaintiff appeals. Motion to reverse decree overruled, and decree affirmed.

Chas. E. Hogg, of Point Pleasant, and Pendleton, Mathews & Bell, of Spencer, for appellant.

Wm. Beard, of Parkersburg, and Somerville & Somerville, of Point Pleasant, for appellees.

WILLIAMS, J. This suit was brought by C. L. Brown, as trustee of William J. Brown, against said William J. Brown, Ephraim W. Brown, and his children, and said C. L. Brown in his own right, and Mrs. Helen M. Fowler, his only child, under the provisions of chapter 17, Acts 1911, made a part of chapter 71, Barnes' Code of West Virginia, for the purpose of selling a tract of 539 acres of land in which said William J. Brown was given a life estate by the will of Robert S. Brown, the father of William J., Ephraim W., and C. L. Brown. All persons now in being, having any kind of interest or estate, vested or contingent, in the land, are made parties defendant, all of whom are alleged to be sui juris. Demurrers to the bill, interposed by Ephraim W. Brown and by some of his children, were sustained, and the court, being of the opinion that the bill could not be cured by amendment, dismissed it, and plaintiff has appealed. The cause is now up for review on plaintiff's motion to reverse the decree, which motion is made pursuant to permission previously granted, after due notice thereof to the appellees.

The demurrer challenges the sufficiency of the bill on four several grounds, viz.: First, because the wife of William J. Brown is not made a party to the bill; second, because Charles L. Brown is not such a trustee as is authorized by the statute to maintain the suit; third, because the court is not authorized to decree a sale of the land without the consent of all parties interested therein who are sui juris; and, fourth, because the bill fails to allege sufficient grounds for a sale.

[1] There is no merit in the first objection for the obvious reason that the wife of William J. Brown has no sort of interest in the land and can never acquire any by virtue of her marital relation. Her husband is not now, nor has he been at any time during his marriage, seized of an estate of inheritance in the land, neither is it possible, under the will of his father, for him to be seized of such an estate at any future time. Hence, by no possibility can his wife ever become entitled to dower in the land.

Before considering the other points raised by the demurrer, it is necessary to consider some of the facts averred in the bill, the truth whereof is admitted by demurrants. Robert S. Brown, deceased, by his will exhibited as a part of the bill, directed that his lands, known as the General George Washington survey, lying along the Ohio river and extending back on the hills and consisting of numerous tracts but constituting one compact body, be divided into three parts equal in value, by lines running from the river to the back Washington lands. To Ephraim W. Brown he gave a life estate in the upper lot, to C. L. Brown a life estate in the middle lot, and to William J. Brown a life estate in the lower lot, with remainder after the death of each life tenant "to the heirs of his body lawfully begotten," and provided that, in the event he should have no such issue living at his death, the land was to go to his two remaining sons for life, with remainder to their heirs. The devise to William J. Brown is in the following language:

"And the said lower or third tract of land next to Ravenswood I will and bequeath to my dear son William J. Brown for and during his life, but subject to the management and use thereof hereinafter directed, with remainder at his death to the heirs of his body, lawfully begotten, but if my said son William J. Brown shall die without issue living at the time of his death, then said lower parcel of land shall pass to my said sons Ephraim and Charles for life, with remainder to their heirs, per stirpes, lawfully begotten."

Testator provided for a like division of his "back lands" into three equal parcels, one of which was to be allotted to each of his three sons "as may be most convenient, or as they may agree among themselves." These parcels were likewise subject to the same limitations and provisions as the river or front lands, and all of the devises were subject to the dower right of the testator's widow, who is now deceased. The remainder of his lands he disposed of in the following language:

"I direct that all my other lands and my town property in Ravenswood shall be divided equally between my said three sons in fee simple, that is to say and with this provision that one-third thereof shall pass absolutely in severalty to my said son Ephraim, and that the other two-thirds thereof shall be allotted and pass jointly to my said sons William and Charles to be rented out and managed, or sold and conveyed by them jointly and for their joint benefit, and I make this provision because of the fact that my said dear son William J. Brown has been from infancy an invalid in health, and I therefore affectionately commit the trust of the management of his share and interest in my estate under this will to his brother, the said Charles L. Brown trusting to his kindness and sense of justice to do at all times what may seem best in the interest and for the comfort and happiness of his said brother William J. Brown, and full power is hereby given the said William J. and Charles L. Brown to sell and convey all or any part of the lands and property hereinbefore devised to them jointly, in fee simple."

The right and power to sell, it is observed, is limited to the lands devised to William J. and C. L. Brown in fee.

The bill avers that in a suit in chancery instituted in the circuit court of Jackson county by William J. Brown against the said C. L. Brown and all the other parties to the present suit, praying for a construction of the will of Robert S. Brown, deceased, and for the ascertainment of his rights, powers, and duties thereunder, the court by a decree which, it is averred, is final and binding on all the parties to the present suit, determined the powers and duties of this plaintiff as trustee for William J. Brown as follows:

"It was the plain and manifest intention of said will to create an express trust in the hands of said C. L. Brown as a trustee for the use and benefit of the plaintiff, and that under said will said C. L. Brown is entitled to the use, possession, and management of the real estate derived by plaintiff in severalty under said will, and that said C. L. Brown as trustee is possessed of the legal title to said real estate, and that the plaintiff has the equitable title only thereto. The court is further of the opinion, and doth decree, that said C. L. Brown as trustee is invested with a personal discretion as to the management of said trust; a discretion that a court of equity cannot control so long as said trustee acts in good faith and with honesty. It is therefore further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that, as to the one-third of the home farm of said R. S. Brown mentioned in the will as devised to said W. J. Brown, and the adjoining back lands, said C. L. Brown shall retain possession of the same as trustee; and he is directed to do what he may in his discretion deem best for the interest, happiness, and comfort of said plaintiff as directed by said will paying the taxes on said land, and keeping the same in repair, and accounting to plaintiff for the residue, if any, of the rents, issues, and profits to be derived from said real estate. And it is further decreed that said C. L. Brown as trustee shall annually account to said plaintiff in person, or before a commissioner of accounts of this county, for the said rents, issues, and profits of said home farm lands, and he shall be entitled to a reasonable compensation for his services as such trustee."

[2, 3] We are unable to see, in view of the language of the will devising the lower one-third of the land to William J. Brown, how the court could have so interpreted the language as to vest in C. L. Brown the legal title to the land as trustee for William J. Brown. But it is not necessary for us to determine the effect of that decree upon the status of C. L. Brown, as we think the will clearly shows that he, independent of the trust created by the will, whatever its extent, has such interest in the land of William J. Brown as entitles him to file the present bill in his own right. He and Ephraim W. Brown have an equal interest in the land devised to William J. for life. The bill alleges that William is now 65 years old and that no child has been born to him. If he should die, leaving no children living at his death, C. L. and Ephraim W. would be entitled to a joint estate in the land during their lives. Therefore granting, arguendo, that their estate is now contingent, still section 2, c. 17, Acts 1911, section 24b2, c. 71, Barnes' Code, authorizes a person having such interest in land to bring a suit for the sale thereof. That section is:

"Such bill may be filed by any of the following persons: (a) * * * (b) Any person in whom alone or with others a contingent remainder would vest, either at law or in equity, if the contingency or event upon which the remainder is to vest, or determining who the remainderman or remaindermen are, should happen at the time of the commencement of the suit."

The contingency, on the happening of which both Ephraim W. and C. L. Brown would become vested with a legal life estate in the land of William J., is the death of William J., without lawful issue living at his death. It is therefore clear that both C. L. and Ephraim W. fall within the class of persons described in subsection (b), and either one of them is authorized to bring a suit in his own right.

We come now to a consideration of the third objection to the bill raised by the demurrer, which is that certain ones of the defendants, all of whom are sui juris, object to a sale. In reply to this objection, counsel for plaintiff insist that they have not such interest in the land as entitles them to make the objection. Section 8 of said act, section 24b8 of the Code, reads as follows:

"If it be clearly shown by the pleadings and proofs that the interests of all persons having any vested, contingent or expectant estates or interests in said property will be promoted by the sale, lease or mining lease of the land, oil, gas, coal or other minerals to be sold or leased, and the court shall be of the opinion that the rights of no person interested will be materially injured or prejudiced, the court may, with the consent of all persons in being having any vested estate or vested interest in said land, oil, gas, coal or other minerals to be sold or leased, decree the sale, lease, or mining lease of such land, oil, gas, coal or other minerals in such manner and on such terms and in such parcels as may be deemed most beneficial to all persons interested."

The learned counsel for plaintiff have filed very exhaustive briefs, citing many authorities to sustain the proposition that demurrants have no vested interest or estate, and therefore are not of that class of persons whose consent is a prerequisite to the right of the court to decree a sale. Strictly speaking, according to the technical rules respecting vested and contingent remainders and executory devises, it may not be said that demurrants have a vested estate. But the question is not so much what particular kind of estate or interest they have, under the rules of the common law, as it is to ascertain in what sense the Legislature used the terms "vested estate or vested interest" in the particular act in question. In order to determine this, it is necessary to consider the general scope and purpose of the act. Section 1 reads as follows:

"That whenever there is either at law or in equity, in any land, or in any oil, gas, coal or other minerals, any contingent remainder, or any vested remainder, which is liable to open and let in after-born children or to open and let in members of any class, or any executory interest, or executory devise, or any base, qualified, conditional or limited fee, or any other qualified, conditional, limited or determinable estate, or interest, it shall be lawful for the circuit court of the county in which the land, oil, gas, coal or other minerals, or any part thereof, to be sold or leased, are situate, upon a bill filed by any of the persons specified in section two of this act, to decree a sale, lease, or mining lease of such land, or of any such oil, gas, coal and other minerals, or of any one or more of them, as hereinafter provided."

This section describes the character or quality of estates or interests in land, which must exist in order to entitle a person having such an interest as is described in any of the subdivisions of section 2 to file a bill praying for the sale or lease of the land. Section 3 provides that "all persons in being who have any vested, contingent or expectant estate or interest, either at law or in equity, in said land," shall be made parties. Would it not make the statute seem very incongruous to say that the Legislature intended to authorize persons, having certain vested or contingent estates or interests in land, to file a bill for the sale thereof, requiring him to make all persons in being in any wise interested therein parties to the bill, and yet, at the same time, deny such defendants, although having the same kind of interest as the plaintiff, a right to object or make defense to the sale? Would not such an interpretation of the statute bring about an inconsistency? We can scarcely conceive that the Legislature intended any such result as is contended for.

this state, which have existed from very early times, that jurisdiction for such purpose has been conferred upon them; and in such cases the jurisdiction can be invoked only when it is clearly shown that the interest of such persons will be thereby promoted, and the rights of no other persons interested will be violated. Such statutes have been upheld on the theory that the Legislature has the power to authorize a conveyance on behalf of persons under disability when it is shown that their interests will be promoted thereby. But we seriously doubt the constitutional right and power of the Legislature to authorize a court to sell the lands, or any vested interest therein of a person who is sui juris, without his consent, simply for the purpose of reinvesting the funds for his benefit. The jus disponendi is a property right which the policy of the law has always been to allow the owner, when sui juris, to determine for himself. From time immemorial it has been one of the fixed principles of the common law, to guard jealously individual property rights, and especially is this true in respect to estates of freehold in land.

It is unnecessary to determine the character of interest the children of Ephraim W. Brown have in the land, whether a vested or contingent interest or estate, as his objection alone is enough to defeat the sale. The act was never intended to authorize one person, having a certain defined interest or estate in land, to file a bill to sell it and deny to another, similarly situated, who is required to be made a party to the bill, any right to object thereto. After a very careful consideration of the question, we have concluded that the chief purpose and design of the statute was to provide a means whereby a valid conveyance or lease of lands might be made, by persons having uncertain estates or interests therein, who, because of such uncertainty, could not make valid title thereto, and that, as a prerequisite to the right of the court to make such conveyance, the consent of all persons in being, who are sui juris and have such interest, whether vested or contingent, as would entitle them to bring the suit, is necessary. The bill avers that plaintiff is advised that William J. Brown will give his consent, but his consent alone is not enough; there are others interested who do not consent. Ephraim W. Brown has by his demurrer expressed his objection to the sale, and, holding as we do that his consent is necessary to give the court power to sell, it is unnecessary to enter upon a consideration of the other of the averments of the bill to determine whether they are sufficient to show that the interest of the parties having "vested, contingent or expectant estates or interests" in the land, will be promoted by a sale thereof. It suffices to say that, in view of the quantity and quality of the land, the manifest purpose of the testator to create an estate therein which would, in the future, vest in fee in his grandchildren, after the life estates of his three sons—a purpose not inconsistent with public policy and violative of no positive rule of law—we hardly think the price which plaintiff alleges he has been offered and thinks he can get for the land, and the proposed plan of reinvesting the funds in government bonds or other valid securities, to be held in the same manner and subject to the same provisions and for the same persons as the land itself is now held under the will, and all the other circumstances, are not enough to justify a sale. The statute evidently vests courts of equity with a large discretion in determining, from all the facts and circumstances appearing, whether or not a sale will be beneficial to all the parties concerned. The chancellor has not abused his discretion by refusing to entertain the suit and dismissing plaintiff's bill upon demurrer. It was his right and duty to consider the interests of those who are to come into the possession of the land after the life estates have ended, and determine whether or not they would be benefited by a sale, as well as the life tenants. No particular circumstances or conditions are alleged to exist now, which would make a present sale more advantageous than a sale at any future time. There is no showing that the land is liable to depreciate in value, and nothing to indicate that it may not grow in value as the years go by. The fact that William J. Brown is now 65 years of age and is becoming less able as he grows older to cultivate the land does not show good cause to sell it. If he, with no family but himself and wife, and with the advice of plaintiff, is not able to make a comfortable living upon the 539 acres of land, nearly half of which, according to a map filed with the bill, appears to be river bottom land, only about 25 acres of which is subject to overflow, such inability must be attributed to poor husbandry rather than to any failure in the land to yield its increase.

For the reasons stated, appellant's motion will be overruled, and the decree affirmed.

STATE v. RICE. (No. 3604.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia;
Feb. 18, 1919.)

1. GRAND JURY §41—INVESTIGATION—SECRECY.

Generally grand jurors cannot be required or permitted to divulge what occurred during an investigation of matters properly committed to them.

2. WITNESSES §72—COMPETENCY—GRAND JUROR.

But where an oath of secrecy is not required of or administered to grand jurors, a member of the grand jury which returned the indictment against accused is competent as a witness in his behalf to show that statements made by a prosecuting witness at the trial of accused regarding his guilt or some fact material to his defense are inconsistent with or contradictory to statements made by the same witness at the preliminary examination.

3. WITNESSES §268(1), 379(1)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—IMPEACHMENT.

Where, on the trial of one indicted for incest with his daughter, the latter, as prosecutrix, is permitted to give in evidence to the jury the fact of the birth of her child, and to impute its paternity to her father, she is subject to cross-examination thereon, and it is error to deny defendant the right to such examination, and, the foundation being laid therefor, she is liable also to be impeached by showing that she has made contradictory statements in relation thereto on other occasions.

4. CRIMINAL LAW §713—TRIAL—CONDUCT OF COUNSEL—ACTION OF COURT.

Counsel ordinarily are allowed great latitude in discussing the facts of the case, and if for any cause they transgress this rule, as sometimes they may inadvertently do, adversary counsel should invoke and the court enforce adherence to proper proprieties in the discussion.

5. INCEST §5—RAPE §18—RELATIVE OF PROHIBITED DEGREE.

A relative of the prohibited degree may be guilty of both rape and incest.

6. INCEST §4, 15—CORROBORATION—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Generally age and lack of corroboration of the prosecutrix will not excuse a defendant charged with criminal assault upon her; the weight and credibility of the testimony being questions exclusively for the jury.

7. CRIMINAL LAW §829(1), 834(2)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTION—REFUSAL.

Ordinarily a defendant properly may demand an instruction couched in his own language, if aptly drawn, intelligible, and pertinent, though the state may have asked and the court given a similar one upon the same subject; but if the two instructions in form and effect embody the same legal principle and amount to the same thing, and the one given is aptly drawn, intelligible, and pertinent, it is not reversible error to refuse to give the one last proffered.

Error to Circuit Court, Monongalia County.

Loring Rice was convicted of incest, and he brings error. Reversed, verdict set aside, and a new trial awarded.

Lazzelle & Stewart and Glasscock & Glasscock, all of Morgantown, for plaintiff in error.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., and Henry Nolte, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

LYNCH, J. Complaining of a judgment of conviction and sentence for confinement in the penitentiary for ten years for incest, Loring Rice assigns as erroneous rulings upon the admissibility of evidence offered in his behalf and rejected, the giving of instructions for the state, the refusal of instructions propounded by him, and the denial of his motion for a retrial predicated upon these grounds.

[1, 2] The only witness who testified to the criminal assault was defendant's daughter, Pearl, who at the time of the commission of the several acts of sexual intercourse was 12 to 14 years old. Her testimony in chief was direct, positive, and unequivocal. Defendant offered, but was not permitted to prove, by W. C. Kelley, a member of the grand jury that returned the indictment, that upon her examination as a witness before that body she testified that W. W. Irvin, her mother's brother, who also was indicted on her testimony for the same offense at the same term, had had intercourse with her within the time covered by the indictment against her father. The purpose of the testimony was to furnish a basis either to impeach or discredit her testimony given to support the prosecution against her father. How the attempt to impeach or discredit could be effected by proof of statements by the same witness as to the guilt of the father and uncle is not apparent, and becomes apparent only when aided by the declaration of defendant's counsel that he expected to show by Kelley and other witnesses that the prosecutrix charged to the uncle the paternity of the child born to her as the result of the intercourse with him.

For some purposes, it is true, as remarked by the judge of the trial court, grand jurors cannot be required or permitted to divulge what occurred during an investigation of matters properly committed to them under the usual charge, especially where as in some jurisdictions they are sworn to secrecy. The action of no member of such inquisitorial body can lawfully become the subject of inquiry, nor can he be interrogated with respect thereto. State v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 15 W. Va. 362, 36 Am. Rep. 803. Nor can the sufficiency of the proof be inquired into to invalidate an indictment found by a lawfully constituted grand jury. Wadley v. Commonwealth, 98 Va. 803, 35 S. E. 452.

There is in this state and in Virginia no statutory provision, general rule of law, procedure or custom requiring an oath of secrecy to be administered to members of a grand jury. Section 5, c. 157 (sec. 554) Code 1913, prescribes the only form of oath required in impaneling such a jury. The question of the competence of a grand juror, when interrogated as was the witness Kelley in this case with reference to the testimony of the prosecutrix, was raised for the first time in Virginia in the case of Little v. Commonwealth, 25 Grat. (Va.) 921, and, though not made a point of the headnotes or of the decision, because not necessary therefor, the opinion clearly discloses the view of the court to be to sustain such proof as competent. For it is there said that the trial court erred in refusing to permit Dearthmont, who with others returned the indictment, to state the testimony of a witness examined by them touching the matter under investigation. The same court, however, in Harris v. Commonwealth, 110 Va. 905, 68 S. E. 834, foreclosed further doubt upon the competency of the source of such proof where the grand juror is called and examined on behalf of the accused to show inconsistent or contradictory statements by a witness before the grand jury regarding the guilt of the accused or some fact material to his defense. The Attorney General, it appears, confessed the error, and upon such confession the court was content to enter an order of reversal without a written opinion. The admission of this character of proof does not, we think, contravene public policy or improperly divulge the secrets of the inquisitorial body, but substantially promotes the ends of justice, and may prevent injustice. See 4 Horwitz' Edition Jones' Com. on Evidence, § 785; 4 and 5 Wigmore on Evidence, § 2363.

[3] Other assignments relied on for reversal likewise relate to proof offered by way of contradicting the prosecutrix as to sexual intercourse between herself, her uncle and defendant, and to interrogations propounded to her on cross-examination touching the subject, which the court refused. Besides Kelley, the witnesses introduced by defendant to lay the ground for impeachment were Posten, the justice before whom she appeared March 17, 1917, and by a complaint, duly verified by her own affidavit, a copy of which with the verification is copied into the record, charged her uncle, William W. Irvin, with having had sexual intercourse with her in 1916, and others to whom she is alleged to have disclosed the assault upon her. This evidence the court should have permitted defendant to submit to the consideration of the jury for the purpose disclosed by his counsel, not because it necessarily would establish the innocence of the accused, an effect not claimed or pretended, but as affecting her credibility, a fact as to which the jurors were the sole judges.

There could not well be a more obvious similarity between the facts and issues and the impropriety of the rulings made in this case and those involved in State v. Koch, 75 W. Va. 648, 84 S. E. 510. The defendants were charged with the same offense. The accusations were made by daughters, to each of whom a child was born, and its paternity was imputed to their fathers in each case, and the same attempt was made, but not permitted, to lay the ground to impeach their uncorroborated testimony for a like reason. As aptly to the one case as to the other do points 1 and 2 of the syllabus of the case cited apply, and without further discussion of this phase of the inquiry, except in one respect, we quote these points:

(1) "Where, on the trial of one indicted for incest with his daughter, the state relies on and attempts to prove by her the birth and parentage of her child, and to impute the same to defendant, as inculcating facts or facts tending to show guilt, the evidence is material and relevant, and is properly admitted to the jury."

(2) "Where on such trial the daughter, as prosecutrix, is permitted to give in evidence to the jury the fact of the birth of her child and to impute its parentage to her father, she is subject to cross-examination thereon, and it is error to deny defendant the right to such cross-examination, and the foundation being laid therefor, she is liable also to be impeached by showing that she has made contradictory statements in relation thereto on other occasions."

The Attorney General has undertaken to defend the action of the court on the ground of an alleged defect in the form of the interrogatories. As to some but not all of them this criticism may properly apply. Excluding the latter, however, there remain enough to warrant reversal for the errors pointed out, certainly as to the foundation for the questions propounded to Posten.

[4] Counsel for defendant complain of the state's instructions Nos. 2, 9, and 13, and the refusal of his instruction No. 11. It is difficult to perceive or infer the purpose of No. 2. The jury, of course, is limited to the evidence in the case and cannot go beyond it in ascertaining the guilt or innocence of the defendant, as that instruction and the oath administered told them. But the reason or purpose for telling them not to "consider the statements of counsel as to alleged facts or as to supposed facts as evidence" seems obscure. No basis therefor is disclosed, unless it rests upon the statements of counsel as to what he proposed to prove by the witnesses whose testimony was not allowed to go to the jury. If so, the instruction should have been clear and positive to that effect, because counsel ordinarily are allowed great latitude in discussing the facts of the case (State v.

Clifford, 58 W. Va. 681, 686, 52 S. E. 864; Sims v. Carpenter, 68 W. Va. 223, 69 S. E. 794); and if for any cause they transgress this rule, as sometimes they may inadvertently do, adversary counsel should invoke and the court enforce adherence to proper proprieties in the discussion (Wickham v. Turpin, 112 Va. 236, 70 S. E. 514; State v. Cooper, 74 W. Va. 472, 82 S. E. 358, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 453).

[5, 6] The objection urged in argument to instructions Nos. 9 and 13 are that as the evidence showed sexual coition before the prosecutrix attained the age of 14, the defendant was guilty of rape, not incest; and that as her testimony was unreasonable and uncorroborated, he could not properly be convicted. Clearly neither ground is tenable. A relative of the prohibited degree may be guilty of both rape and incest. Nor will age and lack of corroboration excuse a defendant charged with criminal assault upon a female according to most authority, the weight and credibility of the testimony being a question exclusively for the jury (11 Enc. Dig. Va. & W. Va. Rep. 629), except in rare cases, as in Harvey v. Commonwealth, 103 Va. 850, 49 S. E. 481, where the defendant charged with rape was 70 years of age, and the assault was not discovered until after the birth of the child, and the evidence bore the impress of falsehood.

[7] Other instructions, both those given and refused, we have examined so far as deemed necessary to avoid error upon the retrial we are compelled to award, and see no reasonable objection thereto, unless it be defendant's No. 11, which was not given apparently because of its similarity to an instruction given at the request of the state on the same subject, namely, the weight the jury should give to the testimony of the defendant himself. Ordinarily a defendant properly may demand an instruction couched in his own language, if aptly drawn, intelligible, and pertinent, though the state may have asked and the court granted a similar one upon the same subject. However, as appears to be the case, the form and effect of the two instructions substantially embody the same legal principle and amount to the same thing, are intelligible and pertinent, and hence not prejudicial warranting reversal.

Judgment reversed, verdict set aside, and new trial awarded.

HOWARD v. BLAIR et al. (No. 3634.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 4, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS §85(2)—SUSPENSION DURING ABSENCE FROM STATE—APPLICATION OF STATUTE—CASE OVERRULED.

The provision of section 18, chapter 104, of the Code of 1913 (sec. 4431), that "Where any such right as is mentioned in this chapter, shall accrue against a person who had before resided in this state, if such person shall, by departing without the same, * * * obstruct the prosecution of such right, * * * the time that such obstruction may have continued shall not be computed as any part of the time within which the said right might or ought to have been prosecuted," has no application to one who was not at the time of the incurrance of the liability nor before nor since a resident of this state. Hefflebower v. Detrick, 27 W. Va. 16, in so far as it holds otherwise is overruled.

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS §85(2)—SUSPENSION—STATUTE.

The departure from this state by one who at the time of incurring an obligation or liability resided here, operates proprio vigore an obstruction to the prosecution of such right as is mentioned in said section 18 of chapter 104 of the Code of 1913 (sec. 4431), and upon a plea of the statute of limitations the plaintiff, to have the benefit of said statute, is not required to show that he was otherwise obstructed by the defendant in the prosecution of his right.

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS §93 — CONVEYANCE OF PROPERTY.

Where a non-resident debtor in fraud of his creditors conveys lands belonging to him in this state, and such creditors promptly institute a suit in equity, upon foreign attachment, to set aside the fraudulent deed, but one of such creditors does not include one of his claims because not then due, he can not be regarded as having been obstructed by such fraudulent deed in the prosecution of a new suit to avoid said deed and recover his debt not due at the time of the first suit, so as to avoid the plea of the statute of limitations.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County.

Bill by John A. Howard, receiver, etc., against Marie Antoinette Blair, W. D. Bryan, administrator of W. J. Bryan, deceased, and others, with garnishment against the Fairmont Coal Company. Demurrer to bill by W. D. Bryan, administrator, sustained, and bill dismissed, and plaintiff appeals. Decree affirmed.

McCamie & Clarke and J. M. Ritz, all of Wheeling, for appellant.

W. S. Meredith, of Fairmont, for appellees.

MILLER, P. The decree to which the present appeal relates, pronounced on March 12, 1918, sustained the demurrer of the defendant W. D. Bryan, administrator of the estate of W. J. Bryan, deceased, and, the plaintiff declining to amend, dismissed his bill. The other defendants, except the Fairmont Coal Company, garnishee in the attachment sued out in the cause, namely Marie Antoinette Blair, John Blair, her husband, S. W. Loller, Cecelia Bryan, A. E. Fox and S. A. Englehard, not served with process and not appearing, are all alleged to be non-residents of the state, and it is alleged that W. J. Bryan in his life time and before and after the accrual of the cause of action sued on was also a non-resident of the state of West Virginia.

The object of the suit, begun July 7, 1916, was to recover of the defendant W. D. Bryan, appointed by the circuit court of Harrison county, West Virginia, administrator of the estate of W. J. Bryan, deceased; first, the sum of $5,000, upon a promissory negotiable note for that sum, dated August 10, 1903, payable on or before April 10, 1904, to the order of the defendant E. A. Fox, and by him endorsed without recourse to the defendant S. A. Englehard, and by the latter also endorsed, and of which note the bill alleges the First Citizens' Bank, a corporation, of which bank plaintiff was appointed special receiver, became the bona fide holder in due course for a valuable consideration before maturity, amounting with interest at the date of the suit as per affidavit filed, to $8,875.00; second, to set aside as being fraudulent and void as to said debt a certain deed made by the said W. J. Bryan and wife to their daughter Lizzie B. Loller, now deceased, dated April 3, 1903, purporting to convey to the grantee therein a certain tract of land situated in Marion county, West Virginia, and then under lease for coal to the defendant Fairmont Coal Company, garnishee, attached in the cause, and subject to said lease, and to sell said land to pay said debt, interest and costs, and also to have applied any money in the hands of said garnishee to the satisfaction of the debt as decreed, and for general relief.

The demurrer was a general one, and no specific grounds were assigned therefor in the court below. Here two grounds are urged in support of the decree, namely, the statute of limitations and laches or staleness of the demand.

[1, 2] On the first ground, the statute of limitations of ten years, it fully appears on the face of the bill and exhibits that right of action on the note sued on matured on April 10, 1904, and that the present suit was not begun until July 7, 1916, more than twelve years after the right of action accrued to plaintiff, or to the bank of which he is special receiver, so that unless upon some ground sufficient to defeat the operation of the statute or bring the case within the exception thereto, the action was clearly barred and the bill was properly dismissed.

The exception in section 18, chapter 104 of the Code (sec. 4431), is as follows:

"Where any such right as is mentioned in this chapter, shall accrue against a person who had before resided in this state, if such person shall, by departing without the same, or by absconding or concealing himself, or by any other indirect ways or means, obstruct the prosecution of such right, or if such right has been or shall be hereafter obstructed by war, insurrection or rebellion, the time that such obstruction may have continued shall not be computed as any part of the time within which the said right might or ought to have been prosecuted."

To bring this case within that exception the bill alleges that although the maker of the note was at the time he executed it a resident of the state of Pennsylvania and had not before or since been a resident of this state, he was personally present in the state, where and when he executed the note and where by its terms it was to be paid, and that by immediately departing from the state and remaining away continuously thereafter he thereby obstructed the prosecution of plaintiff's right against him within the true meaning and intent of the statute.

For this proposition plaintiff takes cover under some early decisions of this court, namely, Heffebower v. Detrick, 27 W. Va. 16; Pugh v. Cameron's Adm'r, 11 W. Va. 523; Abell v. Penn Mut. Life Ins. Co., 18 W. Va. 400; and also the early Virginia case of Wilkinson v. Holloway, 7 Leigh, 277. The fourth point of the syllabus of Heffebower v. Detrick is:

"If a person residing in another state, makes his note in this state, and thereafter departs from, and continues to reside out of this state, he will be considered as a person, 'who before the action accrued resided in this state,' and who by his departure from it, and his residence out of it, has obstructed the payee in the prosecution of his right of action on such note during such absence from this state."

That the statute clearly contemplates that the defendant should have at some time before the cause of action originated or accrued resided in West Virginia seems too plain for controversy. The very words of the statute "who had before resided in this state," and "by departing without the same" read in juxtaposition as they should be, leave no possible room for doubt or quibble as to their meaning. They are plain words, not technical, and should be construed according to their natural and usual acceptance. This was the view of Dr. Minor, of the statute of Virginia, substantially the same as ours. IV Minor, pt. 1 (3d Ed.) 622. The Heffebower-Detrick Case was disposed of on a demurrer to the evidence, and we think Judge Woods, who wrote the opinion, intended no violence to the language of the statute, but put his decision on the presumption, for lack of evidence to the contrary, that the place of residence of the defendant at the time of making the note was where the note was actually executed and where by its terms the contract was to be performed, for he cites and reviews numerous decisions on the subject, and at page 28 says respecting the sufficiency of the evidence to overcome this presumption, "he," the defendant, "never, so far as this record shows, pretended * * * that at the time," the time of the making of the note, "he did not reside in this state." We think the point of the decision should be interpreted in the light of the facts and presumptions from the evidence, so strongly emphasized in the opinion. The case of Abell v. Penn Mut. Life Ins. Co., supra, involved the status of the defendant, a foreign corporation. It was decided that for the purpose of that action its place of residence was in this state, where at the time of the contract it had qualified to do business and had and maintained an agent, and that having thereafter withdrawn from the state and ceased to maintain an agency here until shortly before the institution of the suit, the case was clearly within the statute, and that the time of such withdrawal should be eliminated from the computation of time. It is true the opinion in that case apparently approves Wilkinson v. Holloway, supra, but of which Dr. Minor says at the page and in the volume already cited, the doctrine of that case "is no longer maintainable." And in Embrey v. Jemison, 131 U. S. 336, 350, 9 Sup. Ct. 776, 780 (33 L. Ed. 172), involving the construction of the Virginia statute, in which the district court had construed the statute in accordance with the contention of counsel here, Justice Harlan says:

"This construction of the statute was supposed to be required by the decision in Ficklin's Executor v. Carrington, 81 Grat. [Va.] 219. We are satisfied, upon a careful examination of that case, that it was misinterpreted by the learned district judge who presided at the trial below"

"The statute, so far as it relates to obstructions caused by a defendant having departed from the state, means that, being a resident of Virginia when the cause of action accrues against him, and being then suable in that state, the defendant shall not, in computing the time in which he must be sued, have the benefit of any absence caused by his departure after such right of action accrued, and before the expiration of the period limited for the bringing of suit. The plaintiff was at liberty to sue the defendant wherever he could find him. Having elected to sue him in Virginia, the courts sitting there must give effect to the limitation prescribed by her law, without any saving in favor of the plaintiff on account of the defendant's removal prior to the making of any contract whatever with the plaintiff."

There existed for a time some conflict in the decisions as to whether removal from the state by a defendant of itself constituted an obstruction to the prosecution of plaintiff's right within the meaning of the statute, or whether in addition thereto the plaintiff was bound to show actual obstruction in the prosecution of his particular action. Wilson v. Koontz, 7 Cranch, 202, 3 L. Ed. 315; Ficklin's Ex'r v. Carrington, 31 Grat. (Va.) 219, Brown v. Butler, 87 Va. 621, 625, 626, 13 S. E. 71; Cheatham's Adm'r v. Aistrop's Adm'r, 97 Va. 457, 34 S. E. 57; dissenting opinion of Judge Snyder in Heflebower v. Detrick, supra, 27 W. Va. p. 29; IV Minor, pt. 1, p. 622. The case of Ficklin's Ex'r v. Carrington, supra, distinctly affirms the first phase of the proposition, and so do our cases of Walsh v. Schilling, 33 W. Va. 108, 10 S. E. 54, Fisher's Ex'rs v. Hartley, 48 W. Va. 339, 37 S. E. 578, 54 L. R. A. 215, 86 Am. St. Rep. 39, Lamon v. Gold, 72 W. Va. 618, 79 S. E. 728, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 883, and Batten v. Lowther, 74 W. Va. 167, 81 S. E. 821, while Wilson v. Koontz and Brown v. Butler would seem to hold the contrary. However the Virginia court in Cheatham v. Aistrop, supra, going to the other side reaffirms the rule of Ficklin's Ex'r v. Carrington, and contrary to the construction put by Mr. Barton on Brown v. Butler (see 1 Barton's Chancery Practice, 112, note 4), the court says:

"The opinion in Brown v. Butler does not overrule or disapprove the decision in Ficklin v. Carrington. It was not necessary to a decision of the question involved in Brown v. Butler, hence the opinion expressly says: 'Without stopping, however, to inquire whether those decisions (Wilson v. Koontz, and Ficklin v. Carrington) are irreconcilable, and if so, which is the correct one, it is enough for the purposes of the present case to say that upon the facts already adverted to, we are of opinion that the appellants are not shown to have been obstructed in * * * their rights, either actually or constructively.'"

Reference is also made to the fact that the statute as construed in Ficklin's Ex'r v. Carrington more than twenty years before had since been incorporated without change in the new Code, and though afterwards amended in several particulars had not been so amended as to change the decision in the Ficklin-Carrington Case. And this last holding in Virginia seems to accord with the construction of similar statutes in other states. 2 Wood on Limitations, sec. 244 et seq. Our decisions on this controverted proposition, however, seems to have been consistent from the beginning, namely, that removal by defendant from the state after accrual of the cause of action operates proprio vigore an obstruction to plaintiff's right.

[3] The next proposition advanced by appellant's counsel to reverse the decree is that Bryan the debtor by other indirect ways obstructed the plaintiff in the prosecution of his right; namely, first, by the making of a deed to one Anderson for a tract of land in Marshall county, withheld from record by the grantee until after a decree in rem upon an attachment in favor of plaintiff, subjecting the said land to the payment of said debt, and subsequent appearance by both Bryan and Anderson and the setting aside of the decree and dismissal of the suit on the ground that Anderson was a prior purchaser for value and in possession of the land before plaintiff's action accrued; second, by the making and execution by Bryan to his daughter of a deed for a tract of land in Marion county, subsequently set aside as fraudulent by the decree of this court upon appeal, in the suit of the First Citizens' Bank against Bryan and others, and suits brought by other creditors for the same purpose, consolidated, as reported in 72 W. Va. 29, 78 S. E. 400. The bill alleges that plaintiff after the final decree of the court in said causes, undertook to intervene by petition therein, and also in other suits of said creditors begun and prosecuted in Marshall county, to secure the benefits of said decree to enforce payment of said note, but was denied such relief, upon the ground that it was too late to so intervene after final decree therein, wherefore the bringing of this original suit to obtain the relief prayed for. But we stop to inquire how plaintiff was obstructed in the prosecution of his rights as special receiver by the deed of Bryan to Anderson or by the one to his daughter. It is not alleged that Bryan was responsible for Anderson withholding his deed from record. That the bank was not thereby obstructed is shown by the fact that it actually brought its suit and got a decree of sale. The fact that Anderson prevailed because a bona fide purchaser of land constituted the deed no legal obstruction of plaintiff's rights. And that plaintiff was not obstructed in the prosecution of any right by the deed from Bryan to his daughter is evidenced by the allegations of the bill that the bank of which he was special receiver was plaintiff in one or more of the suits brought to set aside that deed for fraud and subject it to the payment of other notes of other and like classes held by it, and in which plaintiff after his appointment intervened. The reason alleged for not having included the note sued on, in those suits, is that it was not then due. But it became and remained due for more than ten years after maturity and before the attempt was made to intervene in the former suits after the final decree of this court therein, and this clearly appears on the face of the bill. Certainly, therefore, there was nothing in the making by Bryan of the deed to Anderson or of the one to his daughter, to obstruct him or the bank in the prosecution of a suit to set them or either of them aside as fraudulent and void.

The views expressed on the defense of the statute of limitations renders it unnecessary to respond to the defense of laches.

Our conclusion is to affirm the decree, and to hold that in so far as Heflebower v. Detrick, 27 W. Va. 16, and Abell v. Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company, 18 W. Va. 400, may be regarded as inconsistent with the views herein expressed concerning the exception contained in section 18, chapter 104 of the Code, they must be regarded as overruled.

DEMING NAT. BANK v. BAKER.
(No. 3656.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 18, 1919.)

1. ATTACHMENT §276 — LEGAL CLAIM — JURISDICTION.

When plaintiff's claim is purely legal and jurisdiction in equity depends solely on the validity of the attachment, if that is not good, the jurisdiction fails, and the bill should be dismissed.

2. ATTACHMENT §102 — AFFIDAVIT — SUFFICIENCY.

An affidavit for attachment as provided by section 1, ch. 106, Code (sec. 4455), is not invalid for omitting to allege that plaintiff believes he is entitled to recover from the defendant; it is sufficient to allege in the language of the statute the amount of the claim which he believes he is justly entitled to recover in the action.

3. ATTACHMENT §108 — NATURE OF CLAIM — STATEMENT.

As construed by our decisions, section 1, ch. 106, of the Code (sec. 4455), requires that plaintiff in stating the nature of his claim should state it with as much particularity, though not in detail, as is required in the declaration or bill, so that it may thereby be made to appear that he has a valid cause of action against the defendant.

4. ATTACHMENT §108 — AFFIDAVIT — ALLEGATIONS.

And in compliance with the rule just stated when the suit is upon a negotiable note against the indorser thereof, it is necessary for the plaintiff in his affidavit for an attachment in stating the nature of his claim to allege presentation for payment at the time and place appointed and within proper hours, demand of payment, and due notice to indorser, and when payable at a bank, according to the requirements of the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law, it should allege presentation for payment at the bank where payable during business hours, and before the close of the bank in the event contemplated by the statute. It is not sufficient to allege that the note was duly protested.

5. BILLS AND NOTES §410 — "PROTEST" — CERTIFICATE AS EVIDENCE.

The term "protest" means that all steps have been taken to fix the liability of drawer or indorser of which the certificate of the notary is the formal and prima facie evidence (citing Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Protest).

Appeal from Circuit Court, Preston County.

Suit in equity by the Deming National Bank against Charles E. Baker. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

Glasscock & Glasscock, of Morgantown, for appellant.

A. G. Hughes, of Kingwood, for appellee.

MILLER, P. This is a suit in equity founded upon a foreign attachment, in which the decree below was in favor of plaintiff, for the debt sued on, aggregating principal and interest at the date of the decree to $2987.90, and for a sale of the real estate of the defendant attached in the cause, to pay the sum so decreed with interest thereon and the costs of the suit.

[1] The first point of error is that the circuit court should have quashed the affidavit for the attachment upon several grounds, naming them. The proposition advanced by counsel for appellees respecting this point is that affidavits in foreign attachments in equity are not viewed with the same strictness as in actions at law and that the affidavit may be amended or supplemented by the bill. When the plaintiff's claim is purely legal and the jurisdiction in equity depends solely upon the validity of the attachment, if the attachment is not good the jurisdiction fails, and the bill should be dismissed. This has been our construction of the present statute, sec. 1, ch. 106, Code (sec. 4455), in cases arising since the amendment of the statute in 1882. Swarthmore Lumber Co. v. Parks, 72 W. Va. 625, 628, 629, 79 S. E. 723; Millar v. Whittington, 77 W. Va. 142, 87 S. E. 164; Frye v. Miley, 54 W. Va. 324, 46 S. E. 135; Miller v. Zeigler, 44 W. Va. 434, 29 S. E. 981, 67 Am. St. Rep. 777.

[2] The objections to the affidavit that it was not subscribed by affiant and was bad for want of jurat, were abandoned in argument, and we think they are groundless. We are also of the opinion that the third objection, namely, that it does not allege that plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendant the claim or debt sworn to, is also without substantial merit. Appellant is the only defendant. The affidavit in this respect is substantially in the language of the statute, and the allegation is equivalent to the charge that plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendant. An affidavit using the language of the statute or its equivalent is all that is required. Ruhl, Koblegard & Co. v. Rogers, 29 W. Va. 779, 2 S. E. 798; Altmeyer v. Caulfield, 37 W. Va. 847, 17 S. E. 409.

[3-5] Another point is that the affidavit is defective in its statement of the nature of plaintiff's claim in that it fails to allege that the note sued on was presented for payment at the place where according to its terms it was made payable, and for another reason included in the first, that it fails to allege that defendant had notice of the protest or that notice was waived by him. The affidavit does allege that the note was duly protested on March 16, 1915, the date of its maturity. Does this averment satisfy the requirements of our previous holdings on this subject? The meaning of the term "protest," at least in the popular sense, so the authorities say, is that all steps have been taken to fix the liability of drawer or endorser of which the certificate of the notary is the formal and prima facie evidence. Daniel and Douglass on Elements of the Law of Negotiable Instruments, § 929; 3 Words and Phrases, Second Series, 1312; 6 Words and Phrases, 5742, and cases cited; Barnes' Code 1916, sec. 118, ch. 98A (Code 1913, c. 98a, § 118 [sec. 4280]). Such being the definition of the term, it might on first impression seem that the allegation that the instrument was duly protested ought to be regarded as covering all the elements, of presentment for payment at the time and place appointed and within the proper hours, demand of payment and due notice to the maker and endorsers. But an attachment proceeding being a harsh remedy, strict construction has always been applied, and our decisions hold that the same strictness required in the declaration or bill should be demanded of the plaintiff in stating the nature of his claim in his affidavit for attachment. Bank of Huntington v. Hy-sell, 22 W. Va. 142, among the first of our cases, holds that in an action on a negotiable note against an endorser the declaration must allege that the note was duly presented at the place where it was payable, and that it was not paid, and that thereupon the said note was duly protested for non-payment, of all of which the endorser had prompt notice.

Approved forms of pleading require this strictness. Hogg's Pleading and Forms, No. 45. In Sommers v. Allen, 44 W. Va. 120, at page 123, 28 S. E. 787, a suit in equity with attachment, Judge Brannon strongly implies that the affidavit ought to allege all the material issuable facts necessary to entitle plaintiff to recover. In Home Distilling Co. v. Himmel, 74 W. Va. 756, 82 S. E. 1094, we said that it is essential that the nature of plaintiff's claim be so described in the attachment that the court can see therefrom that plaintiff has a valid cause of action against the defendant. See, also, Cosner's Adm'r v. Smith, 36 W. Va. 788, 15 S. E. 977; Reed v. McCloud, 38 W. Va. 701, 18 S. E. 924; Crim v. Harmon, 38 W. Va. 596, 18 S. E. 753; Thompson v. Curry et al., 79 W. Va. 771, 91 S. E. 801; Peabody Ins. Co. v. Wilson, 29 W. Va. 528, 2 S. E. 888; Delaplain v. Armstrong, 21 W. Va. 211. If we adhere to these rules and principles of strict construction, which are not out of harmony with the decisions of other states, we think we are obliged to hold the affidavit in the case at bar fatally defective.

But it is said by counsel for plaintiff that we may look to the bill to supply the deficiency. If this were so, and we do not think it is, certainly not in a case where jurisdiction in equity depends solely on a valid attachment, the bill in this case is not sworn to and could not take the place of the affidavit, for that ground.

The affidavit being fatally defective for the reasons given, and also for the further reason that it is not alleged in affidavit or bill, in accordance with the laws of Pennsylvania, same as sec. 75, ch. 98A, Barnes' Code 1918 (Code 1913, c. 98a, § 75 [sec. 4246]), our Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law, that the note was presented for payment at the bank where it was made payable, during business hours or before the close of the bank, in the event contemplated by the statute, we should not go into the merits of the case, and our conclusion is to reverse the decree, sustain defendant's motion to quash the affidavit, and jurisdiction depending thereon, to dismiss the bill, and our decree will be as indicated.

4. COSTS ⚡238(2)—CORRECTION OF DECREE
—INADVERTENCE.

Right of correction of a decree in such cause, omitting requirement of a defeasance clause in the deed ordered to be executed, accordant with a stipulation therefor in the contract, does not carry costs in the appellate court, if the omission appears to have been the result of inadvertence in the entry of the decree, and the appellant made no objection thereto in the court below.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Doddridge County.

Suit by Homer Freeman, against Martie Swiger and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed, and remanded for further proceedings.

J. V. Blair, of West Union, for appellants.
J. Ramsey, of West Union, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, J. The decree appealed from requires specific performance of the contract construed by this court in Freeman v. Carnegie Natural Gas Co., 74 W. Va. 83, 81 S. E. 572, but it was pronounced in a new suit, the parties to which are not identical with those of the cause to which reference has just been made. The reported decision, however, sets forth the contract, the situation of the parties, and many of the facts material to the disposition of this cause.

The parties defendant to this bill are Lewis A. Swiger, husband of Rachel J. Swiger, the deceased owner of the land and vendor of the oil and gas interests in controversy, and her seven children and heirs at law. The Carnegie Natural Gas Company and Sarah M. Cumberledge, parties to the former suit, are omitted. Five of the children are infants, and are represented by a guardian ad litem. The administrator of Rachel J. Swiger was not made a party.

[1, 2] As the sufficiency of the bill is challenged, in argument here, only on the ground of failure to make the administrator and the Carnegie Natural Gas Company, assignee of the lease on the land, parties, acquiescence in its sufficiency in all other respects may be assumed. It alleges full and strict compliance with all the conditions of the contract, including payment of $200 to Lewis A. Swiger, on account of the first and only gas well drilled on the land, April 1, 1907, and within 90 days after the tubing and testing thereof; the well having been completed January 7, 1907.

Admitting the well-settled doctrine that the personal representative of a deceased vendor is a necessary party to a bill for specific performance, of the contract (Hill v. Proctor, 10 W. Va. 59; Steenrod v. W. P. & B. R. R. Co., 27 W. Va. 1; Hinchman v. Ballard, 7 W. Va. 152), counsel for the appellee, by way of avoidance of the effect thereof, treats the husband and wife as joint obligees at the date of the contract, and invokes the legal proposition that, in such case, the obligor may discharge himself by payment in full to either of the joint obligees. Hatfield v. Cabell County Court, 75 W. Va. 595, 84 S. E. 335; Allen v. South Penn Oil Co., 72 W. Va. 155, 77 S. E. 905; Blish. Con. § 875; 1 Parsons, Cont. 271; C. J. 537. If the obligation to pay the $200 is referable in point of time to the date of contract, and is analogous to rentals stipulated for in an oil and gas lease executed by a husband and wife, on land owned by only one of them, the money was payable to them jointly, and the vendee could discharge himself by payment to either of them. Allen v. South Penn Oil Co., 72 W. Va. 155, 77 S. E. 905; Sandusky v. Oil Co., 63 W. Va. 260, 59 S. E. 1082; Coffman v. Hope Natural Gas Co., 74 W. Va. 57, 81 S. E. 575. The contract bears on its face evidence of intent to make the money payable to both husband and wife. It recites an agreement to make the first payment to them, and acknowledges receipt of the money, and is silent as to the payees of the amounts to be subsequently paid. Presumptively, the parties to whom the first payment was made were intended. If, on the other hand, it is to be regarded as having arisen at the date of payment, the vendee having the option to pay or not, and the consequence of nonpayment being forfeiture of his title, the forfeited title going to the husband and heirs, the right to the money would not have accrued to Rachel J. Swiger in her lifetime, nor to her administrator after her death. It was, in that case, purchase money of the life estate of the husband and the estate in remainder of the heirs, and therefore payable to them. Since it would not have been payable to the administrator in either event, he is not a necessary party.

As the bill does not seek an accounting for oil or gas taken from the land, or to be taken therefrom in the future, there is manifestly no occasion for the presence of the lessee. It is not interested in the cause of action set up in the bill. After settlement of the question of title, there may be no occasion for any litigation with it, and the court cannot assume necessity thereof.

[3] The time of payment of the $200 having been proved only by the testimony of the plaintiff, objection to his competency as a witness to prove the fact was interposed under the claim that it was a personal transaction between him and a deceased person. It was obviously not a transaction with Rachel J. Swiger at all, for the bill alleges she died in 1906, and the answer, denying this, avers she died in 1904. Compensation for the well was paid to Lewis A. Swiger, one of the parties to this suit, and is proved, except as to date, by his receipt.

[4] Failure to require a defeasance clause in the deeds of conveyance ordered to be executed, accordant with the stipulation in the contract for forfeiture of the title for failure to pay $200 for each well that shall be drilled on the land, within 90 days after the tubing and testing thereof, is an error necessitating a modification of the decree. This seems to have been the result of inadvertence, since the decree only impliedly negatives the requirement and the appellee admits the error. Disclaimer of right to an unconditional deed here argues lack of claim thereof in the court below, and of intent to make such claim, or take a decree giving such right. If the appellants had protested against the form of the decree in the court below, no doubt it would have been readily corrected in this respect. Modified, so as to correct the error noted, the decree will be affirmed, and costs in this court awarded to the appellees, agreeably to the principle enunciated in Hope Nat. Gas Co. v. Shriver, 75 W. Va. 401, 83 S. E. 1011, Rowan v. Tracy, 74 W. Va. 649, 82 S. E. 478, Teter v. Teter, 65 W. Va. 167, 63 S. E. 967, and Frye v. Miley, 54 W. Va. 324, 46 S. E. 135.

The cause will be remanded for further proceedings.

HALLAUER et al. v. FIRE ASS'N OF PHILADELPHIA. (No. 3518.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Feb. 18, 1919.)

1. INSURANCE §130(6) — FIRE INSURANCE — COMMENCEMENT OF RISK.

Unless the application so provides, it is not necessary that a policy of fire insurance be issued before protection becomes effective. Insurance commences, as a general rule, at the date on which the contract to insure is consummated by the acquiescence of the parties, whether that is the date of the issuance of the policy or earlier.

2. INSURANCE §130(1) — FIRE INSURANCE — CONTRACT—APPLICATION AND ACCEPTANCE.

A contract of insurance, like any other contract, consists generally of two prerequisites—an offer or application and its acceptance.

3. INSURANCE §132—FIRE INSURANCE—LIMITED ACCEPTANCE—"BINDING SLIP."

Where the insurance is to become effective or the risk attach before the application has been formally accepted by the insurer, frequently a limited acceptance or "binding slip" is given stating such fact.

4. CUSTOMS AND USAGES §11—FIRE INSURANCE—LIABILITY.

But where the testimony offered in the case shows the existence of a custom among insurance agents and companies that, in cases of applications for fire insurance, where the agent agrees to try to write the policy, all the terms having been agreed upon, the insurance is regarded as in force from the date of the application subject to cancellation by the company, and where the acts of the agent are such as reasonably tend to indicate his intention to regard the policy as in force, and the jury finds from the evidence that such was his intention, the insurer is bound to compensate for the loss of the property incurred prior to notice of cancellation.

5. CONTRACTS §29, 176(1)—INTERPRETATION — AGREEMENT—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Though the interpretation of contracts, when made and free from ambiguity, is a question for the court, the determination of whether the facts proved or admitted are such as constitute an agreement binding the parties generally is within the province of the jury to ascertain from facts submitted for their consideration and judgment.

6. TRIAL §333, 334—VERDICT—INTEREST—PLEADING.

Though a jury cannot in an action on a contract allow damages beyond the amount laid in the declaration, yet it may add to that sum interest, though the aggregate exceed the amount demanded by the pleading; and where the excess can rightfully be attributed to interest, the verdict is good.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR §1041(4)—TRIAL §334—VERDICT—INTEREST—AMENDMENT AFTER VERDICT.

Where a jury awards as damages in an action on a contract a sum slightly in excess of that demanded by the declaration, the excess being explainable as interest to cover the time between the dates of the accrual of the cause of action and the trial of the case, an amendment of the declaration after verdict increasing the amount demanded to a sum sufficient to cover the verdict is not prejudicial to defendant, because unnecessary; the verdict being proper if no amendment had been permitted.

8. INSURANCE ⇨132 — "BINDING SLIP" — "BINDING RECEIPT."

A "binding receipt" or "binding slip" is a limited acceptance of an application for insurance given by an authorized agent pending the ascertainment of the company's willingness to assume the burden of the proposed risk, the effect of which is to protect the applicant until the company acts upon the application, and, if it declines to accept the burden, the binding effect of the slip ceases eo instante.

Error to Circuit Court, Berkeley County.

Assumpsit by George Hallauer and others against the Fire Association of Philadelphia. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

H. H. Emmert, of Martinsburg, for plaintiff in error.

Allen B. Noll and Decatur H. Rodgers, both of Martinsburg, for defendants in error.

LYNCH, J. Plaintiffs brought assumpsit to recover the amount of an insurance policy issued, they alleged, by the defendant November 2, 1915, to indemnify them against loss that might result, and three days later did result, from the destruction by fire of the property insured, and obtained the judgment to which defendant prosecutes this writ. The chief defense interposed in the trial court and relied on here rests solely upon the ground that the contract pleaded and offered in evidence never was, and is not now, such a contract as required defendant to render compensation for the property destroyed.

The facts proved and admitted or controverted and constituting the grounds of recovery and of the defense interposed are these: Plaintiffs owned and operated a fruit-evaporating plant, the property insured and destroyed. Trammell & Co., themselves solicitors of insurance contracts for companies represented by them, theretofore had written policies of insurance for their companies covering the same property, but which they were directed to cancel after reporting to the companies respecting the writing of the policies, presumably because of the apparent hazard incident to property devoted to such use. Acting on behalf and at the request of plaintiffs, Trammell & Co. then applied to H. L. Alexander, also an insurance solicitor in the same city, Martinsburg, on November 2, 1915, to write a policy covering the same property, and to the request he replied that he would try to write or place it. He did write, date, and countersign the policy sued on as of the date of the application so as to make it a complete and binding contract of insurance, except as to delivery and revenue stamps, and directed a clerk temporarily employed in his office to inclose it and an account against Trammell & Co. or plaintiffs for the usual premium in an envelope properly noted for delivery, and told her not to deliver it without his consent. The fire occurred three days later, and, without communicating to Alexander or to any employé of his then in his office, the information that the property was at that moment being burned, Trammell & Co., acting for plaintiffs, procured possession of the policy from a clerk in Alexander's office, other than the temporary clerk, who was not advised of the direction previously given, but later Alexander, having knowledge of the delivery and of the fire, authorized Trammell & Co., plaintiffs' witnesses say, and he does not deny it, to cause revenue stamps to be affixed to the policy and canceled by his initials "H. L. A.," which was done according to his directions. Alexander, on the other hand, affirmed his intention to have been not to do anything respecting a contract binding the defendant until it had consented to be bound, and stated further that as soon as he heard of the fire he went to the office of Trammell & Co. and demanded of their clerk, the principals being out, the return of the policy. The clerk, however, flatly denied that any such demand was made upon him, and the principals, Trammell and Nadenbousch, state that no such demand was made upon them personally or through their office.

[1, 2] A contract for insurance, like any other contract, consists generally of two prerequisites—an offer or application and its acceptance. Unless the application so provides, it is not necessary that the policy be issued before protection becomes effective. Insurance commences, as a general rule, at the date of the policy or at the date on which the contract to insure is consummated by the acquiescence of the parties, even though in the form of a parol contract. Insurance Co. v. Insurance Co., 19 How. 318, 15 L. Ed. 636; Croft v. Hanover Fire Ins. Co., 40 W. Va. 508, 21 S. E. 854, 52 Am. St. Rep. 902. To become a binding contract, however, the party to whom the offer or application is made generally must signify his acceptance, so that, in the absence of some provision to the contrary, there must be an actual assent to the assumption of the proposed risk, or some act done implying assent from which the insurer cannot recede without liability. 1 Joyce on Insurance (2d Ed.) § 55. When the proposal or application has been accepted by the company itself or by an authorized agent acting for and on its behalf, the act of the agent being the act of the principal, from that moment the contract becomes effective and enforceable. But to constitute such a contract it is not always necessary that acceptance of the risk and the manual delivery of the contract be concurrent or contemporaneous.

[3, §] Besides, the acceptance may be for a limited period of time with the right reserved to reject, as in a case where a fire insurance company, having received an application for a policy, contracted to accept the risk for the term of 30 days from date, "unless the applicant is sooner notified of its rejection." Barr v. North American Ins. Co., 61 Ind. 488. And this limited acceptance often takes the form of what is known as a "binding receipt" or "binding slip" given by an authorized agent pending the ascertainment of the company's willingness to assume the burden of the proposed risk. 1 Joyce on Insurance (2d Ed.) §§ 64, 65. The effect of such a receipt generally is to protect one seeking insurance until the company acts upon the application, and if it elects to exercise the right reserved to decline to accept that burden, the binding effect of the slip ceases eo instante. See, also, Tucker v. Mutual Fire Ass'n, 71 W. Va. 690, 77 S. E. 279.

[4] Thus it is seen, where the insurance is to become effective or the risk attach before the application has formally been accepted by the insurer, frequently a limited acceptance or binding receipt is given stating such fact. In this case Alexander, agent of the defendant company, in stating that he would try to write the policy, used language which from its general tenor, and in the absence of modifying circumstances, might give the impression that it was his intention to communicate with some one or more of the companies represented by him before the conclusion of the insurance contract and the issuance of the policy. There was no agreement for a limited acceptance or binding receipt given. The only case similar to this which a careful investigation has disclosed, though it differs materially on its facts, is that of Whitman v. Milwaukee Fire Ins. Co., 128 Wis. 124, 107 N. W. 291, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 407, 116 Am. St. Rep. 25, in which the agent, replying to the applicant, told the latter that he "would see to it; take care of it so it would be all right;" would "get a policy." The court said:

"Evidence that the circumstances characterizing an application were closed by a mere promise on the part of the agent to attend to the matter of obtaining a policy of insurance is * * * proof that no contract of insurance was supposed to be closed in present."

And the court further said that to establish that something out of the ordinary was contemplated, namely, the actual closing of a contract precedent to the issuance of a policy, reasonably clear evidence is required to show that the minds of the parties met on the precise proposition.

But it is contended by the plaintiff that the testimony offered in the case shows the existence of a custom among insurance agents and companies that in cases of application for fire insurance, where the agent agrees to write or place the risk, all the terms having been agreed upon, the policy is regarded as in force subject to the rejection of the application by the company, and from that custom and the circumstances appearing in the case it is urged that the insurance became effective from the date of the application, though there was no express understanding to that effect and no binding receipt given.

The circumstances upon which plaintiffs rely to show that defendant's agent, Alexander, was acting in accordance with the custom proved at the trial, are: That he had the policy written at once on the day the request for insurance was made and dated as of that day; that he countersigned the policy knowing that it provided that "this policy shall not be valid unless countersigned by the duly authorized agent of the company at Martinsburg, W. Va.;" that he entered the policy name, number, and premium charge in his company book as of that date, that being the book in which it was his custom to keep the accounts of the different companies which he represented, and in which he entered "each policy as it is written to keep the number of the policy, the company and date"; that the premium on the policy, if collected, would have run from the date of the policy, i. e., the date of the application; that the policy was delivered to the plaintiffs' representative by the agent's clerk; that the agent, or his clerk at his direction, after knowledge of the delivery of the policy and of the fire, called Trammell & Co. over the phone and authorized them to place on the policy the revenue stamps omitted by the former, and deduct their cost from the premium, a fact not denied by the agent when on the stand; that Trammell & Co., who had written two policies on this risk, both of which were directed to be canceled by the companies when informed that they had been written, regarded its policies as having been in force until they were canceled. The only testimony to the contrary was that by Alexander, who insisted that he did not intend to bind defendant until it had a fair opportunity to express a willingness to carry the risk, and who stated that as soon as he heard of the fire he went to the office of Trammell & Co. and demanded of their clerk, the principals being out, the return of the policy, a statement flatly denied by the clerk and by the principals.

[5] Not what he declared after the fire as to his intentions at the time of the application for the policy, but what he admits or the proof shows he actually did before and after the fire controls. The sufficiency of these acts and whether they were proved were submitted to the determination of the jury. Though the interpretation of contracts, when made and free from ambiguity, is a question for the court, the determination of whether the facts proved or admitted are such as constitute an agreement binding the parties generally is within the province of a jury to ascertain from the facts submitted for their consideration and judgment. Bowyer v. Knapp, 15 W. Va. 277; Strause v. Richmond, etc., Co., 109 Va. 724, 65 S. E. 659, 132 Am. St. Rep. 937; Art Syndicate v. German Ins. Co., 213 Pa. 506, 62 Atl. 1107; Manson v. Metropolitan Surety Co., 128 App. Div. 577, 112 N. Y. Supp. 886.

This question was adequately presented to the jury by defendant's instruction No. 3, which, as modified by the court, is:

"The court instructs the jury that, before they can find a verdict for the plaintiff, they must believe from the evidence that H. L. Alexander, the agent of the defendant, at the time of the application for the insurance covered by the policy in the suit, * * * intended to issue a policy in one of the insurance companies represented by him which would be effective until canceled by the company whose policy should be so issued."

This instruction presented squarely to the jury the question of Alexander's intention. Assuming that intention to have existed, as the jury apparently found it so to exist, they were justified further from the evidence in finding that he, as general agent, had ample authority to bind his companies until they approved or canceled the policy. Brown v. Franklin Mutual Fire Insurance Co., 165 Mass. 565, 43 N. E. 512, 52 Am. St. Rep. 534. There is in the record no question or doubt raised by pleading or proof as to the authority of Alexander in the capacity of and as possessing all the powers of an agent to countersign and issue contracts binding defendant, or that for such purpose defendant furnished him with blank policies of insurance duly executed except as to dates, blanks, and his countersignature, and these defendant empowered him to complete and issue as and when necessary fully to consummate a binding contract when delivered.

The complaint founded upon instructions is the refusal to give defendant's instruction No. 5 as requested, and its modification by eliminating the phrase, "The defendant is not bound by local technical terms." Before modification it read:

"The court instructs the jury that (the defendant is not bound by local technical terms, and) unless the expression, 'I will try to write the policy,' is a general technical term known and used by the insurance companies generally, then the jury must give the said phrase its usual construction."

Striking out the phrase does not make a material alteration or change in the purpose of the instruction, because, if the so-called technical phrase is not general, it is necessarily comparatively local, and the latter sense or meaning is certainly implied in the language used, and the implication has a force equivalent to that in the instruction as propounded by defendant; at least the similarity is so apparent between the two forms as not to warrant a reversal of the judgment.

[6, 7] The last assignment to be considered is the leave asked and granted to amend and the amendment of the declaration after the jury had rendered the verdict and defendant had moved the award of a new trial by striking out $1,000 and inserting in lieu thereof $1,500 to correspond with the practice and process, the former sum being that called for in the policy, in consonance with which the jury found, except that they apparently added interest to cover the time between the dates of the accrual of the cause of action and the trial of the case, the verdict being for $1,054.33. Obviously defendant's rights were not impaired by the amendment of the ad damnum clause of the declaration to correspond with the damages specified in the summons; for no amendment of the declaration was in fact necessary. While it is true that the jury cannot in an action on a contract allow damages beyond the amount laid in the declaration, yet it may add to that sum interest, though the aggregate exceed the amount demanded by the pleading; and where the excess can rightfully be attributed to interest, the verdict is good. Section 14, c. 131 (sec. 4923) Code 1913; Salem Terminal Traction Co. v. McGraw, 66 W. Va. 321, 66 S. E. 463; Georgia Home Ins. Co. v. Goode, 95 Va. 751, 30 S. E. 366. Since the verdict would thus have been proper if no amendment of the declaration had been permitted, the amendment therefore was not prejudicial to defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

HAMILTON v. McLAIN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 18, 1919.)

1. INSURANCE — 774—APPOINTMENT OF BENEFICIARY—SUBSEQUENT CHANGE OF RELATIONSHIP.

The appointment of beneficiaries to death benefits by the insured in a contract of insurance, valid in its inception and unrevoked by him, is not affected by subsequent change of relationship by marriage or divorce unless so stipulated in the contract or controlled by some provision of law.

2. INSURANCE — 774—MUTUAL BENEFIT ASSOCIATION—SUBSEQUENT MARRIAGE OF INSURED.

Where in such contract of insurance in a voluntary mutual benefit association the applicant in accordance with the regulations of the association has appointed his father and mother to death benefits resulting solely from natural causes or from accident not under control of the person or corporation by whom he is employed, as stipulated, such appointment is not revoked by the subsequent marriage of the insured, unless so stipulated in the contract or by the rules and regulations made part thereof.

3. INSURANCE — 774—MUTUAL BENEFIT ASSOCIATION—APPOINTMENT OF BENEFICIARY—REVOCATION.

Where a subsequent regulation specifically provides that death benefits for death resulting from accident shall go to the widow, children or parents of the deceased member, but provides that if at the time of his application the member shall have neither of the preferred beneficiaries named, he may if he so elects appoint some other person or persons beneficiary or beneficiaries, the subsequent provision thereof that his marriage subsequent to such application shall be a revocation of such appointment, the effect of such revocation should be limited to death benefits resulting from accident and should not be extended by construction to benefits for death resulting from natural causes which the member in his application has directed to be paid otherwise and according to some other provision of the contract.

4. INSURANCE — 783—RIGHTS OF BENEFICIARY.

The right of a beneficiary lawfully appointed to such benefits is in its inception inchoate but becomes consummate on the death of the insured and cannot be thereafter waived or abrogated by the insurer or otherwise changed unless absolved by some positive rule of law.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Doddridge County.

Interpleader by H. Curt Hamilton, Secretary-Treasurer, etc., against Virginia A. McLain and others, and J. J. McLain and others. Decree for defendants Virginia A. McLain and others, and defendants J. J. McLain and others appeal. Reversed in part, and decree for appellants.

J. Ramsey and J. V. Blair, both of West Union, for appellants.

W. S. Stuart and H. L. Hammond, of West Union, and L. N. Tavenner, of Parkersburg, for appellees.

MILLER, P. The plaintiff, secretary-treasurer of the Relief Association of Employees of the South Penn Oil Company, a voluntary association, by bill filed in the circuit court, interpleaded defendants Virginia A. McLain, widow, in her own right and as administratrix of the estate of Harry H. McLain, deceased, Robert McLain and Allen Dotson McLain, infants, and Virginia A. McLain, guardian for said infants, who together constitute one set of claimants, and J. J. McLain and E. McLain, respectively father and mother of said decedent, the other set of claimants to $1,500.00, which plaintiff acknowledges on behalf of said relief association to be due to one or the other of them on account of the death of said decedent, a member in good standing in said association, and which money with accrued interest plaintiff professed himself ready to pay to the parties adjudged to be lawfully entitled thereto under the contract.

Each set of claimants answered the bill setting up their respective claims, and besides the documentary evidence, depositions of witnesses were taken by both sides and filed in the cause, and on final hearing on the issues presented by the interpleaded defendants, the circuit court by final decree pronounced on April 30, 1917, adjudged the widow and the two infant children of the decedent entitled to said fund in the proportion of one-third to each and decreed payment by plaintiff accordingly. From this decree the other claimants, J. J. McLain and E. McLain, were awarded the present appeal.

It was not the practice of said association to issue certificates or policies of insurance; the application of the member and the printed regulations which formed a part thereof constituted the only evidence of the contract, and it is conceded that the rights of the claimants must be determined thereby.

The declared purpose of said association as stated in said regulations was of "establishing and maintaining a fund from which to pay benefits to those members of the Association, who, under the regulations hereinafter set forth, may be entitled to receive payment of such benefits." As a means of establishing the fund it is provided as follows:

"Said fund shall be known as the Relief Fund, and shall be established and maintained by monthly contributions of the amounts hereinafter specified, from the members of the Association, and by the contributions of the South Penn Oil Company, hereinafter called the company, and by the income arising from investments of such parts of the fund itself as may not be needed for the payment of benefits and operating expenses of the Association."

Following these declarations are some thirty-five regulations by which it is provided the business of the association shall be conducted, the second whereof prescribes the form of application and the manner in which it shall be signed and witnessed.

The bill and exhibits show that decedent made several applications for membership; the first in October, 1904, in which he designated no beneficiary; the second, March 3, 1908, in which he provided, "In the event of death from natural causes pay death benefits to mother;" the third, September 11, 1909, in which he provided, "In the event of death from natural causes, pay death benefits to Father and Mother;" the fourth and last, April 2, 1913, in which he said: "In the event of death from natural causes or by accident outside of control of the South Penn Oil Company, pay death benefits to J. J. McLain and E. McLain who is my parents." The record also shows that in November or December, 1906, the insured made a will whereby he undertook according to its language to "Give everything to my father and mother both real and personal." The several applications for membership referred to were rendered necessary by increases in wages and consequential changes in ratings for dues to be paid by the applicant in accordance with the rules and regulations.

It is also alleged and proven that on July 2, 1913, said Harry H. McLain intermarried with the said Virginia A. McLain, whose maiden name was Virginia A. Dotson, and with whom he continued to live as husband until his death, September 30, 1915, the result of typhoid fever, a natural cause, in no way superinduced by accident of any kind or character, and by whom he had two infant children, one born before and the other after his demise.

It is argued that sections 24 and 25 of the regulations as amended and in force at the time of the fourth and last application properly interpreted are controlling and that the rights of the conflicting claimants must be determined thereby. They are as follows:

"Twenty-fourth: Death Benefits shall be paid to those who by law would be entitled to take the deceased member's estate in case of intestacy, except when the deceased member shall have appointed, in the manner prescribed by these Regulations, some other person or persons beneficiary to receive payment thereof, in which case payment shall be made to such beneficiary or beneficiaries. Applicants for membership in the Association may name in their application a beneficiary or beneficiaries to receive Death Benefits for death resulting solely from natural causes, or from accident outside of the control of the Company; and members may at any time, and as often as they desire, change such beneficiary or beneficiaries previously named in their application or appointed, by filing with the Secretary of the Association a new application naming therein the substituted beneficiary or beneficiaries. The word 'Members' as used in this amendment shall include members who have been and hereafter are retired by, and placed upon the Special Pay Roll, and Annuity Plan List, of the Company."

"Twenty-fifth: Death Benefits for death resulting from accident shall be paid to the widow, children or parents of the member on account of whose death the same may become payable. If such deceased member shall leave a widow, but no children, such widow shall be entitled to receive payment of the whole amount of such Death Benefits; if he shall leave a widow and children, said Death Benefit shall be paid to them in the same proportion as they would take his personal estate in case of intestacy; if he shall leave children but no widow, said death benefit shall be paid to such children in the same proportions as they would take his personal estate, in case of intestacy; if he shall have neither widow nor children, but leave a father and mother, or either, said Death Benefit shall be paid to such father and mother jointly, if both be living, or to the survivor, if one of them be dead. Any member who at the time of applying for membership in the Association shall have neither wife, child, father or mother, may, if he so elects, appoint such person or persons as beneficiary or beneficiaries, of the Death Benefit secured to him, by membership in the Association, as he may see fit, in which case, if but one person be so designated, he or she shall receive payment of the whole of said Death Benefit, or if more than one be so designated, they shall be paid said Death Benefit in equal shares or in such other proportions as such member may request in his application. The marriage of a member subsequent to his appointment of a beneficiary of the Death Benefit secured by his membership shall be a revocation of such appointment."

Based on these regulations and provisions of the contract and the fact that the insured came to his death solely from natural cause and not from an accident either outside of or under the control of the South Penn Oil Company, the contentions of the claimants are as follows: On behalf of the appellants that being designated beneficiaries by the insured in his application they are entitled to the fund as provided in said regulation 24. On behalf of appellees that the marriage of the insured subsequent to his application and appointment of appellants as beneficiaries, worked a revocation of such appointment and let them in as beneficiaries as provided by the final provision of section 25.

We do not see how there can be any doubt about the proper construction of the contract depending on these two regulations, read and considered in the light of the declared purposes of the association and paragraph 6 of the application, which is as follows:

"6. I agree that the acceptance of a benefit from the Relief Fund of said Association for sickness, bodily injury or death happening to me, shall operate as a release of all claims for damages against the South Penn Oil Company by reason of such injury or death which could be made by or through me, and that I or my legal representatives will, upon request, execute such written instrument as may be necessary to evidence such release."

[1] It is not controverted that at the time of his application the insured had the right to name therein "a beneficiary or beneficiaries to receive death benefits for death resulting solely from natural causes, or from accident outside of the control of the company," this by the very words of regulation 24. The applicant exercised this right of appointment, designating appellants, his father and mother respectively, and limiting their rights to benefits thus accruing. It is well settled respecting such contracts that the designation of a beneficiary, valid in its inception remains so, and it is not to be disturbed by changed relationships of marriage or divorce unless otherwise stipulated in the contract or controlled by the laws of the state. Courtois v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W., 135 Cal. 552, 87 Pac. 970, 87 Am. St. Rep. 137; White v. Brotherhood of American Yeomen, 124 Iowa, 293, 99 N. W. 1071, 68 L. R. A. 164, 104 Am. St. Rep. 323, 2 Ann. Cas. 350; Union Fraternal League v. Walton, 109 Ga. 1, 34 S. E. 317, 46 L. R. A. 424, 77 Am. St. Rep. 350.

[2, 3] There is not found anywhere in the contract any provision denying the power of appointment or revoking the same unless, as contended by appellees, the last provision of regulation 25 does so. It is suggested in argument that policies or contracts of life insurance are testamentary in character and should be so construed; but we do not understand counsel as affirming that the appointment made was by virtue of our statute relating to wills revoked by the subsequent marriage of the insured. Certainly the statute can in no way affect a valid contract. Nor can said appointment be treated as revoked by marriage according to any declared object of the association or rule of the common law applicable to such cases. In Massachusetts, etc., Foresters v. Callahan, 146 Mass. 391, 16 N. E. 14, where the statute authorized such beneficiary associations for the purpose of assisting widows and orphans or other relatives of deceased members, and the constitution of the association stated its object to be to make suitable provisions for the widow and orphan, it was held that the designation of the mother of the applicant as beneficiary was one to which the association could give its assent and was a valid appointment and was not revoked by the subsequent marriage of the applicant.

But the question in the case at bar is, Was the appointment of appellants revoked by the subsequent marriage of the applicant by virtue of the provision of said regulation 25? If it was, of course the decree below was right and should be affirmed, otherwise it should be reversed and a decree entered here for appellees. Counsel for appellees in a very elaborate argument contend that the provision of regulation 25 reaches back and controls the construction of regulation 24. Grammatically it certainly cannot be said to do so. The former refers to "death benefits secured by his membership" which might if proper to do so be referred also to regulation 24. But the latter regulation is dealing with death benefits generally and says in the first paragraph that they shall be paid to those who by law would be entitled to take the deceased member's personal estate, unless or except when the deceased shall have appointed some other person in the manner prescribed by the regulations. By that regulation applicant could make no appointment to death benefits except those accruing solely from death due to natural causes or from accident outside the control of the company, and as we have already observed he did not by the appointment actually made attempt to go beyond this limitation.

But how about regulation 25? The first provision thereof is that "Death Benefits for death resulting from accident (plainly meaning accident under the control of the company for which it might be held responsible) shall be paid to the widow, children," etc. Under this regulation what is the power given a member to appoint a beneficiary? There is none, except that if at the time of his application he shall have neither wife, child, father nor mother, and he so elects, he may designate some other person or persons as his beneficiary or beneficiaries. Clearly it is such an appointment to benefits to accrue from accident that is revoked by the subsequent marriage of the applicant and not an appointment authorized by regulation 24. This is undoubtedly a provision made for the benefit of the oil company, which by the constitution of the association is a contributing member. It cannot be a beneficiary except for protection from liability for accidents under its control. If the association or the officers could waive this provision made for the benefit of the company, we do not think that they have done so by impleading the contesting claimants. True, we held in Pleasants v. Locomotive Engineers' Mutual Life & Accident Insurance Association, 70 W. Va. 389, 73 S. E. 976, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 490, that an insurance association might waive an objection to a beneficiary not within the class of persons authorized to take benefits. But no such question is presented here. Appellants are of the class of beneficiaries authorized to accept benefits, and when appointed by the applicant to benefits accruing from death by natural cause or accident from under control of the company, they are preferred to the wife, children or any other favored class.

[4] It is argued however that a beneficiary in such a contract of insurance has no vested interest, and that the inchoate right as appointee may by the provisions of the regulations be taken away at any time by the voluntary act of the insured or by operation of law. But after the death of the insured the right of the beneficiary, before inchoate, becomes consummate, and unless in some way taken away by the terms of the contract or by law, he cannot be deprived of his rights. 1 Bacon on Life and Accident Insurance, § 379. The rule is different where no power is reserved to change the beneficiary. In such cases the beneficiary is said to have a vested interest from the inception of the contract. 14 R. C. L. 1376; Bacon on Life and Accident Insurance, § 377. So the appellants' rights having been fixed by the death of the insured, the association had no authority thereafter by waiver or otherwise to abrogate or affect the rights of the appellants.

As the rights of the parties must necessarily be determined by the provisions of the contract, the terms of which seem plain and unambiguous, we do not see what bearing the prior or subsequent acts of the parties can have on the construction of the contract. But both sides refer to these matters as evidencing an intent on the part of the insured to prefer them. Reference is made to the fact that the insured intermarried with Virginia A. McLain within a short time after making his new contract of insurance, and that his understanding must have been that such marriage revoked his previous appointment. But the other side points to the fact that he knew when making the new contract of his engagement and prospective marriage, and that afterwards he did make changes in other contracts of insurance so as to prefer his wife as beneficiary, but made no change in the contract here involved. At the time of his death he had in force insurance aggregating $8,500.00, of which $4,000.00 was in favor of his wife. These and other facts shown in the evidence, we think, evince an intention to make no change in the beneficiaries named in the present contract. At all events none were made, and the contract and the rights of the parties must be solved by the provisions thereof properly construed and which appear very plain and unambiguous.

Our conclusion is to reverse the decree and enter such a decree here in favor of the appellants as we think the circuit court should have pronounced.

FLEMING et al. v. BOARD OF COM'RS OF PITT COUNTY et al. (No. 169.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 12, 1919.)

1. ELECTION OF REMEDIES ⇨1—NATURE—INCONSISTENT REMEDIES.

The doctrine of the election of remedies is an application of the law of estoppel on the theory that a party cannot occupy inconsistent positions, and applies only where there are two or more remedies existing at the same time which are alternative and inconsistent with each other and not cumulative.

2. ELECTION OF REMEDIES ⇨3(1)—INCONSISTENT REMEDIES—RECOVERY OF DAMAGES FOR TAKING LAND.

That landowners filed petition before the county commissioners under Pub. Laws 1905, c. 714, § 8, for damages because of the construction of a road, and later withdrew such petition without objection after a jury to assess damages had been summoned, did not constitute a bar to a subsequent suit against the county for damages; the two remedies being consistent.

Walker, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by Emma Fleming and others against the Board of Commissioners of Pitt County and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. No error.

This is an action to recover damages of the defendant, Pitt county, for constructing a new road through the property of the plaintiffs. When the case was called for trial and the pleadings read, the defendants demurred ore tenus, and moved to dismiss for that the plaintiffs had not complied with the Public Laws of 1905, c. 714, § 8, in that they had filed their petition with the board of commissioners at the May term of said board in 1915. The petition filed with the board of commissioners on May 3, 1915, was as follows:

To the Board of Commissioners of Pitt County:

Maggie L. Fleming and Emma L. Fleming respectfully sheweth to your honorable board, the following facts:

1. That they own a body of farming lands situated in Greenville township, Pitt county, N. C., and that the public road force, building public roads in Greenville township, Pitt county, N. C., have entered upon said tract of land and have laid out and constructed a public road thereon, being the new road laid out beyond House Station, and in so doing have taken and appropriated to the public use a portion of said lands about 36 feet wide and about 1,435 yards in length, which aggregates between three and four acres of land.

2. That the taking of said portion of land was without the consent of the owners thereof, to wit, Maggie L. Fleming and Emma L. Fleming.

3. That the changing of the old course of the public road along said lands and the laying out of said new road over said lands greatly inconveniences your petitioners in the management and cultivation of said lands, and your petitioners pray:

That they be compensated for the land so taken, and for the damages and inconveniences sustained by reason of the taking of said land and the construction of said road, and these petitioners aver that their damage so sustained exceeds $500, but they hereby offer and consent to accept the sum of $500 in compromise of their said claim, provided their honorable body will pay the same without litigation.

This the 3d day of May, 1915.

Maggie L. Fleming.

Emma L. Fleming.

Upon the filing of the petition the board of commissioners issued an order to the sheriff to summon three freeholders to go over the road and assess the damages. In compliance with the said order of the board of commissioners, the sheriff summoned a jury of three men, who assembled at the courthouse, and, after being sworn and declared themselves ready to hear the case, the plaintiffs' counsel appeared before the said board and withdrew his petition, to which the defendant did not object. This action was then commenced.

The only exception taken on the trial was to the refusal of the court to sustain the demurrer made at the beginning of the trial. There was a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and judgment given accordingly, and defendant appealed.

S. J. Everett, of Greenville, for appellants.

F. C. Harding and Harry Skinner, both of Greenville, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. The road law of Pitt county (Pub. Laws 1905, c. 714, § 8) provides that where any person, across whose land a road is located, claims damages, and files his petition therefor, the board of commissioners shall order a jury of three freeholders to be summoned, who, after notice to the owner, shall assess the damages, and gives the right of appeal to the owner of the land to the superior court, where the petition is heard before a jury de novo, but this statutory remedy is not exclusive, and does not prevent the owner from resorting to the common-law remedy to recover damages by action in the superior court. Mason v. Durham, 176 N. C. 641, 96 S. E. 110, approved in Keener v. Asheville, 97 S. E. 724, at last term.

It follows therefore that the plaintiffs have stated a cause of action in their complaint within the jurisdiction of the court, and that they have the right to pursue their remedy by action, unless prevented by filing their petition before the board of commissioners; the defendant contending that, having two remedies and having elected to ask for the assessment of damages under one, they cannot demand redress under the other.

[1] The doctrine of the election of remedies is "generally regarded as being an application of the law of estoppel, upon the theory that a party cannot, in the assertion or prosecution of his rights, occupy inconsistent positions" (9 R. C. L. 957), and it "applies only where there are two or more remedies, all of which exist at the time of election, and which are alternative and inconsistent with each other, and not cumulative, so that, after the proper choice of one, the other or others are no longer available. This is upon the theory that, of several inconsistent remedies, the pursuit of one necessarily involves or implies the negation of the others." 9 R. C. L. 958. This is the accepted doctrine in this court. Machine Co. v. Owings, 140 N. C. 504, 53 S. E. 345, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 582, 6 Ann. Cas. 211; Pritchard v. Williams, 175 N. C. 322, 95 S. E. 570. In the first of these cases Justice Hoke states the principle as follows:

"As regards what have been termed consistent remedies, the suitor may, without let or hindrance from any rule of law, use one or all in a given case. He may select and adopt one as better adapted than the others to work out his purpose, but his choice is not compulsory or final, and, if not satisfied with the result of that, he may commence and carry through the prosecution of another. * * * In 3 Words and Phrases Judicially Defined, p. 2338, it is said: 'The whole doctrine of election is based on the theory that there are inconsistent rights or remedies of which a party may avail himself, and a choice of one is held to be an election not to pursue the other. The principle does not apply to coexisting and consistent remedies.' These statements of the doctrine are supported by well-considered decisions, and are very generally accepted as correct. Whittier v. Collins, 15 R. I. 90 [23 Atl. 47, 2 Am. St. Rep. 879]; Bacon v. Moody, 117 Ga. 207 [43 S. E. 482]; Austin v. Decker, 109 Iowa, 277 [80 N. W. 312]; Black v. Miller, 75 Mich. 323 [42 N. W. 837]."

This is quoted with approval in the second case, and the court adds:

"It is only when two rights are inconsistent that the party is put to his election, and that the exercise of one or the failure to do so bars the other."

The Machine Company Case is also reported in 6 Ann. Cas. 212, and the editor says, in the note appended:

"The rule stated in the reported case that the doctrine of election of remedies applies only when the remedies invoked are inconsistent, and that when the remedies are consistent all may be pursued, finds affirmance in numerous decisions"

—and he cites decisions from the highest courts of 19 states and from the Supreme Court of the United States in support of the text.

[2] Applying this principle, it is clear that filing the petition before the commissioners, conceding it to have been filed under the statute, which the plaintiffs deny, and which was withdrawn before the present action was commenced without objection by the defendant, is no bar to the present action, because the two remedies are consistent, both having the same purpose in view—the recovery of damages for an entry upon the land of the plaintiffs—based on substantially the same facts.

There is therefore no error in the judgment appealed from.

No error.

CLARK, O. J., concurs for the reasons so well given in the opinion of the court, and upon the following additional grounds:

1. The application of the plaintiff to the county commissioners was not a proceeding or an action, but an offer to settle for the damages sustained, as therein stated, "without litigation."

2. Even if it had been an action or special proceeding, the plaintiff took a nonsuit, or what was equivalent thereto, and there is no estoppel to bring this action.

WALKER, J. (dissenting). This case differs in no wise, in its essential facts, from McIntire v. Railroad, 67 N. C. 278, and a long line of decisions by this court, which have affirmed it and applied the principle that, where the statute prescribes a special remedy for the enforcement of a right created by it, that remedy must be pursued, and it supersedes the common-law remedy. We considered this to be a well-settled law of this state until Mason v. Durham, 175 N. C. 641, 96 S. E. 110, was decided, which permitted the landowner to pursue the common-law remedy, by civil action originally brought in the superior court, and this ruling was approved in Keener v. Asheville, 97 S. E. 724.

It is not a question of election of remedies, as the law abolishes the common-law remedy and leaves only one remedy, a proceeding before the clerk of the superior court. Nor is this proceeding merely administrative in character, but jurisdictional. It is the only remedy, and is not a civil action, but a special proceeding before the clerk. This was so held in the McIntire Case, and also in the numerous cases following it. It, therefore, follows that what is said in the opinion of the court about the election of remedies is, in my opinion, beside the real question involved.

I have discussed the question fully in the Mason and Keener Cases, where I dissented, Justice Brown concurring with me.

PRIDGEN et al. v. LONG et al. (No. 221.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 12, 1919.)

1. FRAUD ¶4—BY VENDOR—INTENT.

Intent of vendor of land, in representing he had good and indefeasible title, to deceive buyer, was an essential ingredient of vendor's alleged fraud.

2. FRAUD ¶54—BY VENDOR—EVIDENCE.

On issue of fraudulent purpose of vendor, trial court erroneously excluded evidence as to dealings of vendor with third person holding legal title in regard to delivery of possession by him to vendor to sell land and exercise general control over it as if he were absolute owner.

3. COVENANTS ¶125(1)—COVENANT OF SEIZIN—ACTION FOR BREACH—DAMAGES.

When covenantee buys in outstanding paramount title, measure of damages, in action for breach of covenant of seizin in his deed, is reasonable price which he has fairly and necessarily paid for title, not to exceed original consideration paid by him.

4. COVENANTS ¶125(1)—FRAUD ¶59(1)—VENDOR AND PURCHASER—BREACH OF COVENANT OF SEIZIN—ACTION BY VENDEE ON FRAUD.

The usual recovery for breach of covenant of seizin or right to convey is purchase money paid by covenantee, and interest; but, where vendee is induced to purchase by fraudulent representations of vendor as to title, he may, on eviction by better title, recover of his vendor all damages naturally resulting from fraud, though land was conveyed by deed with warranty, action being on fraud, not on covenants.

5. COVENANTS ¶97, 128—COVENANT FOR QUIET ENJOYMENT—EVICTION—DAMAGES.

Plaintiff cannot recover, in action for breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment, without showing eviction from possession under paramount title; measure of damages being price paid for land, with interest.

6. COVENANTS ¶94—COVENANT OF SEIZIN—SHOWING OF LACK OF TITLE.

In action on covenant of seizin, plaintiff need show only that defendant had no title, or right to convey.

7. COVENANTS ¶94—"COVENANT OF SEIZIN"—TIME OF BREACH—"SEIZIN"—"COVENANT OF RIGHT TO CONVEY."

Covenant of seizin is broken when deed is delivered, as it implies covenantor then has, not only possession, but right of possession and property; such being primary meaning of "seizin," its secondary meaning being possession alone, and the covenant being one of title synonymous with covenant of right to convey.

8. SALES ¶41—VENDOR AND PURCHASER ¶37(1)—CAVEAT EMPTOR—ABSENCE OF FRAUD.

The maxim of caveat emptor is applicable to contracts of purchase of both realty and personalty, and is adhered to, both by courts of law and of equity, in absence of fraud.

Appeal from Superior Court, Duplin County; Allen, Judge.

Suit by R. O. Pridgen and J. R. Barden against J. P. Long and N. P. Jarman. From judgment for defendant Jarman, plaintiff Barden appeals. New trial.

On the 12th day of February, 1911, John R. Barden, being the owner in fee simple of the tracts of land in controversy, conveyed the same to R. O. Pridgen, for the consideration of $2,000, his wife joining in the deed, which was duly recorded on September 6, 1911; and on the 12th day of February, 1911, R. C. Pridgen reconveyed the same land, by way of mortgage, to John R. Barden, to secure ten notes of $200 each, due at stated times from 1911 to 1920. This mortgage was registered the 9th day of March, 1911.

On September 5, 1911, R. C. Pridgen conveyed the same land to J. P. Long, in consideration of $3,000, and the deed was recorded on the 7th of September, 1911. On September 5, 1911, J. P. Long and wife, Willie Long, reconveyed the land to R. C. Pridgen by a mortgage to secure $2,500, evidenced by ten notes due on different dates between January, 1913 and 1922. R. C. Pridgen then, on the 15th day of September, assigned the ten notes and mortgage to J. R. Barden, who paid him for the same, but Pridgen did not transfer the legal title, which he held as mortgagee. Long took possession of the property, and remained there until about the 1st of November, 1911, and then surrendered the possession of the land to Barden under an agreement, as alleged by Barden, that Barden was to make improvements, and was to sell the land, Long to give him a deed for his equity of redemption, and under this agreement Barden went into the actual possession of the land, and remained in possession until the 11th day of November, 1915, when Barden and wife conveyed to the defendant Nelson P. Jarman and wife, Marie C. Jarman, and Barden put them in possession of the premises, and they have remained there ever since without being disturbed by any one.

On the 10th day of July, 1915, J. R. Barden and R. O. Pridgen instituted a suit, in the superior court of Duplin county, against J. P. Long and Willie Long, and duly filed their complaint on July 10, 1915, in the clerk of the superior court's office. Long and wife filed their answer on August 21, 1915, and at the March term, 1917, the case came on for trial between Pridgen and Barden, as plaintiffs, and Long and wife, as defendants, and at this term the court ordered a mistrial, and made Jarman and wife parties to the action. On April 4, 1917, the defendants Jarman and wife filed their answer, and therewith commenced proceedings for arrest and bail against John R. Barden, alleging that they paid Barden $3,500 for the land, and took his deed with full covenants of warranty and seizin, and, further, that Barden "specifically and emphatically" declared to them and to their attorney, Frank L. Potter, that he was the absolute owner of the lands in fee simple, and that there were no incumbrances or liens upon the same, which assurances and representations were relied upon by these defendants, and were false and fraudulent. The plaintiffs, Pridgen and Barden, filed replies thereto, denying that any false representations were made, and upon all these pleadings the case came on for trial at the August term, 1918, when the court submitted the three issues set out in the record, to which the plaintiff, John R. Barden, excepted.

This action, it is alleged, was brought by Pridgen and Barden for the purpose of foreclosing the mortgage made by Long and wife, and to acquire the equity of redemption of the mortgagors for the purpose of perfecting the title in Barden, and for the benefit of Jarman and wife. The defendants, Jarman and wife, filed an answer, setting up the fraudulent representations, and alleging that Barden was not seized and possessed of any interest whatever in the said lands, and also alleging that John R. Barden delivered to the defendant, Jarman and wife, the notes and mortgage given by J. P. Long to R. C. Pridgen, and assigned by the latter to him.

Among other instructions, the court charged the jury as follows:

"The deed from the plaintiff Barden to the defendant Jarman conveyed nothing, in so far as the land referred to therein is concerned, but only had the effect of transferring to the defendant Jarman his rights as owner of the notes in question, and no title to the land was conveyed thereby. So I charge you, upon the admitted facts in the pleadings, that in so far as Barden was not the owner of the said land at the time of the sale to Jarman, and inasmuch as he covenanted in the deed that he was seized of said lands, as set out in the answer of the defendant Jarman, there was a breach of said covenant immediately upon the execution of the said deed, that is, the said covenant of seizin, and that the defendant Jarman is therefore entitled to recover of the plaintiff, Barden, such damages as arose naturally from said breach of covenant just referred to. I charge you further that the defendant Jarman had a right to buy any outstanding title to said lands, in order to protect himself against incumbrances, and that the measure of damages in this case is the amount paid by Jarman in order to protect his title, so long as it does not exceed the total purchase price paid to plaintiff Barden."

The jury returned the following verdict:

"1. Did the plaintiff Barden, at the time of the sale of the lands in controversy to the defendant Jarman, falsely and fraudulently represent to the defendant Jarman that he was the absolute owner of the land in controversy, and that the same was free of all incumbrances? Answer: Yes.

"2. Did the defendant Jarman rely upon said representations and purchase said land, believing that Barden was the owner thereof in fee simple? Answer: Yes.

"3. What damage, if any, is the defendant Jarman entitled to recover of the plaintiff J. R. Barden? Answer: $800, with interest."

Judgment upon the verdict, and appeal by John R. Barden, one of the plaintiffs. The other facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Stevens & Beasley, of Warsaw, and Murray Allen, of Raleigh, for appellant Barden.

Grady & Graham, of Clinton, for appellees Jarman and wife.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] The court was trying an issue of fraud, whether the plaintiff John R. Barden had falsely and fraudulently represented that he had a good and indefeasible title to the land. The intent of Barden to deceive and cheat the defendant Jarman was an essential ingredient of the alleged fraud. This allegation of fraud was the only one submitted to the jury. The question, therefore, was whether there was a false assertion of title made, which was calculated to deceive, and with intent to deceive, the defendant, and upon the truth of which the latter relied, and was misled thereby to accept the title to his injury. The important element, as to the fraudulent purpose, required that all the relevant facts bearing on it should be submitted to the jury, and the court committed error when it excluded the evidence as to the dealings of the plaintiff with the defendant Long, in regard to the delivery of possession by him to Barden, for the purpose of selling the land and exercising a general control over it, as if he were the absolute owner. There was some evidence, too, of a settlement, or adjustment, between the parties; Jarman and his attorney agreeing to accept a transfer of the notes and mortgage by Barden to Jarman in full settlement, as appears in the statement of the case. Barden denied all fraud, and testified that he thought he had a good title, and had conveyed such a title to Jarman. It was not good in law, but he may have honestly believed that it was, being a layman and having no technical knowledge of the law, or of what was required to constitute a good title. It was not inexcusable ignorance of the law for him to suppose that a transfer of the notes, and the mortgage securing them, would vest the legal title in him. This would be so in some jurisdictions, where a mortgage is regarded only as a security, and some of the profession may have taken this view prior to the decision in Williams v. Teachey, 85 N. C. 402, where this court held that an assignment of a mortgage, in terms which do not profess to act upon the land, does not pass the mortgagee's estate in the land, but only the security it affords to the holder of the debt. The question was even hotly contested in that case. We, therefore, must grant a new trial because of this error.

[3, 4] But the appellant contends that the court stated the wrong rule, as to the measure of damages, when it charged that the jury would allow, as damages, what the defendant Jarman had paid to Long, who held the equity of redemption. This was not the correct rule. Where a covenantee buys in an outstanding paramount title, the measure of damages, in an action for breach of the covenant of seizin in his deed, is the reasonable price which he has fairly and necessarily paid for such title, not to exceed the original consideration paid by him. 11 Cyc. p. 1162; Price v. Deal, 90 N. C. 290; Wiggins v. Pender, 132 N. C. 640, 44 S. E. 362, 61 L. R. A. 772; Bank v. Glenn, 68 N. C. 35. The usual recovery for breach of a covenant of seizin, or for one of right to convey, is the purchase money paid by the covenantor, and interest thereon; but, where the vendee is induced to purchase by the fraudulent representations of the vendor as to his title, he may, upon eviction by a better title, recover of his vendor all the damages naturally resulting from the fraud, although the land was conveyed by deed with warranty. The action in such case is upon the fraud, not upon the covenants of the deed, and the rule of damages for breach of the covenant does not apply. 11 Cyc. 1163. The court applied the latter rule, where there is fraud, to the breach of an ordinary covenant of seizin, and then directed the jury to assess the damages at the amount paid by Jarman, which, of course, meant that this should be done whether it was, or not, a reasonable amount, which was fairly and honestly paid. If this were the rule, a covenantee might pay a very exorbitant price for the incumbrance or paramount title, and recover the full amount from his covenantor, without regard to the question whether he exercised prudence in making the purchase, or whether he could have acquired the title for a less sum. There is no finding here as to whether the price paid by Jarman to Long for the equity of redemption was excessive or moderate. There is evidence that it is far beyond what should have been paid, but only evidence; the plaintiff, Barden, having testified that Long had offered to take $100 for his equity, and sign the Jarman deed. There is also other testimony that goes to show a lower value of the equity than $800.

[5, 6] Reverting to the nature of these covenants, as bearing upon the damages for a breach, we find it to be generally settled that a plaintiff cannot recover, in an action for a breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment, without showing an eviction from the possession under a paramount title, and the measure of damages in such cases is the price paid for the land, with interest. Williams v. Beeman, 13 N. C. 483. But in an action upon a covenant of seizin, all the plaintiff need show is that defendant had no title or no right to convey. Wilson v. Forbes, 13 N. C. 30; Rawle, Covenants for Title, 66; Brandt v. Foster, 5 Iowa, 287. The reason of the distinction is that a covenant for quiet enjoyment is a covenant for possession, and that of seizin is a covenant for title; the word being used as synonymous with "right." In an action upon the former covenant, an eviction must be alleged in the complaint or declaration, but in an action on the latter, it is only necessary to negative the words of the covenant and to allege that the grantor had no seizin or title to the land. 4 Kent, Com. 479; Rickert v. Snyder, 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 416. And, as a general rule, the measure of damages (purchase money and interest) is the same for a breach of covenant of seizin as for a breach of covenant of quiet enjoyment. Wilson v. Forbes, supra. This rule of damages is applicable to those cases where there is an eviction from the whole of the land conveyed, or a want of title to the same. But where there is an eviction from a want of title to only part of the land conveyed, and the plaintiff has been put to the necessity, as in this case, of advancing money to remove an incumbrance, the measure of damages is more difficult to be fixed. With reference to the last statement, it was said in Price v. Deal, 90 N. C. at page 295:

"We think his honor very properly refused to give the instructions asked for by the defendant, upon the question of damages, but we are also of the opinion that there was misdirection in the instruction which he did give to the jury. It is well settled that a party who purchases land with covenants for seizin or quiet enjoyment may protect himself by buying in the outstanding title. Faucett v. Woods, 5 Iowa, 400. When that is done the measure of damages, according to the best lights we have been able to obtain on the point, is that the damages in such a case would be limited to, or measured by, not the value of the land, but by the amount reasonably paid for that purpose, provided it did not exceed the purchase money"—citing Faucett v. Woods, supra; Brandt v. Foster, 5 Iowa, 287; Wood's Mayne on Damages, § 255; Bank v. Glenn, supra.

See, also, 7 Ruling Case Law, p. 1176; Pate v. Mitchell, 23 Ark. 590, 79 Am. Dec. 114; 11 Cyc. 1165, and the numerous cases in note 47.

The defendant relies on Lane v. Richardson, 104 N. C. at page 650, 10 S. E. 189, but the case is distinguishable, for there the court was speaking of judgments as incumbrances, and not of a defect in the title to the fee. The amount of a judgment, mortgage, or other lien is easily ascertained, and, the amount being a certain one, it necessarily fixes the measure of the recovery.

[7] The covenant of seizin is broken when the deed is delivered, as it implies that the covenantor then had, not only the possession, but the right of possession and the right of property. This is the primary meaning of seizin; its secondary meaning is possession alone. 5 Modern Am. Law, § 593. It is a covenant of title in this state, and not merely one of possession, and is synonymous with the covenant of right to convey (Id. § 595), which also is broken, as soon as made.

The plaintiff Barden offered evidence to the effect that the defendant Jarman had undertaken to make an independent investigation of the title before he purchased, and that he did so, and he concludes, therefore, that he acted upon his own investigation, or information therefrom or from his attorney who made it, and not upon the representations of Barden. He claims that, because of this, he is discharged from blame, and cites, in support of this position, 12 R. C. L. § 111, p. 357, and also Shappiro v. Goldberg, 192 U. S. 232, at page 241, 24 Sup. Ct. 259, at page 261 (48 L. Ed. 419), where it is said by Justice Day:

"There are cases where misrepresentations are made which deceive the purchaser, in which it is no defense to say that, had the plaintiff declined to believe the representations and investigated for himself, he would not have been deceived. Mead v. Bunn, 32 N. Y. 275. But such cases are to be distinguished from the one under consideration. When the means of knowledge are open and at hand or furnished to the purchaser or his agent and no effort is made to prevent the party from using them, and especially where the purchaser undertakes examination for himself, he will not be heard to say that he has been deceived to his injury by the misrepresentations of the vendor"—citing Slaughter v. Gerson, 13 Wall. 379, 20 L. Ed. 627, So. Dev. Co. v. Silva, 125 U. S. 247, 8 Sup. Ct. 881, 31 L. Ed. 678, and other cases decided by the same court.

But whether this principle applies to this case will depend upon the facts regarding the investigation and other relevant matters, as they are developed at the trial, and plaintiff can raise the question by a prayer for instructions on the second issue, or, perhaps, more specifically and in another way, by asking for an issue presenting the precise matter, when it is properly pleaded.

Plaintiff Barden also contended that there had been a settlement between him and the defendant Jarman of their differences in regard to the fraud and breach of the covenant, the latter accepting the notes and mortgage, which were duly transferred to him, as a full accord and satisfaction. If there has been a settlement between the parties, it may be pleaded, and a corresponding issue submitted, so that the jury may determine the question under proper instructions.

to the contract), and such representations are false within the knowledge of the party making them, and they cause loss and damage to the party relying on them, and he has acted with ordinary prudence in the matter, he is entitled to relief in any court of justice. Walsh v. Hall, supra. In that case, Justice Dick, after referring to those principles, says:

"No specific rule can be laid down as to what false representations will constitute fraud, as this depends upon the particular facts which have occurred in each case, the relative situation of the parties, and their means of information. Examples are given in the books which have established some general principles which will apply to most cases that may arise. If the falsehood of the misrepresentations is patent and a party accepts and acts upon it with 'his eyes open,' he has no right to complain. If the parties have equal means of information, the rule of caveat emptor applies, and an injured party cannot have redress, if he fail to avail himself of the sources of information which he may readily reach, unless he has been prevented from making proper inquiry by some artifice or contrivance of the other party. Where the false representation is a mere expression of commendation, or is simply a matter of opinion, the parties stand upon equal footing, and the courts will not interfere to correct errors of judgment. Where a matter which forms a material inducement is peculiarly within the knowledge of one of the parties, and he makes a false representation as to that fact, and the other party, having no reason to suspect fraud, acts upon such statement and suffers damage and loss, he is entitled to relief. Whenever fraud and damage go together, the courts will give a remedy to the injured party." Broom, Leg. Maxims, 739; Adams, Equity, 176; Story's Eq. Jur. c. 6; Atwood v. Small, 6 Ck. and Fin. 232; Chitty on Contracts, 681; Broom's Com. on the Common Law, 347.

For the reasons assigned, there must be a new trial of all the issues.

LITTLE v. FLEISHMAN et al. (No. 259.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Jan. 3, 1919.)

1. RECEIVERS §67—PROPERTY VESTING IN RECEIVER.

Where a failing corporation had sold and delivered its stock and good will for benefit of creditors, and receiver for it was thereafter appointed, title to stock having passed to buyers, receiver had no right to take possession, but could only sue for price.

2. RECEIVERS §104—GOODS SOLD BY INSOLVENT—ACTION FOR PRICE.

Where failing corporation sold stock of goods for benefit of creditors, and thereafter receiver was appointed, who innocently seized and sold goods, though title had passed to buyers, the receiver could not recover from buyers price of goods or any part of it; the seizure and sale having worked failure of consideration.

3. SALES §201(7)—PASSING OF TITLE.

Where failing corporation sold stock of goods and good will for benefit of creditors, title passed by delivery of the goods to buyers in seller's store, and by buyers' placing servant in charge, price being fixed, and parties having gone to another city to pay money to seller's creditors.

4. RECEIVERS §104 — WRONGFUL ACTS OF RECEIVER—DEFENSES.

Where receiver of failing corporation, which had sold its stock for benefit of creditors, wrongfully seized goods from possession of buyers, to whom title had passed, tender back to buyers could go only in mitigation of damages.

5. RECEIVERS §132—AUTHORITY — WAIVER OF BULK SALES—STATUTE.

Under Revisal 1906, § 964a (Bulk Sales Statute), receiver of failing corporation, which had contracted to sell its stock of goods and good will for creditors, could not waive compliance with statute and pass good title as against creditors, where buyers refused to comply with contract, and before receiver was authorized to tender goods all creditors had not waived objection, and conditions of statute had not been met.

6. RECEIVERS §104 — WRONGFUL ACTS OF RECEIVER—SEIZURE OF GOODS SOLD BY INSOLVENT—"GOOD WILL."

Where failing corporation sold stock of goods and good will, and thereafter receiver was appointed at suit of creditors, who seized the goods, the receivership and seizure thus impairing or destroying "good will," the probability that former customers would resort to the old stand, buyers had right to refuse tender by receiver.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Good Will.]

7. RECEIVERS §104 — WRONGFUL ACTS — SEIZURE OF GOODS SOLD — RETENTION OF LEASE.

Where failing corporation sold stock of goods and good will for creditors, and receiver was thereafter appointed, who seized the goods in possession of buyers, so that they rightfully rescinded, receiver cannot complain of retention of his corporation's lease by the buyers, it having been transferred to them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Calvert, Judge.

Action by J. C. Little, receiver, against Benjamin Fleishman and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The action was brought by the plaintiff, as receiver of the Raleigh Department Store, Inc. (hereinafter called the Store), to recover of the defendants the sum of $2,621.56, which he alleges to be due to him as receiver, it being the difference between the net proceeds of the sale of a stock of goods sold by him officially, viz. $7,427.10, and the price of the stock which, as he alleges, the defendant agreed to pay the Store for the same.

The defendants denied the liability, and averred that the contract of sale had not been completed; that the stock of goods were sold in bulk by the Store, and the provisions of Revisal, § 964a, were not complied with; that the creditors, by their own unauthorized and illegal action, defeated the consummation of the contract by taking the goods from the possession of the defendants' servant, who had been placed in charge by them; that while the parties, that is, the defendants and the Store, were engaged in closing up the contract, and before the purchase price had been paid, plaintiff, at the instance and request of some of the creditors, was appointed receiver, in an action commenced by them in the superior court of Wake county, and took the goods from the possession of defendants' caretaker, afterwards selling the same for a greatly reduced price at public auction. Defendants claimed that not only were the goods contracted to be sold to them, but also the good will of the Department Store, which at the time was a going concern, although somewhat embarrassed financially; that by the plaintiff's action, as above described, the main purpose of the parties in making the contract of sale was altogether frustrated, and the contract became valueless to the defendants, the consideration upon which it was based having utterly failed.

Plaintiff contended that he took possession of the goods for the purpose of tendering them to the defendants, in furtherance of a due execution of the contract, intending that, upon payment of the price by the defendants, to wit, $10,308.68, to deliver the goods to them, and that afterwards, on the 11th or 12th of September, 1918, the court made an order to that effect. The price, by agreement of the parties to the contract, was to be paid in the city of Baltimore, and, while in that city for the purpose of arranging some matters with a view to the payment of the money, the suit was brought in Raleigh, and the receiver appointed; whereupon the defendants, as soon as notified of the receivership, renounced the trade, and refused to proceed further with the contract and rescinded the same. This was done on September 4, 1918, and it was afterwards, on September 11, 1918, that the court, by its order, appointed plaintiff permanent receiver, and directed him to tender the goods to the defendants. Plaintiff, as temporary receiver, had on August 31, 1918, been given "authority to take possession of the property, assets, and effects of the Raleigh Department Store, Inc., and hold the same subject to the further order of the court," and plaintiff, on September 1, 1918, qualified as receiver, and took possession of the goods, as before stated.

The parties waived a jury trial, and consented that the judge should find the facts which was done, the findings being mainly in favor of the defendants, and the judgment being rendered, upon the facts, for them. Other facts will be found in the opinion of the court. Plaintiff appealed.

J. H. Pou and John W. Hinsdale, both of Raleigh, for appellant.

R. W. Winston and J. Crawford Biggs, both of Raleigh, and Baldwin & Sappington, of Baltimore, Md., for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The goods were delivered to the defendants at Raleigh, where the business of the Raleigh Department Store had been conducted, and remained in the store under the care of a servant of the defendants. The plaintiff contends, in two of its assignments of error and in its brief, that the title thereby passed to the defendants. If this be so, the receiver had no right to take possession of the goods, nor did the court have any power to make the order requiring him to do so. If the title was in defendants, even the plaintiff, acting as receiver and under an order of the court in a suit to which defendants were not parties could not seize the goods. He could not do so for the purpose of tendering them to the defendants under the contract of sale, because he could not tender defendants' own goods to them; and besides, when he seized the goods, no order of the court requiring a tender to be made had been granted. It may further be said that no tender was necessary, as the goods were already in the possession of defendants, and the defendants, as we have stated, contended that the title had thereby vested in them. The only remedy of the receiver was to demand payment of the price, and, if the demand was refused, to sue for its recovery. It was a very simple remedy, as the defendants were not only perfectly solvent, but, to use plaintiff's own description of their financial rating, as set forth in his brief, they were, as a firm, a "strong, wealthy, and successful concern."

erty to be wrongfully taken, would not permit its receiver to recover the price of the goods, or any part of it, in a case like this, because, by seizing and selling them, it has destroyed the subject-matter of the contract, and worked a failure of the consideration upon which the promise to pay the price of the goods was based. It would be unjust and inequitable to permit a recovery under such circumstances. The property was taken innocently, as no wrong was intended, but in a legal sense it did not affect the defendants' right to it, though they lost the possession.

[3,4] Excluding from consideration, at present, the bulk sales law, and its effect upon this contract, we are disposed to agree with the plaintiff's contention, as stated in his brief, that the title did pass by the delivery of the goods to the defendants in the store at Raleigh, and their exercise of the right of ownership by placing their servant in charge of them, the price being fixed, and the parties having gone to Baltimore for the purpose of paying the money there to the creditors of the Department Store. Phifer v. Erwin, 100 N. C. 69, 6 S. E. 672; Wittkowsky v. Wasson, 71 N. C. 451; McArthur v. Mathis, 133 N. C. 143, 45 S. E. 530; Foley v. Mason, 6 Md. 37; Leedom v. Phillips, 1 Yeates (Pa.) 527. There was nothing to be done by the buyer or seller, as a condition precedent or concurrent, upon which the passing of the property in the goods depended. When there is such a condition, and it is unperformed, the title, of course, will not pass, even though the goods may have been left in the possession of the buyer; and this is according to the third rule of Mr. Benjamin in his Treatise on Sales, 318, as explained in Hughes v. Knott, 138 N. C. at page 110, 50 S. E. 536. The buyers had the goods and were ready to pay the price. This but exhibits more clearly the mistake in seizing the goods which belonged to the defendants, and which the receiver had no right to take and the court no power to order them into his possession. His plain and only remedy was to sue for the price, and in doing so he perhaps might have attached the goods, as defendants were nonresidents; but this he did not do, and one cannot gain possession of property belonging to another than the debtor, and apply it or its proceeds to the satisfaction of a debt due by the latter, who was the former owner; there being no fraud alleged or shown in the passage of the title. Smith v. Young, 109 N. C. 224, 13 S. E. 735. It may also be said that by seizing the goods he left the matter open to the defendants to accept it, if so minded, as an act of rescission, and the defendants did so treat it by refusing to complete the execution of the contract. It can make no difference what plaintiff's motive was in seizing the property of the defendants, for his motive, however good or commendable, cannot change the legal quality of his act. Under certain circumstances not now presented, it could affect only the damages (38 Cyc. 1002 and 1003), and the tender of the goods likewise could only go in mitigation of damages, if there was a legal tender at all (Ward v. Moffitt, 38 Mo. App. 395).

[5-7] We will now consider the case upon the assumption that there was no vesting of the title to the goods in the defendants, but that the contract had not passed out of its executory stage, as the parties have dealt with it on this assumption in their briefs and the argument before us, and have devoted a large part of their attention and discussion to that feature of the case. The judge finds as facts that while the defendants were in Baltimore preparing to pay the price of the goods, for the purpose of its distribution among creditors, the receiver was appointed and took possession of them, without any notice to the defendants, and the latter did not acquire any knowledge of it, nor were they in any way notified of the receivership until September 4, 1918, when they at once repudiated the contract and refused longer to be bound by it. He also finds that what was done tended to discredit the business of a going concern, and would give to the property the reputation of a bankrupt stock of goods, and impair the good will and diminish the value of the stock as one to be thereafter sold in the retail trade, which was the understanding and purpose of the parties in making the contract; that is, that the goods were bought from a going concern to be sold by defendants, in continuation of the business at the same stand, as an active, solvent concern, with the advantage of the good will of the seller. The tender of the goods was not made, or ordered to be made, until several days after the defendants had repudiated the contract; and it also appears that the "bulk sales" statute, before cited, was not complied with, though plaintiff contends that a receiver could waive compliance with the statute and pass a good title, as against creditors, to the defendants. We are of the opinion that he could not, as at the time the defendants refused to comply with the contract, and before the plaintiff was authorized to tender the goods, all of the creditors had not waived objection to the sale, and the conditions set forth in the statute had not been performed. The judge expressly finds as a fact that before the appointment of plaintiff as temporary receiver no creditor had consented to the sale to defendants except the Baltimore Bargain House, and after he was appointed there was no objection to the sale except by two as to the payment of the price in Baltimore instead of in Raleigh. This is not what the law required. The finding means, at most, that there was merely an undisclosed purpose not to disapprove, and no formal and express waiver of objection, as there should have been. Revival, § 964a, declares that a bulk stock sale shall be prima facie fraudulent and void, unless certain things are done by the seller, and these conditions precedent confessedly were not complied with, as we have said.

 The buyers were not required to rely upon the unexpressed intentions of the creditors, but were entitled to a positive waiver of these requirements, one upon which defendants could safely rely, if that would have been sufficient. But the plaintiff contends that the statute does not apply to receivers.
 That part of it reads:

"Nothing herein shall prevent voluntary assignments or deeds of trust for the benefit of creditors as now allowed by law, or apply to sales by executors, administrators, receivers or assignees under voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors, trustees in bankruptcy, or by any public officers under judicial process."
(Italics ours.)

It is manifest that the exceptions named in the section are restricted to sales made by those persons or officers. This sale was not made by the plaintiff, but by the Department Store, before he was ever appointed, and is not exempted by that clause. The sale could then have been avoided by any one creditor, and therefore it was not, at the time the defendants repudiated it, a valid contract, or such a one as required them to accept a tender of the goods or to pay the price. Besides, at the time of the tender, the value of the goods and the good will,
 which clearly passed, and was clearly intended by the parties to pass, by the transactions, to the defendant, were so impaired —and by the conduct of the creditors in bringing suit, having a receiver appointed and seizing the goods—that, even if otherwise bound by the contract, the defendants had a right to refuse the tender and performance of the contract. 6 R. C. L. §§ 380, 381; 13 Corpus Juris, §§ 721, 724, 733; 9 Cyc.
 631; Clark on Contracts (2d Ed.) pp. 474, 475, 476, 479. The court finds that "the good will of the going concern was a valuable asset, and a material inducement to and consideration of the contract." Plaintiff insists that the destruction must be of all or a material part of the property, and that depreciation must be substantial, in order to give the purchaser the right to rescind.
 We think this was the case, even regardless of the special findings. Our common sense, observation, and experience teach us that much. It does not require technical knowledge or skill for that purpose. The conduct of the creditors, acting through the court and the receiver, was bound to seriously impair the benefits to be derived from the contract, including the good will, and was well calculated to entirely defeat its object and purpose, as understood by the parties. As to the "good will," which evidently passed, as it was a general sale of the Store's assets, we may accept plaintiff's definition of it, as being "the probability that former customers will resort to the old stand," and we still think it was a thing of value. Bloom v. Home Ins.

 Agency, 91 Ark. 367, 121 S. W. 293, cited by plaintiff. But the latter's counsel contended that impairment of the good will was not sufficient ground for a rescission of the contract or its nonperformance. Granting this to be true, for the sake of argument, the virtual destruction of the good will and the property, by its complete and wrongful appropriation, must surely be sufficient. Again, we say that the plaintiff pursued the wrong course, for which the defendants are not responsible and should not be made to suffer. The creditors, through the plaintiff, will not be heard to assert that the good will was of no value when it was their own fault that it was rendered valueless. If they had not interfered, and prevented a complete execution of the contract, it would have been of value to defendants in the further prosecution of the business of the Store, which was a going concern, at the old stand. Everything that the plaintiff claims that defendants should have done, or should have proved, was prevented from being done, or being proved, by the creditors' own fault. That no man should be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong is not only a principle of the common law, but a maxim of general jurisprudence, which is well recognized and established. It is based on elementary principles, and is applied both in courts of law and of equity, the reasonableness and necessity of the rule being manifest. It is of such general application that it admits of illustration from every branch of legal procedure, and is one of the basic principles which govern this case. Broom's Legal Maxims (6th Am. Ed.) p. 212, star p. 275, and cases. It applies even though the actual wrong was unconsciously committed, which we have no doubt was the case here.

We need not discuss the point as to the retention of the lease by the defendants.
 The Department Store is well rid of it. It would have been a burden and incumbrance if it had kept it, and there is not the slightest prospect of its ever needing it. As we have said, it is a recognized principle in the law that a party cannot take any advantage from his own wrong. The creditors, by the receiver, have brought this unfortunate situation upon themselves, and must abide the consequences. If they had sought the remedy in an action for the price, defendants being fully solvent according to their own estimate of them, there would have been no ground of complaint. They have the stock of goods, and have lost the good will, and the lease, if of any tangible value, by their own act, and by no fault of plaintiffs, who are not parties to the other action.

We have not yet understood why a tender was at all necessary, as the goods were already in the possession of the defendants. Why take them out of their possession in order to put them back again? The more clearly the facts of this case are revealed to us, the more apparent it seems that the only remedy of the plaintiff, and, too, an effective one, was by a simple action to recover the price of the goods. If this had been brought, there would have been no confusion, difficulty, or delay, as defendants, it now appears, were willing to pay in Raleigh, though we do not think they were legally required to pay the price there. If some of the creditors wanted it paid in Raleigh, why could not the seller and buyer agree, just as well, for their convenience, or for any other good reason they had, that it should be paid in Baltimore? We perceive no practical difference it would make if it were paid in one place rather than the other. Proper provision, it seems, had been made for its distribution by a solvent concern and with adequate protection to the rights of the creditors.

Our decision upon these, the material questions in the case, renders it unnecessary to consider the remaining and very numerous exceptions. We think, though, that, as the stock of goods was sold to the defendants much below cost, and by the receiver nearly $3,000 less than the defendants gave for it, it was some evidence of a loss in value, and even of a great depreciation.

The rulings, and final decision, of the court were in all respects correct.

DAWSON v. WOOD. (No. 220.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 5, 1919.)

1. REMAINDERS ⚡16 — CONTINGENT REMAINDERS—SALE OF PROPERTY—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTE.

Laws 1903, c. 99 (Pell's Revisal 1906, § 1590), as amended by Laws 1905, c. 548, and Acts 1907, cc. 956, 980, providing that property in which there is a vested interest, with contingent remainder over to persons not in being, or to others only upon happening of contingency, may be sold and proceeds reinvested by order of court after action in which service is obtained upon such contingent remaindermen by appointment of guardian ad litem to represent them, held constitutional; the fund being impressed with contingencies and limitations imposed on original property.

2. JUDGMENT ⚡719 — CONCLUSIVENESS — MATTERS INVOLVED IN ISSUES.

An adversary judgment will usually conclude the parties as to all matters involved in the issue as stated and defined in the pleadings.

3. JUDGMENT ⚡747(½) — CONCLUSIVENESS — INTEREST IN PROPERTY.

Judgment adjudging plaintiff's interest in property as that of a life tenant was conclusive as to plaintiff's interest in such property in her subsequent action for sale of the property.

4. JUDGMENT ⚡747(½) — CONCLUSIVENESS — SALE OF PROPERTY.

Judgment, denying order of sale of property in life tenant's action therefor in which sale was opposed by defendants required to be made parties, and where property was valued at from $15,000 to $18,000, did not preclude sale in subsequent action, where there was no opposition and a responsible bid of $33,000 made for the property.

5. LIFE ESTATES ⚡27(1) — SALE OF PROPERTY—DESIRABILITY OF SALE.

Where property valued at $33,000 was inadequately improved, was situated in progressive business town with ever-increasing taxes and assessments against it, and yielded return of only $200 per year, court properly decreed sale in life tenant's action therefor under Revisal 1905, § 1590.

6. LIFE ESTATES ⚡27(1) — SALE OF PROPERTY—STATUTE.

Revisal 1905, § 1590, providing for sale of property in which there is a vested estate with contingent remainder "if the interest of all parties would be materially enhanced by it," does not require life tenant to acquiesce and suffer under such condition, where the entire income is absorbed by current costs and charges and for the benefit of contingent remaindermen alone, but question should be considered and determined with some sense of proportion, and in fair and reasonable adjustment of all parties interested.

7. LIFE ESTATES ⚡27(3) — SALE OF PROPERTY—PURCHASER—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER.

Where property is sold by order of court in life tenant's action therefor under Revisal 1905, § 1590, purchaser's title is not affected by provisions of decree as to apportionment of interest on proceeds.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Allen, Judge.

Controversy without action by John G. Dawson, commissioner, against D. E. Wood. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Plaintiff, under a decree of the court, in a cause duly constituted, of Laura A. Miller et al. v. Julia B. Faulkner et al., and as commissioner in the cause, having contracted to sell the land, the subject-matter of said suit, to defendant, D. E. Wood, at the price of $33,000, and the payment of certain assessments for paying, etc., which said sale was fully approved, etc., the said purchaser, on demand made, declines to take the property or comply with the terms of the bargain, claiming that the commissioner is not in a position to make a valid title. On the case presented, the court, being of opinion that the title offered was a good one, entered judgment for recovery of purchase price and the delivery of the deed on payment of same or compliance with the terms of the decree. From this judgment, the defendant appealed.

Rouse & Rouse, of Kinston, for appellant.
Dawson, Manning & Wallace, of Kinston, for appellee.

HOKE, J. From the facts properly presented it appears:

That the real estate in question belonged to one Richard F. Green, who has died, making disposition of the same by his last will and testament, as follows:

"Item IV. I give and bequeath to my wife, Eliza B. Green, my house and lot in the town of Kinston, N. C., in which I now reside, to go with all my household and kitchen furniture and all other improvements thereto belonging, to have and to hold during her natural life and, at her death, to go to my daughter, Laura A. Green, to have and to hold during her natural life and, at her death, to her nearest blood relative."

(2) That the wife, Eliza B. Green, is dead, and Laura A. Miller, having married, is the Laura A. Green referred to in the aforesaid devise, and that Julia B. Faulkner and Laura A. Harding were, at the time of the proceedings instituted, under which the present sale was had, and are now, the nearest of kin of said Laura A. Miller, and the former has six children now living, one of whom is a minor, and the latter also has now living children and grandchildren, resident and nonresident, and most of whom are minors.

(3) That the present life tenant, Laura A. Miller, in May, 1918, instituted an action to sell said property for reinvestment, under section 1590 of the Revisal, making the present nearest blood relations, Julia B. Faulkner and Laura A. Harding, parties defendant, and, in same proceedings, it was made to appear, by averment and otherwise, that this was a desirable, valuable lot in the business section of Kinston, N. C., subject to the taxes and assessments usually imposed on such property. "That the lot yields very little income, and is burdensome. That the buildings situated upon it are very old, have become in a bad and dilapidated condition, which are yearly growing worse, to the end that the said structures will soon be valueless, and are, in fact, at this time in a damaging condition, and the income yielded by the said property does not exceed $200 per year. That on account of the condition of the title to the said lot of land as above set forth, no one feels justified in improving the structures situated upon said land, which consist only of a dwelling house and a small outhouse, nor do they feel justified in placing new buildings upon the said lot of land, to the end that the revenue from the said lot may be increased, for the reason that if any one should make expenditures in the improvement of the said lot it might, by reason of the condition of the said title, result in a loss to them of any amount which they might expend," and praying for a sale of same for reinvestment, provided as much as $30,000 could be obtained therefor, with a cash payment thereon of $5,000.

The next of kin having accepted service did not answer the averments of the petition showing the necessity of sale, and made no resistance to the application. It was thereupon adjudged that J. G. Dawson, as commissioner in the cause, make inquiry as to the value, and obtain and submit bids for the property considered adequate and desirable; and it was furthermore adjudged, after due inquiry: That Y. T. Ormond be, and he was, appointed guardian ad litem in said action, "to represent in same, as contemplated by law, any persons under disabilities and any person not now in being or whose names and residences are not known, or who may, in any contingency, become interested in said land"; and, summons having been duly issued, said guardian voluntarily appeared in the cause, waiving service, etc., and accepting appointment as such guardian. That, at the January term, 1919, of superior court of Lenoir county, the said commissioner made his report, submitting that, after full advertisement and due inquiry, the present defendant, D. E. Wood, had bid for the property $33,000, of which $15,000 was to be paid in cash and the remainder with bond payable on or before 10 years, with interest and properly secured. The bid and security offered was set forth in the report, and the said bidder also agreed to pay eight-tenths of the amounts now due for paying assessments against the property aggregating $750.65. The commissioner further reported that the price offered was the reasonable worth of the land, that it was the best price possible to obtain for it, and that the interest of all the parties would be materially enhanced by a sale at the amount stated, and recommended that the sale be made on the terms proposed. And the guardian ad litem, appointed after due inquiry, answered under oath, and admitted that the price offered was fair and reasonable worth of the property; "that the interest of all the parties on said proceedings required that the land should be sold, and same would be greatly enhanced in value by the sale to D. E. Wood at the price and on the terms stipulated." It was further made to appear that heretofore, in 1913, this present plaintiff had instituted an action against the defendants, Julia B. Faulkner and Laura A. Harding, then and now the nearest of kin, seeking a sale of this property on allegation that she was absolute owner in fee under the terms of her father's will, and, if otherwise, asking for a sale for reinvestment under the statute. In that case, entitled Miller v. Harding, reported in 167 N. C. 53, 83 S. E. 25, there was judgment holding that plaintiff had only a life estate in the property, and that the right to a present sale had not been shown. In this jurisdiction and on the facts thus presented, the courts have not had the inherent power to decree a sale of property and pass a valid title to the purchaser, the remainder here being limited on a contingency that would prevent the ascertainment of the ultimate takers or any of them till the death of the life tenant. Hodges v. Lipscombe, 128 N. C. 57, 38 S. E. 281; Aydlett v. Pendleton, 111 N. C. 28, 16 S. E. 8, 32 Am. St. Rep. 776; Williams v. Hassell, 74 N. C. 434; Watson v. Watson, 56 N. C. 401. In other states, and generally, the power in question has been more broadly exercised. See Bolfl v. Fisher, 3 Rich. Eq. p. 1; Baylor's Lessee v. Dejarquette, 54 Va. (13 Grat.) 152; Ruggles v. Tyson, 104 Wis. 500, 79 N. W. 766, 81 N. W. 367, 48 L. R. A. 809, and like cases. And to remove the restrictions prevailing under our decisions and with a view of unfettering these estates to the end that the property might be more profitably employed, the General Assembly of 1903 (chapter 99; Pell's Revisal, § 1590) passed a statute conferring on the courts the power to order a sale and transfer of the title in all cases where there was "a vested interest in real estate and a contingent remainder over to persons who are not in being, or when the contingency has not yet happened which shall determine who the remaindermen are." That the proceedings could be instituted by any person having a vested interest in the land and all persons in esse who are interested shall be made parties defendant and served with a summons and "where the remainder will or may go to minors or persons under disabilities or to persons not in being and whose names and residences are not known and who may, in any contingency, become interested in said land but because of such contingency cannot be ascertained, the judge of the superior court shall, after due inquiry of persons who are in no way interested in or connected with the proceedings, appoint some discreet person as guardian ad litem to represent such remaindermen upon whom summons shall be served as provided by law for other guardians ad litem and it shall be the duty of such guardians to defend such actions, and when counsel is needed, to make this known to the judge, who shall by order give instructions as to the employment of counsel and the payment of his fees and the court shall, if the interest of all parties require or would be materially enhanced by it, order a sale of such property or any part thereof for reinvestment, either in purchasing or improving the real estate, less expense, etc., and such newly acquired or improved real estate shall be held upon the same contingencies and in like manner as the property ordered to be sold and the court may authorize the loaning of such money, subject to its approval until such time when it can be invested in real estate."

In Laws 1905, c. 548, this reinvestment in realty was required to be within 2 years, but such requirement was removed by the later Acts of 1907, cc. 956, 980, leaving the matter of reinvestment somewhat in the discretion of the court, but with clear intimation that the fund should be reinvested in realty when an advantageous opportunity should be offered.

[1] Construing the statute as amended in the carefully considered case of Hodges v. Lipscombe, 133 N. C. 199, 45 S. E. 556, the court held that it was only necessary to make parties defendant those of the contingent remaindermen who, on the happening of the contingency, would presently have an estate in the property at the time of action commenced, and, as to others more remotely interested, they could properly have their interest represented and protected by a guardian ad litem as the statute provides. It will be noted that the statute does not, either in its terms or purpose, profess or undertake to destroy the interest of the contingent remaindermen in the property, but only contemplates and provides for a change of investment and subject to the right to use a reasonable portion of the amount for the improvement of remainder, a case presented in Smith v. Miller, 151 N. C. 620, 66 S. E. 671, and approved when properly safeguarded, it impresses upon the fund the same contingencies and limitations as were imposed upon the original property. This being true and a reasonable provision being made for protecting the interest of the unascertained or more remote remaindermen by a guardian ad litem, carefully selected and duly notified, the statute is undoubtedly a constitutional enactment, and has been approved in this and other respects by numbers of decisions dealing directly with the subject. Pendleton v. Williams, 175 N. C. 248, 95 S. E. 500; Smith v. Witter, 174 N. C. 616, 94 S. E. 402; Smith v. Miller, 151 N. C. 620, 66 S. E. 671; Hodges v. Lipscombe, 133 N. C. 199, 45 S. E. 556; Springs v. Scott, 132 N. C. 548, 44 S. E. 116.

In Springs v. Scott and Smith v. Miller, supra, the constitutionality of the statute was directly and fully considered, and in Pendleton v. Williams, speaking to this and other features of the act, the court said:

"It is very generally recognized that statutes of this kind, being no interference with the essential rights of ownership, but operating rather in addition to those already possessed by the owners of such estates, are well within the legislative powers [citing Lawson's Rights and Remedies, § 3867], and the act we are presently considering has been repeatedly approved and applied by decisions of this court, the law being construed to authorize a sale of the property or the portion of it affected by the contingent interest, and not a sale of the contingent interest separately"—citing Smith v. Witter, 174 N. C. 616, 94 S. E. 402; Anderson v. Wilkins, 142 N. C. 154, 55 S. E. 272, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1145; Springs v. Scott, supra, and other cases.

Under these authoritative interpretations and on perusal of the record in which this decree of sale was had, it will appear that the petitioner's case comes clearly within the statutory provisions. The methods required have been carefully pursued, the interest of the contingent remaindermen properly safeguarded, an advantageous sale has been effected, and we must concur in the view of his honor below that the present plaintiff, as commissioner, is in a position to offer a good title, and the contract of the purchaser must be complied with.

This being virtually an independent action by the commissioner to collect the purchase money, there is doubt if any of the objections urged against the validity of the sale are available to defendant while the decree in the principal suit remains unchallenged, either by appeal or motion in the cause. There seems to be nothing jurisdictional in these objections, but, if the contrary be conceded, we are of opinion that none of them can be sustained. It was chiefly urged that the petitioner in the principal proceedings is barred of his right to a sale for reinvestment by reason of a judgment denying such right in a former suit instituted by her for the same purpose in 1913 and reported in Miller v. Harding, 167 N. C. 53, 83 S. E. 25.

[2-4] It is undoubtedly the accepted principle here and elsewhere that an adversary judgment will usually conclude the parties as to all matters involved in the issue as stated and defined in the pleadings. Holloway v. Dunham, 176 N. C. 550-552, 97 S. E. 486, and authorities cited, but an examination of the former case will show that the matters there in issue were: First, whether the petitioner was the owner, as she claimed, of an absolute fee simple in the property; and second, whether, under the facts and conditions as alleged and then existent, a present sale was expedient and for the best interest of all the parties concerned, a comparison of the two cases will disclose that, while the quantity of the petitioner's estate, being a question fixed in its nature, was there finally determined against her, on the second, a variable question, as to the expediency of the sale, there are such pronounced differences in the conditions presented that the judgment in the first case could in no sense be considered an estoppel of record in the second. In the former, the proposition was to have a sale at public auction without further inquiry, and at a suggested value of $15,000 to $18,000, with the persons required to be made parties by the statute in active resistance to the measure, while in the instant case, on careful inquiry, an adequate and responsible bill of $33,000 is presented for consideration, together with relief from $700 or $800 of accumulated assessments, and with the proposed measure fully acquiesced in by all persons who are proper parties under the statute and recommended by reliable officials of the court who had the matter in special charge. On the case as now presented and the question of expediency, we must hold, as stated, that the former judgment denying a sale is no bar to such a decree in the present suit. It is further insisted that the decree should not be upheld for the reason that no proper inquiry has been shown as to the necessity and expediency of the present sale. As we have heretofore stated, we incline to the opinion that such an objection is not available in a suit for the purchase money, but, in any event, it is not open to defendant on the facts of this record, and we are clearly of opinion that full and adequate inquiry has been shown, it appearing that, before decree made, a conscientious, capable, and diligent commissioner, both by public advertisement and personal effort, has made painstaking inquiry into the facts, and has succeeded in presenting to the court a bid of $33,000, $15,000 of which is in cash and the remainder sufficiently secured; that the desirability of the sale at such a price is admitted by the parties of record, including a disinterested and intelligent guardian ad litem, appointed and acting in the interest of the contingent remaindermen.

[5-7] As a matter of fact, with property of this value inadequately improved in a progressive business town with ever-increasing taxes and assessments against it, and yielding a return of only $200, the desirability of a sale for reinvestment would seem to be revealed by the objective facts. In providing that a sale could be made when the interest of all parties would be materially enhanced, the statute does not require that a life tenant should acquiesce and suffer, under such conditions where the entire income is absorbed by current costs and charges and for the benefit of the contingent remaindermen alone, but the question should be considered and determined with some sense of proportion and in fair and reasonable adjustment of the rights of all parties interested. Again, it is objected that the decree in the principal case provides that the interest on the fund shall be paid, one-half to the life tenant and one-fourth each to the contin-gent remaindermen made parties under the statute. This might be a good ground of exception if it were made by the life tenant, but if she has seen proper to consent to such a disposition of the income, this assuredly is no concern of the purchaser, nor could it in any way affect the question of the title that is offered him. In the recent case of Pendleton v. Williams, supra, which is an authority apposite to several of the questions presented in this appeal, the court, in response to a similar objection, said:

"So far as the purchaser is concerned, the statute having given the power of sale and all the parties in interest being before the court, there is no reason why a good title cannot be conveyed to him, and he is in no way charged with the duty of seeing that the purchase money is properly distributed. When a purchaser has paid his bid into court or to the officers duly authorized to receive it, he is quit of all further obligation concerning it, and as to him the judgment must be affirmed"—citing Wilkinson v. Brinn, 124 N. C. 723, 32 S. E. 966, and 16 R. C. L., Title, Judicial Sales, sec. 83.

On the record, we are of opinion that the judgment directing the collection of the purchase money, according to the terms of sale, should be affirmed, and, on final judgment, proper provision be made for securing the fund according to the provisions of law and the course and practice of the court.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 24, 1919.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR §327(5) — BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—PARTIES.

The Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company, holder of certain deeds to lands in Dougherty county, Ga., executed to secure the payment of money loaned by the company to one Kimsey, brought proceedings in Bibb county, Ga., for the foreclosure of the instruments, obtained judgment at the first term of the court, and had the execution levied on the lands in Dougherty county. Plaintiffs in error filed an equitable petition against the insurance company, Kimsey, and the levying officer, setting up claim to the lands and seeking to enjoin the levy, alleging that they had been deceived and by fraud induced to make the deeds to Kimsey; that the deeds were infected with usury; that Kimsey represented to petitioners that, if they desired to have a loan upon the lands, he could negotiate the same for them, and petitioners applied for the amount of $1,800; that they executed warranty deeds to Kimsey, but did not know the nature of the instruments, and thought they were making manual delivery of certain papers; that Kimsey gave bonds to reconvey the lands to petitioners; that Kimsey borrowed $2,500 from the insurance company, but petitioners received only about $150 from the entire transaction, which they are ready and willing to pay into the court. The petition contained, among others, the prayer that the deeds from plaintiffs in error to Kimsey, and from the latter to the insurance company be declared void and ordered canceled, and there was also a prayer for general relief. Upon the trial of the case the court directed a verdict in favor of the defendant, the insurance company, against the petitioners, but in favor of the petitioners against Kimsey "as to the excess of the fund after payment of the insurance company's fi. fa." A decree in accordance with this was directed. A motion for new trial was made by the petitioners, which was overruled, and that judgment was brought here for review. Held, that Kimsey was a necessary party to the bill of exceptions.

2. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF §58(1)—PERSONAL SERVICE—SERVICE ON ATTORNEY.

Kimsey did not reside in Dougherty county, but in Habersham county, Ga. He was not made a party to the bill of exceptions expressly, and the only service upon him was made by the sheriff by leaving a copy of the bill of exceptions at Kimsey's residence. The entry of service contained no recital that Kimsey was absent from the county. Kimsey was a party to the proceedings and appeared for himself as attorney at law, as is shown by the record. Held, that the service of the bill of exceptions was insufficient. It was not good as service upon Kimsey as a party; for that must be personal. It was not good as service upon him as attorney, for it did not show that he was absent from the county of his residence, and it is only in case the attorney is absent therefrom that service upon him can be perfected by leaving a copy at his residence. Civ. Code 1910, § 6160; Anderson v. Albany, etc., Ry. Co., 123 Ga. 318, 51 S. E. 342; Lyons v. Winter, 129 Ga. 416, 59 S. E. 270; Akerman v. Neel, 70 Ga. 728. The motion to dismiss the writ of error must be sustained.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 24, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. EXECUTION §167—AFFIDAVIT OF ILLEGALITY—AMENDMENT.

"Affidavits of illegality are, upon motion and leave of court, amendable instantaneously by the insertion of new and independent grounds: Provided, the defendant will swear that he did not know of such grounds when the original affidavit was filed." Civil Code 1910, § 5704. The defendant in execution will not be permitted to amend his affidavit of illegality by the addition of new and independent grounds, whether of fact or of law, thereto for causes which existed and were known, or in the exercise of reasonable diligence might have been known, at the time of the filing of the original affidavit. Baker v. Smith, 91 Ga. 142, 16 S. E. 967 (2). An amendment which does not add a new and independent ground of illegality, but which merely amplifies or amends a ground in the original affidavit, need not be sworn to.

2. EVIDENCE §65 — PRESUMPTION — QUESTIONS OF LAW—KNOWLEDGE.

Applying the foregoing principles, the amendment to the affidavit of illegality in this case added new and independent grounds; and such new and independent grounds not having been verified as required by the statute, the court erred in allowing the same over timely objection, and in refusing to strike the same upon demurrer. In so far as the amendment raised only questions of law, the defendant in execution was conclusively presumed to have had knowledge of these grounds at the time of the filing of his original affidavit, and the court did not err in refusing to allow the same.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 24, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. INSURANCE §360(3)—AUTOMATIC PREMIUM LOAN CLAUSE—LOAN VALUE—EXTENSION OF POLICY.

A limited payment (20-payment) life insurance policy was issued on May 25, 1913. The insured paid the first premium on the date of issue, the second premium on May 25, 1914, and the third on May 25, 1915. The premium due on May 25, 1916, was not paid. The insured died on August 25, 1916. The insured had borrowed on the policy $337.11, and the interest on the amount had been paid up to May 25, 1916. The premium, as stated in the face of the policy, was $316.89, payable annually. The policy provided: "The company will, at any time after three full years' premiums have been paid, advance upon the sole security of this policy, when legally assigned, a sum equal to the amount specified in the table below, less any indebtedness to the company on account of this policy. The interest on such loan shall not exceed six per cent. per annum, and shall be payable annually in advance." The loan or surrender value of the policy, as stated in the table referred to, was $396 after the policy had been in force three years; $621 after four years. The policy further provided: "In the event the insured should, at any premium date or within the days of grace thereafter, after three full years' premiums have been paid hereon, fail to pay or cause to be paid the then current premium, if the policy be not surrendered by the insured with a choice of one of the options herein guaranteed, and if at the time of the nonpayment of premium there is a loan value hereon in excess of all indebtedness that may then exist against the policy, together with interest, the company will apply such available loan value towards the payment of the premium then due, with interest thereon at a rate not exceeding six per cent. (6%) per annum, chargeable annually in advance; and will continue to carry said policy in force, in the form as written and at the rate of premium as provided for in the face hereof, subject to its terms and such indebtedness, the same as if the premium had been paid in cash; and will continue to so apply such loan value as long as such value, at the rate of premium provided in the face hereof, will suffice to pay for even one day's premium. At any time while this policy is thus in force the insured may resume payment of premiums thereon without medical re-examination, and in that event any indebtedness against the policy may either be paid in cash or allowed to remain as a loan hereon. All such indebtedness shall be a first lien on the policy, and the policy will lapse unless premium payments are resumed by the insured within the actual period of extension." The nonforfeiture provisions of the policy, other than the automatic premium-loan clause last above quoted, gave to the insured the option to surrender the policy to the company, after the policy has been in force three full years, and at any time prior to default in premium payment, or within the days of grace (one month) thereafter, and to take (1) the cash surrender value, as indicated by the table set out in the policy, less any indebtedness to the company on account of the policy; or (2) a nonparticipating paid-up life policy for a reduced amount, as indicated by the table; or (3) a nonparticipating paid-up term policy for the full amount insured by the policy, as indicated by the table, with a provision in (2) and (3) as to any indebtedness to the company on account of the policy. The insured did not surrender the policy, and did not elect to take any of the options last above referred to.

On June 26, 1916, the fourth annual premium having become due on May 25, 1916, the company offered to loan to the insured the full amount available after the policy had been in force four years, to wit, $621, at the time tendering the insured a loan agreement to be executed by himself and his wife; the latter being the beneficiary named in the policy. Along with the loan agreement, the company furnished to the insured a statement of his indebtedness to it, showing former loan, $337.11, premium due on May 25, 1916, $316.89, and interest to May 25, 1917, $37.26, making a total of $691.26; and required the insured to pay the additional sum of $70.26 to cover the total of his indebtedness to the company. On June 27, 1916, the insured signed the agreement and forwarded it from Macon, Ga., to the beneficiary at Atlanta, Ga., with the request that she also execute the agreement and deliver it to the company together with the sum of $70.26. At the time of the receipt of the agreement by the beneficiary, she was "ill and bedridden and remained in this condition for several days, at which time she became wholly unconscious and remained in this condition until after the death of the insured; and for said reasons was unable to execute said loan agreement prior to the death of the insured." The insured died without knowing that the beneficiary had not complied with the "wrongful" demands of the company. After the death of the insured, the beneficiary completed the agreement and tendered it, together with $70.26, to the company. One clause of the policy provided: "This policy is issued with the express understanding that the insured may, without the consent of the beneficiary, receive every benefit, exercise every right, and enjoy every privilege conferred upon him by this policy."

Held: Under the foregoing facts, the available loan value on the policy, to wit, $58.89 (conceding, without deciding, that interest at 6 per cent. per annum in advance on the existing loan and on the amount appropriated to the payment of the premium due should not be first deducted), was, under the automatic premium-loan clause quoted above, insufficient to "carry the policy in force, in the form as written," to the date of the insured's death, August 25, 1916.

(a) The obligation of the company, under the automatic premium-loan clause quoted above, was to apply such available loan value toward the payment of the premium due, and to carry the policy in force "in the form as written and at the rate of premium as provided for in the face" of the policy. In a strict technical sense no "rate of premium" is provided in the face of the policy. The reference is, however, to the contract as written, and the words quoted above are to be given their usual and ordinary signification. The parties were dealing with this contract of insurance, to wit, a limited payment life policy as distinguished from a purely protective policy or other form of contract.

2. INSURANCE — 392(8) — LIFE INSURANCE — AUTOMATIC PREMIUM-LOAN PROVISION — FORFEITURE.

The insurance company was not estopped from declaring a forfeiture of the policy (conceding, without deciding, that its demand that the loan agreement be executed by the beneficiary was wrongful and unauthorized); it affirmatively appearing that the sum of money necessary to pay the past-due premium, interest in advance upon the loan, and the existing loan upon the policy, was neither paid nor tendered the company until after the death of the insured.

"Affidavits of illegality are, upon motion and leave of court, amendable instantly by the insertion of new and independent grounds: Provided, the defendant will swear that he did not know of such grounds when the original affidavit was filed." Civil Code 1910, § 5704. The defendant in execution will not be permitted to amend his affidavit of illegality by the addition of new and independent grounds, whether of fact or of law, thereto for causes which existed and were known, or in the exercise of reasonable diligence might have been known, at the time of the filing of the original affidavit. Baker v. Smith, 91 Ga. 142, 16 S. E. 967 (2). An amendment which does not add a new and independent ground of illegality, but which merely amplifies or amends a ground in the original affidavit, need not be sworn to.

2. EVIDENCE §65 — PRESUMPTION — QUESTIONS OF LAW—KNOWLEDGE.

Applying the foregoing principles, the amendment to the affidavit of illegality in this case added new and independent grounds; and such new and independent grounds not having been verified as required by the statute, the court erred in allowing the same over timely objection, and in refusing to strike the same upon demurrer. In so far as the amendment raised only questions of law, the defendant in execution was conclusively presumed to have had knowledge of these grounds at the time of the filing of his original affidavit, and the court did not err in refusing to allow the same.

A limited payment (20-payment) life insurance policy was issued on May 25, 1913. The insured paid the first premium on the date of issue, the second premium on May 25, 1914, and the third on May 25, 1915. The premium due on May 25, 1916, was not paid. The insured died on August 25, 1916. The insured had borrowed on the policy $337.11, and the interest on the amount had been paid up to May 25, 1916. The premium, as stated in the face of the policy, was $316.89, payable annually. The policy provided: "The company will, at any time after three full years' premiums have been paid, advance upon the sole security of this policy, when legally assigned, a sum equal to the amount specified in the table below, less any indebtedness to the company on account of this policy. The interest on such loan shall not exceed six per cent. per annum, and shall be payable annually in advance." The loan or surrender value of the policy, as stated in the table referred to, was $396 after the policy had been in force three years; $621 after four years. The policy further provided: "In the event the insured should, at any premium date or within the days of grace thereafter, after three full years' premiums have been paid hereon, fail to pay or cause to be paid the then current premium, if the policy be not surrendered by the insured with a choice of one of the options herein guaranteed, and if at the time of the nonpayment of premium there is a loan value hereon in excess of all indebtedness that may then exist against the policy, together with interest, the company will apply such available loan value towards the payment of the premium then due, with interest thereon at a rate not exceeding six per cent. (6%) per annum, chargeable annually in advance; and will continue to carry said policy in force, in the form as written and at the rate of premium as provided for in the face hereof, subject to its terms and such indebtedness, the same as if the premium had been paid in cash; and will continue to so apply such loan value as long as such value, at the rate of premium provided in the face hereof, will suffice to pay for even one day's premium. At any time while this policy is thus in force the insured may resume payment of premiums thereon without medical re-examination, and in that event any indebtedness against the policy may either be paid in cash or allowed to remain as a loan hereon. All such indebtedness shall be a first lien on the policy, and the policy will lapse unless premium payments are resumed by the insured within the actual period of extension." The nonforfeiture provisions of the policy, other than the automatic premium-loan clause last above quoted, gave to the insured the option to surrender the policy to the company, after the policy has been in force three full years, and at any time prior to default in premium payment, or within the days of grace (one month) thereafter, and to take (1) the cash surrender value, as indicated by the table set out in the policy, less any indebtedness to the company on account of the policy; or (2) a nonparticipating paid-up life policy for a reduced amount, as indicated by the table; or (3) a nonparticipating paid-up term policy for the full amount insured by the policy, as indicated by the table, with a provision in (2) and (3) as to any indebtedness to the company on account of the policy. The insured did not surrender the policy, and did not elect to take any of the options last above referred to.

On June 28, 1916, the fourth annual premium having become due on May 25, 1916, the company offered to loan to the insured the full amount available after the policy had been in force four years, to wit, $621, at the time tendering the insured a loan agreement to be executed by himself and his wife; the latter being the beneficiary named in the policy. The insured died without knowing that the beneficiary had not complied with the "wrongful" demands of the company. After the death of the insured, the beneficiary completed the agreement and tendered it, together with $70.26, to the company. One clause of the policy provided: "This policy is issued with the express understanding that the insured may, without the consent of the beneficiary, receive every benefit, exercise every right, and enjoy every privilege conferred upon him by this policy."

Held: Under the foregoing facts, the available loan value on the policy, to wit, $58.89 (conceding, without deciding, that interest at 6 per cent. per annum in advance on the existing loan and on the amount appropriated to the payment of the premium due should not be first deducted), was, under the automatic premium-loan clause quoted above, insufficient to "carry the policy in force, in the form as written," to the date of the insured's death, August 25, 1916.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1919.)

1. RAILROADS — §159(9)—LIENS—"WAGES FOR SERVICES"—"EMPLOYE"—SWITCHING OF CARS—STATUTE.

A railroad company executed a "mortgage or deed of trust" on "the railroad, property, equipment, and franchises" of the railroad company to a trustee to secure the payment of a certain issue of bonds. The trustee instituted an equitable suit for the appointment of a receiver and to foreclose the lien provided in the mortgage or deed of trust. A receiver was appointed, who took charge of all of the assets of the railroad company, and operated the railroad. During the course of operation he applied certain money derived from the earnings of the road to the purchase of cross-ties, cost of repairs to the roadbed and equipment, and for "general betterment" of the railroad property, all of which was found necessary for the upkeep "of the roadbed and equipment," and amounted to not less than $12,000. More than six months (approximately two years) after the commencement of proceedings to appoint the receiver a connecting railroad company filed an intervention in the suit for the recovery of certain amounts for which the defendant railroad company had become indebted to it within six months immediately preceding the institution of the suit and the appointment of a receiver, for services rendered in switching cars for the defendant company and for supplies, consisting of the rental of certain cars furnished by the intervener, and used by the defendant in the operation of its railroad, all of which services and supplies were alleged to be necessary to the operation of the defendant's road, the demand for which amounted to less than $500. The case upon the intervention was, by consent, tried by the judge without a jury; and upon evidence tending to support the allegations of the intervention a judgment was rendered in favor of the intervener for the full amount claimed, the lien of which was declared to be superior to the lien of the mortgage or deed of trust. Held:

The amount claimed by the intervener for the switching of cars for the defendant railroad company was not wages for services rendered by an employé for the railroad company, within the meaning of the act of 1893 (Acts 1893, p. 91, Civil Code, § 2793), which provides: "The amounts due employés by any railroad company for wages earned by service rendered to said railroad company shall constitute a lien upon the railroad and other property of said railroad company, and shall be superior in dignity to the lien of any mortgage or other contract lien executed or created by said railroad company since December 13th, 1893: Provided, that no employé shall be entitled to said lien under this section to an amount exceeding five hundred dollars." Accordingly the intervener did not have a statutory lien for its demand based upon the switching of cars.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employé.]

2. RAILROADS §159(4)—"FURNISHING OF MATERIALS, SUPPLIES OR OTHER ARTICLES"—STATUTE—LIEN.

The supplying of cars as necessary to the operation of a railroad is the "furnishing of material, supplies, or other articles," within the meaning of the act of 1894 (Acts 1894, p. 68; Civil Code, § 2795), which provides: "All persons furnishing material, supplies, or other articles necessary to the operation of any railroad company which is operated in this state, and all persons having claims against such company for live stock killed by its engines or cars, shall have a lien upon the property of the company for the amounts due for such supplies, material, or other necessary articles furnished within six months preceding the institution of proceedings for the same, or for the amounts due to the company for the killing of such live stock, which lien shall be superior in dignity to any mortgage or other contract lien created by said railroad company." But the intervener did not acquire a lien under this provision of the statute, because the supplies were not furnished within six months next before the intervener commenced the action to enforce its alleged lien.

3. CLAIM INFERIOR TO MORTGAGE.

Applying the principles announced in Central Trust Co. v. Thurman, 94 Ga. 735, 20 S. E. 141, and Alexander v. Mercantile Trust & Deposit Co., 100 Ga. 537, 28 S. E. 235, the intervener did not have a claim superior to the mortgage which a court of equity will declare and enforce.

1. CORPORATIONS §30(5) — LIABILITY OF ORGANIZERS—CREDITORS.

"Persons who organize a company and transact business in its name, before the minimum capital stock has been subscribed for, are liable to creditors to make good the minimum capital stock with interest." Civ. Code 1910, § 2220. The liability thus provided for is obviously for the purpose of creating a fund, when the subscriptions to the amount of the minimum capital stock shall have been paid, for the ultimate benefit of those who may extend credit to the corporation; and such persons have the right to presume that the statute has been complied with, and to rely, if necessary, upon the statutory liability of those failing to observe the law. Organizers of a company who transact business in its name before the minimum capital stock has been subscribed for are considered as committing a fraud upon those who may extend credit to the company, and the statute imposes a liability upon them. John V. Farwell Co. v. Jackson Stores, 137 Ga. 174, 73 S. E. 13 (3). Upon principle the statute applies to private corporations generally, including among others banking corporations chartered under Civ. Code 1910, § 2262 et seq.

2. BANKS AND BANKING *§*36, 47(1)—CAPITAL STOCK—STATUTE—"MAXIMUM AMOUNT"—"MINIMUM AMOUNT."

While it is provided that no bank shall be incorporated with less than a specified amount of capital stock (Civ. Code 1910, § 2269), that provision of the law does not purport to limit the power to incorporate a bank with a minimum capital stock greater than that specified in the statute. It is optional with the institution whether it will name a maximum amount of capital stock and a minimum amount of capital stock; and where but one amount is named, that is both the maximum and minimum amount of capital stock of the company, within the meaning of Civ. Code 1910, § 2220. Rosenheim v. Horne, 10 Ga. App. 582, 73 S. E. 953 (4).

JUDGMENT *§*432—SETTING ASIDE JUDGMENT—FAILURE TO MAKE LEGAL DEFENSE.

A party cannot successfully ask for relief in equity to set aside a judgment at law against him, on the ground that he failed or omitted to make a legal defense, unless he was prevented by fraud or accident, unmixed by any fraud or negligence by himself, from setting up such defense.

Error from Superior Court, Colquitt County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Equitable action by D. A. Fain against the Bank of Doerun and others. General and special demurrers to petition by defendant Bank overruled, and the Bank excepts and brings error. Reversed.

Parker & Gibson, of Moultrie, for plaintiff in error.

James L. Dowling and Erle B. Askno, both of Moultrie, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. D. A. Fain brought an equitable action against the Bank of Doerun. The allegations of the petition were to the following effect:

In 1914 the firm of D. A. Fain & Son, composed of petitioner and his son, J. A. Fain, was engaged in the business of selling livestock, vehicles, fertilizers, etc. J. A. Fain had general charge and supervision of the business. In that year, acting for the partnership, J. A. Fain obtained two loans from the Bank of Doerun, one for $3,500, the other for $1,800, and, as collateral security for the notes, delivered to the bank a large number of notes payable to the firm, aggregating more than $13,000; and to further secure the loan he executed to the bank his mortgage on certain described realty belonging to him individually. Soon after these transactions he disappeared, and his whereabouts from that time have been unknown to petitioner. By reason of his disappearance the affairs of the firm became "entangled and confused," and the firm became insolvent; and by reason of the insolvency the petitioner had to pay a large amount of the firm's indebtedness from his individual means. A sufficient amount has been collected by the bank on the collateral notes to pay off the loans due it by the firm, but the bank has failed to credit the firm's notes with the collections. "After both of the notes executed by J. A. Fain for the partnership of D. A. Fain & Son to said Bank of Doerun became due, W. M. Smith, who is cashier of said defendant bank, and at the time acting for said bank, approached your petitioner and stated that, although one of said notes had been paid in full and a greater portion of the other had also been paid, and that said bank had a sufficient number of said collateral notes on hand which were solvent to pay the balance of said indebtedness, the said W. M. Smith urged your petitioner to let the Bank of Doerun sue said notes to judgment and obtain an execution thereon, and levy on the land above described as belonging to the said J. A. Fain, and sell the same at sheriff's sale, and that your petitioner could buy in said land and protect himself for any loss that he might sustain on account of the indebtedness of D. A. Fain & Son that he might be called upon to pay. Petitioner shows further that the said W. M. Smith urged your petitioner not to file a defense to said suit, for the reason that the sole purpose of instituting said suit and obtaining the judgment aforesaid would be to sell the land of said J. A. Fain, so that your petitioner might protect his own interest as aforesaid, that said defendant would not hold said judgment against your petitioner, and that the same would not operate as a general judgment against the property of petitioner, but that said judgment would be enforced only to the extent of selling the land of the said J. A. Fain as above described, and that the said W. M. Smith, acting for said bank, did then and there fully warrant, promise, and agree that the judgment would not be enforced by said bank, or otherwise, against the property of this petitioner, but that the same would be enforced only against the property hereinabove described as belonging to J. A. Fain. This petitioner further shows that on or about the time stated in this paragraph, and prior to the filing of the suit by said bank, the said W. M. Smith, acting for said bank, agreed with this petitioner that, when the judgment should be obtained upon said note, petitioner and the said bank could get together on a settlement, at which time all notes which had been paid should be credited upon the said $3,500 note and the $1,800 note; and if more of said collateral notes were paid than would be sufficient to pay the notes of said partnership, then and in that event the said bank would pay the overplus to this petitioner and return to him the unpaid collateral notes. Petitioner shows that, yielding to the persuasion and promises of the said W. M. Smith, he consented for said Bank of Doerun to institute suit on the notes, and yielding to the persuasion and promises of said W. M. Smith, and confiding in the statements made to petitioner by said W. M. Smith, petitioner did not file a defense to the notes sued upon, but allowed a judgment by default to be entered up against the partnership of D. A. Fain & Son, and each of the partners thereof, which said judgment was obtained at the July, 1916, term of this honorable court for the sum of $4,382.60." Execution was issued upon the judgment, and in disregard of the bank's agreement it was levied, not on the land of J. A. Fain, but upon certain described property of the petitioner, as well as certain property belonging to the firm, and other property which has been claimed by third persons; and the property of petitioner levied upon has been advertised for sale. Petitioner has endeavored to have a full and complete accounting between the bank and petitioner's firm with reference to the collateral notes, but the bank has refused to have such an accounting, or to give petitioner any information in reference to the collateral notes, or the amounts collected thereon.

Among other things, it was prayed that the judgment against the firm and the members thereof be set aside, and the enforcement of the execution based on the judgment be enjoined.

The bank demurred to the petition generally and specially; one ground of demurrer being that it appeared from the petition that the plaintiff entered into a fraudulent scheme and device the object of which was to defraud J. A. Fain, his son and partner in business, and that, according to the petition, the plaintiff was equally at fault in fraud with the defendant, and did not come into a court of equity with clean hands. The demurrers were overruled, and the bank excepted.

The court erred in overruling the demurrer on the grounds above set out.

"The judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction may be set aside by a decree in chancery, for fraud, accident, or mistake, or the acts of the adverse party unmixed with the negligence or fault of the complainant." Civil Code, § 5965.

"When both parties are at fault, and equally so, equity will not interfere, but leaves them where it finds them. The rule is otherwise if the fault of one overbalances, decidedly, that of the other." Civil Code, § 4534.

From the allegations of the petition it is clear that the plaintiff in the present action voluntarily and knowingly entered into a scheme the effect of which would necessarily be a fraud upon the plaintiff's partner, and, in all likelihood, upon the creditors of the insolvent firm of which the plaintiff was a member; and in accordance with the provisions of law above quoted, and many decisions of this court in line with them, not necessary to cite, equity will not grant him the relief sought.

Judgment reversed.

RECEIVER OF INSOLVENT BANK—PLEA OF LIENHOLDERS.

Where a receiver appointed for an insolvent bank brought a petition against various parties, including creditors and the holders of certain liens upon property of the bank, and prayed, among other things, that the holders of the liens be made party defendants, that the status of these and other liens be ascertained, and the amount due upon them determined, and where two of the alleged lienholders, nonresidents of the county in which the petition was brought, who were the grantees in deeds executed to secure debts due from the insolvent bank, filed a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, raising, among other defenses, the contention that they could not be made parties to the petition, inasmuch as they were the holders of the title to the property covered by their deeds, and that the court had no jurisdiction of them in the proceedings instituted, it was error to overrule this plea; it not appearing that the debts due to the grantees in the security deeds had ever been paid, or that tender of the amount of the debts had ever been made, or that there was any contest as to any genuineness or amount of the debts to secure which the deeds had been executed. And this is true, even though the petition filed by the receiver alleged that there were certain taxes to be paid, and prayed that the plaintiffs in error and other creditors of the bank be brought in, so that the amount of their debts could be fixed, the property sold free from the liens, and the valid liens be allowed to take precedence to the extent of said liens. RELIANCE LIFE INS. CO. v. HIGH-
TOWER. (No. 832.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)INSURANCE ¶78, 90, 93, 137(2), 141(2, 3)
—POWER OF AGENT—PREMIUMS—RECEIPT—LIABILITY.

An insurance company may limit the power of its agent, and when notice that the agent's power is limited is brought home to the insured in such manner as would put a prudent man on his guard, the insured relies at his peril on any act of the agent in excess of his power.

(a) The insured is bound by plain and unambiguous limitations upon the power of the agent contained in his policy.

(b) Where the application for a policy of life insurance and the policy itself stipulate that the insurance shall not become effective until the first premium shall have been actually paid while the applicant is in good health, and that agents are not authorized to modify the policy or extend time for paying a premium, the actual payment of the first premium during the good health of the applicant is a condition precedent to the liability of the insurer; and a local agent of the company could not waive such condition.

(c) The formal acknowledgment of the receipt of the first premium in a policy of life insurance containing the provisions above stated is not conclusive of payment, so as to estop the company from denying the validity of the policy, except in a case of due or unconditional delivery of the policy by the company.

Certified Questions from Court of Appeals.

Action by Mamie Hightower against the Reliance Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error, and the Court of Appeals certifies questions. Questions answered.

Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, of Atlanta, and C. N. King, of Chatsworth, for plaintiff in error.

Bryan, Jordan & Middlebrooks and Leo Sudderth, all of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. The certified questions, which are sufficiently indicated herein, are based upon the following facts gathered from the questions: An application for life insurance, signed by the applicant, contained a provision as follows:

"I hereby declare and agree that all statements and answers written in this application * * * are true, full, and complete, and are offered to the company as a consideration for the contract of insurance, which I hereby agree to accept, and which shall not take effect until the first premium shall have been actually paid while I am in good health and the policy shall have been signed by the duly authorized officers of the company and issued."

The policy itself contained, among others, the following provisions:

"Agents are not authorized to modify this policy or to extend the time for paying a premium. * * * All insurance provided by this policy is based upon the application therefor, a copy of which is hereto attached and made a part of this policy."

And it recited:

"The payment of the first annual premium being [is] hereby acknowledged."

The insurance company, with knowledge that the first annual premium had not in fact been paid, issued the policy and sent it to the company's state agency, which in turn forwarded it to the local agent for delivery to the applicant. The local agent made manual delivery of the policy upon the promise of a third person to pay to the local agent the first annual premium; the third person accepting the note of the applicant for the amount of the premium. The premium was not actually paid by the third person until after the death of the applicant; no demand for payment having been made upon him while the applicant lived. After the death of the applicant the first premium was paid to the local agent, and (less the commission of that agent) was forwarded to the state agency, which retained the amount so received, without an offer to return it, until after suit on the policy, when the company in its plea tendered the amount so received by its state agency to the plaintiff, the beneficiary named in the policy.

Applying to the facts above stated the principles recognized in Reese v. Fidelity Mutual Life Association, 111 Ga. 482, 36 S. E. 637, it must be ruled: (1) It was within the power of the insurance company, as between itself and its agent, to define and limit the powers of the latter. Limitations upon the power of the agent affect all third persons dealing with him who have knowledge or notice thereof, and any notice of limitations upon the agent's power which a prudent man is bound to regard is the equivalent of knowledge to the insured; (2) the stipulation in the signed application that the insurance "shall not take effect until the first premium shall have been actually paid while I am in good health," coupled with the words in the policy, "Agents are not authorized to modify this policy or to extend the time for paying a premium," were sufficient to charge the applicant with notice that he was dealing with a special agent with limited powers; (3) the actual payment of the first premium during the good health of the applicant was a condition precedent to liability under the policy, and the agent of the company could not waive such condition. We do not overlook the fact that conclusions different from those stated above, upon the facts given, have been reached by many courts. According to the view held by these courts, such condition in the application and policy will be deemed to have been intended to apply only to matters arising after the issuing of the policy, or, in all events, the company will be held to be estopped from relying upon the condition. In this view, if the agent has authority to deliver the policy, the condition of the policy and application to the effect that the policy is not to become effective until the first premium is actually paid is construed as applying to the payment of premiums after the first, and as having no application to the payment of the first premium, which is considered waived by the delivery of the policy to the insured. See the monographic note to Johnson v. Aetna Ins. Co., 107 Am. St. Rep. 92, 99, and especially the authorities cited at page 135 (123 Ga. 404, 51 S. E. 339). It might appear at first blush that the view last above referred to has been approved by this court in Supreme Lodge v. Few, 138 Ga. 778, 784, 76 S. E. 91. That decision is really not in conflict with any prior decision of this court. In Reese v. Fidelity Mutual Life Association, supra, it was recognized that the insurer, by the use of proper terms and provisions in the application or policy, may validly provide that the policy shall not become of force until actual payment of the first premium, and may further impose limitations upon the power of the agent to waive such provision, and that a contract of insurance issued by the company and delivered by the agent to the insured, contrary to such provision, and without compliance therewith by the insured, is void, unless the circumstances attending the delivery, or the custom of doing business, shows that the insurer is estopped from relying upon the condition. That decision was approved in the following cases: Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Clancy, 111 Ga. 865, 36 S. E. 944; Mutual Reserve Ass'n v. Stephens, 115 Ga. 192, 194, 41 S. E. 679, where it was held that an amendment seeking "to hold the association liable upon an alleged waiver which, by the express terms of the policy, the agent in question had no power to make," was improperly allowed; Hutson v. Prudential Ins. Co., 122 Ga. 847, 50 S. E. 1000, where it was ruled that an insurer may qualify the authority of a general agent, and "will not be bound by the acts of his agent beyond the scope of his authority, where the person dealing with the agent had notice of such limitations;" Johnson v. Aetna Ins. Co., supra (a fire insurance case), where it was said, with respect to life insurance contracts, "Unquestionably, as to a matter concerning the time when the contract is to become of force, * * * the insured, by accepting the policy, would be bound by its terms, and could not set up a waiver which he was bound to know the company's agent had no power to make;" Atlanta Buggy Co. v. Hess Spring Co., 124 Ga. 338, 341, 52 S. E. 613, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 431; Clark v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 129 Ga. 571, 59 S. E. 283; Brown v. Mutual Benefit Life Ins. Co., 131 Ga. 38, 40, 61 S. E. 1123; Few v. Supreme Lodge, 136 Ga. 181, 71 S. E. 130; Williams v. Empire Life Ins. Co., 146 Ga. 246, 248, 91 S. E. 44. See, also, Royal Benefit Society v. Naylor, 14 Ga. App. 202, 204, 80 S. E. 545; Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Thompson, 20 Ga. App. 706, 93 S. E. 299 (5). This court, in Stephenson v. Empire Life Ins. Co., 139 Ga. 82, 86, 76 S. E. 592, upon review declined to overrule Reese v. Fidelity Mutual Life Ass'n, supra. In view of our own cases, upon the facts given, it must be held that a delivery of the policy by the company to the insured did not result. The recital in the policy to the effect that the first premium had been paid, and the formal acknowledgment of the receipt thereof, will not operate to estop the insurer from contesting the validity of the policy as a contract of insurance. It would be otherwise if the policy had been duly delivered by the company. In that event such recital would become a covenant of the contract, and it would not be open to the insurer to deny the payment of the first premium for the purpose of avoiding the policy, although the insurer might deny and disprove the recital merely for the purpose of enforcing payment of the first premium. See Ill. Central Ins. Co. v. Wolf, 37 Ill. 354, 87 Am. Dec. 251, and cases cited in note; Mass. Benefit Life Ass'n v. Sibley, 158 Ill. 411, 42 N. E. 137; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. French, 30 Ohio St. 253; Golt v. National Protection Ins. Co., 25 Barb. (N. Y.) 189; Basch v. Humboldt Mutual Co., 35 N. J. Law, 429, 431; Dobyns v. Bay State Beneficiary Ass'n, 144 Mo. 95, 45 S. W. 1107; Grier v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 132 N. C. 542, 44 S. E. 28; Kendrick v. Life Ins. Co., 124 N. C. 315, 32 S. E. 728, 70 Am. St. Rep. 592, and cases cited in note at page 597. We do not overlook the fact that some courts have held such recital in a policy of insurance to be conclusive on the insurer so far as the validity of the contract is concerned, even where the delivery of the contract was made under circumstances similar to those above stated. The sounder view, in our opinion, is that such recital is not to be given this effect where the possession of the contract was procured by fraud, accident, or mistake, or where the delivery of the policy was made in the teeth of a plain provision therein which the insured was bound to know the agent had no power to waive, and is to be given effect only where the policy has been unconditionally or duly delivered by the company.

In view of what we have said, the mere fact that the "state agency" received the first premium after the death of the insured and did not offer to return it until after suit on the policy did not amount to ratification by the company.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 14, 1919.)

BASTARDS \S 93 — ERRORS OF JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—CERTIORARI.

The writ of certiorari will not lie to correct errors committed by a justice of the peace in proceedings under Pen. Code 1910, \S 1331 et seq., against the putative father of a bastard child, where judgment is rendered requiring the defendant to give security for the support of the child, and binding him over to the superior court upon his failure to give such security. Such is the ruling in the case of Hyden v. State, 40 Ga. 476, and upon formal review of that decision this court declines to overrule it.

Certified Question from Court of Appeals.

David S. Atkinson, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

H. Roy Lang, of Waverly, and T. M. Scarlett, Jr., of Brunswick, for defendant in error.

FROST et al. v. SMITH et al. (No. 818.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1919.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS \S 124 — PLEA — PARTIES.

The suit was instituted against William Frost, and after suggestion of his death of record in 1910, William J. Frost, as administrator upon his estate, was made a party defendant. By amendment to the petition in 1911, William J. Frost individually was made a party defendant, and duly served. The character of the case will appear from the decision made when it was before this court on a former occasion. Smith v. Frost, 144 Ga. 115, 86 S. E.

235. At a subsequent trial, which occurred in 1917, William J. Frost in his individual capacity offered to file an answer setting up title to a part of the land in himself under a deed executed by William Frost in 1900 (which was three years before the institution of the suit), and possession thereunder for a period of more than seven years before William J. Frost individually was made a party defendant. The judge declined to allow the answer filed, on the ground that it came too late. In the judgment it is stated that no entry of default appears on the docket, nor has there been any judgment of default entered against W. J. Frost, and "that at least one motion for continuance has been made by the defendant W. J. Frost." Held, treating as true the allegations of the answer which was rejected, prescription would run in favor of William J. Frost individually as to the part of land claimed by him, until he was made a party defendant and served (Bower v. Thomas, 69 Ga. 47 [2]; Powell on Actions for Land, § 124), and the plea was meritorious.

2. PARTIES ¶56 — PLEADING ¶85(3) — DEFENSES — CONDITIONS — STATUTE.

The provisions of Civil Code 1910, § 5628, requiring the judge at each regular term to call the cases on the appearance docket, and hear and decide all objections made to the sufficiency of petitions, pleas, etc., and section 5653, requiring the judge at each term to call the appearance docket upon some day previously fixed or on the last day of the term, and in all cases in which the defendant has not filed a demurrer, plea, answer, or other defense, to mark the case "in default," have reference to the filing of defenses, etc., by defendants in original suits filed under section 5551 et seq., and section 5662 et seq., and do not apply to defendants who are subsequently brought in by the plaintiffs by amendment. Where a new party defendant is added by amendment to the petition, upon motion of the plaintiff, and at the trial of the case at some subsequent term such new defendant offers for the first time to file a meritorious plea, whatever may be the right of the court to impose reasonable terms, the court should not disallow the plea unconditionally.

(a) It would seem that section 5628 and section 5653, supra, were applicable; that under application of their provisions the proposed answer was not offered too late. McKenzie v. Consolidated Lumber Co., 142 Ga. 375, 82 S. E. 1062 (1); Hodnett v. Stewart, 131 Ga. 67, 61 S. E. 1124; American Central Ins. Co. v. Albright, 145 Ga. 515, 89 S. E. 487.

(b) The judgment disallowing the plea was erroneous.

(c) On another hearing, evidence tending to support the plea duly offered should be admitted.

3. TRIAL ¶191(4)—EXPRESSION OF OPINION.

One issue in the case was whether the defendant's possession was wrongful. While instructing the jury on the subject of mesne profits, the language employed by the trial judge amounted to an expression of opinion that the defendant's possession was wrongful.

4. PARTIES ¶59(3) — AMENDMENT — PLEADING.

There is no merit in the assignment of error upon the allowance of an amendment which alleges the death of one of the original plaintiffs and prays that the petitioners, as his heirs at law, recover his interest in the land.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶1078(1)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—BRIEFS.

Some of the assignments of error were not discussed in the brief of counsel for the plaintiffs in error, and, under the rules of this court, will be considered as abandoned.

6. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

None of the other special grounds of the motion for new trial, which complain of rulings on admissibility of evidence and of certain excerpts from the charge of the court, when considered in connection with the pleadings, the evidence, and the charge in its entirety, show cause for reversal, nor are they of such character as to require elaboration.

7. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

As the judgment of the trial court is reversed upon other grounds, no ruling is made as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Washington County; R. N. Hardeman, Judge.

Suit by O. P. Smith and others against William J. Frost, administrator, and others, in which, after defendant's death, William J. Frost, his administrator, was made a party defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

A. R. Wright, of Sandersville, for defendants in error.

(No. 1046.)

Rehearing Denied Feb. 24, 1919.)

1. TRUSTS ¶134—CONSTRUCTION OF DEED—TITLE OF TRUSTEE.

"Where the terms of a conveyance by deed to a trustee are large enough to embrace the fee in the premises described, and this fee is carved up into an estate for life in favor of one beneficiary and a remainder in behalf of other beneficiaries, who are uncertain and unascertained, the instrument should be construed as clothing the trustee with full title, and the title as to the remainder should be considered as abiding in him so long, at least, as the identical persons who are to take and enjoy it are not ascertainable. Up to that time, the trust is executory, and the remainder is an equitable, not a legal, estate."

2. TRUSTS §169(1)—REMOVAL OF TRUSTEE—APPOINTMENT TO VACANCY.

There being a valid trust as to the entire fee, the removal of the trustee created a vacancy which the judge of the superior court was authorized to fill by the appointment of a successor at chambers. Civ. Code 1910, § 3744; Heath v. Miller, 117 Ga. 860, 44 S. E. 13.

3. TRUSTS §159, 192—QUALIFICATION OF TRUSTEE—POWER OF SALE.

The life tenant, though one of the beneficiaries, was legally qualified to be trustee, at least for the other cestuis que trust, under the appointment of the judge of the superior court. Robertson v. De Brulatur, 188 N. Y. 901, 80 N. E. 939; Burbach v. Burbach, 217 Ill. 547, 75 N. E. 519; Lozey v. Stanley, 147 N. Y. 560, 42 N. E. 11; Lewin on Trusts, 41, § 17; 39 Cyc. 248 (3); Weeks v. Frankel, 197 N. Y. 304, 90 N. E. 969, and cases therein cited. For physical precedents, see Vernoy v. Robinson, 133 Ga. 654, 66 S. E. 928 (4); Wadley v. Le Cato, 139 Ga. 177, 77 S. E. 47. In a deed where power is given to a trustee to sell the real estate with the written consent of the life tenant, such consent is for the benefit of the life tenant only, and as to such consent the life tenant does not occupy a fiduciary position to the remaindermen. Farwell on Powers (3d Ed.) 630; 2 Chance on Powers, 358, § 2430.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR §909(1)—PRESUMPTION—MATTERS NOT SHOWN BY RECORD—REMOVAL AND APPOINTMENT OF SUCCESSOR.

Where the contrary does not appear from the record, it will be presumed that the judge of the superior court, in removing such a trustee and in appointing a successor, acted with all necessary jurisdictional requisites. Winn v. Lunaford, 130 Ga. 436, 439, 61 S. E. 9. See Lamar v. Pearre, 82 Ga. 360, 9 S. E. 1043, 14 Am. St. Rep. 163 (4).

5. TRUSTS §203—POWER OF SALE—CONVEYANCE BY TRUST DEED.

The power of sale contained in the deed authorized the trustee to sell the entire estate in the land, and therefore the substituted trustee conveyed fee-simple title to her grantees under her deed of September 1, 1877.

6. DEEDS §95—CONSTRUCTION—INTENTION.

In construing a deed, the entire instrument must be looked at, and all parts construed together, in order to determine the intention of the maker, without special regard to the formal arrangement of the deed.

7. DEEDS §93—CONSTRUCTION—REASON.

Under Civ. Code 1910, § 4187, that interpretation should be such as will effectuate the intention, and it is proper to seek for a rational purpose by construing the deed consistently with reason and common sense.

8. DEEDS §95—CONSTRUCTION—AVOIDANCE OF INJUSTICE.

If there is any doubt as to the real intention, an interpretation which plainly leads to injustice should be rejected, and one which conforms more to the meaning of the grantor, and does not produce unusual and unjust results, should be adopted.

9. DEEDS §95—CONSTRUCTION—REDUNDANT WORDS.

In deeds, as in all other contracts, none of the words are to be considered as redundant, if a reasonable intentment can be given them.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Suit by Joseph F. Woodbery and others against the Atlas Realty Company. Judgment for defendant upon a directed verdict, and plaintiffs except and bring error. Affirmed.

In September, 1858, Joseph F. Woodbery, "for and in consideration of the natural love and affection which he has and bears to and for his present and beloved wife, Mrs. R. Emma Woodbery," conveyed described land in the city of Atlanta to H. H. C. Holcombe in trust, "with all the rights, members, and appurtenances in any way or manner belonging, for the sole and separate use and benefit of the said R. Emma Woodbery [wife of the grantor] during her natural life, * * * and after her death to her children; but should there be no child or children, then to Josephine Frances Woodbery and William Albert Woodbery." The habendum clause was:

"To have and to hold said property unto him, the said Hosea Henry C. Holcombe, in trust for the purposes mentioned, forever, with the right and power to the said trustee or his successor as trustee, by and with the written consent of said R. Emma Woodbery, as often as she and her trustee may think and deem best, to sell and reinvest the proceeds or to exchange the same and to execute titles therefor and to receive and accept titles, all to be done without any order for that purpose from the court. The trust property or trust fund is to remain and continue in trust for the sole and separate use and benefit of her, the said R. Emma Woodbery, for and during her natural life, * * * and the trust property or trust fund, after the death of the said R. Emma Woodbery, to her children; but should there be no child or children or representative of said child or children, then to Josephine Frances Woodbery and William Albert Woodbery."

At the date of the making of this conveyance there were no children born of the life tenant. Between that date and the 28th of June, 1877, there had been born to the life tenant and the grantor five children, three of whom were then above the age of 14 years, the other two being under that age. All of these children are plaintiffs in the

"Affidavits of illegality are, upon motion and leave of court, amendable instantaneously by the insertion of new and independent grounds: Provided, the defendant will swear that he did not know of such grounds when the original affidavit was filed." Civil Code 1910, § 5704. The defendant in execution will not be permitted to amend his affidavit of illegality by the addition of new and independent grounds, whether of fact or of law, thereto for causes which existed and were known, or in the exercise of reasonable diligence might have been known, at the time of the filing of the original affidavit. Baker v. Smith, 91 Ga. 142, 16 S. E. 967 (2). An amendment which does not add a new and independent ground of illegality, but which merely amplifies or amends a ground in the original affidavit, need not be sworn to.

2. EVIDENCE \S 65 — PRESUMPTION — QUESTIONS OF LAW—KNOWLEDGE.

Applying the foregoing principles, the amendment to the affidavit of illegality in this case added new and independent grounds; and such new and independent grounds not having been verified as required by the statute, the court erred in allowing the same over timely objection, and in refusing to strike the same upon demurrer. In so far as the amendment raised only questions of law, the defendant in execution was conclusively presumed to have had knowledge of these grounds at the time of the filing of his original affidavit, and the court did not err in refusing to allow the same.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 24, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)*1. INSURANCE \S 360(3)—AUTOMATIC PREMIUM LOAN CLAUSE—LOAN VALUE—EXTENSION OF POLICY.

A limited payment (20-payment) life insurance policy was issued on May 25, 1913. The insured paid the first premium on the date of issue, the second premium on May 25, 1914, and the third on May 25, 1915. The premium due on May 25, 1916, was not paid. The insured died on August 25, 1916. The insured had borrowed on the policy $337.11, and the interest on the amount had been paid up to May 25, 1916. The premium, as stated in the face of the policy, was $316.89, payable annually. The policy provided: "The company will, at any time after three full years' premiums have been paid, advance upon the sole security of this policy, when legally assigned, a sum equal to the amount specified in the table below, less any indebtedness to the company on account of this policy. The interest on such loan shall not exceed six per cent. per annum, and shall be payable annually in advance." The loan or surrender value of the policy, as stated in the table referred to, was $396 after the policy had been in force three years; $621 after four years. The policy further provided: "In the event the insured should, at any premium date or within the days of grace thereafter, after three full years' premiums have been paid hereon, fail to pay or cause to be paid the then current premium, if the policy be not surrendered by the insured with a choice of one of the options herein guaranteed, and if at the time of the nonpayment of premium there is a loan value hereon in excess of all indebtedness that may then exist against the policy, together with interest, the company will apply such available loan value towards the payment of the premium then due, with interest thereon at a rate not exceeding six per cent. (6%) per annum, chargeable annually in advance; and will continue to carry said policy in force, in the form as written and at the rate of premium as provided for in the face hereof, subject to its terms and such indebtedness, the same as if the premium had been paid in cash; and will continue to so apply such loan value as long as such value, at the rate of premium provided in the face hereof, will suffice to pay for even one day's premium. At any time while this policy is thus in force the insured may resume payment of premiums thereon without medical re-examination, and in that event any indebtedness against the policy may either be paid in cash or allowed to remain as a loan hereon. All such indebtedness shall be a first lien on the policy, and the policy will lapse unless premium payments are resumed by the insured within the actual period of extension." The nonforfeiture provisions of the policy, other than the automatic premium-loan clause last above quoted, gave to the insured the option to surrender the policy to the company, after the policy has been in force three full years, and at any time prior to default in premium payment, or within the days of grace (one month) thereafter, and to take (1) the cash surrender value, as indicated by the table set out in the policy, less any indebtedness to the company on account of the policy; or (2) a nonparticipating paid-up life policy for a reduced amount, as indicated by the table; or (3) a nonparticipating paid-up term policy for the full amount insured by the policy, as indicated by the table, with a provision in (2) and (3) as to any indebtedness to the company on account of the policy. The insured did not surrender the policy, and did not elect to take any of the options last above referred to.

On June 26, 1916, the fourth annual premium having become due on May 25, 1916, the company offered to loan to the insured the full amount available after the policy had been in force four years, to wit, $621, at the time tendering the insured a loan agreement to be executed by himself and his wife; the latter being the beneficiary named in the policy. Along with the loan agreement, the company furnished to the insured a statement of his indebtedness to it, showing former loan, $337.11, premium due on May 25, 1916, $316.89, and interest to May 25, 1917, $37.26, making a total of $691.26; and required the insured to pay the additional sum of $70.26 to cover the total of his indebtedness to the company. On June 27, 1916, the insured signed the agreement and forwarded it from Macon, Ga., to the beneficiary at Atlanta, Ga., with the request that she also execute the agreement and deliver it to the company together with the sum of $70.26. At the time of the receipt of the agreement by the beneficiary, she was "ill and bedridden and remained in this condition for several days, at which time she became wholly unconscious and remained in this condition until after the death of the insured; and for said reasons was unable to execute said loan agreement prior to the death of the insured." The insured died without knowing that the beneficiary had not complied with the "wrongful" demands of the company. After the death of the insured, the beneficiary completed the agreement and tendered it, together with $70.26, to the company. One clause of the policy provided: "This policy is issued with the express understanding that the insured may, without the consent of the beneficiary, receive every benefit, exercise every right, and enjoy every privilege conferred upon him by this policy."

Held: Under the foregoing facts, the available loan value on the policy, to wit, $58.89 (conceding, without deciding, that interest at 6 per cent. per annum in advance on the existing loan and on the amount appropriated to the payment of the premium due should not be first deducted), was, under the automatic premium-loan clause quoted above, insufficient to "carry the policy in force, in the form as written," to the date of the insured's death, August 25, 1916.

(a) The obligation of the company, under the automatic premium-loan clause quoted above, was to apply such available loan value toward the payment of the premium due, and to carry the policy in force "in the form as written and at the rate of premium as provided for in the face" of the policy. In a strict technical sense no "rate of premium" is provided in the face of the policy. The reference is, however, to the contract as written, and the words quoted above are to be given their usual and ordinary signification. The parties were dealing with this contract of insurance, to wit, a limited payment life policy as distinguished from a purely protective policy or other form of contract.

2. INSURANCE — 392(8)—LIFE INSURANCE—AUTOMATIC PREMIUM-LOAN PROVISION—FORFEITURE.

The insurance company was not estopped from declaring a forfeiture of the policy (conceding, without deciding, that its demand that the loan agreement be executed by the beneficiary was wrongful and unauthorized); it affirmatively appearing that the sum of money necessary to pay the past-due premium, interest in advance upon the loan, and the existing loan upon the policy, was neither paid nor tendered the company until after the death of the insured.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1919.)

1. RAILROADS — 159(9)—LIENS—"WAGES FOR SERVICES"—"EMPLOYE"—SWITCHING OF CARS—STATUTE.

A railroad company executed a "mortgage or deed of trust" on "the railroad, property, equipment, and franchises" of the railroad company to a trustee to secure the payment of a certain issue of bonds. The trustee instituted an equitable suit for the appointment of a receiver and to foreclose the lien provided in the mortgage or deed of trust. A receiver was appointed, who took charge of all of the assets of the railroad company, and operated the railroad. During the course of operation he applied cergrantor a purpose to permit a reduction in the use of the life estate by carving out of it another remainder and withholding it from the wife, his love for whom was the sole consideration for the deed. "It is a well-recognized fact that the uncertainty of life gives a life estate a more or less speculative value." In the case of Gunby v. Alverson, 146 Ga. 536, 91 S. E. 556, the trust deed conveyed the property to the daughters of the grantor or their children, and also provided a power of sale for purposes of re-investment. This court held that the trust projected over the entire estate, and declined to place the decision "on the narrow technicality of the absence of the word 'to' in the conveyance to the grantor's grandchildren." In that case it was also said:

"We wish to note that we have not overlooked the line of decisions, of which Fleming v. Hughes, 99 Ga. 444, 27 S. E. 791, may be cited as a type, that a conveyance to a trustee in trust for one for life, with remainder to the surviving children of the life tenant, and, in default of such children, with remainder over to others, passes to the trustee the legal title of the life estate only. In such cases there were no complications as to indeterminate remaindermen, implied power of sale, and other indicia reflecting the grantor's intention to convey the whole fee to the trustee."

It was also noted in the Gunby Case that the deed contained no language restricting the trust to the life tenants, as was the case in the devices under consideration in Bull v. Walker, 71 Ga. 195, Carswell v. Lovett, 80 Ga. 36, 4 S. E. 866, and McDonald v. McCall, 91 Ga. 304, 18 S. E. 157. A trustee may have and exercise a power of sale as to property or an interest therein to which he has not the legal title. Simmons v. McKinlock, 98 Ga. 743, 26 S. E. 88; Henderson v. Williams, 97 Ga. 709, 25 S. E. 395; Headen v. Quillian, supra. In Coleman v. Cabaniss, 121 Ga. 281, 48 S. E. 927, it is held that this may be done when the trustee has neither the equitable nor the legal title. See, in this connection, Clarke v. East Atlanta Land Co., 113 Ga. 21, 38 S. E. 323 (4); Baille v. Carolina B. & L. Ass'n, 100 Ga. 20, 28 S. E. 274; Cabot v. Armstrong, 100 Ga. 438, 28 S. E. 123.

STUBBS v. MENDEL et al. (No. 939.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 14, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PLEADING — 335 — DEMURRER AND ANSWER—"FILED."

W. B. Stubbs, as administrator of R. K. Walker, filed his petition against W. K. Smith and Carl Mendel, for a reformation of deeds which the plaintiff had made to them, and later, by amendment, for rescission. Upon the call of the docket at the appearance term of the cause (October term, 1916), the case was marked in default as to W. K. Smith, and at the June term, 1917, on the 7th day of June, Smith made an oral motion that the court open the default, and that he be allowed to file his demurrer and answer; to which motion the plaintiff objected, on the grounds that it was too late to open the default, that the court had no jurisdiction to open it at that term, and that the defendant was not proceeding in the manner prescribed by the law for opening defaults. After a hearing the court passed the following order: "Upon motion of counsel for W. K. Smith, one of the defendants in the above-stated case, it appearing that at an interlocutory hearing of said case at Hinesville, Georgia, on the 18th day of September, 1916, Honorable Walter W. Sheppard, judge presiding, a demurrer and answer were filed with the court and marked 'Filed' by the court; that after argument the court took said answer and demurrer for the purpose of making a decision therein, and later forwarded the same by mail to the clerk of the superior court of Chatham county; that the same were lost and never reached the office of the clerk of said court; that at the appearance term of said case default was entered: It is ordered that the default entered therein be opened, and that the copy plea and demurrer, this day tendered, be marked 'Filed' as of September 18, 1916." On the trial of the case a verdict was rendered for the defendants. The plaintiff moved for a new trial. The motion was dismissed as to Smith, and overruled as to Mendel. The plaintiff excepted, assigning error upon the judgment opening the default, as well as upon the ruling on the motion for new trial.

The marking of the demurrer and answer of Smith "Filed," by the judge of another circuit on an interlocutory hearing before him in his circuit, and retaining the demurrer and answer for the purpose of making a decision in the case, and later forwarding them by mail to the clerk of the superior court, who never received them, was not a legal filing in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Chatham county. "A paper is said to be filed, when it is delivered to the proper officer, and by him received, to be kept on file." Peterson v. Taylor, 15 Ga. 483, 60 Am. Dec. 705; Jordan v. Bosworth, 123 Ga. 879, 51 S. E. 755.

2. COURTS — 114 — PLEADING — 85(1), 190 — TIME FOR FILING — "NUNC PRO TUNC."

As the demurrer and answer of Smith had not been filed at the interlocutory hearing on September 18, 1916, the court erred in ordering copies of the demurrer and plea presented at the June term, 1917, to be marked "Filed" as of September 18, 1916. "A nunc pro tunc entry is for the purpose of recording some action that was taken or judgment rendered previously to the making of the entry, which is to take effect as of the former date. Such an entry cannot be made to serve the office of correcting a decision, however erroneous, or of supplying non-action on the part of the court." Pendergrass v. Duke, 147 Ga. 10, 92 S. E. 649.

3. JUDGMENT \S 153(4), 159, 174 — OPENING DEFAULT—TIME—EFFECT.

The judgment of default as to Smith was entered at the appearance term (October, 1916). The court allowed the default to be opened at the June term, 1917, which was the second term after the trial term, the terms of Chatham superior court being fixed by statute for March, June, October, and December. "At the trial term the judge in his discretion, upon payment of costs, may allow the default to be opened for providential cause preventing the filing of a plea, or for excusable neglect, or where the judge, from all the facts, shall determine that a proper case has been made for the default to be opened on terms to be fixed by the court. In order to allow the default to be thus opened, the showing shall be made under oath, shall set up a meritorious defense, shall offer to plead instant, and announce ready to proceed with the trial." Civ. Code 1910, § 5656. "While under the Civil Code, * * * a trial judge is vested with a wide discretion as to opening a judgment of default, on motion made at the trial term of a case, there is no provision of law authorizing him to entertain and grant a motion to open a default presented at any subsequent term at which the case is called for trial. Thornton v. Coleman, 104 Ga. 625, 627 [30 S. E. 782]. To move to open a default at the term at which a case regularly stands for trial is purely a matter of grace; and this privilege must be exercised, if at all, within the time prescribed by the statute whereby it is conferred. Ingalls v. Lamar, 115 Ga. 298, 299 [41 S. E. 573]. The present case differs from the case of Davis v. South Carolina Railroad Co., 107 Ga. 420 [33 S. E. 437]." Cauley v. Wadley Lumber Co., 119 Ga. 648, 46 S. E. 852. See Caldwell v. Freeman, 146 Ga. 469, 91 S. E. 544.

Moreover, it appears that the motion to open the default was oral, and not made under oath. Accordingly, it is clear that the court had no jurisdiction at the second term after the trial term to open a default, even if the motion to do so had been properly made. The error in opening the default and allowing the defendant Smith to file a demurrer and answer at the second term after the trial term of the case, rendered all subsequent proceedings as to him nugatory, since the plaintiff was thereby deprived of a substantial right. Cauley v. Wadley Lumber Co., supra.

4. JUDGMENT \S 174 — SETTING ASIDE JUDGMENT—EFFECT ON COPARTY.

From the pleading it appears that there was really no issue between the plaintiff and Mendel, who in effect joined with the plaintiff in seeking to have his deed to Smith reformed or rescinded, as the land conveyed in that deed was also conveyed in the plaintiff's deed to Mendel; and if it should be decreed that Smith, under his deed, did not have title to the land also conveyed to Mendel, then neither the plaintiff nor Mendel desired the deed to Mendel to be reformed or rescinded. It appears, therefore, that Mendel's right to hold the land conveyed to him depended upon whether it should be decreed that Smith had no title to it. In view of the course the case took, the erroneous judgment in opening the default as to Smith makes it proper that the verdict in favor of Mendel should be set aside, but without taxing him for costs. The judgment is therefore reversed as to both defendants.

LANDRUM v. RIVERS. (No. 756.)

Rehearing Denied Feb. 24, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE \S 86—CONTRACT TO MAKE A WILL—DECREE—EVIDENCE.

Specific performance of a contract to make a will in favor of another, where the party claiming the right to specific performance has performed his part of the contract, will be decreed, where the contract to make the will is shown with the requisite degree of certainty and definiteness.

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE \S 86—TRIAL \S 240—INSTRUCTIONS—ARGUMENTATIVENESS.

The court did not err in refusing to give in charge a lengthy written request, which in certain parts was argumentative in character, and which also instructed the jury that specific performance of a contract like that referred to in the first headnote would not be enforced, where refusal to enforce it would not amount to a fraud on the party seeking the equitable relief or specific performance.

3. TRIAL \S 260(1)—REQUESTED CHARGES—GIVEN CHARGES.

Other portions of the requests to charge examined, and held to have been sufficiently covered, where pertinent and legal, by the charge as given.

4. TRIAL \S 260(9)—REQUESTED CHARGE—GIVEN CHARGE—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

The court's charge in submitting the terms of the contract in question was full, apposite, and correct, sufficiently covering the subject, and there was no error in refusing to give the charge requested upon this subject.

5. TRIAL ⚡260(9)—REQUESTED CHARGE—GIVEN CHARGE—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

The court's charge as to the main issue in the case—that is, as to what the contract was, and whether the contract as alleged was made or not—was sufficiently full and comprehensive, and the court did not err in refusing to give the charge requested upon this subject.

6. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE ⚡123—CONTRACT TO MAKE A WILL—TERMS OF CONTRACT—CHARGE.

The portions of the court's charge, in which he states the issues as to the agreement upon the part of the decedent as to what he would leave by his will to the petitioner upon certain considerations stated, were not misleading, but correctly presented the real issue.

7. WITNESSES ⚡140(9)—COMPETENCY—HUSBAND.

The husband of the plaintiff was not a party to this suit, nor was he a party to the contract in such a sense as to render him incompetent as a witness.

8. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE ⚡120—CONTRACT TO MAKE A WILL—EVIDENCE.

The testimony of the physician attendant upon the decedent in his last illness, tending to show that he then desired to make a will in favor of the petitioner in the case, was competent, relevant, and material, and the court did not err in admitting it over objection.

9. JUDGMENT ⚡256(1)—TRIAL ⚡365(1)—VERDICT—CONSTRUCTION.

The construction of a verdict may be aided by a consideration of the pleadings; and giving to the verdict in this case the scope which it should have, under the allegations in the petition and the issues made by the pleadings, it cannot be said that the decree rendered was not authorized by the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Campbell County; C. W. Smith, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. N. C. Rivers against Mrs. E. E. Landrum, individually and as administratrix of the estate of L. A. Brown, deceased. Verdict and decree for plaintiff, motion for new trial, exceptions to decree and motion to set aside decree overruled, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Mrs. N. C. Rivers brought her equitable petition against Mrs. Exer Ellen Landrum as an individual and as administratrix of the estate of L. A. Brown, in which she prayed, among other things, specific performance of an oral contract to make a will, and for injunctive relief. This petition was filed on May 13, 1915. The allegations of the petition show that Mrs. Landrum's intestate owned a valuable estate, consisting of realty and personality; that at the time of the making of the contract, specific performance of which was sought, Brown's aged mother was living in the house with him; that he was unmarried and was about 53 years of age; that petitioner and her husband and their two children were keeping house in the same county in which Brown lived, he being her uncle. She was engaged in the discharge of her duty, looking after and taking care of her children, waiting on and assisting her husband in making a living, and trying to accumulate property. Brown had no person in his house who could take care of him and look after his mother; and, approaching petitioner, he proposed to her that if she would change her place of residence, procure the consent of her husband to allow her to live in the house with him, and bring her children, live in his house, and be a comfort to him and his mother, treating them kindly and affectionately during their lives, and would look after and nurse the mother during her life, and cook for and wait on him and his mother, he would on his part, as compensation for such services to be rendered by petitioner, execute his last will and testament before his death, and in such will bequeath to her all of the property of every kind which he then owned and which he might acquire between that date and the date of his death. In the same paragraph in which these allegations just set forth are contained it is alleged that the decedent, L. A. Brown, stated to petitioner especially "that the compensation for all this service would be made by him by willing and leaving to her all the property he had at the date of his death of every kind and character." The death of Brown and of his mother is alleged, and that he died without having executed his last will and testament. Certain money, the proceeds of a life insurance policy taken by Brown and payable to his estate, it is charged, was sufficient to pay all the debts of the estate, and that plaintiff was willing that the debts should be paid with this money. Full performance of the contract on the part of petitioner was shown, and she prayed that specific performance be decreed, and that the court decree that the property owned by Brown at the time of his death, as set out in the exhibit attached to the petition, is the property of petitioner, and that the defendant be enjoined from administering on it as the property of Brown, or in any way disposing of it or changing the status. There was also a prayer for general relief. Mrs. Landrum, the defendant, was a sister and sole heir at law of Brown.

Upon the hearing of the case the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. Upon this verdict the judge rendered a decree. The defendant filed certain exceptions to the decree, and also a motion to set aside the decree, and made a motion for a new trial. The motion for a new trial was overruled. The exceptions to the decree and the motion to set aside the decree were also overruled. The defendant sued out a writ of error, bringing the case to this court, and in the bill of exceptions assigned error upon the judgment of the court overruling the motion for a new trial, and overruling the exceptions to the decree and the motion to set aside the decree.

Brewster, Howell & Heyman, of Atlanta, and J. H. Longino, of Fairburn, for plaintiff in error.

J. F. Golightly and L. S. Camp, both of Fairburn, and S. Holderness, of Carrollton, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. [1] 1. The plaintiff in error submitted a large number of written requests to charge, which the court refused to give, and error is assigned upon the refusal to give in charge these requests. Among them was the following:

"It is not every parol contract which the court will specifically enforce. It will never enforce any parol contract for the sale of land, or the making of a will, or the testamentary disposition of property, unless the party who is seeking such performance will be defrauded if the contract is not enforced, even if all other elements are shown to exist which would entitle a party to such relief."

The court did not err in refusing to give this charge. This charge is not in harmony with the doctrine laid down in other cases decided by this court, that a contract to make a will will be specifically performed where the evidence establishes the contract with the requisite degree of certainty (a subject to which we will allude further on in this opinion), and it is shown by the evidence that the party claiming the right to specific performance fulfilled and performed his part of the contract.

"The court instructs you that, since the law has provided what disposition shall be made of the estate of one who dies, the court favors the disposition fixed by the law, and will not, except when a strict compliance is had, permit it to be diverted from the channel so prescribed by the law. The law is very strict in requiring that its provisions for the proper disposition of the estate of the dead shall be observed, and the safety of the estate of every one depends upon their observance. So long as one lives, he is presumed to be able to look after his estate; when he is dead, the law steps in and undertakes to care for it, and see that it is legally and properly disposed of. It will see it reaches his heirs at law, or go to his legatees under his last will and testament. The law has thrown around the estates of those who die every safeguard to protect them. It is in the faith of this fact we all labor and toil to accumulate property, feeling that when we die our estates will be safe. It is the duty of the court and jury to exercise great care and extreme caution in the effort to see that the estate of one who is dead shall not be diverted from the channels and removed from the safeguards of law. You see this suit is an effort to take this estate out of the channels prescribed by the law, and that by a parol contract. While such an effort, under the law, may succeed, it can do so only when, under the evidence, which is so strong and convincing and satisfactory that the jury to a reasonable moral certainty are convinced of its truth, and not to enforce it would result in a fraud on the plaintiff, because it is not practical to make her whole by awarding in money the value of her performance or part performance. It is a very serious proposition, after one dies, for an outsider, one who under the law would have no rights or interest in the dead man's estate, to set up a parol agreement, had with the man who is now dead and unable to speak, whereby not a part of his estate, but his whole estate, belongs to her, and not to those upon whom the law cast it. You must realize, gentlemen of the jury, such an effort is a very dangerous thing, and one that threatens all estates. While the law does not declare such a thing may not succeed, but, on the contrary, it is the law such a contract may be made, and may be specifically enforced, yet in its wisdom it has imposed on the party who seeks to enforce such a contract a very heavy burden, in that the contract must be so certain, definite, and clear, and so precise in its terms, as that neither party can reasonably misunderstand them, and prove it by evidence so strong and cogent as to convince the jury to a reasonable moral certainty it was made, and not to enforce it specifically would be a fraud on the plaintiff, because she could not be easily and adequately compensated in money for the performance or part performance of the contract by the plaintiff. In other words, the court will not enforce such a contract, save in cases where specific performance is the only remedy that will afford the plaintiff adequate relief, and prevent a wrong and injustice to the plaintiff. Therefore, gentlemen of the jury, you see that, under the law, unless the evidence is so strong and convincing as to satisfy you to a reasonable moral certainty the contract was made as alleged, that the plaintiff cannot be compensated easily and adequately in money for the performance or part performance, and that it would result in a fraud upon her, if not specifically enforced, then you should not interfere with the laws disposing of this estate, but let it go as the law directs, and leave the plaintiff to her remedy to recover the compensation for the services she claims she rendered, in money."

The court did not err in refusing to give this charge. It would have been error for the court to have instructed the jury in the language just quoted. In the first place the charge is argumentative—strongly so. In the next place it is in conflict with the doctrine which is briefly stated in the preceding division of this opinion. Thirdly, it is not law in this state that a contract to make a will will not be enforced specifically, unless the refusal to specifically enforce it would be a fraud on the plaintiff, on the ground that she could not be easily and adequately compensated in money for the performance or part performance of the contract by the plaintiff; nor is it law that the court will not enforce such a contract, save in cases where specific performance is the only remedy that affords the plaintiff adequate relief and prevents a wrong and injustice to the plaintiff. The case of Heery v. Heery, 144 Ga. 467, 87 S. E. 472, in all the controlling features, is nearly identical with the present case. The differences on the facts of that case and the instant case are differences that do not tend in any way to weaken the claim of defendant in error, but rather to strengthen it, as appears from a careful reading of the record in that case. Among the cases there cited is that of Banks v. Howard, 117 Ga. 94, 43 S. E. 438, and apparently it is one of the cases upon which the court based the decision in the Heery Case. It was said in the Banks Case:

"Contracts under which one of the contracting parties agrees with the other, for a valuable consideration, that he will make a will giving to the other property, either real or personal, have been sustained and enforced in America from the earliest times, and the validity of such contracts seems now to be beyond all doubt."

In the case of Gordon v. Spellman, 145 Ga. 682, 89 S. E. 749, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 852, it was ruled:

"An oral contract to devise lands falls within the operation of the statute of frauds; but where the party in whose favor the will is to be made has performed his part of the contract, and the other party dies leaving a will in which no devise is made pursuant to the oral contract, the disappointed party may apply to a court of equity for specific performance of the contract, if it is one of such a nature that a court of equity would require specific performance."

[3] 3. Requests to charge were also made in writing as follows:

(5) "Here the law is very strict. It does not look with favor on such a contract, and therefore it requires the very strictest proof to establish such a contract; proof that is convincing and so strong as to convince you to a reasonable moral certainty that it was made, as alleged."

(6) "Not only must such be the character of the proof, but it must be accurate and definite and certain. It must establish the contract which is alleged. That is, the evidence must establish substantially the exact terms and conditions, every detail as it is laid in the declaration or petition; and unless you are satisfied to a reasonable moral certainty that the evidence of this character the court has referred to, that L. A. Brown, in his lifetime, made such a contract, then that would end your investigation and you should find in favor of the defendant."

(8) "Then, further, that the plaintiff 'was to cook for her [his mother] and him, and nurse him if he should become sick, make his beds or have it done by her children, look after mending his clothes and seeing they were properly laundered and ironed.' Now, these, like those just referred to, are not loose allegations, which make no difference whether they are proved or not, but are parts of a parol contract, and they must be established just as alleged, or substantially so, by such evidence as the court has heretofore called your attention to."

(9) "Then, further, during the life of his mother and his life, this, like the other features of the contract to which the court has alluded, is an important part of the contract, and must also be established by the same character of evidence."

So far as the requests just quoted are legal, they are sufficiently covered by the general charge. So far as relates to the character of proof required in cases of this kind, the court instructed the jury as follows:

"This is a suit in which the plaintiff asks for the specific performance of a contract, and being a suit in reference to the sale or disposition of land, before a contract, a parol contract, for the sale or other disposition of land can be required to be specifically performed, the contract should be made out by the evidence, clearly, satisfactorily, and specifically to the satisfaction of the jury, to a moral and reasonable certainty, and must be substantially the contract as set out in the petition of the plaintiff; and the performance of the contract, the performance of it by the plaintiff, should be shown by the evidence with the same degree of certainty. The court instructs you as to this particular part of the case, gentlemen of the jury, that the law relating to the preponderance or greater weight of the evidence does not apply, but the evidence must show to your satisfaction clearly and specifically the contract and its terms as set out and alleged in the petition to a moral and reasonable certainty, and that the same was carried out and performed on the part of the plaintiff; that is, the evidence must show to a moral and reasonable certainty as to the contract itself and its terms, and as to its having been carried out by the plaintiff. Evidence has been admitted for your consideration upon the question of the feelings of L. A. Brown towards his relatives, of his feeling towards the family of Mrs. Landrum, and also towards the plaintiff, and evidence as to what he said about what he wanted done with his property, and what he expected to do with it and all that kind of thing. This evidence, gentlemen of the jury, was admitted and is admitted for your consideration, in order for you to determine whether a contract was made and entered into or not. If there was no contract made as alleged, then whatever he said about what his desires were as to where his property would go, or whatever his feelings might have been towards any of the other parties at interest, would not authorize you to find for the plaintiff simply because he desired it to go to her; but, as I stated to you, that evidence is admissible to your consideration, only that you may consider all of the facts and circumstances surrounding the situation, in order that you may arrive at the truth as to whether or not there was such a contract as that made, and, if so, as to whether or not such contract was carried out by the plaintiff in this case, the question for your consideration being as to whether any such contract was made, and, if so, whether it was ever complied with by the plaintiff in this case. If the deceased, Mr. L. A. Brown, made such a contract as the one set out in the plaintiff's petition, and if the plaintiff carried out and performed the duties and services she was required to render under such contract, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, although it might appear that, pending the continuance of such contract, the deceased, Mr. L. A. Brown, sold part of the property he had in possession at the time the contract was made. Now, gentlemen of the jury, if you believe from the evidence in this case, under the circumstances which I have given you, that the contract as set out and set up in the plaintiff's petition was actually entered into and made between the plaintiff and Mr. L. A. Brown, clearly and substantially as set out and described in the petition, and then you believe that the plaintiff in this case, Mrs. N. C. Rivers, carried out and performed completely her part under such contract, if such contract was made, and that the deceased, L. A. Brown, failed to carry out his part of the contract, if such a contract was made, that he was to make a will, giving to her all of his property, but that he failed to do so, and died without making any will, and you believe all this to a moral and reasonable certainty, then, gentlemen of the jury, you would be authorized to find for the plaintiff in this case, and the form of your verdict would be, 'We, the jury, find in favor of the plaintiff on the issues in the case.'"

"That he would compensate her for such services [that is, the services which the alleged contract set out] by executing a will and bequeath unto her all the property he then owned and which he would acquire between that date and his death. This, you will observe, is a very important portion of the alleged contract, and that same kind of evidence which the court called your attention to is demanded in regard to this portion of the contract. You will observe this is a provision of the contract which will not be satisfied by establishing a contract, no matter how strong and conclusive the evidence may be, that he would make a will and bequeath to her all his property at his death. There is a wide difference between a contract to make a will, and bequeath unto her all the property of every kind and character which he then owned and which he would acquire between that date and the date of his death, and a contract 'to make a will and bequeath all his property at his death.' In the one case L. A. Brown would, from the date of the contract, lose all power of disposition of his property he owned or any he might thereafter acquire. The only right he would have over the property he then had or might thereafter acquire would be to use it for the balance of his life. He would have no right to sell it, give it away, or will it to any one except the plaintiff. In the other case, it would only be what property he might own at his death he was obligated to bequeath to the plaintiff, having the right to sell, trade with, and dispose of any and all of the property he then owned or might thereafter acquire. Now, you look to the evidence, and determine whether L. A. Brown made a contract with the plaintiff as she alleges he made. You have a right to consider the character and kind of a man, as disclosed by the evidence, the reasonableness or unreasonableness of such a contract. While its reasonableness or unreasonableness would not affect the contract, if made, it may be considered by you in weighing the evidence, whether a man of the character of L. A. Brown, as shown by the evidence, would or would not be likely to enter into such a contract. In other words, gentlemen, you may and should consider every circumstance, fact, the situation, conditions, character of any and all parties, as shown by the evidence, in determining what is the truth. If you should believe L. A. Brown did not make this alleged contract, that very contract, with all its terms and conditions, just as alleged, then that would end your investigations."

We do not think the court erred in refusing to give this charge. It is argumentative, at least to this extent: That it unduly stresses the importance, or alleged importance, of certain parts of the contract, and impinges, in some parts of it, upon the correct principle that, before the jury could find in favor of the plaintiff, they should believe that the evidence had shown with the requisite degree of certainty that a contract, substantially in its terms and conditions identical with the one alleged, had been made as alleged in the petition; and it would have been laying too much emphasis upon the identity of terms and language of the contract for the court to charge that:

"If you should believe that L. A. Brown did not make this alleged contract, that very contract, with all its terms and conditions, just as alleged, then that would end your investigations."

If the plaintiff alleged a definite contract, and showed by evidence, sufficient under the correct rules of law, that a contract substantially the same as the one alleged was made, that would be sufficient, so far as regards the establishment of the contract which constitutes the basis of her claim in the case. As a part of his instructions to the jury the court stated fully and clearly the contentions in the petition as to what the contract was. The language employed by him was as follows:

"He stated that, if petitioner would change her place of residence, and would move from the place where she was then living" (this being followed by a full statement of the terms of the contract so far as related to what the complainant was to do), he, "the said L. A. Brown, for such service, would on his part, as compensation for such care and such service to be rendered by her, execute his last will and testament before his death, and in such will and testament would bequeath to her all property of every kind and character which he then owned, and which he would acquire between that date and the date of his death, stating to her at the time, that while he had considerable property, * * * and especially stating to her that her compensation for all this service would be made by him willing and leaving to her all the property he had at the date of his death of every kind and character."

This part of the charge states the allegations of paragraph 3 of the petition, and the charge of the court as given required the jury to find from the evidence that this contract had been substantially proved. If there be a substantial difference between the allegation that the decedent would leave her by will all of his property and the other allegation, made in the same paragraph, that he would leave her all of the property he then had and all that he might acquire, there was no demurrer on the ground of conflicting allegations and that the two contracts could not be declared upon in the same count. The charge of the court submitted allegations as to the contract as it was made in the petition, and covered the subject fully.

[5] 5. The other requests to charge, so far as they were legal and pertinent, were sufficiently covered by the charge as given by the court, and other requests besides those which we have specifically referred to were properly refused, both in view of what we have said above, and for the further reason that they would have tended, had they been given to the jury, to lead them to believe that the court disapproved of contracts like that which it was here attempted to set up, and viewed the same with great suspicion. It is not improper here to say that it may be true that there is always great danger in the law allowing such contracts to be specifically enforced, where the contracts rest solely in parol and parol evidence alone is adduced to sustain them; and it may be forcibly argued in such instances that there is great inducement to perjury, whereby the property of a man, after his death, will be diverted from the course which the law has prescribed for it. But the validity of these contracts has been recognized by the courts for a long time, and whether they should be allowed to stand and should be enforced is not now a question for this court, but for the Legislature. The law-making body knows what the courts have held on this subject, the doctrine that has been repeatedly laid down; and if it is dangerous to the public welfare and is not a salutary doctrine, it is within the province of the law-making body of the state to change it and lay down a different rule.

[6] 6. Certain charges of the court are excepted to upon the ground that they tend to convey to the jury a mistaken and confused idea as to what the real contract was, and the real agreement upon the part of the decedent as to the property that he would bequeath in his will to the petitioner. It appears from a reading of the charge upon this subject that this question was fully and fairly submitted to the jury. The jury must have understood from the instructions, and no doubt did understand, that if they believed that it was established with the requisite degree of certainty and definiteness by the evidence that the decedent, L. A. Brown, agreed, in consideration of certain things to be performed by the petitioner, he would bequeath her in his will all the property that he then had or that he might acquire between that date and his death, or that if he agreed upon the consideration stated that "he would leave her all of his property at his death," they should find in favor of the petitioner; and in view of the allegations in the third paragraph of the petition the court did not err in submitting this issue to the jury.

"The husband of the plaintiff, Urma Rivers, being sworn as a witness for the plaintiff, testified in regard to the alleged contract as follows: 'By Counsel for Plaintiff: Q. How came you to move to Mr. Brown's house? A. We were living on his mother's place. I was farming. He came down there to get me to help him cut some stock; he said he wanted to build more rooms to the house; he made a contract with Clyde to move to his house. He said he told her, if she would move to his house and take care of his mother her lifetime, take care of him his lifetime, he would make his will, and will her what he had and all he would get before he died. My wife was there at home when he told me that; she heard it. I told her it would be right smart on her, but, if she thought she could do the work and wait on him, we would move there. He was present. We moved there after we got the crop gathered.' On cross-examination, in answer to the questions propounded by counsel for defendant, as follows: 'Q. Tell the jury just what he said the contract was. A. Well he came down to my house in August to get me to help him to cut some stock; he wanted to build some to the house. He said he had made a contract with Clyde to move to his house. He said, if she would move to his house and take care of his mother her lifetime, and stay on and take care of him his lifetime, that he would make his will, and will her all he has got and all he would get before he died. Q. That was all, he stated, of the contract that he made; that was all of it, wasn't it? A. That is all I remember he said. Q. You made an affidavit in this case didn't you, written by your lawyers? A. Yes, sir. Q. Well, I will read you the affidavit as quoted in the bill of exceptions: 'In the month of August, 1910, L. A. Brown came to the house of affiant, and in the presence of affiant's wife stated to affiant that he, the said L. A. Brown, desired to have some stock cut in order to add to the house that he was then living in, in order to make it large enough for affiant and his wife and children to move into the house and live in, and he wanted affiant to come and help him cut stock for that purpose, and he then stated to affiant as follows: 'That he had agreed with Clyde, he called her, affiant's wife, that if she would move into the house with him, and wait on his mother in sickness, and stay with her during her life, and stay on with him during his lifetime, and to wait on him and keep the house and do the cooking, and he stated that he would expect her to mend his clothes and keep them up and do his sewing, and stay there and do that work as long as his mother lived, and then until he died, that he would execute his will before he died, and will her all of his property of every kind.' And he went on to state in the presence of affiant's wife that this was an agreement he had made with her, and that he wanted to enlarge the house, and add five rooms to the house, so there would be ample room there for affiant and his family and L. A. Brown, and he stated to affiant that it would be expected that affiant would work the land and pay the rent just like he had been paying heretofore; that is to say, affiant had been working on the place of Mrs. Elizabeth Brown, and paying the rent over to L. A. Brown; and he stated to affiant that if affiant would go on and pay the rent, and act just like he had been acting so far as the rent was concerned, he expected Clyde, affiant's wife, to move into the house after it was fixed, and to wait on his (L. A. Brown's) mother during her lifetime and then to wait on him, to do his mending and sewing and cooking, and live in the house with him until his death. He further stated that he would not require her to furnish the provisions, but he expected to pay for half the provisions and put them at the house, and that he would be charged no board, but that she would do all the cooking, and that she would be at no expense about the family, except he would really buy and place at the home half of the provisions to be used, and he stated that affiant's wife and affiant's children would live in the house with him, and she would do this waiting on him, and waiting on his mother, that no rent would be charged for the house, except he stated that affiant would be expected to pay rent for the place the same as he had been paying, that is to say, that affiant would pay him the third and fourth of what he made, but that Clyde would not be expected to pay anything; and he stated to affiant that it was impossible for him and his mother to stay there together any longer, unless they got somebody to stay with them, that she was getting feeble and needed waiting on, and somebody to stay with her, and he really needed somebody to help wait on him and do his cooking; and he further stated to affiant, 'I have got plenty to take care of me and my mother in her lifetime, but yet I am dependent; I have got nobody to wait on her and nobody to stay with her when I am gone, and nobody to look after me, and I want to make some permanent arrangement, so somebody will be in the house and wait on her when she is sick, and wait on me when I am sick, and mend my clothes and sew for me, and I want to get Clyde to come and do this for me, and at my death I will make my will and will her all of my property of every kind.' Wasn't that what you swore, that that was the contract; isn't that what the contract was? A. I was to run a crop, but he didn't make that contract with her; he made it with me. Q. Isn't that the contract he made with her, and didn't you swear it, and didn't your lawyer write it; ain't that the contract? I ask you, didn't he make this contract? A. I made a contract to make a crop over there. Q. State whether this was the contract or not— You swore once. Tell the jury whether that was the contract or not. A. I made a contract to make a crop. Q. Was that all the contract was made? A. Yes, sir; to make a crop, all that I made. Q. Was this the contract he made with your wife? Tell me whether this is the contract. A. He told me she was to do the cooking, wait on his mother. Q. How were all the provisions to be furnished at the house to support the family? A. I was to furnish half. Q. You were to furnish half of the provisions, and Mr. Brown was to furnish the other half? A. Yes, sir. Q. That was in it? A. Yes, sir. Q. That was a part of the contract, wasn't it? A. Yes, sir. Q. Another part of the contract was that Mrs. Rivers was to wait on his mother? A. Yes, sir. Q. And another part of the contract was that she was to wait on him? A. Yes, sir. Q. And another part of the contract was that she was to do the cooking, wasn't it? A. Yes, sir. Q. And another thing, she was to keep the house? A. Yes, sir. Q. Well, let us see if we can't find just exactly what this contract was; what was he to do on his part? He was to fix up the house? A. Yes, sir. Q. You were to help him? A. I did help him. Q. And you agreed to do it? A. Yes, sir. Q. He went to see you? A. Yes, sir. Q. You agreed to go and help him cut stock? A. Yes, sir. Q. And another thing was, he was not to be at any expense in the house-keeping except to furnish one-half of the provisions, that was all. You were not to charge him any board. You were to furnish the other half, wasn't you? A. Yes, sir. Q. You did furnish half of the provisions, approximately one half, and he furnished the other half, didn't he? A. I furnished over half, I think. One year he didn't kill a hog. I furnished the meat for the whole year. Q. So you did more than you agreed to do? A. Yes; I did that year. Q. Another thing, you were not paying any rent for the house you lived in? A. No sir. Q. That was a part of the agreement, wasn't it? A. Wasn't anything said about house rent; I don't think there was; there might have been. Q. Didn't you expressly say it, didn't you swear it, that you were not to pay any rent for the house, but all you were to pay was to pay your third and fourth for the crop? A. Yes, sir; I was to pay the third and fourth. Q. You didn't pay any rent did you? A. No, sir. Q. And wasn't that part of the agreement? A. It might have been; I don't remember now. Q. You have not any very clear recollection of what the contract was, have you? A. Why, he might have said that he was not going to charge any rent for the house. Q. Didn't he expressly say so? You didn't pay any. That was a big item, adding four or five or six rooms to the house; wasn't that expressly understood, that you were not going to pay any rent for that house, and you would not have gone there unless you had had that contract? A. People don't rent houses when they farm; that is, pay extra rent for the house. Q. That is what you contracted to do, to work down there on a farm? A. Yes, sir. Q. Well, now, do you think you understand the contract? Ain't it a good deal more than you swore it was awhile ago? A. Well, I didn't say that was all. Q. I asked you if that was all, and you said that was all you could remember. You can remember a great deal more now? At the conclusion of the testimony of this witness, Urma Rivers, the husband of the plaintiff, and the above-quoted testimony in regard to the alleged contract and all he testified to touching the making of said contract, both on the direct and cross-examination, in which recital is given both the questions and answers, the defendant moved the court to exclude all this evidence of the said witness, Urma Rivers, from the consideration of the jury, because he was a party to this contract, and, this suit being defended by the administratrix of L. A. Brown, that he is an incompetent witness under our law; which motion the court refused to grant, saying: "Taking the testimony all together, there was other testimony than that of Mr. Rivers as to the separate contract between Mrs. Rivers and Mr. Brown, the dead man, with the consent of Mr. Rivers; and taking all the testimony together, as it appears in the record, this motion is overruled." The defendant contends that the court erred in overruling said motion to exclude said testimony, for the reason assigned in said motion, to wit, that, L. A. Brown being dead, and the suit being defended by his administratrix, the said witness, Urma Rivers, the husband of the plaintiff, by the said testimony delivered by himself, clearly shows he was a party to said contract, and, being a party thereto, under the law he was incompetent as a witness to establish by his testimony the contract sued on, when the other party thereto, viz. L. A. Brown, was dead, and his administratrix was defending said suit. The defendant says the fact, if it be a fact (which the defendant says is not a fact), that 'there was other testimony than that of Mr. Rivers as to a separate contract between Mrs. Rivers and Mr. Brown, the dead man, with the consent of Mr. Rivers, and taking all the testimony together as it appears from the record,' did not in any way have the effect of rendering him competent to testify, if he was a party to the contract with the dead man, intestate of the defendant administratrix."

The court did not err in refusing to exclude the testimony of this witness on the grounds urged. He was not a party to the suit, and was not a party to the contract sued upon. Intermingled with his testimony regarding the contract sued upon, and connected with that contract, is evidence of what might be called a collateral undertaking upon the part of the husband of the petitioner. This did not render him incompetent as a witness.

[8] 8. The testimony of the physician attendant upon the decedent in his last illness, tending to show that he then desired to make a will in favor of the petitioner in the case, was competent, relevant, and material, and the court did not err in admitting it over objection.

[9] 9. Under the charge of the court the jury returned a verdict in favor of the petitioner, the verdict being in the following language:

"We, the jury, find for the plaintiff on all the issues in this case."

The court thereupon rendered its judgment, decreeing that the plaintiff recover from the defendant all the estate of L. A. Brown which had come into the hands of the defendant, Mrs. Landrum, as the administratrix of the estate of the decedent, or which might come into her hands as such administratrix, less such costs as might be taxed in the case. The court further decreed that title to the realty constituting a part of the estate be in the plaintiff as against the defendant and the estate of the decedent. It was further decreed that the personal property belonging to the estate of the decedent which had not been sold be turned over to the plaintiff; that the defendant make a deed conveying the realty described in the decree to the plaintiff, this being the realty which constituted a part of the estate of the decedent; that the proceeds of the sale of any of the property of the estate, and any other money that might come into the hands of the defendant as a part of the estate of the decedent, be delivered to the clerk of the superior court of Campbell county; that if the defendant had paid any debt of the decedent, which was a just claim against the estate, she deliver to the clerk of the court the receipts, canceled notes, or other evidence of the payment of any money on account of such estate; and that, if these claims were just, they be taken and held in lieu of any money which she would have to pay over had those claims not been paid. It was further decreed that the administratrix should keep and retain nothing on account of any services she had rendered, or should hereafter render, as administratrix of the estate, or for any money she had paid or agreed to pay out to any person as administratrix or otherwise, except such money as had been paid out on obligations due by L. A. Brown at the date of his death, and that she make a statement to the court, verifying the same by oath, showing just what money she had received, and from what source, and how it had been distributed, and to whom, and paying over to the clerk of the court the balance in her hands. The decree further makes provision for the payment of all debts of the decedent at the date of his death, payment of costs in certain cases, payment of the cost of carrying this case to the Supreme Court on a previous writ of error, for the presentation of all claims against the estate of the decedent by intervention or otherwise; also that the counsel who filed the suit shall be a tenant in common with the plaintiff, having one-fourth interest in the property (this latter provision being to secure the fee of counsel), and that plaintiff shall be liable for all the just claims of the decedent. Numerous exceptions to this decree were filed, on the ground that it does not follow the verdict and was not authorized thereby, specifying wherein it was not authorized; also a motion to set aside the decree was made. The exceptions and the motion were overruled. We are of the opinion that the court properly so ruled. We have set forth above the substance of the decree. The jury had been instructed that they should return a general verdict, and that, if they found in favor of the plaintiff on all the issues of the case, their verdict should so state. Under this charge the jury returned a verdict finding in favor of the plaintiff "on all the issues in the case." And when we consider the scope of the pleadings, the issues involved, it is apparent that the verdict, properly construed, authorized the decree rendered. When this suit was instituted in 1915 the defendant in error had not been granted permanent letters of administration, but was temporary administratrix. Subsequently to the filing of the suit permanent letters of administration were granted. The effect of the verdict and decree was to put the title to this property in the plaintiff. The meaning of the verdict and the decree in the case is that there is specific performance of a contract on the part of the decedent to leave by his will all of his property to the plaintiff in the case. Had this contract been carried out, the plaintiff would have had title to the property from the date of the death of the intestate; and we do not think it should be taxed with the cost of the administration and the litigation which had been carried on by the defendant, who was the sole heir at law of L. A. Brown.

It is cogently argued in the briefs of counsel for plaintiff in error that she was entitled to this cost and compensation, and also reasonable counsel fees for the attorneys at law who represented her in this litigation. We cannot agree with this contention. Mrs. Landrum was, as said above, the sole heir of the decedent, and she was as an individual made a party defendant in the original petition. She was stricken from the cause as an individual, and the case proceeded against her as administratrix. The claims of creditors of the estate were not in jeopardy. The estate was apparently worth several times the amount of any valid claims against it. The great bulk of the estate would not have been touched by debts. The proceeds of a small quantity of personalty and of an insurance policy on the life of the decedent were sufficient to pay off the debts of the estate. While nominally the litigation was in behalf of Mrs. Landrum as administratrix, the contest upon her part was actually carried on in protection of her personal interest. Her loss or her gain was to be the result of the suit; and the property involved, which under the decree for specific performance became the property of the defendant, cannot be taxed with any fee payable to the counsel for Mrs. Landrum. In the case of Belt v. Lazenby, 126 Ga. 767, 56 S. E. 81, it was said:

"An agreement to devise, if founded upon sufficient consideration, is, after death of the party who agreed to devise, enforceable against his sole heir at law, by treating the heir as a trustee and compelling him to convey the property in accordance with the contract; and where the agreement is entire, and embraces both real and personal property, and the estate of the decedent is unrepresented and owes no debts, and the heir is in possession of all such property, it is not necessary, in order to enforce the contract in its entirety, to have an administrator for such estate appointed and made a party defendant to the suit. In such a case, equity, having obtained jurisdiction over the subject-matter and over the heir for the purpose of enforcing the contract as to the land against him, may enforce the whole of the contract against him."

The issues which were made in this case could have been fought out between Mrs. Landrum as an individual and Mrs. Rivers. Each is responsible according to the contract for the fees of her own counsel. That the fee for the counsel for Mrs. Rivers was provided for in the decree is not a matter of which the plaintiff in error can complain.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v.
TOUCHSTONE & WILBANKS.
(No. 980.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1919.)

CARRIERS ⇐182—LIABILITY—VENUE.

The Central of Georgia Railway Company, a corporation chartered under the laws of Georgia, has its principal office in Chatham county. It did not have an agent, office, line of railway, or place of business in Tift county, Ga., but had a line of railway operating between Alexander City, Ala., and Albany, Ga., at which latter point it connected with another common carrier, the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, which operated a railroad between Albany in Dougherty county and Tifton in Tift county. On October 13, 1917, the Central of Georgia Railway Company received, at Alexander City, Ala., a carload of cattle to be transported to Tifton, Ga. The shipper and carrier entered into a written contract, which contained the following clauses: "Received by Central of Georgia Railway Company at Alexander City, Alabama, * * * from Smith Wilbanks, the live stock described, consigned and destined as indicated below, which said carrier agrees to carry to said destination, if on its own road, or otherwise to deliver to another carrier on the route to said destination. * * * And it is further agreed, that the responsibility either as common carrier, or as warehouseman, of each carrier over whose lines the property shipped hereunder shall be transported shall cease as soon as delivery is made to the next carrier, or consignee; and the liability of the said lines contracted with is several, and not joint. Neither of the said carriers shall be responsible or liable for any act of negligence of the other carrier over whose lines said property is or is to be transported." The cattle were not shipped with reasonable promptness by the initial carrier and its connecting carrier, and arrived at Tifton with the loss of some, and the others in a damaged condition. The consignor instituted a suit for damages in Tift county against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. To the petition, which alleged facts as just set forth, the defendant filed a demurrer on the ground, among others, that the petition showed upon its face that the court in Tift county was without jurisdiction. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant excepted. Held:

1. The Carmack Amendment (Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa), which fixes a liability on the initial carrier for loss or injury to goods, does not purport to deal with the venue of actions to enforce such liability; and the question of venue, which is determined by state laws, is not affected thereby.

(a) Irrespective of whether the present action be construed to be for a breach of the contract of carriage, or one in tort for loss and damage to the shipment, the allegations of the petition do not make a case where the contract was to be performed, or the damage occurred, in Tift county, within the purview of any of our statutes relating to venue in cases against railroad companies, so as to give jurisdiction over the defendant corporation in that county by having a second original issued and served upon it in the county where its home office is located.

(b) The case differs from Adair v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 21 Ga. App. 564, 94 S. E. 840, which was a suit by attachment against a foreign corporation.

(c) The ruling announced above being controlling, it is unnecessary to pass upon other questions raised by demurrer.

REAL ESTATE BANK & TRUST CO. v.
BALDWIN LOCOMOTIVE WORKS.
(No. 767.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DEED OF TRUST—CONSTRUCTION.

The evidence authorized the finding that the deed of trust executed to the plaintiff in error by the Eden Manufacturing Company did not convey title to the locomotive, the property in controversy. See the former decision in this same case, 145 Ga. 831, 90 S. E. 49.

2. RAILROADS —171(6)—SALE OF EQUIPMENT—LEASE OF EQUIPMENTS—REGISTRATION.

Sections 2791 and 2792 of the Civil Code of 1910 apply not only to railroads which are operated by corporations duly chartered, but to all railroads, whether chartered or not, in the operation of which cars and locomotives are essential.

3. RAILROADS —171(6)—SALE OF EQUIPMENT—LIEN OF VENDOR.

As this action was converted into one equitable in its nature, by amendment to the original pleadings both of the plaintiff and the defendant, the issues were to be decided under the application of equitable principles; and the jury were authorized to find, in the application of such principles, that the plaintiff in error, by reducing its claim to judgment, did not obtain a lien superior to the claim of the Baldwin Locomotive Works for the balance of the unpaid purchase money.

4. REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL.

The rulings in the foregoing headnotes, in connection with the rulings made when the case was formerly before this court, decide the controlling questions; and the court below did not err in refusing to grant a new trial.

Gilbert, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

Action by the Baldwin Locomotive Works against the Real Estate Bank & Trust Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

See, also, 145 Ga. 105, 88 S. E. 534.

Geo. H. Richter and Edward S. Elliott, both of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

H. W. Johnson, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except

GILBERT, J. (dissenting). The written instrument executed by Bourne to Baldwin Locomotive Works in the purchase of the locomotive is a contract of conditional sale. Hays v. Jordan, 85 Ga. 741, 11 S. E. 833, 9 L. R. A. 373; Cottrell v. Merchants Bank, 89 Ga. 508 (2), 519, 15 S. E. 944; North v. Goebel, 138 Ga. 739, 76 S. E. 46. It does not appear that the vendee under the conditional sale was a railroad company, or a person owning or operating a railroad; and as to recordation of the contract sections 3318, 3319, and 3259 of the Civil Code apply. There was a failure to record the instrument in the county of the residence of the vendee, as required by these sections. If, however, the vendee can be classified as a person operating a railroad, then section 2792 of the Civil Code requires that the contract be recorded in the county where the principal office is located. There was a failure to comply with this law, because it does not appear that the vendee maintained any office in a county other than Chatham, where he resided. While good as between the parties thereto, the contract of sale, as against lawfully acquired rights of third parties, was ineffectual to retain title, because of the failure to comply with the law as to recordation. Civil Code, § 3260; Cambridge Tile Co. v. Scafe Co., 137 Ga. 281, 73 S. E. 492; Pickard v. Garrett, 141 Ga. 831, 82 S. E. 251; Farmers Bank v. Avery, 145 Ga. 449, 89 S. E. 409. A record other than that required by law is a nullity. McCandless v. Yorkshire Corporation, 101 Ga. 180 (4), 182, 28 S. E. 663.

KRAMER v. SPRADLIN et al. (No. 965.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 14, 1919.)

1. WITNESSES ⇨150(4) — COMPETENCY — CASE OVERRULED.

Where a testator bequeathed and devised to his widow a promissory note payable to him, and all his interest in a deed to certain realty, executed by the maker of the note to secure its payment, and in his will expressly authorized his widow to sue on the note if it should not be paid, and to reconvey the land to the grantor in the deed (as provided by statute) in order to have the land sold under a judgment on the note as the property of the defendant, and the executor expressly consented to the legacy and devise, the widow was the assignee or transferee of the title of the testator to the note, and of his interest and rights under the deed; and where an execution issued upon a judgment on the note obtained by the widow against the maker was levied upon the land conveyed in the security deed, and a statutory claim to a part of the land was interposed, the maker of the note and security deed was an incompetent witness to testify, on the trial of the issue in the claim case, to transactions and communications between himself and the testator, relative to the note and the deed, and tending to the direct benefit of the witness and to the injury of the plaintiff in fi. fa. The decision in Austin v. Collier, 112 Ga. 247, 37 S. E. 434, in so far as it conflicts with what is here ruled, is, upon review, overruled.

2. WITNESSES ⇨158 — COMPETENCY.

Certain testimony objected to was not inadmissible on the sole ground that the witness was incompetent because of the death of the testator of the plaintiff.

Error from Superior Court, Heard County; J. R. Terrell, Judge.

Suit by Ruth Kramer against one Vaughn. Judgment for plaintiff, and execution issued against Vaughn, upon which J. W. Spradlin, Sr., interposed a statutory claim to a specified part of the land. From a directed verdict finding the land claimed not subject to execution, plaintiff excepts, and brings error. Reversed.

C. E. Boop and S. Holderness, both of Carrollton, for plaintiff in error.

Hall & Jones, of Newnan, and Willis Smith and J. L. Smith, both of Carrollton, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. Kramer made a loan of money to Vaughn, and took from him a promissory note therefor, payable to Kramer, and a deed to described land to secure the debt. Kramer died, leaving a will whereby he gave to his widow the note and all of his interest in the land conveyed as security for its payment. The will specifically stated the transaction between the testator and Vaughn, and authorized the widow to sue on the note in the event of its nonpayment, and to reconvey the land to Vaughn for the purpose of its sale under the judgment obtained upon the note, according to the statute in such cases (Civ. Code, § 6037). The executor expressly consented in writing to the legacy, both as to the note and the security deed. The note was not paid, and the widow brought suit thereon against Vaughn, and obtained a judgment. She reconveyed the land to Vaughn by a quitclaim deed, which was duly and properly filed and recorded; and afterward the execution issued upon the judgment was levied upon the land as Vaughn's property. Spradlin interposed a statutory claim to a specified part of the land; and on the trial of the issue made in the claim case the court permitted Vaughn to testify that, subsequently to the execution of the security deed to Kramer, Vaughn, for a valuable consideration, sold and conveyed to Spradlin by a warranty deed the portion of the land claimed, and that the sale and conveyance were made with the actual knowledge and expressed consent of Kramer, who really advised Vaughn and Spradlin to make the trade, and aided them in carrying it out in the execution of the conveyance. This testimony was objected to by the plaintiff in execution, on the ground that, as to the title to Vaughn's note and to the testator's interest in the security deed, the plaintiff was the assignee and transferee of her deceased husband, Kramer, who in his will gave and bequeathed to her Vaughn's note and all of the testator's interest in the land held by him at the time of his death under the deed executed to him by Vaughn to secure the payment of the note, and that Vaughn was directly interested in the result of the case, for the reason that he had conveyed to the claimant a part of the land by a warranty deed, and if it should be found subject to the plaintiff's execution, Vaughn would then be liable on his warranty to the claimant. A verdict was directed finding the land claimed not subject to the execution, and the plaintiff excepted.

"1. Where any suit is instituted or defended by a person insane at time of trial, or by an indorsee, assignee, transferee, or by the personal representative of a deceased person, the opposite party shall not be admitted to testify in his own favor against the insane or deceased person, as to transactions or communications with such insane or deceased person, whether such transactions or communications were had by such insane or deceased person with the party testifying or with any other person."

And:

"4. Where a person not a party, but a person interested in the result of the suit, is offered as a witness, he shall not be competent to testify, if as a party to the cause he would for any cause be incompetent."

The controlling question in the case is whether Mrs. Kramer, the plaintiff in execution, who is the legatee and devisee, under the will of her husband, of Vaughn's promissory note, and of all the interest of the testator in the deed given to secure the note, which the testator held at the time of his death, is the assignee and transferee as to such property within the meaning of the evidence act above quoted, so as to exclude the testimony of Vaughn, who is interested in the result of the suit, as to transactions and communications he had with the testator.

In Hendrick v. Daniel, 119 Ga. 358, 46 S. E. 438, it was held:

"Under Civil Code, § 5269 [C. C. 1910, § 5858] par. 1, in an action of ejectment the opposite party to the grantee of a deed from a deceased person is not competent to testify in his own behalf to conversations and transactions with such deceased person, affecting adversely the title conveyed by the deed; and under paragraph 5 the agent of such a party is likewise incompetent."

We quote liberally from the able opinion rendered by Mr. Justice Oandler in that case. He said:

"The literal meaning of the word 'indorsee' is easily ascertained by reference to its etymology. Indorsement applies to such written entries as may be made on the back of notes, checks, etc., and may transfer title to the paper on which it is made. The literal meaning of the word 'assignment' is much broader. In its most general sense it applies to the transfer of interest in all classes of property, real, personal, or mixed. Bouvier gives as the definition of the verb 'assign' to make or set over to another, and of 'assignment' a transfer or making over to another of the whole, of any property, real or personal, in possession or in action, or of any estate or right therein; a transfer by writing, as distinguished from one by delivery. Black's Law Dictionary (page 97) defines the word as 'the act by which one person transfers to another, or causes to vest in that other, the whole of the right, interest, or property which he has in any realty or personalty, in possession or in action, or any share, interest, or subsidiary estate therein; * * * in a narrower sense, the transfer or making over of the estate, right, or title which one has in lands and tenements.' The same authority defines the verb 'assign,' as used in conveying, as follows: 'To make or set over to another; to transfer; as to assign property, or some interest therein.' It seems clear that, technically speaking, the word 'assignment' refers to a transfer of interest in land alone, and that to apply it to a transfer of a note or similar paper is to give it a broad, rather than a technical, meaning. Literally, it most assuredly covers a conveyance of land by deed. The word 'transfer,' in its literal meaning, is broader than 'assignment,' and all the authorities agree in a definition which in effect covers any act by which the owner of anything delivers or conveys it to another with the intent to pass his rights therein. In like general terms a transferee is one to whom a transfer is made. Following the former decisions of this court, therefore, and giving to the words 'assignee' and 'transferee,' as used in the Code, a literal construction, we are forced to the conclusion that they cover the grantee in a conveyance of land. These words are the broadest that could possibly have been used. A literal construction of either necessarily includes a vendee, grantee, or donee. That such was the meaning intended to be given them by the lawmaking power we think can easily be established by an application of any or all of the well-known rules for the construction of statutes. [Underscoring ours.] The act of 1889 and the amending act of 1893 are both remedial statutes. The evil sought to be cured was that the living took advantage of the dead, the sane of the insane, by giving testimony the power to contradict which was buried in the tomb or obscured by dethroned reason. By the decision of this court in the case of Woodson v. Jones, supra [92 Ga. 662, 19 S. E. 60], it was brought to the attention of the General Assembly that the act of 1889 failed of its full purpose, and it was accordingly amended by the act of 1893. To use a homely metaphor, by inserting in the law as it stood the word 'indorsee' the Legislature healed the particular malady pointed out by the decision in the case cited, and then, to guard against a relapse, or the possibility of a similar attack in the future, it inoculated the patient with the words 'assignee' and 'transferee.' The mischief as it existed prior to the passage of the act of 1889 was plain. That act did not accomplish its full purpose, and so, in 1893, the General Assembly amended it so as to cover all possible cases where the same mischief threatened, and where estates, real, personal, or mixed, of deceased or insane persons, might otherwise be obtained or damaged by allowing parties to suits affecting such estates to testify to communications and transactions with such deceased or insane persons. With the full nature and extent of the evil clearly apparent, we cannot believe that the General Assembly intended to protect the estate of a deceased indorsee of a note against the testimony of the living maker, at the same time allowing it to be wronged by nullifying his warranty deed to a tract of land. On what theory it can be supposed that the General Assembly sought to protect the purchaser of a note and leave unprotected the grantee of a piece of real estate we are at a loss to conceive. [Underscoring ours.]”

In Hendricks v. Allen, 128 Ga. 181, 57 S. E. 224, the decision in Hendrick v. Daniel, supra, holding that the grantee in a conveyance of land was an assignee or transferee was followed. In Turner v. Woodward, 136 Ga. 275, 71 S. E. 418, it was held that the grantee or donee in a deed of gift who was the defendant in the action was an assignee or transferee of the title within the meaning of the Civil Code, § 5858, par. 1, and that the plaintiff was incompetent as a witness to testify to transactions between himself and the deceased grantor or donor of the defendant. In Hudson v. Broughton, 147 Ga. 547, 94 S. E. 1007, it was held:

“On the trial of an action to recover a house and lot, brought by a vendee in a warranty deed against a donee in possession under claim of a parol gift from the same transferor to an undivided half interest in the lot, with valuable improvements made thereon by the donee, and with actual notice to the plaintiff by the donee prior to and at the date of the deed from the vendor to the vendee, where at the time of trial the vendor and donor was dead, it was not error to refuse to permit the plaintiff and her agent to testify as to alleged conversations and transactions with the vendor relative to the transfer of the house and lot to the plaintiff.”

Considering the beneficent purpose of the General Assembly in passing and amending the evidence act as set forth in section 5858 of the Civil Code, and as was so clearly and forcibly expressed by Mr. Justice Candler in Hendrick v. Daniel, supra, and the ruling in that case and the subsequent cases approving and following it, to the effect that a grantee and a donee in a conveyance of land are assignees and transferees in contemplation of that act, we reach the confident conclusion that a legatee and a devisee are also assignees and transferees within the contemplation of that act; and therefore, in the circumstances of this case, it was error to permit the witness Vaughn, who was interested in the result of the case, to give the testimony objected to, as to transactions and communications between himself and the testator of the plaintiff.

In McMechen v. McMechen, 17 W. Va. 683, 41 Am. Rep. 682, it was held that the devisees of a testator are his assignees within the meaning of a statute of that state declaring that—

“A party shall not be examined in his own behalf in respect to any transaction or communications had personally with a deceased person, against parties who are the executors, administrators, heirs at law, or next of kin, or assignees of such deceased person, where they have acquired title to the cause of action from or through such deceased person, or have been sued as such executors, administrators, heirs at law, next of kin, or assignees.”

In the opinion it was said:

“It has been held in New York, upon the construction of a statute similar to ours, that the devisees of real estate are the assignees of the testator within the meaning of their statute, and we think properly so; and therefore the devisees of the real estate under the will of Shepherd McMechen are the assignees of said Shepherd McMechen within the meaning of section 23, c. 130, of our Code. Buck v. Stanton, 51 N. Y. 624; Cornell v. Cornell, 12 Hun [N. Y.] 314.”

In Hayes v. Hayes, 45 N. J. Eq. 461, 17 Atl. 634, it was held that the legatee of a debt was an assignee for the purpose of suing thereon. In Joss v. Mohn, 55 N. J. Law, 407, 28 Atl. 987, an action against devisees to recover a sum of money which the plaintiff claimed to have loaned to their decedent, it was held that the devisees were the representatives of the deceased debtor, and that the plaintiff was incompetent to testify to any transaction with or statement made by the decedent. As to the statute of that state on the subject, the court said:

“The import of” the statute, “as judicially construed, is to exclude any testimony concerning any transaction with or statement by any testator or intestate represented in an action, by a party to the action, where either of the parties sues or is sued in a representative capacity, unless the representative offers himself as a witness in his own behalf, and testifies to such transactions or statements.”

On the subject see 40 Cyc. 2304, and 5 O. J. 838, § 4, to the effect that an assignee is “one to whom rights have been transmitted by particular title, such as a sale, gift, legacy, transfer, or cession”; Bouvier's Law Dic. "Assignee." In McAleer v. McNamara, 140 Iowa, 112, 117 N. W. 1122, it was held that a mere donee should not be held to be an assignee under the statute of that state in reference to the competency of witnesses. This decision is, however, in conflict with the decisions of this court on our statute, heretofore cited. We are aware that a ruling contrary to what we hold in this case was made in Hight v. Sackett, 34 N. Y. 447, as to the meaning of the word “assignee”; but we are not at all impressed with the correctness of that decision.

This court, in Austin v. Collier, 112 Ga. 247, 37 S. E. 434, held that legatees under a will were not indorsees, assignees, or transferees, or personal representatives of the deceased, so as to render the plaintiff, who sued to recover land from them, an incompetent witness as to transactions and communications between the plaintiff and the testator. Counsel for the plaintiff in the present case have requested that the decision just cited be reviewed and overruled. After mature consideration, we are of the opinion that the decision so rendered was erroneous; and we overrule the same in so far as it conflicts with the ruling here made.

[2] 2. The witness Street, to whose testimony the plaintiff in execution objected, was not incompetent to testify that he purchased from Vaughn with the consent of Kramer, a portion of the land which Vaughn had conveyed to Kramer in the security deed; it not appearing that the land which Street claimed to have purchased was any part of the land Vaughn sold to Spradlin; it, moreover, not appearing that the conveyance that Vaughn may have executed to Street contained a warranty of title. Street's testimony was not objected to on the ground that it was irrelevant. It was admitted, but it did not authorize the judge to direct the verdict. The direction of the verdict was error.

Judgment reversed.

1. DEEDS \S 38(1), 41, 112(1)—VALIDITY—DESCRIPTION.

The third item of the will of Phil. M. Byrd devised to his wife, Mary, for life, all of his "estate both real and personal or mixed." The ninth item provided: "I give and bequeath to my beloved niece Emiline M. Chapman, for her sole and separate use for and during her natural life, all the estate, both real and personal or mixed, conveyed by the third item of this will to my wife Mary, after her estate therein is over. The estate in this item contained, at the death of my said niece Emiline M. Chapman, shall pass to and become the property in equal shares of the children or representatives of children, including Joseph L. Chapman, the husband of the said Emiline M. Chapman." The testator died seized and possessed, among other properties, of a city lot in Gainesville, Hall county, Ga., and lots of land 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 40, 47, and 14 in the Twelfth district of Hall county, Ga. When the will was probated Emiline M. Chapman had a daughter, Fannie Suddeth. On the assumption that she had a vested interest in these lands under the will, Fannie Suddeth executed to Quillian a bond for title, and afterward died, Emiline M. Chapman being still in life. After the death of Fannie, her husband and children as heirs at law received the agreed consideration specified in the bond for title, and executed a deed which, after reciting the bond for title and payment of the consideration to them, described the land as follows: "All the lands in Hall county, Georgia, of which Phil. M. Byrd, late of Hall county, deceased, died seized and possessed, being all the interest to which said Mrs. Fannie M. Suddeth had or may be entitled under the will of said Byrd, or which said Fannie M. Suddeth had or may be otherwise entitled in and to said land, whether more or less than one-seventh, or which we as heirs at law as aforesaid have or may be otherwise entitled in and to said lands, whether more or less than one-seventh, including lots of land Nos. 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 40, 47, and 14 in the Twelfth district of Hall county, Georgia, subject to the life interest of Emiline M. Chapman." The deed concluded as follows: "To have and to hold the said bargained premises * * * forever in fee simple. And the said parties of the first part, their heirs, executors, and administrators will warrant and forever defend the right and title of the above-described property unto the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, against the claims of all persons whomsoever." Held:

A deed to land is not void for uncertainty of description, if it furnishes the key to the identification of the land intended to be conveyed by the grantor. Crawford v. Verner, 122 Ga. 814, 50 S. E. 958; Swint v. Swint, 147 Ga. 467, 94 S. E. 571(2). Under this rule, when considered in connection with the will and extrinsic evidence identifying the land of which the testator died seized and possessed, the deed is not void for uncertainty of description. Yopp v. A. C. L. R. Co., 148 Ga. 539, 97 S. E. 534; Hayes v. Dickson, 148 Ga. —, 98 S. E. 345.

(a) Properly construed, the deed conveyed all of the interest of the grantors in the land acquired under the will of the testator, including the lot in Gainesville.

(b) The requisites as to matters of description in a deed are the same whether based upon a valuable or a good consideration. Civil Code 1910, \S 4179.

2. ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR.

The assignments of error relating to admissibility of evidence, so far as sufficient to present any question for consideration are without merit.

3. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE — ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR.

The evidence was sufficient to authorize the jury to find for the defendant upon the issue of fraud, accident and mistake in the execution of the deed. The remaining assignments of error do not relate to the controlling questions in the case, and do not show cause for a reversal.

BARTLETT et al. v. TAYLOR et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1919.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. RULINGS ON PLEA IN ABATEMENT AND DEMURRERS.

The demurrer to the plea in abatement was properly sustained, and the court did not err in overruling the general and special demurrers to the petition.

*(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)2. CORPORATIONS —557(1)—MARSHALING ASSETS—APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER.

A corporation as plaintiff cannot maintain an equitable suit to marshal its own assets, and the appointment of receivers under such a proceeding, over duly made objection of the stockholders and creditors, is error.

3. BANKS AND BANKING —225—RECEIVERSHIP—INJUNCTION AGAINST CREDITOR.

The directors of a solvent bank or a majority of them cannot have a receivership for the bank and its assets, an injunction against its creditors and other equitable relief, although the action in which such relief is sought may have been authorized by the directors and stockholders of the bank.

4. BANKS AND BANKING —77(2)—RECEIVERSHIP—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

Where directors of bank, to prevent a run and to preserve its assets for its creditors and stockholders, petitioned for appointment of receivers, and bank, its stockholders, and creditors against whom injunctive relief was sought were made parties, such stockholders by collateral attack cannot question court's jurisdiction to appoint receivers and to marshal and distribute bank's assets.

5. BANKS AND BANKING —77(2)—RECEIVERSHIP—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS—ESTOPPEL.

Where bank directors, to prevent a run and to preserve assets for creditors and stockholders, petitioned for appointment of receivers, and the bank and stockholders were made parties, and assets were reduced to possession and distributed under order of court, the stockholders who had had benefit of receivership, when sued by receivers to enforce their liability for benefit of depositors under Civ. Code 1910, § 2249, could not first attack court's jurisdiction to appoint receivers, etc.

6. BANKS AND BANKING —77(6)—SUIT FOR RECEIVERSHIP—PARTIES—PRESUMPTION.

In entire absence of allegation to contrary of plea in abatement in receivers' suit against stockholders alleging that all stockholders were parties, court will assume that all stockholders were parties, duly served with process, or had actual notice of directors' suit for appointment of receivers, authorized to be brought against bank, its stockholders and others.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; H. A. Mathews, Judge.

Suit by R. J. Taylor and others, receivers, against C. L. Bartlett and others. Demurrer to plea in abatement sustained, and general and special demurrers to petition overruled, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

C. L. Bartlett, Roland Ellis, C. H. Hall, Jr., Hall & Roberts, and Noltingham & Holliman, all of Macon, for plaintiffs in error.

Miller & Jones and Hardeman, Jones, Park & Johnston, all of Macon, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. [1] Taylor et al., as receivers of the Exchange Bank of Macon, brought suit against certain stockholders of that bank, to enforce, on behalf of unpaid depositors in the bank, the individual liability of the stockholders under the charter. The defendants, who appear as plaintiffs in error in this case, at the first term after which they were made parties to the litigation, filed a special plea in the nature of a plea in abatement, and demurred generally and specially to the petition. Many of the questions raised by demurrer in this case were adjudicated against the plaintiffs in error in the case of Lamar v. Taylor, 141 Ga. 227, 80 S. E. 1085. The grounds of demurrer not so adjudicated were ruled upon adversely to them in the case of Harris v. Taylor, 97 S. E. 860, except as hereinafter noted.

In the petition filed by the receivers it was alleged that they were appointed in the case of Schofield et al. v. Exchange Bank of Macon and others (including named creditor and the stockholders of the bank), commenced in the superior court of Bibb county on July 8, 1907; that the petitioners in that case alleged themselves to be a majority of the directors of the bank; that the cause so commenced is still pending; that the petition in that cause, of file in said court, is made a part of the record in this case; that the present petition is auxiliary to the main cause; and that petitioners, under authority and direction of the court, since August 20, 1907, have administered the assets of the bank. The further allegations of the petition are in substance set forth in the report of the cases of Lamar v. Taylor, supra, Turpin v. Taylor, 143 Ga. 224, 84 S. E. 547, and Harris v. Taylor, supra. It appears from the original petition in the case of Schofield et al. v. Exchange Bank of Macon et al., that the plaintiffs in that case were authorized by resolution of the directors to bring that action against the Exchange Bank, the stockholders, and the creditor named as defendant therein, for the appointment of receivers, for injunction against threatened suits, and for distribution of the assets of the bank to depositors, creditors, and stockholders, according to their respective rights and priorities, as a necessary measure to prevent a "run" on the bank, which was alleged to be imminent, and the consequent wrecking of the bank, which was in fact solvent, according to the allegations there made.

The special plea, and so much of the demurrer not heretofore considered in the cases mentioned, raised the contention that the court was without jurisdiction and authority to appoint receivers for the Exchange Bank upon the petition of the directors thereof. It was insisted that the directors could not legally invoke the appointment of receivers to take charge of and administer the assets of the bank, a solvent corporation; that the duty of managing the affairs of the bank devolved upon the directors; that the appointment of receivers was null and void; and that the receivers had no legal right to administer the assets of said bank and to prosecute the present action. The court sustained a demurrer to the special plea, and overruled the general and special demurrer filed by the defendants, and they excepted.

[2-4] It is conceded that under the rule of force in this state a corporation cannot, as plaintiff, maintain an equitable suit to marshal its own assets, and that the appointment of receivers under such a proceeding, over the objection of creditors or stockholders, duly made, is error. Steele Lumber Co. v. Laurens Lumber Co., 98 Ga. 329, 24 S. E. 755; Gresham v. Crossland, 59 Ga. 270; Martin v. Brown, 129 Ga. 562, 569, 59 S. E. 302. It is also conceded that the directors of a solvent bank, or a majority of them, cannot have a receivership for the bank and its assets, an injunction against the creditors of the bank, and other equitable relief, although the action in which such relief is sought may have been authorized by the directors and stockholders of the bank. Bank of Soperton v. Empire Realty, etc., Co., 142 Ga. 34, 82 S. E. 464. But where, as in this case, the directors of a bank, in order to prevent a run upon the bank and to preserve its assets for its creditors and stockholders alike, petition the court of equity for the appointment of receivers, and the bank itself, its stockholders, and creditors against whom injunctive relief is sought are duly made parties to the proceeding, such stockholders will not be heard to question, by collateral attack, the authority and jurisdiction of the court to appoint the receivers, and to marshal and distribute the assets of the bank.

[5] It will be noted that the receivers were appointed in 1907. Practically all the assets of the bank were reduced to the possession of the receivers so appointed, and by them distributed under orders of the court. Five years thereafter, the stockholders, who, with one exception, were parties defendant in the case in which the receivers were appointed, invoked the decisions of this court cited above, and insisted that the court was without jurisdiction in the premises. The proceeding was undertaken primarily for the benefit of the stockholders. They had full notice and knowledge of the appointment of the receivers, and they cannot now be heard to question the jurisdiction of the court when they are called upon to pay to the receivers, for the benefit of depositors, the respective amounts for which they are liable under the charter. They cannot in such circumstances accept the possible benefit of the receivership, and at the same time deny the power and authority of the court to fully administer the assets of the corporation, including the charter liability of the stockholders, for the benefit of depositors. Had they interposed a timely objection to the appointment of the receivers, a different question would be presented. Attention is also called to the fact that these receivers, after having distributed practically all the assets of the bank, made application to the court for direction and authority with respect to filing the present suit against the stockholders. The petition was prepared and presented to the court, and in open court an order was passed directing and authorizing the receivers to file the same against the stockholders. At the date of this order the bank was admittedly insolvent; there were unpaid depositors; these depositors under the charter of the bank had the right to look to the stockholders for the payment of their deposits. Under Civil Code, § 2249, the charter liability of the stockholder is expressly made an asset of the corporation, to be recovered by the assignee, receiver, or other person having the legal right to enforce the same. To the date of the filing of the suit against the stockholders, under the order thus granted, no question was raised by any creditor or stockholder touching the jurisdiction of the court of equity to appoint receivers upon the application of the bank's directors and for the purposes hereinbefore indicated. Without regard to the character of the attack upon the authority and jurisdiction of the court, it must be held that the objection now comes too late.

[6] We have said that the stockholders here complaining, with possibly one exception, were parties to the original proceeding in which the receivers were appointed. We have thus conceded that one of the stockholders may not have been served with process in that suit. The record upon this question is, however, by no means clear. So far as appears from the allegations of the plea in abatement, all the complaining stockholders were made parties in the main case, and were duly served with process therein. In the entire absence of allegation to the contrary, we must assume that all the stockholders were parties and were duly served with process, or else had actual notice of the filing of the suit by the directors on behalf of the stockholders. We are of the opinion that the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the plea in abatement, and in overruling the general and special demurrers to the petition.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS Ⓒ388(5)
—VENDOR AND PURCHASER Ⓒ235—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—PAYMENT OF PURCHASE PRICE—EVIDENCE.

It is well settled that the actual payment, before notice, of the purchase price, is essential to the maintenance of the claim that one is a bona fide purchaser of property for value and without notice; and, applying that rule to the present case, as it should be under the evidence, the verdict directed by the court was the only one that could have been rendered under the facts contained in the record, and the court did not err in so directing.

Error from Superior Court, Berrien County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Suit by P. H. Gaskins against M. Rowe and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants except and bring error, and plaintiff takes a cross-bill of exceptions. Judgment on main bill of exceptions affirmed, and cross-bill dismissed.

E. K. Wilcox, of Valdosta, and J. P. Knight, of Nashville, for plaintiffs in error. Quincey & Rice, of Ocilla, and C. A. Christian, of Nashville, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. P. H. Gaskins brought his petition to recover certain lands and have certain deeds canceled against M. Rowe and against H. C. Reynolds as administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo of the estate of John Reynolds. The petitioner showed, and it was not controverted, that John Reynolds became the owner of the property by a grant from the state of Georgia, and both Gaskins and Rowe derived title from John Reynolds. The petition shows a deed from John Reynolds, dated in 1839, to James M. Davison, and then a series of conveyances from Davison, finally vesting the petitioner with title. The defendants show that H. C. Reynolds became administrator de bonis non of the estate some 50 or 60 years after the date of the deed from John Reynolds to Davison, and an administrator's deed from H. C. Reynolds to defendant Rowe. The deed from John Reynolds to Davison was never recorded, and Rowe claims as a bona fide purchaser without notice of the deed from John Reynolds to Davison.

If Rowe was a bona fide purchaser for value from H. C. Reynolds without notice of the prior conveyance of John Reynolds, H. C. Reynolds' intestate, or if the evidence required the submission to the jury of the question as to whether he was a bona fide purchaser for value, the direction of the verdict was error. But we are of the opinion that the uncontroverted evidence shows that Rowe was not a bona fide purchaser. He took the deed under which he claims from the administrator of John Reynolds, who had been dead when H. C. Reynolds was appointed administrator, some 60 years after the death of John Reynolds and 25 years after the death of the executor named in the will of John Reynolds; and while the deed which he took from H. C. Reynolds recited a consideration of $3,000, as a matter of fact he paid in cash $5 and gave his note and a mortgage on the land for the remainder. In the petition it is charged that there was an understanding and an agreement between Rowe and H. C. Reynolds, the administrator de bonis non, that the remainder of the purchase money should not be paid in the event the title conveyed to Gaskins should not stand the test of a lawsuit. There were one or two small payments made by Rowe after the first cash payment of $5, amounting to some $200. Rowe did not undertake to testify in the case to meet this charge, contained in the petition, that he was not to pay the balance of the purchase money unless it should appear in any litigation that should be instituted to recover the land that he had a valid title. Reynolds, however, was not entirely silent on this question. He testified on the trial, in part, as follows:

"Mr. Rowe has not paid me anything. I have never received anything for the lot of land; as far as the money transaction is concerned, I know nothing about what agreement was made, and could not refer to it intelligently. The matter was referred to Mr. Davison. He knew better than I do. I believe I had a letter from Mr. Rowe. I turned the letter over to Col. Davison. I corresponded with no one. I supposed Rowe was to pay for it; that was left up to my attorney. There was no understanding whatever on Rowe's part, but my understanding was that, if there was a lawsuit, and it was won, it would help me; if not, I would not be. About the other transaction I was ignorant. I understood that I would get something out of it, if it was won."

In view of such testimony, coming from the grantor in the deed to Rowe, the charge made in the petition, and the silence of Rowe at the trial, we think the court was authorized to assume as uncontroverted that there was an understanding between Rowe and the administrator that the place should not be paid for, if it should appear on the trial of any action brought to recover the land that Rowe did not have a valid title. Whether such agreement on the part of such administrator could have been set up as a defense by Rowe need not be decided. In the case of Colquitt v. Thomas, 8 Ga. 258, 278, it was said:

"When a purchaser goes into equity for relief against a prior incumbrance, upon the ground that he is a bona fide purchaser without notice, he will not be relieved, if he has notice before he pays all the purchase money, although he has paid a part. The rule in such a case goes thus far, to wit: Notice before actual payment of all the purchase money, although it be secured, and the conveyance actually executed, or before the execution of the conveyance, notwithstanding the money be actually paid, is equivalent to notice before the contract."

In the case of Whiddon v. Whiddon, 148 Ga. 255, 96 S. E. 431, it was said:

"In order to defeat the legal title in the plaintiffs, it was necessary, under the pleadings in this case, for the defendant to show that he was a bona fide purchaser for value without notice; and where it appears that he had not paid the consideration, but at most had only paid a part of the consideration, before he received knowledge of the outstanding legal title, he could not occupy the position of an innocent purchaser for value, so as to entirely defeat the outstanding legal title. Whether under proper equitable pleadings he could have secured, and have had the court to frame, a decree which would have protected his interest, and interest proportionate to the part of the consideration which he had paid, need not be discussed, as he did not file equitable pleadings seeking to have such a decree framed and granted."

The counsel for the plaintiff in error insist that this rule, which deprives the subsequent purchaser of the position of a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice, where a prior purchaser had failed to record his deed, or did not record it for any reason, is not applicable to cases of sales by administrators, and they base this contention upon the ground that the doctrine of caveat emptor applies in administrators' sales, and that a purchaser with deferred payments of property at an administrator's sale would be compelled to comply with his contract of purchase. Without deciding whether, as a general rule, the doctrine that one who has not paid the purchase money for land does not occupy the position of a bona fide purchaser is applicable to administrators' sales, we think the doctrine is applicable to a sale made under the circumstances shown here, as against Rowe and the administrator; for Rowe, the court was authorized to hold, had taken a deed with the understanding that he would not pay the purchase money if it should appear that he did not get a good title. Under the uncontroverted facts shown in this record, we think the rule applies with all its force. As laying down the doctrine that the purchase money for land must be actually paid before notice, where one seeks to set up and maintain the character of a bona fide purchaser, see Jewett v. Palmer, 7 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 65, 11 Am. Dec. 401; Barney v. McCarty, 15 Iowa, 510, 83 Am. Dec. 429; Trice v. Comstock, 57 C. C. A. 647, 121 Fed. 620, (6) 61 L. R. A. 176; Davis v. Ward, 109 Cal. 186, 41 Pac. 1010, 50 Am. St. Rep. 29; Macauley v. Smith, 132 N. Y. 524, 30 N. E. 998; Bell v. Pleasant, 145 Cal. 410, 78 Pac. 957, 104 Am. St. Rep. 61; Boone v. Chiles, 10 Pet. 179, 9 L. Ed. 389; 3 Washburn on Real Property, § 2200. It follows from what has been said that the judgment refusing a new trial should be affirmed; and the judgment of the court below having been affirmed on the main bill of exceptions, the cross-bill of exceptions is dismissed.

EISFELDT v. CITY OF ATLANTA et al.

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. INNKEEPERS — ROOMING HOUSE—LICENSE FROM MUNICIPALITY.

The business of keeping a rooming house is one so far affecting the public health, morals, or welfare that it is competent for municipal authorities to require persons conducting such a business to obtain a license, where the Legislature in the exercise of the police power has conferred upon the municipality the necessary authority to pass ordinances upon this question.

2. INJUNCTION — EVIDENCE—REFUSAL TO GRANT LICENSE.

The evidence objected to in this case tended to illustrate material issues involved, and the court did not err in overruling the objections.

3. REFUSAL OF INJUNCTION.

There was no abuse of discretion in refusing an injunction.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action for injunction by Mrs. Julia Eisfeldt against the City of Atlanta and others. Judgment for defendants refusing an injunction, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. H. Leavitt, Richard B. Russell, and Holbrook & Corbett, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

J. L. Mayson and S. D. Hewlett, both of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

BECK, P. J. Mrs. Julia Eisfeldt filed her petition against the city of Atlanta and the chief of police of that city, alleging as follows: She is a resident, and conducts a rooming house located at 135 Ivy street in that city. She holds the premises thus designated under a lease for a term of years, and pays an annual rental of $1,380. She has spent a large sum in putting the premises in habitable condition and in furnishing the house, her savings for many years being invested therein; and she is unable to make a livelihood by any other business. She made application to the mayor and council of the city for permit to conduct a rooming house, which was referred to the police committee. Under ordinances of the city it is the duty of that committee to meet in the city hall on Thursday immediately before the regular meeting of the council, for the purpose of passing on such applications as are referred to it. On Thursday, September 13, 1917, the day upon which it was to meet, according to the ordinances of the city, the committee did not meet, and, although petitioner's attorney was present in the city hall and in the room where said committee was to meet, she was not given an opportunity to present her application in person, or for a hearing in her behalf by said committee. At the regular meeting of the city council on September 17, 1917, J. Lee Barnes, chairman of the police committee, stated in open meeting of the council that the committee did not meet as required by law; and each member of the committee signed an adverse report on petitioner's application during the session of the said council on that date, and she was denied a permit to conduct the rooming house. At the time of making the application she tendered to the city clerk $25, the fee for a license to conduct a rooming house, but it was refused. On September 18, 1917, she again made application for a permit to conduct a rooming house at 135 Ivy street, and again tendered to the city clerk $25, the license fee required, and it was refused. She makes a continuous tender of the fee; she is willing at all times to comply with the laws and ordinances of the city of Atlanta, and is now ready to pay the license fee required by the city for permission to conduct the rooming house. On August 13, 1917, she was served with a summons to appear in the recorder's court in the city of Atlanta on the next day, to answer the charge of keeping and maintaining a rooming house without a permit. At that time her application was pending before the city council; and on September 5, 1917, when the case came on to be heard, the charge against her was dismissed. From time to time the members of the police department have invaded her home and premises at 135 Ivy street, without a warrant and without any reasonable cause therefor, and that the chief of police is continually threatening to arrest her for conducting the rooming house. To deny her the right to conduct the rooming house would cause her great and irreparable damage and loss of the money she has invested; and unless the acts and conduct of the defendants be restrained, they will deprive her of her property without due process of law, and deny to her the equal protection of the laws. Waiving discovery, she prays that the city and the chief of police, as well as their subordinates, be enjoined and restrained from interfering with or disturbing her in the peaceful maintenance of the rooming house, and from going in or about said premises without a warrant issued according to law, and for general relief. When the case came on for a hearing the trial court refused the injunction.

[1] 1. We are of the opinion that the court did not err in refusing to grant the injunction in this case. Evidence was introduced tending to show that the rooming house conducted by the plaintiff was of a disorderly character, and that she maintained it for immoral purposes. Numerous affidavits were introduced by her, tending to show that the house conducted by her was not a disorderly house, and that it was not conducted in such a way as to violate the law. The evidence made an issue of fact, and therefore an issue for determination by the court hearing the case, who determined it adversely to the plaintiff.

It is cogently urged in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff that operating a rooming house is a useful, and per se a perfectly lawful, occupation and business, and that the city of Atlanta has no discretion as to granting or refusing licenses to operate a useful and per se lawful business. Among other cases cited to support this position is that of Peginis v. Atlanta, 132 Ga. 302, 63 S. E. 857, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 716. The question of revoking a license which had been granted the proprietor of a restaurant was involved in the Peginis Case, and upon other facts it differs from the branch of the instant case now under consideration. Substantially the same question as that here involved was decided in Cutsinger v. Atlanta, 142 Ga. 555, 83 S. E. 263, L. R. A. 1915B, 1097, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 280, thus:

"The business of keeping a hotel, lodging house, or rooming house is one so far affecting the public health, morals, or welfare that it is competent for the Legislature, in the exercise of the police power, to authorize municipal authorities to require persons conducting such a business to obtain a license."

The full discussion in the Cutsinger Case of the question involved renders further discussion here unnecessary.

It is also argued in the brief that no ordinance requiring one to obtain a license to maintain a rooming house was introduced in evidence; and that for this reason the court erred in deciding adversely to the plaintiff. We do not think there is any merit in this contention. It is true that neither the ordinance nor a duly certified copy thereof was introduced in evidence; and usually, in order to show the existence of an ordinance, it is necessary that there should be proof of the same. This rule should not be applied with strictness in this court, because, both under the pleadings and the evidence of the plaintiff, while it is not distinctly stated that there was an ordinance requiring one to obtain a license for the purpose of conducting a rooming house, the existence of the ordinance is distinctly recognized in the plaintiff's petition and in certain parts of the evidence introduced by her, and the existence of the ordinance was not contested on the trial. It is recognized in the petition itself, though not plainly alleged to exist, for the petitioner does show that she made application to the mayor and council of the city for a permit to conduct a rooming house, "and that the said permit was, in the ordinary course, referred to a committee of council, known as the police committee." Again, it is alleged in the petition that "under the ordinances of the city of Atlanta, it is the duty of the said police committee to meet in the city hall on the Thursday immediately before the regular meeting of council, for the purpose of passing on such applications as are referred to it." And in more than one place it is alleged that petitioner "tendered to the city clerk of the city of Atlanta the sum of $25, the fee for a license to conduct such rooming house." It is nowhere in the petition alleged that no such license is required by ordinance, nor that the ordinance requiring the fee is invalid.

We are further of the opinion that the evidence does not show that the ordinance in regard to licenses which are to be secured by those seeking to engage in the business of conducting rooming houses is being administered in an arbitrary manner. The application for the license in question is referred to a committee in due course, as appears from the petition itself; and in the present case the chairman of the police committee, in his affidavit, denies that he had stated that his committee did not meet according to law. If, as a matter of fact, the committee and the chairman of the committee acted in an arbitrary manner in regard to the application of this petitioner, steps should have been taken to compel the committee to give the applicant an opportunity of making a showing, if any question should arise as to her being a suitable person to obtain such permit; but she could not, because of the failure of the committee, in the particular instance alleged, to have a meeting and grant her permit, operate a rooming house, for which an ordinance required her to obtain a license, without becoming subject to the penalties imposed by the ordinance.

[2,3] 2. Error is assigned upon certain rulings in admitting, over objection, evidence tending to illustrate the issue as to whether or not the permit to run the rooming house should have been granted upon the application of the petitioner; but we are of the opinion that this evidence was properly admitted.

Judgment affirmed.

FRANK v. McEACHIN. (No. 959.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1919.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE $\S 49\frac{1}{2}$ (2,6) 185—SALE OF WIFE'S SEPARATE ESTATE—JURISDICTION OF JUDGE OF CIRCUIT COURT — "DEED OF GIFT."

A contract by a wife to sell her separate estate to her husband is void unless it is allowed by order of the superior court of the county of her domicile. The judge of the superior court of the county of the wife's domicile has no jurisdiction to grant such an order in vacation, and a contract of sale made in pursuance of such vacation order is void.

A wife may give her separate estate to her husband without an order of the superior court; but such a gift will not be presumed. To establish it the evidence must be clear, unequivocal, and free from doubt that the parties intended the transaction to be a gift.

Proof merely that an instrument purporting on its face to be a warranty deed consummating a sale, for a stated consideration, by a wife to her husband, of land constituting her separate estate, and made under a vacation order of a judge of the superior court, was without consideration; would not convert it into a "deed of gift."

In this case there was no evidence of a clear and unequivocal character showing the intention of the parties, free from doubt, that the transaction between the wife and the husband was a gift from her to him of the land in controversy.

The action being to recover land, and against a widow, the maker of an instrument as referred to above, which was the only title under which the plaintiff claimed, the judge, under the legal principles hereinbefore announced, and on the evidence submitted, properly refused, on a preliminary hearing, to grant an interlocutory injunction, and to appoint a temporary receiver.

Error from Superior Court, Jeff Davis County; J. P. Highsmith, Judge.

Action by E. A. Frank against A. E. McEachin for an injunction and a receivership. From a judgment refusing a temporary injunction, and the appointment of a receiver, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Jno. C. Bennett, of Hazlehurst, and C. H. Parker and W. W. Bennett, both of Baxley, for plaintiff in error.

C. B. Conyers, of Brunswick, and Jno. Rogers, Jr., of Hazlehurst, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. This is an action brought by Edward A. Frank against Angel E. McEachin for the recovery of several parcels of land, and for an injunction and a receivership. On an interlocutory hearing the plaintiff submitted evidence in brief as follows: (1) A conveyance in the form of warranty deed dated April 25, 1905, from Mrs. Angel E. McEachin to G. W. McEachin, her husband, for an expressed consideration of a stated sum of money, the receipt of which was acknowledged in the instrument, which contained a recital that the land "is sold in pursuance of an order of court and attached hereto and made a part of this deed, which is true." Attached to the instrument is a petition to the superior court of the domicile of Mrs. McEachin, signed by an attorney purporting to represent the petitioner, and praying for an order allowing petitioner to sell the land described in the deed to which the petition is attached for the consideration therein named. On April 24, 1905, "at chambers," the judge ordered that the petitioner be "allowed to sell the land described in her petition, for the consideration named, to her husband, G. W. McEachin," and that the petition and order be recorded with the deed. (2) A security deed dated January 12, 1912, from G. W. McEachin to the Union Savings Bank of Richmond county, Ga., executed to secure a loan from the bank to the grantor, with a power of sale to the grantee if the note for the loan should not be paid. (3) A written transfer of the security deed, February 13, 1912, by the bank to George J. Babson, with all the rights of the bank under the security deed. (4) A deed dated February 5, 1918, from Babson to Frank, the plaintiff, made in accordance with a sale of the land under the power in the security deed. (5) Certain allegations made in a petition of Mrs. Angel E. McEachin against Babson et al., brought on May 1, 1915, to the effect that she was compelled and coerced by her husband to execute the deed from her to him, dated April 25, 1905, and that such deed was without any consideration of any sort paid or promised to be paid by him to her. (6) An allegation in a petition brought by Mrs. Angel E. McEachin against Wesley White et al., on September 21, 1914, as follows:

"Petitioner shows that she holds said lands under the permission of her husband, G. W. McEachin, who is helpless from infirmity, and that she made the rent contract with the defendants; and that the said Whites, under the terms of said contract, are share croppers."

This allegation was verified by Mrs. McEachin. (7) The testimony of Mrs. McEachin, given on the trial of an action brought by her against the Union Savings Bank et al., prior to the institution of the present suit, to the effect that she never employed the attorney who prepared and presented the petition to the judge for the sale of her land to her husband; that she was not acquainted with such attorney, and had never seen him. "I just signed it [the deed from her to her husband] for nothing, so far as receiving anything is concerned. I signed it because he told me to sign it. No other reason prompted me to sign it. I signed it because he told me to. I didn't want to sign it. * * * I was unwilling to sign it, and didn't want to sign it; but he told me to sign it, and I signed it."

The defendant testified to the effect that the land was hers; that she and her husband moved upon it about 1897 or 1898; that she lived on it with her husband until his death in January, 1915; that she had remained in possession of it as her own property since his death; and that the statement made in her case against the Whites was written by her attorney, and she did not understand the effect thereof.

The plaintiff in an action for land must prove title in himself. This the plaintiff in the present case undertook to do by the evidence hereinbefore set out. As will be seen, he claimed title under the defendant, Mrs. McEachin, and sought to prove that she conveyed the land in dispute to her husband; that he conveyed to the bank by the execution of a security deed to it; that the bank transferred the security deed and all rights it had thereunder, as well as the note secured thereby, to Babson; and that Babson, in accordance with the power given in the security deed, sold the land and conveyed it to the plaintiff, Frank. Civil Code, § 3009, provides:

"No contract of sale of a wife as to her separate estate with her husband or her trustee shall be valid, unless the same is allowed by order of the superior court of the county of her domicile."

This court has held that the authority to order such sale is conferred on the superior court, and not upon the judge of that court in vacation, and consequently that an order granted in vacation to the wife to sell her separate estate to her husband is void. Roland v. Roland, 131 Ga. 579, 62 S. E. 1042 (4). It follows that the conveyance from Mrs. McEachin to her husband was void as a deed of "bargain and sale," the order allowing the wife to execute it having been granted in vacation. The plaintiff contended that, as it appeared from the evidence that such deed was without any consideration, it was valid as "a deed of gift," and that no order of the court was necessary to authorize a wife to give her separate estate to her husband. "A wife may give property to her husband, but a gift will not be presumed. The evidence to support it must be clear and unequivocal, and the intention of the parties must be free from debt." Civil Code, § 3010. Certainly there was no clear and unequivocal evidence to support the contention that the deed from Mrs. McEachin to her husband indicated that the instrument showed that she intended to give the land conveyed to him. Nor can it be successfully urged that there was any evidence showing that to be the intention of the parties, much less that such intention was shown by the evidence to the extent of being free from doubt. The mere fact that there was no consideration for the execution of the instrument did not convert it from a deed of "bargain and sale," as it appeared on its face to be, to a "deed of gift" from the wife to the husband.

As the only title upon which the plaintiff relied originated in the deed from Mrs. McEachin to her husband, and as his title necessarily depended upon the validity of that conveyance, and it appearing from what we have said that that instrument was not valid, either as a "deed of bargain and sale" or as a "deed of gift," the plaintiff utterly failed to show title in himself to the premises in dispute.

The judgment refusing to grant a temporary injunction and to appoint a receiver indicates that his honor, the trial judge, entertained views similar to those we have hereinbefore expressed; and we, therefore, hold that he did not err in rendering such judgment.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

UPMAGO LUMBER CO. v. MONROE & CO.
(No. 844.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1919.)

1. INJUNCTION \S 119—LANDLORD AND TENANT \S 22(1)—SALES \S 68—BREACH OF CONTRACT—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—CONSTRUCTION.

Monroe & Co. entered into a written contract with the Upmago Lumber Company for the purchase of certain machinery for the equipment of a sawmill to be located and operated at a place accessible to timbered lands of the Upmago Lumber Company, and for the advancement of money necessary to the installation of the plant, agreeing to saw lumber for the Upmago Lumber Company at certain scales of prices. After the mill had been located and operated for more than eight months, a third person, who had advanced supplies to Monroe & Co., foreclosed his lien and caused a levy to be made upon the sawmill property. The Upmago Lumber Company replevied the property, and offered to turn it over to Monroe & Co., and requested that they continue operation of the mill in terms of the contract. On the contention that Monroe & Co. declined the offer and voluntarily surrendered the property, and relinquished all of their rights therein, the Upmago Lumber Company took charge of the mill and operated it. Shortly thereafter the Upmago Lumber Company negotiated a sale to another person; and when the sale was about to be consummated, the members of the firm of Monroe & Co., who had been employed by the Upmago Lumber Company to operate the mill, asserted that they were in possession by their own right, and that the property could not be sold without their consent. The Upmago Lumber Company filed suit to enjoin Monroe & Co. from asserting any claim to the property or interfering with the plaintiff's possession, and to recover a balance due on account of moneys advanced to Monroe & Co. The defendants filed an answer, admitting that they had refused to continue to operate the sawmill, alleging that this was because the plaintiff had failed to carry out its contract, and denying that they had yielded their rights to the possession of the property under the contract; and answering further, by allegations in the nature of a cross-petition, among other things they set up a demand for money supplied by them that went into improvement of the property, and for damages for alleged breach of the contract upon the part of the plaintiff. At an interlocutory hearing the judge granted a temporary injunction as prayed, on condition that the plaintiff execute a bond conditioned to pay any judgment that might be rendered in favor of the defendants on their cross-demand. By amendment to the answer, filed after the plaintiff had given a bond as provided in the order of the judge, concluded with a prayer that the defendants have judgment "against plaintiff and against the surety on their bond given in this matter," for a stated amount of money. The plaintiff filed a demurrer to the original answer of the defendants, and renewed the demurrer to the answer as amended. The court overruled the demurrer, and the plaintiff filed exceptions pendente lite. On the final trial the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the grant of an injunction as prayed, and awarding to the defendants a stated sum on their cross-petition. The plaintiff made a motion for new trial, which was overruled. Error was assigned upon the exceptions pendente lite, and upon the judgment refusing a new trial.

The contract, so far as material to be stated, was as follows: "For and in consideration hereinafter named the following agreement is entered into: That the party of the first part (Hugh T. and Fuller Monroe, trading as partners under the firm name of Monroe & Co.) agrees to purchase a sawmill outfit which * * * includes the sawmill and all fittings, two engines, lath mill, etc., but no boiler, at the price of $1,750, where it now stands. This mill is to be moved and put up at the company's siding, Fla., or near there, which erection of mill Hugh T. Monroe will supervise. The Upmago Lumber Company will pay the expenses of erecting the mill plant, which will be added to the purchase price; said Monroe & Co. to pay $1,000 cash and for the balance to execute mortgage on the property and other property, notes bearing interest at 8 per cent., being $150 per month notes. Upmago Lumber Company agrees to furnish one 150 H. P. boiler and big surfacer machine, the boiler being at Cheraw at present, and the Upmago Lumber Company will pay the expense of erecting the big machine at the plant in Florida. And the said Monroe & Co. hereby agree to operate the sawmill and saw lumber, cutting the timber economically and loading it on cars of the railroad company that the proposed tramroad connects with, at the following prices: [Follows a schedule of prices.] The timber that Monroe & Co. agree to cut under this contract is all the timber that the Upmago Lumber Company now owns, or may hereafter purchase within one and one quarter miles of the A. C. L. R. R., or the Fla. Central Road, within ten miles of the mill. * * * Also the timber Upmago Lumber Company now owns or may own within one and one quarter miles of proposed tramroad running west from the railroad eleven miles, or all east of the Beachton and Amonia road. Said Monroe & Co. are to stand any rejections of lumber they ship, including freight, which is not in accordance with orders furnished them; they also agree to operate the sizing machine (the machine being owned by the Upmago Lumber Company, the boiler also being owned by the Upmago Lumber Company). Monroe & Co. * * * hereby release from the Upmago Lumber Company the tramroad mentioned above, a locomotive and cars to do their logging with. * * * It is understood and agreed that said Monroe & Co. are to keep the planing machine, locomotive and cars and boiler, and tramroad in repair, and to return same after the expiration of this contract in good running order except ordinary wear and tear. In case either boiler, that is, locomotive or sawmill boiler, give out, become useless, when same is not the fault of Monroe & Co., Upmago Lumber Company will replace same. * * * In the event that said Monroe & Co. cannot or do not comply with the terms of this agreement, unless it is caused by an act of providence, the Upmago Lumber Company, on three days' written notice, may take charge of the operations and conduct the same; the intent of this clause being to prevent the operations being tied up indefinitely by sickness, death, or financial troubles. The Upmago Lumber Company is to build the main line of the tramroad out as far as necessary to handle the timber that the Upmago Lumber Company now owns. In the event that it is desirable to build spur tracks from the tramroad, Monroe & Co. are to build same, Upmago furnishing only the rail, spikes, frogs, switches, etc. It is understood and agreed that the timber cut by Monroe & Co. shall be cleaned up to all trees 12" in diameter at the stump, 18" from the ground, and all laps that will make a 6x8-12' or over." Held:

1. The defendants' answer in the nature of a cross-petition as finally amended, is to be construed as setting up a demand for damages on account of the breach of the contract, and not a suit for the recovery of the property. The contract contemplates a sale of the sawmill outfit, except specified parts of the machinery to be used therein, and a lease of the tramroad and its equipment.

2. DAMAGES \S 40(2) — SUIT BY LESSEE OF TRAMROAD—REMOVEDNESS.

Where the lessor in pursuance of the contract furnished a tramroad, engine, locomotive, and cars, and the lessees accepted and used them in their business, a claim for damages by the lessees, based upon the alleged defective condition of the road and its equipment, for alleged profits which the lessees would have earned in operating the mill if the tramroad and equipment had been in good condition, was too remote and speculative to be the basis for recovery. Civ. Code 1910, § 4394; Willingham v. Hooven, 74 Ga. 234 (3), 58 Am. Rep. 435.

3. DAMAGES ¶117—BREACH OF CONTRACT—MEASURE.

Treating the cross-demand as for a breach of the contract, the measure of damages for the alleged breach in taking so much of the sawmill outfit as was owned by the defendants should be upon the basis of the fair market value of that property at the date it was taken, and not for any amount of money that may have been advanced by Monroe & Co. for the equipment, maintenance, or improvement of the property. Demands of the character last mentioned were set up in the answer, and the judge erroneously instructed the jury in regard to considering this in determining the amount of damages recoverable by the defendant. The measure of damages applicable as above stated would also apply to the value of buildings and other appurtenances erected by the defendants as a part of the sawmill outfit.

4. ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR.

The foregoing rulings dispose of the controlling questions so far as properly made; and it is unnecessary to pass upon any other assignment of error presented by the record.

Error from Superior Court, Thomas County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Suit for injunction by the Upmago Lumber Company against Monroe & Co., with cross-petition by defendant. Temporary injunction granted on condition, demurrer to answer overruled, verdict for plaintiff, awarding defendants a certain sum on a cross-petition, motion for new trial overruled, and plaintiff excepts and brings error. Reversed.

John P. Knight, of Nashville, and Clifford E. Hay, of Thomasville, for plaintiff in error.

Merrill & Grantham, of Thomasville, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except FISH, C. J., disqualified.

BARNES v. WATSON, Tax Collector, et al. (No. 774.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1919.)

1. TAXATION ¶611(6) — VALUATION — ARBITRATION—EVIDENCE.

Upon consideration of the evidence and the pleadings it does not appear that the petitioner in this case was denied the right of arbitration upon the question of the valuation of his property, which had been assessed by the county board of tax assessors at a higher valuation than that placed upon it in the return made by petitioner to the tax receiver.

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ¶229(3), 284(1)—TAXATION ¶452 — DUE PROCESS — EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS.

The sixth section of the act of August 14, 1913 (Acts 1913, p. 127), relative to the duties of county boards of tax assessors created by that act, and providing for notice to any taxpayer whose returns have been increased, and for arbitration in case of dissatisfaction of a taxpayer with the action of the board, and for a decision by a majority of the arbitrators fixing the final assessment of the property, except so far as the same may be affected by the finding of the state tax commissioner, is not repugnant to the due process clause of the Constitution of the United States, as contained in the Fourteenth Amendment; nor is it obnoxious to the due process clause of the Constitution of the state of Georgia; nor does it deprive the taxpayer of the equal protection of the laws.

(a) Questions raised as to the constitutionality of those portions of the act, which relate to and define the powers and duties of the state tax commissioner, are not determined, as they are not involved under the facts of this case.

(b) Upon review of the decision of Vestel v. Edwards, 143 Ga. 368, 85 S. E. 187, the request that it be overruled is denied.

3. TAXATION ¶40(6)—UNIFORMITY—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTE.

The tax equalization law is not unconstitutional on the ground that it is in conflict with article 7, § 2, par. 1, of the Constitution of Georgia (Civ. Code 1910, § 6553), which declared that all taxation shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, etc.

4. TAXATION ¶312—APPOINTMENT OF ASSESSORS—"COUNTY OFFICERS"—ELECTION.

That part of the act which provides for the appointment of county boards of tax assessors is not unconstitutional on the ground that it is in conflict with article 11, § 2, par. 1, of the Constitution of Georgia (Civ. Code 1910, § 6599), which declares that county officers shall be elected by the qualified voters of their respective counties. The members of the board are not "county officers," within the meaning of that expression, as used in the section of the Constitution last referred to.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, County Officer.]

5. TAXATION ¶312—APPOINTMENT OF COUNTY BOARD OF TAX ASSESSORS—VALIDITY.

The appointment of the board of tax assessors of McDuffie county by the ordinary was legal and proper under the law.

Error from Superior Court, McDuffie County; H. O. Hammond, Judge.

Suit for injunction by J. M. Barnes against W. A. Watson, Tax Collector, and H. T. Clary, Sheriff. Interlocutory injunction refused, and plaintiff excepts and brings error. Affirmed.

J. Glenn Stovall and J. B. Burnside, both of Thomson, for plaintiff in error.

Clifford Walker, Atty. Gen., Jno. C. Hart, of Atlanta, John T. West, of Thomson, and H. J. Fullbright, of Waynesboro, for defendants in error.

BECK, P. J. John M. Barnes brought his petition against W. A. Watson, tax collector, and H. T. Clary, sheriff, seeking to enjoin the collection of a tax fi. fa. issued against him for state and county taxes for the year 1915. In the petition it is alleged as follows: On May 4, 1915, petitioner returned his property for taxation for that year at a stated valuation. This return was regularly made pursuant to law, and was delivered to the tax receiver of the county, who delivered it approved to the board of tax assessors of the county; and the board increased the valuation given in his return, and assessed his property for taxation at the increased valuation. Within ten days from the date on which he was served with notice of the increase, being dissatisfied with the action of the board, he filed his protest and demanded an arbitration, as provided by the act approved August 14, 1913 (Acts 1913, p. 123), entitled "An act to regulate the return and assessment of property for taxation in this state," etc. Subsequently the board notified him of the selection by them of an arbitrator, and a time of meeting was appointed for the arbitration within ten days from the naming of the arbitrator chosen by the board. At the time named the petitioner and his arbitrator were present to proceed with the arbitration, but the arbitrator named by the board would not act, giving some frivolous excuse for continuing the matter, and failed and refused to act at any time within the ten days, though petitioner's arbitrator stood ready to proceed with the arbitration at any and all times. After the expiration of ten days from the date of his selection the arbitrator chosen by the board informed the arbitrator selected by the petitioner that the time allowed by law for arbitration had expired, and he declined to arbitrate the matter, for that reason; and so no arbitration was had, and petitioner was denied the right thereof through no fault of himself or of the arbitrator selected by him. It is charged that the assessment made by the board of tax assessors was null and void on account of denial to petitioner of the right of arbitration; that the assessment was illegal and void, for the reason there is a board of commissioners of roads and revenues in McDuffie county, who are the legal advisers of the ordinary, and the ordinary appointed the members of the board of tax assessors without the advice of the board of county commissioners; that the act of August 14, 1913, is void for reasons stated, because it conflicts with specified portions of the state and federal Constitutions (see headnotes). The petitioner tendered the tax due according to the valuation of the property made in his return, but the tax collector refused to receive this, and issued fi. fa. based upon the increased valuation.

At the hearing, after evidence was submitted, the court refused an interlocutory injunction, and the petitioner excepted.

[1] 1. The court below did not err in adjudging adversely to petitioner upon the issue presented by his allegations that he had been denied the right of arbitration so as to contest the increased valuation made by the board of tax assessors. The board appointed an arbitrator, and the taxpayer appointed one. These two arbitrators could not agree on the valuation; and the court was authorized to find from the evidence that the arbitrator named by the petitioner capriciously refused to agree on an umpire, and it does not appear that any effort was made by petitioner to avail himself of the remedy provided by law, whereby the ordinary or the county commissioners, as the case may be, can appoint an umpire in case of disagreement of the arbitrators, thereby securing a hearing without delay. This question was ruled on in the case of Vestel v. Edwards, 143 Ga. 368, 85 S. E. 187.

[2] 2. In Vestel v. Edwards, supra, it was held:

"An act of the Legislature, which has for its object the equalization of taxation by means of a just and fair assessment of property returned for taxation, and which provides for notice to any taxpayer whose returns have been increased, and that if he is dissatisfied with the action of the county board of tax assessors in assessing the value of his property for taxation he may demand an arbitration of the question of the valuation of the property returned for taxation, and which provides that in case of disagreement as to the selection of an umpire the ordinary or the county commissioners, as the case may be, shall appoint one, and the arbitrators shall render their decision within ten days from the date of the naming of the arbitrator by the board, is not repugnant to the due process clause of the Constitution of the United States as contained in the Fourteenth Amendment. (a) Nor is it obnoxious to the due process clause of the Constitution of the state of Georgia. (b) Nor does it deprive the taxpayer of the equal protection of the laws."

The decision in the Vestel Case is controlling upon the contention made by the petitioner that the tax equalization act is unconstitutional, in that it provides for arbitration in case the taxpayer is dissatisfied with the assessment of the value of his property by the board of tax assessors, and prohibits any right of appeal from the finding of the arbitrators, and provides that if no arbitration is had under the provisions of the act the valuation fixed by the board shall be binding and final. Substantially the same contentions were made in the case cited, and the decision thereof settles this part of the controversy adversely to the plaintiff.

The contention that the tax equalization act is unconstitutional and void because of its provisions as to the duties and powers of the state tax commissioner, in that there is no provision for notice to a taxpayer in the event of an increase of the valuation of property by order of the commissioner, or by arbitration between the commissioner and the county board of tax assessors, will not be determined in this case for the reason stated in the Vestel Case, where substantially the same contention was made; it being ruled there that questions based upon constitutional grounds which relate to the duty of the state tax commissioner, "who, so far as the record shows, has not exercised any of the duties imposed upon him by those sections of the act, * * * and therefore, whatever" might be decided "relatively to that officer, or his duties under the act, would be moot."

And it was added that until that officer has exercised the authority conferred upon him by the act to the detriment of the plaintiff, the latter could not attack the act with respect to the authority conferred upon him.

Upon review of the case decision in Vestel v. Edwards, supra, the request that it be overruled is denied. See Turner v. Wade, 147 Ga. 666, 95 S. E. 220.

[3] 3. The plaintiff raises the further contention that the tax equalization act is unconstitutional because in conflict with article 7, § 2, par. 1, of the Constitution of Georgia, which provides that all taxation shall be uniform. There is no merit in this contention. See Columbus So. Ry. Co. v. Wright, 89 Ga. 574, 15 S. E. 293.

[4] 4. The board of tax assessors, which is to be established in every county is a part of the machinery created by the legislative power of the state to equalize the burdens of taxation, and for collecting the revenues due the state and the county; and while it is provided that the members of the board shall be residents of the county in which they are appointed, they are not county officers in the sense in which that word is used in the Code section providing that county officers shall be elected by the qualified voters of their respective counties.

[5] 5. It is further contended in this case that the assessment made by the county board is void, because the members of the board were appointed by the ordinary and not by the commissioners of roads and revenues. The portion of the tax equalization law relating to the appointment of the county board of tax assessors provides that they shall be appointed by the board of county commissioners; and that if there is no board of county commissioners in a given county, the tax assessors shall be appointed by the ordinary of that county. By an act of the General Assembly, entitled "An act to create a board of commissioners of roads and revenues for the county of McDuffie, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1872 (Acts 1872, p. 477), it is provided that the commissioners elected under the provisions thereof "shall be the legal advisers of the ordinary in all matters relating to the revenue and taxes for county purposes, public bridges, public roads, and county matters generally; and a majority shall determine all questions." This is the only part of the act of 1872 defining the duties of the commissioners of McDuffie county. It is provided in the Constitution of the state that the Legislature may define the duties of the board of commissioners for any county, and in the county of McDuffie it would seem that the commissioners have no other duty than to act in an advisory capacity. On the trial of the case the ordinary testified that he "was ordinary of McDuffie county, Ga., at the time of the appointment of the board of tax assessors of said county, and as such ordinary he was in absolute and sole charge of the management of county affairs; that he assessed the taxes, directed the working of public roads, the building and repairing of public bridges, and had charge of the property of the county generally; that he attended to all duties pertaining to the office of ordinary; that his predecessors in office had had similar charge of county affairs, and that the board of roads and revenues as created by the act of August 24, 1872, has never managed any of the county affairs or had direction in county matters, except when the ordinary desired to consult them in merely an advisory capacity; that the various ordinaries of said county have always managed county affairs without any direction from said board of roads and revenues, the affairs having been always absolutely controlled as deemed best by the ordinary alone, who was in no wise bound by the views of said board of roads and revenues.

We are of the opinion that it is giving a proper construction to the provisions of the act of 1872, relating to the commissioners of McDuffie county, to hold that the ordinary had the power to appoint the county board of tax assessors; and whether or not it was proper for him to obtain the advice of the county commissioners, the fact that he acted without that advice would not render his appointment vain and nugatory. It seems clear that where the county has no other commissioners than those who can act only in an advisory capacity to the ordinary, these are not such commissioners as fall within the meaning of that part of the act of August 14, 1913, relating to the appointment of the county board of tax assessors. When the Legislature enacted the tax equalization law, and provided therein that the county board of tax assessors should be appointed by the county board of commissioners in counties where there were commissioners, it must have had in view counties which had commissioners with some actual authority to transact the business of the county and to manage its affairs in the ordinary way in which it is done by boards of county commissioners, and did not have in view those counties with commissioners vested merely with the right to advise. The expression, "and a majority shall determine all questions," which follows the definition of the powers conferred upon the commissioners of McDuffie county, evidently means that a majority of those commissioners shall determine all questions arising as to the advice which they shall give the ordinary, and leaves that officer as the actual agent of the county in managing its affairs within the sphere of duties pertaining to an ordinary where there are no commissioners.

Judgment affirmed.

GROOVER et al. v. WILKES. (No. 877.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 14, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. NEW TRIAL \S 18, 26—PLEADING \S 254—
DEMURRER—ABSENCE OF PARTIES.

Where a petition was brought to recover a described tract of land and to cancel a deed thereto which contained a condition subsequent, and by amendment it was alleged that there were outstanding a quitclaim deed to one of the defendants to the action and a deed from a sheriff conveying the land in controversy to the grantor in the quitclaim deed, and it was prayed that the quitclaim deed and the sheriff's deed be canceled, and where upon the trial evidence was adduced to support this amendment, the fact that the grantors in the quitclaim deed and the sheriff's deed were not made parties is not a ground for a new trial after verdict in favor of the plaintiff, no objection to the allowance of the amendment having been raised by demurrer or otherwise.

(a) The objection that the amendment set forth no valid ground for the cancellation of the two deeds should have been urged by demurrer. Defects in pleadings cannot be taken advantage of in a motion for a new trial.

2. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS \S 51—
CONDITIONAL DEED—CONSTRUCTION—FORFEITURE.

Under the evidence there was no error in giving the jury instructions as to the effect of the mental condition of the plaintiff's intestate, the grantor in the conditional deed, upon his failure to act in regard to declaring a forfeiture by reason of a failure of the grantee to comply with the condition subsequent in the deed, conveying the land to him.

3. HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTION.

The charge upon the subject of notice to one of the defendants as to the failure upon the part of the grantee in the conditional deed to comply with the condition did not contain error in any way hurtful to the movant.

4. EVIDENCE \S 271(1)—SELF-SERVING DECLARATION.

The court did not err in excluding from evidence a self-serving declaration by grantee, tending to show that he was complying with the condition in the deed.

5. NEW TRIAL \S 35—EXCLUSION OF MATERIAL EVIDENCE—PROVINCE OF JURY.

The exclusion of relevant and material evidence is ground for the grant of a new trial; it being the province of the jury, and not of this court, to say what weight the evidence should have.

Error from Superior Court, Liberty County; W. W. Sheppard, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. A. C. Wilkes, as administratrix of the estate of J. W. Groover, against J. J. Groover and another. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, motion for new trial overruled, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

See, also, 138 Ga. 407, 75 S. E. 353.

Mrs. A. C. Wilkes, as administratrix of the estate of J. W. Groover, brought her petition against J. J. Groover and J. C. Groover, to recover certain land and to cancel deeds, and for other equitable relief. The plaintiff's intestate had conveyed the land in controversy, by warranty deed, to his grandson, J. J. Groover, one of the defendants, upon the expressed consideration of natural love and affection "and the consideration of support and maintenance of the said [grantor] and his wife," the deed containing this clause:

"It is further provided herein that should the said [grantee] voluntarily refuse and fail to care for and maintain the said [grantor] and his wife, that fact will cancel, annul, and void this deed."

The suit was based on the ground, as alleged in the petition, that the grantee had violated the condition subsequent in the deed. After the filing of the original petition R. J. Groover was made a party defendant, and by his answer he set up a claim of title to the land, based upon a deed from J. D. Strafford, sheriff of Liberty county, Ga., to P. H. Raiford, dated July 6, 1909, and a quitclaim deed from P. H. Raiford to R. J. Groover. By amendment the plaintiff prayed that the two deeds just mentioned be declared void and be canceled. Upon the trial, after evidence was introduced by both sides, the jury returned a verdict that the plaintiff recover the land, and that the deeds from J. W. Groover to J. J. Groover, from the sheriff, Raiford, and from Raiford to R. J. Groover, be canceled. J. J. and R. J. Groover made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled.

A. S. Way and H. H. Elders, both of Reidsville, for plaintiffs in error.

Oliver & Oliver, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The defendants in their motion for a new trial set up the contention that the court was without jurisdiction to try the question as to whether or not the sheriff's deed to Raiford and Raiford's quitclaim deed to R. J. Groover should be canceled. In support of their contention they cited several decisions by this court, in which it is ruled that both the grantor and the grantee are necessary parties to proceedings to cancel deeds. We do not think, however, the defendants are in position to successfully urge this contention in the motion for a new trial. An amendment to the petition was allowed, reciting the execution and the existence of the sheriff's deed and the quitclaim deed, and praying that these instruments be canceled. Inasmuch as no objection was raised to the amendment or to the prayer contained in it, and evidence pertinent to this amendment was adduced and considered by the jury, the defendants cannot, after verdict, insist that the verdict should be set aside and a new trial granted on the ground of a nonjoinder of the sheriff and the grantee in the sheriff's deed, who was the grantor in the quitclaim deed. The objection to the amendment that it sets forth no valid ground for the cancellation of the two deeds should have been urged by demurrer. Defects in pleadings cannot be taken advantage of in a motion for a new trial.

"You are to take into consideration all the facts and circumstances which surrounded J. W. Groover, the deceased. If you find that he didn't take any steps to create a forfeiture, if there was a willful refusal to comply with the conditions in this deed, see whether or not that failure to take advantage of it was due to his inability, mentally or physically; if the circumstances surrounding him were such as to keep him from asserting his rights under the deed. You are to look to the evidence to see whether or not he had a desire to do that. If he had no desire to do it, why then the plaintiff couldn't recover. If you find from the facts and circumstances in the evidence that he did have a desire to do it, but by reason of his physical or mental condition, or both, he was unable to do it, why then, gentlemen of the jury, she, his administratrix, would not be precluded from bringing suit in this case; and if you find under those circumstances that the support was an inadequate one, and that he didn't acquiesce in it or waive his right under it, and was prevented from creating the forfeiture or acting upon the clause which would create the forfeiture, why, then, her right would be the same as his right, and she would have the right to have the deed to James J. Groover annulled."

This charge was, in substance, correct. The deed from the intestate of the plaintiff to J. J. Groover contained the clause set forth in the statement of facts, providing that upon a certain condition the deed should be canceled and declared void. This provision as to avoidance, it was ruled when the case was previously before this court (Wilkes v. Groover, 138 Ga. 407, 75 S. E. 353), created a condition subsequent. Evidence was adduced to show that the condition had been violated, which made it a question for the jury to decide whether or not the grantor had a right to enter and repossess himself of the land, or declare a forfeiture on account of the violation of the condition subsequent, if such was found to be the case, or whether he had waived the forfeiture. And the fact that there is no evidence to show that the grantor was mentally incapable of entertaining a desire to declare a forfeiture or to understand his rights in the premises did not render a charge upon the subject of his mental condition improper; for if, during the latter years of his life, he was suffering from intense physical pain, pain so great as to prevent his fixing his mind upon the question of his rights under the deed, then it might be said that his mental condition was such that his failure to act would not amount to a waiver of the forfeiture.

"In reference to that question of notice, I charge you that notice need not necessarily be an absolute information upon the part of one to the other, but it might be drawn from all the facts and circumstances surrounding the parties, their ability to know, and their positions that would require them, if they were undertaking to make a purchase, to inquire and look into the facts and circumstances surrounding the case. There is no constructive notice involved in this case. There may be actual notice, but that notice must be derived from the facts and circumstances surrounding the parties, such as would put a prudent man on notice and make him inquire into the condition of affairs."

This charge was given in reference to the notice R. J. Groover must have had of any failure of J. J. Groover to comply with the condition in the deed made to him by J. W. Groover, before the presumption that R. J. Groover was an innocent, bona fide purchaser would be overcome. If there are any inaccuracies in this charge, they are not of such character as to injure the movants.

[4] 4. During the progress of the trial, while M. S. Lewis, a witness for the defendants, was testifying, counsel for the defendants propounded the following question to him: "Do you know whether Jesse [J. J. Groover] ever carried anything over there for the old man?" to which witness answered as follows:

"Well, I would see him leave his place with a dish or plate, something covered up with a cloth, and he said, 'Just make yourself at home; I am going to carry the old man something to eat.'

This was objected to by counsel for the plaintiff, on the ground that what was stated by J. J. Groover as testified to by the witness was self-serving, and therefore inadmissible. The court sustained this objection, and ruled out that part of the testimony as to what J. J. Groover said. The exception to this ruling is without merit. In substance it was a saying by J. J. Groover that he was going over to furnish the grantor in the deed with food; in other words, that he was complying with the condition subsequent in the deed, which was clearly a self-serving declaration, and upon that ground objectionable.

[5] 5. One branch of the defense was based upon the contention that J. J. Groover was holding the land in controversy under R. J. Groover, who had purchased from Raiford after the last named had bought at a sheriff's sale and had taken a sheriff's deed to the land, and that Raiford was an innocent purchaser for value. It is clearly inferable from the evidence that the contention of the plaintiff, relatively to this defense just referred to, was that R. J. Groover was not a bona fide purchaser without notice of the violation of the condition subsequent in the deed from J. W. Groover to J. J. Groover, and that the transaction between him and J. J. Groover was colorable. During the progress of the trial, while J. J. Groover was testifying as a witness, and after he had testified that since the land in dispute had been purchased by R. J. Groover, from Raiford he (J. J. Groover) had rented the land to a tenant, the following questions were propounded to said witness by counsel for defendants, and the following answers were made:

"Q. Who claims this land? A. R. J. Groover. Q. Why is it that you rented any part of the land? A. He [indicating R. J. Groover, who was near the witness stand] told me to."

Upon objection of counsel for the plaintiff this testimony was rejected; the court holding that it was hearsay evidence. We think this ruling was error. The evidence was material; it tended to negative the theory of the plaintiff, as indicated in the evidence, that J. J. Groover did not recognize R. J. Groover as the real owner of the land, but was holding it under a conveyance from J. W. Groover, and that when he rented it to a tenant he was acting for himself in the exercise of an ownership with which he was vested under the original deed from J. W. Groover. And the case being close under the evidence, this error, though the evidence may seem trifling in itself, is sufficient to cause a reversal; for it is not the province of this court to say what weight should be given to the evidence, where it is clearly admissible and material.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

MARTIN v. ENGLISH, Sheriff. (No. 2725.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2, Feb. 27, 1919.)

1. TROVER AND CONVERSION — RIGHT OF ACTION—PROPERTY IN CUSTODIA LEGIS.

Where an automobile, while conveying intoxicating liquors on a public road or private way of this state, is seized by a sheriff under the provisions of section 20 of the prohibition law approved March 23, 1917 [Laws 1917 [Ex. Sess.] p. 16], and is being lawfully held by him in his official character as an arresting officer pending the condemnation proceedings authorized by the statute, or subsequently to the judgment of the court and pending the sale of the property, an action of trover against the sheriff cannot be maintained by the owner of the automobile. The property is in custodia legis, and trover does not lie in such a case. Smith v. Kershaw, 1 Ga. 259; Wallace v. Holly, 13 Ga. 389, 58 Am. Dec. 518; Chipstead v. Porter, 63 Ga. 220; Haslett v. Rogers, 107 Ga. 245, 33 S. E. 44; Geer v. Thompson, 4 Ga. App. 756, 62 S. E. 500; Barton v. Thompson, 13 Ga. App. 786, 80 S. E. 30; Hoyt v. Smith, 20 Ga. App. 596, 93 S. E. 224; Bernstein v. Higginbotham, Sheriff, 148 Ga. 353, 96 S. E. 1; 35 Cyc. 1737. The cases of Riley v. Martin, 34 Ga. 136, and Wilson v. Paulsen, 57 Ga. 596, and others wherein an apparently contrary ruling is made, are easily distinguishable by their facts from the instant case and the cases cited above.

(a) While in this case there was no demurrer to the petition, nor a motion to strike it, substantially the same result was reached by the verdict for the defendant.

2. TROVER AND CONVERSION — GIST OF ACTION—RIGHT OF POSSESSION.

Even if an action of trover would lie under the circumstances stated above, the agreed statement of facts in this case shows that the defendant sheriff had the right of possession of the automobile sued for, and that the plaintiff owner was not entitled to recover. "The gist of the action of trover is the injury to the right of possession." Roper Wholesale Grocery Co. v. Faver, 8 Ga. App. 178, 68 S. E. 883. In some cases, to recover in trover, it is essential that the plaintiff show both title and the right of possession. In this class of cases, although the plaintiff may show that he has legal title, if it appears from the evidence that the defendant is rightfully entitled to retain possession of the property sued for, a verdict for the defendant is not only authorized, but demanded. Geer v. Thompson, 4 Ga. App. 756, 62 S. E. 500; Birmingham Fertilizer Co. v. Dozier, 13 Ga. App. 759, 79 S. E. 927; Clark v. Fleming, 78 Ga. 782, 4 S. E. 12; Mitchell v. Georgia &

Stephens, J., dissenting.

Error from City Court of Sandersville; E. W. Jordan, Judge.

Action of trover by L. J. Martin against B. A. English, Sheriff. Verdict and judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Evans & Evans, of Sandersville, for plaintiff in error.

J. J. Harris and M. L. Gross, both of Sandersville, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. The majority of the court are of the opinion that the headnotes require no elaboration. In view, however, of the lengthy dissenting opinion of Judge STEPHENS, it was thought advisable to set forth briefly the views of the majority of the court.

[1, 2] The agreed statement of facts specifically shows that the condemnation proceedings were begun within 10 days from the date of the seizure of the automobile, and that statement of facts and the answer of the sheriff (which the plaintiff admitted was true) clearly show that in all other respects the proceedings were in substantial compliance with the provisions of the statute; and no question as to the irregularity or illegality of the proceedings, including the order of the judge for the sale of the automobile, or as to the jurisdiction of the trial court, was raised in that court or in this court; nor was any attack made upon the statute by the plaintiff in error in either court. The brief of his counsel in this court states that "the only question in this case was whether or not trover would lie against the sheriff when brought by the real owner of the car." With all due respect to our learned Brother, we do not think the questions referred to above, as to the legality of the condemnation proceeding, or as to jurisdiction, are in the case. It is only when it clearly appears from the record that a judgment has been rendered by a court having no jurisdiction of the subject-matter that this court will of its own motion reverse the judgment. Smith v. Ferrario, 105 Ga. 51, 31 S. E. 38. No such lack of jurisdiction appears from the record in this case.

In our opinion the alleged owner of the automobile could not maintain an action in trover to recover it. As said by Mr. Presiding Justice Beck in the Bernstein Case, supra:

"The act of the Legislature to which we have last referred provides a plain statutory remedy to promptly try the question of title where vehicles are seized under circumstances attending the seizure of the one in question. Chipstead v. Porter, 63 Ga. 220."

And that remedy is not an action in trover. A complete answer to the inferential attack upon the act itself, made in the dissenting opinion, is found in the recent able and exhaustive opinion of Justice George, speaking for the Supreme Court, in Mack v. Westbrook, Solicitor, 148 Ga. —, 98 S. E. 339, decided February 12, 1919.

If, however, we are wrong in holding that under the facts of the case an action of trover will not lie, then, under the answer of the sheriff (which was admitted to be true) and the agreed statement of facts, the verdict for the defendant was clearly the only legal one possible.

Judgment affirmed.

BROYLES, P. J., and BLOODWORTH, J., concur.

STEPHENS, J. (dissenting). Plaintiff in error, L. J. Martin, instituted a suit in trover in the city court of Sandersville against B. A. English, sheriff of Washington county, for the recovery of a certain automobile, alleged to be in the possession of the defendant, to which plaintiff claimed title. The defendant answered, and by way of defense set up that he held possession of the automobile in question by virtue of a judgment or decree of the judge of the city court of Sandersville condemning the automobile and ordering it sold, alleging in his answer that the car had been seized by one of his deputies while it was being used to transport intoxicating liquors, that the said seizure had been made under section 20 of the prohibition act of 1917 (Laws 1917 [Ex. Sess.] p. 16), providing for the seizure by a sheriff and the condemnation and sale of any vehicle or conveyance engaged in the transportation of intoxicating liquors, and also alleging that a condemnation proceeding had been instituted in the city court of Sandersville against "said car and against one Marvis McBride as owner." Under an agreed statement of facts the answer of the sheriff was agreed to as true, and it further appeared from the agreed statement of facts that the solicitor of the said city court instituted the condemnation proceeding within the 10 days required by the statute, and that the petition in such proceeding was served upon "Marvis McBride alleging that he was the true owner thereof," that the plaintiff, L. J. Martin, was the true owner of the automobile at the time of the seizure, and that the plaintiff had made demand on the defendant for the delivery of the property, and the same had been refused. The judgment or decree of the judge appearing in the defendant's answer and admitted in evidence was as follows:

"It having been made to appear to the court that a copy of the within petition was duly served upon Marvis McBride on the 24th day of August, 1917, and that no answer has been filed by the said Marvis McBride, the same is hereby declared in default, and the sheriff is hereby directed to proceed to advertise for two issues in the Sandersville Progress, the legal organ of Washington county, said car described in the petition hereof, and to sell the same, and apply the proceeds thereof as the law directs."

Upon the issues thus made a verdict and judgment were rendered for the defendant. A motion for new trial on the general grounds only was overruled, and on exception thereto the case was brought to this court for review.

The majority of the court are of the opinion that an action of trover does not lie; that the verdict and judgment are supported by the evidence and are not contrary to law. The judgment is therefore affirmed. In this judgment of affirmance and the reasons given therefor I cannot concur.

I make no attack upon the act itself. I am of the opinion that the plaintiff proved his title and right to possession, and that the defendant sheriff failed to set up, either in his answer or by the evidence, that the automobile in question had been condemned according to the terms of the statute. I am of the further opinion that under the showing made by the defendant sheriff the property is not in custodia legis, and trover is the proper remedy, and that the verdict and judgment for defendant are contrary to law.

The plaintiff made a prima facie case. Did the defendant, admitting the plaintiff's title at the time of the seizure, show by his answer and the evidence that plaintiff became divested of his title and that the same was acquired by the state of Georgia? The proceeding against the property, being in invitum and predicated upon a drastic statute derogatory of the common law and common right, must be strictly pursued. It must affirmatively appear that the court under whose order the property was condemned and the true owner claimed to have been divested of his title had jurisdiction in the particular case. All jurisdictional facts must appear of record.

That no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law is a well-settled constitutional doctrine. Notice to the person whose property is sought to be taken is an essential element of due process of law. This is fundamental and needs no argument. Our Legislature, in enacting the statute under which this seizure is justified, recognized this constitutional provision, and provided that a copy of the petition in the condemnation proceeding should be served upon "the owner or lessee, if known, and, if the owner or lessee is unknown," then service must be perfected by publication. If the owner is known, service upon him would be sufficient. If, however, he is not known, the state proceeds at its peril in seeking to condemn his property by service upon some other person. Only service by publication will then protect the state, unless, perhaps, service upon a lessee would suffice under the terms of the statute. The notice required under the statute is jurisdictional. The proceeding is in rem and the notice required is prerequisite to the power and jurisdiction of the court to condemn property and order it sold under the authority of this statute.

In Bradstreet v. Neptune Insurance Co., 3 Sumn. 607, Fed. Cas. No. 1793, Justice Story said:

"It is a rule, founded in the first principles of natural justice, that a party shall have an opportunity to be heard in his defense before his property is condemned, and that the charges on which the condemnation is sought shall be specific, determinate and clear."

In Brown on Jurisdiction, p. 189, it is said:

"When a legal proceeding is commenced against a person or corporation, whether resident within the jurisdiction of the court in which it is begun or not, and whether the proceeding is in rem or in personam, the defendant must be served with process in some one of the forms provided by law, or a voluntary appearance must be made by or on his behalf. The notice, if there is no appearance, is jurisdictional. Although much has been said by courts touching jurisdiction derived from the filing of a petition, seizure of property by attachment, garnishment, or other means of sequestration, we hold that the rule to-day is that there must be service of process made on the defendant in some form to give the court jurisdiction over the property seized; otherwise the judgment would be an arbitrary edict, condemning without hearing."

At page 191 the author further says:

"Without notice one essential element of jurisdiction is absent—the party defendant. * * * Where the statute prescribes the form of service, or mode of obtaining it, that mode must be pursued strictly. The law requiring process to be served also gives the implied right to the defendant to appear and defend; and, if this right is refused him, the judgment is void. The judgment is based on the service as much as subject-matter. The petition simply says: I have a cause of action against the defendant. The law says: Notify the defendant of the proceedings and the court will hear you. Hence the notice must be given under the forms of law. Where it provides a form, or gives direction as to the manner of service by publication, the statute must be complied with strictly; the direction is mandatory."

At page 239:

"The proceeding in rem is a proceeding to acquire, dissolve, forfeit, confiscate, or sell and apply a thing for some legal purpose, or its proceeds. In the latter proceedings, when regular, it is said to bind the world. This, however, is subject to conditions, for the owner must be notified in some form of the proceedings, but personal service is not necessary. The state in which the thing is situated may prescribe a form of service and seizure other than personal service of the notice of the suit on defendant, usually by publication. It is such proceedings that, when regular, bind the world."

At page 250:

"There are certain conditions and means under and by which the res is brought under the control of the court: (1) The court must have jurisdiction over the subject-matter and actual dominion over the thing; (2) a petition or information must be filed in a court of competent jurisdiction asking the seizure of the thing, setting forth a right of action against the thing or the owner of the thing attached, and praying for judgment or condemnation or sale for the debt; (3) notice must be given to the owner of the thing of the seizure and the nature of the proceedings against it, or notice to the world, where the action is purely against the thing; (4) opportunity for intervention and defense by the owner of the thing must be given; (5) a judicial finding of the facts alleged in the information or petition and a judgment of condemnation or sequestration are necessary; (6) the conclusiveness of the decree rests upon the sufficiency of the notice and regularity of the proceedings." (Italics mine.)

At page 132:

"To render a valid judgment the court rendering it must acquire jurisdiction over the defendant in the action, and all the authorities agree that, if it does not, then the judgment is invalid and void, a mere arbitrary edict and entitled to no respect. The defendant must be subject to the jurisdiction of the court, and in order that the judgment be valid, the process must be served within such jurisdiction. It is also shown that the judgment rendered by the court must be such a one as it is authorized to render in the proceedings before it or it will be coram non judge."

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Thatcher v. Powell, 6 Wheat. (19 U. S.) 119, 5 L. Ed. 221, held that—

"In summary proceedings, where a court exercises an extraordinary power, under a special statute, which prescribes its course, that course ought to be strictly pursued, and the facts which give jurisdiction ought to appear on the face of the record; otherwise the proceedings are not merely voidable, but absolutely void, as being coram non judge."

In Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 350, 21 L. Ed. 959, that court held that—

"Where the special powers conferred are exercised in a special manner, not according to the course of the common law, or where the general powers of the court are exercised over a class not within its ordinary jurisdiction upon the performance of prescribed conditions, no such presumption of jurisdiction will attend the judgment of the court. The facts essential to the exercise of the special jurisdiction must appear in such cases upon the record."

See, also, D'Antignac v. Augusta, 31 Ga. 700, approved in Frank v. Atlanta, 72 Ga. 432, and in Du Bignon v. Brunswick, 106 Ga. 322, 32 S. E. 102.

Section 20 of the prohibition act of 1917 provides that, in a proceeding to condemn a vehicle or conveyance on the ground of its being engaged in the transportation of intoxicating liquors, a copy of the condemnation proceeding—

"shall be served upon the owner or lessee if known, and if the owner or lessee is unknown, notice of such proceeding shall be published once a week for two weeks in the newspaper in which sheriff's advertisements are published."

Under the foregoing authorities cited the perfection of notice in some manner as required by this statute is jurisdictional, and all jurisdictional facts must appear upon the face of the record. Notice is a condition precedent, under the statute, to the right and power of the court to render judgment condemning a vehicle or conveyance seized upon the ground of its being engaged in the transportation of intoxicating liquors. When the record before us shows that before the rendition of the judgment of condemnation under which the sheriff justifies his possession of the automobile in question service was perfected upon a certain person by name, it will not be presumed, even if it was not necessary for the record to disclose such a jurisdictional fact, that other or different service than such service upon the party named was perfected. In other words, it will be taken as a fact that the plaintiff in this case, who was at the time the true owner of the property, was neither served personally nor was there any service by publication. In the case of Galpin v. Page, supra, it was held that—

"When * * * the record states the evidence or makes an averment with reference to a jurisdictional fact, * * * it will not be presumed that there was other or different evidence respecting the fact, or that the fact was otherwise than as averred."

The judgment of the city court of Sandersville condemning the property, which was pleaded and admitted in evidence by consent, does not recite on its face such jurisdictional facts as are required by the foregoing authorities cited. This judgment merely recites that—

"It having been made to appear to the court that a copy of the within petition was duly served upon Marvis McBride" on a named date, and "that no answer has been filed by the said Marvis McBride, the same is hereby declared in default."

It does not recite who Marvis McBride is whether he is lessee or owner. So far as appears from this judgment, in the absence of the pleadings, Marvis McBride, the only party served with notice, was a perfect stranger to the case. He does not appear to be either the owner or lessee. It therefore does not appear from the judgment that the owner or the lessee was served, nor does it appear that there was any service perfected by publication. The judgment on its face fails to show the jurisdictional fact of such service as is required by the statute, and therefore fails to show jurisdiction in the court which rendered it. Neither does it show that the condemnation proceedings were instituted by the solicitor of the court within 10 days after notice to him by the officer seizing the vehicle as required by the statute, nor that any one was ever in possession of the automobile, nor that the automobile was ever seized by any one, nor that it was ever engaged in the transportation of intoxicating liquors, nor that service was perfected within the jurisdiction of the court, nor that anything transpired within the jurisdiction of the court—all of which are jurisdictional facts. The judgment, therefore, failing to show jurisdiction over the subject-matter, is absolutely void and constitutes no defense for the defendant.

The judgment relied upon by the sheriff, in addition to failing to show jurisdictional facts, fails to show that it was based upon a proceeding under the condemnation statute. These omissions might have been aided by the pleadings, but the latter are not in evidence. The absence of the pleadings is fatal. The judgment being relied upon to show a judicial result, i. e., a condemnation under the terms of the statute, the pleadings are absolutely essential to establish the particular state of facts upon which the judgment is predicated, including service or notice. This was held to be the law in Gibson v. Robinson, 90 Ga. 756, 16 S. E. 969, 35 Am. St. Rep. 250. Mr. Justice Samuel Lumpkin, at page 763 of 90 Ga., at page 969 of 16 S. E., used the following language:

"It is well recognized as a general rule that, where a judgment is relied on as an estoppel, or as establishing any particular state of facts of which it was the judicial result, it can be proved only by offering in evidence a complete and duly authenticated copy of the entire proceedings in which the same was rendered. But where the only direct object to be subserved is to show the existence and contents of such judgment, this rule does not apply, and a certified copy of the judgment entry of a court of record possessing general original jurisdiction is admissible, by itself, to prove rendition and contents. * * * Such entry will be prima facie evidence of a valid judgment, and, on being admitted, all the legal incidents attach which the law annexes to judgments of that class. It will not, however, be conclusive either of jurisdiction of the parties, service, or of any other matter material to the rendition of a valid judgment." (Italics mine.)

This opinion was cited with approval by the Supreme Court of this State in Kerchner v. Frazier, 106 Ga. 440, 32 S. E. 351. See, also, Weaver v. Tuten, 138 Ga. 103, 74 S. E. 835; Little Rock Cooperage Co. v. Hodge, 112 Ga. 526, 37 S. E. 743.

The defense, therefore, is fatally defective, and fails to establish in the defendant sheriff any right to hold the automobile for the purpose claimed.

The judgment, failing to show any seizure or any other jurisdictional fact, is void on its face. Can such jurisdictional facts be supplied by evidence aliunde? If so, the burden would be upon one defending under the judgment to establish such facts. This the defendant fails to do. It is true that in the agreed statement of facts the evidence recites that a seizure was made, that it was made within the jurisdiction of the court, and that the condemnation proceedings were instituted against the automobile and against one "Marvis McBride as owner," and that the petition in such proceedings was "served upon Marvis McBride alleging that he was the owner thereof." Any allegation, if there were any, in the petition for condemnation which alleged ownership in any one, or that service was perfected on Marvis McBride, "alleging that he was the owner," certainly constituted no judicial determination of the ownership of the automobile claimed to have been seized and sought to be condemned. The recitals in the petition were merely what the state alleged or claimed in the case. Under no view do such recitals adjudicate or judicially determine anything, certainly nothing as against this plaintiff, who was not a party to that case, not having been served, and not having entered an appearance. Besides, there is nothing in the evidence whatsoever from which it can be remotely inferred that the fundamental jurisdictional fact of seizure was adjudicated or determined in the condemnation proceeding. The evidence therefore utterly fails to supply the jurisdictional facts lacking on the face of the judgment. A judicial determination upon the trial of the condemnation proceedings of all jurisdictional facts was necessary to a valid judgment of condemnation, and essential to the defendant's defense. It nowhere appearing that such determination was had, the verdict and judgment in the case before us are unsupported by the evidence and are therefore contrary to law, as set out in the general grounds of the motion for new trial.

Nowhere does it appear, either from the record or from the evidence, that the proceeding was against the "owner" or the "lessee," or the whole world by virtue of a newspaper publication. No notice whatever, as the statute requires, having been given, the defendant sheriff's right to hold and sell the property manifestly fails, and his answer and the evidence set up no defense against the true owner.

The automobile is not being condemned in the proceeding now before us. The sheriff here is defending upon the ground that it was condemned in the former proceeding. This defense he fails to substantiate, in the absence of proof, either in the judgment of condemnation or in the evidence produced, that the automobile was legally and judicially condemned.

Whatever presumption of ownership or legal possession may arise from mere possession can be disputed in this proceeding by the plaintiff when the fact of ownership or right of possession was not adjudicated in the condemnation proceedings. The plaintiff certainly stands as well before the court in this respect in the trover suit as does the defendant. As to the argument that one in possession of personal property is presumed to be the owner, it is a sufficient reply to say that the proof here conclusively shows that the person in possession of the automobile when seized was not the owner. Besides, the statute destroyed any such presumption by recognizing that the party in possession of the vehicle or conveyance proceeded against might be a lessee. Whether notice to a lessee binds the owner we are not called upon to decide, since there is nothing whatever in the record to connect Marvis McBride with the owner as a lessee. There nowhere appears any privity between them. So far as the evidence and the record disclose, he may have been in a wrongful and illegal possession of the automobile. Besides, he was proceeded against, not as a lessee, but, according to the evidence as the owner. He clearly was not the latter. Be that as it may, as evidenced from the judgment, so far as the recitals disclose, he was not proceeded against either as a lessee or as the owner.

That, under the terms of this statute, an automobile worth $5,000 can be taken from its owner, confiscated, and sold, and the proceeds of the sale paid over to the state upon the automobile being found transporting liquor of the value of only 50 cents, is, to say the least, a harsh and drastic proceeding. It is a matter strictissimi juris. For this reason the statute should be enforced most strictly and in accordance with its very terms. Only then should its enforcement work a forfeiture and a destruction of property rights. The Constitution of this state declares that "protection to person and property is the paramount duty of government, and shall be impartial and complete." Civ. Code, § 6358. Therefore no fiction of ownership founded upon a mere presumption from possession should prevail when confronted with the absolute fact that the party in possession, and who alone was served and notified, was not the owner.

I am not unmindful of the decisions of this court and of the Supreme Court which hold that an action of trover will not lie against a sheriff to recover personal property held by him under judicial process. These decisions are based upon the ground that such property is in custodia legis, and cannot be interfered with. The instant case, however, is distinguishable from them. It appears here that the court had no jurisdiction, and that the sheriff holds the property under a void judgment. The property therefore is not in custodia legis, but is being held by the sheriff tortiously and illegally. Under such circumstances the authorities abundantly sustain the proposition that trover will lie at the instance of the true owner to recover personal property in the possession of a sheriff. A sheriff as such is not exempt from an action of trover to recover property which he claims to hold in his official capacity. In Riley v. Martin, 35 Ga. 136, where a levying officer made a lawful levy, and afterwards tortiously converted the property, although acting in his official capacity, it was held that trover would lie against him. In 38 Cyc. 2041, where this case is cited with approval, it is stated that "an action for conversion may be maintained for the wrongful seizure and disposition of property under an attachment, execution, or distress." In support of the proposition that trover will lie against a sheriff to recover property in his custody, where there was either an unlawful seizure or a wrongful conversion, see Laise v. Mitchell, Sheriff (1893) 53 Mo. App. 563, and Abercrombie, Sheriff, v. Bradford (1849) 16 Ala. 560. A wrongful levy constitutes a conversion. Stuart v. Phelps (1874) 39 Iowa, 14; Marks v. Wright (1892) 81 Wis. 572, 51 N. W. 882; Vaden v. Ellis (1857) 18 Ark. 355; Lyon v. Yates (1868) 52 Barb. (N. Y.) 237.

Plaintiff relies upon title in himself; the sheriff defends upon title in the state. The issue that is being tried is one of title, and trover, therefore, must be the remedy. The owner may rest secure on his title and demand that his property be taken by due process of law and in accordance with the terms of the statute.

The uncontradicted testimony showing title in the plaintiff at the time of the alleged seizure of the automobile, and the answer of the defendant sheriff and the evidence failing to show that plaintiff's title had become divested, and that such title had by due process of law been transferred to the state of Georgia, the sheriff falls to set up any title in the state which would justify him in withholding from the plaintiff the automobile in question after plaintiff had demanded of him its surrender. In my opinion the verdict and judgment were contrary to law, and the judgment of the trial judge overruling the motion for new trial should be reversed.

Feb. 25, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. EVIDENCE ⇨158(18)—BEST EVIDENCE—ESTABLISHMENT AND MAINTENANCE OF PUBLIC ROADS.

Record evidence of action taken by a county court or other governmental agency empowered to control the establishment and maintenance of public roads, streets, and alleys, and showing the establishment of such highway or its official recognition by the appointment of road supervisors who have repaired and improved it, is the best evidence of the fact, and, as a general rule, ought to be produced, or its absence accounted for.

2. HIGHWAYS ⇨5—"PUBLIC ROAD"—USER—STATUTE.

Mere user of a way or road by the public for travel will not suffice to make it a "public road," within the meaning of section 56a10, c. 43 (sec. 1777), Code 1913; but such user, accompanied by some official recognition by the county court, as by work done on it by a supervisor acting by appointment of that tribunal, does come within the intendment of the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Public Road.]

3. HIGHWAYS ⇨197(3)—SELECTION OF DANGEROUS WAY—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

A traveler, having two reasonably convenient ways for his journey, one of which is dangerous and the other not, assumes the risk of injury, if he uses the dangerous way, and cannot recover for any injury he may thereby sustain.

4. HIGHWAYS ⇨213(2)—DANGERS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

The comparative availability, convenience, freedom from dangerous defects, and safety for travel, as between two or more highways are generally questions for the jury to determine.

5. HIGHWAYS ⇨198—INJURY FROM DEFECT IN STREET—LIABILITY.

Sections 56a49 and 56a50, c. 43 (secs. 1815, 1816), Code 1913, impose upon a county court, incorporated city, town, or village absolute liability for injuries occasioned to travelers by defects in a public road or street.

6. HIGHWAYS ⇨197(6) — INJURY FROM DEFECT IN STREET—LIABILITY.

The only limitations upon such liability, other than that noted above, where there are available two reasonably convenient ways, are where the negligence of the plaintiff is the direct or proximate cause of the injury, or where the defect or obstruction is only a remote cause thereof.

7. HIGHWAYS ⇨187(1)—DEFECT—INJURY TO TRAVEL—LIABILITY OF COUNTY COURT.

While the liability of county courts is in its nature absolute, a cause of action must exist before a liability arises.

8. HIGHWAYS ⇨197(3) — INJURY FROM DEFECT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

If a traveler negligently fails to exercise ordinary care and caution for his own safety against defects in a public highway, which he knows or can readily see are dangerous, and has the opportunity to avoid them, he is not entitled to damages, but must bear the burden of his own indiscretion.

9. HIGHWAYS ⇨213(1, 4)—DEFECT—PERSONAL INJURY — LIABILITY — DEFENSE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Ordinarily such questions of liability and defense in an action based upon an injury due to an alleged defect in a public highway should be submitted to the jury as the triers of fact. Only where the facts are undisputed, or clearly established by the evidence, do they become questions of law for the court.

10. HIGHWAYS ⇨192—"OUT OF REPAIR"—STATUTE.

A public road is defective and "out of repair," within the meaning of sections 56a49 and 56a50, c. 43 (secs. 1815, 1816), Code 1913, when it becomes unsafe for reasonable use in the ordinary modes of travel, and includes obstructions to the highway, as well as defects therein, without regard to the manner in which or the persons by whom such obstructions were placed therein.

11. HIGHWAYS ⇨153, 192—OBSTRUCTION—NUISANCE—ACTION FOR DAMAGES.

But not every obstruction to the free and unrestricted use of a public road or street, even if unauthorized by the proper authorities, constitutes a nuisance, or is actionable in damages. The right of the public to the free and unobstructed use of a highway or street is subject to reasonable and necessary limitations and restrictions.

12. HIGHWAYS ⇨192 — OBSTRUCTION — EXCUSE—LIABILITY.

Temporary obstructions for some purposes frequently are unavoidable. But this necessity cannot operate to excuse careless or indifferent disregard of the rights of travelers, or justify the leaving of the street in an unsafe and dangerous condition.

13. HIGHWAYS ⇨198, 200—COUNTY ROADS—FAILURE TO REMOVE OBSTRUCTION—SECONDARY LIABILITY—PRIMARY LIABILITY.

Where by the mere omission of the county court to act promptly in causing the removal of an obstruction placed by another in a county road under its control, from which arises a cause of action for which both are jointly and severally responsible, the county court being the passive or permissive agent, and the obstructor the active agent, the former, though liable, is only secondarily so, while the latter is primarily liable, and in any event must finally respond to the injury suffered because of the obstruction.

Error to Circuit Court, Logan County.

Action by A. A. Williams against the Main Island Creek Coal Company, the County Court of Logan County, and others. Verdict and judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Greene & Hogsett, of Logan, for plaintiff in error.

J. B. Wilkinson, England, Hager & Davis, Butts & Minter, and Chaffin & Bland, all of Logan, for defendants in error.

LYNCH, J. Denied the right to submit to a jury upon the proof introduced the question of defendant's liability for a personal injury caused by the skidding and upsetting of an automobile driven by him over and along the public road between Logan and Omar, and complaining of a nisi capiat judgment upon the exclusion of the proof and a directed verdict, the plaintiff prosecutes this writ to reverse the action taken in these respects.

The defendants here and below are the county court of Logan county and the Main Island Creek Coal Company, a corporation, and its agents and employes. The sufficiency of the declaration was not challenged by demurrer. The negligence charged against the county court is its failure to exercise the diligence required by law to keep and maintain the road in good condition for public travel, and permitting the road to be obstructed by its codefendant, thereby endangering the lives and property of persons lawfully upon it. The negligence charged against the Main Island Creek Coal Company, its servants and agents, is the obstruction of the road by the erection and maintenance thereon of a scaffold built out of heavy timbers along and about and attached to a building in process of construction by the defendant company at the time of the injury, and the projection of the scaffold into the road to the extent of about three feet, leaving for public use only from six to eight feet of level space between the structure and the steep bank of Main Island creek at the point of injury, the bank over which the automobile skidded and upset early one morning when the plaintiff attempted to pass the scaffold in his car.

The proof introduced to show the public character of the road was deemed insufficient to establish that fact. It consists, among other testimony, of that of two surveyors or supervisors, who by appointment of the county court had charge and control of the precinct or district in which the road is located, and under whose direction it was kept in reasonably fair condition for an ordinary country roadway leading from the county seat to and through a rural mining community. Viewers acting or assuming to act under an appointment of the county court, according to the testimony of at least one witness, inspected the road with the view of repairing the injury done to it by a washout occasioned by a freshet in Main Island creek several years before the accident suffered by plaintiff. The road, as said by many witnesses acquainted with and traveling over and along it, had existed and the public had recognized it for years as a thoroughfare devoted to general travel without question as to the purpose to which it apparently was devoted.

[1] Plaintiff introduced no record evidence emanating from the minutes of the county court proceedings for the purpose of showing official recognition of the roadway or appointment of the road supervisors who testified to the facts already stated. If it be true that such authorization appears, the record is the best evidence of the fact and ought to be produced or its absence accounted for, as a general rule. Ordinarily such evidence would remove all doubt and uncertainty in respect of a matter of so vital importance in regard to the establishment and maintenance of city, county, state, and national highways.

[2] To avoid the difficulty presented in this case may have had some influence upon judicial tribunals in holding sufficient for the establishment of a highway recognition of its existence by the proper governmental agency, as by preparing or repairing it for the use of the public, and its general use as a highway. But, whatever the inducement, our decisions, often repeated, say such recognition and use are of themselves sufficient to show the way used and improved to have all the essential characteristics of a thoroughfare devoted to public use, and to require the county court to respond in damages for any injury caused by defects therein due to its negligence.

Besides, under the statute in force at the time of the injury sustained by plaintiff, section 56a10, c. 43 (sec. 1777), Code 1913:

"Every road, * * * used and occupied as a public road, * * * shall in all courts and places be taken and deemed to be a public road, * * * whenever the establishment thereof as such may come in question."

Though broad in its terms, this provision was construed in Talbott v. King, 32 W. Va. 6, 9 S. E. 48, as not actually meaning that mere user of a way for travel will suffice to make it a public road under this section, but that such user, accompanied by some official recognition by the county court, as by work done on it by a surveyor or supervisor acting by appointment of that tribunal, does come within the intentment of the statute. Ball v. Cox, 29 W. Va. 407, 1 S. E. 673; Campbell v. Elkins, 58 W. Va. 308, 52 S. E. 220, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 159; Burke v. County Court, 70 W. Va. 174, 73 S. E. 304.

[3, 4] The road over which plaintiff drove his automobile on the morning of the accident clearly was such a road as the statute intended to be taken and deemed in all respects to be a public highway. It was the only way available for use by the ordinary means of travel through a narrow and circumscribed rural valley between Logan, the county seat of Logan county, and Omar—a valley which at the place where the injury occurred was occupied exclusively by railroad tracks, by buildings and coal-mining operations of the Main Island Creek Coal Company, and by the roadway; and although at certain seasons travelers departed from the usual way, as some of the witnesses testified, yet other testimony seems to warrant the assumption that such departure was no longer possible, owing to these improvements, and at the point where the accident occurred there had never been any departure of consequence from the used roadway. After the erection of the barn and the scaffold temporarily attached to it, the width of the traveled way was narrowed so that the only space available for the passage of vehicles at that point was the distance between the outer edge of the scaffold and the creek bank, estimated by not more than three or four witnesses as being about twelve feet, and by many others as being from six to eight feet, barely sufficient for a car to pass, as taxi drivers testified who used the road daily. Nor was any testimony introduced to show that there was any other available road for travel between Logan and Omar.

Respecting this situation or condition, the cause of action averred in the declaration is not within or controlled by the principles enunciated in Shriver v. County Court, 66 W. Va. 685, 66 S. E. 1062, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 377, point 4, syllabus, as to any of the defendants. But more clearly as to the Main Island Creek Coal Company the case is governed by the principles enunciated in O'Hanlin v. Carter Oil Co., 54 W. Va. 510, 515, 46 S. E. 565, 66 L. R. A. 893. In the Shriver Case the plaintiff had the choice of travel between two equally convenient public highways by which to reach his destination, and with knowledge of the defect that caused him injury he chose that way rather than the other which was either not defective or less hazardous. It is said:

"A traveler, having two reasonably convenient ways for his journey, one of which is dangerous and the other not, assumes the risk of injury, if he uses the dangerous way, and cannot recover for any injury he may thereby sustain."

The availability, comparative convenience, and freedom from dangerous defects and safety for travel, as between two or more highways, the accessibility of passage over private property by the use of which injury could be avoided, and the necessity for assuming the risk by the selection of the dangerous road, are questions for the jury according to that case. However, as developed by the proof offered, plaintiff, as we have said, had no such choice between traveled roadways and no such access to private property. Upon the retrial, which for reasons herein stated must be awarded, the proof may show what does not now appear upon this phase of the instant case, and nothing said respecting the matters above mentioned is intended to foreclose inquiry as to them.

[5-7] Our statute, as uniformly construed by this court in numerous decisions, imposes upon a county court, incorporated city, town, or village absolute liability for injuries occasioned to travelers by defects in a public road. Sections 56a49 and 56a50, c. 43 (secs. 1815, 1816), Code 1913; Burke v. County Court, 70 W. Va. 174, 73 S. E. 304; Warth v. County Court, 71 W. Va. 184, 76 S. E. 420; Shipley v. County Court, 72 W. Va. 656, 78 S. E. 792; Boylard v. Parkersburg, 78 W. Va. 749, 90 S. E. 347; Whittington v. County Court, 79 W. Va. 1, 90 S. E. 821. The only limitations, other than those laid down in the Shriver Case cited, upon the liability of the county courts for injuries occasioned by defects in a public road, are where the negligence of the plaintiff is the direct or proximate cause of the injury (Phillips v. Ritchie County Court, 31 W. Va. 477, 7 S. E. 427), or where the defect or obstruction is only the remote cause thereof (Childrey v. Huntington, 34 W. Va. 457, 12 S. E. 536, 11 L. R. A. 313). While the liability of county courts is in its nature absolute, that does not refer to the cause of action. That must exist before a liability arises. Yeager v. Bluefield, 40 W. Va. 484, 21 S. E. 752.

[8] For, except where a statute otherwise provides, as in the Workmen's Compensation Act, the negligence of the person injured and his unwarranted disregard of a danger or defect of which he has notice or knowledge may always be interposed in defense of the action for an injury resulting therefrom. This is but another application of the familiar doctrine that, where an injury is directly traceable to the fault or negligent act of the plaintiff, and but for such fault or negligence the accident probably would not have occurred, he is not entitled to damages. Likewise, if a traveler negligently fails to exercise ordinary care and caution for his own safety against defects which he knows or can readily see are dangerous and has the opportunity to avoid them, he is not entitled to damages, but must bear the burden of his own indiscretion. Phillips v. Ritchie County Court, cited; Hesser v. Grafton, 33 W. Va. 548, 11 S. E. 211; Slaughter v. Huntington, 64 W. Va. 237, 61 S. E. 155, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 459; Faugh v. Parsons, 74 W. Va. 425, 82 S. E. 204; Corbin v. Huntington, 74 W. Va. 479, 82 S. E. 323, and 81 W. Va. 154, 94 S. E. 38.

[9-11] Lawfully to entitle a plaintiff so injured to recover from a county court or other person or persons jointly liable for the consequences resulting from defects or obstructions in a public highway, he must show, by the record evidence, if reasonably available, or in the manner heretofore indicated, the way to be devoted to public use, and the concurrence of the defendants in unlawfully producing the defect or causing the obstruction or permitting them to remain, as the case may be, and that he was injured as a result thereof. To defeat recovery defendants may show the defensive matters recognized by the decisions cited. Ordinarily these questions should be submitted to the consideration and judgment of the jury as the triers of fact, and should not be taken from them. Only where the facts are undisputed or clearly established by the evidence do they become questions of law for the court. Snoddy v. Huntington, 37 W. Va. 111, 16 S. E. 442; Slaughter v. Huntington, 64 W. Va. 237, 61 S. E. 155, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 459; Warth v. County Court, 71 W. Va. 184, 76 S. E. 420; Corbin v. Huntington, 81 W. Va. 154, 94 S. E. 38.

A public road is defective and out of repair within the meaning of sections 56a49 and 56a50, c. 43, Code 1913, when it is in such condition as not to be reasonably safe for use in the usual manner and by the ordinary modes of travel, including obstructions to the highway as well as defects therein without regard to the manner in which or the person by whom such obstructions were placed there. Arthur v. Charleston, 51 W. Va. 132, 41 S. E. 171; Boylard v. Parkersburg, 78 W. Va. 749, 90 S. E. 347; Whittington v. County Court, 79 W. Va. 1, 90 S. E. 821; Johnson v. Huntington, 82 W. Va. 458, 95 S. E. 1044.

[12, 13] But it is not every obstruction to the free and unrestricted use of a public road or street, even if unauthorized by the proper authorities, that constitutes a nuisance or is actionable in damages. The right of the public to the free and unobstructed use of a highway or street is subject to reasonable and necessary limitations and restrictions. Temporary obstructions for some purposes sometimes, doubtless frequently, are unavoidable. Stanton v. Parkersburg, 66 W. Va. 393, 66 S. E. 514; Johnson v. Huntington, 80 W. Va. 178, 92 S. E. 344; idem, 82 W. Va. 458, 95 S. E. 1044; 3 Dillon, Municipal Corp. (5th Ed.) § 1168. This necessity, however, cannot operate to excuse willful, careless or indifferent disregard of the rights of travelers lawfully entitled to the enjoyment of the highway, nor will it ever justify the leaving of the street or way in an unsafe and dangerous condition. 3 Dillon, Municipal Corp. § 1168. This rule of law applied to the issues here involved means that the Main Island Creek Coal Company is responsible for an injury resulting from or incident to the scaffold, unless it brings itself within the terms of the rule. Whether it can do so or not, the case as now presented does not disclose.

Where by the mere omission of a county court to act promptly in causing the removal of an obstruction placed by another in a county road under its control, from which arises a cause of action for which both are jointly and severally responsible, the county court being the passive or permissive agent and the obstructor the active agent, the former though liable, is only secondarily so, while the latter is primarily liable, and in any event must finally respond to the injury suffered because of the obstruction. For if the highway was unduly obstructed by the scaffold, as the weight and preponderance of the evidence clearly indicates, and the county court is held liable to plaintiff, it would have, within well-recognized legal principles, remedy over against its codefendant, Main Island Creek Coal Company, enforceable in an independent action. Johnson v. Huntington, 80 W. Va. 178, 92 S. E. 344; Richmond v. Sitterding, 101 Va. 354, 43 S. E. 562, 65 L. R. A. 445, 99 Am. St. Rep. 879; 4 Dillon, Municipal Corp. (5th Ed.) §§ 1725-1728, citing numerous cases.

For the reasons assigned, our order will reverse the judgment and remand the case for new trial, to be governed by the principles herein announced.

McCLURE et al. v. NORFOLK & W. RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 25, 1919.)

1. CARRIERS § 149(1/2), 156(1)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—REASONABLE LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—APPLICATION OF LIMITATIONS.

The following provision in a bill of lading, viz.: "Property destined to or taken from a station, wharf, or landing at which there is no regularly appointed agent shall be entirely at risk of owner after unloaded from cars or vessels or until loaded into cars or vessels, and when received from or delivered on private or other sidings, wharves, or landings shall be at owner's risk until the cars are attached to and after they are detached from trains"—is a reasonable limitation upon the carrier's liability and enforceable. But neither clause of said provision has application, except in cases where it appears the loss of goods shipped occurred at stations, wharves, or landings at which the carrier did not maintain a regularly appointed agent.

2. CARRIERS § 156(1)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—LOSS—BILL OF LADING.

Such bill of lading did not exempt carrier from liability for loss of freight by fire while the loaded cars were on a private siding on carrier's belt line about three-quarters of a mile from a station at which an agent was maintained.

Error to Circuit Court, Wayne County.

Action by L. E. McClure and F. E. Way, receivers of the Kenova Poplar Manufacturing Company, against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Holt, Duncan & Holt, of Huntington, for plaintiff in error.

Livezey & Irons, of Huntington, for defendants in error.

WILLIAMS, J. This writ of error was awarded the Norfolk & Western Railway Company to a judgment recovered by L. E. McClure and F. E. Way, receivers of the Kenova Poplar Manufacturing Company, a corporation, in an action of assumpsit against it to recover the value of two carloads of dressed lumber, which plaintiffs say was delivered to the defendant at Kenova, W. Va. on the 22d of July, 1911, to be transported to the city of Detroit, Mich. There is a private siding leading from defendant's belt line in Kenova into plaintiffs' manufacturing plant and lumberyards. On the afternoon of said 22d of July, plaintiffs loaded the two cars in the mill and shoved them out on the siding about 70 feet away from the building. Bills of lading were then filled out and sent by a messenger to defendant's depot, which was between a half and three-quarters of a mile distant from the mill, to obtain the signature of defendant's agent. They were signed by the agent about 4:45 o'clock p. m. of the same day and mailed to plaintiffs, who received them in due course. About 11 o'clock of the same evening, fire originated in the mill, from some unknown cause, and destroyed both the mill and the loaded cars standing on plaintiffs' private siding. The lumber was the subject-matter of an interstate shipment, and the bills of lading, signed by the railway company's agent, contained certain provisions, stipulations, and conditions identical with those contained in a form of bill of lading which was made a part of the published tariff rate schedule then filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission and applicable to interstate shipments originating in West Virginia.

"Property destined to or taken from a station, wharf, or landing at which there is no regularly appointed agent shall be entirely at risk of owner after unloaded from cars or vessels or until loaded into cars or vessels, and when received from or delivered on private or other sidings, wharves, or landings shall be at owner's risk until the cars are attached to and after they are detached from trains."

This provision does not undertake to limit the railway company's liability resulting from its own negligence or the negligence of its agents and servants, and is a reasonable restriction of the carrier's liability. Berry v. W. Va. & P. R. Co., 44 W. Va. 538, 30 S. E. 143, 67 Am. St. Rep. 781. But plaintiffs contend that it has no application to the present case; and it is admitted by counsel for the respective parties that the issue depends upon the proper interpretation of the last clause of the provision above quoted, beginning with the words, "and when received." Defendant contends that, inasmuch as the two cars were on plaintiffs' private siding and had not been attached to a train, its liability as carrier had not attached, that the loaded cars were on the shippers' private siding at their risk, at the time they burned. On the other hand, plaintiffs contend that, Kenova being a station at which defendant maintained a regular freight agent, the provision does not apply; that the phrase, "at which there is no regularly appointed agent," qualifies the last clause, as well as the first clause of the provision; and, when expanded to express fully what, according to grammatical construction, it evidently means, it would read as follows:

"And when property is received from or delivered on private or other sidings, wharves, or landings, at which there is no regularly appointed agent, it shall be at owner's risk until the cars are attached to or after they are detached from trains."

This construction is the logical one, for why should the carrier wish to place a greater limitation on its liability in case of property loaded into cars than in case of property at the same siding before it is loaded? The first clause of the provision clearly does not limit the carrier's liability for property not loaded into cars, whether placed at, or to be received from, stations, wharves, or landings, without regard to whether they be public or private, except only in case no regularly appointed agent is maintained at such places. There is as much, if not more, danger that property not loaded into cars would be destroyed or carried away, than there is after it has been loaded, and therefore no reason for making the distinction contended for by counsel for defendant in the application of the provision. The terms, "private or other sidings," in the last clause, necessarily mean private or public sidings, because all railroad sidings fall under one or the other class.

[2] It is clearly established by the evidence that Kenova is a station at which defendant maintains a regularly appointed agent; and the fact that plaintiffs' private siding was from a half to three-quarters of a mile distant from the station house does not contradict the fact that the point at which the cars were destroyed was a station at which defendant maintained an agent, within the meaning of the provision. It maintained a belt line extending around the town of Kenova, and plaintiffs' manufacturing plant was right near to the belt line, and connected with it by a private siding.

In Jolly v. A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co., decided by the District Court of Appeals, First District, of California, 21 Cal. App. 368, 131 Pac. 1057, the identical provision in the bill of lading here involved was interpreted in the manner now contended for by these plaintiffs. There a carload of goods had been placed upon a public siding in one of the streets of the city of San Francisco, consigned to George H. Tay Company. The car arrived in the morning, and the consignee was notified that it would be set on the siding next to its warehouse in the due course of its business, and was actually so placed some time after 5 o'clock in the afternoon, after business hours and without further notice to the consignee. About two hours after the car was placed on the siding, it caught fire and damaged the goods, for which the consignee recovered a judgment. On appeal the carrier claimed exemption by reason of said provision in the bill of lading, but the court held that it applied only in case of deliveries at points where no regularly appointed agent was maintained.

These observations call for an affirmance of the judgment, and it will be so ordered.

UNION WATER METER CO. v. TOWN OF NEW MARTINSVILLE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 25, 1919.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⇨248(1)—PURCHASE BY UNAUTHORIZED AGENT—RATIFICATION—INTRA VIRES.

A municipality is bound by a contract of purchase of property on its behalf by an unauthorized agent, if with knowledge thereof it performs acts amounting to ratification; the contract being intra vires.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⇨248(3)—UNAUTHORIZED PURCHASE BY AGENT—RATIFICATION.

In such case, ratification may be implied either from acquiescence after full knowledge, or from subsequent acts and conduct by the municipal authorities inconsistent with any other theory.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⇨248(3)—PURCHASE OF GOODS BY UNAUTHORIZED AGENT—RATIFICATION.

Where water meters are sold and delivered to a city owning its water plant and system, upon the order of one not authorized to act on its behalf, and it thereafter receives them and pays for their installation, by an order drawn upon its treasury, it thereby impliedly ratifies the contract of purchase, and is bound by its terms.

Error to Circuit Court, Wetzel County.

Action by the Union Water Meter Company against the Town of New Martinsville. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and rendered.

M. H. Willis, of Martinsville, for plaintiff in error.

H. H. Rose, of Fairmont, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, J. Plaintiff brings error to a judgment for defendant, rendered upon its demurrer to the evidence in an action of assumpsit to recover $687.06 and interest thereon, the price of certain water meters which plaintiff, a corporation, alleges it sold and delivered to defendant, a municipal corporation, at its special instance and request, to be paid for in 30 days from the 2d day of November, 1911. Defendant's demurrer to the declaration was overruled. Thereupon it gave notice of recoupment, pleaded the general issue and the statute of limitations, and filed two other special pleas, in one of which it averred that, at and before the time of making the purchase, plaintiff falsely and fraudulently represented to it that said water meters would not corrode; that they were of sufficient strength to endure the pressure of water in defendant's lines or pipes without leakage; that they would correctly and accurately measure and register the quantity of water flowing through the pipes to which they should be attached, knowing at the time of said representations that they were untrue; and that defendant relied upon said representations as being true and was thereby induced to make the purchase. The other special plea sets up a warranty by plaintiff of the same facts alleged to have been falsely represented as true. It further alleges defendant notified plaintiff of the alleged defects in the meters and tendered them back to it before this action was brought. Issues were joined on all of said pleas, and the case was tried upon evidence introduced by plaintiff only; defendant offering none. No resolution is shown to have been adopted at any meeting of the municipal council authorizing any one as its agent to purchase the meters, or obligating it to pay for them. Plaintiff introduced the following letter under date, "New Martinsville, September 13, 1911," signed by G. A. Harman and addressed to plaintiff:

"Some time ago, your agent was here in interest of your company. We were not ready to buy meters at that time but I told him that I would notify the company when the city took steps towards getting meters. We have about decided to put meters in. Would like for your agent to come here and meet the city council. Let us know when he can come and the council will meet him. We would prefer to meet him some evening as we have more time in the evening. Have him bring sample meter with him."

Mr. Harman appears to have then been president of the city's water board. Plaintiff proved also that it shipped the meters upon the written order of George Grall, clerk of the city water board, after they had been carefully tested at the factory and found to be in good condition, and that they were received, installed, and used in the water system; that the only complaint was by the same clerk who wrote, under date of January 10, 1912, the following letter to the plaintiff:

"One of the 2-inch meters would not register and on examination found disk bent and one of the 4-inch meters has also 'stoped' running kindly advise us what to do would like to know if you can give us any information as to where we can get a regular meter book. Thanking you in advance."

Plaintiff promptly replied, explaining what it supposed was the cause of the trouble, and requested that the two meters be returned for inspection and repairs, free of charge if it should be found to be on account of defective material. They were never returned. At the same time a meter reading book was forwarded to Mr. Grall. Notwithstanding numerous letters were addressed and mailed to the city water board of New Martinsville demanding payment of the account, no further complaint was made.

[1, 2] Edward Huffman, a plumber, swears he installed the meters between the 10th and 17th of November, 1911; that he was employed by Mr. Faucet, superintendent of the waterworks, and was paid for the work by the city, "by regular order by the town council and paid out of the treasury." No objection was made to any of the foregoing evidence. Upon demurrer to the evidence, we think a fair inference to be drawn therefrom is that the municipality of New Martinsville owned and controlled the waterworks, and that George Grall, clerk of the city water board, was authorized by the municipal council to purchase the meters, or, if not so authorized, the contract of purchase was made by him on behalf of the city, and, by paying Huffman for their installation, the city ratified the unauthorized contract. The contract was intra vires, and in such case a municipality may ratify an unauthorized contract just as an individual or a private corporation may do; and ratification may be inferred from acquiescence after knowledge of the facts or from conduct inconsistent with any other supposition. 2 Dillon on Munic. Corp. (5th Ed.) § 797; 3 McQuillin on Munic. Corp. § 1255; 15 C. J. 544; 28 Cyc. 677; Jones v. School District, 110 Mich. 363, 68

N. W. 222. Diamond Power Specialty Co. v. City of West Point, 11 Ga. App. 533, 75 S. E. 903, was a case very similar to the one now before us, and the court there held that—

"Even if the chairman of the electric committee of a city council had no authority to purchase blowers for the city electric plant, yet where the blowers were accepted and installed, and operated for nine months, the city would be estopped from setting up want of authority to execute the contract."

See, also, Goshorn's Ex'rs v. County Court, 42 W. Va. 735, 26 S. E. 452, wherein Judge Holt, in discussing the liability of the county court, in an action against it for the price of hogs, purchased by two members of the county court at a time when the court was not in session, says at page 741 of 42 W. Va., at page 454 of 26 S. E.:

"Having received the benefits, it is bound in conscience to pay, and will not be heard to say that the original agreement was not made by a person legally authorized to contract."

If the contract and its ratification were not proven, still the city would be liable, on an implied contract, to pay what the meters were reasonably worth; the agreement being one which the city could lawfully make in a formal manner, and it having received the benefits therefrom. In such case, the city would be estopped to deny its liability, on a quantum valebant, for the reasonable worth of the property. Goshorn's Ex'rs v. County Court, supra; and Cade v. City of Belington, 82 W. Va. 613, 96 S. E. 1053; and authorities above cited. Cases like the present are exceptions to the general rule that municipalities are bound only by the action of their constituted authorities when assembled.

[3] But there is sufficient evidence, we think, to show a ratification, and the contract must be regarded as ratified according to its terms, which includes the time of payment. The bill was payable in 30 days from the day of delivery, which made it fall due December 2, 1911. Limitation did not begin to run until then, hence this action, brought on the 18th of November, 1916, was within time to prevent the bar of the statute; the limitation being five years.

Plaintiff retained title to the meters until they were paid for, and because thereof counsel for defendant insists that it cannot maintain this action. This is a non sequitur. Plaintiff retained the title for its security, and, having elected to bring this action for the price of the meters, it thereby treated the title as vested in defendant, which it had a right to do, and waived its right to sue in detinue for the goods. Plaintiff has made its election and is bound thereby. Orenstein-Arthur Koppel Co. v. Martin, 77 W. Va. 793, 88 S. E. 1064.

The judgment will be reversed, and, the case having been submitted upon a demurrer to the evidence, a judgment entered here for plaintiff for the amount assessed by the jury, to wit, $926.67, with interest thereon from the 28th day of September, 1917, the date of the verdict.

HUPP et al. v. PARKERSBURG MILL CO.
et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 25, 1919.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER — 232(8)—POSSESSION UNDER UNRECORDED DEED—NOTICE.

Possession of a tract of land by the grantee thereof in an unrecorded deed, attended by only slight improvements such as might reasonably and fairly be deemed to have been the work of a tenant, or provision by an owner for a tenant, and unaccompanied by any conspicuous markings of the boundary lines, or improvement up to such lines, while his grantor resides upon and uses an adjacent tract which, together with the one conveyed by the unrecorded deed, constitutes a single tract, to which he has recorded title and out of which he made the conveyance, is not sufficient to put a subsequent purchaser of such entire tract upon inquiry as to the title of the occupant under the unrecorded deed.

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER — 232(8)—POSSESSION UNDER UNRECORDED DEED—NOTICE.

In such case, the possession under the unrecorded deed is apparently consistent with that of the grantor having record title to all of the land on which there is such concurrent possession at different places: wherefore a purchaser from him is under no duty to prosecute his inquiry as to the title beyond the record and the possession by the holder of the recorded title.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Calhoun County.

Suit by W. S. Hupp and others against the Parkersburg Mill Company and others, with cross-bill by defendants. Decree denying relief sought by the bill, and granting the prayer of the cross-bill, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Bruce Ferrell, of Grantsville, for appellants.

POFFENBARGER, J. The appellants, having been in possession of a tract of land, conveyed to them by E. J. Vannoy and wife, out of a larger tract to which the grantors had record title, by an unrecorded deed, at the date of the execution and recordation of a deed of trust on the entire tract, in favor of the Parkersburg Mill Company, a corporation, brought this suit for cancellation of the deed of trust, in so far as it affects or relates to the portion of the land conveyed to them, as a cloud upon their title, under the impression that their possession constituted notice of their right, to the trustee and the trust deed creditor. Upon the bill and the joint and several answer of the trustee and creditor, denying notice and praying enforcement of the lien, the exhibits filed therewith, depositions taken, and a stipulation filed, the court entered a decree denying the relief sought by the bill, for want of equity, and granting the prayer of the cross-bill answer, from which the plaintiffs have appealed.

By deeds executed and duly recorded in 1910, Vannoy became the owner of a tract of land containing 406 acres and 93 poles. By a deed executed July 9, 1912, and not recorded until November 11, 1913, Vannoy and his wife conveyed to the appellants a portion thereof, containing 91½ acres, describing it by metes and bounds. For the most part, the land so conveyed was unimproved. In a cleared space containing 1½ or 2 acres, there was a house into which the grantees moved in December, 1912, after having enlarged the cleared space by about an acre and built a corncrib. Between that date and the execution of the deed of trust they cleared some additional land in another place on the tract and cultivated it in corn, built some fence, sowed some grass seed, and set out a small orchard. The house and outbuildings were in view of a public road, but the other improvements were not. The deed of trust was executed October 16, 1913, and admitted to record October 22, 1913, without actual notice of the conveyance to the appellants, or their claim of title as purchasers, on the part of the grantee or creditor. It conveyed all of the 406-acre tract, except five small parcels thereof, amounting in the aggregate to about 117 acres, previously sold to other parties and conveyed by deeds duly recorded, to secure to the Parkersburg Mill Company a promissory note for the sum of $2,000, executed by the grantor, but it did not except the 91½ acres previously conveyed to the appellants by the unrecorded deed.

In a chancery suit brought by the First National Bank of Spencer, the portion of the 406-acre tract retained by Vannoy was sold, and out of the proceeds of the sale $690.67 was paid on the debt secured as aforesaid. A decree entered therein saved to that company its right to proceed against the 91½-acre tract conveyed to the appellants, for sale thereof to satisfy the unpaid portion of its said debt. After having denied all the material allegations of the bill, the answer averred the existence of the unpaid indebtedness secured by the deed of trust, and prayed for a sale of the land in controversy to satisfy the same, by way of affirmative relief, which prayer was granted in the decree appealed from.

their grantor, the unrecorded deed was valid and effective, and their possession under it adverse. It must be admitted, also, that they were not tenants in common with Vannoy. But these conclusions are not determinative of the issue raised by the pleadings or the rights of the parties. Possession under an executory contract, not adverse at all to the vendor, and even under a merely verbal contract, would be notice to a subsequent purchaser, under some circumstances. Marshall v. McDermitt, 79 W. Va. 245, 90 S. E. 830, L. R. A. 1917C, 883; Anderson v. Nagle, 12 W. Va. 98; Atkinson v. Miller, 34 W. Va. 115, 11 S. E. 1007, 9 L. R. A. 544; Campbell v. Fetterman, 20 W. Va. 398. Upon an issue as to title between the grantor in an unrecorded deed in possession of land and a subsequent purchaser thereof claiming to have bought it and obtained a conveyance thereof, without notice of the prior conveyance, the relation between the grantor and grantee in the unrecorded deed, and their rights, are only incidentally involved. The real inquiry is whether the subsequent purchaser had notice of the prior right of the grantee in the unrecorded deed, so as to deprive him of the benefit of the statute declaring every deed conveying any estate void as to subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration and without notice, until and except from the time that it is duly admitted to record. Section 5, c. 74, of the Code (sec. 3835). The peculiar relation between tenants in common is a factor that sometimes enters into the inquiry. Martin v. Thomas, 56 W. Va. 220, 49 S. E. 118; Ellison v. Torpin, 44 W. Va. 414, 30 S. E. 183. But, when probative or potential, this, too, is only incidentally involved. The situation of the parties to the transaction out of which this controversy has arisen and the facts and circumstances are altogether different from those disclosed by the records in the two cases just referred to and all others in which this court has been called upon to determine questions of notice between prior and subsequent purchasers, arising under the recording statute. In Campbell v. Fetterman's Heirs, 20 W. Va. 398, two town lots constituted the subject-matter of the unrecorded deed, and the grantor was not in possession of any part of either of them at the date of the execution of the subsequent deed. Here the grantee was in possession of the portion of the original tract conveyed to him by the unrecorded deed, while the grantor remained in possession of the residue thereof; wherefore there was concurrent and partial, but not joint nor common, possession of the original tract considered as an entirety. In Delaplain v. Wilkinson, 17 W. Va. 242, and Anderson v. Nagle, cited, the element of notice by possession was not involved; the claimants against the unrecorded papers having been creditors, as to whom such notice is unavailing, not subsequent purchasers. The decision in Marshall v. McDermitt, 79 W. Va. 245, 90 S. E. 830, L. R. A. 1917C, 883, rests upon another proposition, Marshall's estoppel by acceptance of the benefit of the decree under which his land was sold.

The legal effect of possession under such circumstances has been a subject of inquiry in other jurisdictions, however, and has generally been held to be insufficient to constitute such notice as will put a subsequent purchaser upon inquiry. It is so held because it is not inconsistent with the possession of the grantor. He is in possession of a portion of the land, under a deed calling for the entire tract and recorded. One contemplating the purchase of land so held is required to examine the record as to the title and also the land itself as to possession. Going to the record, he finds a deed conveying the entire tract to the grantee; and going to the land, he finds the grantee in possession at some point on the tract. Although others may be found in possession, also, their possession is not deemed to be inconsistent with that of the holder of the record title, ordinarily; wherefore the inquiry need not go beyond the record and the ascertainment of possession on the part of the grantee in the record title, unless there is something in the character of the possession that renders it inconsistent with that of the holder of the recorded deed. That such others found in possession may be only tenants of his, though not known to be such, makes their possession legally consistent with the recorded title and his possession thereunder. Billington v. Welsh, 5 Bin. (Pa.) 129, 6 Am. Dec. 406; Hewes v. Wiswell, 8 Me. (8 Greenl.) 94; McMechan v. Griffing, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 149, 15 Am. Dec. 198; Pope v. Allen, 90 N. Y. 298; Brown v. Volkening, 64 N. Y. 76; Holmes v. Stout, 10 N. J. Eq. 419; Coleman v. Barklew, 27 N. J. Law, 357; Wade on Notice, §§ 291, 293; Webb, Rec. Tit. § 232.

[2] This theory of consistency in possession is not judicially asserted with a degree of rigidity that precludes possibility of notice by means of possession and improvement of a part of the land so held. The doctrine of the cases above referred to seems to be that circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry may amount to notice.

"Actual notice, of itself, impeaches the subsequent conveyance. Proof of circumstances, short of actual notice, which should put a prudent man upon inquiry, authorizes the court or jury to infer and find actual notice. The character of the possession which is sufficient to put a person upon inquiry, and which will be equivalent to actual notice of rights or equities in persons other than those who have title upon record, is very well established by an unbroken current of authority. The possession and occupation must be actual, open and visible; it must not be equivocal, occasional, or for a special or temporary purpose; neither must it be consistent with the title of the apparent owner by the record." Brown v. Volkening, 64 N. Y. 76, 82.

"The fact of notice must be proved by indubitable evidence; either by direct evidence of the fact, or by proving other facts, from which it may be clearly inferred. It is not in such case sufficient that the inference is probable, it must be necessary and unquestionable." McMechan v. Griffing, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 149, 155, 15 Am. Dec. 198.

"If such a line had been run, as alleged in the bill, and the complainant had made improvements up to the line, such an actual occupancy of the land would have been sufficient to put the purchaser upon inquiry." Hanrick v. Thompson, 9 Ala. 409, 413.

In that case, two persons had bought an imperfect section of land, at the same time, taking separate conveyances, with the understanding that, although the patents called for an unequal division of the section, it was to be equally divided between them. Hanrick, to whom the larger portion had been conveyed, having died, his executor advertised and sold the area called for in his patent, to an innocent purchaser. In Billington v. Welsh, cited, Turner, owning a tract of 234 acres on which he had made valuable improvements, verbally sold about 100 acres thereof to his brother-in-law, Welsh, who entered upon it and made slight improvements. Billington purchased the entire tract at a sale made under an execution against Turner, and it was held that Welsh's possession was not sufficient to constitute notice. One of the judges, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"At best the possession of the defendant was of a mixed nature. His pretensions are not defined by marked boundaries or an actual survey. If one inclining to purchase had previously viewed the premises, he would have seen nothing but what usually occurs, where forges, grist and saw mills are carried on—outhouses and cabins for the accommodation of colliers and other workmen. Without such conveniences, those manufactories could not be carried on. The defendant's holding under such circumstances could not convey the same information, nor put a purchaser upon inquiry in the same manner, as an exclusive, unmixed possession, in common cases might * * * seem to give."

Concurrent possession of grantor and grantee on the original tract is not always conclusive evidence against notice, however. Any peculiar circumstance which strongly suggests disassociation or separation of title between them suffices to put the purchaser upon inquiry. Krider v. Lafferty, 1 Whart. (Pa.) 303; Hatch v. Bigelow, 39 Ill. 546.

The boundary lines of the tract of land conveyed to the appellants may have been surveyed, but there is no proof that they were marked by any conspicuous monuments or defined by possession and improvement up to them. Whether such marking or improvement would be sufficient to put a purchaser upon inquiry need not be determined. It suffices to say the occupancy of the appellants and the improvements made by them were not apparently inconsistent with the possession of their grantor, but, on the contrary, were entirely consistent therewith. The house into which they moved had been erected before they purchased, and the additional clearing they had done and the out-buildings they had put up did not differ in character from improvements frequently made by tenants. The possession of the 91½ acres was exclusive and adverse, as regards the grantor of the appellants; but it was neither actually nor apparently coextensive with the bounds of the tract to which the vendor had record title and under which he was likewise in possession. Though perfect as between themselves and their vendor, their title, as to the subsequent purchaser, was equivocal, mixed, and consistent with that of the vendor, if not secret or concealed. The principles and precedents to which reference has been made fully sustain the finding and the legal conclusion of the trial court.

For the reasons stated, the decree complained of will be affirmed.

DONEHOO et al. v. KING et al. (No. 3672.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 25, 1919.)

1. ESTOPPEL \S 37—ESTOPPEL BY DEED—CONVEYANCE IN FRAUD OF CREDITORS.

The doctrine of estoppel by a covenant of warranty is not operative between the grantor and grantee, in a deed conveying land with intent to defraud creditors, against a purchaser from the grantor for a valuable consideration, or any person claiming under such purchaser; the deed having been set aside for fraud, and the land sold to satisfy a debt of a creditor, and the grantor having reacquired the title and conveyed the land to a third person for value.

2. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES \S 315(1)—DEED—CONSTRUCTION.

A decree setting aside a deed, and subjecting the land conveyed by it to sale, at the instance of a creditor of the grantor, to satisfy both prior and subsequent debts, upon a bill charging the making of the conveyance with intent to defraud the creditor as to such debts, withholding of the deed from record, inducement of credit by a false representation of ownership of the land after the conveyance, failing circumstances of the grantor at the date of the deed, and his insolvency at the date of the filing of the bill, is properly interpreted as one setting the deed aside for fraud in the making thereof.

8. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES ¶162(2) — PARTICIPATION IN FRAUD—VOLUNTEER'S ACCEPTANCE OF BENEFITS.

A mere volunteer in a fraudulent conveyance, whether an infant or an adult, participates in the fraud of the grantor by his acceptance of the benefit of the conveyance.

4. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES ¶162(2)—INFANT GRANTEE—PURCHASER FOR VALUE—ESTOPPEL.

To permit an infant grantee in a fraudulent conveyance to have the benefit of an estoppel, arising from the covenant of warranty in the deed, against a purchaser for value from the grantor, after the latter has reacquired the title through judicial proceedings and conveyed the land to a third person for value, would contravene the legal principle denying to any person the benefit of his own wrong, as well as the spirit of the statute against fraudulent conveyances.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Boone County.

Bill by Cora B. Donehoo and others against J. D. King and others and J. W. Cassingham and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants J. W. Cassingham and others appeal. Decree reversed and bill dismissed.

J. Blackburn Watts and McClintic, Mathews & Campbell, all of Charleston, for appellants.

Murphy & Wade, of Madison, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. This appeal is from a decree setting aside and canceling the title papers of the appellants as to the undivided two-fifths of 2,503 acres of land claimed by them, as constituting clouds upon the title of the appellees, and awarding partition of the land, upon the theory that the latter acquired the title by means of a covenant of warranty in a deed which was set aside and annulled and the covenantor's partial reacquisition of the title warranted by him.

By a deed dated September 9, 1877, and recorded August 30, 1883, Daniel Donahoo and wife conveyed the land to Clara J. Briggs and Mary King, two of his children, in trust for his six minor children, with a covenant of general warranty as to all of it but three acres. In November, 1883, T. M. White, a creditor of Donahoo, filed his bill to set aside the deed for want of consideration, and intent on the part of the grantor in the making thereof to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors and particularly the said White. Upon that bill the deed was set aside and the land sold to satisfy the plaintiff's debt, and he became the purchaser. By a deed dated October 9, 1897, White reconveyed to Donahoo two-fifths of the land for a recited consideration of $2,012. By a deed dated August 21, 1890, Donahoo and wife conveyed said two-fifths to John Moores, who on the next day acquired the other three-fifths from White by deed. From Moores such title as he acquired by these conveyances, purporting to be entire and complete, has passed by numerous deeds to the appellants.

The sole ground of alleged title in the appellees is inurement to them of the title to the two-fifths reconveyed to Donahoo by reason of his covenant of general warranty in the deed by which he had formerly conveyed the entire tract to them and which had been canceled and set aside. Their contention is that the deed was set aside only as to the superior right of White as a creditor, and was left in full force and effect between the parties to it, and that the warranty passed the reacquired title to the two-fifths by estoppel. Of course a creditor of a fraudulent or voluntary grantor has no right to have the conveyance wholly set aside, except for subjection of the property to payment of his debt, but he has an undoubted right to have the property sold, and complete title thereto passed by the sale, if such procedure is necessary to the satisfaction of his debt. And in this instance the property was sold, and complete title passed to White. Hence this bill cannot be sustained upon the theory of title remaining in the grantees after the sale. Such a status is both logically and legally impossible. It is fair to counsel to say they do not claim it.

[1] Ordinarily, if a person grants land with a covenant of general warranty, any title thereto he subsequently acquires from a third person virtually passes by force of his warranty to his grantee, for he is estopped to claim it against his own covenant. Clark v. Sayers, 55 W. Va. 512, 47 S. E. 312; Yock v. Mann, 57 W. Va. 187, 49 S. E. 1019; Summerfield v. White, 54 W. Va. 311, 46 S. E. 154. And the estoppel binds his heirs, grantees, and all persons claiming under him. Clark v. Sayers, cited; Custer v. Hall, 71 W. Va. 119, 76 S. E. 183; Raines v. Walker, 77 Va. 92; Carver v. Jackson, 4 Pet. 86, 7 L. Ed. 761; Myers v. Croft, 13 Wall. 291, 20 L. Ed. 562; Irvine v. Irvine, 9 Wall. 618, 19 L. Ed. 800.

The theory of the appellees is that the covenant of warranty between Donahoo and his grantees embodied in the deed was not destroyed by the decree or the sale made under it, and that it still has force and efficacy, binding him and all persons claiming under his subsequent deed to Moores. It seems to be admitted, however, that if the deed of 1877 was actually fraudulent the grantees therein are estopped to claim the benefit of the warranty against Moores, a purchaser for value from Donahoo, after he reacquired title. That they are, if such is the case, is most emphatically asserted by well-considered decisions. Gilliland v. Fenn, 90 Ala. 230, 8 South. 15, 9 L. R. A. 413; Stokes v. Jones,

[2] This record discloses none of the proceedings in the suit brought by White, except the bill, the decrees of sale and confirmation, and the deed made by the special commissioner. The bill alleged indebtedness both prior and subsequent to the date of the deed it assailed, and charged both want of consideration and fraud in a single paragraph, and, in addition thereto, false representations of ownership of the land after the conveyance, by way of inducement to loans made to the grantor by the plaintiff, as well as a withholding of the deed from record. It also alleged failing circumstances on the part of Donahoo since the year 1876, and total insolvency at the date of the filing thereof. What defense he set up in his answer does not appear. The decree did not adjudge the existence of fraud in terms. Its language is that the deed "be set aside and held for naught so far as the same in any way affects the plaintiff's debt." However, it subjected the land to sale for all of the indebtedness claimed, $2,000, largely, if not entirely, contracted before the date of the deed, and $1,123.95 contracted afterwards.

Considered as an entirety, the bill cannot be fairly construed otherwise than as one attacking the deed on the ground of actual fraud. Lack of consideration was charged as a circumstance tending to prove fraudulent intent. In addition thereto it charged a conveyance by a man in failing financial circumstances, to avoid payment of existing indebtedness, and fraudulent contraction of subsequent indebtedness. Nor is the decree fairly susceptible of any interpretation other than that of one setting aside the deed for actual fraud, since it set it aside as to indebtedness subsequently incurred; for it could not have been set aside for lack of consideration alone as to a debt subsequently incurred. Code, c. 74, § 2 (sec. 3830); Edwards Manufacturing Co. v. Carr, 65 W. Va. 673, 64 S. E. 1030; Greer v. O'Brien, 36 W. Va. 277, 15 S. E. 74; McCue v. McCue, 41 W. Va. 151, 23 S. E. 689; Graham Grocery Co. v. Chase, 75 W. Va. 775, 84 S. E. 785.

[3,4] Inability of the infant beneficiaries of the deed of 1877 to participate actively in the fraud of the grantor may be admitted, but that does not absolve them from the effect of the fraudulent intent and purpose. There is no saving in section 1 of chapter 74 of the Code (sec. 3829) in favor of volunteers, whether infants or adults. If there is fraud on the part of the grantor only, it vitiates the deed as to everybody except a purchaser for value and without notice. Graham Grocery Co. v. Chase, cited. The recipient of a fraudulent gift, however free from intent actually fraudulent, becomes a fraudulent grantee the moment he claims the benefit of the grant. His acceptance amounts in law to an adoption of the fraudulent act of the grantor. Graham Grocery Co. v. Chase; Laidley v. Reynolds, 58 W. Va. 418, 52 S. E. 405; Mayhew v. Clark, 33 W. Va. 387, 10 S. E. 785; Connaway v. McCann, 30 W. Va. 200, 3 S. E. 590; Duncan v. Custard, 24 W. Va. 730; Sexton v. Wheaton, 8 Wheat. 229, 5 L. Ed. 603. To claim the benefit of the estoppel ordinarily arising from a covenant of warranty, the grantees in the fraudulent deed would have to adopt the fraudulent act of the grantor, for the covenant is a part of that act, and that would make them, in a legal sense, participants in it. If permitted to take the benefit of it, they would be allowed to profit by their own fraud at the expense of a purchaser for value.

From these principles and conclusions it results that the decree complained of is erroneous, and that there is no merit in the bill; wherefore the decree will be reversed and the bill dismissed, with costs to the appellants in this court and in the court below.

GRIFFIN v. RICHARDSON. (No. 3567.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 25, 1919.)

1. DEDICATION ¶19(5)—SALE BY REFERENCE TO MAP—RIGHT OF PURCHASERS.

Where the owner lays off a tract of land into lots, streets, and alleys for an addition to a town, and has a map made thereof, with reference to which he makes sale of such lots, the purchasers thereof are entitled to the use of all such streets and alleys necessary to the complete enjoyment of the lots purchased by them.

2. DEDICATION ¶60—STREETS AND ALLEYS—ACCEPTANCE—RIGHT TO MAKE IMPROVEMENTS.

Where the owner of a tract of real estate lays off the same into lots abutting upon streets and alleys, as shown by a plat thereof, and dedicates such streets and alleys to the public upon their natural grade and in their natural state, and such dedication is accepted by some public corporation having the right to accept the same, such public corporation has authority to make such improvements in the streets and alleys so dedicated as will make them reasonably fit for the purpose of their dedication, so that the reasonably convenient use thereof by any abutting owner is not materially affected.

3. DEDICATION ¶61—TOWN ADDITION—MAP—RIGHT OF PURCHASERS—CHANGE OF GRADE.

Where a tract of land is laid off into lots, streets and alleys as a subdivision to a city or town, and the owner so laying off the same makes a map thereof, and makes sale of the lots with reference thereto, the purchasers of such lots have the right to the free and unobstructed use of such streets and alleys, and where it is necessary, in order that such use shall be enjoyed, that changes be made in the natural grade of such streets or alleys, any purchaser so having the right to use the same may make such changes as are necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the easement possessed by him, so that he does not materially affect any other abutting owner's reasonably convenient use of such streets or alleys.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Harrison County.

Bill for injunction by James A. Griffin against Edwin V. Richardson, administrator, etc. Decree for plaintiff, perpetuating the injunction, and defendant appeals. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

Harvey W. Harmer and Chas. G. Coffman, both of Clarksburg, for appellant.

Homer Strosnider and Fred L. Shinn, both of Clarksburg, for appellee.

RITZ, J. In the year 1890 one William Hood laid off into town lots an addition to the town of Shinnston. A plat was made of this addition, which included thereon certain streets and alleys, as well as the lots, as part thereof. These lots were sold by Hood to various parties, among the purchasers being the plaintiff Griffin and defendant's intestate, Luther H. Coffman. Coffman became the owner of three of said lots, to wit, those numbered 6, 7, and 8 on the plat, and Griffin likewise became the owner of three thereof, Nos. 25, 26, and 27. Between the rear of the three lots owned by Griffin and the rear of the three owned by Coffman there was laid down on the plat an alley 18 feet wide connecting at one end of the property of Griffin and Coffman with another road or alley referred to in the proceedings as Ravine alley, and at the other end of their respective properties was another alley running at right angles to the alley separating the properties of the parties to this suit. Each of the parties constructed houses on the respective parcels of land owned by him, the house of Coffman fronting on a street running in front of his lots at the end farthest from the lots of Griffin, and the house of Griffin fronting on a street running in front of his lots at the end farthest from the lots of Coffman. It appears that the surface of the alley at one end of the lots of the parties, known as the Ravine alley, at the point at which it intersected with the alley separating the properties of the parties, was about 10 or 12 feet below the surface of the alley with which it so connected, so that it was impossible, under the conditions that existed at the time the property was laid out, to use these two alleys in conjunction. Each of the parties reached the rear of his property by coming over the alley between them, and in order to turn around was compelled to go upon his own lots, or the lots of his neighbor; the alley not being wide enough in which to turn a wagon. That part of the alley lying between the property of the parties farthest from the Ravine alley, and for about one-third of the length thereof, was paved with brick by Coffman some time since, and for the remainder of the distance the alley was in the same condition, until shortly before the institution of this suit, that it was when the property was originally laid out; that is, it was never graded, but was simply laid out upon the ground and left in its natural state. At the end of the alley separating the properties of the parties next to the Ravine alley it is considerably lower than it is in the middle. The addition at the point where the properties of the parties are located is on sloping ground, Griffin's property lying on the upper side of the alley, and Coffman's property on the lower side thereof, and the ground sloping gradually from the front of Griffin's lots down to the alley in the rear, and from the rear of Coffman's lots down to the front thereof. In addition to this slanting condition of the alley, it is not uniform in its longitudinal elevation, being considerably higher at a point located about the center of the properties of the parties to this suit than at either end. In this ungraded condition, except as to the portion thereof which had been paved with brick as above stated, the parties had used this alley for a considerable length of time, part of the time it being occupied with chicken houses, and sometimes entirely closed part of the way with other outbuildings and fences.

Shortly before the institution of this suit Coffman desired to open this alley through to the Ravine alley, and with a view to doing this the obstructions were removed therefrom, and he proceeded to grade down the alley between him and Griffin, and to remove the material into Ravine alley; his purpose being to raise the grade of the Ravine alley some 6 or 7 feet, and lower the grade in the alley separating his property from that of Griffin, so as to make a grade over which travel might be conducted from one of these alleys to the other. This involved cutting off the high part of the alley between his property and that of Griffin, about the center thereof, and also making some cutting in the alley from a point near the end of the present brick paving to the point where it intersects with the Ravine alley. The engineer he procured to lay out the proposed improvement files a profile with his deposition, which indicates the extent of the cutting required in order to carry out the plan. From this profile it is shown that Coffman's purpose was to cut down the alley at one point 5 feet, this being the deepest part of the cut, and the cut on both sides of this point gradually grew less until it tapered off to the present grade. For some of the distance the alley is only cut down a few inches, for part of the way a foot or two, and for another part of the way as much as 5 feet. In accordance with this plan Coffman procured men to enter upon the grading, and as soon as this was done Griffin filed this bill and procured an injunction against further work being done.

Griffin in his bill alleges that the purpose of Coffman is to cut down the alley between them to the level of the grade of the Ravine alley, which would make a cut some 10 or 12 feet deep, and his proof is to the effect that, if this was done, it would destroy the access to his property from the rear thereof. The uncontradicted evidence, however, is that Coffman never had any such purpose, his only purpose being to grade the alley as above indicated; but Griffin contends that even then, while the access to his property would not be entirely destroyed, it would be affected in a substantial way—that is to say, that for part of the distance he could not get into his property as readily as he can at the present time. This is undoubtedly true as to that part where the cut will be five feet deep. It will require some grading at those points to get into the Griffin lots, and then the access thereto would not be as easy as it was theretofore, but the cutting to this extent is only over a portion of Griffin's property. For much the larger portion thereof the excavation is very much less, and for considerable parts of it there is no cut in the alley contiguous to his property, or it is inconsiderable, and Coffman's contention is that he has a right to put this alley in condition fit to be used in connection with the other streets and alleys with which it connects, so long as he does not too materially injure the premises of Griffin. Upon a hearing the court below made the injunction perpetual, and, Coffman having died pending the suit, his personal representative prosecutes this appeal.

[1] There is no doubt that when a party lays off a piece of land into lots and sells those lots to others with reference to certain streets and alleys indicated upon the plat, such purchasers are entitled to have the use of those streets and alleys. They are entitled to put them in condition so that they can be reasonably used in connection with the properties purchased by them, and also to have them kept free from any obstructions which would prevent such use. Cook v. Totten, 49 W. Va. 177, 38 S. E. 491, 87 Am. St. Rep. 792; Edwards v. Moundsville Land Co., 56 W. Va. 43, 48 S. E. 754. There is no obligation upon the party who lays out the lots to grade the streets in the absence of some express agreement to that effect. 9 R. C. L. 794; 10 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 428; City of Bellevue v. Daly, 14 Idaho, 545, 94 Pac. 1036, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 992, 123 Am. St. Rep. 179, 14 Ann. Cas. 1136; Nichols v. Peck, 70 Conn. 439, 39 Atl. 803, 40 L. R. A. 81, 66 Am. St. Rep. 122; Dudgeon v. Bronson, 159 Ind. 562, 64 N. E. 910, 65 N. E. 752, 95 Am. St. Rep. 315, and note at page 328.

[2, 3] While there is no obligation upon the party dedicating the streets and alleys in this way to put them in reasonable condition for use, he does vest the right in the parties to whom he sells the lots to so put them in such condition, and to do whatever may be necessary to that end. As between the original owners of the property and the purchasers of the lots, or the owners of the easement, the latter have the absolute right to do whatever may be necessary for the reasonably full enjoyment of the easement granted. Hammond v. Woodman, 41 Me. 177; Cook v. Totten, supra; Edwards v. Moundsville Land Co., supra; 9 R. C. L. 794; 10 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 428; City of Bellevue v. Daly, supra; Nichols v. Peck, supra; Dudgeon v. Bronson, supra; McMillan v. Cronin, 75 N. Y. 474; Prescott v. White, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 341, 32 Am. Dec. 266. These authorities clearly establish the right of the purchasers of lots under such circumstances, as between them and the original owner, to do whatever may be necessary to put the streets and alleys in condition for use. Clearly when they were laid off this is what the parties contemplated, and while the original owner cannot be compelled to improve the same at his expense, he cannot prevent such improvement being made by the lot owners. And where a subdivision of this character has been dedicated, and such dedication has been accepted by a municipal corporation, the right of said municipal corporation to change such streets and alleys from their natural state into a condition making them reasonably serviceable to the people having a right to use the same is beyond question. And this is true notwithstanding that by so doing the ingress and egress of some abutting lot owner may be in some measure disadvantageously affected. Hickman v. City of Clarksburg, 81 W. Va. 394, 94 S. E. 501, and authorities there cited.

But it is contended that while this right may be vested in a municipal corporation upon its acceptance of such a dedication, it does not belong to the owners of lots in such a subdivision. It is a little difficult for us to understand why, if a municipal corporation can make such a change in the natural condition of such streets and alleys, that one or more of the parties who own the easement, and are entitled to use the same, could not do the like. The action of the municipal corporation is only by reason of the fact that it has accepted the dedication, and its right to improve such streets or alleys without paying compensation to an abutting owner who may be injured thereby depends on no other ground than that it is the owner of the easement. Why, then, in a case where no public authority has accepted the dedication of such easement, cannot the private owners thereof do exactly the same thing? If it is damnum absque injuria, in case the work is done by a public authority owning the easement, why is it any less so when such improvements are made by private persons owning exactly the same easement? It may be said that the right of a municipal corporation to make such improvements is not unlimited. It can only do such grading and make such improvements in streets and alleys thus dedicated as may be reasonably necessary to put the same in condition for the reasonable enjoyment of those entitled to their use, and this must be done so as to disadvantageously affect abutting property owners as little as possible. We think exactly the same rule applies in cases where the easement thus created has never been accepted by a public authority, but is vested in the owners of the lots. So far as our examination has gone there have been few adjudications upon this particular question, but we find in the case of Rotch v. Livingston, 91 Me. 461, 40 Atl. 428; that it is held that any one of the several owners of such a road or alley as is involved here may at his own expense fit the way for convenient use, so that such improvement does not materially impede any other owner in his convenient use of the same, and this same doctrine is announced by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in the case of Killion v. Kelley, 120 Mass. 47. We conclude, therefore, that Coffman had the right to improve this alley lying between his property and that of the plaintiff so long as he did not materially impede the plaintiff in the use of the easement in connection with his property.

This brings us to the question of whether or not the improvements contemplated constitute such an impediment. We have pretty fully shown their character in the statement we have before made. Griffin, it is true, will not be able to obtain access to his property as readily as theretofore, but his use of the alleys and streets of the subdivision will be very much easier than theretofore. The rule does not mean that an abutting property owner cannot be made to suffer any inconvenience at all, but only that no substantial injury may be inflicted upon him. It must be borne in mind that when these people bought these lots they knew that it was contemplated that these streets and alleys would be used for the purpose for which such streets and alleys are ordinarily used, and they also must have known, because the physical facts so informed them, that this could not be done without making some change in the then existing condition thereof, and so long as the change proposed to be made goes no further than the absolute necessity of putting them in condition fit for the use to which they are dedicated, and does not substantially prevent the use thereof by any of the abutting owners, no one has a right to complain, even though his property may not be as free of access as it would be were no changes made therein. To hold in this case that Griffin is entitled to have this alley remain in its natural condition would be practically dedicating it to his individual use, and to deny the use of it to others who are equally entitled thereto, for it is conceded that it cannot be used in connection with the Ravine alley unless some improvement is made in it, and some change made in the grade of the Ravine alley. We do not think that the change proposed to be made by Coffman, as shown by the evidence in this case, is any more than Griffin must have contemplated would be made when he purchased his property, for he surely must have known that this alley lying between him and Coffman would be used in connection with the alley with which it intersects, and such could not be the case except it be improved in the manner which it was proposed by Coffman to improve it.

We are therefore of opinion that the court erred in perpetuating the injunction, and our order will be to reverse the decree of the circuit court and dismiss the bill.

BLAGG v. BALTIMORE & O. R. CO.
(No. 3680.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 25, 1919. Rehearing Denied
March 27, 1919.)

1. RAILROADS — 358(1) — OPERATION — LICENSEE—CARE REQUIRED.

One not in the employ of a railway company, using its tracks as a walkway over a portion thereof which pedestrians are accustomed to use for such purpose, but not at a public crossing, is at most a mere licensee, and such railway company owes to him no higher or other duty than it owes to a trespasser.

2. EVIDENCE — 119(1) — READMISSIBILITY — RES GESTÆ.

Whenever a statement is made by one under such circumstances that it may be regarded as spontaneous and as the direct result of a transaction to which he was a party, it becomes a part of the transaction itself, and if proof of the fact is material to the inquiry being made, such statement will be received in evidence as tending to establish such fact.

3. RAILROADS — 369(3) — LICENSEE—PERSONAL INJURY—LIABILITY.

A person using a railroad track as a foot-path for his own convenience elsewhere than at a public crossing, and injured by a train while so doing, cannot recover damages from the railroad company, unless it be shown that after he was discovered upon the track by the employes or servants of the railroad company they did not use reasonable care to avoid injuring him.

4. TRIAL — 250(1) — INSTRUCTION—EVIDENCE.

It is error to give an instruction based upon an hypothesis which is not supported by any evidence.

Error to Circuit Court, Mason County.

Action by B. H. Blagg, administrator of Raymond Bennett, deceased, against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Rankin Wiley, of Point Pleasant, for plaintiff in error.

B. H. Blagg, of Point Pleasant, and Somerville & Somerville, of Grafton, for defendant in error.

RITZ, J. This writ of error is prosecuted to a judgment in favor of plaintiff for damages occasioned by the death of his decedent, Raymond Bennett, caused by the alleged wrongful act of the defendant. Bennett was killed on the 26th day of August, 1913, by being run over on the tracks of the defendant near its station of Point Pleasant. The evidence shows that a north-bound train of the defendant, containing a locomotive, tender, and three cars, just a short distance north of defendant's station of Point Pleasant, ran over the defendant about 7 o'clock on the morning of August 26, 1913, and so badly injured him that he died in a few minutes after the accident. As to how long Bennett was on the track before he was struck by this train, as to when he came on the track, what efforts were made to stop it before he was struck, whether or not the engineer saw him in sufficient time to have stopped the train before it struck him, there is no evidence. The testimony for the plaintiff, by one witness shows that she lived near the railroad track, at the point where the accident happened; that she was in her kitchen eating breakfast at the time she heard the locomotive give quick short blasts of the whistle indicating the possibility of an accident; that she quickly got up from the table, and went rapidly to her front door, which was just across another room, the door between the kitchen and this room, and the front door, being open at the time, and that when she got to her front porch the train had run over Bennett, and he was still under it; that by the time the train stopped it had passed entirely over his body and left it remaining a few feet to the rear of the train. She does not undertake to state when Bennett got on the track; in fact she did not see him until after he was run over, nor does she undertake to say how far the engine was from him at the time he was discovered. The only reasonable inference that can be drawn from her evidence is that it must have been very close from the fact that she, moving as rapidly as she conveniently could, only crossed the front room of her house from the time she heard the first alarm given until the train had run over him. She does state in her evidence that the train had not slowed down from the time it first began to whistle until she first saw it, or until after it had run over Bennett. Manifestly she could not know whether the train had slowed down before she saw it or not. She does state, however, that the train stopped when the last car had passed just a few feet beyond Bennett's body, and when the engine was just up to a trestle a short distance north of where Bennett was struck. Another witness testifies that he was working at a house near the place of the accident, and that he saw Bennett struck by the train on the trestle above referred to. This testimony is denied by the physical facts shown that Bennett's body was south of the trestle at the time it was run over, and at the time it was recovered, and that the train had stopped before going upon the trestle. Manifestly this witness was confused in his statements, and they are not to be relied upon, being in direct conflict with the physical facts indisputably shown. He does not, however, undertake to say how long Bennett had been on the track at the time the engineer discovered him, or before he was struck, or what, if any, efforts were made to prevent his being struck after he was discovered. He does state that the train was running 40 to 50 miles an hour at the time he observed it, and his statement in this regard is all of the evidence as to the speed of the train. Another witness who came upon the ground very shortly after the accident observed what he presumed to be the place where Bennett was hit. He found at this point Bennett's dinner bucket with his dinner spilled upon the ground, and also marks of blood and mangled pieces of his clothing and remains. This point, this witness says, was a little bit closer to the trestle referred to than it was to the Point Pleasant station. He says that he stepped off the distance from this point to a point in a southerly direction, at which the plaintiff's decedent would have been observable had he been upon the track, and he finds that plaintiff's decedent could have been seen 265 steps from the point at which he was hit, but he does not undertake to say that the engineer saw him at any such distance, or that he was even upon the track at the time the engine was that distance away. In fact, as before stated, there is no proof in this case as to when Bennett came upon the track, how long he had been upon the track before he was hit by the engine, how far the engine was from him at the time he was discovered, or as to whether or not the engineer could have, in the exercise of ordinary care, prevented the injury after discovering Bennett upon the track. In this state of the case the defendant requested a peremptory instruction to find in its favor, which was refused, and certain instructions given on behalf of the plaintiff to which objection was made. The jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $1,000, and, after overruling defendant's motion to set it aside, the court rendered judgment thereon.

[1] There is some attempt made to show that the defendant's track at the point at which Bennett was killed had been frequently used by pedestrians going to and from their work, and by others having occasion to use the same as a walkway or passway. The evidence upon this, however, is not very satisfactory, and it does not appear that the track was used for this purpose to a very much greater extent than railroad tracks are ordinarily used for such purposes. However, this can make no difference so far as the duty which the defendant owed to the plaintiff's decedent is concerned. He would be a mere licensee at most, and the defendant company owed him no other or different duty than it owed to a trespasser. Bralley v. Railway Co., 66 W. Va. 462, 66 S.

[2] On the trial of this case the court permitted a witness to testify that he came to the station at Point Pleasant immediately after the accident, and that the engineer in charge of the train made a statement to the effect that he saw Bennett in the middle of the track and blew for him, but the man did not seem to hear the alarm, apparently for the reason that there was a train going over the K. & M. at the time. It is complained that this statement was improperly admitted. The theory, of course, upon which it is sought to justify the statement of the engineer is that it is part of the res gestæ. It appears that it was made in a very few minutes after the accident happened, and under such circumstances as that it might well be assumed that it was a spontaneous and voluntary outburst. We think under the rule laid down in Starcher v. Oil Co., 81 W. Va. 587-601, 95 S. E. 28, this statement was properly admitted as part of the res gestæ. The circumstances under which it was made and its substance particularly characterize it as a spontaneous utterance, the natural result of the accident.

[3] But does the evidence in this case justify the jury's verdict? It must be borne in mind that a railroad company owes to a trespasser or mere licensee discovered upon its tracks only the duty not to injure him if it can be avoided. Primarily the railroad is built for the purpose of operating trains thereon, and such trains are entitled to the use of the tracks free from obstruction by trespassers, and one who goes upon such tracks at a point other than a public crossing, where he has a right to be, is charged with this knowledge. Of course, it cannot be said that if a trespasser or a mere licensee is discovered upon the track, the employes of the company owe no duty to him. It seems to be well established that in this event there is an obligation to give an alarm in order to inform him of the approach of the train, and, if he does not heed such alarm, then the employes must resort to such other means as may be available to prevent injuring him, if possible, such as giving a second alarm, or reducing the speed of the train, or even stopping it if this can be done. Bralley v. Railway Co., 66 W. Va. 462, 66 S. E. 653; Teel v.

Railroad Co., 49 W. Va. 35, 38 S. E. 518; Spicer v. Railway Co., 34 W. Va. 514, 12 S. E. 553, 11 L. R. A. 385; Huff v. Railway Co., 48 W. Va. 45, 35 S. E. 866. There is not the slightest evidence in this case to show when plaintiff's decedent came upon the railroad track, or that he was discovered thereon within such time as that the train could have been stopped and the injury prevented. In fact, the only reasonable deduction from the evidence presented is that plaintiff's decedent was discovered upon the track only a few seconds before he was hit. There is no evidence to show, even assuming that Bennett had been on the track for some time before the train hit him, that the train, at the speed at which it was running, could have been stopped after he was discovered, assuming that he was discovered as soon as the engineer might have seen him. There is no evidence to fix negligence upon the railroad company, or any of its employes, and unless this is done there is no right of recovery.

[4] Complaint is made of instructions given on behalf of the plaintiff. The first of these instructions tells the jury that if the engineer saw Bennett on the track it was his duty to give an alarm, and in case the alarm was unheeded it was the duty of the engineer to adopt additional measures of precaution, such as a repetition of the signal, and, if necessary, to check the speed of the train. This is a correct statement of a general principle of law, but what evidence is there in this case to justify some of the hypotheses assumed by the instruction? This instruction assumes that Bennett did not heed the alarm when given, and this assumption may be justified from the fact that he did not get off the track. It further assumes that the engineer had opportunity to check the speed of the train, or to give the second alarm, and did not do so. There is no evidence of this. The second instruction likewise states a correct proposition of law, but the hypotheses contained therein find no support in the evidence. The third instruction tells the jury that if Bennett was seen by the engineer in charge of the train on the right of way of the defendant company in such close proximity to the track as to be in danger, it was then the duty of the engineer to take such precaution for his safety as the circumstances reasonably dictated. There is no basis in the evidence for the hypothesis that Bennett was upon the right of way so close to the track as to be in danger. If the evidence shows anything, it shows that he was on the track. Then too, this instruction is indefinite in advising the jury that it was the duty of the engineer to take such precautions, by signaling or otherwise, as the circumstances reasonably dictated. It should have been more definite in this regard, and directed the jury just what things the engineer should have done, and not left the jury to speculate or wander at large as to the duty of the engineer under a particular state of facts. While these instructions correctly propound propositions of law, the hypotheses upon which they are founded find no support in the evidence offered, and they were therefore improperly given.

It follows from what we have said that the judgment of the circuit court will be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

GOODRICH v. MATTHEWS. (No. 217.)

1. HIGHWAYS ⇐175(1) — NEGLIGENCE—LAW OF THE ROAD.

Failure to turn to the right, as required by Laws 1913, c. 107, when meeting another on a highway, renders one guilty of negligence.

2. TRIAL ⇐165—MOTION FOR NONSUIT—PRESUMPTIONS AS TO EVIDENCE.

Upon a motion for judgment of nonsuit, the evidence in favor of the plaintiff must be taken as true.

3. HIGHWAYS ⇐184(3) — COLLISIONS—NEGLECT—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action for injuries to a mule struck while being led on a highway, whether defendant's negligence in staying in the used rut in the highway, and not turning to the right when meeting the mule, was the proximate cause of the accident, held for the jury.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐904(2), 905—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

It is the province of the jury, and not the appellate court, to pass on credibility of witnesses and to determine weight of evidence.

5. EVIDENCE ⇐220(2) — DECLARATIONS OF DECEASED PERSONS—IMPLIED ADMISSION.

A declaration of a deceased person in defendant's presence in nature of a charge that defendant was responsible for injury to a mule which his automobile struck, and therefore negligent, was admissible in evidence on the same ground that a charge of crime made to a party and not replied to is treated as an implied admission.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Calvert, Judge.

Action by W. L. Goodrich against Elliott Matthews. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

This is an action to recover damages for the killing of a mule belonging to the intestate of the plaintiff, which, the plaintiff alleges, was killed by the negligence of the defendant in driving an automobile.

At the time of the injury complained of, the plaintiff was walking along a public road leading two mules and going in a westerly direction, and the defendant was driving an automobile along the road going in an easterly direction and met the intestate of the plaintiff.

There was a motion for judgment of nonsuit at the conclusion of the evidence which was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

A witness for the plaintiff named Cain went to the place where the mule was injured a few minutes after the injury, and he was permitted to testify that the owner of the mule said to the defendant, "You have run over my mule, and you will have to pay for her," and the defendant excepted.

There was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

E. L. Gavin, of Sanford, and Fowler & Crumpler and W. H. Fisher, all of Clinton, for appellant.

ALLEN, J. [1] The statute in force at the time of the injury complained of (chapter 107, Laws 1913) required the defendant to turn to the right when he met the plaintiff's intestate on the road, and if he failed to do so he was guilty of a breach of a statutory duty, which is negligence, and, if this was the cause of the injury to the mule, it is actionable and renders the defendant liable to answer in damages. Ledbetter v. English, 166 N. C. 125, 81 S. E. 1066; McNeill v. R. R., 167 N. C. 396, 83 S. E. 704; Dunn v. R. R., 174 N. C. 259, 93 S. E. 784. Does the evidence tend to prove these facts?

The road was 21 feet wide. E. M. Bullard, a witness for the plaintiff, testified:

"The mules, judging from their tracks, were as far to the right as they could get. I noticed defendant's car tracks were in the wheel ruts. I know his car tracks, as they had non-skid tires, and could tell from that that the defendant kept in the ruts and did not turn to his right. To the right going west it was 7 feet and 2 inches from the rut to the edge of the ditch. I am satisfied Matthews did not turn to his right."

[2, 3] Upon a motion for judgment of nonsuit, we must assume that this evidence is true, and, if so, it shows that the mules were as close to the ditch on their side as they could go, and that the defendant having a space of 7 or 8 feet to his right, instead of going as far from the mules as he reasonably could, did not turn to the right at all, but continued in the rut ordinarily used by travelers, and that he was therefore negligent in that he failed to obey the statute, and it was for the jury to say, under the circumstances, whether this failure on his part to do as the law required was the proximate cause of the injury. The jury might reasonably conclude that if the defendant had turned 2 or 3 feet, which he could have done easily, that the mules would not have been injured, and that the real proximate cause of the injury was because he did not do so.

[4] The evidence of the defendant tends to prove that he was as far to the right as he could reasonably go, and that the injury was not caused by his negligence, but because as he drove opposite the mules one of them backed into the car and was injured, but we cannot base our ruling on this contradictory evidence, as it is the province of the jury alone to pass on the credibility of the witnesses and to determine the weight of evidence, and we must presume that the contentions of the defendant were fairly submitted to the jury, as there is no exception to the charge, and it has not been sent up as a part of the record.

We are therefore of opinion that the motion for judgment of nonsuit was properly overruled.

[5] The exception to the evidence does not come within the ruling in Bumgardner v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 440, 43 S. E. 948, in which the declaration of a deceased party, who was injured, made after the event and detailing the cause of the injury, was excluded because it was a narrative of a past event, as the evidence admitted in this case was a declaration made to the defendant himself, and was in the nature of a charge that the defendant was responsible for the injury and therefore negligent, to which the defendant made no reply.

It was admissible upon the same ground that a charge of crime or misconduct made to a party and not replied to is dealt with as an implied admission.

No error.

(177 N. C. 559)

STATE v. DUNNING. (No. 89.)

1. ASSAULT AND BATTERY ⚡95 — ASSAULT WITH DEADLY WEAPON—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution against a peace officer for shooting and wounding prosecuting witness whom he was attempting to arrest for a misdemeanor under a warrant, evidence held not to support a direction that defendant was guilty as a conclusion of law.

2. ARREST ⚡68 — CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS — OFFICERS—RIGHT TO EMPLOY FORCE.

A peace officer having the right to arrest an offender may use such force as is necessary, and to a great extent is the judge of the degree of force that may properly be asserted, and if resisted he may use force to the extent of taking life, regardless of whether the offense be a felony or misdemeanor.

3. ASSAULT AND BATTERY ⚡92 — USE OF FORCE BY OFFICER — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

Where a peace officer shot and wounded prosecuting witness while attempting to arrest him under a warrant for disorderly conduct, on being assaulted by the latter with a knife, evidence, in prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, held to justify the degree of force used.

4. ARREST ⚡68 — CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS — USE OF FORCE—OFFICER'S DUTY TO RETIRE.

A peace officer attempting to arrest an offender under a warrant, and being assaulted by him, need not retreat or retire in order to justify the use of force in making the arrest.

Appeal from Superior Court, Bertie County; Kerr, Judge.

I. W. Dunning was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and he appeals. Error.

This is an indictment for an unlawful assault with a deadly weapon on one C. T. White, while defendant, as constable and chief of police of the town of Aulander, was endeavoring to arrest the said prosecutor C. T. White for disorderly conduct in breach of the criminal law.

On the trial the defendant testified in his own behalf, and at the close of all the evidence the court charged the jury as follows:

"Gentlemen of the jury, if you believe the evidence of the defendant, I. W. Dunning, himself, I charge you that he is guilty, and, if you so believe it, you will say guilty for your verdict."

Verdict of guilty. Judgment, and defendant excepted and appealed.

Winston & Matthews, of Windsor, and Alex Lassiter, of Aulander, for appellant.

The Attorney General, Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., and Winborne & Winborne, of Murfreesboro, for the State.

HOKE, J. There was evidence on the part of the state tending to convict the defendant, but the same does not accompany the record, as no exception is made concerning it.

For the defense I. W. Dunning, a witness in his own behalf, testified as follows:

"I am the defendant. I have lived near and in Aulander, Bertie county, all my life. I am now 24 years old. Some three years ago I moved to Aulander, to be near a physician for treatment. I went to Norfolk and underwent an operation and came back to Aulander. I have not been strong since then. The commissioners of the town of Aulander elected me constable and chief of police of the town. There was no other constable of the town nor any other policeman. I was the only one. I have known C. T. White all my life. He was then living in Aulander, and had been living there a number of years. His reputation was that when under the influence of liquor he was a desperate and violent man. I know that of my own knowledge, because I had frequently seen him in that condition. He had been indicted for repeated assaults and for cutting people, and had been convicted. At the May election of this year in Aulander I was re-elected constable by the people of the town. On the day in question, about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, complaint was made to me that C. T. White was drunk on the street, violently noisy, and profane in the presence of the public and of ladies passing on the street. I went up the street and found him at the Main street crossing of the town, within a few yards of the post office, in the heart of the business section of the town and of the bank, and in the very center of the business part of the town. I went up to him. He had an open knife in his hand and was noisy and cursing. I ordered him to cease cursing and advised him to go home. I did not want to have to put him in the lockup, and thought I could get him quiet. He did quiet down for a few moments, and came up to me and said he wanted me to give him his liquor. He claimed that he had been to Kelford and brought back two quarts of liquor, and said I had taken it. I told him I had not done so. He demanded that I let him search me, and to satisfy him I did so. He felt in all my pockets until he came to the one in which I had my pistol, as I was then on duty. I told him he could not go in that pocket. Then he began to curse and abuse me, and called me a most foul and loathesome name (too foul for this record). I backed back from him. He had me by the hand and was attempting to cut me. I was trying to arrest him. This kept up for several minutes. Finally the mayor came up and quieted him down. Later he went in the barber shop and commenced raising a row and cursing Mr. Early, who was in the barber shop. Early finally got him down on the floor. I went to arrest him, and Early and his relatives said if I would let him alone they could get him to go home. He was quiet for but a moment, and came out in the street and commenced cursing Early and myself and threatened to kill us both. He had his open knife in his hand. I dodged about the town to keep out of his way. He completely terrorized the town. All the above occurred about three to four hours before I shot him. People came to me and complained, and finally about 10 o'clock Mr. A. T. Castellow, the mayor of the town, brought me a warrant charging disorderly conduct or a misdemeanor, for the arrest of C. T. White, and told me to go at once and arrest him and bring him before him. During the early part of the evening, and again after I got the warrant, I called on several persons to go with me to assist in making the arrest. They all declined because they said they knew his desperate and dangerous character when under the influence of liquor, and they did not propose to get cut. I finally got a man to go with me. Then White was passing down the street with one Cox, and going in the direction of the Cox place of business—his restaurant and poolroom. I heard him cursing and threatening to kill me and Early. He was violent; cursing and noisy. He went in the Cox place of business and took a seat by the stove. It was a store some 70 feet deep. In the back was a poolroom. Some young boys were there playing pool. The stove was in the middle of the house, between the counters, and about 20 feet from the door. I went in with my warrant in my hand. I then had my pistol in my pocket, and had not taken it out during the day or night. I had my hand on my pistol, which was in my hip pocket. I walked within ten or twelve feet of White, and said, 'I have a warrant for you; consider yourself under arrest.' He got up with his open knife in his hand, and I said, 'Put up your knife and consider yourself under arrest.' He said, 'damn you and your warrant, too; take your hand off your gun.' I again told him I had the warrant and to consider himself under arrest. He again replied, 'damn you and your warrant both; take your hand off your gun.' He then advanced towards me about one step with his knife open in his hand, and drawn back in the attitude of striking. He did not get in striking distance of me; an open door opening on the street was behind me, and there was nothing to keep me from going out of it. If I had stepped out of this door he could not have hurt me, but I did not go out of door because I did not want to run. The warrant I had for his arrest charged disorderly conduct, or a misdemeanor."

[1] And on this evidence we are of opinion that there was error in holding the defendant guilty as a conclusion of law.

[2] It is a principle very generally accepted that an officer, having the right to arrest an offender, may use such force as is necessary to effect his purpose, and to a great extent he is made the judge of the degree of force that may be properly exerted. Called on to deal with violators of the law, and not infrequently to act in the presence of conditions importing serious menace, his conduct in such circumstance is not to be harshly judged, and, if he is withstood, his authority and purpose being made known, he may use the force necessary to overcome resistance, and to the extent of taking life, if that is required for the proper and efficient performance of his duty. It is when excessive force has been used maliciously, or to such a degree as amounts to a wanton abuse of authority, that criminal liability will be imputed. The same rule prevails when an officer has a prisoner under lawful arrest, and the latter makes forcible effort to free himself; and, in this jurisdiction, the position holds whether the offense charged be a felony or a misdemeanor, the governing principle being based on the unwarranted resistance to lawful authority, and not dependent, therefore, on the grade of the offense.

These views are in accord with numerous decisions of our court in which the questions presented were directly considered, as in State v. Sigman, 106 N. C. 728, 11 S. E. 520; State v. McMahan, 103 N. C. 379, 9 S. E. 489; State v. Pugh, 101 N. C. 737, 7 S. E. 757, 9 Am. St. Rep. 44; State v. McNinch, 90 N. C. 695; State v. Garrett, 60 N. C. 144, 84 Am. Dec. 359; State v. Stalcup, 24 N. C. 50. In State v. Sigman the principle is stated and approved as follows:

"If an officer is resisted in making an arrest, he may use that degree of force which is necessary to the proper performance of his duty; and, after an accused person is arrested, the officer is justified in the use of such force as may be necessary, even to taking life, to prevent his escape, whether the offense charged is a felony or misdemeanor."

In State v. McNinch:

"A police officer, in arresting one for violating a city ordinance, was indicted for an assault. The prosecutor alleged that the force used was excessive, and the judge charged the jury if such was the case the defendant was guilty, but failed to call their attention to the good faith in which the officer claims to have acted. Held error. The amount of force necessary to make the arrest is left to the judgment of the officer when acting within the scope of his general powers and actuated by no ill will or malice."

In State v. Garrett it was held, among other things:

"That where a defendant, in a state's warrant charging a misdemeanor, put himself in armed resistance to the officer having such warrant, and the officer, in an attempt to take defendant, slew him, without resorting to unnecessary violence, it was held that he was justified."

In Sigman's Case the officer was convicted of an assault, but that was, because the offense being only a misdemeanor, the defendant was fleeing from the officer to avoid arrest, the distinction and principle applicable being stated as follows:

"But where a person charged only with a misdemeanor flies from the officer to avoid arrest, the latter is not authorized to take life or shed blood in order to make the arrest. Under such circumstances, if he kills he will at least be guilty of manslaughter, and he will be guilty of an assault if no actual injury is inflicted, if he uses such force as would have amounted to manslaughter had death ensued."

And a similar ruling was approved in Sossamon v. Cruse, 133 N. C. 470, 45 S. E. 757, and in State v. Bryant, 65 N. C. 327. In none of these was the question of resistance presented.

[3] Considering the facts in evidence as testified to by defendant, it appears that the prosecutor, C. T. White, shown to be a violent and dangerous man when drinking, had been drunk and disorderly in the town of Aulander for several hours, intimidating its citizens, committing various violations of the town ordinances, including several breaches of the peace; that when defendant, the constable and chief of police, approached the prosecutor to arrest him, having a warrant for the purpose duly issued, and of which the prosecutor was fully aware, the latter, in resistance, assaulted the officer with a drawn knife, making it necessary to shoot the offender in order to subdue him and execute the process, and, in view of the principles prevailing here, as stated, if this version of the occurrence is accepted by the jury, the action of the officer is fully justified. True, defendant testifies that he could have retired from the room and have avoided the difficulty, "but that he did not want to run." While this, at times, may be the rule as between individuals, under the circumstances presented he was not required to "withdraw or to run." Charged, in a special sense, with conserving the peace and quiet of the town, having, as stated, a warrant commanding him to arrest the prosecutor, it was both his legal right and official duty to proceed according to the exigency of his writ, and to exercise the force required to its efficient execution.

[4] A proper concept of the officer's duty in the premises is very well stated in one of the defendant's prayers for instructions, as follows:

"The law does not require an officer with a warrant for an arrest for an offense to retreat or retire, but he must stand his ground and perform his duty; and it was not the duty of the defendant with the warrant for the arrest of the prosecutor, when the prosecutor advanced on him with the knife, if he did so, to back or retire, but it was his duty to stand and perform his duty and disarm the prosecutor, if it appeared to be necessary to do so, to effect the arrest."

On the record there was error to defendant's prejudice, and there must be a new trial of the cause.

Error.

BALCUM et ux. v. JOHNSON. (No. 225.)

1. RAILROADS \Leftrightarrow 481(2)—FIRES—EVIDENCE.

In action against railroad company for damages caused by fire alleged to have been started by defendant's engine, a witness was properly allowed to testify that engine operated by defendant a week before fire, in passing witness, threw out sparks and live coals from which fire caught, where defendant owned and operated only one engine.

2. NEGLIGENCE \Leftrightarrow 62(3)—PROXIMATE CAUSE—INTERVENING AGENCIES.

In order for act of intelligent intervening agent to break sequence of events and protect author of primary negligence from liability, such act must be an independent superseding cause and one that author of primary negligence had no reasonable ground to anticipate, and usually act must be in itself negligent or at least culpable.

3. RAILROADS \Leftrightarrow 465 — FIRES — PROXIMATE CAUSE—INTERVENING AGENCIES.

Where a railroad engine started a fire, conduct of persons attempting to prevent spread of fire, such as back-firing, on the question of intervening agencies, is not to be considered or charged with the critical scrutiny that may obtain in more deliberate circumstances.

4. RAILROADS \Leftrightarrow 465 — FIRES — PROXIMATE CAUSE—BACK-FIRING.

Where a railroad negligently started a fire, it was liable for damages caused by back-firing on part of a third person in a reasonable effort to extinguish fire.

5. REMAINDERS \Leftrightarrow 17(2)—REVERSIONS \Leftrightarrow 8(1)—FIRES—RIGHTS OF REMAINDERMEN.

Owners of property in remainder or reversion after a life estate may recover for a trespass which causes permanent damage to same, and to extent that it wrongfully affects or impairs the value of their estate or interest, and this without making life tenant a party.

6. TRIAL \Rightarrow 365(1) — VERDICT — INTERPRETATION.

A verdict should be interpreted and allowed significance by a proper reference to the testimony and charge of the court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; O. H. Allen, Judge.

Action by L. L. Balcum and wife against J. D. Johnson. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. No error.

Plaintiffs, alleging ownership of a designated tract of land, instituted the action to recover damages of defendant for wrongfully setting out fire and burning over the ground by means of a defective engine operated by defendant and his employees over his tramroad, etc.

There was denial of plaintiff's ownership by defendant and of any and all liability in the matter. There was evidence offered by plaintiffs of ownership of land, subject to a life estate therein of one J. A. Balcum, the life tenant not being a party, and also evidence in support of the wrong and damage alleged against defendant. On the part of defendant, there was evidence tending to show that he was in no default by reason of the fire complained of, including testimony to the effect that the fire that caused the damage was in fact and in truth put out by one Tom Wright, who had no relationship with defendant and his work and for whose conduct defendant was in no way responsible. Evidence in reply by plaintiff that the fire complained of and causing the injury was not started by Tom Wright, and that any fire put out by him was in the reasonable effort to check the spread of the fire started by defendant and which, under conditions presented, was a neighborhood menace.

On issues submitted, the jury rendered the following verdict:

"1. Are the plaintiffs the owners of the land described in the complaint? A. Yes, except as to the life estate of J. A. Balcum.

"2. Was the land burned over by the negligence of the defendant, as alleged in the complaint? A. Yes.

"3. If so, what damages were done to said land and premises? A. $300."

Judgment on the verdict for plaintiffs, and defendant excepted and appealed, assigning errors.

Butler & Herring and H. E. Faison, all of Clinton, for appellant.

Geo. A. Smith, of Charlotte, and Fowler & Crumpler, of Clinton, for appellees.

HOKE, J. [1] Defendant noted an exception to the evidence of two witnesses for plaintiff, Martin Hairr and wife, to the effect that, one week before the fire in question, the engine operated by defendant over his tramroad, in passing the witness, threw out sparks and live coals from which fire caught. In this connection, it was also proved that defendant owned and operated only the one engine over his road, and, under our decisions applicable, the evidence is competent on the issue. Whitehurst v. Lumber Co., 146 N. O. 588, 60 S. E. 648; Knott v. R. R. Co., 142 N. C. 238, 55 S. E. 150. In addition, it appeared from the evidence of Andrew Robinson, defendant's engineer and a witness in his behalf, that the engine in question was in the same condition on the day of the fire that it had been for six months previous to the fire and continued to be for six months thereafter. This, in any event, would render the evidence receivable on the issue. Blevins v. Cotton Mills, 150 N. C. 493, 64 S. E. 428. It was further insisted that his honor erroneously modified certain prayers for instruction by defendant in reference to the conduct of one Tom Wright who was engaged with others in the endeavor to extinguish or check the spread of the fire. The prayers more directly involved, being as follows:

"A. The defendant contends that the fire originated off his right of way and some distance from it, and that he was in no way responsible for this fire, but that from whatever cause originated this fire was held under control and was not permitted to go across the sand-clay road, and was not communicated to the plaintiff's land, and that the fire which burned the lands on the east side of the sand-clay road was set out by a third party, viz., one Tom Wright, and this is the fire that eventually burned the plaintiff's land. If this is true, and the jury should so find by the greater weight of the evidence, then the defendant is not liable. Or, if you shall find by the greater weight of the evidence that there was another fire set out by Tom Wright on the east side of the sand-clay road, as contended for by the defendant, and you are then in doubt as to whether the original fire or the fire set out by the third party, Tom Wright, burned the plaintiff's land, in that event, the defendant is not liable, and the plaintiff could not recover."

"B. If the jury shall find from the evidence that the fire originated between the defendant's railroad track and the county sand-clay road, which runs parallel with the railroad track and several hundred yards east therefrom, and that while those assembled endeavoring to control the fire, and while it was a considerable distance from the sand-clay road, which road was about 30 feet wide and free from combustible matter, one Tom Wright, a third party, instead of back-firing along the sand-clay road on the west side of the road and next to the fire, strewed fire on the opposite side of the road, being the eastern side of the road, with the wind blowing in an easterly direction, this would be an act of negligence for which the defendant would not be liable."

[2] His honor, both in his general charge and in direct response, told the jury that the positions embodied in those instructions would prevail in their consideration of the case unless the act of Tom Wright referred to was a reasonable act and precaution to prevent the spread of the fire wrongfully started by defendant. It is the well-recognized doctrine that, in order for the act of an intelligent intervening agent to break the sequence of events and protect the author of a primary negligence from liability, such act must be an independent, superseding cause, one that the author of the primary negligence had no reasonable ground to anticipate, and usually the act must be in itself negligent or at least culpable. In Barrows on Negligence, the position is stated and commented on as follows:

"Where an independent, efficient, wrongful cause intervenes between the original wrongful act and the injury ultimately suffered, the former, and not the latter, is deemed the proximate cause of the injury.

"An efficient, intervening cause is a new proximate cause, which breaks the connection with the original cause, and becomes itself solely responsible for the result in question. It must be an independent force, entirely superseding the original action, and rendering its effect in the chain of causation remote. It is immaterial how many new elements or forces have been introduced; if the original cause remains active, the liability for its result is not shifted. Thus, where a horse is left unhitched in the street, and unattended, and is maliciously frightened by a stranger, and runs away. But for the intervening act he would not have run away, and the injury would not have occurred; yet it was the negligence of the driver in the first instance which made the runaway possible. This negligence has not been superseded or obliterated, and the driver is responsible for the injuries resulting. If, however, the intervening, responsible cause be of such a nature that it would be unreasonable to expect a prudent man to anticipate its happening, he will not be responsible if damage results solely from the intervention."

The same principle is satisfactorily treated in Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 31 et seq., and has been very generally approved and applied in the decisions here and elsewhere. Ward v. R. R., 161 N. C. 179, 78 S. E. 717; Hardy v. Hines Lumber Co., 160 N. C. 113, 75 S. E. 855, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 759; Harvell v. Lumber Co., 154 N. C. 254, 70 S. E. 389; Harton v. Telephone Co., 146 N. C. 429, 59 S. E. 1022, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 956, 14 Ann. Cas. 390; Harton v. Telephone Co., 141 N. C. 455, 54 S. E. 299; Ins. Co. v. Boon, 95 U. S. 117, 24 L. Ed. 395; R. R. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. Ed. 256; Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 136. In Harton v. Telephone Co., 141 N. C. 455, 54 S. E. 299, supra, the general principle apposite is stated as follows:

"The proximate cause of the event must be understood to be that which in natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new and independent cause, produces that event, and without which such event would not have occurred. Proximity in point of time or space, however, is no part of the definition.

"The test by which to determine whether the intervening act of an intelligent agent which has become the efficient cause of an injury shall be considered a new and independent cause, breaking the sequence of events put in motion by the original negligence of the defendant, is whether the intervening act and the resultant injury is one that the author of the primary negligence could have reasonably foreseen and expected."

In Hardy v. Lumber Co., Walker, J., delivering the opinion, quotes from R. R. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. at page 475, 24 L. Ed. 256, as follows:

"We do not say that even the natural and probable consequences of a wrongful act or omission are in all cases to be chargeable to the misfeasance or nonfeasance. They are not when there is a sufficient and independent cause operating between the wrong and the injury."

In Lane v. Atlantic Works, Colt, J., delivering the opinion, states the principle:

"In actions of this description, the defendant is liable for the natural and probable consequences of his negligent act or omission. The injury must be the direct result of the misconduct charged; but it will not be considered too remote if, according to the usual experience of mankind, the result ought to have been apprehended."

[3, 4] It is well understood that, when a fire of this kind is started and under conditions importing serious menace to the principal and adjacent property, it is the custom and assuredly the right of the neighbors to lend a hand and do what reasonable prudence and judgment require to prevent its spread, and that back-firing is one of the methods approved and frequently resorted to. It is also recognized that, in the presence of an emergency like this, the conduct of participants is not to be considered or judged with the critical scrutiny that may obtain in more deliberate circumstances. McKay v. Ry., 160 N. C. 260, 75 S. E. 1081, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 412, and authorities cited. In the present case there was much testimony tending to show that the back-firing on the part of Wright was done in the reasonable effort to extinguish the fire wrongfully started by defendant, and, with such facts in evidence and under the principles stated, the intervening act of Wright would not break the causal connection with the original wrong of the defendant; the same being neither independent, improbable, nor culpable.

[5, 6] Again, it is objected that a proper consideration of the record and verdict will disclose that plaintiffs, the owners in remainder, subject to the life estate of J. A. Balcum, have recovered for the entire injury done to the property when the life tenant has not been made a party and is in no way concluded by the judgment; but, in our opinion, this objection must also be disallowed. It is the accepted position here and elsewhere that the owners of property in remainder or reversion after a life estate may recover for a trespass which causes permanent damage to the same and to the extent that it wrongfully affects or impairs the value of their estate or interest, and this without the presence of the life tenant in the suit. Cherry v. Canal Co., 140 N. C. 422, 53 S. E. 138, 111 Am. St. Rep. 850, 6 Ann. Cas. 143; Gwaltney v. Timber Co., 115 N. C. 579, 20 N. E. 465; Jordan v. Bearwood, 42 W. Va. 312, 26 S. E. 266, 36 L. R. A. 519, 57 Am. St. Rep. 859; Shortle et al. v. Terre Haute, etc., Ry., 131 Ind. 338, 30 N. E. 1084. It is further recognized and approved in several of our more recent decisions that a verdict should be "interpreted and allowed significance by a proper reference to the testimony and charge of the court." Weldon v. Ry., 98 S. E. 375, at the present term; Jones v. R. R., 176 N. C. 260, 97 S. E. 48; Grove v. Baker, 174 N. C. 745, 94 S. E. 528; Reynolds v. Express Co., 172 N. C. 487, 90 S. E. 510, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 1071.

Considering the record in view of these principles, it very clearly appears from the language of the issue, the charge of the court, and his honor's rulings in the exclusion of evidence, where it only tended to show injury to the life tenant, that the damages assessed in response to the third issue have been restricted to the injuries that were permanent in their nature and to the extent that they affected the interest and estate of the remaindermen who are both parties of record.

On careful consideration, we find no reversible error, and the judgment on the verdict is affirmed.

No error.

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇨142 — LABOR BY HUSBAND ON WIFE'S FARM—PRESUMPTION.

In absence of contract of renting between husband and wife, husband, as matter of law and fact, was merely agent of wife in carrying on her farm, and whether it was rented to tenants, or worked with hired labor, husband was entitled to no share in crops and profits for his services which his creditors could subject to their debts; presumption being that he was working gratuitously to contribute to support of family.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇨137(1)—SEPARATE PROPERTY OF WIFE—CONSTITUTION.

Under the Constitution, the wife holds her property free from any control of her husband.

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇨142—OPERATION OF FARM THROUGH TENANTS — RIGHT OF LANDLORD—STATUTE.

A wife owning a farm worked by her husband through tenants, under Revisal 1905, § 1993; as to landlord's lien, was vested with right to the custody and control of the entire crop, subject only to the right of the tenants to their share.

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇨138(10)—HUSBAND AS WIFE'S AGENT — LIABILITY FOR PURCHASE.

Guano bought by husband as agent for wife in making crops on her farm worked by him, other than fertilizers furnished by him for tenants, was liability against wife, not by reason of her receipt of crops, but by reason of husband's implied authority to incur indebtedness in making crop on part of the land worked for her directly, if furnished with her knowledge and without dissent.

5. JUDGMENT ⇨252(1)—PRAYER FOR RELIEF.

Plaintiff is entitled to recover any judgment which the facts alleged and proved would warrant, though not set out in the prayer for relief.

6. GARNISHMENT ⇨33—EARNED WAGES.

When a man has earned wages, they can be garnished as his property, if no personal exemption is claimed.

7. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES ⇨104(4) — HUSBAND AND WIFE.

No creditor has a right to the personal services of his debtor and a husband, as against his creditors, may donate to his wife his services in running her farm.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Allen, Judge.

Action by the Pocomoke Guano Company and others against D. F. Colwell, administrator of S. F. Peterson, deceased, and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

S. F. Peterson died intestate in November, 1912, leaving a widow and several minor children. During the year 1912 and for some time previously he was engaged in running the farm on his wife's land in said county, part of it with hired labor and the rest by tenants. He also on his own account ran a store, a cotton gin, and acted as agent for the sale of fertilizers. At the time of his death and for some time prior thereto he was insolvent. There was no lease, or contract of rental between him and his wife. During 1912 he used guano, furnished by himself as agent of plaintiff Guano Company on the crops on his wife's land, which at his death were practically gathered. He sold 12 bales of the cotton at $655.80, and received the proceeds. The rest of the crops were turned over to the widow, by the administrator of the husband.

The referee found that the value of the crops turned over to the widow by the administrator after deducting the rental value of the farm was $1,661.20, and gave judgment against the administrator and the widow for said amount. This action was brought by the plaintiff Guano Company against the administrator and his surety, and also against the widow, to recover the value of said crops to be applied to the general indebtedness of the husband for the guano sold by him as agent, and for other indebtedness of the husband.

On exception to the referee's report the court reversed the ruling of the referee, and held that the defendants were not indebted to the plaintiffs for the value of the crop turned over to the widow, and rendered judgment against the plaintiffs, who appealed.

Tillett & Guthrie, of Charlotte, Stevens & Beasley, of Warsaw, and McIntyre, Lawrence & Proctor, of Lumberton, for appellants.

Butler & Herring, of Clinton, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. [1] It is found as a fact by the referee, and approved by the judge that there was no contract of renting between the husband and wife. The husband was, therefore, as a matter of law and of fact, merely the agent of his wife in carrying on her farm. Wells v. Batts, 112 N. C. 283, 17 S. E. 417, 34 Am. St. Rep. 506; Branch v. Ward, 114 N. C. 148, 19 S. E. 104. Whether the farm was rented to tenants or worked with hired labor, the husband was entitled to no share for his services, the presumption being, in the absence of a contract, that he was doing this gratuitously and in order to contribute to the support of a family. He had no interest in the crop which his creditors could subject to the payment of their debts. The husband did not give any lien upon the crop, and had no right to do so. Rawlings v. Neal, 122 N. C. 173, 29 S. E. 93; Bray v. Carter, 115 N. C. 16, 20 S. E. 164. The plaintiffs have no right to follow the fund which was the purpose of this action.

[2-4] Under the Constitution the wife holds her property free from any control of her husband (Manning v. Manning, 79 N. C. 300) and was vested with the right to the custody and control of the entire crop, subject only to the right of the tenants to their share therein. Revisal, § 1993. But while the plaintiffs cannot recover against her, for any indebtedness of the husband, whatever amount of guano was bought by him as agent for his wife in making the crops on said land (other than the fertilizers furnished by him for the tenants, as to which no assent of the wife is shown or presumed) would be a liability against the wife, not by reason of her receipt of the crops, but by reason of his implied authority to incur indebtedness for advances in making the crop on that part of the land worked for her directly if it was furnished with the wife's knowledge and without dissent. Thompson

v. Coats, 174 N. C. 193, 93 S. E. 724, does not apply, for in that case she and her husband were living apart, and there was nothing which implied an agency of the husband to act for her. But the court there said that the supplies furnished the tenants through her husband were not presumed to be by her authority; there being no direct benefit to her.

[5] It is true this action is brought to subject the entire crop (after deducting the rental), and the plaintiffs are not asking judgment against the widow on the ground of his agency, but she is a party to this action, and the plaintiff Guano Company is entitled to recover any judgment which the facts alleged and proven would warrant, though not set out in the prayer for relief. But, on the other hand, the husband was the agent of the plaintiff Guano Company in selling the fertilizers, and as there went into his hands the proceeds of 12 bales of cotton (which is found to be $655.80), the Guano Company cannot recover of the widow, the owner of the land, unless the amount of the guano furnished for the crop worked for her direct, and not by her tenants, exceeded that amount.

When the case goes back, if it is suggested that there was an excess of such indebtedness above $655.80, the amount may be ascertained, and the judgment may be rendered against the widow for that amount. Judgment should be rendered against the plaintiffs for the costs, up to that time, in any event and for the cost of this appeal.

[6, 7] It has been suggested that the creditor is entitled to recover for the value of the husband's services while acting as agent for his wife. When a man has earned wages, they can be garnished as his property, if no personal property exemption is claimed, but no creditor has a right to the personal services of the debtor, or, what is the same thing, to collect payment of the value thereof from one to whom he renders services, and thus make a contract which the debtor and the employer did not make. Such claim as this is simply an assertion of "peonage," and if it could be enforced the creditor could follow the debtor around wherever he might go, and compel his services through the medium of an employer.

It is too late in the world's history to assert such doctrine. Indeed the counsel for the plaintiff did not assert this proposition. He placed his right to recover upon the assumption that a husband, acting as agent in supervising his wife's farm, was in law a renter (though it is admitted here as a matter of fact that there was no contract of renting), and hence the wife was entitled only to rent, and the husband was entitled to the rest of the crop, which therefore the creditor could follow in the hands of the wife. This proposition is without a scintilla of fact to sustain it, and has no analogy in the law.

In Osborne v. Wilkes, 108 N. C. 651, 13 S. E. 285, the court held that a married woman could employ her husband as her agent to carry on the manufacturing business, and that his "creditors acquire no interest in the profits because he gives his services without other compensation than an indefinite allowance applied by her permission to the payment of his expenses," citing numerous cases on page 672 of 108 N. C., on page 292 of 13 S. E. On page 673 of 108 N. C., on page 292 of 13 S. E., it is said that creditors "have no lien upon his [the debtor's] skill or attainments, nor can they compel him to exact compensation for managing his wife's property, or collect from her as on a quantum meruit what his services were reasonably worth. 2 Bishop, Married Women, §§ 299, 300, 453, 454. She may remunerate him by furnishing him a support. He may, if he choose, serve her without compensation. 2 Bishop, supra, § 439; Corning v. Flower, 24 Iowa, 584. Indeed, a creditor cannot collect from any person compensation for service rendered by his debtor with the understanding that it was gratuitous. 2 Bishop, supra."

The subject is fully discussed with full citation of authorities, and none to the contrary in Mayers v. Kaiser, 85 Wis. 382, 55 N. W. 688, 21 L. R. A. 623, 39 Am. St. Rep. 849, and with numerous authorities in the notes on pages 624 to 628 of 21 L. R. A. Indeed it is useless to discuss what amounts to a self-evident proposition, unless reversing the trend of the times, we should revert to the days when a man's labor and the control of his time belonged to his creditors.

Affirmed.

STATE v. OGLESTON et al. (No. 209.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS §236(4)—UNLAWFUL MANUFACTURE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where a still was in active operation and defendants, charged with unlawful manufacture of spirituous liquors, were the only persons present, jury was warranted in returning verdict of guilty; the inference being permissible that defendants were in charge of and operating the still.

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION §174 — UNLAWFUL MANUFACTURE — AIDING AND ABETTING.

Under Laws 1917, c. 157, notwithstanding charge is for manufacture of spirituous liquors, a conviction for aiding and abetting can be had.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; O. H. Allen, Judge.

Jonah Ogleston and Otis Perry were convicted of the unlawful manufacture of spirituous liquors and they appeal. No error.

The defendants, Perry, a white man, and Ogleston, a negro, were convicted under an indictment charging the unlawful manufacture of spirituous liquors, and appealed from the judgment rendered upon the verdict.

The exceptions taken by the defendants are: (1) To the refusal to enter judgment of nonsuit upon the ground that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty; (2) to the following charge given to the jury:

"Under this act [reading chapter 157, p. 310, Laws of 1917], notwithstanding the charge is for the manufacture of spirituous liquors, you can convict either of the defendants for aiding and abetting the manufacturing of spirituous liquors."

W. S. O'B. Robinson, of Goldsboro, and T. C. Wooten, of Kinston, for appellants.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PER CURIAM. [1] The evidence is, in our opinion, fully sufficient to support the verdict. It tends to prove that the sheriff of Lenoir county, with two deputies, found a still in the woods a mile behind the houses where the defendants lived; that the still was in active operation with a fire under the furnace and the spirits running from the spout of the still into a bucket; that Ogleston, who admitted that he had before that time engaged in the manufacture of spirituous liquors, was standing in front of the fire with his back to the still, and that Perry was sitting down; that each of the defendants had a gun, and that the two guns were wrapped up together, and were near the defendants; and that no one else was at or about the still.

As the still was in active operation, and as the defendants were the only persons present, the inference was at least permissible that the defendants were in charge of the still and operating it.

[2] The charge of his honor is sustained by State v. Horner, 174 N. C. 792, 94 S. E. 292, in which the court says:

"It makes no difference whether defendant was a principal in the first degree or in the second degree as an aider and abettor. The latter is but a lower grade of the principal offense, viz. the distilling or manufacturing of the liquor. An aider and abettor is denominated in the books as a principal in the second degree."

No error.

Petition of WALLACE & BARRON et al.
(No. 10171.)

APPEAL AND ERROR §1180(3) — EFFECT OF DECISION ON PARTIES NOT APPEALING.

Where there were seven interests involved when the attorney's fees were fixed and only three appealed, decision that decree as to appellants is reversed, but that parties not appealing are bound, means that the parties not appealing are bound for four-sevenths of fee as formerly fixed, and not for the whole fee.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Union County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

In the matter of the final settlement and discharge of William Coleman and another executors of Anne E. Rice, deceased. From decree of probate court adjudging that Wallace & Barron and George S. Mower, petitioning for attorney's fees, were entitled to only four-sevenths of their fee, they appeal to the circuit court, which allowed the entire fee, whereupon the executors and owners of four-sevenths interest in estate appeal. Judgment of circuit court reversed, and judgment of probate court affirmed.

John Gary Evans, of Spartanburg, for appellants.

Wallace & Barron, of Union, and Geo. S. Mower, of Newberry, for respondents.

WATTS, J. The sole question raised by the appeal turns upon the construction to be placed upon the decision of this court in the former appeal in this case reported in 106 S. C. 534, 91 S. E. 861. An examination of the records discloses that there were seven interests involved when the fees were fixed, and three interests appealed. Four did not appeal. The court sustained the contention of appellants when the case was remanded. The probate judge allowed the attorneys four-sevenths of their fee. An appeal was taken from this order, and his honor, Judge Shipp allowed the whole fee, as claimed, and required the appellants to be bound for what this court had allowed the appellants in the former appeal, on the ground that no appeal had been taken by them, and that they could derive no benefit from the decision.

The court, in the former opinion, held that the executors had no right to employ so many attorneys, the same not being necessary, but, inasmuch as no one appealed, except the appellants, the decree as to them was reversed, but that the parties not appealing were bound. This means they are bound for their proportionate part of the fee, as formerly fixed, and not the whole as fixed. That had they appealed, the decree would have been reversed as to them, as well as the appellants. The probate court properly construed the intention and decision of this court. The exceptions are sustained, and judgment of circuit court reversed, and judgment of the probate court affirmed and made the judgment.

Reversed.

SISTER FELICITAS v. HARTRIDGE, Sol. Gen. (No. 790.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1919.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW §56, 82, 206(1), 209, 318—CRIMINAL LAW §627(1), 629—SEARCHES AND SEIZURES §7—STATUTES §71, 110½(1)—SUBJECT AND TITLE—PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—UNIFORMITY OF LAWS—JUDICIAL POWER.

Except as to the part dealt with in the second division of the opinion, the act of the General Assembly of this state, approved August 21, 1916 (Acts 1916, p. 126), entitled an act to provide for the inspection by state authorities of private institutions, etc., was properly held not to be unconstitutional upon the grounds urged in the attack made upon various sections of the act.

2. STATUTES §64(10) 110½(1)—SUBJECT AND TITLE—INSPECTION BY GRAND JURY—EFFECT OF PARTIAL INVALIDITY.

So much of the fourth section of the act just referred to declares it to be the duty of the grand jury to specially present the owner, keeper, custodian, or manager of such institution, in certain cases there stated, contains matter different from what is expressed in the title of that act, and is therefore unconstitutional and void.

(a) But the void part of section 4 may be segregated and eliminated without destroying the entire act, as it is not so essentially connected with the primary principle and purpose of the law as to render its elimination destructive of the whole.

(b) The part of the act declared unconstitutional and void did not affect the issue involved in the instant case, nor the judgment rendered by the court.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW §48—INVALIDITY OF STATUTE.

Before an act of a co-ordinate department of the government can be declared unconstitutional, the conflict between the act and the fundamental law must be clear and palpable, and an act will not be set aside in a doubtful case.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW §40—VALIDITY OF STATUTE—SPIRIT OF CONSTITUTION.

That an act is contrary to the spirit of the Constitution is insufficient to invoke judicial interference, as courts cannot declare acts unconstitutional, except where they violate express words of Constitution.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

Contempt proceeding, on the relation of W. C. Hartridge, Solicitor General, against Sister Felicitas. From a judgment holding defendant guilty of contempt and enforcing a fine, she excepts and brings error. Affirmed.

Anderson, Cann, Cann & Walsh, of Savannah, King & Spalding, of Atlanta, Augustin Daly, of Macon, and Louis LeGarde Battey, of Augusta, for plaintiff in error.

Walter C. Hartridge, Sol. Gen., of Savannah, pro se.

BECK, P. J. Pursuant to the provisions of an act of the General Assembly of this state, entitled an act to provide for the inspection by state authorities of private institutions, etc., approved August 21, 1916 (Acts 1916, p. 126), a committee of five members of the grand jury of the October term, 1917, of Chatham superior court, called at the Convent of the Sisters of Mercy, and at the Convent of the Franciscan Sisters, for the purpose of making the inquiry and investigation provided for in said act. Mother Clare, in charge of the Convent of the Sisters of Mercy, and Sister Felicitas, in charge of the Convent of the Franciscan Sisters, declined to permit the committee to make the investigation desired. This committee, through the grand jury, reported the refusal to the superior court. The solicitor general of the Eastern judicial circuit filed a petition to the superior court, reciting the facts just set forth, and setting up the contention that the refusal by Mother Clare and by Sister Felicitas constituted a contempt of court, and prayed that an order be passed requiring the respondents to show cause why they should not be adjudged guilty of contempt and be punished therefor; and an order to this effect was granted. Both respondents made answer to the rule, setting up, first, that the institution over which they presided was not within the purview of the act above referred to, for reasons set forth in the answer, and they attacked the act on numerous constitutional grounds. The judge of the superior court, after hearing evidence, discharged the rule as to Mother Clare, but held that Sister Felicitas was guilty of contempt, and imposed a fine. To this ruling Sister Felicitas excepted and brought the case by writ of error to this court for review.

[1, 3, 4] 1. The judge who heard the issues made by the rule and the answer, in passing upon the case and rendering the judgment complained of, delivered an opinion in writing, which (omitting only certain general observations made in the course of the opinion which do not materially affect the decision and discussion of the issues involved) is as follows:

"It appears that the respondent is the head of a private institution known as St. Francis Convent. That that institution is not only a convent but is also a 'private orphanage.' That no person is kept in confinement in the convent, and that the orphanage, which is for colored orphans, is governed by the usual and customary rules and regulations that obtain in orphan asylums. In a wide sense, the orphans are persons who are kept in confinement, and to this private orphanage the act approved August 21, 1916, applies.

"The constitutionality of the act is attacked on about forty grounds, great and small, general and special. I do not deem it necessary to consider in detail all of these grounds. They can be grouped together under three heads, of form, substance, and procedure. In the group 'form' falls the objection based on Code, § 6437, dealing with one subject-matter. Under this general ground there are six subdivisions. The first contention is that the act provides for inspection 'by state authorities,' and that five members of a grand jury are not state authorities. The grand jury represents the state. It acts 'in the name and behalf of the citizens of Georgia.' Its action is taken to maintain the peace, good order, and dignity of the state. The county is only a subdivision of the state. In the enumeration of county officers grand juries are not included. There may be county authorities and state authorities; but when the grand jury acts in matters of general welfare it is a state authority, and a committee from that body can be empowered by the state, acting through its Legislature, to make inspections 'of every private institution in which citizens of Georgia and other states are kept in confinement.' I cannot assume that the grand jury would act without legal evidence and the concurrence of at least twelve of its members.

"The second and third contentions are that the act provides for the examination and questioning of the inmates of these institutions, and that the caption provides only for inspection. Inspection and examination are synonymous terms, or are very nearly so; and if in order to make an inspection it is necessary to question an inmate, it is quite clear that the power given to inspect would include the power to question. The power being given, the usual and ordinary means for the exercise of the power are implied. Inspection, examination, questioning are all related, and are but the means employed to reach a given end, that is, the inspection of institutions in which citizens of Georgia and of other states are kept in confinement.

"The fourth and fifth contentions deal with the demand for release of an inmate and special presentment, while the sixth is a résumé of the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth contentions.

"The great purpose of the act is inspection of private institutions where citizens are kept in confinement. Any instrumentality in aid of this purpose is not a subject-matter different from the title.

"In the group of 'substance' falls the objection, with its several subdivisions, based on Code, § 6358, dealing with protection to persons and property; the objection based on Code, § 6359, dealing with due process of law, with a like number of subdivisions; the objection based on Code, § 6372, dealing with searches and warrants, with its three subdivisions; and the objection based on Code, § 6700 (the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States), dealing with citizenship, with its eight subdivisions. Wherein this act breaks down the constitutional barrier which impartially and completely protects the person and property of the respondent, I am at a loss to see. That the respondent may be deprived of her liberty and property is true, but it is not true that such deprivation will be without due process of law. The Legislature has the right to require inspection of institutions where citizens are kept confined. When the right to inspect is denied, there is certainly no violation of the due process clause of the Constitution because the inspectors, a committee from the grand jury, report to that body the result of their inspection. The vice in the respondent's contention is in assuming that the report or action of a committee from the grand jury is a final process by which the respondent is, without due process of law, deprived of her liberty or property. No deprivation of any kind can arise until after the grand jury shall have specially presented the respondent, and then only after a fair and impartial trial a jury of her peers has found her guilty of the offense charged against her in the presentment.

"As to unreasonable searches, it is safe to say that no search is required to be made under the act. Certainly I cannot read into the act words that are not there. There is nothing in the act which can be construed as authority for a committee from the grand jury of this state to make an unreasonable search of this orphanage. The legislative authority is sufficient to authorize the inspection of private institutions where citizens are kept in confinement.

"I do not see the application of the Fourteenth Amendment to the instant case. For the reasons heretofore given, this state does not by the act in question abridge any privilege or immunity of the respondent, deprive her of any right without due process of law, or deny her the equal protection of the laws. The respondent erroneously assumes that the committee from the grand jury become vested under the act with all the powers of the grand jury and the trial court and jury, and that in this way the respondent is deprived of certain privileges and immunities, such as right of appeal, cross-examination, etc. The committee from the grand jury has no such powers, and cannot have.

"In the group of 'procedure' falls the objection based on Code, § 6361, dealing with accusation and list of witnesses; the objection based on Code, § 6497, dealing with the judicial powers vested in certain courts; and objection based on Code, § 6391, dealing with uniformity of laws. Under this last objection are two subdivisions. The vice of this group is that the respondent assumes a fact not contemplated in the act, and that is, that the grand jury will not furnish the accused on demand, at the proper time, a copy of the accusation and list of witnesses. It is also vicious in that it confuses the ascertainment by the committee of the fact that a person is illegally deprived of liberty, with the final determination after presentment by the jury of the county, of the guilt or innocence of the respondent. The objection that the act does violence to the uniformity of laws clause, for the reasons assigned, is not convincing. The same vice here again appears, and that is, in assuming that the grand jury and a committee from that body are one and the same, and that the grand jury has surrendered all its rights and powers to a committee. There is no reason suggested why, after the report has been made, the proceedings before the grand jury will not be the decent and orderly investigation, hearing of evidence, and presentment required by law. So far as the grand jury or any committee or member of that body being required to keep secret all matters and things which may come to their knowledge, and so far as relates to the publication, at the expense of the county, of the names of dissatisfied inmates, these are matters which concern the jurors and the county, and in which it does not appear that the respondent is interested. * * * Before an act of a co-ordinate department of the government can be declared unconstitutional, the conflict between the act and the fundamental law must be clear and palpable. The solemn act of the General Assembly will not be set aside in a doubtful case; and before annulling an act passed upon as constitutional by both the legislative and executive departments of the state government, the judicial department should be clearly satisfied of its unconstitutionality. Even if the act in question were contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, that of itself would not be sufficient to invoke judicial interference. The courts cannot declare acts unconstitutional except where they are in violation of express words of the Constitution; otherwise there would be a substitution of the judgment of the court for the will of the Legislature, and this cannot be.

"The unconstitutionality of the act has not been made to appear so clear and palpable as to justify the annulling of it, and therefore it is adjudged that the respondent, Sister Felicitas, is in contempt, and judgment will be entered accordingly."

[2] 2. The foregoing opinion sufficiently discusses the objections urged to the constitutionality of the act in question, states the controlling issues made in the case, and announces sound principles of law applicable thereto, except as to that portion of the criticism directed against the part of the fourth section of the act which provides that—

"In case that such demand for the release of said person is not promptly complied with upon the demand of the committee, it shall be the duty of the grand jury to specially present the owner, keeper, custodian, or manager of such institution, in a special presentment for false imprisonment, and for holding persons to involuntary servitude, in violation of the Constitution of the state of Georgia, and of the United States."

The objection to this provision is not specifically discussed in the opinion which we have set forth, and is not dealt with in that opinion except in the general way where it is held that the act is not unconstitutional. If it was intended in this opinion to hold that that part of the act which we have just referred to is not unconstitutional, a conclusion is reached in which we cannot concur; but we will not reverse the judgment of the court below because of the ruling as to this part of the legislative act under review, for, in passing upon the issues made before him in the instant case and in reaching the decision which we are upholding, the court was dealing with those parts of the act which related to inspection strictly, as appears from the statement of facts. But we cannot concur in so much of opinion as holds, apparently, that the provision of the act which makes the refusal of demands for the release of persons a criminal offense is not objectionable on the ground that it contains matter different from what is expressed in the title of the act, in violation of the provision of the Constitution (Civil Code, § 6437) inhibiting the passage of a law containing matter "different from what is expressed in the title thereof." The title of the act is in the following language:

"An act to provide for the inspection by state authorities of every private institution in which citizens of Georgia and of other states are kept in confinement by sanitoriums, private hospitals, private asylums, private orphanages, Houses of the Good Shepherd, convents, monasteries, or any other institution under any other name, maintained by private individuals, corporations, churches, or charitable institutions, within the state of Georgia, and for other purposes."

We do not think this title can receive any fair construction which would make it sufficiently indicate that the part of the act which we have pointed out does not contain matter different from the title. The title itself indicates that it is the purpose of the act to provide for the "inspection" of certain institutions; and no other term is used to define the general scope of the act, except the words "and for other purposes," and this last expression can cover only those purposes which are germane to the main expressed purpose of inspection. If the express purpose of the act had been "to regulate" institutions of the kind named, possibly it might have been, in order to make the regulation effective, no violation of the clause of the Constitution now being considered to have provided that in certain contingencies the managers or those in charge of such institutions might be indicted, as an indictment might, in case of violation of the regulation prescribed, be a method of making effective the regulations; but where "inspection" is the sole specific purpose indicated, we cannot see any indication, in the term employed, of a purpose to include in the act provisions for presentment by the grand jury and a prosecution, but we are further of the opinion that the part of the act which we have held to be unconstitutional does not so affect the entire legislative scheme as embodied in this act as to render the entire act void. We are of the opinion that the provisions as to prosecution and presentment can be segregated and eliminated from the act, and the main legislative scheme be given force. Accordingly we concur in what was said in the opinion of the trial judge which we have quoted, and adopt the decision contained in his opinion as the decision of this court upon the issues made by the contentions of the plaintiff in error based upon constitutional grounds, except as regards that part of the act contained in section 4, providing for prosecution and presentment by the grand jury. Therefore the judgment of the court below will stand unaffected by the ruling which we have made in the second division of the opinion, as that part of the act held to be unconstitutional was not involved in the proceedings which resulted in the judgment complained of.

Judgment affirmed.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. HODGSON BROS. CO. (No. 860.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1919.)

1. TRIAL ~~6~~368 — AGREED STATEMENT OF FACTS—EFFECT.

Hodgson Bros. Company sued out an attachment against Harris Bros. Grain Company, nonresidents of the state. The attachment was levied by process of garnishment served upon the Southern Railway Company. The garnishee answered not indebted, and that it had no property in its hands belonging to the defendant, etc.; and a traverse of the answer was duly filed. A judgment was rendered in the attachment suit in favor of the plaintiff, which was not excepted to. The garnishment case was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, as follows: "In June, 1915, the Ft. Worth & Rio Grande Railway Company received from the Harris Bros. Grain Company, at Rochelle, Tex., certain sacks of oats consigned to Harris Bros. Grain Company, Greenville, S. C., with instructions from the shippers to notify Hodgson Bros. Company at Athens, Ga., upon the arrival of the car at Greenville, S. C. A bill of lading was issued with draft attached, drawn by Harris Bros. Grain Company for $559.30, with instructions that the paid freight bill was to be deducted from this amount and accepted as cash. This shipment of oats was received by the Southern Railway Company from its connecting carrier, and by it transported to Greenville, S. C., where it arrived on or about July 10, 1915. In the meanwhile Hodgson Bros. Company had transferred the invoice covering the shipment to the Acme Feed Company of Greenville, S. C., and upon the order of Hodgson Bros. Company (Harris Bros. Grain Company having notified the Southern Railway Company, on June 15, 1915, that the car of oats was for Hodgson Bros. Company of Athens) it was delivered by the Southern Railway Company to the Acme Feed Company on July 10, 1915, upon that company paying to the Southern Railway Company $559.30, $240.40 of which was the freight charges to which the Southern Railway Company was entitled; thus leaving a balance in the hands of the Southern Railway Company of $318.90. After the car of oats had been delivered as above set forth, the Southern Railway Company received, on or about July 16, 1915, another order from Harris Bros. Grain Company, dated July 14, 1915, instructing the railway company to deliver the car of oats to A. M. Hayes of Greenville, S. C.; but at that time the car had already been delivered to the Acme Feed Company, as above set forth. After summons of garnishment was served on July 14, 1915, on the Southern Railway Company, the defendant, Harris Bros. Grain Company, brought suit against the initial carrier, the Ft. Worth & Rio Grande Railway Company, in the county court of Dallas county, Tex., on account of the alleged wrongful delivery of this car of oats; and on February 17, 1916, a judgment was obtained against the Ft. Worth & Rio Grande Railway Company for $399.10, the Southern Railway Company's plea of privilege having been sustained by the Texas court, and the suit as to it having been dismissed." The answer of the garnishee stated, among other things, that the oats were delivered to the Acme Feed Company "upon the order of Harris Bros. Grain Company, the consignor." There was no evidence as to indorsement or transfer of the bill of lading. A judgment was rendered against the garnishee, and it carried the case to the Court of Appeals by writ of error. The judgment of the trial court was affirmed, and a writ of certiorari to that judgment was granted by this court. Held:

Where a case was being tried by the judge without the intervention of a jury, and the parties in open court stated certain facts "which were agreed on by both parties to be true," there being nothing said in the agreement to qualify its terms, the facts thus agreed to for the purposes of the trial must be accepted as the truth and as binding upon both parties, notwithstanding they may be contradicted by certain admissions made in the answer of one of the parties, favorable to his adversary. Luther v. Clay, 100 Ga. 236, 28 S. E. 46, 39 L. R. A. 95; 1 Enc. Ev. 473; Pillsbury v. Brown, 82 Me. 450, 19 Atl. 858, 9 L. R. A. 94; Saltonstall v. Russell, 152 U. S. 628, 14 Sup. Ct. 733, 38 L. Ed. 576; Folger v. Insurance Co., 99 Mass. 267, 96 Am. Dec. 747; Sawyer v. Corse, 17 Grat. (Va.) 230, 94 Am. Dec. 445.

2. GARNISHMENT — 39 — CONVERSION OF GOODS — GARNISHMENT BY CREDITOR OF OWNER — STATUTE.

A person who has committed a tort by conversion of the property of another is not subject to garnishment on account of such conversion, at the instance of a creditor of the owner of the goods, until final judgment has been recovered by such owner for the damages arising from the conversion. Civ. Code 1910, §§ 5272, 5265; Gamble v. Central Railroad, etc., 80 Ga. 595, 7 S. E. 315, 12 Am. St. Rep. 276; Bates v. Forsyth, 69 Ga. 365; Selheimer v. Elder, 98 Pa. 154; Keyes v. Milwaukee, etc., Ry. Co., 25 Wis. 691; Rood on Garnishment, 183.

3. CARRIERS — 83 — BILL OF LADING — DELIVERY — CONVERSION.

Where an owner of goods delivers them to a railroad company to be shipped to a designated point, and a bill of lading is issued to the owner, in which he is named as both shipper and consignee, and which contains a direction to "notify" a third person, it is the duty of the railroad company, unless otherwise instructed by the owner or by some holder of the bill of lading properly indorsed, after transporting the goods to the place of destination, to make delivery thereof to the holder of the bill of lading, or one duly authorized by such holder to receive the same. The company is not authorized to make delivery to the person designated to be notified, to whom the bill of lading has never been assigned, or to any other person acting upon his order. Florida Central, etc., R. Co. v. Berry, 116 Ga. 19, 42 S. E. 371. Therefore such a delivery would amount to a conversion. Merchants', etc., Transportation Co. v. Moore, 124 Ga. 482, 52 S. E. 802; Brothers v. Horne, 140 Ga. 617, 79 S. E. 468.

4. CARRIERS — 177(3) — GARNISHMENT — 40 — CONVERSION — REMEDIES BY SHIPPER.

Where the shipment involved transportation between points in different states over the lines of several connecting railroads engaged as common carriers, and the conversion was committed by the last carrier by making a wrongful delivery of the goods, the holder of the bill of lading had an option to sue the initial carrier under the provisions of the act of Congress commonly called the Carmack Amendment (U. S. Comp. St. § 8604a; Georgia, etc., Ry. Co. v. Blish Co., 241 U. S. 190, 36 Sup. Ct. 541, 60 L. Ed. 948), or to sue the last carrier (Southern Ry. Co. v. Morris, 147 Ga. 729, 95 S. E. 284); and where the holder of the bill of lading obtained a judgment for the conversion against the initial carrier alone, the judgment not being one against the last carrier, it will not amount to such liquidation of the demand between those parties as to render it subject to garnishment at the suit of a creditor of the holder of the bill of lading.

5. DISPOSITION OF CAUSE.

Applying the foregoing rulings, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed and the cause remanded.

Certiorari to Court of Appeals.

Suit by the Hodgson Bros. Company against the Harris Bros. Grain Company with attachment levied by process of garnishment served upon the Southern Railway Company. Judgment in attachment suit for plaintiff, and in garnishment suit against the garnishee, which took writ of error to Court of Appeals, and from its judgment of affirmance (21 Ga. App. 753, 95 S. E. 263) a writ of certiorari was granted. Reversed, and cause remanded.

Blanton Fortson, of Athens, for plaintiff in error.

BROOKMAN v. RENNOLDS et al.

RENNOLDS et al. v. BROOKMAN.
(Nos. 837, 838.)

Rehearing Denied Feb. 24, 1919.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR \S 843(1)—CROSS-BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—DECISION.

Where the trial judge renders a judgment granting a new trial based upon a single ground in the motion, and the respondent brings a bill of exceptions, and the defendant in error brings a cross-bill of exceptions, the assignments of error in the cross-bill relating to questions which will probably arise on another hearing will be decided.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS \S 524(1)—TRIAL \S 252(3)—FOREIGN LETTERS—SPECIAL ADMINISTRATION—POWER TO SUE—INSTRUCTION—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Letters of administration granted in another state, authorizing an administratrix to administer "personal property, goods, chattels, and credits" of an intestate who died while a resident of the state in which the letters were issued, are special in character, and do not afford authority to the administratrix to maintain a suit in this state to enjoin the cutting of timber and to recover damages for trespass in cutting and removing the timber from the land.

(a) In a suit of the character just mentioned, it is incumbent upon the judge so to frame his charge to the jury as to make it conform to the pleadings and evidence; and the fact that the letters of administration have been admitted in evidence without objection would not authorize the judge to charge that the administratrix was authorized to maintain the suit.

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION \S 38—TESTIMONY—DENIAL.

In a suit to enjoin the cutting of timber and recover damages for trespass on the realty, where both parties relied upon prescriptive title, and the plaintiff contended that the land in dispute was a certain part of her land lying on the north side of a road which separated it from the main body of her land of which it formed a part, and the defendants contended that the land in dispute was a part of their tract, which comprised all the land on the north side of the road, and that they and his predecessors in title had been in actual possession of the land, and a witness for the plaintiff had testified that during the period of the defendants' actual possession the plaintiff's lessees had cut the timber on all of the plaintiff's tract, it was competent to show by the same witness that such lessees did not cut the timber on the land in dispute.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR \S 970(2)—EVIDENCE \S 177—SECONDARY EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—DISCRETION OF COURT.

In order to admit secondary evidence, it must appear that the primary evidence, for some sufficient cause, is inaccessible to the diligence of the party. The question of diligence is ordinarily addressed to the discretion of the court, which will not be interfered with unless flagrantly abused.

5. EVIDENCE \S 229, 256 — ADMISSIBILITY—SURVEYOR'S CERTIFICATE.

One of the defendants' predecessors in title was John M. Tison. A certificate issued by him, signed "John M. Tison, County Surveyor," and tending to show the correctness of a map of the plaintiff's lands, was relied upon as a part of the deed under which she was attempting to prescribe. She did not show that John M. Tison was ever in possession of the land in dispute, but contended to the contrary. The defendants produced evidence to show that John M. Tison was in actual possession of the land in dispute during the period covering the date of the certificate. The certificate was tendered after the introduction of such evidence by the defendants. Held, that there was no error in admitting the certificate over the objections: (1) That it did not appear that the certificate was made while Tison was in possession; (2) that it was an official certificate, and would not bind him personally.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR \S 231(5)—EVIDENCE \S 117—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

Under the issues presented by the pleadings and evidence, the authority of one of the agents of the plaintiff's intestate to manage and control his lands was a relevant question; and it was not erroneous to admit a paper purporting to be a copy of the map of his lands covering the land in dispute, when offered in connection with other evidence tending to show that at the time of employment the plaintiff's intestate delivered to the agent the paper as showing the lands he was employed to protect.

(a) The paper contained certain certificates which were not objected to separately; the only objection being to the evidence in its entirety. Under such objection the admissibility of such certificates will not be considered.

7. TRIAL \S 255(8)—ISSUE—INSTRUCTION.

The true location of the dividing line between the lands of the plaintiff and the defendant was a matter of dispute, and under the pleadings and evidence there was a question of whether a line had been established by acquiescence by acts and declarations of the parties or their predecessors, or by actual possession of the defendants and their predecessors for a term of seven years; and it was the duty of the court, without request, to charge the law on that subject.

8. ADVERSE POSSESSION \Leftrightarrow 116(7) — ACTUAL AND CONSTRUCTIVE POSSESSION—EVIDENCE.

The plaintiff's intestate was never in actual possession of the land in dispute, though there was evidence tending to show that he was in constructive possession thereof. There was also evidence to show that the defendants and their predecessors in title were in actual possession of the land in dispute during any period of the plaintiff's constructive possession. Under these circumstances the court, on request, should have charged the jury "that actual possession of land by one person claiming it is inconsistent with the constructive possession of the same land by another claimant."

9. CHARGE OF COURT.

The charge complained of in the fifth ground of the amended motion for new trial did not accurately state the contentions of the defendants, and was somewhat confusing.

10. ADVERSE POSSESSION \Leftrightarrow 116(2) — TRIAL \Leftrightarrow 193(2), 253(8)—INSTRUCTIONS—IGNORING EVIDENCE—OPINION OF COURT.

The charge set out in the tenth division of the opinion was applicable to one phase of the case as made by the pleadings and evidence, and was not open to the objections urged against it in the motion for new trial.

11. ADVERSE POSSESSION \Leftrightarrow 116(4) — PRESCRIPTION PERIOD—INSTRUCTION.

The charge set out in the eleventh division of the opinion unduly restricted the period within which the defendants were authorized to prescribe.

12. ADVERSE POSSESSION \Leftrightarrow 116(5)—ACTUAL OR CONSTRUCTIVE POSSESSION — CONSTRUCTION.

The prescription provided for in Civ. Code 1910, § 4168, contemplates actual possession for a period of 20 years, and that provided for in section 4169 contemplates possession under color of title for 7 years, which may be actual or constructive; and in a case where a party relies upon a prescription based upon both sections, the court should not in the charge so confuse the two as to state in effect that, in order to acquire prescription under color of title, the possession relied on as the basis of such prescription must be actual possession of the whole tract.

13. ADVERSE POSSESSION \Leftrightarrow 116(5)—PERMISSIVE POSSESSION—INSTRUCTION.

The evidence authorized a charge upon the subject of permissive possession.

14. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

As the case will go back for another trial, in which the evidence may not be the same, no ruling will be made on the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Glynn County; J. P. Highsmith, Judge.

Suit for injunction and for damages by Mrs. Marion P. Brookman, administratrix, against P. J. Rennolds and others. Verdict for plaintiff, motion for new trial granted, and plaintiff excepts, and defendants file a cross-bill of exceptions. Affirmed on main bill of exceptions, and reversed on cross-bill.

Mrs. Marion P. Brookman, alleging herself to be administratrix upon the estate of Henry D. Brookman, deceased, by appointment of the Surrogate Court in the state of New York, instituted a suit in the state of Georgia to enjoin the cutting of timber on a described tract of land, and to recover damages on account of trespass in cutting and removing the timber. She also prayed for general relief. The case was tried before a jury, and their verdict was for the plaintiff. The defendants made a motion for a new trial on numerous grounds. Upon the hearing the judge granted a new trial on one ground. The plaintiff excepted. The defendants filed a cross-bill of exceptions, assigning error on the failure of the judge to grant a new trial on each of the remaining grounds of the motion.

Adams & Adams, of Savannah, and D. W. Krauss, of Brunswick, for plaintiff.

Bennet, Twitty & Reese, of Brunswick, for defendants.

ATKINSON, J. [1] 1. In Thornton v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 116 Ga. 121, 42 S. E. 287, 94 Am. St. Rep. 99, it was held:

"A judgment granting a first new trial will never be reversed unless the law and the facts demanded the verdict rendered; and this is true notwithstanding the grant of a new trial may have been based upon a single ground in the motion, and though this ground may not have been well taken. But where in such a case the defendant in error brings a cross-bill of exceptions, the assignments of error therein relating to matters which will probably arise at another hearing will be decided."

Under this ruling the questions made by the cross-bill of exceptions, which may arise on another trial, will be considered. The case differs from Southwestern R. Co. v. Smithville, 134 Ga. 432, 67 S. E. 936.

[2] 2. In Jones v. Clett, 114 Ga. 673, 40 S. E. 719, the administrators of the estate of a person who resided in New York at the time of his death, appointed in the Surrogate Court of New York, brought an action in this state to recover a described parcel of land with mesne profits and damages alleged to have been sustained by the cutting and removing of timber from the land. On the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence their letters of administration with the will annexed. It appeared that the will was adjudged by the Surrogate Court "to be a valid will of personal estate only." The letters recited:

That there is granted unto the administrator named "full power and authority, by these presents, to administer and faithfully to dispose of all and singular the said goods, chattels, and credits, and to ask, demand, recover, and receive the debts which unto the said testator whilst living and at the time of death did belong, and to pay the debts which the said testator did owe, as far as such goods, chattels, and credits will thereto extend and the law require."

The letters were excluded from evidence, on the ground that they were granted for the purpose of administering personalty only, and were insufficient to authorize the plaintiffs to maintain the action; and a nonsuit was granted. On exception it was held:

"An administrator with the will annexed, appointed in another state under a judgment admitting the will to record as 'a valid will of personalty only,' and authorized by the letters of administration issued to him to administer only 'the goods, chattels, and credits' of the testator, has no authority to institute, in the courts of this state, either an action to recover land and mesne profits, or an action of trespass for the recovery of damages to real property."

The principle thus ruled was applied in Taylor v. McKee, 121 Ga. 223, 48 S. E. 943, a somewhat similar case, in which it was held:

"Where special letters of administration are presented, limiting the power of the administrator to specific property of the estate of the intestate, his power will not be extended beyond his letters."

The principle announced in the cases cited is applicable to the case under consideration. In this case the plaintiff's right to the relief sought depended upon title to the land in dispute. The plaintiff placed her case on alleged title in the estate of her intestate and her letters of administration issued from the Surrogate's Court of New York. These did not purport to authorize her as administratrix to administer upon any of the estate of the deceased, except "personal property, goods, chattels, and credits." Under the principle of the decisions cited above, these were special letters limited to the administration of specific property, and cannot be so extended as to confer authority upon the administratrix to administer real estate of the intestate in this state. It was urged that the decisions cited did not apply, because in those cases the letters were objected to when offered in evidence, whereas in the present case they were admitted without objection; also that, although the letters had been introduced on a former trial of the case, and had been duly filed and recorded in the court since the commencement of the action, no point had ever been made as to their sufficiency as authority for the administratrix to maintain the suit. These suggestions do not state any valid basis of distinction. The burden was upon the plaintiff to prove her case, and the defendants had the right at any time to urge that the evidence offered for the purpose was either lacking in some respect, or proved a fact that was fatal to her case. In this instance the letters showed affirmatively that her authority to sue was restricted; and while charging the jury the judge should have so framed his instructions as to adjust them to the issues as presented by the pleadings and evidence. In Huxford v. Southern Pine Co., 124 Ga. 181, 187, 52 S. E. 439, 441, it was said by Cobb, J.:

"A party may allow a deed relied upon by his adversary to go in evidence without objection, but his failure to object does not preclude him from urging in his motion for a new trial that the deed is invalid for some reason appearing upon the face of the same, or for other reason appearing in the evidence."

The court informed the jury in his charge that the plaintiff occupied the same position as her intestate, and that, if he, if living, had made out such a case as would entitle him to recover, she upon the same facts could recover. It was upon this charge that the court granted a new trial. For reasons stated there was no error in the judge granting a new trial.

[3] 3. In this and the succeeding divisions of this opinion assignments of error made in the cross-bill of exceptions will be considered. The plaintiff's intestate and defendants claimed large bodies of land on which was pine timber valuable for sawmill, turpentine, and other purposes which adjoined each other on one side. That claimed by the defendants was called the "plantation tract," and that claimed by the plaintiff was called the "college tract." The plantation tract, which was alleged to contain 762 acres, lies in the fork of "Turtle river" and College creek," both being well-defined tidewater streams. A public road extended from the bridge across Turtle river and the bridge across College creek, and along the north side of the road was a ditch and embankment on which was a fence constructed by the defendants' predecessors in title and claimed as their southern boundary line. It was contended that the land was thus inclosed and used as a pasture for cattle, and some parts of it were cultivated and occupied by tenants of defendants and their predecessors in title for a great many years, dating back to 1860. The plaintiff claimed under a deed executed in 1866 purporting to convey 7,073 acres of land to her intestate, in which the land was described by reciting various grants issued by the state to persons other than the plaintiff's intestate and not shown to be his grantors, comprising as many as 28 tracts, and by referring to a designated unrecorded map as showing the boundary of the great tract composed of the several grants. This map shows the road above mentioned, and that the great bulk of the land embraced therein lay on the south side of the road; that a part thereof, amounting to 245 acres, extended over and lay on the north side of the road, being also adjacent to College creek, bordering some distance on the creek and commencing at the bridge, and bordering also along the road in the direction of the Turtle river bridge. The land thus claimed by the plaintiff, located on the north side of the road, constitutes the land in dispute. The plaintiff relied entirely upon a prescriptive title based on the deed above mentioned, and possession of a part of the land on the south side of the road for more than seven years. Neither plaintiff nor her intestate were ever in actual possession of any part of the land in dispute. The defendants also relied upon prescription: First, by twenty years' actual possession based on inclosure of the land by Turtle river, College creek, and a fence maintained along the public road and use thereof as a pasture, and occupancy of portions thereof by tenants within such inclosure; second, by seven years' possession exercised by the maintenance of the inclosure above mentioned, and by inclosure and cultivation of fields and occupancy by tenants on portions of the land in dispute for more than seven years under the will of John M. Tison, deceased, probated in 1883, and a decree of court rendered in 1884, partitioning the plantation tract among devisees named in the will, and successive conveyances from such devisees down to the defendants. The defendants also contended that, whatever might have been the true line, the road had become the boundary line between the plaintiff and defendant by reason of acquiescence by acts and declarations upon the part of the plaintiff's intestate and the defendants and their predecessors in title for more than seven years, and by reason of defendants' actual possession for more than seven years prior to the bringing of the suit. The plaintiff disputed all the claims thus made by the defendants, and the defendants disputed the claims so made by the plaintiff; and as a consequence both parties were put upon proof of the respective contentions above mentioned. The plaintiff's intestate resided in New York, and made only occasional visits to the property, and during the whole period after his purchase local agents were employed to look after and protect the property. From 1880 up to the trial of the case one of the agents lived within a few hundred yards of the land in dispute, on the opposite side of College creek, and had actual notice of whatever acts of possession were exercised by the defendants and their predecessors in title on the plantation tract. The agent employed in 1880 subsequently died, and his son, who resided with him and who had the same information as to possession, became his successor as agent of plaintiff's intestate. While the agent last mentioned was being examined as a witness for the plaintiff he testified:

"The timber was cut off the college lands in 1889, and in about four years the Brookmans sold them for timber purposes and leases."

The defendants proposed to prove by this witness that the timber was cut on all of the college tract, except the land claimed in the suit to be a part of the college tract, and for which the plaintiff is suing, and that the timber on that part was not cut. This evidence was excluded on the ground that it was irrelevant. The evidence, if admitted, would have been a circumstance tending to show that the plaintiff's intestate had knowledge of the defendants' adverse possession up to the road, and also his acquiescence in the division line along the road as claimed by the defendants, and also to qualify the testimony of the witness that the lessees of the plaintiff had cut the timber on all the land claimed as the college tract.

[4] 4. The defendants tendered in evidence a certified copy of a lease, executed by certain of the defendants' predecessors in title, to certain water rights along the shore lines or margins from College creek bridge to Turtle river. This was offered in connection with an affidavit by an agent of the alleged lessees to the effect that he had made search for the original, and that it was lost or destroyed. The evidence was excluded on objection that it was irrelevant, and that there had been no effort to produce the witness, and that proof of the loss of the original could not be made by affidavit. It is declared in Civil Code, § 5759:

"In order to admit secondary evidence, it must appear that the primary evidence for some sufficient cause, is not accessible to the diligence of the party. This showing is made to the court, who will hear the party himself on the question of diligence and the inaccessibility of the primary evidence."

In Turner v. Elliott, 127 Ga. 338, 56 S. E. 434, it was held:

"The sufficiency of the examination preliminary to the introduction of secondary evidence of a lost original is left largely to the presiding judge; and where he is satisfied and admits secondary evidence, his discretion will not be interfered with, unless clearly abused."

See Orr v. Dunn, 145 Ga. 137, 88 S. E. 669 (2).

The evidence submitted before the judge was insufficient to show that the original document was not accessible to the diligence of the party; and the court did not err in its ruling.

[5] 5. The plaintiff tendered a certificate dated July 16, 1868, purporting to have been made by "John M. Tison, County Surveyor," and appearing on the map of the college tract, which map purported to have been made by "John M. Tison, County Surveyor," on January 8, 1853. The map in question was contended to be the same to which the plaintiff's grantor referred in the deed executed in 1860. The certificate which was tendered, being subsequent in date, could be no part of the deed, but amounted to a mere declaration. The language of the certificate was:

"I hereby certify that I have this day completed a resurvey of the annexed plat of land, and have clearly marked the lines, corners, and stakes around the whole."

It was shown that John M. Tison was the first among the defendants' predecessors in title; and while the plaintiff disputed that John M. Tison was ever in possession, the defendants offered evidence to show that he was in possession during a period covering the date on the certificate, upon which evidence they relied in part to establish their prescriptive title referred to in a preceding division of this opinion. There being such evidence, the declaration so made was admissible against the defendants, who were privies in estate of John M. Tison, for the purpose of explaining the character of such possession. It was contended that in order to lay the proper foundation for such declaration, under the rulings in Carter v. Buchannon, 3 Ga. 513, and Sharp v. Hicks, 94 Ga. 624, 21 S. E. 208 (3), the party offering the evidence should have made proof of the facts necessary to lay the foundation for its admission, and that it would not suffice to rely upon proof of the same facts by the other party; also that the declaration by John M. Tison in an official capacity as surveyor would not bind him personally. The contentions deal more with form than with substance and afford no reason for excluding the evidence.

[6] 6. The plaintiff tendered a map, purporting to be a copy of the map referred to in the foregoing division, containing the certificate:

"This will certify that this map is a true copy of the said above Tison map or plat on this July 3, 1879.

"[Signed] Geo. H. Day, C. E."

Below the certificate the following appeared:

"I hereby certify that I have, by the request of Mr. F. D. Scarlett, completed a resurvey of all those tracts of land as the college lands, have plainly marked all lines and established all corners which have been destroyed.

"[Signed] R. M. Tison, Surveyor."

When the evidence was tendered, it was objected to in its entirety as immaterial and irrelevant. The court, being of the opinion that "it may be admissible on the question of adverse possession," overruled the objection. When considered in connection with testimony tending to show that, when Mr. Brookman employed the agent (mentioned in a preceding division of this opinion), he delivered this copy map to the agent as showing the land he was employed to look after, the plat was admissible as tending to show the property which the agent was employed to guard. It is a rule of practice that, where evidence is objected to in bulk, some of which is admissible, and some inadmissible, a ruling admitting the evidence will not be reversed.

Had there been an objection that the correctness of the copy had not been proved, or had there been separate objections to the certificates by Geo. H. Day and R. M. Tyson, neither of whom appeared to have had any interest or been in possession of the land at the times the certificates were made, different questions would be presented.

[7] 7. Under the pleadings and evidence the true location of the dividing line between the plantation tract and the college tract was in dispute; and whether the public road had been established as the dividing line by acquiescence by acts and declarations of the parties and their predecessors in title, or by actual possession of the defendants for the term of seven years, as provided in Civil Code, §§ 3821, 3822, was a question for determination. Therefore it was the duty of the court to charge the law on that subject without a request. These provisions of the law are applicable in cases of this character. Ivey v. Cowart, 124 Ga. 159, 52 S. E. 436, 110 Am. St. Rep. 160; Osteen v. Wynn, 131 Ga. 209, 62 S. E. 37, 127 Am. St. Rep. 212.

[8] 8. The plaintiff's intestate was never in actual possession of any part of the land in dispute, though there was evidence to authorize a finding that he was in constructive possession thereof by reason of the deed covering the land, and his actual possession of some other portions of the land embraced in the deed. The evidence also tended to show that the defendants and their predecessors in title were in actual possession of all of the land in dispute during any period of plaintiff's constructive possession. The court was requested to charge the jury "that actual possession of land by one person claiming it is inconsistent with the constructive possession of the same land by another claimant." This request stated a correct principle of law. It was applicable to the case, and was not covered by the general charge.

[10] 10. The sixth ground of the amended motion for new trial complains of the following charge to the jury:

"Now, the defendant contends that there is a certain fence running from Turtle river on the one end, Turtle river bridge on one end to College creek bridge on the other, and that this line of fence and the creek and the river constitute actual adverse possession of this parcel of land in question. So that, gentlemen, you will look to see whether or not this fence, in connection with Turtle river on the one side and College creek on the other, was such possession as to constitute actual possession, as defined to you by the law. They contend that this was a substantial inclosure, and was such possession as met all of the requirements of the actual adverse possession referred to by the law. Now, gentlemen, that is a question for your determination under the evidence. It is for you, as jurors, applying common sense, to look to the evidence and facts and circumstances in this case, and from that determine whether or not this was such possession (the fence, the creek, and the river together) as measured up to the requirements of actual adverse possession."

This charge was adjusted to that phase of the case in which the defendants set up prescriptive title by 20 years' actual adverse possession, and was not erroneous for the reasons assigned: (a) That it excluded from the consideration of the jury certain evidence of possession by occupancy and cultivation of particular parts of the land in dispute included within the general inclosure referred to by the judge in his charge; (b) that it amounted to an expression of an opinion by the judge that the occupancy and cultivation of such particular parts of the land in dispute would not be actual adverse possession.

"Now, the defendant contends in addition to that, gentlemen, that John M. Tison, made a will conveying this property or bequeathing this property to certain of his children—this was made in 1882, and later probated—and that in 1884 there was a decree of court to divide the property among the heirs to whom it was bequeathed, that later the heirs who had an interest all made a deed to Arabella Tison, and that thereafter, in 1905, the executor of Arabella Tison made and conveyed the property in question—a certain tract of land, including the property in question and the parcel in dispute—to the Downing Company and H. T. McKinnon. In 1905, that thereafter, in 1906, McKinnon conveyed his half interest to the Downing Company, and that later, in 1911, the Downing Company conveyed to James Kelley, and that later, in 1913, James Kelley conveyed to Phillip J. Renolds; and they further contend, gentlemen, that these parties were bona fide purchasers for value, beginning with Arabella Tison, and then the several parties following that were each and severally bona fide purchasers for value, and that between 1892 and the time of the filing of this suit there was such actual adverse possession under these several deeds as color of title to ripen into prescriptive title. That is to say, they claim that these parties, irrespective of what may have been the status of John M. Tison, have acquired prescriptive title by reason of actual adverse possession for a period of seven years or more, since 1892, and under these several conveyances."

There was evidence tending to show unbroken possession of the defendants' predecessors in title continuously after the death of John M. Tison until the institution of the suit. The defendants relied upon such evidence, in connection with the various documents rectified by the court, to establish a prescription by seven years' possession under color of title. The charge tended to restrict the jury to the consideration of a prescriptive period commencing after 1892; whereas the defendants were entitled to have submitted to the jury their contention that prescription had ripened in their favor prior to that date.

[12] 12. The judge also charged:

"If John M. Tison did not have good prescriptive title to the lands, then it is for the determination of the jury whether or not the defendants have acquired good prescriptive title to the land in question, under the conveyances referred to as color of title, by reason of having had actual adverse possession of these lands for a period of seven years under these titles as color and under such possession as had the elements of prescriptive title."

There was evidence to authorize the jury to find a prescription arising after the death of John M. Tison in favor of the defendants, based on actual adverse possession for a period of 20 years under Civil Code, § 4168; also a prescriptive title based on 7 years' adverse possession under color of title as provided in Civil Code, § 4169. In the former case the possession of the whole tract must be actual; in the latter the actual possession need be only a part of the land described in the color of title. The charge complained of did not notice the distinction, and its language is such as to make the impression that, in order to acquire prescription under color of title, the possession relied on as the basis for such prescription must be actual possession as distinguished from constructive possession.

[13] 13. Another portion of the charge upon which error was assigned was a concrete statement in which the question was submitted whether or not John M. Tison was in permissive possession, if the jury should find that he was in actual possession of the premises in dispute. The evidence was sufficient to authorize a charge on this subject, and the charge as given was not cause for reversal for any reason assigned.

[14] 14. The ruling stated in the fourteenth headnote does not require elaboration.

Judgment affirmed on the main bill of exceptions, and reversed on the cross-bill.

*(Syllabus by the Court.)*1. NEW TRIAL \S 86 — GROUNDS — LACHES — MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The evidence authorized the verdict; and the points that the plaintiff was not entitled to a verdict because he came into a court of equity without clean hands, and after long delay, were not well taken under the general grounds of the motion for new trial, especially as it does not appear that such points were presented or passed upon by the trial judge.

2. WITNESSES \S 150(2) — COMPETENCY — TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENT.

In an action brought by the grantor in a deed against the heirs at law of the grantee, to have the instrument canceled because never delivered, the grantor was not an incompetent witness, under Civ. Code 1910, \S 5858, par. 1, to testify in his own behalf to the nondelivery of the deed.

3. TRIAL \S 296(7) — GROUNDS — INSTRUCTION.

The charge of the court as set out in the third division of the opinion was not cause for a new trial.

4. TRIAL \S 280(1) — REQUESTED INSTRUCTIONS — GIVEN INSTRUCTIONS.

The requests to charge, in so far as they embodied correct and pertinent legal principles, were covered by the explicit, correct, and concrete instructions given to the jury.

Error from Superior Court, Laurens County; J. L. Kent, Judge.

Action by E. A. Butler against Cora Hall and others. Judgment for plaintiff, motion for new trial overruled, and defendants except and bring error. Affirmed.

In February, 1917, E. A. Butler brought an action against Cora Hall and others named, all being children of petitioner and of his deceased wife, Julia E. Butler, alleging, in substance:

That on December 17, 1891, petitioner signed a paper in the form of a warranty deed in the presence of two witnesses, one of them a notary public, which purported to convey to Julia E. Butler a tract of land containing about 150 acres, upon the expressed consideration of love and affection and of $25, the receipt of which was acknowledged in the instrument; that on the same date he had the instrument recorded in the clerk's office of the county where the land was situated; "that in about the year 1891 a proceeding to eject your petitioner from lands then described as follows was filed against him [the land to which the present action relates]; * * * that the sole and only purpose of writing and signing said deed was to give your petitioner the right to disclaim title in the aforesaid ejectment proceedings, but petitioner shows that he did not exercise that right, but did hold and retain both title and possession of the said lands in the aforesaid proceedings; * * * that said deed, having been written, signed, and recorded for the aforesaid specific purpose, and having served its purpose, was no longer effective as title or evidence of title to said land; * * * that though said deed was written, and signed by him, the same was written by his then counsel * * * and in his office * * * and in the presence of [the witnesses attesting the instrument], but was never delivered to the said Julia E. Butler, but that the same was placed on record by your petitioner, retained and held by him until it was subsequently destroyed by fire; * * * that the said Julia E. Butler was not only not present when the said deed was signed and recorded," but was at home about 15 miles away; that she "at that time was not aware that your petitioner had made a deed and recorded the same as aforesaid"; that "petitioner was and had been, at the time said deed was signed and recorded, and has continuously been and now is in the peaceable, quiet, exclusive, adverse, notorious, and uninterrupted possession of said land where he then, and has since, and is now, operating the same as his own, and notoriously exercising exclusive ownership thereof, no other person having ever been in possession of the same since said time, as tenants or otherwise, except your petitioner, or under his immediate control as landlord of such tenants who may have cultivated some parts of said lands in the meanwhile; * * * that the defendants are now undertaking to set up adverse claim by virtue of the aforesaid deed, and are threatening to sell and convey their alleged interest therein, claiming that your petitioner now has no interest except as a distributive share as an heir at law of the said Julia E. Butler, and by virtue of their pretense as claimants of an interest in said lands, recently asserted by them, your petitioner is being now deprived of the full enjoyment of the same, and that the outstanding recorded paper purporting to be an adverse title is menacing your petitioner's legal rights, and is a cloud upon your petitioner's title, sufficient to deprive him of the exclusive and full enjoyment of the aforesaid premises and its appurtenances; * * * that the said Julia E. Butler never claimed, or pretended to claim, the said lands referred to in said deed, or any title or interest in the same, during her lifetime, nor did the character of your petitioner's possession change at the time said deed was signed and recorded, nor did it subsequently change, but continued as above."

The petitioner and the defendants were the only heirs at law of Julia E. Butler, who died in 1898, intestate, owing no debts, and there has been no administration upon her estate. Among the prayers was one asking for a decree directing the cancellation of the instrument as a cloud upon petitioner's title, and that the title to the land be decreed to be in him. The defendants answered, averring that the deed was delivered to their mother, Julia E. Butler, and that the land in question was owned in common by the petitioner and the defendants, and praying as it was not susceptible of division in kind, that it be sold and the proceeds divided among the petitioner and the defendants as the heirs at law of Julia E. Butler. On the trial there was a verdict for the petitioner. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and the defendants excepted.

T. E. Hightower, of Dublin, for plaintiffs in error.

R. Earl Camp and J. S. Adams, both of Dublin, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The motion for new trial contained the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to evidence, and without evidence to support it, and was contrary to law and the principles of justice and equity. There was ample evidence to authorize the verdict. In the brief for the plaintiffs in error it is contended, under the general grounds of the motion for new trial, that a new trial should have been granted because it appeared that the petitioner had not come into the court of equity with clean hands, by reason of the purpose for which he executed the instrument sought to be canceled, and on account of his long delay in asking for this relief. The petition set forth the plaintiff's case, and he submitted evidence sufficient to authorize the jury to find in his behalf. There was no demurrer to the petition, and, so far as the record discloses, no point was made on the trial as to the plaintiff's fraudulent purpose in executing the deed to his wife, or as to his delay in beginning an action for the cancellation of the paper.

"I never did deliver the deed to anybody. I never authorized anybody to deliver this deed to anybody; it has never been delivered to anybody with my consent. No person ever took possession of this land under this deed; Mrs. Butler, my wife, never did have this deed in her possession or in her hands in her life, in my presence. She never did have this deed in her possession or in her hands, with my consent or knowledge. My wife never did have this deed in her possession at any time when Mrs. Hall was present, or when any discussion was up about selling the land; not when I was present."

This testimony was admitted over the defendants' objection on the ground that the witness was incompetent to testify as set forth, because Mrs. Butler, to whom the deed purported to have been made, was dead, and that the witness, being a party to the action, was incompetent to testify as to transactions and communications between himself and his deceased wife. The witness was not incompetent, and the court did not err in admitting the testimony. Paragraph 1 of section 5858 of the Civil Code declares:

"Where any suit is instituted or defendant by a person insane at the time of trial, or by an indorsee, assignee, transferee, or by the personal representative of a deceased person, the opposite party shall not be admitted to testify in his own favor against the insane or deceased person, as to transactions or communications with such insane or deceased person, whether such transactions or communications were had by such insane or deceased person with the party testifying or with any other person."

The plaintiff and the defendants were heirs at law of Mrs. Butler. The defendants, however, were not indorsees, assignees, transferees, or personal representatives of Mrs. Butler, so as to render the plaintiff an incompetent witness, in this action, as to transactions or communications with his deceased wife. In Boynton v. Reese, 112 Ga. 354 (3), 357, 37 S. E. 437, 438, it was held:

"A grantee in a deed against whom a petition for the cancellation thereof is brought by an heir at law of the grantor is not, because of the fact that such grantor is dead, disqualified from testifying as to communications and transactions between the deceased and the witness leading up to the execution of the instrument."

Like rulings were made in the following cases: Oliver v. Powell, 114 Ga. 592 (5), 601, 40 S. E. 826; Causey v. White, 143 Ga. 7 (3), 84 S. E. 58; Goddard v. Boyd, 144 Ga. 18, 85 S. E. 1013; Rudolph v. Washington, 146 Ga. 605, 91 S. E. 560.

The decision in Harrison v. Perry, 86 Ga. 813, 13 S. E. 88, was based on the act of 1860 (Code 1882, § 3854, par. 1), which provided that—

"Where one of the original parties to the contract or cause of action in issue or on trial is dead, or is shown to the court to be insane, or where an executor or administrator is a party in any suit on the contract of his testator or intestate, the other party shall not be admitted to testify in his own favor."

This act was changed by the act of 1889, as amended by the act of 1893, now embodied in the Civil Code, § 5858, par. 1.

The testimony to the effect that the witness never delivered the deed to anybody, nor ever authorized anybody to deliver it, and that it was never delivered to any one with his consent, was not subject to objection that it was the mere expression of his conclusion.

[3] 3. Exception to the following charge was one of the grounds of the motion for new trial, viz.:

"I charge you that if E. A. Butler executed the deed, signed it in the presence of witnesses, and had it recorded in the county where the land lay, this would be prima facie evidence that it was delivered; that is, such evidence as would authorize the jury to believe that it was delivered, unless there was some evidence showing that it was not, and that E. A. Butler did not intend to make and deliver it by what he had done."

The exception to this charge was that in using the words "some evidence" the court thereby instructed the jury that the onus would be shifted if "some evidence" was introduced by the plaintiff showing that he did not intend to make and deliver the deed in question. We do not think this a fair criticism of the charge. The instruction was to the effect that the prima facie case stated by the court would be overcome if there was "some evidence showing to the contrary," not merely that such prima facie case would be overcome if any evidence submitted tended to show the contrary. "Evidence showing the contrary" means evidence proving the contrary to be true. At any rate, in view of the clear, explicit, and concrete instructions given to the jury, we are of the opinion that this ground of the motion did not require the grant of a new trial.

[4] 4. The requests to charge, in so far as they embodied correct and pertinent legal principles, were covered by the explicit, correct, and concrete instructions on the issues in the case.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS — SEIZURE — INJUNCTION.

In Gunn v. Atwell, 148 Ga. —, 96 S. E. 2, it appeared that a certain automobile in the possession of one Jenkins, and in which intoxicating liquors were found, was seized by police officers of the city of Macon, and the seizure was reported to the solicitor of the city court of Macon, who instituted condemnation proceedings under section 20 of the prohibition laws of this state, approved March 28, 1917 (Acts Ex. Sess. 1917, p. 16). Atwell filed an equitable petition in which he alleged that Jenkins was neither the owner nor a lessee of the car, but that Atwell was the owner thereof, and had no knowledge that Jenkins had used the automobile for the purpose of transporting intoxicating liquors; and Atwell prayed that the officers be required to surrender the automobile, and for injunction and general relief. It was ruled, in the case cited, that section 20 of the act, supra, "provides an adequate remedy at law for an adjudication of all the rights of the defendant in error; and therefore there was no ground for equitable jurisdiction." The facts in the instant case bring it clearly within that ruling; and there was no error in refusing to order the sheriff of the county to deliver the possession of the car to the plaintiff, and to enjoin the pending condemnation proceedings in the city court; the plaintiff having an adequate remedy at law for the adjudication of the rights claimed by her in the petition for injunction.

MEDLIN v. STATE. (No. 1127.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 15, 1919.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — 595(8), 668 — HOMICIDE — 188(4) — CONTINUANCE — ABSENCE OF WITNESSES — MATERIALITY OF EVIDENCE.

In making his statement to the jury, as provided for by statute, the prisoner cannot lay the foundation for introducing in his favor evidence that would otherwise be inadmissible. Thus, where there was nothing to show that at the time of the homicide, with the commission of which the defendant was charged, the decedent was the aggressor and was making an attack upon the accused, except the statement of the accused to that effect, evidence offered by him to prove that the decedent was a man of violent character was properly rejected. Vaughn v. State, 88 Ga. 731, 16 S. E. 64; Nix v. State, 120 Ga. 162, 47 S. E. 516.

(a) Nor did the court err in overruling the motion for a continuance, based upon the ground of the absence of witnesses subpoenaed by the defendant, by whom he expected to prove that the decedent was a man of violent character, as the testimony of these witnesses would not have been admissible under the evidence in the case as actually developed.

2. CRIMINAL LAW — 547(1) — ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE — DEFENDANT'S FORMER STATEMENTS.

An extract, shown to be substantially correct, from a prisoner's statement made on a former trial, was admissible in evidence without offering the entire statement, though it was shown that the statement made at the former trial, as taken down by the official reporter, had been lost.

3. HOMICIDE — 297 — JUSTIFICATION — INSTRUCTION.

That part of the court's charge to the jury in the following language, to wit, "No possible wrong, however heinous, will justify a killing," is not ground for the grant of a new trial, when considered in the connection in which it was used, as the court there was speaking of a past and completed wrong.

4. HOMICIDE — 297 — INSTRUCTION.

The court did not err in charging the jury that "one cannot avenge a wrong by killing without being guilty of murder." This principle of law was not irrelevant under the facts; nor did it, when considered in connection with the context, contain an expression of opinion by the court that the accused relied upon a justification of the killing through the avenging of some wrong.

5. CRIMINAL LAW §814(17)—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—CHARGE.

The court did not err in failing to instruct the jury as to the law of circumstantial evidence, as the case for the state did not rest entirely upon circumstantial evidence.

6. GRANTING OF NEW TRIAL.

The grounds of the motion for a new trial not specifically dealt with show no cause for the grant of a new trial.

1. CRIMINAL LAW §376—HOMICIDE §190 (10)—WITNESSES §406—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—RELEVANCY—CHARACTER EVIDENCE.

"A party to a case has the right to introduce all competent, relevant, and material evidence, either to prove the main issue involved, or to discredit the evidence of a witness for the opposite party." Tiller v. State, 111 Ga. 840, 36 S. E. 201(1). Accordingly, on the trial of a criminal case the state may introduce any competent, relevant, and material evidence for the purpose of disproving the contention of the defendant, or for the purpose of discrediting his defense, and it affords no valid ground of objection that such evidence may tend incidentally to put the defendant's character in issue. Smith v. State, 148 Ga. —, 96 S. E. 1042(2).

(a) Where the defendant in a homicide case contended that the deceased entertained ill will toward him and had made repeated threats against him, which threats had been communicated to him, and offered evidence tending to support this contention, it was competent for the state, in rebuttal, to prove any relevant and material fact or circumstance tending to discredit the contention; and there was no error in admitting evidence to the effect that immediately preceding the homicide the deceased and the accused were upon friendly terms, although the circumstances, proof of which were relied upon by the state to show their friendly relations, tended incidentally to put the defendant's character in issue.

FORGERY §10—ALTERATION OF WRITING—MATERIALITY—FIGURES IN CHECK.

For an alteration of a writing to be the basis of a prosecution for forgery the alteration must be a material one.

(a) "The figures in a check, following the words in the body thereof denoting the sum called for, are not a material part of the instrument, the words being controlling in determining the legal effect."

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; H. A. Mathews, Judge.

Thomas McIntosh was indicted for forging and altering a check or draft, his demurrer to the indictment was overruled, and he excepts and brings error. Reversed.

John R. Cooper, of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

John P. Ross, Sol. Gen., of Macon, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. The indictment charged that the defendant forged and altered a check or draft, "by altering and raising the figures and numerals on said check, to wit, $2.60, to the figures and numerals, to wit, $57.60; said check or draft being in substance and tenor as follows:

"Form No. 1840 Southern Railway Company, Account Department, June, 1917.

"Roll 3144 Line 6 Washington, D. C., July 16, 1917. No. 22389. H. C. Ansley, Treasurer, Southern Railway Co., Washington, D. C.: Pay to the order of Thomas McIntosh ($57.60) [the figures on said draft and check being "$2.60" before its alteration, and said figures "$2.60" being falsely and fraudulently altered and made to be "$57.60" as aforesaid], Two ⁶⁰/₁₀₀ Dollars. Not valid if drawn for more than three hundred (300) dollars. In full for services rendered during the month of June, 1917, when indorsement is in exact accord with name of payee and is guaranteed by an agent of the company. Not negotiable unless countersigned by either A. H. Plant, Comptroller, H. E. Bruce, R. F. Green, P. Herman, K. Hurt, E. Marceron, C. E. Moore, H. T. Rinck, H. E. Bruce."

Printed on margin the following:

"This check will be paid by any of the banks named on the back having sufficient funds of the company in its hands or by any agent having sufficient funds of the company in his hands. It is receivable also in payment of freight or fares. Payable not later than sixty days from date."

Indorsed on the back of the check or draft were the names of a number of banks.

To this indictment a demurrer was filed, as follows:

"(1) Because the said indictment does not allege a crime against the laws of the state of Georgia. (2) Because the alleged alteration in the check described in said indictment is not a material alteration and does not constitute a forgery. (3) Because the check described in said indictment is not alleged to have been altered or changed in amount in the body of said check, the only alteration being in the marginal figures, and therefore the alteration did not constitute a forgery."

The demurrer was overruled, and defendant excepted.

This case has not been without its serious difficulties. That for an alteration of a writing to be the basis of a prosecution for forgery the alteration must be a material one was easily determined from text-books, books of reference, and the opinions of the courts of last resort in many jurisdictions; but the question of what was a material alteration was not so easily settled. After a very thorough examination of the reports and digests in search of precedents, three cases directly in point were found, two of these holding that under facts similar to those in the instant case the defendant was not guilty of forgery, and one that he was. In Commonwealth v. Hilde, 94 Ky. 517, 23 S. W. 195, it was held:

"Where 'a check for 'seventy cents,' the amount of which was also written in figures, thus '$70/100,' near the top of the check, was altered by inserting the figure '3' between the dollar mark and the figures '70,' leaving the words 'seventy cents' in the body of the check unchanged, the alteration constituted a forgery, although the person to whom the check was presented for payment could, by close observation, have detected the forgery and prevented the consummation of the fraud."

This case is referred to with disapproval by the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, and by the Supreme Court of Illinois, as will hereafter appear. In State v. Lotono, 62 W. Va. 310, 58 S. E. 621, the second and fourth headnotes are as follows:

"An alteration in an instrument, to constitute forgery, must be of a material part thereof; and a material alteration of an instrument is one which makes it speak a language different in legal effect from that which it originally spoke, or which carries with it some change in the rights, interests, or obligations of the parties to the writing. * * * The figures in a check, following the words in the body thereof denoting the sum called for, are not a material part of the instrument, the words being controlling in determining its legal effect."

In the opinion in that case Judge Miller said:

"An alteration in an instrument, to amount to forgery according to the authorities cited, must be such as to make it speak a language different in legal effect from that which it originally spoke or which carries with it some change in the rights, interests, or obligations of the parties to the writing. It follows that an immaterial change—a change which if true would not affect the legal liability of the parties in an action on the instrument—would not amount to forgery. 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 572; State v. Poindexter, 23 W. Va. 805. The test is the legal effect of the change or alteration, not whether some one may be misled or deceived by the paper. Here the only change was in what are called in some cases the marginal figures, which, while they might mislead one who should fail to observe the body of the instrument, could not change or affect the legal status of the parties, or tend in legal effect to prejudice another's rights. The alteration of the check in this case did not deceive the bank; and its legal effect was not changed. The materiality of the alteration is a question of law for the court upon the admissibility of the altered instrument in evidence, and, the alteration being shown, nothing remains for the jury to pass upon. Mfg. Co. v. Watson, 58 W. Va. 189, 195 [52 S. E. 515]. Was the alteration of the figures in the check a material one? We think not. It is true the figures follow the words in the body of the check denoting the sum called for, as is frequently the case, and are not strictly marginal; but we do not think they form a material part of the paper. They are for ready reference, as if written at the top or in the margin, and for convenience; they are not controlling, and do not change the legal effect of the paper. The words are the controlling portion, and the figures constitute no material part of the instrument. Many authorities so hold. 2 Cyc. 196, 211, and cases cited; Schryver v.

Hawkes, 22 Ohio [St.] 808. We are cited to only one case which holds the contrary—Commonwealth v. Hide, 94 Ky. 517. That case stands alone, unsupported, and we do not think it states the law correctly."

To the same effect as the Lotono Case is that of Willson v. State, 85 Miss. 687, 38 South. 46, the first headnote of which is as follows:

"Under Code 1892, § 1106, defining forgery and confining the crime to instances where any person may be affected, bound, or in any way injured in his person or property, the mere alteration of the figures, following the character '$,' in the upper right-hand corner of a draft, changing '$2.50' to '$12.50,' does not constitute forgery where in the body of the instrument the sum ordered paid was distinctly written 'two and 50/100 dollars,' and this is especially true where the paper upon which the draft was written had distinctly stamped upon its face the words 'ten dollars or less,' since the alteration was of an immaterial part of the instrument and could not injure any one."

While the opinion in the Willson Case is based upon a local statute, the general principles announced therein are applicable to the instant case. In addition to the above the following cases throw light upon the question at issue. In State v. Means, 47 La. Ann. 1535, 18 South. 514, one of the headnotes is as follows:

"The forgery charged, and altering, were not alleged with the required certainty. The extent and character of the altering were not shown; whether the figures (it is alleged) were forged were of a material character, or merely marginal; whether the writing expressed was forged or only the figures."

In the decision Mr. Justice Breaux, speaking for the court, said:

"To constitute a charge of alteration and forgery of an instrument it must be averred that it was altered in a material part. It does not appear with certainty whether the alteration was of a material part. Of course, if the accused feloniously forged and altered the figures '2.75' so as to make them read '29.75' by adding '9' to a material part of the order, he is guilty of forgery; in other words, if there was no writing of the amount, and if the order read, pay '2.75,' and was thus altered, it is forgery. But if the '2.75' was merely marginal, or in character marginal, as relates to a writing of the amount, it was not forgery."

In Lawless v. State, 114 Wis. 189, 89 N. W. 891, it was held that—

"Insertion of the figure '5' before the figure '9' in a check reading 'Pay to [defendant] or order $9—— fifty cents —— Dollars' is a material alteration, constituting a forgery, although the written words remained unchanged and the person cashing the check might by close observation have detected the change and prevented the consummation of the fraud."

In the opinion in that case the Hide Case, supra, is referred to as "a case similar in nearly all its aspects." The difference in the two cases is very marked. In the Lawless Case the number of dollars was not written out in words, but only expressed in figures, while in the Hide Case the amount was expressed in both words and figures.

In People v. Lewinger, 252 Ill. 332, 96 N. E. 837, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 239, it was held that—

"Altering the marginal figures of a check to make them correspond with the amount expressed in written words which are not ambiguous or uncertain is not forgery, as the written words, under section 17 of the Negotiable Instrument Act of 1907, control the amount of the check, and the alteration does not change the legal effect of the instrument."

In discussing that case Mr. Justice Cartwright said:

"The alteration of the figures, therefore, did not change the legal effect of the instrument. That was the law as established before the passage of the Negotiable Instrument Act. Other courts have held that an alteration of marginal figures on a check in which the amount payable is plainly expressed in words is not forgery"—citing the Wilson, Lotono, and Means Cases, supra, and Jackson v. State, 72 Ga. 28.

While the Supreme Court of Wisconsin referred to the cases of Lawless and Hide, supra, as similar cases, the Supreme Court of Illinois said in the Lewinger Case, "We do not regard them as of the same nature." Nor do we. The difference in the two cases is pointed out above. So it appears that the Supreme Court of West Virginia was right when it said in the Lotono Case that the Hide Case "stands alone unsupported."

From the foregoing opinions it appears that before the alteration of a check or draft can be the basis of a prosecution for forgery, the change must be such that it would affect the "legal liability of the parties in an action on the instrument." It is well established that when the amount of a check is expressed both in words and figures, and there is a conflict between the two, the amount stated in words controls. See, in this connection, Bryant v. Georgia Fertilizer & Oil Co., 13 Ga. App. 448, 79 S. E. 236. Applying the above rulings to the facts as alleged in the indictment in the instant case, it follows that the change in the check, upon which the prosecution in the instant case was based, was not material, and therefore the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the indictment.

This error rendered the further proceedings nugatory,
Judgment reversed.

WILLIAMS v. STATE. (No. 10225.)

March 7, 1919.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — §1152(2)—JURY — §90— RELATIONSHIP — QUALIFICATION — QUESTION FOR COURT.

The fact that a juror is related within the prohibited degree to a witness for the state in a criminal prosecution does not render him incompetent to serve as a juror upon the trial of the case. Atkinson v. State, 112 Ga. 411, 37 S. E. 747 (1); Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Mead, 22 Ga. App. 70, 95 S. E. 476 (1); 18 R. C. L. 259, § 77.

(a) The contention of the accused, as set forth in his motion for a new trial, was that the witness, who was related to one of the jurors, was the "prosecuting witness," and "to all intents and purposes was in fact the prosecutor in said case." Even if this contention were supported by the affidavits submitted, and even if the proof of this contention were sufficient in law to establish the disqualification of the juror, yet, as the evidence submitted by the movant was met by a countershowing by the state, the judge was the trier of this issue, and it does not appear that he abused his discretion in resolving it in favor of the state.

2. RULING ON MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The verdict was authorized by the evidence, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF WEST UNION v. FREEMAN. (No. 73.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES \S 49, 96—PAYEE'S SUIT AGAINST MAKER—DEFENSE—ACCOMMODATION.

In a suit by the payee of a negotiable note against the maker, the latter may defend by showing that it was made for the payee's accommodation and without consideration.

2. BILLS AND NOTES \S 473—ACTION AGAINST MAKER—DEFENSE—ACCOMMODATION—SPECIAL PLEA.

In an action of assumpsit by the payee against the maker of a note, the latter may file a special plea setting up facts showing that the note was made for the payee's accommodation and was without consideration, even though such matters are provable under the general issue which he has also pleaded.

Questions Certified from Circuit Court, Doddridge County.

Action of assumpsit by the First National Bank of West Union against W. W. Freeman. There was an order striking out a special plea and question certified. Order striking out plea reversed, and cause remanded.

J. Ramsey, of West Union, for plaintiff.

Law & McCue, of Clarksburg, for defendant.

WILLIAMS, J. The question certified is whether it was error to strike out defendant's special plea, which the court had previously permitted him to file, in this action of assumpsit on a promissory note made by him payable to plaintiff, a national bank. Defendant pleaded the general issue and also filed a special plea, which on motion of plaintiff the court later struck out. The special plea avers, in substance, that defendant was a stockholder and director of the plaintiff bank when the note was executed; that, on making an examination into the financial condition of the bank, the Comptroller of Currency discovered that it had been carrying numerous notes and evidences of debt against certain persons, named in the plea, aggregating $23,068.74, which he refused to permit it longer to carry as assets, and took temporary control of the bank, requiring it to replenish its assets to the extent of said $23,068.74; that, at the same time, a number of suits were instituted against certain ones of the bank's debtors; that it would require some time to collect the money due from them, but that it was necessary to replenish the bank's assets, pending those suits, to prevent its being placed in the hands of a receiver, and rather than raise the money by assessing its stockholders, the bank, through its officers, attorneys, and agents, solicited certain of its friends, among them the defendant, to execute to it their several individual, accommodation notes in order to enable it to supply the necessary asset; that on the representations by the bank's agents that the notes and accounts sued on were good and collectable and as fast as they could be collected the proceeds therefrom would be applied to the payment of said accommodation notes, until they should be fully paid, defendant executed his note, originally for $2,456.40 payable to said bank in six months, which, together with other notes of like character, executed by others for the same purpose in varying amounts, made up the deficit of $23,068.74, satisfied the requirements of the Comptroller of Currency and enabled the bank to continue in business; that there was no consideration whatever for said note, but that it was executed solely for the bank's accommodation and for the reasons stated; that, as the bank realized on said suits, the money was applied on said accommodation notes, and defendant's note was renewed from time to time until all the money collectable from the source named had been realized, leaving the defendant's renewal note, now sued on for the sum of $1,061 wholly unpaid; that at no time when defendant renewed his note was he requested to pay nor did he pay discount, and when he was notified that no more money could be collected by means of the aforesaid suits he refused to pay said note or any part of it, wherefore he prays judgment, etc..

[1, 2] This plea sets up a good defense. The rights of the bank's creditors do not appear to be involved. The note is still in the hands of the payee who brings the suit, and it is a well-settled principle that, as long as a negotiable note remains in the payee's hands, want of consideration may be shown. The plea avers the note was made solely for the accommodation of the bank which is the plaintiff and payee, and, if this fact be proven, it will defeat the action. 3 R. C. L., Bills and Notes, § 336; and Daniel's on Neg. Inst. (6th Ed.) § 189.

"The party for whose benefit accommodation paper has been made acquires no rights against the accommodation party who may set up the want of consideration as a defense to an action by the accommodated party, since as between them there is no consideration, a fact which is always a defense to a suit on negotiable paper between the immediate parties." 8 C. J. 259.

The text is supported by a mass of decisions. The following decisions are in point: Lyons v. Westwater (C. C.) 173 Fed. 111; Peterson v. Tillinghast, 192 Fed. 287, 112 C. C. A. 545; Murphy v. Keyes, 39 N. Y.

Super. Ct. 18; Shuey v. Holmes, 20 Wash. 13, 54 Pac. 540; Second National Bank v. Howe, 40 Minn. 390, 42 N. W. 200, 12 Am. St. Rep. 744; and Neal v. Wilson, 213 Mass. 336, 100 N. E. 544.

"The fact that notes given to a bank without consideration are given for the purpose of increasing the apparent assets of the bank does not deprive the maker of the defense of want of consideration as between himself and the bank." Chicago Title & Trust Co. v. Brady, 165 Mo. 197, 65 S. W. 303; Moore v. Maddock, 33 Mo. 575; and Williams v. Hasshagen, 166 Cal. 386, 137 Pac. 9.

It is permissible, in an action between the original parties to a note, to show the relation between them, or that the note was executed purely for the payee's accommodation. Brown v. Smedley, 136 Mich. 65, 98 N. W. 856; Bank v. Kelly, 30 N. D. 84, 152 N. W. 125, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 1044; and Haupt v. Vint, 68 W. Va. 657, 70 S. E. 702, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 518, and authorities there cited.

No reason is assigned for striking out defendant's plea. The court may have rejected it because it thought it set up no defense to the action, or because it thought the defense set up by the special plea was provable under the general issue. If the case were before us on writ of error to a final judgment, the rejection of the plea would not alone be cause for reversal, because the matters averred are clearly provable under the general issue. But notwithstanding they are so provable, defendant had a right, if he so desired, to plead them specially; they being in the nature of a confession and avoidance of the right of action. 1 Chitty on Pleading (11th Amer. Ed.) 480; and Merchants' & Mechanics' Bank v. Evans, 9 W. Va. 373.

Our conclusion is to reverse the order striking out the special plea and remand the cause.

SAYRE v. KUNST. (No. 3609.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 25, 1919.)

1. EXECUTION ⚡158(2), 185—CLAIM—BOND—SUSPENSION OF SALE—POSSESSION.

If where a sheriff, fully indemnified, levies an execution upon and advertises for sale property apparently owned by the judgment debtor, another claims to be the owner thereof, and desires an adjudication of such claim, he must give the bond required by section 4, c. 107, Code 1913 (sec. 4495), to suspend the sale until his title is adjusted in the manner provided by sections 5 and 6 (secs. 4496, 4497), and if he desires possession of the property to remain where it was immediately before the levy, pending the determination of his claim, he must also give the bond required by section 7 to have the property forthcoming on the day and at the place to be appointed for the sale, should his claim thereto be adjudged invalid.

2. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES ⚡121—CLAIM—POSSESSION—LIABILITY FOR LOSS TO EXECUTION CREDITOR.

If, when protected only by the delivery bond of the claimant of property levied on and advertised for sale under an execution for the debt of another, and such bond, though good as a common-law obligation, is invalid as a statutory forthcoming bond, and the execution creditor has given a bond of indemnity against such claim, the levying officer permits the possession of the property to remain where it was immediately before the levy, and it is not produced for sale at the time and place appointed, he must respond in damages to the execution creditor to the extent of the loss thereby sustained by him.

3. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES ⚡121—LIABILITY OF SHERIFF—EXCUSE—ESTOPPEL.

The approval of the bond by the obligees, the execution creditors, before its acceptance by the sheriff, does not operate to excuse the default of the latter or to estop or defeat recovery by the obligees.

4. EXECUTION ⚡207—FORTHCOMING BOND—LIABILITY OF OBLIGORS.

The obligors in such a bond, having failed to produce the property at the time and place appointed, or in lieu thereof to pay the judgment upon which the execution issued, are liable to the obligees therein for breach of its obligation.

5. SUBROGATION ⚡10(2) — FORTHCOMING BOND—SHERIFF'S SUBROGATION TO RIGHT OF EXECUTION CREDITOR.

And in such case the officer is entitled to be subrogated to the right of the execution creditors to an action on such delivery bond.

6. EXECUTION ⚡207—SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES ⚡135 — FORTHCOMING BOND—BREACH—LIABILITY.

Though the execution creditors have a valid cause of action against either the sheriff or the obligors in the bond, as between the two the latter are the parties ultimately liable; and where the execution creditors have elected to proceed against the former, it is proper for him to invoke the broad power of a court of equity to make the latter parties defendant, and, if found liable, to shift the burden of the liability upon them, thus making it possible to adjudicate in one suit conflicting claims which, if permitted to proceed at law, will require two actions for final settlement.

7. EQUITY ⚡46—JURISDICTION—REMEDY AT LAW.

To deny equity jurisdiction because of a remedy at law, the legal remedy must be adequate to the demands of the particular case, and as full, complete, and efficacious as that given in equity, and must not leave open for future litigation matters really and substantially involved.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Taylor County.

Suit for injunction by Benjamin F. Sayre against John H. Kunst, executor, etc. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

John L. Hechmer, of Grafton, for appellant.

Warder & Robinson, of Grafton, for appellee.

LYNCH, J. The decree complained of by defendants below, appellants here, made perpetual a preliminary injunction theretofore awarded enjoining the further prosecution of two actions at law instituted by them, one against Benjamin F. Sayre, sheriff of Taylor county, for the four-year term beginning January 1, 1901, the other against him and the sureties on his official bond, both apparently being for the same cause of action.

In the year 1891, John H. Kunst, executor of G. H. A. Kunst, together with Adolphus Armstrong, then living, sued in their names for the use of John H. Kunst, administrator of Sara Kunst, and recovered against the defendant, James W. Findley, a judgment of nearly $1,100, including interest and costs. They caused an execution to be issued on the judgment in 1904, and placed the writ in the hands of Sayre for levy upon the property of the judgment debtor. This he did, or attempted to do, upon the supposition that the property levied on was subject to sale under the writ, the itemized aggregate valuation being $2,279. Immediately upon being informed of the levy, Irvin Findley, a son of the judgment debtor, denied the ownership of his father, who apparently remained silent in respect thereof, and claimed title in himself; and Sayre, when advised of the claim, demanded an indemnifying bond of Kunst and his co-plaintiff, the judgment creditors, and they furnished the requisite indemnity. Thereupon the claimant and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, surety, entered into and delivered to Sayre a bond binding them to pay the obligees therein, the judgment creditors, an amount double the estimated value of the property, or have it forthcoming for sale at the time and place appointed by the sheriff for that purpose, namely, at the courthouse of Taylor county, October 3, 1904. Before accepting the bond, Sayre alleges he submitted it to the obligees for their inspection and approval or rejection, and also to his legal adviser, and that they approved it before its acceptance by him; whereupon, and with their knowledge and acquiescence, he permitted the property to remain in the possession and control of the claimant on the premises, where it was when found and levied on, whether the proprietor and owner of the premises was the father or the son, their residence being the same.

The judgment and no part of it was paid by James W. Findley or the obligors named in the instrument purporting to be a statutory forthcoming bond, nor was the property or any part of it produced by them or any of them at the time and place mentioned, or a bond given to suspend the sale as authorized by chapter 107 of the Code (secs. 4492-4499). Nor did the claimant, or any other person for him, apply to the circuit court of the county, or the judge thereof in vacation, for the order or orders specified in sections 5 and 6 of that chapter (secs. 4496, 4497), the only orderly and proper procedure provided for where the creditor has given the officer a bond of indemnity. The property not being forthcoming, but theretofore dissipated, and then unavailable in satisfaction of the execution lien, the judgment creditors brought the actions the prosecution of which Sayre asked the court to enjoin, and which the decree complained of did enjoin.

The first movement initiated by the judgment creditors after this situation arose, and before the actions were brought, was a notice of a motion and a motion granted for the award of execution upon the instrument executed by Irvin Findley and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, treating it as a statutory forthcoming bond. To the judgment awarding execution the obligors obtained a writ of error from this court, assigning as grounds therefor rulings upon the sufficiency of the notice and service thereof, a non est factum plea, the evidence, and the adjudging the bond to be valid as a statutory forthcoming bond. What is now important to note, the decision reported in Kunst v. Findley, 73 W. Va. 152, 80 S. E. 136, adjudged the bond to be irregular and insufficient to warrant the award of execution thereon as the statute permits to be done in case of a bond for the forthcoming of property levied on to satisfy a debt or judgment, and, if good at all, to be good only as a common-law bond.

Then followed the two actions at law, the declaration in the one against Sayre as the sole defendant only appearing in the record. It contains three counts, all of which are alike except in certain particulars, and, so far as necessary, set forth the facts heretofore detailed. They differ in this, that the first count, after rectifying the execution and delivery of the indemnifying bond, charges the neglect and failure of Sayre to take from Irvin Findley a proper forthcoming bond, and in suffering him to retain possession of the property levied on without their consent and against their will, contrary to his duty in that regard; the second, a wrongful intent on the part of Sayre to deprive them of the benefit of the levy and of the money then due on the judgment, and that he, without their license or authority, suffered and permitted Irvin Findley to retain possession of the property at his risk until the day of sale, upon giving bond to have it forthcoming at the time and place appointed therefor; and the third, the surrender of the goods and chattels levied on into the possession of Irvin Findley without payment of the judgment, and without a sale of the property, and not afterwards resuming possession thereof, whereby the benefit of the lien, and the payment of the judgment out of the proceeds thereof when sold, was wholly lost to plaintiffs.

There is no question raised as to the character, effect, or sufficiency of the Findley bond as a common-law obligation, or as to the omission of any necessary party or parties, or as to the correctness of the recitals of the bill. The bill is unchallenged except by demurrer for want of equity. Other grounds assigned for reversal are the action of the court in directing an issue to be tried by a jury, first as to whether the property levied on then was the property of the claimant, and, second, whether Kunst and Armstrong approved and accepted the bond as formally sufficient and the surety as adequate. The jury affirmatively answered both questions, but upon most meager proof, and doubtfully questionable both as to competency and sufficiency.

[8, 7] There can be no reasonable doubt of the right of the plaintiff to maintain the bill or as to the relief he prays. The matters involved are intricate, and cover many years of procrastination and controversy, for the adjudication and settlement of which equity has facilities and powers not possessed by or available to courts of law, whose rules of procedure are more rigid and inflexible. Besides, the latter cannot in any form of action, or by any adjudication, settle and determine once and for all the matters in issue. The plaintiff invokes the court to grant him relief by enforcing for his benefit and protection the bond of Findley, should the court adjudge plaintiff to be liable to defendants or any of them for the defaults as regards the execution on the judgment. If entitled to this relief, there is no equally expeditious proceeding at law by which he could obtain it. These and other reasons well recognized as furnishing ample justification for resort to equity warrant the ruling on the demurrer to the bill. "To deny equity jurisdiction because of a remedy at law, the legal remedy must be adequate to the demands of the particular case, and as full, complete, and efficacious as that given in equity and must not leave open for future litigation matters really and substantially involved." Warren v. Boggs, 97 S. E. 589, point 7, Syl.

ship of the property, unfortunately for the claimant, if it was his, came too late, if the provisions of the statute for his protection are not to be disregarded altogether. Resort to the remedy thereby prescribed must, to avail, necessarily be prompt. Instead of being diligent, he was negligent, and delayed action until resort to the remedies once available has now become impossible. His laches cannot now be excused, and he does not offer any explanation or justification for the delay. Apparently he relied with confidence upon the protection which he evidently assumed the forthcoming or delivery bond furnished him. Such a bond, unaccompanied by a preliminary bond to suspend or defer the sale until his claim was adjusted, as provided by section 4, c. 107, Code (sec. 4495), could not and did not warrant the act of the officer in permitting the property to remain in his possession. He should have required the claimant to give, or the latter voluntarily should have given, the bond allowed by section 4, and thus have suspended the sale until the claim of ownership had been determined by proceedings instituted in the circuit court, as provided by sections 5 and 6. August v. Gilmer, 53 W. Va. 65, 73, 44 S. E. 143. That is the mode authorized by the statute for that purpose. Generally it is the debtor who gives a forthcoming bond. The claimant is required by statute to give a suspending bond, though ordinarily after furnishing the latter he must, if he desire the property to remain in such possession as it was immediately before the levy, also give bond for its delivery if upon the trial his right thereto is determined against him. Section 7, c. 107, Code (sec. 4498); Kunst v. Findley, 73 W. Va. 152, 154, 80 S. E. 136.

Without the suspending bond the duty of the officer was to exercise the power to convert the property into liquid assets, and discharge the debt represented by the judgment, regardless of the alleged hostile title. The purpose of such bond is to indemnify the officer and the execution creditors against the damages either or both might sustain in consequence of the suspension of the sale, while the officer is further protected by the indemnifying bond which he may demand of the latter to protect him in carrying the execution into effect. Not having brought himself within the provisions of the statute by failing to give both bonds according to the provisions of sections 4 and 7, the claimant cannot, in the face of such prolonged delay, be permitted to invoke to his relief the remedy conditionally allowed by the statute. Besides, by not giving them, he irrevocably bound himself by the one he did give to do at the proper time one of two things as he might elect, namely, to pay the amount due on the execution, or, in lieu of payment in money, to produce the property, and permit it to be sold, and the proceeds applied according to the command of the writ.

As the property has ceased to exist or has become valueless by lapse of the intervening years, performance of the second alternative is now impossible, and the obligors cannot avoid liability for the performance of the first, no valid defense being interposed, and the bill being taken for confessed against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, duly served with process to answer. This is the only logical conclusion to be drawn from that obligation, considered and construed in the light of the statute. It determines the rights of the parties as regards their liability and the ownership of the property and to each other, so that the consequential damages must finally fall where responsibility first arose; that is, upon the party primarily at fault, or whose neglect furnished the occasion for the loss that has occurred. The first act of omission or neglect is chargeable in the first instance to the obligors in the delivery bond, and only secondarily to Sayre. If the former do not for any legitimate or sound reason respond favorably to their conditional undertaking, the latter must account for his dereliction to the extent the obligees have suffered injury therefrom. Lyon v. Horner, 32 W. Va. 432, 9 S. E. 875; Smith v. Hightower, 80 Ga. 669, 7 S. E. 165.

[3-5] Armstrong's approval of the bond given before its acceptance by the plaintiff, conceding the fact to be as alleged, does not operate as an estoppel or defeat recovery by the obligees, or excuse the default of Sayre evidenced by his unauthorized act in permitting the property to be lost, and by his failure to retake it and enforce against it the lien of the execution, in the absence of a suspending bond, without regard to the claim of adverse ownership. Though the bond given by him and his co-obligor is not such an instrument as the statute permits for the benefit of a debtor who desires to retain possession of property or pay the debt in the meantime, there is not, as we have said, any question raised as to its sufficiency and legality as a common-law obligation. Adler v. Green, 18 W. Va. 201; Hall v. Wadsworth, 35 W. Va. 375, 14 S. E. 4; Kunst v. Sayre, 73 W. Va. 152, 80 S. E. 136; Waterman v.

Frank, 21 Mo. 108; Wilson v. White, 82 Ark. 407, 102 S. W. 201, 12 Ann. Cas. 378. There is a manifest difference between the two—a difference recognized in the former decision. The first, construed in connection with the judgment and execution, has, when the property is not delivered as agreed, and the bond is filed in the office of the clerk who issued the writ, the force and effect of a new judgment against the obligors, and the court may, upon proper notice and motion, award execution leviable upon their property. Sections 3 and 4, c. 142, Code (secs. 5142, 5143): Cabell v. Given, 30 W. Va. 760, 5 S. E. 442; Kunst v. Sayre, supra; Walker v. Gamble, 74 W. Va. 706, 82 S. E. 1014. But no such speedy result is possible or allowable upon the second; none of any kind other than by the usual formal action prosecuted by the obligees to final judgment against the obligors.

It follows, therefore, that the sheriff was guilty of neglect of duty in accepting from the claimant what purported to be a statutory forthcoming bond, when only a suspending bond was authorized, and in not requiring the production of the property for sale at the time and place appointed. It further appears that Findley has breached his forthcoming bond, assuming it to be valid as a common-law obligation, in not producing the property at the time and place provided, or paying the judgment in lieu thereof. Kunst, therefore, has a valid cause of action against each of them, but, having elected to proceed against the sheriff, it is proper for the latter to invoke the broad powers of a court of equity to make Findley and his surety parties defendant, and, if found liable, to shift the burden thereof upon them as the parties ultimately liable. Thus it is possible to adjudicate in one suit conflicting claims which, if permitted to proceed at law, will require two actions for final settlement, the one by Kunst against the sheriff, the other by the sheriff against the obligors in the forthcoming bond.

Therefore we are of opinion that the court correctly overruled the demurrer, but erred in granting the relief it did grant, for which reason we reverse the decree and remand the cause.

PAXTON LUMBER CO., Inc., v. PANTHER COAL CO. (No. 3708.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 11, 1919. Rehearing Denied
March 26, 1919.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS §62(1) — COAL MINING LEASE—"RIGHT TO USE TIMBER STANDING OR BEING ON SAID LAND."

A coal mining lease conferring "the right to use the timber standing or being on said land" will be construed to grant the lessee the right to use the timber only for mining purposes, not to authorize a severance and sale or other uses characteristic of an unqualified ownership, unless the authority is conferred in express terms, or in terms so unmistakable as to exclude reasonable doubt as to the lessor's intention.

2. LOGS AND LOGGING §34(1) — QUANTITY OF LUMBER—"TO BE CUT FROM THE MANUFACTURER'S TIMBER HOLDINGS."

Though not every impossibility of full performance of a contract of sale will excuse the vendor, yet, where such contract specifies the quantity of lumber sold as lumber "to be cut from the manufacturer's timber holdings," the contract is to be construed with reference to such qualifying phrase, and not as importing an absolute quantity irrespective of the designated source from which it is to be obtained; and if it shall thereafter appear impossible to obtain the quantity specified from the manufacturer's holdings because of insufficiency of timber thereon to produce the quantity, and neither party was aware of the insufficiency when they entered into the contract, the impossibility necessarily implies an element of mistake such as excuses performance beyond the timber capacity of the land.

3. SALES §71(5)—SALE OF TIMBER—QUANTITY—WARRANTY OR ESTIMATE.

Where a contract purports to sell goods identified by reference to independent circumstances, such as lumber to be cut from the manufacturer's timber holdings, with the qualification "about" or words of like import as to the quantity named, the contract applies to the specific timber thereon, and the specification of the quantity is not regarded as a warranty, but only as an estimate of the probable amount, in reference to which good faith is all that is required of the party making it.

4. SALES §71(3) — QUANTITY OF GOODS—"ABOUT."

But where no such independent circumstances are referred to, and the engagement is to furnish goods of a certain quality or character to a certain amount, the quantity specified is material and governs the contract; the addition of the qualifying words "about" and the like, operating only as a provision against accidental variations arising from slight and unimportant excesses or deficiencies in number, measure, or weight.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, About.]

5. SALES §36—IMPOSSIBILITY OF PERFORMANCE—MUTUAL MISTAKE—EXCUSE.

Frequently the impossibility of performing a contract, and mutual mistake excusing performance, when interposed in defense of an action thereon, have somewhat similar characteristics; and where the impossibility is due to a circumstance existing at the time of the bargain, and relating to the subject-matter thereof, without the knowledge of either party, it partakes of the nature of a mutual mistake, and excuses performance to the extent the subject-matter had no potential existence.

6. SALES §36 — PERFORMANCE—EXISTENCE OF SUBJECT-MATTER.

If the parties to a contract enter into it under the belief that the subject-matter is in existence, and in effect condition their contract thereon, no contract exists if the subject-matter is not then in existence, and, if it exists in part only, performance after exhaustion of such part will be excused.

7. PLEADING §367(6)—PARTICULAR STATEMENT OF DEFENSE—MOTION—STATUTE.

Section 63, c. 125 (sec. 4817), Code 1918, authorizing a plaintiff to apply for an order requiring defendant to file a more particular statement of his defense, impliedly requires promptness in making the motion.

8. PLEADING §367(6)—PARTICULAR STATEMENT OF DEFENSE—MOTION—STATUTE.

Ordinarily such a motion, made when the case, is called for trial, approximately six months after issue joined upon the appropriate plea, comes too late.

9. JUDGMENT §199(3) — VERDICT — JUDGMENT NON OBSTANTE VEREDICTO.

A judgment non obstante veredicto must be based upon the merits of the case as disclosed by the pleadings, and it cannot properly be invoked to serve the purpose of a motion to set aside the verdict in determining the sufficiency of the evidence.

Error from Circuit Court, McDowell County.

Suit by the Paxton Lumber Company, Incorporated, against the Panther Coal Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Henry Roberts, of Bristol, Va., and Sanders, Crockett & Kee, of Bluefield, for plaintiff in error.

Anderson, Strother, Hughes & Curd, of Welch, for defendant in error.

LYNCH, J. Paxton Lumber Company, Incorporated, a corporation engaged in the purchase and sale of lumber, sued Panther Coal Company, also a corporation, whose principal occupation or business is the production and sale of coal, and incidentally only the manufacture of lumber, in assumption, upon an account filed with the declaration, for the value of timber contracted by defendant to be manufactured and delivered to plaintiff, but which, it is alleged, was neither manufactured nor delivered pursuant to the terms and requirement of the contract; and the Paxton Lumber Company prosecutes this writ to review and reverse the judgment for defendant for $866.51, the balance conceded to be due defendant upon shipments of lumber received and appropriated by plaintiff pursuant to the provisions of the contract.

The contract, dated March 22, 1916, proved and admitted, and alleged to have been breached by defendant June 4, 1917, specifies the quantity, quality, and grades of poplar, oak, chestnut, and basswood to be furnished according to its stipulations, and the prices to be paid for the various grades, and the terms of settlement. The quantity designated is qualified or limited by the word "about"—that is, about 950,000 feet in the aggregate for all kinds and grades of lumber; and the source from which it is to be derived by the phrase, "from the manufacturer's timber holdings," manufacturer being the designation given in the contract to denote the Panther Coal Company. Of the quantity contracted for, not to exceed 150,000 feet were delivered.

The timber which defendant had the lawful right to convert into lumber for its own use in the prosecution of its mining operations was that having a diameter of less than 16 inches, and standing on the tract of 1,500 acres of land in McDowell county, demised, leased, and let to defendant October 4, 1913, by the Sibley Coal & Coke Company, to remove the coal contained therein, and timber of that size could be used by defendant only for mining purposes. Timber over 16 inches in diameter was expressly excepted from the lease, but defendant subsequently purchased part of the timber of that size on the tract from its owners, and that constituted the only timber which defendant had the right to cut for sale to others.

To what extent the Panther Coal Company complied with the requirements of its contract with the Paxton Lumber Company they do not agree, though the quantitative difference does not exceed 40,000 feet, and this disparity is due mainly to a misapprehension as to whether certain lumber, the sale and receipt of which is acknowledged and not disputed, was furnished in fulfillment of the contract, or of a transaction of an independent nature completed between the date of the former and the alleged breach thereof. Though the contract of March 22d calls for no lumber less than $\frac{3}{4}$ inch, except basswood, the corresponding dimension of the controverted quantity was $\frac{1}{4}$ inch, and defendant insists it was taken up and paid for under the first agreement, while plaintiff urges the opposite view. It is doubtful whether basswood was part of the controverted quantity. Whatever may be the truth as regards these counterclaims, there is no need to enter now upon an investigation of their merits, as the verdict of the jury has eliminated them from further consideration, together with plaintiff's right to any recovery whatsoever, unless we shall conclude that for some cause or upon some ground the judgment based upon the verdict should be set aside and a retrial ordered.

The important questions presented for consideration and decision necessitate a further recital of the facts indisputably established and those about which there is some controversy, and when these are ascertained and viewed in the light of the verdict and judgment, both of which stand upon a presumption in favor of their correctness, we must then determine by what law these facts are controlled and governed.

There was not at the date of the contract and at the time of its breach a quantity of timber owned and controlled by defendant sufficient to permit the manufacture of the requisite amount, grades, and quality called for by the contract; not more, indeed, than defendant manufactured and delivered pursuant to its terms, unless the timber of less than 16 inches in diameter, which the Sibley Coal & Coke Company lease permitted defendant to use for mining purposes, could lawfully be devoted to that purpose. The entire 1,500 acres had theretofore virtually been denuded of merchantable trees, or trees out of which merchantable timber demanded by the contract could be manufactured. The evidence introduced before the jury upon this phase of the controversy seems to be without substantial contradiction. It may without hesitation be said to be conclusive, except as to 584 trees, most, if not all, of which we assume were cut, milled, and delivered to plaintiff; for apparently it was out of these trees that the lumber plaintiff received under the contract was obtained. What doubt may be said to exist, if any does exist, has no reasonable foundation or justification, and nothing was offered to show the fact to be otherwise than as stated.

Though this observation may not be wholly inapplicable to the proof of the smaller timber not cut and still remaining on the leased land, its applicability is not significant or important. It may be conceded, as Leckie, defendant's general manager of the coal mining operations on the land, admits, that probably there remain enough of that sort of trees standing on the large boundary to furnish the lumber required to complete the contract, a fact about which he frankly confesses a very limited knowledge, as he employs his time exclusively in the discharge of duties in no wise associated with the manufacture or sale of lumber. But by no lawful right could this timber, although sufficient to meet the requirements of the contract, be applied to the accomplishment of that end. The lease under the authority of which the coal mining operations are conducted sufficiently, though inaptly, denies the right to appropriate it except as authorized by that instrument. Its language is:

"The lessee shall have the right to use the timber standing or being on said land within the following boundaries: (All timber on the right of way of the Norfolk & Western Railway, and all timber over 16 inches in diameter on the Richard Lockhart land, the Adam and A. J. Cline land, and the J. J. Cline land excepted.)"

[1] This being a mining lease, its grant of the right to use the timber must be construed as intending only such use as may be necessary to effectuate the purpose of the demise. The provision is not infrequent, but usual, in coal mining leases. Timber is essential and indispensable in the exploitation of coal properties, and ordinarily a provident and cautious prospective operator endeavors to induce the owner of the superincumbent surface to concede the right to appropriate part of the timber thereon to such uses. Rare are leases of this kind that do not grant such concession. It enters into the consideration agreed to be paid for the main privilege and as incidental to it. The right of appropriation, however, seldom is enlarged into an unqualified ownership, such ownership as may be interpreted to authorize a severance and sale without regard to the generally prescribed limitations upon the right to use for mining purposes, except where the authority is conferred in express terms; and, until the lessee finds it necessary to elect to exercise the right, title to the timber remains vested in the lessor or grantor, in this case in the Sibley Coal & Coke Company or its lessors. Godfrey v. Weyanoke Coal & Coke Co., 97 S. E. 186, 189.

[2, 3] These observations introduce the fundamental or basic legal problem the solution of which must determine the issues involved upon this writ. Tersely stated, the problem resolves itself into this question: May defendant lawfully be compelled, directly or indirectly, to acquire and manufacture timber other than that owned by defendant on its timber holdings, and deliver the product to plaintiff, or suffer the damage consequent upon the failure so to do, notwithstanding the explicit qualifications of the contract?

A preliminary remark, founded upon undisputed and unqualified proof, will tend to enlighten the discussion and assist in its apprehension. It was through F. O. Frizzell, plaintiff's inspector and purchaser of lumber, that the negotiations between the Paxton Lumber Company and Panther Coal Company which resulted in the contract of March 22, 1916, were begun. Prior thereto he was upon the holdings of the defendant coal company, and ascertained and inspected the different kinds of trees standing thereon. With the knowledge thus acquired he took up with William Leckle, general manager of defendant's coal mining operations, and only incidentally the representative of its lumber dealings, the proposal of inducing defendant to manufacture the timber on its "timber holdings" into lumber, and sell the product to his principal; and when Frizzell ascertained through Leckle defendant's attitude toward effecting such a trade, he informed Paxton Lumber Company by letter, evidently specifying the different kinds, quality, and grades of lumber available from such timber. Acting upon the information so acquired, the Paxton Lumber Company prepared and forwarded to Leckle the contract involved. Frizzell, being in the military service of the United States at the time of the trial, was not available as a witness; but it may not improperly be assumed that he possessed the qualification necessary to judge with reasonable accuracy the number and fitness of the trees to meet the requirements contained in the contract. Whether his estimates included the trees under 16 inches in diameter on the tract does not appear. If he did include them, the estimate was not reliable. Counting them, there probably was enough timber on the land to cut the required quantity of lumber, according to some witnesses; for there is some proof of the sufficiency and fitness of the timber on the tract at the time Frizzell examined it, all sizes and grades considered, to produce the lumber contracted for, and the lack of sufficiency if the smaller trees are excluded. Though the Paxton Lumber Company, through its agent Frizzell, may not have had actual knowledge of the nature of defendant's right to use those trees, it did have constructive notice afforded by the recorded Sibley Coal & Coke Company lease, and hence knowledge of the prescriptive limitation.

Finally, what of the legal principles determinative of the question of liability predicated upon these facts? or, what is but another mode of stating the same proposition, what effect must be accorded the word "about" as quantitative description of the lumber sold, and the phrase, "from the manufacturer's timber holdings," as prescriptive of the source from which the timber was to be manufactured as well as of the quantity thereof?

The addition of the qualifying words "about," "more or less," in a contract for the sale and shipment of a quantity of cordwood, says the Supreme Court of the United States in Brawley v. United States, 96 U. S. 168, 171, 24 L. Ed. 622, or of iron rails, as in Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 204, 6 Sup. Ct. 12, 15 (29 L. Ed. 366), is a provision "against accidental variations, arising from slight and unimportant excesses or deficiencies in number, measure, or weight." This, the court says, is the rule of construction when no independent circumstances are referred to, and the engagement is to furnish goods of a certain quality or character to a certain amount, the quantity specified then being material and governing the contract. "About," as used in the contract now examined, might, if unaided by other prescriptive terms or phrases, be susceptible of the same interpretation; that is, as providing only against a small discrepancy in quantity. However, in the federal cases cited, its use in another connection is noted by the court, saying:

"Where a contract is made to sell or furnish certain goods identified by reference to independent circumstances, such as an entire lot deposited in a certain warehouse, or all that may be manufactured by the vendor in a certain establishment, or that may be shipped by his agent or correspondent in certain vessels, and the quantity is named with the qualification of 'about,' or 'more or less,' or words of like import, the contract applies to the specific lot; and the naming of the quantity is not regarded as in the nature of a warranty, but only as an estimate of the probable amount, in reference to which good faith is all that is required of the party making it."

The quotation just cited is applicable to this case, for the use of the qualifying phrase, "to be cut from the manufacturer's timber holdings," limits the contract to the specific timber on defendant's lands. See Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 438, pts. 17 and 18 Syl., overruled in part, though not as to the interpretation of these or similar qualifying words, by Newman v. Kay, 57 W. Va. 98, 110, 49 S. E. 926, 68 L. R. A. 908, 4 Ann. Cas. 39, and also Winton v. McGraw, 60 W. Va. 98, 54 S. E. 506, and Pickens v. Pickens, 72 W. Va. 50, 77 S. E. 365, where certain qualifications are noted with respect to these rules in cases involving deficiency in the acreage of land.

[4, 5] In this connection it is relevant to remark, upon the sufficiency of the proof to warrant the finding of the jury as to the good faith of the defendant in its efforts to comply with its engagements, that in the voluminous correspondence regarding plaintiff's demands for shipments to satisfy its customers, and defendant's endeavors to meet such demands, and his assignment of one cause or another for his failure to do so, the latter in no letter and at no time intimated that delay on its part was due to want of timber on land owned or controlled by it; nor was there such an intimation except and until during the progress of the trial, when this defense was brought for the first time to plaintiff's knowledge. These matters and accompanying circumstances, however, as we have said, were submitted to the judgment and arbitrament of the triers of fact, and their verdict cannot be disturbed unless good cause be shown therefor.

As we have also remarked, the qualifying phrase, "to be cut from the manufacturer's timber holdings," limits the contract to such timber as was on defendant's lands; and, since the amount was only sufficient to yield about one-sixth of the total number of feet contracted for, the questions of impossibility of performance and mistake are at once presented. A pioneer case having some relevancy to the main question in issue is Lord Clifford v. Watts, L. R. 5 C. P. 577. The issue was one of liability on the part of the lessee under a demise of a tract of land for the annual production of merchantable clays of not less than 1,000 tons upon a prescribed rental during a specified term. Afterwards it appeared that the premises contained no such clay, and the lease reserved no minimum rent to be paid in that event. An equitable plea was interposed by defendant that no liability attached because he could not at any time within the term dig 1,000 tons of clay a year, as there was not at the date of the demise or since under the land in question so much clay, wherefore performance was impossible, and the impossibility unknown to him when he made the covenant, and he had no reasonable means of ascertaining that fact. The court sustained the plea upon demurrer, and expressed the opinion upon the construction of the deed that it was the intention of the parties that the covenant to dig not less than 1,000 tons of clay in each year should not take effect unless there was clay to that amount in the lands demised. "The covenant is based upon the assumption that there was clay there. It was impossible to perform it unless there was; and the covenantor did not undertake an impossibility, but merely to dig and remove such clay as should be found in the land, to the extent stipulated for."

Scioto Brick Co. v. Pond, 38 Ohio St. 65, reiterates the same doctrine, the contract in issue being a demise to mine clay of a designated quality, and providing that the lessee shall mine or cause to be mined or pay for not less than 2,000 tons every year during the term, and for the payment of a specified sum monthly as the clay is taken away; and, as appears from headnotes, it was held that if clay of that quality, and in quantity sufficient to justify its being mined, existed, the lessee, on failure to mine at least 2,000 tons per year during the term, was bound to pay therefor at the prescribed rate. But if in fact clay of that quality and quantity could not, by the use of due diligence, be found on the land, no such obligation to pay arose, and that the burden rested upon the defendant to prove these exculpatory facts. As sustaining the same proposition, see Blake v. Lobb's Estate, 110 Mich. 608, 68 N. W. 427, where it was said that as the lease was made for the purpose of exploring for, mining, and taking out merchantable iron ore, the lease presupposed the existence of the ore, and that, on its appearing that no such ore was to be found, the purpose failed, and defendant should not be charged with the consideration. Gribben v. Atkinson, 64 Mich. 651, 31 N. W. 570, where, construing an iron ore or mining lease, no ore being discovered, the court held to the same effect, and in practically the same language, as in the last preceding case.

The legal propositions enunciated by these decisions appear to be sound and worthy of implicit confidence, and go far to meet the situation disclosed by this case, though they may apply only indirectly to its facts, because here there was only a partial, not a total, failure to discover the thing contracted for, and to that extent the contract was performed. They form a solid foundation upon which to base a similar conclusion upon the merits of this case, for we think the same principles are applicable.

Nor is there want of ample authority to uphold defendant's contention. A like demise for mining iron ore, whose covenants the lessees partly performed, is found in Muhlenberg v. Henning, 116 Pa. St. 138, 9 Atl. 144. When sued for a breach thereof the lessees set up the defense, which the court sustained as sufficient to defeat the action, that, although they had operated the mine in a workmanlike and skillful manner for about nine months, yet on account of the nonexistence of sufficient ore, and its inferior and unmerchantable quality, they were unable to continue to mine it at a profit. For the breach thus occasioned the lessors brought an action on the covenant to mine annually 1,500 tons of ore, or in default thereof pay $525. In the opinion the court said:

"We are not to construe the contract to require the lessees to perform an impossible thing. The $525 is not a penalty; it is the price of the ore. The grant was of the ore in place, and, if the subject-matter of the contract fail, the price is not payable. If there was no ore to mine, there could be no royalty to pay. As well might the vendor of meat which proved to be putrid, or of a cargo of corn which had no existence, enforce collection from his vendee. We think the manifest meaning or intention of the parties, as exhibited by the terms of the contract, was that fifteen hundred tons 'of clean and merchantable iron ore' were to be mined in each year, if that quality and quantity of ore were there found, and that the contract by necessary implication must be so construed."

See, also, Boyer v. Fulmer, 176 Pa. St. 282, 35 Atl. 235; Ridgely v. Conewago Iron Co. (C. C.) 53 Fed. 988; Flavelle v. Red Jacket Consolidated Coal & Coke Co., 96 S. E. 600.

Similarly, in a case involving a contract for the sale and delivery of 200 tons of a specific crop of potatoes, to be grown on defendant's land, and he planted sufficient seed to grow more than the quantity specified in an average year, but the crop was attacked by a disease and he was unable to meet his engagement except in part, it was held that the contract must be taken to be subject to the implied condition that the parties shall be excused if before breach performance becomes impossible because of the perishing of the thing without the contractor's default. Howell v. Coupland, L. R. 9 Q. B. 462. As to a like failure of a peach crop sold and in part delivered, but for which the purchaser refused to pay, and sought to defeat the action on the ground of noncompliance with the terms of the contract, see Ontario, etc., Ass'n v. Packing Co., 134 Cal. 21, 66 Pac. 28, 53 L. R. A. 681, 86 Am. St. Rep. 231.

The term "impossible" or "impossibility" of performance employed in these decisions and in some text-books is not wholly appropriate. "Mistake," according to Williston on Sales, § 660, is the more apt word:

"The nature of the defense of impossibility is very similar to that of mistake. Indeed, many cases that are ordinarily classed as cases of impossibility should rather be classed under the heading of mistake. Impossibility of performance may be due either to a circumstance existing at the time the bargain was made, or to supervening circumstances which render performance in the future impossible, though not impossible when the bargain was made. Impossibility of the former sort generally involves mistake."

So, in this case, the impossibility of performance being due to a circumstance existing at the time the bargain was made partakes of the nature of a mistake respecting the existence of the subject-matter of the contract. "If the parties to a contract enter into it under the belief that the subject-matter or consideration is in existence, and in effect condition their contract thereon, no contract exists if the subject-matter is not then in existence." 1 Page on Contracts, § 72; 1 Elliott on Contracts, § 102; 13 C. J. 373; St. Louis, etc., Ry. Co. v. Johnston, 58 Tex. Civ. App. 639, 125 S. W. 61; Allen v. Hammond, 11 Pet. 63, 9 L. Ed. 633.

Though, generally speaking, a promisor is bound to comply with the express terms of his agreement, there appears to be manifestly increasing tendency to afford him relief upon equitable principles, where great hardship necessarily would ensue by forcing him to do what circumstances have rendered practically impossible of performance. This reasonable rule is exemplified or illustrated in the cases cited, and aptly fits the situation appearing in this case, of which plaintiff had, it appears, as much if not more knowledge than defendant had when they entered into the contract. Frizzell, we repeat, inspected the timber, knew its quantity and quality, and what he knew his principal, the plaintiff, knew. He reported separately to each of the contracting parties, gave them the information which served as the basis of the preliminary agreement which later became the written contract, prepared at the instance and direction of the plaintiff without defendant's knowledge of its terms, and without previous consultation with him, and the first intimation the latter had of its contents was obtained upon the receipt of the contract through the mail.

[6] It is not every impossibility of performance that relieves a promisor. But where there is a contract for a specified quantity of lumber qualified by the phrase, "to be cut from the manufacturer's timber holdings," the quantity contracted for will be construed to be limited by the qualifying phrase, thus making it a contract to sell specific lumber to the extent of the quantity named, not an absolute contract to sell that quantity of lumber irrespective of the source; and if it later appears that the manufacturer's holdings do not contain timber in the quantity named, and that the parties were equally ignorant of the true state of facts, the impossibility of obtaining the specified quantity from such lands necessarily implies an element of mistake in entering into the contract, such as entitles to relief from performance beyond the quantity of timber capable of being cut therefrom. It should be noted, however, that if the contract had specified the quantity without any phrase limiting the source of the timber, the absolute duty then would have devolved upon defendant to procure that quantity from any source available.

[7, 8] Plaintiff complains of the refusal of the motion to require defendant to file a more specific statement of the grounds of defense to the action. The statute, section 63, c. 125 (sec. 4817), Code, authorizing such procedure, provides against unreasonable delay, and impliedly requires promptness in making the motion, and proof of good cause therefor. Though the defendant filed the plea appropriate to the action in term time, February 12, 1918, plaintiff did not make the motion until June 12th of the same year, when the court, "after hearing evidence on said motion and maturely considering the same," overruled it and refused to continue the case. Diligence required immediate, not delayed, action in an endeavor to invoke the benefit of the statutory provisions, and seems not to have been exercised by the plaintiff. Norfolk & Western Ry. Co. v. Spears, 110 Va. 110, 65 S. E. 482; Fayette Liquor Co. v. Jones, 75 W. Va. 119, 123, 83 S. E. 726.

[9] Nor is the case presented such as warrants resort to the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. We have had occasion recently to say that such a motion is inappropriate except when justified by the pleadings. It is not proper when based merely upon the lack of sufficient evidence to support the verdict. Holt v. Otis Elevator Co., 78 W. Va. 785, 90 S. E. 333, L. R. A. 1917A, 1194; Shafer v. Security Trust Co., 97 S. E. 290. A request timely made for a new trial is the recognized and only proper procedure in such cases.

It is not necessary to pass seriatim upon the instructions said to be erroneously given, modified, or refused, as it suffices to say that, in so far as they are inconsistent or harmonious with the principles laid down, they were not improperly given or refused.

For the various reasons assigned we are of opinion to affirm the judgment.

PHILADELPHIA CO. OF WEST VIRGINIA v. SHACKELFORD.
(No. 3489.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 28, 1919. Rehearing Denied
March 26, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS §79(1)—OIL AND GAS LEASE—RECOVERY OF DELAY RENTALS—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION.

To warrant recovery in an action of assumpsit by lessee against lessor in a lease for oil and gas, of rentals paid for delay in drilling a well, as for money had and received by the lessor for the use of the plaintiff, there must have been a total failure of consideration for such payments.

2. MINES AND MINERALS §79(1)—RECOVERY OF DELAY RENTALS—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION.

Where such lease for oil and gas calls for 288 acres and the lessor has title only to a one-half undivided interest in the oil under 67 acres thereof, there has not been such total failure of consideration as to warrant recovery of delay rentals paid, in an action by lessee against the lessor as for money had and received.

3. MINES AND MINERALS §79(1)—RECOVERY OF DELAY RENTALS—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION.

Such a lease confers on the lessee all the rights of the lessor as a co-tenant to enter and operate for oil, and if such right be of any substantial value there has not been such total failure of consideration as to warrant recovery by lessee of the rentals paid for delay in drilling a well, in an action against lessor for money had and received.

4. MINES AND MINERALS §73—RECOVERY OF DAMAGES—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION—BREACH OF COVENANT.

To warrant recovery of damages by lessee against lessor in such lease for partial failure of consideration or for breach of covenant, the pleadings must present such an issue or issues; they are not recoverable under the common counts in assumpsit, or upon a special count for money had and received.

5. MINES AND MINERALS §77—RECOVERY—RENTALS OF DELAY—SURRENDER OF LEASE.

Where such a lease confers on the lessee a valuable right in oil, though under only a part of the land leased, the lessee is not entitled after verdict in an action for money had and received, to surrender the lease, and to have the benefits of a new trial, upon the theory of total failure of consideration.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR §238(1)—JUDGMENT §84—ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF PART OF DEBT—ELECTION TO TAKE JUDGMENT.

The plaintiff, on the filing by defendant of his counter affidavit under section 46, chapter 125, of the Code of 1913 (sec. 4800), is then entitled to judgment for the sum thereby acknowledged to be due him, but if he does not then or at any time before trial elect to do so, he cannot when the pleadings do not warrant any recovery by him assign his neglect to take judgment as ground for reversal on writ of error prosecuted by him in this court.

Error to Circuit Court, Gilmer County.

Suit by the Philadelphia Company of West Virginia against John N. Shackelford, with set-off by defendant. Judgment for defendant on a directed verdict, motion for new trial overruled, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

E. A. Brannon, of Weston, and Chas. E. Hogg, of Point Pleasant, for plaintiff in error.

R. F. Kidd and Linn & Craddock, all of Glenville, for defendant in error.

MILLER, P. Plaintiff as assignee of a lease of 288 acres, more or less, for oil and gas, sought by this suit to recover from defendant, the lessor, the several quarterly installments of rent or delay money of $72.00 each paid by it to him, aggregating, according to the bill of particulars filed, $864.00.

The declaration, besides the common counts in assumpsit, also contained a special count. According to the averments of the special count right of action was predicated on the theory of a rescission of the contract and total failure of consideration.

By the lease pleaded and proven the defendant and his wife on November 1, 1909, did "grant, demise, lease and let to said Swisher his successors and assigns, for the sole and only purpose of mining and operating for oil and gas, and of laying pipe lines, and of building tanks, stations and structures thereon to take care of said products," the tract aforesaid, described by reference to the lands of adjoiners, as containing 288 acres more or less. By its further provision the lease was to remain in force for the term of ten years from date and as long thereafter as oil and gas or either of them should be produced from said land by said lessee or his successors or assigns.

And in consideration of said grant the said lessee covenanted and agreed to deliver to the credit of the lessor in the pipe line free of cost one-eighth of all the oil saved and produced from the leased premises, and seventy-five dollars in advance each three months for the gas from each and every gas well drilled the gas from which should be marketed off the premises. And the further covenant of the lease was to complete a well on the premises within three months from the date of the lease or pay at the rate of seventy-two dollars quarterly, in advance, for each additional three months such completion should be delayed.

On appearance by defendant he cravedoyer of the writing sued on, which being read to him and made a part of the record, he interposed his demurrer to the declaration, which was overruled. The only specific ground assigned and relied on was failure of the declaration to allege payment by plaintiff to defendant of the sum of one dollar and surrender of the lease for cancellation, which by the provisions thereof constituted conditions precedent to the right of the lessee to terminate and render said lease null and void, and to absolve him from the payments and liabilities thereafter to accrue thereunder.

On the same day defendant was permitted to file his counter affidavit under the statute, accompanied by a bill of sets-off aggregating $655.49, alleging in his affidavit that there was not as he verily believed due plaintiff from him on account of the demands stated in the declaration a greater sum than $208.51, the difference between the amount of the plaintiff's bill of particulars, $864.00, and the amount of said sets-off, $655.49.

At this stage of the proceedings the parties went to the jury on the issue joined on the defendant's general plea of non assumpsit, and at the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence, the court on motion of defendant struck out all of plaintiff's evidence and directed the jury to find a verdict for defendant, which was done. The plaintiff then moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant it a new trial, on the ground that the court had misdirected the jury, which motion the court took time to consider.

On a subsequent day, but before the court had acted on the motion to set aside the verdict, plaintiff brought into court its written surrender of said lease together with an affidavit showing payment to defendant by plaintiff of the sum of one dollar as the consideration for the surrender of said lease, and thereupon renewed its motion to set aside the verdict and for a new trial, the following grounds being assigned: First, that the evidence was sufficient to show plaintiff's right to recover in the action; Second, that the lease at the institution of this suit was without value, and that plaintiff received nothing in the form of money or property from defendant prior to the institution of his suit, wherefore a surrender thereof was not a condition precedent to his right of action; Third, that the institution of the suit, per se, operated as a rescission of the lease, no formal notice of which was necessary in order to maintain the suit; Fourth, that the surrender of the lease and payment of one dollar by the plaintiff to the defendant as a consideration for the surrender, after verdict, in a case of this kind satisfies all the requirements of the law; Fifth, because the court erred in not permitting the witness Gates to show that he had examined the title and found that the lessors had no title to the premises described in the lease, whereupon plaintiff ceased and refused to pay further rental; Sixth, because of the exclusion of certain oral evidence as shown by the record of the official stenographer who took the testimony in the case; Seventh, on the further ground that it would be unjust and inequitable not to set aside the verdict and award plaintiff a new trial, after its surrender of said lease, which would operate as a great hardship, in that the plaintiff might be precluded and barred from maintaining another action to recover back the rentals sued for in this action, should the court decline to award a new trial.

This motion was overruled, and the judgment now under review was that the plaintiff take nothing by its declaration and that defendant go hence without day, and that plaintiff do pay him his costs about his defense in this behalf expended. And plaintiff took exceptions thereto, and on its request the court certified the evidence and its rulings on the trial as a part of the record.

On this hearing an additional ground is assigned for setting aside the verdict and as showing error on the judgment, namely, that as defendant in the counter affidavit admitted liability to plaintiff on the demands stated in the declaration, of $208.51, the court should at the least have directed a verdict or entered up judgment for plaintiff for that sum. We observe, however, that plaintiff did not elect on the filing of said affidavit, or before or after verdict, to take judgment for the amount so admitted or move the court for judgment therefor, and we must assume it had some reason therefor not clearly apparent from the record.

[1] The special count of the declaration alleges want of any right or title in the lessors at the time of the lease, or prior or subsequent thereto, in the tract of 288 acres or any part thereof, or to the oil or gas thereunder, or under any part thereof, and avers the non existence of any such tract so far as any right or title thereto of the defendants is concerned, and also avers the inability of the lessors or either of them at any time to deliver possession of said tract to plaintiff for the purposes of said lease, wherefore they rendered no consideration for the rentals paid to and received by them from plaintiff.

These averments show clearly that the basis of recovery laid and relied on in the pleadings was want of any title in the lessors and total failure of consideration for the rentals paid and sought to be recovered. It is conceded that to warrant recovery in such cases, for money had and received, there must have been total failure of consideration, or after eviction by a third person, for mesne profits for the period for which rents have been paid. Gaffney v. Stowers, 73 W. Va. 420, 424, 80 S. E. 501, and authorities there cited; 1 Chitty on Pleading (11th Amer. Ed.) 355.

[2] Plaintiff's evidence on the trial did not show entire lack of title in the lessors to any land or oil right within the boundaries described in the lease. On the contrary the evidence showed title by reservation in a deed from defendant and his wife to one W. E. Donlan, dated September 29, 1898, for a tract of 67 acres, of an undivided half of all the oil under the land thereby conveyed, and which land plaintiff's evidence locates within the boundaries described in the lease. There was no evidence of eviction or possession by paramount title by a third person amounting to eviction of plaintiff from the 67 acres. So that unless according to the contentions of plaintiff's counsel the lease conferred upon the lessee no right and title to the oil so reserved in said deed, it cannot be said that there was total failure of consideration for the monies paid and sought to be recovered.

[3-5] Certainly the lease was valid and binding between the parties and operated to transfer to the lessee all the rights of a co-tenant to enter in conjunction with all the other co-tenants of the oil, if not of the gas, and drill and produce oil. Freeman v. Egnor, 72 W. Va. 830, 79 S. E. 824. There is no evidence that this right was of such a small or trifling value as to amount to no consideration for the rentals paid, and we take judicial notice that such a right even in so small a tract as 67 acres is often worth thousands of dollars, sufficient to warrant payment of the rents required to keep the lease in full force.

However, a very elaborate and ingenuous argument is presented by learned counsel for plaintiff in support of the proposition that there was total failure of consideration shown. They take the position that as the main object of the lease was operation, and it undertook to grant, demise, lease and let to the lessee said 288 acres for the sole and only purpose of mining and operating for oil and gas, there was an implied covenant of good title and for peaceable and quiet enjoyment, and a mere co-tenant of the oil, not of the gas, under the 67 acres, could not enter and operate unrestrained and unhindered by others with rights as co-tenants, wherefore there was total failure of consideration for the thing which the lease undertook to grant. This upon the principles enunciated in Hall v. Vernon, 47 W. Va. 300, 301, 34 S. E. 764, 81 Am. St. Rep. 791. But if it be true that the lease did confer on the lessee a valuable right as co-tenant in the oil under the 67 acres, the argument is of course wanting of a sufficient prop to support it. And it seems to us it is fully met by the reasoning of judge Poffenbarger in Gaffney v. Stowers, supra, 73 W. Va. at page 425, 80 S. E. at page 503, where he says in reply to a similar argument based on the defects of title involved in that case:

"Clearly, therefore, having this right from the lessor, they were in a position to deal on advantageous terms with any adverse claim set up under the exception, and could no doubt have acquired it on much more favorable terms than would otherwise have been available. They did not contemplate immediate possession under the lease. Like all other oil and gas leases, it was taken for purposes more or less speculative, and for these purposes the lessees had the benefit of it. So clearly there was not an entire failure of consideration and recovery cannot be had otherwise than upon a special count."

But should there have been a recovery under the pleadings for partial failure of consideration? In the Gaffney-Stowers Case, supra, the special count was regarded sufficient as one for the breach of covenant, and for partial failure of consideration. But we have no count in this case other than for total failure of consideration, and no evidence in the case justifying recovery on any other theory. For anything that appears in the record plaintiff may have had knowledge from the beginning of the defect of title or want of title of the defendant to the land covered by the lease and yet have been willing on account of such rights as it conferred to the oil and gas under the 67 acres, to retain the lease, and pay the rentals. If so he could not retain the lease and recover the rentals paid, for as said in the case last cited voluntary payment of money with knowledge of all the facts is never recoverable.

The next inquiry is, was the plaintiff, after verdict, on showing payment of the one dollar and surrender of the lease, entitled to a new trial? We think not. At the time the suit was brought the lease was in full force. It had not been surrendered or terminated according to its provisions, and besides, its surrender by its provisions would only operate to excuse payments and liabilities thereafter to accrue, not past liabilities thereunder. At the time the suit was brought the lease had been in force nearly three and a half years, and when it was offered for surrender and cancellation, on April 7, 1917, it had been in force over seven years. Having had the benefits of the lease, such as were conferred, for all these years, rents paid could not be recovered back on the theory of a total failure of consideration. And the basis of plaintiff's right of recovery is not strengthened upon the theory of a rescission.

[6] Lastly to be answered is the question of the alleged right of plaintiff to judgment for the sum of $205.51, acknowledged in the counter affidavit of the defendant. According to section 46, chapter 125 (sec. 4800), of the Code, plaintiff had the right on the filing of that affidavit to take judgment for that amount and go to trial for the residue of its claim, but it did not so elect, and as said before, it did not move for judgment for that amount at any time, perhaps for the reason that the evidence did not justify recovery on any issue presented by the pleadings, and plaintiff did not wish to accept a judgment which might thereafter prejudice its rights in a new suit predicated on a different theory or cause of action.

For the foregoing reasons we find no error in the judgment for which it ought to be reversed, and our conclusion is that it ought to be

. Affirmed.

KEYSTONE COAL & COKE CO. v. HALL
(No. 3617.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

3. FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER \Leftrightarrow 12(2)— DEFENSES—VERBAL CONTRACT OF LEASE.

In a suit for unlawful entry and detainer of real estate, a verbal contract of lease purporting to create a life tenancy cannot be set up by the defendant to defeat the action, even though it is shown that the consideration has been fully paid, and the defendant put in possession thereunder. Such a contract is cognizable only in equity.

Error to Circuit Court, McDowell County.

Action of unlawful entry and detainer by the Keystone Coal & Coke Company against J. R. Hall. From a verdict and judgment for plaintiff, on appeal to the circuit court, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Strother, Taylor & Taylor, of Welch, for plaintiff in error.

Anderson, Strother, Hughes & Curd, of Welch, for defendant in error.

RITZ, J. The plaintiff instituted before a justice of the peace an action of unlawful entry and detainer to recover possession of the dwelling house occupied by the defendant and his family, situate on its property. The defendant, until a short time prior to the institution of the suit, was an employé of the plaintiff, and while such employé occupied one of the houses owned by it as part of its mining plant. Shortly before the institution of the suit the defendant was dismissed from plaintiff's services, and demand made upon him to vacate the house. This he refused to do, and this suit was instituted before a justice of the peace, resulting, on appeal to the circuit court, in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

[1] The defense set up is that the defendant's wife holds the premises under a verbal contract with the plaintiff, made in the year 1906, by which it agreed to permit her to occupy the dwelling house so long as she lived, in consideration of the settlement of a suit instituted by her to recover damages for the alleged wrongful death of her husband in the mines of the plaintiff. This defense was rejected by the court below upon the ground, as indicated by the record, that the defendant's wife was an incompetent witness to testify to the contract or agreement she had with the plaintiff company, because of the fact that the officer with whom it was made is now dead. It does not clearly appear that this is the ground upon which the lower court based his ruling, and this contention is not made by plaintiff's counsel in this court. Of course, the fact that the plaintiff's agent, or officer, with whom the alleged contract was made is dead would not, under the provisions of section 23 of chapter 130 of the Code (sec. 4879), make the defendant's wife an incompetent witness. There is no inhibition against such testimony where the transaction is had with a deceased agent. Board of Education v. Harvey, 70 W. Va. 480, 74 S. E. 507; Hains v. Railway Co., 75 W. Va. 613, 84 S. E. 923.

The plaintiff, however, does insist that the defense relied upon cannot avail for the following reasons: First. The evidence of Mrs. Hall offered to show the contract does not establish the same. Second. It does not appear that the agent with whom the contract purported to have been made had any authority to make the same. Third. The alleged contract, not being in writing, is invalid under the statute of frauds.

[2, 3] The facts upon which the defendant relies to defeat recovery are substantially that in the year 1906 his wife was then the wife of a man by the name of Meadows, who was an employé of the plaintiff. Meadows was killed while at work in the mines of the plaintiff, and, contending that his death was caused by plaintiff's wrongful act, his administratrix, who was his widow and the wife of the defendant in this case, instituted a suit to recover damages. While this suit was pending, the superintendent or manager of the plaintiff approached Meadows' widow, and, after a conversation, he agreed with her that she should have the right to occupy the house in which she was then living, and in which Meadows had been living before his death, as long as she liked; that she should treat it as her own, without any obligation to the plaintiff company, in consideration that she dismiss the suit for damages claimed because of the death of her husband; that pursuant to this arrangement she did dismiss the suit, and the plaintiff company never after that time charged her any rent, or attempted to collect any rent, for this house until the year 1916, 10 years thereafter; that about 2 years after the death of her first husband she intermarried with the defendant in this case; that he, before his marriage, in a conversation with the superintendent of the plaintiff company, informed said superintendent that he and Mrs. Meadows were about to be married, and inquired if it would make any difference as to her rights in the house which she occupied, and was informed that it would not. From this the defendant contends that his wife is a life tenant in the property, and that the plaintiff cannot maintain this suit.

Before determining whether or not the testimony proves the contract relied upon by the defendant, or whether the agent making the contract had authority, or whether the statute of frauds bars it, or the nature of the right granted thereunder, assuming it was made, we must determine whether it is such a defense as can be made in this action, giving to it all the force for which the plaintiff contends. Defendant contends, of course, that the proof establishes the contract, that his wife paid all of the consideration for the tenancy and that she was placed in possession of the premises, and has been there ever since, and that, notwithstanding it was not in writing this full performance takes it without the statute of frauds. But can such a contract be set up in defense of an action for unlawful entry and detainer? There is no doubt that the defendant's wife would be entitled to relief in equity if the contract is properly interpreted by her, and the agent making the same had authority, or, if without authority, his action was subsequently ratified, either by acquiescence or by some affirmative act on the part of the company. But, unless this is such a defense as can be made in this suit, it would be manifestly improper for us to construe the evidence offered to support the contract, or to determine its legal effect in advance of these questions being raised in a court having jurisdiction to authoritatively determine them. In an action of ejectment, under sections 20 and 21 of chapter 90 of the Code (secs. 4088, 4089), certain equitable defenses are allowed to be made; that is, a defendant will be allowed to set up and rely upon a written contract of purchase, even though it has not been carried into deed. But these sections have been interpreted, not only by this court, but similar statutory provisions have been construed by the courts of Virginia, to exclude the right of a defendant to set up a purely equitable right not dependent upon a written contract, in defense of an action of ejectment. Garrett v. Oil Co., 66 W. Va. 587, 66 S. E. 741; Davis v. Teays, 3 Grat. (Va.) 283; Suttle v. Railroad Co., 76 Va. 284; Hurley v. Charles, 110 Va. 27, 65 S. E. 468.

It is quite clear from these authorities that in an action of ejectment such a contract as is relied upon to defeat this action would not avail. While the statute does not in express terms give to a defendant the right to set up an executory contract for the purchase of real estate as a defense in an action of unlawful entry and detainer, it has been held, that, where he has such a contract as would be a defense under the statute in an action of ejectment, he could rely thereon in an action of unlawful entry and detainer for the premises. Dobson v. Culpepper, 23 Grat. (Va.) 352; Williamson v. Paxton, 18 Grat. (Va.) 475; Locke v. Frasher's Adm'r, 79 Va. 409; Brumbaugh v. Sterringer, 48 W. Va. 121, 35 S. E. 854. But in the case last above cited it is distinctly held that, to be available as a defense in an action of unlawful entry and detainer, such an executory contract must be in writing; it must be such a contract as the law recognizes, and not one which arises because of the application of equitable principles to a status in which the parties have placed themselves. The statute permitting this equitable defense goes no further than to permit a defense at law under an executory contract in writing. Without the aid of this statute it would take legal title to make a valid defense, and the courts will not permit the defense relied upon here to be effective, unless it comes within the purview of the statute permitting it.

The conclusion is that the defense set up and relied upon in this case is not available at law. Whether or not it can be made effective in a suit in equity will depend upon the interpretation of the contract, its extent, the authority of the agent making it, and the application of the statute of frauds thereto. Having reached the conclusion that this defense, however substantial, is not available in this suit, and that the contract set up and relied upon by the defendant is one cognizable only in a court of equity, we conclude that the action of the circuit court in directing a verdict for the plaintiff must be affirmed.

1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. PARENT AND CHILD — 2(2) — FATHER'S RIGHT TO CUSTODY AND CONTROL.

The father, if living, is the natural guardian of his infant children, and, if not incapacitated or unfit, is entitled to their custody, care, and control in preference to the mother.

2. DIVORCE — 296 — CUSTODY OF CHILDREN — DISCRETION OF COURT.

The discretion given by section 11 of chapter 64 of Code 1913 (sec. 3646), upon decreeing a divorce, or where the parties are living separate and apart, to determine with which of the parents their infant children shall remain, and to provide for their care, custody, and maintenance, should be exercised with due regard to the natural and legal rights of the parents, where nothing has intervened justifying denial of such parental rights.

3. DIVORCE — 298(2) — CUSTODY OF CHILDREN — CIRCUMSTANCES.

When in a suit for divorce the mother is decreed to have deserted and abandoned her husband without just cause, and has thereby broken up their home, and a decree of separation is pronounced against her, unless the father has relinquished his rights to another or is financially or physically unable or morally unfit for the trust, the care, custody, and maintenance of his infant children should be committed to him as their natural guardian.

4. DIVORCE — 297 — CUSTODY OF CHILDREN — AGREEMENT BY FATHER.

Where, pending a suit by husband against wife for divorce, he makes a contract with her for the care, custody, and maintenance of their infant child by a stranger, and thereafter consents to interlocutory orders so disposing of the infant, the court on final decree may, unless the interests of the child require a different disposition, respect such contract and continue the custody and maintenance of the child in accordance therewith.

5. DIVORCE — 303(1) — CUSTODY OF CHILDREN — DISPOSITION.

And, having so disposed of the infant, the court will not afterwards, except upon new facts and conditions shown, exercise its authority and jurisdiction to change the custody of the child.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Monongalia County.

Suit for divorce by George T. Buseman against Bessie P. Buseman and others. Decree of divorce and separation depriving plaintiff of care of his infant child, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. William Cramer, of Morgantown, for appellant.

Cox & Baker, of Morgantown, for appellees.

MILLER, P. Upon a bill by husband against wife, filed July 18, 1913, for a divorce a mensa and for the custody of their infant daughter, based on the alleged desertion of plaintiff by defendant, the decree appealed from, pronounced February 23, 1916, found that defendant had deserted plaintiff in Monongalia County, on April 22, 1912, and it was thereby adjudged and decreed that the plaintiff be granted a divorce from bed and board from defendant, and that they be perpetually separated and protected in their persons and property and that the custody, care, control, education, and training of their infant daughter, Nellie Elizabeth Buseman, be and remain with and that she be thereby committed to George Schaefer and Belle Schaefer, his wife, so long as the court should have the right to direct such custody, care, control, education, and training in all respects in accordance with the terms, conditions and provisions of the decree entered in the cause on March 28, 1914. There is no complaint of the decree of divorce and separation; the appeal is limited to that part of the decree which deprives plaintiff of the custody of his infant child and commits her to the custody and care of the Schaefers, in no way related by blood, but utter strangers to the parents of the child.

The pleadings and proof show wilful desertion of plaintiff by defendant, and we think the decree of separation prayed for must be interpreted as a finding of the essential facts of such wilful desertion or abandonment, without justifiable cause. At the time of her desertion defendant left the state and went to Cleveland, Ohio, taking her child with her, where she placed it in Jones Home for Friendless Children, located in that city, and she obtained employment as a manicurist in a barber shop there; and out of her earnings she says she contributed to that institution one dollar per week for the care and expenses of keeping the child. She remained in Cleveland with the child thus situated until July 11, 1913, when she and plaintiff entered into a written agreement whereby a divorce suit which she had brought in Cuyahoga County, Ohio, was to be dismissed by the court, and whereby it was also agreed that the daughter was to be taken from the children's home and placed by them in the care and custody of said Schaefers in Morgantown, West Virginia, who the agreement recites had agreed to maintain her and bring her up carefully in their own family; but the contract further provided that such custody and control of the child should continue only until the parties thereto should mutually agree otherwise or a different provision should be made by some court of competent jurisdiction on the application of either party, in which case it was stipulated that said agreement should not be held as prejudicing the right of either party to have the custody of said infant; and another provision thereof was that plaintiff would pay said Schaefer for the board and care of the child not exceeding three dollars per week, and in addition furnish her such medical attendance and care as might be necessary, and each party was to have the right and privilege of visiting the child at all reasonable times, satisfactory to said Schaefer.

Pursuant to this agreement, both parties accompanying her, the child was brought to Morgantown and placed by them in the custody of Mr. and Mrs. Schaefer, where she remained but a few days before the institution of this suit by plaintiff on July 18, 1913, and at which time upon the presentation of his bill an injunction was awarded him restraining and inhibiting the defendant, until the further order of the court from interfering with him in the care, custody, control and education of said child, which was by said order also awarded him until the further order of the court.

Subsequently, on October 25, 1913, upon bill and exhibits and the separate answer of the defendant Mrs. Buseman and upon her motion, and with the consent of plaintiff, another interlocutory order was made in the cause whereby and so long as the court should have the right to control the same the custody, care, education and training of said infant was delegated to A. Ed. Lough and Jane B. Lough, his wife, and it was further ordered that said child should not be allowed to be or remain at the separate home of either of the parents, or at the place where either of them should make his or her home while she should remain in the care and custody of said Loughs, the costs of her maintenance and support to be borne and paid by plaintiff as the court might from time to time order, and for a breach of said order he was to be punishable as for a contempt of the court, and there was also a provision in the decree for visiting the child by both parents, and there were other provisions thereof not important in the disposition of the cause.

On March 26, 1914, upon the petition of said Loughs, they were relieved of their trust and so long as the right of the court to control the same continued, the custody, care, control, education and training of said child was thereby again committed to said Schaefer, with similar provisions also to those contained in prior decrees, but with more stringent terms and with greater detail in barring her from the separate homes of her parents, in relation to parental visits, etc., and with provisions also respecting the duty and obligation of plaintiff to bear and pay the expenses of her care and keeping as aforesaid. The defendant consented to this order, but plaintiff being present did not consent thereto. It was this order to which the final decree appealed from referred as more particularly defining in all respects the terms, conditions and provisions respecting the custody, care, control, education and training of said infant.

[1] That the father, if living, and if he be dead, the mother, if not incapacitated or unfit, is the natural guardian of their infant children, and entitled to their custody, care, and control, is well settled law in this state, if not in most of the states of the Union. It was so at common law, and while the rigor of the ancient rule has been somewhat relaxed, and modified by statute, as well as by judicial decisions, depending on the interest of the child or children, the rule nevertheless prevails, and is to be applied unless for good cause shown in each particular case a different provision should be made. Our decisions from the beginning so holding, and controlling the disposition of the case at bar, are: Rust v. Vanvacter, 9 W. Va. 600; State v. Reuff, 29 W. Va. 751, 2 S. E. 801, 6 Am. St. Rep. 676; Green v. Campbell, 35 W. Va. 698, 14 S. E. 212, 29 Am. St. Rep. 843; Cunningham v. Barnes, 37 W. Va. 746, 17 S. E. 308, 38 Am. St. Rep. 57; Carliens v. Carliens, 50 W. Va. 113, 40 S. E. 335, 55 L. R. A. 930; Dawson v. Dawson, 57 W. Va. 520, 50 S. E. 613, 110 Am. St. Rep. 800.

[2] Our statute, section 11, c. 64 of the Code (sec. 3646), relating to divorce, provides, among other things, that upon decreeing a divorce, whether from the bonds of matrimony or from bed and board, the court may make such further decree as it shall deem expedient, concerning the estate and maintenance of the parties, or either of them, and the care, custody and maintenance of the minor children, and may determine with which of the parents the children, or any of them, may remain; and also may from time to time afterwards, upon the petition of either of the parties, revise or alter such decree concerning the care, custody, and maintenance of the children, and make a new decree concerning the same as the circumstances of the parents and the benefit of the children may require; and whether divorce be granted or not, if the parties be living separate and apart from each other, the court is given power thereby to make such order or decree concerning the care, custody and maintenance of the children or either or any of them, and may determine with which of the parents the children, or either or any of them may remain, as to the court may seem proper and the benefit of the child or children may require.

[3-5] The discretion thus conferred upon the court by statute must of course be exercised with due regard to the natural and legal rights of the parents, if nothing has intervened justifying the denial of these rights; the court has no arbitrary authority to take from the parents their natural rights found in nature as well as in law and reason respecting the care, custody, and maintenance of their infant children; but our decisions cited hold with reference to and just regard for these natural and legal rights of parents that they may by voluntary contract with relatives or strangers, acted on by the other contracting party, surrender these rights, or by being or becoming financially, physically or morally unfit for the trust put in the power of the court under the statute to take from them these rights, the interest of the child then becoming the pole of action to guide the court's discretion in the premises.

Although plaintiff at the time of the entry of the decree of March 26, 1914, again giving the care and custody of the infant to the Schaefers withheld his consent thereto, and on final decree pronounced February 26, 1916, he entered his objection to so much thereof as adjudged that the care and custody of the infant should remain with said Schaefers in accordance with the said former decrees, those decrees were both in accord with the contract in writing made between plaintiff and defendant on October 24, 1913. In addition to relinquishing their respective rights to the custody and control of their infant daughter and consenting that she might be disposed of as decreed by the court in each of said decrees, it was further agreed that the parties might with the consent of the court withdraw their pleadings and by amendments eliminate certain charges made therein each against the other, and in the order of October 25, 1913, said amendments were made and certain affidavits filed on behalf of both parties were withdrawn in accordance with said contract.

That the court in the exercise of the discretion given by statute, has the power to respect if not to enforce such agreements, although made with strangers, always however with an eye singled to the interests of the infant child, is well settled by our decisions already referred to. In this case the contract, made under the circumstances disclosed, between plaintiff and defendant, with reference not only to the first but also to the final decree to be made, should be interpreted as a confession on the part of both parties of their unfitness in point of financial ability or otherwise to have the care and custody of their child. And the law of our decisions is, that having made disposition of infant children, the court will not afterwards reconsider the question, except upon some new or altered conditions or facts calling therefor.

Some courts however hold that a contract whereby a parent, the natural guardian of his infant children, seeks to escape the burden and responsibility of such children, is void upon grounds of public policy. Spencer on the Law of Domestic Relations, § 431, and cases cited, including Hibbette v. Bains, 78 Miss. 695, 29 South. 80, 51 L. R. A. 839. But Mr. Spencer says respecting such agreements they are not in all cases to be entirely ignored, particularly when they have been relied upon and the custody of the child has been transferred thereunder. See also Schouler on Domestic Relations (5th Ed.) § 251. We think the consensus of the more recent and well considered cases is that while such contracts will not be given effect so as to relieve the parent of the obligation imposed upon him by the law of nature and by general law to care for and provide for his infant children, they may and will be given effect if made in the interest of the child, for the interest of the infant is controlling and not the provisions of the contract.

Wherefore, if hereafter the circumstances and conditions should change, and the interest of the child should demand it, we do not think either parent would be bound by the contract, and the court with the power and jurisdiction conferred by statute may be properly invoked in modification of the decree giving custody of the child to the Schaefers. Indeed we find in the record another contract between the parties, dated September 25, 1915, just before the final decree of divorce from bed and board, which seems to have reserved the right, not inconsistent with the former contract, to acquire the control and custody of the child.

We find no error in the decree and it will be

Affirmed.

STATE ex rel. HUNDLEY et al. v. GOODWYN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 28, 1919. Rehearing Denied
March 26, 1919.)

1. ASSOCIATIONS §17 — MASONIC GRAND MASTER—JURISDICTION.

A Grand Master of Masons within his jurisdiction has not authority to postpone, either temporarily or indefinitely, an annual communication of the Masonic Grand Lodge that elected him, where the constitution of the order designates the time and the last preceding annual communication selected the place therefor.

2. ASSOCIATIONS §17—AUTHORITY OF MASONIC GRAND MASTER—COMMUNICATION.

In the event of an emergency rendering undesirable or inadvisable the holding of an annual communication of a Masonic Grand Lodge, the time and place regularly appointed and therefor, the Grand Master may cause special communication of the Masonic Grand Lodge at such time and place as he may deem, when so convoked, it alone may determine the feasibility and necessity for such communication.

ASSOCIATIONS §117 — ANNUAL GRAND COMMUNICATION—"QUORUM."

Where an association, as an incorporated Masonic Grand Lodge of Colored Masons, with jurisdiction, is composed of an indefinite number of members, and subject to change from suspension, or expulsion, revocation of charters of subordinate lodges and the grant of additional charters, and the constitution of the Grand Lodge, by-laws, edicts, rules, and regulations do not, nor does any rule of law or relative provision, prescribe a constitutional quorum, the members present at the time and place regularly appointed and selected for such annual grand communication, and qualified and competent to transact the business thereof, constitute a "quorum" for that purpose, though less than a numerical majority of such body.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Quorum.]

4. MANDAMUS §128 — SURRENDER OF MASONIC OFFICES.

Mandamus lies to compel the retiring Grand Master of Masons, the Grand Secretary, and Grand Treasurer of a Grand Lodge of Masons to surrender their offices and deliver the books, papers, and other documents, funds, and other things in their possession and under their control pertaining to such official positions, to their successors in office, when their right thereto is established by clear and competent proof, and the property is within the jurisdiction of the court awarding the writ.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. WORDS AND PHRASES—"COMMUNICATION."

The word "communication" is the Masonic equivalent for the word "meeting."

Original mandamus by the State, on the relation of H. B. Hundley, Grand Master of the Colored Masons, and others, against A. E. Goodwyn, late Grand Master, etc., and others. Writ awarded.

Blue & McCabe and McWhorter & Carney, all of Charleston, for relators.

Jo N. Kenna, of Charleston, and Wm. Denney, for respondents.

LYNOH, J. The relators seek the aid of the writ of mandamus to compel respondents to deliver to them possession of all the records, record books, minutes, proceedings, moneys and all other property or properties or things of any kind whatsoever belonging to the Grand Lodge of Colored Masons of this state, which have come into and are in the hands of the respondents, who claim to be officers of the lodge and who hold the property by virtue of such claim.

[5] The respondent A. E. Goodwyn was elected Grand Master of the Colored Masons of West Virginia at the regular annual communication—the word "communication" being the Masonic equivalent of the word "meeting"—of the Grand Lodge held at Clarksburg in June, 1917, and the respondents, Trent and Hughes, respectively, Grand Treasurer and Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge, at which communication Huntington was selected as the place for the next ensuing annual communication of the Grand Lodge, the time therefor being fixed by the constitution thereof, at which time and place the relators claim to have been elected respectively as the successors of each of the respondents, which succession, or the right thereto, the latter deny, basing their denial upon the proclamation of the respondent Goodwyn as the then Grand Master of Masons dispensing with or "calling off" the Huntington communication because of war conditions then prevailing in this country.

The right to the writ depends upon the answers to three questions: (a) Whether Goodwyn as the Grand Master had authority to postpone indefinitely the holding of the communication at the time prescribed by the constitution of the order and at the place designated by the Grand Lodge in 1917; (b) whether the body assembled at Huntington was legal and constitutional as to empower it to dispatch the business ordinarily transacted by such a body when properly constituted; and if so (c) whether the writ will lie to compel respondents to deliver to relators the property in their possession belonging to the grand body.

The Grand Lodge instituted and conducted by the colored Masons of this state is a chartered body, as the relators and respondents both concede, as they also do that the constitution of the organization requires a grand annual communication at a time definitely prescribed and at a place to be selected each year at the preceding annual communication, and that upon all questions arising upon this proceeding the principles laid down by Albert G. Mackey in his work on Masonic Jurisprudence, so far as applicable, shall govern and control.

[1, 2] Upon the first question presented for consideration, namely, the power of a Grand Master of Masons to postpone an annual communication of the Grand Lodge: Doubtless Goodwyn and those with whom he consulted and upon whose advice he acted reached the conclusion that as he was Grand Master, and as such the supreme head of the organization that elected him, and had the exclusive authority to preside over its deliberations, wherever and whenever convened, he also necessarily was clothed with ample authority to proclaim and thereby lawfully to effect the indefinite postponement of the annual communication required by the organic law of the fraternity, whose duly elected and constituted chief officer he was at that time. In part the authority assumed is consistent with the authority vested in the office of Grand Master of Masons. Such an officer does, it is true, have the exclusive right to preside when present at any meeting, whether regular or special, of the Grand Lodge within his jurisdiction. That is a recognized prerogative of the office. Though a high prerogative, the conclusion predicated upon it is contrary to and violative of the principles of Masonic jurisprudence as laid down by Mackey. For he says:

"The constitution of the Grand Lodge necessarily must designate a time and place for the annual communication which it is not in the power of the Grand Master to change."

The constitution of the Grand Lodge organized by the colored Masons of this state designates the date, but not the place, for each successive annual communication, but impliedly confers, or some rule or regulation grants, or custom—it matters not which—establishes the right of each annual communication to select the place where the next one shall convene. This right of selection, however, does not affect, modify or render nugatory the positive regulation of the right claimed to defer to a later date or "call off" the 1918 communication of the grand body, as Goodwyn attempted to do. The lack of authority to effect such postponement and the reason and the purpose thereof are not the less obvious and certain because the constitution left undetermined the place of each successive annual communication. But what Mackey says in the paragraph from which we have already quoted manifestly was intended to meet the exigencies that furnished the motive for the attempted postponement; for he says:

"But on the occurrence of any emergency which may in his opinion render a special communication necessary, the Grand Master possesses the prerogative of convoking the Grand Lodge, and may select such time and place for the convocation as he deems most convenient or appropriate. This prerogative has been so repeatedly exercised by Grand Masters, from the earliest times to the present day, that it seems to be unnecessary to furnish any specific precedents out of the multitude that the most cursory reading of the old records would supply."

Whether by this declaration of the law applicable to this phase of the controversy the author intended to say that the special communication was to supersede the annual communication and to dispatch such business as might be transacted at the latter, if convened according to the constitutional provision, is a question that does not arise and with which we are not concerned for the present, for no such special communication was convened.

[3, 4] Then what of the second proposition, namely, whether the body that assembled at Huntington at the time fixed by the constitution and the place selected therefor at the Clarksburg meeting was legally and properly constituted and authorized to transact the business proper to be transacted, had not Goodwyn attempted to postpone the regular annual communication? The constitution, it is agreed, does not prescribe what shall constitute a constitutional majority of such lodge when assembled in annual or special grand session for the dispatch of business or for any other purpose, and, so far as we are informed by counsel or can discover, there is no rule of law or statutory provision which prescribes or fixes a quorum for associations of this character, except the general provision governing corporations organized for the purpose of profit, and none whatever fixing such a quorum for fraternal organizations.

Notwithstanding Goodwyn's proclamation, the representatives of 10 of the 37 subordinate lodges acknowledging allegiance to the Grand Master of Colored Masons, several Past Masters, a Past Grand Master, Grand Senior Deacon, Grand Pursuivant, one of the three Grand Trustees, and a District Deputy Grand Master met at Huntington on June 11, 1918, and organized and held a grand communication for the dispatch of business, and thereafter continued in session for the usual length of time, and, among other things, elected the relator H. B. Hundley Grand Master of Masons within his jurisdiction, the relator S. B. Moon Grand Secretary, and the relator I. M. Carper Grand Treasurer, of the same Grand Lodge. Did the persons so convened constitute such quorum as empowered them, or the body of which they were members, to do such acts as we must recognize as lawful and binding? A regular corporation, it must be conceded, is not bound by the action of a minority of its directors or stockholders, though in each instance what they did was done at the time and place fixed for such meetings for the transaction of the corporate business, but this is because of the protective provision of the statute. What would be the result in the absence of such a statute is a question with which we are not now concerned and need not answer, except to remark that the statute may have originated from the abuse of the power claimed and exercised on behalf of minorities, and it is now generally recognized that neither a minority of a board of directors nor of stockholders of a business corporation, though duly and legally convened at the proper time and place, can lawfully transact any business for the corporation. The same principle applies to any organization having a definite number of constituents or members not subject to constant change in numerical strength, for when changes of this character do occur, the record of a corporation usually discloses the succession. Masonic bodies, however, are constantly changing; the membership seldom remains the same. Some die every year; others are suspended or expelled or demitted; new members join; and Masons from other jurisdictions may increase the number by affiliation; new lodges are organized; while for various reasons charters may be withdrawn from some subordinate lodges and charters granted to others, so that, as we have said, the membership of the body is constantly fluctuating, sometimes is large, at other times small. To avoid the difficulty which may arise, it is usual to fix a quorum sufficient to constitute a Grand Lodge of Masons much smaller indeed than would be required in most other organizations. As an illustration, the only other Grand Lodge of Masons in this state has fixed as a constitutional majority the representatives of five subordinate lodges, though it has jurisdiction over more than two hundred of them.

As apropos this question and as important in this connection Chancellor Kent says:

"There is a distinction taken between a corporate act to be done by a select and definite body, as by a board of directors, and one to be performed by the constituent members. In the latter case, a majority of those who appear may act; but in the former, a majority of the definite body must be present, and then a majority of the quorum may decide. This is the general rule on the subject; and if any corporation has a different modification of the expression of the binding will of the corporation, it arises from the special provisions of the act or charter of incorporation." 2 Kent Com. (14th Ed.) *293.

And even if a bare majority of a board of directors or the stockholders be present at a regular meeting, the corporation may, nevertheless, be bound by the acts of a minority, for then apparently the vote of a minority can determine the policy of the corporation. Thus five constitute a quorum of nine directors, and where there are only five present, three may control. The same general principles are stated by Morawetz on Private Corporations (2d Ed.) vol. 1, § 476. "In the absence of an express provision to the contrary, the rule is," the author says, "that such of the shareholders as actually assemble at a properly convened meeting constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, and a majority of that quorum have authority to represent the corporation." For this proposition he cites Field v. Field, 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 395; Everett v. Smith, 22 Minn. 53; Madison Avenue Baptist Church v. Baptist Church, etc., 28 N. Y. Super. Ct. 649; Craig v. First Presbyterian Church, 88 Pa. 42, 32 Am. Rep. 417; Brown v. Pacific Mail Steamship Co., 5 Blatch. 525, Fed. Cas. No. 2025.

The question involved upon this point may not improperly be illustrated by the case of Rex v. Varloe, Cowper, 248, where the policy of a borough was to be determined by the vote of its freemen, a corporation which necessarily consisted of an indefinite number, and that number subject to change from time to time; and the conclusion reached was that the major part of the freemen present, whether large or small, were entitled to act. The same principle was applied in the Madison Avenue Church Case, cited above, for the same reason, as it was also in the case of Craig v. Church, also cited. The decision in each case was based upon the regularity of the assemblage and of the time and place fixed therefor and the indefiniteness and uncertainty of the number of those entitled to participate. The same principle was discussed in King v. Miller, 6 T. R. 268, 101 Eng. Reprint, 547; King v. Bellringer, 4 T. R. 810, 100 Eng. Reprint, 1315; 1 Cook on Stock & Stockholders (3d Ed.) § 607; 2 Kent's Com. *293. And while these cases deal with elections by the voters of municipal corporations or by the directors or stockholders of business corporations, they announce the principle which we think governs the question we are discussing, that wherever the constituent number is indefinite and variable, the acts of those who assemble, although a minority, at the regular time and place provided for the assemblage and act for and on behalf of the associated body, are regular and entitled to judicial approval. Therefore it must follow that the meeting of the Grand Lodge at Huntington was regular and lawful and not subject to the criticism urged against it by respondents.

The third and last proposition, whether the writ lies or not, seems to be quite clear. Goodwyn's term of office ended, it is said, by the provisions of the constitution, by-laws, rules, or regulations of the order with the expiration of the year for which he was elected, and by rotation Hundley was his regular and legitimate successor. But the cessation of his authority as Grand Master of Masons does not depend solely upon custom or legislation. He ceased to be such an officer upon the election of Hundley by a legally constituted Grand Lodge, and thereafter possessed none of the powers or the prerogatives pertaining to the former position, and hence in duty was bound to recognize the authority of his successor. And so of Trent and Carper. And there appears to be no substantial reason or excuse for his refusing obedience to the principal command of the alternative writ. Mandamus lies to compel the admission to office of a party having a clear prima facie right thereto, and as a necessary incident to compel the delivery of the appurtenances of the office. Kline v. McKelvey, 57 W. Va. 29, 49 S. E. 896. That such relief will be given to compel the surrender of the office to a claimant where the right seems clear appears to be the settled policy of this state, and as part of such relief the restoration and delivery to the rightful claimant of the property pertaining thereto. State ex rel. v. James, 73 W. Va. 753, 81 S. E. 550. See, also, Coldwater Mining Co. v. Gillis, 170 Mich. 123, 135 N. W. 901, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 410.

1. ASSOCIATIONS §20(2)—SUITS AGAINST ASSOCIATION BY NAME—JURISDICTION—SUIT AGAINST MEMBERS.

In the absence of a statute authorizing such procedure, an unincorporated society or association cannot be sued as an entity by its name, nor can a judgment be rendered against it merely by name. To confer jurisdiction, the persons composing it, or some of them, must be named as parties and process served upon them individually.

2. COURTS §37(1)—SUBMISSION TO JURISDICTION—AMENDMENT OF PLEADING AND PROCESS—JUDGMENT.

If such a society or association, being sued as a corporation, files a plea denying its corporate existence, and such plea is ascertained to be well founded, its failure to object to an amendment of the process and pleadings, so as to treat it as a fraternal benefit society, under a statute permitting actions against certain classes of such societies by name, does not amount to a submission to the jurisdiction of the court, to such an extent or in such manner as will sustain a judgment against it, unless the proof shows it to be such a society as may be so sued by virtue of the statute.

3. CORPORATIONS §34(8), 505, 519(1)—ASSUMED NAME—SUIT—PROOF OF INCORPORATION.

Though a corporation contracting under an assumed name may be sued by such name, and is estopped to deny its existence for the purposes of the litigation, proof of incorporation of the individuals so contracting is essential to the maintenance of the action.

4. CORPORATIONS §34(8)—DENIAL OF CORPORATE EXISTENCE—ESTOPPEL.

The doctrine of estoppel is not available to persons dealing or contracting with an unincorporated association, with knowledge of its character, in an effort to prevent it from denying corporate existence on its part.

5. INSURANCE §687—"FRATERNAL BENEFIT SOCIETY"—STATUTE.

An unincorporated association paying no death benefits nor any disability benefits in excess of $500 in one year to any one person is not a fraternal benefit society, within the meaning of chapter 55A of Barnes' Code (Code 1913, c. 55A [secs. 3226-3263]).

6. INSURANCE §687—SUIT AGAINST ASSOCIATION AS CORPORATION—JURISDICTION—STATUTE.

Nor is such an association identical with an incorporated life and accident insurance association, or an incorporated building association, or an unincorporated pension association, composed of members of the general association to which they are related, in such sense as to make it amenable to judicial process as a corporation, or to bring it within the statute authorizing judicial procedure against fraternal benefit societies, by name.

7. ASSOCIATIONS §16—JUDGMENT §237(2)—ACTION EX DELICTO—JURISDICTION—JUDGMENT AGAINST MEMBERS.

An action ex delicto against such an association and individual members of one of its subordinate lodges or divisions, predicated upon alleged wrongful and illegal expulsion from such subordinate organization, may be prosecuted to judgment, against the individual defendants, on failure of jurisdiction of the association itself, the parties being liable jointly and severally, if liable at all.

8. ASSOCIATIONS §10—WRONGFUL EXPULSION OF MEMBER—LIABILITY—GROUNDS.

An inquiry as to the liability of an unincorporated association and members thereof, for alleged wrongful and illegal expulsion, participated in by a subordinate body acting under the orders of a superior officer constituting the official head of the association, involves consideration of the rights, duties, powers, and obligations of the members, the subordinate bodies and superior officers and tribunals, as determined by the constituting articles of agreement, by-laws, rules and regulations, often designated as the constitution, statutes, and rules, and the usages and precedents of such organizations.

9. ASSOCIATIONS ¶5—CONSTITUTION AND RULES—CONSTRUCTION—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Like other written instruments, such laws, rules and regulations are proper subjects of interpretation, and the reasonable construction given them by the officers and tribunals expressly or impliedly charged with the duty of interpretation, or of which they are reasonably and fairly susceptible, is binding upon the members and subordinate organizations of the order, and also upon the courts in the administration of justice in causes involving the rights of members, if it does not contravene public policy or any public law.

10. ASSOCIATIONS ¶10—EXPULSION OF MEMBER—ACTION OF SUPERIOR OFFICER—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Right of an officer of an unincorporated association, designated in its constitution, as its official head, and authorized by that instrument to exercise full control over the order in general, and to sign all charters and decide all controversies appealed to him, subject to a power of review by a triennial convention of the order, whose enactments and decisions upon all questions are declared to be the supreme law of the association, and to whom such officer reports his transactions, to exercise appellate power in a case in which a member tried on a charge of infraction of a rule, justifying his expulsion, if guilty, has been acquitted, in the absence of an appeal and of his own volition, falls within a reasonable and fair construction of the laws and rules conferring his authority, wherefore a court cannot consistently deny its existence, in the trial of an action for damages for illegal expulsion, in the absence of a denial thereof by the association's tribunal of last resort.

11. ASSOCIATIONS ¶10—APPELLATE POWER OF SUPERIOR OFFICER—SUSPENSION OF MEMBER.

Nor can it be judicially determined by a civil court that such an officer having additional power and authority to suspend the charter of the subordinate organization in which such trial has occurred may not exercise his appellate power in such manner and his power of suspension conjointly and simultaneously, so as to compel expulsion or loss of the charter, the evidence adduced on the trial affording bases for two honest and reasonable opinions as to whether it preponderates decidedly against the innocence of the accused member.

12. ASSOCIATIONS ¶10—SECOND TRIAL OF MEMBER—PRESUMPTION—CONSTITUTION OF ASSOCIATION.

The legal presumption, if any, against right in the tribunals of an unincorporated association, to subject a member thereof to a second trial for the same offense, is overthrown and excluded by the terms of the constitution of such an association, making the enactments and decisions of its highest tribunal its supreme law.

13. ASSOCIATIONS ¶10—EXPULSION OF MEMBER—DAMAGES—MALICE.

An inference of malice on the part of members of a subordinate association, in voting for an expulsion of a member, after having voted for his acquittal of the charges preferred against him, sufficient to sustain a verdict predicated on such theory, is not deducible from their mere change of attitude, especially when a superior officer claiming authority to do so, not negated by any express provision of the laws and regulations of the order, nor by any decision of the association's tribunal of last resort, has intervened and annulled the first decision on the ground that the acquittal was plainly contrary to the weight of the evidence.

14. ASSOCIATIONS ¶10—EXPULSION OF MEMBER—ACTION OF SUPERIOR OFFICER—MALICE.

Nor does the presence, on the occasion of the expulsion, of a member between whom and the accused there has been previous animosity or ill feeling, and who advised and encouraged a superior officer to demand rescission of what was deemed an unjustifiable acquittal, and, on the occasion of the expulsion, gave his reason for doing so, but was excused from voting, on his own motion, raise an inference of malice sufficiently strong to sustain a finding thereof.

Error to Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Suits by J. W. Simpson and by G. A. Smith against the Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and others. Verdict for plaintiffs against the Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and in favor of the other defendants, and recovery in the Smith case reduced on motion for new trial and in the Simpson case motion for new trial overruled, and defendant Brotherhood in each case brings error. Judgment against defendant the Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers reversed, and verdict against it set aside, and judgment in favor of the individual defendants affirmed, and as to defendant Brotherhood causes remanded, with leave to plaintiffs to acquire jurisdiction of its members.

Sanders, Crockett & Kee, of Bluefield, and William H. Werth, of Tazewell, Va., for plaintiffs.

J. M. McGrath, of Princeton, and French & Easley, of Bluefield, for defendants.

POFFENBARGER, J. In each of these two cases involving the same general principles and procedure, and giving rise to similar questions, two writs of error were obtained. In each a number of individuals were joined with the unincorporated association known as the Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers as defendants. Under instructions from the court, the jury in each returned a verdict for all the individual defendants, and a verdict against the association, assessing the damages in the Smith case at $15,931, and in the Simpson case at $11,000. In each the jury in response to interrogatories propounded by the court itemized its assessment of the damages, allowing Smith $1,531 as compensation for the loss of his insurance, $2,400 for other compensatory damages, and $12,000 as punitive damages; and Simpson $4,500 as compensation for the loss of insurance, and $6,500 as additional compensatory damages. On a motion for a new trial, the court eliminated the punitive damages in the Smith case, and rendered judgment for the residue of the verdict, amounting to $3,931. In the other, the motion for a new trial was overruled and judgment rendered for the entire amount of the verdict. Writs of error were awarded to both plaintiffs on their complaints of the action of the court in directing a verdict for the individual defendants, as well as other assignments of error set forth in their petitions; and on numerous assignments of error like writs were awarded to the Brotherhood.

Both actions seek damages for wrongful expulsion of the plaintiffs from the N. H. Smith Division No. 448 of the Brotherhood, on account of alleged violations of rules and regulations of the association, under coercion by Warren S. Stone, Grand Chief Engineer of the Brotherhood, the division having previously exonerated them on two occasions, once by a mere resolution and again by a formal vote in accordance with the association laws and regulations. Stone, being a nonresident and not served with process, was eliminated from the case by a dismissal. The other 33 individual defendants in each case, residents of the state, were made parties under the impression that they were liable in damages to the plaintiffs, by reason of their having voted for their expulsion from the division. As to 14 of them, Smith's action was dismissed on his own motion, leaving 19. The other action was prosecuted to final judgment as to all of the individual defendants. On the assumption of their identity with the Brotherhood, the Locomotive Engineers' Mutual Life & Accident Insurance Association and the Locomotive Engineers' Building Association, both foreign corporations, were also joined as defendants, but the actions were dismissed as to the former on its demurrers to the declarations, and as to the latter on its special pleas denying the jurisdiction of the court as to it.

[1-4] A preliminary inquiry of vital importance in some aspects of the case is whether the Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers has been brought within the jurisdiction of the court by sufficient process and pleadings. Upon the assumption that it was a corporation qualified under the laws of the state to do business here, the summons in each case, as to it, was served upon the auditor of the state, and it was impleaded as a corporation. It filed special pleas at rules denying that it was a corporation, to which the plaintiffs replied generally, and the issues thus raised were determined in favor of the defendant, and the actions accordingly dismissed as to it. But in the same order in which the dismissal was formally adjudged, the plaintiffs were permitted to amend both the summons and the declaration in each case, by striking out the words "a corporation," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "a fraternal beneficiary association." Assignments of error claim the benefit of the technical dismissals entered upon the record; but, going beyond that, objections to the amendments are based upon other grounds. Deeming itself to be out of court, by reason of the dismissals, at the time of the making of the amendments, the association entered no objection, but the individual defendants objected and excepted to the action of the court in permitting the amendments. The course pursued by the plaintiffs was adopted upon two theories: (1) Identity of the Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers with the Locomotive Engineers' Mutual Life & Accident Insurance Association and the Locomotive Engineers' Building Association; and (2) liability of the association to be sued by its association name under the provisions of chapter 55A of Barnes' Code 1918.

Of course a corporation, like an individual, may do business under an assumed or false name and be sued by such name (Marmet Co. v. Archibald, 37 W. Va. 778, 17 S. E. 299); but in order to apply this doctrine incorporation by some name must be established. One who contracts with and receives money from certain persons acting as a corporation under a valid charter granted under a general law, but acts within both the charter and the general law, cannot avoid the obligation of the contract by denial of the corporate existence of the persons so contracted with. Bon Aqua Imp. Co. v. Standard Fire Ins. Co., 34 W. Va. 764, 12 S. E. 771. But this involves action in a corporate capacity or name. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, there is a presumption that persons representing themselves to be incorporated and contracting in a corporate name are what they represent themselves to be, and the situation of the parties and circumstances are often such as to estop them from denial of the fact. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Bennett, 28 W. Va. 16; Miller v. Newburg Orrel Coal Co., 31 W. Va. 836, 8 S. E. 600, 13 Am. St. Rep. 903. Lack of proof of the element of representation of corporate existence renders this principle unavailable to the plaintiffs. And, in the absence of proof to the contrary, very slight evidence of incorporation will sustain a finding that a party to a contract is a corporation, though not so described in the contract. Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen v. Cramer, 60 Ill. App. 212; Independent Order of Mutual Aid v. Paine, 122 Ill. 625, 14 N. E. 42. Under some of these decisions, the adoption of a name by which the organization shall be known and the use of a seal, as disclosed by correspondence found in the record, might be sufficient evidence to establish the corporate existence of the association, contrary to the finding in the trial court, in the absence of proof to the contrary, but direct and positive evidence that it is a voluntary and unincorporated association clearly overthrows a mere inference arising from these circumstances. There is no proof that the contracts of membership made between the plaintiffs and the association were understood or deemed by them to have been made in a corporate name. On the contrary, both admit in their testimony that the association is not incorporated. Not having been misled nor deceived as to the capacity in which the association made its contracts with them, they are not in a position to invoke the doctrine of estoppel.

[5, 6] The amendments were permitted and the association held to answer, under the impression that the Brotherhood is a fraternal benefit society, within the meaning of the provisions of chapter 55A of the Code, represented by the state auditor, for purposes of service of process, and liable to be sued in its association name. It filed special pleas denying that it is such a society as is contemplated by that chapter, and averring itself to be within an exception provided by section 29 thereof. That section declares nothing contained in the act shall be construed to affect or apply to grand or subordinate lodges of Masons, Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, the Junior Order of United American Mechanics, nor to similar societies that do not issue insurance certificates. This exemption applies to societies paying death benefits, if such benefits do not amount to more than $300 to any one person, and to those paying disability benefits not exceeding $500 to one person in one year. The Brotherhood proper pays no death benefits, nor anything in the nature of a disability benefit, except an allowance out of what is known as the indigent fund, which, under no circumstances, can exceed $30 per month to one person. Within the order, there is a pension association, but its benefits go only to those who contribute to its maintenance. It is self-sustaining, and cannot in any event create a liability upon the Brotherhood. The Pension Association might come within the statute, but the Brotherhood is a separate and distinct, though an allied or connected, organization. Section 1 of the chapter defining the fraternal benefit society includes provision for the payment of benefits, in accordance with the provisions of section 5. Other elements of the society required by section 1 are defined by sections 2 and 3, and the whole chapter, as originally passed, contemplated organizations providing benefits in the nature of indemnities for their members. Some additions subsequently made confer certain privileges on fraternal organizations which they did not formerly enjoy, but nothing in the later acts altered the purpose or effect of the original statute. The Brotherhood is not within the statutory definition of a fraternal benefit society, because it pays no benefits, ordinarily, and never in such an amount as to deprive it of the exemption allowed by section 29 of chapter 55A of the Code.

The Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and the Locomotive Engineers' Mutual Life & Accident Association, the two corporations to which reference has been made, are not identical. The Grand International Brotherhood covers vastly more ground than the insurance association. Its purpose is the promotion of the general interests of railway locomotive engineers. The insurance association merely provides life and accident indemnities for such members of the Brotherhood as become certificate or policy holders therein, and the building association is a corporation owning and managing a Brotherhood building in the city of Cleveland, Ohio. Though all members of the Brotherhood having the necessary physical qualifications are expected or required to become members of the insurance association, and membership in the Brotherhood is a condition both precedent and subsequent to right of membership in the insurance association, all members of the Brotherhood are not members of that association. The estimated number of those who are not members of the latter, because they are physically disqualified from such membership, is estimated at about 4,000. The insurance association limits the scope of its insurance business, as any other insurance corporation might, to members of the Brotherhood in good standing, and makes its collections of assessments for payment of indemnities through the officers of the local division of the Brotherhood. Nevertheless, the insurance association is a distinct entity from the Brotherhood. It is a corporation capable of contracting, suing, and being sued and owning and holding property as fully and completely as an individual may own and hold it, and the association known as the Brotherhood has no such capacity and is not in any legal sense the owner of the assets of the insurance association, nor liable on its contracts of insurance. That an unincorporated society and an incorporated insurance association, composed of members of the former, and affiliated with it, are not identical has been expressly decided in Hajek v. Bohemian-Slavonian Benevolent Society, 66 Mo. App. 568. Relationship of the institutions is not determinative of the question of identity. Almost anything conceivable bears some sort of relation to everything else. The common features of animals do not make them identical. Nor does the close relation of parent and offspring in the same species. Obviously, these organizations are not actually nor legally identical. Nor does the relation subsisting between them make the Brotherhood a fraternal benefit society within the meaning of the statute. The legislative intent in this respect is rendered clear by the express provision exempting the Junior Order of United American Mechanics, except the insurance branch of the order.

Whether or not the filing of the special pleas denying incorporation, or failure to object to the amendments until a term subsequent to the one at which they were made, might constitute a legal submission to the jurisdiction of the court, under circumstances different from those obtaining here, is an academic inquiry to which no time or labor need be devoted. An essential element of submission to jurisdiction is the existence of some persons capable of performing the act. The law courts take no cognizance of unincorporated associations, organizations, or societies, in the absence of a statute authorizing them to do so. A partnership cannot be sued by the firm name. The law courts do not recognize it as an entity, wherefore it is necessary, in order to obtain jurisdiction of it, to make the individuals composing the firm parties and serve process upon them. Courson v. Parker, 39 W. Va. 521, 20 S. E. 583; Brown v. Gorsuch & Sons, 50 W. Va. 514, 40 S. E. 376. If an association is not incorporated, and there is no statute authorizing procedure against it by its name, the action must be brought against the individuals composing it. 29 Cyc. 218; Bacon, Life & Accident Ins. § 612. It can neither waive errors nor enter an appearance as an entity. If the theory of a technical submission can be sustained, it would avail nothing, for there can be no judgment against a voluntary unincorporated society by name. The judgment must in all cases be against the individuals composing it, or some of them, unless a statute provides otherwise. O'Connell v. Lamb, 63 Ill. App. 652; Hajek v. Bohemian-Slavonian Benevolent Society, 68 Mo. App. 568; Lumber Co. v. Oliver, 65 Mo. App. 435; Moore v. Stemmons, 119 Mo. App. 162, 95 S. W. 313; Crawley v. American Society of Equity, 153 Wis. 13, 139 N. W. 734; Bacon's Life & Accident Ins. § 612.

Lack of jurisdiction of the Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers makes reversal of the judgment against it inevitable, and also renders it unnecessary, as well as improper, to pass upon any of the numerous rulings made in the course of the trials, in so far as they might, if it were a party to the cases, affect its interests. Without having brought the association within its jurisdiction, the trial court could not properly decide anything against it, nor can this court do so. But, since the court acquired jurisdiction of the individual defendants, it is necessary to determine whether it properly directed verdicts in their favor.

With a single exception, they are all members of the N. H. Smith Division No. 448. One of them is a member of another division. Through their respective divisions, they are no doubt members of the grand international organization. Membership in the general organization seems to be attainable only by means of membership in the local divisions. If, by virtue of its jurisdiction over them, the court had jurisdiction pro tanto of the Brotherhood, the measure of relief to which the plaintiffs are entitled, if any, is a judgment against them in their individual capacities. Crawley v. American Society of Equity, 153 Wis. 13, 139 N. W. 734. This is true not only because the individual defendants, if jointly liable with others and not otherwise, did not plead the nonjoinder of other necessary parties, but also because the actions are for damages for wrongs, not breaches of contract, and the plaintiffs have their election to sue all of the wrongdoers or only one or more of them. Cunningham v. Sayre, 21 W. Va. 440; Riverside Cotton Mills v. Lanier, 102 Va. 148, 45 S. E. 875.

[7-8] Although the plaintiffs claim to have been injured by wrongful and illegal acts of the defendants, the injuries of which they complain were deprivation of contractual rights. Both their right of membership in the division and in the Brotherhood and the powers, privileges, and rights of the defendants within the same organizations are measured and defined by the organic or fundamental laws thereof, called the constitution and statutes, and its rules and regulations: For convenience, these documents constituting the agreement are called the laws of the organization, and breaches and violations thereof are termed offenses. Likewise, the tribunals of the organization, charged with the duty of determining whether or not the contract has been violated, are regarded as judicial or quasi judicial bodies. This contract governs not only the rights of individual members and local divisions, but the higher tribunals and their officers as well. The inquiry as to liability, therefore, involves consideration of the relations of all the parties to the action, plaintiffs and defendants, the division to which they belonged, the Grand Chief Engineer, and what is known as the Grand International Division.

Both declarations are framed upon the theory of lack of right, power and authority in the Grand Chief Engineer to make certain rulings in obedience to which the division expelled the plaintiffs; lack of right in the division to adopt the procedure ordered by the Grand Chief Engineer, resulting in their expulsion; malicious and wrongful action on the part of individual members of the division, in voting for expulsion on the trial which resulted in such action; and wrongful, malicious, and concerted action on the part of such members and the Grand Chief Engineer, amounting in legal effect to a conspiracy for the accomplishment of illegal and injurious expulsion of the plaintiffs.

The alleged misconduct of the plaintiffs for which they were expelled related to an alteration or disturbance of working conditions or service on a certain portion of the line of the Norfolk & Western Railway, within the jurisdiction of the general adjustment committee, to which the members of the N. H. Smith Division No. 448 were subject. At that point, the equipment of the railroad company was pooled so as to afford the engineers and firemen an equitable and just apportionment of employment. The motive power consisted of steam locomotives and electric motors. Under the pooling arrangement, all of the engineers handled indiscriminately both classes of motors, taking their turns regularly in the service. This arrangement was changed by the road foreman of engines and the electric motors given permanently to certain men, two of them to Smith and Simpson. This action resulted in serious disturbance of some of the other employees. It necessitated a general rearrangement, occasioning loss of employment or wages to some of them. Twelve members of the N. H. Smith Division No. 448 preferred written charges against the plaintiffs, accusing them of having procured this alteration, "the cutting of the Elk Horn pool," in violation of sections 20 and 35 of the standing rules of the organization and article 11(a) of what is known as the Chicago Joint Working Agreement. These charges were referred to an investigating committee composed of three members, who sustained them and gave the accused members notice to appear at a division meeting to be held May 21, 1916, for trial. At that meeting, Smith and Simpson appeared and denied the truth of the charges. The chairman of the investigating committee stated that J. S. Mastin, the road foreman of engines, by whom the alteration of crews was made, had told him the Elk Horn crews would not have been cut off had not Smith and Simpson come to his office. Thereupon the accused presented a statement in writing from Mastin, saying they were not responsible for the action complained of, and that the trouble was in his office and would have been corrected, when he came in, if no one had said anything about it. On this statement, the division passed a resolution exonerating both of the men. A brief but comprehensive and dispassionate report of the action of the division was immediately made by the secretary, to S. H. Huff, chairman of the general adjustment committee of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, on the Norfolk & Western Railway, who transmitted it to the Grand Chief Engineer. This official, on June 9, 1916, wrote a letter to the secretary of the division requesting a copy of the charges, the evidence, and the notice to appear for trial. Huff no doubt was responsible in some degree for the preferment of the charges and this action on the part of the Grand Chief Engineer. He had been called to Bluefield, by a telegram, in connection with the Elk Horn trouble, before the charges were preferred, and he later had interviews with Stone, the Grand Chief Engineer, at New York and Washington, concerning the Smith and Simpson cases, before they were finally disposed of. After having received these papers, Stone disapproved the method of procedure adopted by the division, as well as the result. In such cases, the statutes of the organization require the decision to be made by ballot. He therefore ordered the cases to be reopened and disposed of in accordance with the laws of the organization. In obedience to this direction, the accused parties were notified to appear again for trial on the same charges on July 16, 1916. On the occasion of this second trial, Mastin was present, and the record of the proceedings represents him as having admitted that Simpson and Smith caused the cutting of the crews. Marra, chairman of the investigation committee, is represented as having made a contradictory statement assented to by Mastin. The record further states that Mastin, in response to a question by Simpson, denied that the accused had requested the cutting of the crews, and said that they had come to his office at the request of the assistant road foreman, E. M. Bill. The evidence having been thus adduced, ballots were taken which resulted in acquittals, 8 black balls, and 15 white ones having been cast in Simpson's case, and 12 black ones and 20 white ones in Smith's. In his report of this trial, to the Grand Chief Engineer, dated July 21, 1916, Wade Miller, Chief Engineer of Division No. 448, did not stop with the statement of the result, but commented rather extensively upon the procedure and the merits of the controversy. He said Mastin had not denied having admitted to the committees that Smith and Simpson had caused the cutting of the crews, but had endeavored, in his oral statement to the division to cover it up and leave the impression that the disturbance of the crews was due to a mistake in his office, made by Bill, the assistant road foreman. He also said Ballengee, a member of the division, had overpersuaded and misled the members in their voting, by a speech he had delivered on the occasion. He concluded by saying the officers of the division had done all in their power to make the laws of the organization effective in the cases, but had found it impossible to do so. In his reply, dated July 24, 1916, the Grand Chief Engineer expressed confidence in the integrity of the officers of Division No. 448, and then proceeded as follows:

"It is also very evident that Bro. Mastin (regardless of the fact that he is an officer of the company) not only uses his official position to play favorites, but with a few of his followers dominates the division, and defeats the carrying out of the plain language of the law. In our opinion, the time has arrived when, if over 200 loyal members will stand by and allow this condition to exist, Division 448 should cease to exist. We will place the entire matter before the advisory board of Grand Officers at our first opportunity, and if they concur in our opinion the charter of 448 will be suspended, pending action of the next convention."

On August 6, 1916, a resolution to rescind the action of July 16th was offered and consideration thereof was postponed until the next meeting, held August 13, 1916, and at that meeting it was unanimously adopted. On August 14, 1916, the investigating committee again signed a report sustaining the charges originally made on April 22, 1916, and notified the accused to appear for trial at a meeting to be held August 20, 1916. Appearing on the last-named date, in response to the notice, Simpson and Smith objected to trial, on the ground of their having filed an appeal to the Grand Chief Engineer from the action of the division at the last preceding meeting. This appeal is in the form of a letter dated August 18, 1916, and addressed to the Grand Chief Engineer. It denied the validity of the rescission of the results of the former trials and the right of the division to subject the accused parties to another trial. In view of this situation, the division postponed action and directed the secretary to write the Grand Chief Engineer for advice and instruction in the premises. By a letter dated August 23, 1916, that officer overruled the contention of the accused, and by another dated August 26, 1916, advised the division through its secretary that it had undoubted authority to rescind or set aside the results of the former trials and reopen the cases and proceed with the trial thereof. That trial took place on September 17, 1916, and resulted in the expulsion of Simpson by a vote of 21 to 10, and Smith by a vote of 18 to 12. The evidence, as recorded, was similar to that used on the two former occasions, but more witnesses testified. Mastin is reported as having said the crews might not have been cut so soon if Simpson and Smith had not been down to the office. Huff was present for the first time, and made an extensive statement, but, on his own motion, was excused from voting. On a joint appeal from these actions, the Grand Chief Engineer declined to reopen the cases, but advised the appellants of their right to appeal from his decision to the next convention, or Grand International Division. Of this last right of appeal they did not endeavor to avail themselves.

Section 35 of the Standing Rules, under which the charges were preferred, reads as follows:

"Any member who by verbal or written communication to railroad officials or others interferes with a grievance that is in the hands of a committee, or at any other time makes any suggestion to any official that may cause discord in any division, shall be expelled as per sections 49 and 54 of statutes, when proven guilty: Provided, however, this law shall not apply to a brother in official position when called upon to express an opinion in his official capacity."

Section 20 of said rules affirms the right of a committee of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers to handle all questions and matters pertaining to engineers, except such of them as are firemen, working as engineers, they being under the jurisdiction of the committee of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen. The Elk Horn pool, the dissolution of which by the action of Mastin, alleged to have been induced by the plaintiffs, resulted in the proceedings complained of, affected both classes of engineers, in consequence of which there was a general reduction in rank and position among the engineers and firemen as well as loss of time. In view of this result, the plaintiffs were charged with having violated the Chicago Joint Working Agreement, entered into by the two organizations, the Locomotive Engineers and Locomotive Firemen. This agreement was operative among the members of the two organizations on the Norfolk & Western Railway, but had not been assented to by the railway company. It is a rather lengthy document, and some of its provisions bear directly upon the relations subsisting between the engineers and firemen in the Elk Horn pool.

Simpson held three certificates or policies of insurance, calling for $4,500 and Smith one, calling for $1,500. Under the rules and regulations of the insurance company by which the certificates had been issued, they were expressly made valid for a period of one year after the expulsion of the members to whom issued but no longer. The president of the insurance association, testifying in the case, said the insurance certificates of the plaintiffs would have been maintained by him, on payment of the assessments called for by them, if appeals had been taken to the Grand International Division, notwithstanding the lack of express authority to do so. The import of his testimony is that formerly the convention or Grand International Division met annually, and that the provision for continuance of insurance certificates for one year was designed to keep them in force, after expulsion, pending the prosecution of appeals; and that, by an amendment of the constitution, making the convention triennial instead of annual, the right of maintenance of insurance pending an appeal had been apparently interfered with by oversight. Hence he says he would have recognized the certificates and endeavored to keep them in force if the expelled members, the plaintiffs here, had taken appeals to the convention. Their only reply to this is lack of duty on their part to take appeals at a period earlier than 30 days before the meeting of the Grand International Division. They tendered assessments for a while, without appealing, but they were not accepted.

[10, 11] Section 8 of the constitution requires the Grand Chief Engineer to devote his entire time to the interest of the Brotherhood, declares him to be the official head of the order and expressly vests in him power to exercise full control over the grand office and the order in general. It also clothes him with authority to entertain appeals, and makes his decisions final and conclusive until the triennial meeting of the Grand International Division. Section 66 of the statutes provides that any division willfully violating any rule or regulation of the Grand International Brotherhood may have its charter suspended by the Grand Chief Engineer, until the next meeting of the Grand International Division. The terms of these provisions are broad enough to include both executive or administrative powers and quasi judicial authority. Since the order is composed of its subordinate bodies, as well as its members, authority vested in the Grand Chief Engineer to exercise full control over the order in general may reasonably be construed as carrying a power of visitation and direction over the divisions, and as effectually excluding the theory of lack of authority in this official to act otherwise than upon an appeal formally taken to him. Of course, his power over the order is not absolute nor unlimited. It is vested in him not for purposes of destruction, dissolution, or perversion, but to enable him to see that the laws and regulations of the order are enforced and its integrity and efficiency preserved. It would not be unreasonable nor inconsistent with the language of section 8 to hold that, on the development of a situation rendering it necessary in his opinion to make an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining whether a division has violated any rule or regulation of the general organization by any act of omission or commission, he may institute an inquiry of his own volition and without initiation or suggestion from any other source, and, after having ascertained the facts, determine whether or not the division has willfully violated any of the rules or regulations, subject to a right of review by the Grand International Division. Such power in the hands of such an organization may be essential to the maintenance of its integrity. Otherwise a subordinate division might wholly fail to discharge its duties, with impunity, for, by mutual assent, its officers and all of its members might refrain from bringing its wrongful acts to the attention of the superior authority. Irremediable conduct of that kind might soon demoralize the entire association. Section 66 of the statutes might reasonably be deemed to be an interpretation of a portion of section 8 of the constitution, as well as a means of carrying it into effect. The appellate jurisdiction of the Grand Chief Engineer is not questioned here. It is expressly conferred by section 8 of the constitution. One of the contentions seems to be that he had no authority or power to intervene or interpose in the cases pending in division No. 448, because neither the division, on the one hand, nor the accused members, on the other hand, had prosecuted an appeal, so as to bring the controversy within his jurisdiction as conferred by that section of the constitution, and because he seems to have acted in the matter at the instance of Huff. Manifestly, the question thus raised was one for decision, in the first instance by the Grand Chief Engineer, and ultimately and finally in the Grand International Division, to which an appeal might have been taken. If the interpretation of the constitution were, for all purposes, within the jurisdiction of this court, and the position taken by the attorneys for the plaintiffs accepted as sound, it might be adopted as the basis of the decision. But the construction of the organic agreement, by-laws, rules and regulations of a benefit society or other unincorporated voluntary association belongs, not to the court, but to the board, council, or other tribunal provided for the purpose in the organization, if any. So long as the body upon which this power of interpretation has been conferred does not substitute legislation for interpretation, nor transgress the bounds of reason, common sense, or fairness, nor contravene public policy or the laws of the land, in their conclusions and decisions, the courts cannot interfere with them. *State ex rel. S.) 806, note.

Practically all of the positions taken in argument, for the plaintiffs below, are rendered untenable by this general principle. Whether Huff's position as chairman of the General Adjustment Committee gave him such official interest in the proceedings pending in the division as justified his complaint to the Grand Chief Engineer, against the result of its action, and whether that official was bound to refrain from procedure in the premises, because the information tending in his opinion, to establish the evasion of duty on the part of the division, was communicated by Huff, whose alleged animosity toward Simpson may have been known or suspected, are questions of such character as bring them within the provinces of the officers and tribunals of the association for determination. Huff was subordinate to Stone in rank and authority. The charges made against the plaintiffs related to a matter over which he may have had some authority. Under his diagnosis of the situation, Simpson and Smith had a grievance, deprivation of their right, as senior engineers, to run the electric motors, that should have come up regularly and possibly have passed through the hands of the committee or the local committee whose determinations might directly or indirectly have required action on his part reviewable by Stone. As chairman of the general adjustment committee, he was the highest official of the order on the Norfolk & Western Railway, and, whether directly chargeable with any duty respecting the cutting of the Elk Horn crews or not, the propriety of the dissolution of the Elk Horn pool was manifestly a matter concerning which he might be called upon to act officially, by way of review or otherwise. Whether he acted strictly within his duty or not, nothing in the rules or regulations forbade his giving his superior information which both deemed to be for the good of the organization, nor acceptance thereof by the latter. Whether their conduct in this respect was proper or not, the written laws of the order leave undetermined, and it was not so unreasonable or unjust as to place it beyond the scope of a reasonable interpretation of the rules and regulations.

Stone's exercise of his power of suspension and appellate jurisdiction conjointly and simultaneously, so as to compel the expulsion of the accused members, or loss of the charter, and thus restrain the liberty of members in respect of their action in the trials is harsh and drastic on its face and decidedly variant from the course of ordinary judicial procedure. But it must be remembered that the association was not formed in absolute accord with the scheme or plan of the state government. The mere reversal of a finding of not guilty by a division would not effect an expulsion of a guilty member. He can be eliminated only by the action of the division itself, and the chief's power over the division is his control of its charter. In what other way could he compel an obdurate division to expel members plainly and indisputably guilty of the most reprehensible conduct? Must the division be permitted, if it so wills, to let all of its rules and regulations become dead letter law, and thus make itself an impediment to the maintenance of an efficient organization, an obstruction to the achievement of the social object, and a disgrace to the association? It cannot be unreasonable to say the two powers vested in the official head of the organization may be conjointly exercised in plain cases. If they can be so used in such cases, the right to determine whether they may be in doubtful cases necessarily follows, and belongs to the association tribunals, not the courts.

[12-14] If the members of a division should expel a member on some ground not recognized by the laws, rules, and regulations, or without notice or trial, or without any evidence against him, under a threat of suspension of the charter, they might be liable, for purely arbitrary and tyrannical action on the part of the official head of the organization would no doubt be inefficacious to protect himself, his association, or those acting under his orders. People v. New York Produce Exchange, 149 N. Y. 401, 44 N. E. 84; Society for Visitation of Sick v. Commonwealth, 52 Pa. St. 125, 91 Am. Dec. 139; People v. Young Men's, etc., Soc., 65 Barb. (N. Y.) 357; Rex v. Faversham, 8 T. R. 356. Though the plaintiffs denied the charges preferred against them and may not have been guilty, there was some evidence against them. They had been in Mastin's office just before the crews were cut and held a conversation with him in which reference was made to the electric motors and expressed the opinion that they were, or would be, entitled to them. Moreover, they had previously seen Bill, the assistant, who swears they requested assignment to those motors, and that he communicated their request to Mastin before the crews were cut. Keith, another engineer, swears Simpson invited him to unite with him in a demand for the electric motors, saying they might be able to "bluff" the railroad officials into compliance with their request. In the new assignments they got the electric motors. They may not have been guilty, but the existence of evidence against them cannot be successfully denied.

Whether it was sufficient or not was a question for the division in the first instance, and later for the Grand Chief Engineer if the Grand International Division concurs in his construction of the constitution and statutes. While his opinion that there was a decided preponderance of evidence against the accused may not have been well founded, the evidence afforded bases for two intelligent and reasonable opinions as to the preponderance thereof. Stone swears he has exercised the powers and authority he applied in these two cases on previous occasions without any protest or dissent on the part of the Grand International Division.

Right to expel on the same charges on which the accused has previously been acquitted, under the mandate of a superior officer or tribunal exercising appellate jurisdiction, depends upon the same principle. It is a question of private social law, either determined by the express terms of the constituting instruments, by-laws, rules and regulation, or by fair and reasonable interpretation of provisions thereof, relating to the subject. Neither the constitution, statutes, nor rules of the association forbid the placing of an accused member in jeopardy a second time. If, in the absence of any provision on the subject, there is a presumption of intent to adopt this provision of organic state law, it is clearly overthrown by the practically unlimited powers vested in the Grand International Division to whom the Grand Chief Engineer makes his triennial reports, and whose representative and spokesman he is, when that body is not in session. In the absence of an express provision, guaranteeing immunity from second trial for the same offense, the right of interpretation and construction exists, and that right is vested in the grand Chief Engineer. When his decision is reported to the G. I. D., it is subject to the action of that body, which has "exclusive jurisdiction over all subjects pertaining to the Brotherhood," whose "enactments and decisions upon all questions are the supreme law of the Brotherhood," to which "all divisions and members of the order shall render true obedience." Con. G. I. B. of L. E. § 3. The courts cannot interpose in advance of the decision of a body having such plenary powers, and hold that its representative has no power to do what it clearly has power to ratify or order. The powers thus vested in it expressly exclude any presumption of intent to adopt the limitations and rules of the civil laws, respecting either procedure or substantive rights in the order. They do not override legal limitations imposed upon the powers of such organizations, of course, but nothing in the civil law inhibits a second trial of a member of a voluntary association for the same offense against his will. Ordinarily, the courts deny the existence of any presumption of intent to bind such associations to the modes of procedure prescribed by public law. Gray v. Christian Society, 137 Mass. 329, 50 Am. Rep. 310; Spilman v. Supreme Council of the Home Circle, 157 Mass. 128, 31 N. E. 776; People v. St. George Soc., 28 Mich. 261; Kelly v. Grand Circle, 40 Wash. 691, 82 Pac. 1007; Marcus v. National Council, 123 Minn. 145, 143 N. W. 265; Kulberg v. National Council, 124 Minn. 437, 145 N. W. 120; Pepin v. Société St. Jean Baptiste, 24 R. I. 550, 54 Atl. 47, 60 L. R. A. 626; Murray v. Supreme Hive, 112 Tenn. 664, 80 S. W. 827. An apparently contrary holding is found in Commonwealth v. Guardians of the Poor, 6 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 469, but that was a public corporation governed, as to its organization and rights of members, by public law, not by contract. Moreover, there seems to have been no mode of correction by appeal. The corporation was not a subordinate organization of a larger body having supervisory power over it, and the member expelled had had no notice of the second trial.

The propositions on which these observations stand are obvious corollaries of others to which the courts have yielded practically unanimous assent. The expulsion of a member of a voluntary association, whether incorporated or not, after notice, an opportunity to be heard and a trial fairly conducted agreeably to the laws of the association, is conclusive upon the civil courts. State ex rel. Smith v. County Court, 78 W. Va. 259, 88 S. E. 796; Bogges v. Buxton, 67 W. Va. 679, 69 S. E. 367, 21 Ann. Cas. 289; Committee v. County Court, 68 W. Va. 113, 69 S. E. 522; Wilcox v. Supreme Council, 210 N. Y. 370, 104 N. E. 624, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 806, note citing numerous cases. "Where the society makes provision for the settlement of controversies between it and its members, or between its members, concerning its government, its dissolution, or its property, courts will refuse to take cognizance of such controversies until those who have grievances, have in the first instance, resorted to and exhausted the remedies provided by the society. * * * The mere provision of such a means abridges the right to appeal to the courts until the prescribed means have been pursued. This rule prevails in matters of discipline, in the expulsion and suspension of members, and arises from the fact that in such cases the controversy springs from the contract of membership, and is a matter of internal regulation." Niblack, Ben. Soc. & Acc. Ins. § 111; Smith v. County Court, cited; Grand Lodge, K. of P. v. People, 60 Ill. App. 550; Oliver v. Hopkins, 144 Mass. 175, 10 N. E. 776; Zeliff v. Grand Lodge, K. of P., 53 N. J. Law, 536, 22 Atl. 63; Whitty v. McCarthy, 20 R. I. 792, 36 Atl. 129.

Whether malice on the part of the members voting for expulsion, under the circumstances stated, would constitute a good cause of action, need not be determined, for there is no evidence of its existence, sufficient to sustain a verdict founded upon it. The trial court correctly so ruled by his peremptory instruction to find for the individual defendants. On the last trials, the vote was taken under the mandate of a superior officer, claiming right and power under the laws of the organization, to annul the acquittals on the ground that they were against the clear weight of evidence, and required the division to expel the accused members. This introduced an entirely new element into the cases. It became necessary for each member to determine for himself whether Stone possessed the authority he claimed and whether the law of the association required submission to his orders. The change of attitude of members was on its face a submission to an assertion of superior authority, wherefore it raises no inference of malice or misconduct. Huff and Simpson were not friends. On two previous occasions they had had altercations, but there is nothing in the evidence tending to prove that Huff was actuated by any ill will in what he did respecting the charges. He had not attended the first two trials, and on the last did no more than explain the reason for his having brought the others to the attention of the Grand Chief Engineer. At his own request, he was excused from voting, and there is no proof that he otherwise exercised any personal influence he may have had over other members.

Lack of jurisdiction of the Grand International Brotherhood requires reversal of the judgment, and setting aside of the verdict against it, but the judgment in favor of the individual defendants must be affirmed. the trial court's instruction to the jury to find for them having been properly given. As nothing can be decided against the association without jurisdiction, and the judgment in favor of the other defendants is free from error and completely discharges them, there is no occasion to deal with the numerous assignments of error, based upon the other rulings of the court during the progress of the trial. As to the Grand International Brotherhood, the cases will be remanded, with leave to the plaintiffs to acquire jurisdiction of its members by proper process and proceed with a new trial, if they shall see fit so to do.

KNOTTS v. BARTLETT et al. (No. 3626.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 4, 1919.)

1. CONTRACTS §169, 170(1)—CONSTRUCTION OF WRITTEN AGREEMENT—CIRCUMSTANCES.

Where the language of a written agreement is ambiguous or incomplete, or the purpose contemplated obscure, the court, in an endeavor to interpret its meaning and ascertain its subject-matter and purpose, will look to the circumstances surrounding the parties at the time they entered into it, and the acts done by them in carrying it into execution.

2. PLEADING §312—SUIT FOR ACCOUNTING—BILL—INCONSISTENCY—EXHIBIT.

Where a bill alleges the formation of a partnership for the purpose of securing options and leases upon oil and gas properties for oil and gas purposes, and for the actual development and drilling for oil and gas, if deemed advisable and necessary, and also the performance of acts tending to show the concurrence of the parties in such intention, an exhibit filed with the bill, showing an agreement that one of the parties was to pay the traveling expenses of the other in securing such "options," to be taken in the name of the former, and that the net profits were to be divided, when construed in relation to allegations, admitted on demurrer, of acts done pursuant to such agreement, will not be deemed inconsistent therewith.

3. PLEADING §214(3)—BILL FOR DISSOLUTION AND ACCOUNTING—BILL—EXHIBIT—DEMURRER.

Where a bill for the dissolution of a partnership and an accounting alleges the formation of the partnership for certain purposes, and acts done thereunder tending to show such to have been the intention of the parties, and an exhibit filed with the bill is not inconsistent therewith, on demurrer it will be taken as true that a partnership for such purposes was formed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County.

Bill by J. Bowan Knotts against Fred W. Bartlett and others. Decree for defendant Bartlett, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

W. M. Hess, of Mannington, for appellant.

L. S. Schwenck, of Mannington, and Harry Shaw and W. S. Meredith, both of Fairmont, for appellees.

LYNOH, J. The original and amended bills, dismissed upon demurrer, allege a partnership between plaintiff and defendant Fred W. Bartlett for the purpose of dealing in oil and gas leases or "options" covering lands in Marion, Wetzel, and other counties of this state and elsewhere, and the exploration or development of the leased premises for these products, if the parties so elect, and the actual and profitable development of some of the lands through operations thereon by sublessees, who also are named defendants, and pray for a decree to require Bartlett to account to plaintiff for his share of the oil wrongfully withheld by Bartlett, and for a disclosure by defendant Eureka Pipe Line Company of the quantity of oil produced from the leasehold estates, and for other relief.

[1] The chief argument in support of the ruling upon the demurrer is directed against the agreement copied into and filed with and made a part of the amended bill, particularly as to its sufficiency to show the formation of the partnership alleged in both bills. This is the contract:

4. § For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

"December 13, 1915.

"I hereby agree to pay J. B. Knotts traveling expenses in securing an option on the Kingley and Burgess oil property, or any other properties; said options are to be taken in my name and the net profits is [are] to be divided.

"F. W. Bartlett."

J. B. Knotts is the plaintiff, J. Bowan Knotts, and F. W. Bartlett is the defendant Fred W. Bartlett.

The terms of the contract, apparently a mere memorandum of the agreement, are enlarged by the allegations of the bills, and the allegations are admitted by the demurrer. They disclose the real object of the parties in entering into the agreement, namely, to effectuate a common enterprise upon the terms agreed upon as evidenced by the exhibit. That paper appellee Bartlett would have us interpret to mean only that the parties intended a mere joint enterprise devoted exclusively to the acquirement of options to buy and sell oil properties for profit, Knotts to contribute his time and experience, and Bartlett to bear the necessary expense, and both to participate in the net profits realized from the sales. In answer to that argument it is necessary now to say only that neither party acted upon that interpretation, and it is not consistent with the express declarations of the bills. Among other things the bills allege that—

"said Bartlett and your orator (Knotts) on the said 13th day of December, 1915, entered into an agreement between themselves forming a partnership, for the purpose of taking, securing, and handling options and leases upon oil and gas properties * * * for oil and gas purposes and development, and, if deemed advisable and necessary, for the actual development and drilling for oil and gas on such of the leases which they should take or secure, as they should determine to drill and develop, or procure the drilling and development of."

[2, 3] The contracts secured and sublet were leases for the production of oil and gas from lands in Marion county, taken and procured by Knotts in the name of Bartlett as lessee, and delivered to him by Knotts, and with reference to which Bartlett acted in subletting them to Carnegie Natural Gas Company upon condition that if oil were produced, as subsequently it was, Bartlett was to have the well or wells upon his reimbursing the operator for the money expended for that purpose, and the operator to have the well or wells upon the annual payment of rentals if gas only was produced. In other words, Bartlett acted in accord with the charges preferred by the bills, the truth of whose allegations he admits. By this admission he also interprets the contract as the plaintiff interprets it.

The word "option" does not necessarily definitely define or limit the business to which the partnership was to be devoted.

If it may properly be said to have that effect, yet the parties were competent to give it a wider meaning, as they have done, if what Bartlett actually did may be accepted as indicating such an enlargement. Furthermore, interpreting the contract as he suggests, he cannot now lawfully exclude his partner from participation in the emoluments accrued, if he himself has departed from the strict letter of the contract. If the object was, as he says, to sell the leases, or "options" if he prefers that word, and divide the profits, he should have adhered to the accomplishment of that object and not have departed from it. His departure does not justify the wrong complained of or warrant the course pursued by him. For where his acts are construed in connection with the contract, as plaintiff interpreted it in his pleadings, there is concord, not discord, between them. Conceding the language to be of doubtful import or ambiguous, though it seems clear enough as far as it goes to define the relation of the parties to each other, yet where the parties, by their acts and conduct, concur in its construction and interpretation, courts regard and give effect to their exposition, when to do so does not violate the rules of law or infringe upon public policy. Clark v. Sayers, 55 W. Va. 512, 47 S. E. 312. This is an often repeated and well-established canon of construction.

If Bartlett did not intend to say what the language used means, and what he has interpreted it to mean, why did he not make the meaning clear? Why provide for the taking of options in his name if he simply employed Knotts to secure options for him? Many matters are left open by the memorandum, but the door of inquiry into their real meaning is not closed, as counsel would have us believe. It is the duty of a court to ascertain what the parties meant to accomplish, what they had in mind, and, to do so, to give due regard to their intention, their situation, the subject-matter of the agreement, and the method of achieving the object contemplated, unless they themselves have made these things plain. Heatherly v. Bank, 31 W. Va. 70, 5 S. E. 754; Myers v. Carnahan, 61 W. Va. 414, 57 S. E. 134; Shrewsbury v. Tufts, 41 W. Va. 212, 23 S. E. 692.

There can be no doubt of the soundness of the doctrine relied on by appellee Bartlett, and quoted from section 1189, Page on Contracts regarding the repository of the common intention of the parties to a contract reduced to writing and unambiguous in its terms; or of the statement of the law in Donahue v. Rafferty, 96 S. E. 935, regarding the incorporation of an exhibit in a pleading purporting to file it; or in Board of Education v. Berry, 62 W. Va. 433, 59 S. E. 169, 125 Am. St. Rep. 975, and Freeman v. Carnegie Natural Gas Co., 74 W. Va. 83, 81 S. E. 572, regarding the effect of such exhibits upon the pleading. There is, however, doubt as their applicability to the facts here presented, chiefly for the reasons heretofore given and also in the cases referred to.

In Donahue v. Rafferty the issue was whether an exhibit filed to show the terms of a sale of real estate by public outcry could be considered as refuting an allegation of title; in Board of Education v. Berry and Freeman v. Gas Co., whether, in case of discrepancy between them, the exhibits controlled the allegations or the allegations the exhibits. Considered upon the uncontroverted, indeed admitted, facts of the instant case, there is no conflict. Nothing in the paper exhibited is inconsistent with, or in conflict with, any statement contained in the bill. Counsel point us to none. If any existed, the exhibit, being the repository of the actual contract, would, when properly interpreted, control, as held in the decisions cited. But we see neither conflict nor inconsistency, though apparently the parties interested in the contract do not concur in their interpretation of the paper.

The bill alleges acts done by Bartlett, among others the granting to the Carnegie Natural Gas Company of drilling rights on the leases obtained by Knotts, and his submission of the agreement to the latter for his approval, all of which, admitted to be true, tend to establish as a fact that the parties did not deal on the basis of a strict construction of the term "option" in the agreement of December 13, 1915, but apparently gave to it a wider scope, comprehending either a sale of the leases so acquired, or their development when deemed advisable and necessary. In no other way could the profits which were to be divided be obtained. Further, according to the memorandum, the labor of the plaintiff was unlimited as to time and territory. He was to acquire leases wherever they could be had. The employment was not confined to any one transaction. His interest did not by the terms of the contract cease because the leases were taken in Bartlett's name or upon the procurement of any particular lease. Any other property on which leases could be obtained by Knotts was within the terms of the contract.

Therefore having construed the exhibit not to be inconsistent with the express allegations of the bill setting forth the formation of a partnership for the procurement of options and leases, and their development when deemed advisable and necessary, it will be taken as true upon demurrer that a partnership has been formed for the purposes therein set forth. That fact being admitted, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the effect of the cases of Sodiker v. Applegate, 24 W. Va. 411, 49 Am. Rep. 252, Clark v. Emery, 58 W. Va. 637, 52 S. E. 770, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 503, and Tyler v. Teter, 75 W. Va. 217, 83 S. E. 906, relied on by appellee. They have bearing only where the formation of a partnership is a disputed question, not, as here, where it is admitted. Upon the trial of the case upon its merits some of the allegations of the bill may be disproved, and then, when the question of the formation of the partnership is a disputed one on the evidence, the cases will have an important bearing.

Under these circumstances shall we say, as counsel contend we must, that Knotts has no rights that equity can or will enforce; that he has an adequate remedy at law, notwithstanding the allegations of the bills and the need of the discovery for which he prays, and must therefore be relegated to a legal forum for the redress of his grievances? To that question, considered in connection with the facts admitted to be true and the law applicable to them as herein enunciated, the only answer is that facts so admitted bring the case within the often reiterated rule that, to deny the right to relief in equity, the legal remedy must be equally efficacious and capable of adjudicating once and for all the rights involved. Warren v. Boggs, 97 S. E. 589.

These reasons lead us to direct the entry of an order reversing the decree and remanding the cause.

LANIER v. JOHN L. ROPER LUMBER CO.
et al. (No. 222.)

1. ACTION ¶45(1)—MISJOINDER—INCONSISTENT CAUSE OF ACTION.

Where grantor in conveying large tract of land included land previously conveyed, prior grantee cannot sue to recover, on ground of fraud, purchase money paid subsequent grantee for property, and in same action sue to set aside subsequent deeds, and to recover damages for cutting of timber on the land; the two causes of action being inconsistent.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶193(2)—WAIVER OF DEFECT—MISJOINDER.

Where no objection was made to complaint on the ground that two inconsistent causes of action were joined, the court, on appeal, will consider the causes of action separately.

3. ELECTION OF REMEDIES ¶3(4)—CONVEYANCE TO THIRD PARTY.

Where grantor in conveying tract of land included land previously conveyed, prior grantee cannot claim, from estate of such subsequent grantee on ground of fraud in having his land so included, purchase money paid the subsequent grantee upon the subsequent grantee's conveyance of the property to a third person, and also claim the land from the third person, his only right to the money being on ground that the subsequent grantee acquired title.

4. DEEDS ¶76—FRAUD—VALIDITY—VOIDABLE DEED.

Where deed is procured by grantee after having surveyed land, and included in deed land previously conveyed to third party, with knowledge of prior conveyance, and that prior grantee is in possession, and where grantor, who is able to read, is not prevented from reading deed before signing it, and is not misled into signing paper he had not intended to sign, the deed, if procured by fraud, is merely voidable, and not void; there being no fraud in the factum.

5. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ¶228(3), 233—VALIDITY—REGISTRATION.

Under Connor Act (Revisal 1905, § 980), title to land is in subsequent grantee, where subsequent deed is registered before prior deed, though subsequent grantee had notice of prior deed; notice being insufficient to take place of registration.

6. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ¶232(8)—POSSESSION UNDER UNRECORDED DEED.

Under Connor Act (Revisal 1905, § 980), title to land is in subsequent grantee, whose deed is registered before prior deed, although grantee under prior deed was in possession of land at time of the subsequent conveyance.

7. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ¶239(9)—FRAUD—INNOCENT PURCHASER—TITLE.

Purchaser for value without notice gets title unaffected by fraud of grantor in acquiring title.

8. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ¶238—FRAUD—INNOCENT PURCHASER—CONVEYANCE TO PARTY WITH NOTICE.

Where purchaser for value without notice of fraud conveys property, second purchaser gets good title, though it has notice of the fraud.

9. PLEADING ¶8(15)—FRAUD—CONCLUSIONS.

Allegation that grantor was induced by deceit to sign the deed, without stating the facts, held insufficient allegation of fraud.

Appeal from Superior Court, Duplin County; Gulon, Judge.

Action by B. M. Lanier against the John L. Roper Lumber Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action against the Roper Lumber Company to recover damages for cutting certain timber on the land described in the complaint, and against the administrator and heirs of Jefferson Lanier to recover the purchase price of the same.

In 1898 John T. Batts, who was then the owner of the land, executed a deed purporting to convey the same to the plaintiff, who was then under 21 years of age. This deed was not registered until February 5, 1904.

On the 27th of November, 1902, the said Batts sold this land and other lands to Jefferson Lanier, and executed a deed to the said Lanier, purporting to convey the same, which deed was registered on the 27th of December, 1902, prior to the registration of the deed to the plaintiff.

On April 6, 1906, the said Jefferson Lanier sold the timber on said lands to the Blades Lumber Company for $12,000, and executed his deed conveying the same, which was registered April 11, 1906, and thereafter the Blades Lumber Company sold and conveyed said timber to the defendant the Roper Lumber Company.

The plaintiff became 21 years of age in February, 1910, and this action was commenced October 27, 1918.

The plaintiff claims that the land conveyed to him in 1898 was embraced in the deed to Jefferson Lanier in 1902 by fraud, and that therefore he is entitled to recover damages of the Roper Lumber Company for cutting the timber, and if this is not so that he should recover of the administrator and heirs of Jefferson Lanier the purchase money paid by the Blades Lumber Company.

The defendants deny fraud and plead the ten and three year statutes of limitations, to which the plaintiff replies that he discovered the facts constituting the fraud within three years before this action was commenced.

The plaintiff knew on February 5, 1904, that the land he claims and which is described in the complaint was included in the deed to Jefferson Lanier.

It was admitted that the Blades Lumber Company paid Jefferson Lanier $12,000 for the timber conveyed in its deed, and there is no allegation in the complaint that the Blades Lumber Company had notice of any fraud or irregularity, or that he knew of the execution of the deed to the plaintiff by Batts.

The allegations in the complaint as to the Roper Lumber Company are that it knew the value of the timber lands of Jefferson Lanier, and did not pay near their value, that it knew of the existence of the deed to the plaintiff at the time of its purchase, and that Jefferson Lanier had bought for much less than the real value, and that the plaintiff was in possession of the land at the time of the purchase. It is also alleged that at the time of the cutting of the timber in 1916 the Roper Lumber Company had notice of the pendency of an action by the plaintiff against the heirs of Jefferson Lanier to set aside the deed executed to him by Batts in so far as it interfered with the deed executed to the plaintiff in 1898, which action resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff.

The allegations of fraud against the administrator and heirs of Jefferson Lanier are that Lanier bought from Batts for much less than the true value; that Lanier knew of the deed to the plaintiff when he bought; that his contract with Batts was for the purchase of the lands owned by Batts, and was not intended to cover the lands conveyed to the plaintiff in 1898, and that Lanier had the land surveyed and included in the deed all of said land. It is also alleged that Batts was an ignorant man and unskilled in business, and that he was induced to sign the deed by the deceit of Lanier, but it is not alleged that Batts could not read, or that any act or representation of Lanier induced the execution of the deed which he signed.

Upon the admissions made by the parties and upon the pleadings his honor rendered judgment in favor of the defendants, holding that the Roper Lumber Company was the owner of the timber, and therefore not liable in damages, and that the cause of action against the administrator and heirs of Jefferson Lanier was barred by the statute of limitations, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

ALLEN, J. [1-3] The two causes of action alleged in the complaint—one against the Roper Lumber Company to set aside the deeds under which it claims and recover damages for cutting the timber on the land, and the other against the administrator and heirs of Jefferson Lanier to recover the purchase money of the land—are inconsistent, and cannot be prosecuted at the same time, as one repudiates the deed executed to the Blades Lumber Company, and the other affirms it; but as there is no objection made on the ground of a misjoinder, we will consider the causes of action separately, although we might dispose of the appeal as to the Lumber Company by the admission of the plaintiff, appearing in the judgment, that "in this action he is undertaking to follow the fund received by Jefferson Lanier from said Blades Lumber Company for said timber, to recover his proportion thereof from the administrator and heirs at law of the said Jefferson Lanier, defendants herein, upon the grounds set out in his complaint," which he cannot do except upon the ground that the Blades Lumber Company acquired title to the land which it passed to the Roper Lumber Company. He cannot claim the purchase money of the land, and also the land and timber.

If, however, there was one action against the lumber company alone to recover damages for cutting the timber, would the plaintiff be entitled to recover? The answer to the question depends on who had the title to the timber at the time it was cut, and this requires some investigation into the allegations of fraud.

Assuming these allegations to be sufficient, they consist in an allegation that Lanier knew of the deed to the plaintiff when he bought; that the plaintiff was then in possession of the land; that Lanier had the land surveyed and included the plaintiff's land in his deed, and that he induced Batts to sign the deed by deceit.

There is no allegation that Batts could not read, or that anything was said or done to prevent him from reading the deed before signing, or that the deed was read to him incorrectly, or that he did not sign the paper he intended to sign, and if fraud is alleged it falls within the class of fraud in the treaty or consideration which renders the instrument voidable, and not fraud in the factum.

"An instance of fraud in the factum is when the grantor intends to execute a certain deed, and another is surreptitiously substituted in the place of it. See Gant v. Hunsucker [34 N. C. 254, 55 Am. Dec. 408], and Nichols v. Holmes [46 N. C. 360], ubi supra. Another instance is afforded by the case of a deed executed by a blind or illiterate person, when it has been read falsely to him upon his request to have it read. 2 Black Com. 304; Manser's Case, 2 Coke's Rep. 3. These authorities show that the party was fraudulently made to sign, seal and deliver a different instrument from that which he intended, so that it could not be said to be his deed. Several of the cases in our Reports, referred to above, furnish examples of what is meant by fraud in the consideration of the deed, or in the false representation of some matter or thing collateral to it. In all of them it will be seen that the party knowingly executes the very instrument which he intended, but is induced to do so by means of some fraud in the treaty, or some fraudulent representation or pretense. In this category is included the case of a man who can read the instrument which he signs, seals and delivers, but refuses or neglects to do so. Such a man is bound by the deed at law, though a court of equity may give relief against it." McArthur v. Johnson, 61 N. C. 319, 93 Am. Dec. 593, approved in Medlin v. Buford, 115 N. C. 269, 20 S. E. 463; Griffin v. Lumber Co., 140 N. C. 519, 53 S. E. 307, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 463.

[4-6] If so, and there was fraud, the deed from Batts to Lanier was valid until set aside, and conveyed the title under the Connor Act, because it was registered before the deed to the plaintiff (Mintz v. Russ, 161 N. C. 538, 77 S. E. 851), and this is true although Lanier had notice of the plaintiff's deed, as "no notice to the purchaser, * * * however full and formal, will supply the place of registration" (Quinnerly v. Quinnerly, 114 N. C. 145, 19 S. E. 99, approved in Tremaine v. Williams, 144 N. C. 116, 56 S. E. 694), and although the plaintiff was in possession of the land, the protection given under the proviso to Revisal, § 980 (Connor Act), to those in possession under an unregistered deed or against those having notice of the deed, being restricted to cases where the deeds were executed prior to December 1, 1885. Collins v. Davis, 132 N. C. 109, 43 S. E. 579. See Wood v. Lewey, 153 N. C. 402, 69 S. E. 268, and cases cited, for a discussion of these principles.

[7, 8] Lanier then, having obtained the title conveyed the timber to the Blades Lumber Company for value, and there being nothing on the face of the Lanier deed to put the lumber company on notice, and no allegation that it had notice of any fraud, it was a purchase for value without notice, and its title was indefeasible, and when it subsequently conveyed to the Roper Lumber Company the latter company acquired the title of its vendor, although it might have had notice of fraud, and having title to the timber there can be no recovery against it.

"This principle—that a purchaser with notice, from one without notice, is protected by his vendor's want of notice—is a familiar one, and does not seem to be seriously questioned by counsel. Bassett v. Norsworthy, 2 White & T. Lead. (Cas. Eq. 31, notes; 1 Bigelow, Frauds, 402; Taylor v. Kelly, 3 Jones' Eq. [56 N. C.] 240; Wallace v. Cohen, 111 N. C. 103 [15 S. E. 892]."
Arrington v. Arrington, 114 N. C. 166, 19 S. E. 356.

See 39 Cyc. 1650.

We have thus far considered the appeal in the most favorable light for the plaintiff, but there are really no sufficient allegations of fraud, of which the Roper Company is said to have had notice, and the allegations against Lanier are defective.

[9] It was not fraudulent in Lanier to have the land surveyed, or to buy with knowledge that the plaintiff held an unregistered deed for a part of the land conveyed to him, or when the plaintiff was in possession, and the allegation that Batts was induced to sign the deed by deceit, without stating the facts, is insufficient, as "it is a fundamental rule of pleading that when a plaintiff intends to charge fraud he must do so clearly and directly, by either setting forth facts which in law constitute fraud, or by charging that conduct not fraudulent in law is rendered so in fact by the corrupt or dishonest intent with which it is done." Merrimon v. Paving Co., 142 N. C. 552, 55 S. E. 370, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 574.

The cause of action against the administrator and heirs of Jefferson Lanier is barred by the statute of limitations, as it appears that the plaintiff knew his land was embraced in the deed to Lanier in 1904, and the deed to the Blades Lumber Company was on record in 1906, and he attained his majority in 1910, more than three years before this action was commenced. Sanderlin v. Cross, 172 N. C. 243, 90 S. E. 213.

AMERICAN NAT. BANK v. SAVANNAH TRUST CO. et al. (No. 281.)

BANKS AND BANKING — 171(5)—RECEIVING CHECK FOR COLLECTION — NEGLIGENCE — FAILURE TO GIVE NOTICE OF LOSS OR NON-PAYMENT.

If plaintiff bank, after receiving a check for collection and after giving defendant trust company, sender, credit therefor, delayed for 40 days to inform defendant that check had been lost or not paid, and the drawer in the meantime became insolvent, plaintiff cannot recover from defendant the sum lost by such negligent delay irrespective of whether drawee bank would have paid the check if promptly presented.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by the American National Bank against the Savannah Trust Company, and the Wachovia Loan & Trust Company as garnishee. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Error.

This action was brought to recover $705, with interest, being the amount of the deposit of the plaintiff in the defendant Savannah Trust Company.

The defendant trust company sent to plaintiff bank from Savannah by mail in November, 1912, a check drawn by Lybrand & Co. on the bank of Swansea, S. C., payable to the Reliance Fertilizer Company. Defendant bank gave credit to the Reliance Fertilizer Company for the amount of the check, and the fertilizer company checked on the same in the usual course of business.

The plaintiff bank received the check at Wilmington on November 22, 1912, credited it to the defendant Savannah Trust Company, and in the usual course of business said credit was balanced off by dealings between the two banks. On the 22d or 23d of November, the plaintiff sent the check directly to the bank of Swansea on which it was drawn for collection. The plaintiff did not mention or intimate to the Savannah Trust Company that the check was not paid until more than a month afterwards by letter dated December 30th, and received by the bank in Savannah Monday, January 2d.

When the defendant notified the payee, the Reliance Fertilizer Company, that the check had not been paid, the defendant trust company requested the fertilizer company to allow the amount to be charged back to them, which said company refused to do because of the length of time that had elapsed, and the defendant trust company admitted its liability on account of the lapse of time.

The check has never been paid, although both the plaintiff and the trust company have tried to collect it; the latter doing so as a courtesy and not a duty. The plaintiff then, because the defendant trust company refused to reimburse the plaintiff, brought this suit attaching the trust company's funds.

From a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant appealed.

John D. Bellamy & Son, of Wilmington, for appellants.

McClammy & Burgwin, of Wilmington, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. When this case was here on the former appeal (Bank v. Trust Co., 172 N. C. 344, 90 S. E. 302), the court held that it was negligence per se for a bank to send a draft or check for collection to the bank on which the check was drawn, and further that when the bank which has committed such negligence sues the bank, which had forwarded the check, for the amount which had been credited, and such original bank sets up as a counterclaim the negligence of the plaintiff in not notifying it of nonpayment, and in the delay of over a month without inquiry, that this was negligence per se, but that the burden of proof rested on the correspondent bank, which had forwarded the check to the plaintiff bank, to show that it had sustained damages, which raised an issue for the jury.

The defendant asked the court to charge:

"If defendant had paid cash for the draft to the Reliance Fertilizer Company and admitted its liability for same, then if the jury shall find from the evidence, by the greater weight, that the plaintiff was negligent in not notifying the defendant within a reasonable time of the non-payment, and thereby put it out of the ability of the defendant or its customer to collect the check, the defendant would not be liable to plaintiff in this action, and it would be your duty to answer the issue, 'No.'"

The court so charged, but erred in adding:

"Provided you further find the check would have been paid if it had been presented in due course and but for the negligence of the plaintiff."

If the plaintiff, after giving credit to its customer for the check, remitted to it, and though the check would not have been paid if presented, still if for 40 days it delayed to inform the customer that the check had been lost or had not been paid, and in the meantime the drawer, Lybrand, had become insolvent, thus depriving the customer bank of the recovery from Lybrand of the amount which it had credited and paid to the fertilizer company for such check, the plaintiff bank certainly cannot recover the sum thus lost by its customer by such negligent delay, and this irrespective of the fact, if it be a fact, that the drawee bank would not have paid the check if promptly presented, or even if it was presented and payment refused. It was the duty of the plaintiff bank to give prompt notice of the refusal to pay or of the loss of the check, so that the customer bank should have opportunity to protect itself.

If upon the evidence the jury shall find that, if such notice had been given in due course by the plaintiff bank, the customer bank could have saved itself from loss, then the jury should have found upon the issue that the defendant bank was entitled to recover on its counterclaim any loss it sustained by reason of such negligent delay.

It is not necessary in this view to consider the other exceptions.

STATE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE v.
WHITE OAK-BUCKLE DRAINAGE
DIST. et al. (No. 252.)(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 19, 1919.)1. DRAINS ⇐2(2)—ADVANCEMENT BY STATE
—RECOVERY OF MONEY.

While Pub. Laws 1911, c. 67, § 14, was repealed by Laws 1915, c. 235, § 1, the latter act, in view of section 2 thereof, did not destroy the obligation to repay to the board of agriculture money previously advanced.

2. DRAINS ⇐19 — ADVANCEMENT BY STATE —LIABILITY OF DRAINAGE DISTRICT.

Under Pub. Laws 1911, c. 67, § 14, a drainage district organized under Laws 1909, c. 442, as amended by the Act of 1911, is liable for money advanced to a drainage engineer according to Laws 1909, c. 442, § 2, although the drainage commissioners did not expressly authorize the expense, and the drainage district did not receive any practical benefit.

3. STATUTES ⇐206—CONSTRUCTION.

An entire statute should be examined to ascertain its meaning, and force and effect should be given to every part of it, reconciling, when reasonably possible, any seeming conflicts by comparing its sections and provisions with each other.

4. DRAINS ⇐20—ADVANCEMENT TO DRAIN-AGE DISTRICTS—ACTION TO RECOVER—PAR-TIES.

In action by state board of agriculture against drainage district to recover money paid to drainage engineer employed under Pub. Laws 1911, c. 67, § 14, state treasurer is a proper, if not necessary, party plaintiff, and upon request will be made a party, where he agrees to abide by proceedings and judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Allen, Judge.

Action by the State Board of Agriculture against the White Oak-Buckle Drainage District and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The state treasurer, on March 25, 1912, paid out of the funds of the state board of agriculture the sum of $1,125.85, for the compensation and expenses of the drainage engineer of the defendant the White Oak-Buckle drainage district and his necessary assistants. The payment of this amount, and the purpose for which it was paid, are admitted. It is admitted, further, that the bonds issued by the district have been sold, and were sold August 1, 1916. The district was organized under chapter 442, Public Laws of 1909; the engineer was appointed, upon recommendation of the state geologist, and the compensation of the engineer and his assistants and their expenses were paid out of the funds of the state board of agriculture, under section 14, chapter 67, of the

"That the state treasurer shall pay the compensation and expenses of the drainage engineer and his necessary assistants as provided in section 2 of chapter 442 of the Public Laws of 1909, according to an itemized statement approved by the clerk of the court, to whom the petition for a drainage district was made, and the state geologist, upon warrant of the state auditor, out of any money in the state treasury to the credit of the department of agriculture: Provided, that said sum or sums shall be refunded to the state treasurer to the credit of the department of agriculture by the petitioners for the drainage district if the drainage district is not established: Provided further, that if the drainage district is established said sum or sums shall be refunded to the state treasurer to the credit of the department of agriculture out of the first moneys received from the sale of the bonds of said drainage district: Provided, that the total amount loaned by the state treasury out of the funds to the credit of the department of agriculture for the purpose set forth in this section shall never exceed fifteen thousand dollars ($15,000) at any one time: Provided further, that not more than two thousand dollars shall be advanced to any one district: And provided further, that before any advancement is made for the purposes herein expressed, the bond of the petitioners required by section two of said chapter shall be first approved by the Attorney General."

It was contended, on the argument, that the plaintiff could not recover (1) because section 14, chapter 67, Public Laws of 1911, was repealed by section 1, chapter 235, Public Laws of 1915; (2) because the money was not paid on the request of the commissioners of the drainage district, and has proved to be of no real practical benefit to the defendant.

The court was of the opinion, upon the facts, and so held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount claimed ($1,125.85) with interest from March, 1912, and rendered judgment accordingly. Defendant appealed.

C. D. Weeks, of Wilmington, and J. G. Mills, of Wake Forest, for appellants.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] While section 14, chapter 67, Public Laws of 1911, was repealed by section 1, chapter 235, Laws of 1915, the repealing act was not passed until after the money had been paid and the relation of debtor and creditor existed. Section 14 expressly provided for the refunding or repayment of the amount so paid, whether the district was finally established or not; if established, the amount should be repaid out of the proceeds of the sale of the bonds issued by the district.

The contention of the defendant is that the repeal of the section by chapter 235, Laws of 1915, canceled the obligation, and destroyed the right of the plaintiff to enforce payment. That such was not the intention of the Legislature is clear from the words of section 2, chapter 235, Laws of 1915, as follows:

"That, upon request of the Department of Agriculture, the Attorney General shall bring in the Superior Court of Wake County an action against the drainage commissioners of any drainage district that has failed or may hereafter fail to refund any money advanced by the State Treasurer under the provisions of section 14, chapter 67, of the Public Laws of 1911, the said action to be brought both against the board of drainage commissioners and the bond of the petitioners for the district required by section 2 of chapter 442 of the Public Laws of 1909."

The effect of the act of 1915 was to relieve the state board of agriculture of the burden of advancing money, which was imposed by the act of 1911, but clearly not to destroy the obligation of the debt theretofore contracted. Blair v. Cookley, 136 N. C. 405, 48 S. E. 804; Kearney v. Vann, 154 N. C. 311, 70 S. E. 747, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 1189; McLeod v. Board, 148 N. C. 77, 61 S. E. 605; Johnson v. Carson, 161 N. C. 371, 77 S. E. 307; Manly v. Abernethy, 167 N. C. 220, 83 S. E. 343; Nance v. So. R. Co., 149 N. C. 366, 63 S. E. 116; Clements v. State, 76 N. C. 199; Woodley v. Bond, 66 N. C. 396; Caldwell v. Donaghey, 108 Ark. 60, 156 S. W. 839, 45 L. R. A. (N. S.) 721, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 133, and note. Its operation is prospective in this respect, and was manifestly intended to be. This appears plainly from section 2 of the act of 1915 (chapter 235), which directs the Attorney General of the state to bring an action in Wake superior court against the drainage commissioners and the bondsmen, for the reason that, if it was intended to cancel the indebtedness, such a requirement would not have been made. It would be inconsistent with the defendant's construction of the act of 1915, that it destroyed the debt, if the Attorney General is required to sue upon it at the request of the department of agriculture. How could he recover on a debt which had been forgiven and released to the defendants? A plaintiff cannot recover on a debt when there is no debt.

It is thus apparent that, although section 14 of the act of 1911 (chapter 67), which directed the payment of the money, was repealed, the Legislature preserved, in section 2 of chapter 235 of the Laws of 1915, the right to sue for money already advanced under said act, and, of course, kept the debt alive for that purpose. The money paid by the treasurer was paid under the provisions of the act of 1911, and before its repeal by the act of 1915. As the bonds of the district were not sold until August, 1916, the district having been established before the money was paid, it is doubtful if suit could have been instituted before August, 1916, the date of the sale of the bonds. The fact that the bond of the petitioners is equally liable to the plaintiff does not affect the primary liability of the drainage district and its commissioners. It was their duty, in any event, to have paid the advancement made by the plaintiff out of the bond money.

[2] The defendants further contend that the plaintiffs cannot sue, because they did not authorize the expense. The answer to this is they organized the district under the act of 1909, as amended by the act of 1911. The act of 1909 (Laws 1909, c. 442) provided for the appointment of the drainage engineer upon the recommendation of the state geologist. This was done. The surveys and estimates and plans were made by him and his assistants, and the district established based upon these surveys and estimates. The district received the benefit of the expense; the statute directed these expenses, as well as the compensation of the engineer and his assistants, to be paid by the state treasurer out of the funds of the plaintiff. The acceptance of the money, advanced under the law, involved the promise to repay, unless it was a mere gift or an appropriation. That it was such cannot be, and is not, claimed. The act under which it was paid expressly provided for its repayment by the district, and it was a liability also secured by the bond of those filing the petition for the creation of the district. Having received the money, the defendant cannot repudiate the obligation imposed by the statute to pay it back. If there was no practical benefit derived, it was not the plaintiffs' fault. We have referred to the question of actual benefit, although there is no finding of fact and no assignment of error in regard to it; the single error alleged being that the court did not give proper force and effect to the repealing law.

[3] We have reached our conclusion in accordance, as we think, with the principle which is stated in the defendants' brief, as to the interpretation of statutes, that—

"The law requires, in the interpretation of a statute, that we should give it that meaning which is clearly expressed, and if there is doubt or ambiguity we should construe it so as to ascertain from its language what was the true intention of the Legislature." State v. Johnson, 170 N. C. 687, 691, 86 S. E. 788; McLeod v. Commissioners, 148 N. C. 85, 61 S. E. 605; Fortune v. Commissioners, 140 N. C. 322, 52 S. E. 950; Abernethy v. Commissioners, 169 N. C. 631, 86 S. E. 577; State v. Earnhardt, 170 N. C. 725, 86 S. E. 960; People's Bank v. Loven, 172 N. C. 666, 90 S. E. 948.

The defendants' contention as to the meaning of the act of 1915 would require us to ignore section 2, of chapter 235, Laws of 1915, and confine our construction of the chapter to section 1, repealing section 14 of the Laws of 1911, c. 67. This would violate the settled rule, as we are required to examine the entire statute to ascertain its meaning, and to give force and effect to every part of it, reconciling, when reasonably possible, any seeming conflicts, by comparing its sections and provisions with each other.

"It is not permissible, if it can be reasonably avoided, to put such a construction upon a law as will raise a conflict between different parts of it, but effect should be given to each and every clause and provision. But when there is no way of reconciling conflicting clauses of a statute, and nothing to indicate which the Legislature regarded as of paramount importance, force should be given to those clauses which would make the statute in harmony with the other legislation on the same subject, and which would tend most completely to secure the rights of all persons affected by such legislation." Black's Interpretation of Laws (1896) p. 60, § 32.

And again:

"Where two statutes on the same subject, or on related subjects, are apparently in conflict with each other, they are to be reconciled, by construction, so far as may be, on any fair hypothesis, and validity and effect given to both, if this can be done without destroying the evident intent and meaning of the later act." Id.; Bank v. Loven, supra.

The Legislature undoubtedly intended to change its policy, but as clearly did it manifest the purpose to preserve existing debts and save to the plaintiffs the remedy for their enforcement, and this was a just and righteous purpose.

[4] B. R. Lacy, treasurer of the state, comes into this court and asks to have himself made a party, as one of the plaintiffs; he agreeing to abide by the proceedings and judgment. The request is granted, the court being of the opinion that he is a proper, if not a necessary, party, and that his becoming a party will inure to the benefit and protection of the defendant; he being the receiving and disbursing officer of the fund recovered in this action, under the statute in such cases made and provided. When paid into the state treasury, the money will be held for the benefit of the other plaintiff, and paid out, as directed by law.

There is no error in the record.
Affirmed.

In action for fire from engine of sawmill cutting standing timber, submission to jury of question of liability of owner of timber for negligence of sawmill operator is not ground for reversal, where jury found that sawmill operator was not negligent.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR — 215(2) — OBJECTIONS IN LOWER COURT — MISTAKE IN STATEMENT OF EVIDENCE.

A mistake by the court while endeavoring to rehearse the testimony or to give the evidence of a witness, or the admissions of the parties, cannot be made the subject of a valid exception on appeal, unless the mistake is called to court's attention at the time it is made.

7. TRIAL — 194(15) — INSTRUCTION ON TESTIMONY—PROVINCE OF JURY.

In action for fire from sawmill engine, court's statement "that there was no evidence one way or another as to the absence of a spark arrester," followed by instruction to consider facts to determine whether machinery was otherwise defective, was an instruction on the force and legal effect of the testimony.

8. NEGLIGENCE — 121(3) — OPERATION OF SAWMILL ENGINE—PRIMA FACIE CASE.

Evidence that fire originated from spark or sparker from sawmill engine establishes the prima facie case that such fire was due to defective spark arrester.

9. APPEAL AND ERROR — 1064(2) — REVIEW — PREJUDICIAL ERROR.

In action for fire from sawmill engine, court's statement "that there was no evidence one way or another as to the absence of a spark arrester," followed by instruction to consider facts and determine whether machinery was otherwise defective, where there was evidence tending to show that fire originated from the engine, was prejudicial error; such evidence establishing prima facie case of defective spark arrester.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Allen, Judge.

Separate actions, by Mrs. J. A. Royal and others, by J. B. Winders and others, by Alex. Blackburn and others, and by J. C. Jones, against Pope & Parish and others, were consolidated and tried together. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. New trial.

These were four several actions against the same defendants consolidated without objection, so far as appears, and tried before his honor, O. H. Allen, judge, and a jury, at August term, 1918, of the Superior Court of Sampson county. The actions were by several adjoining proprietors of land to recover damages caused to their lands by fire wrongfully started, as they allege, by defendants or their agents in operating a steam sawmill on the tract of one of the plaintiffs, J. C. Jones, and under a contract at the time between L. N. Dodd, owner and operator of the mill, and defendant J. D. Pope, the owner of the timber. On denial of liability and issues submitted, the jury rendered the following verdict:

"(1) Are the respective plaintiffs the owners of the lands set out in their respective complaints? Answer: Yes.

"(2) Did defendants negligently set fire and burn the lands of the plaintiffs, as alleged, and, if so, which defendants? Answer: No."

Judgment on the verdict for defendants, and plaintiffs, having excepted, appealed.

I. C. Wright, of Wilmington, for appellants.
Butler & Herring, of Clinton, for appellees.

HOKE, J. On the hearing it was made to appear:

That the defendants, P. F. Pope and W. H. Parish, a partnership trading as Pope & Parish, owned the timber, with the right to cut and remove same, on the lands of J. C. Jones, one of plaintiffs, sometimes designated as the Smith, or Jim Smith, place, and in November, 1915, they sold and conveyed the said timber and all their rights and appurtenances in reference thereto to their codefendant, J. D. Pope, who continued to own same to the time of trial. The deed, executed in November, 1915, and duly proved and filed with the register during the trial week, was allowed in evidence by his honor, and plaintiff excepted. That on the 27th of January, 1916, the defendant J. D. Pope, then owner of the timber, contracted with L. N. Dodd, who owned and operated a steam sawmill, to cut the timber on the said tract of land; the agreement being in terms as follows:

"This Indenture made this the 27th day of January, 1916, by and between L. N. Dodd and J. D. Pope, of Harnett county. L. N. Dodd agrees to cut all of the longleaf timber on the Smith tract of land for $1.50 per thousand, and stack each grade separately at mill, convenient for hauling; said timber to be cut clean as he comes to it, down to the 10-inch stumpage.

"J. D. Pope agrees on his part to take said shingles at the mill and advance enough every two weeks to meet the expenses of manufacturing said shingles, and at the end of each month to settle in full for all cut the previous month.

"It is also agreed between the two parties that L. N. Dodd shall have all the cull grade of shingles, and that the tar is to be divided after all the expenses are paid equally."

That, pursuant to the agreement, said Dodd, on the 14th of March, 1916, having duly placed his mill and engine, commenced to cut the timber into shingles and a few hours thereafter the fire caught near the mill, burned over the lands of J. C. Jones where the mill was situated and the lands of the other plaintiffs, adjoining proprietors, doing substantial and extended damage to all of said tracts.

There was testimony on the part of plaintiffs tending to show that the mill had a smokestack, defective in structure, and that it threw sparks and live coals to a degree that was a menace, and there was pine straw, wire grass, and leaves lying around the mill which had not been cleaned away, and where the fire caught, and that the man in charge had been warned by one of plaintiffs not to fire his engine till he cleaned up the straw, leaves, and litter around the mill, and that the owner, Dodd, was heard to say after the fire that "the place where he missed it was in not raking off around the mill." There was evidence on the part of defendant in contradiction to that of plaintiff and to the effect also that the damage done to the land was not near so extensive as plaintiffs claimed, and that some of the land was not injured at all; further, that before contracting with him, J. D. Pope had made inquiry about L. N. Dodd, and had been informed that he was a capable and reliable sawmill man.

[1, 2] On these facts, relevant and sufficiently full for a proper apprehension of the questions presented, we concur in his honor's view that in no aspect of the evidence is a recovery permissible against the partnership of Pope & Parish; they having conveyed the timber several months before by deed absolute in terms and retaining no interest whatever either in the timber or its manufacture. For the purpose presented, the deed, properly established, was sufficient to pass the title without registration, and, the deed having been duly proved and filed for registration with the proper officer, we see no reason why, on the facts of this record and as between the parties, the deed should not be received in evidence as a registered instrument. Smith v. Lumber Co., 144 N. C. p. 47, 56 S. E. 555.

[3] We approve also his honor's ruling that, under the contract presented, there was no partnership created between L. N. Dodd and J. D. Pope in reference to the manufacture of this timber within any definition of "partnership" recognized by our decisions. Gorham v. Cotton, 174 N. C. p. 727, 94 S. E. 450, and authorities cited. The instrument shows that, so far as the shingles were concerned, the millman was engaged in sawing the timber into shingles for J. D. Pope, the owner, at so much per thousand. It was further objected by plaintiff that his honor left it to the jury to determine whether, under the contract between them and the attendant facts, the conditions were so menacing as to deprive defendant J. D. Pope of any defenses which might arise from the fact that L. N. Dodd was at the time an independent contractor. If this relationship be conceded, the exception is hardly presented on the record, for the jury have in their verdict declared that neither Dodd nor Pope is liable, but, as it will no doubt come up on a second trial, we deem it well to make some further reference to the matter. In Thomas v. Lumber Co., 153 N. C. 351, 69 S. E. 275, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 584, it was held that a company operating a steam railroad for logging purposes is liable in damages for fires caused by its locomotives by reason of its foul right of way, so dangerous that it might reasonably have been anticipated that injury would thereby occur to adjacent owners, and the principle of independent contractor will not avail the employer in such instances, and, again, the operation of a defectively equipped engine or of a good engine not carefully managed or managed by an unskillful engineer is such source of danger to the adjacent landowners from fire that an employer cannot relieve himself of the consequent damage under a contract with an independent contractor. This decision has been cited and approved by us in Strickland v. Lumber Co., 171 N. C. 755, 88 S. E. 340, and many other cases, and in his learned and well-considered opinion Associate Justice Manning, speaking further to fires caused by a defective engine, said:

"We will now consider the view based upon a finding that the fire was caused by a spark emitted by a defectively equipped engine, but not communicated from the right of way. Would the defendant be liable? If the defendant itself had been at the time operating the engine, its liability is governed by the third rule formulated in Williams v. Railroad, 140 N. C. 623 [53 S. E. 448], as follows: '3. If fire escapes from a defective engine, or defective spark arrester, or from a good engine not operated in a careful way or not by a skillful engineer, and the fire catches off the right of way, the defendant is liable.' The liability of the employer rests upon the ground that mischievous consequences will arise from the work to be done unless precautionary measures are adopted, and the duty to see that those precautionary measures are adopted rests upon the employer, and he cannot escape liability by in-trusting this duty to another, though he be employed as an 'independent contractor' to perform it. In Covington, etc., Bridge Co. v. Steinbrock, supra [61 Ohio St. 215, 55 N. E. 618, 76 Am. St. Rep. 375], the principle is thus stated: 'The weight of reason and authority is to the effect that, where a party is under duty to the public or a third person to see that work he is about to do, or have done, is carefully performed so as to avoid injury to others, he cannot, by letting it to a contractor, avoid his liability in case it is negligently done to the injury of another. [Citing numerous authorities.] The duty need not be imposed by statute though such is frequently the case. If it be a duty imposed by law, the principle is the same as if required by statute. Cockburn, C. J., in Bower v. Peate, supra. It arises at law in all cases where more or less danger to others is necessarily incident to the performance of the work let to contract. It is the danger to others incident to the performance of the work let to contract that raises the duty and which the employer cannot shift from himself to another so as to avoid liability, should injury result to another from negligence in doing the work.' It cannot be denied that the operation of a defectively equipped engine, or the operation of a good engine not carefully managed or managed by an unskillful engineer, is a source of great danger to property adjacent to the road on which such an engine is operated. Such danger raises the duty which the employer cannot shift from himself to another."

[4] It will be noted that the engine referred to in Thomas v. Lumber Co. was a locomotive on a privately owned logging road, and while the principle is probably more insistent on an engine of that character, owing in part to its extended range of action and the greater variety of threatening conditions that are likely to arise, we are well assured that it should be applied also to a case like the present where one owning the timber on another's land contracts with the owner of a steam sawmill to cut the timber with an engine of this kind, always requiring a heavy draft for its successful use, in this instance having a smokestack not over 10 feet high and operated under conditions importing serious menace unless proper precautions were taken. Helpful cases in illustration of the general principle will be found in Davis v. Summerfield, 133 N. C. p. 325, 45 S. E. 654, 63 L. R. A. 492; Jacobs v. Fuller & Hutspin-pillar, 67 Ohio St. p. 70, 65 N. E. 617, reported in 65 L. R. A. 833, with a full and learned note on the subject; Thompson v. Lowell, etc., Ry., 170 Mass. p. 577, 49 N. E. 913, 40 L. R. A. 345, 64 Am. St. Rep. 323; Dillon v. Hunt, 105 Mo. 154, 16 S. W. 516, 24 Am. St. Rep. 374; Bower v. Peate, L. R. 1 Q. B. D. (1873-76) 321; Hardaker v. Idle Dist. Council, [1896] Q. B. D. 335; Penny v. Welbedon, etc., District, [1899] Q. B. D. 72. Aman v. Lumber Co., 160 N. C. p. 369, 75 S. E. 931, and Lawton v. Giles, 90 N. C. p. 374, are well-considered decisions in our own court giving support to the position that, in reference to the principle and its proper application, there should be no distinction between locomotive and stationary engines generating and operated by steam, and more peremptorily so when they are defective and used or likely to be used under conditions, as stated, importing menace of substantial injury.

[5] As heretofore stated, the jury having negatived liability on the part of Dodd or J. D. Pope, the results of the trial should not be disturbed by reason of this exception, but we are of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to have the issues submitted to another jury by reason of another objection to a portion of his honor's charge, in terms as follows:

"Now, the negligence in this case relied upon, as I understand it, is by allowing grass and combustible matter to be near and around the engine that was being used for cutting shingles, and the plaintiffs also contend that there is evidence tending to show that there were defects about the machinery. There were defects about it which caused the sparks to be emitted that set out the fire. (They allege that there was no spark arrester on the mill, but there is no evidence one way or another about that as I recollect it.)"

To that part of the charge in parentheses plaintiffs in apt time excepted.

"(As to other evidence about defects in the machinery, I believe there was some evidence of a short smokestack as contended for by the plaintiffs, and there may be some other evidence which I do not now recall, and if there is you will consider all of the evidence, and say whether or not the defendants or any of them were negligent with reference to the defective machinery, or in permitting any combustible matter to remain there with reference to the fire. And if you find that this combustible matter was allowed to remain there, and that was the cause of the fire, you will answer the issue 'Yes.')

To the above charge in parentheses plaintiffs in apt time excepted.

[6, 7] It is well understood with us both by general rule and precedent that, when a judge, presiding at the trial of a cause, is endeavoring to rehearse the testimony or to give the evidence of a witness or the admissions of the parties and makes a mistake about it, unless called to his attention at the time, this may not be made the subject of a valid exception on appeal (State v. Lance, 149 N. C. p. 551, 63 S. E. 198); but, taking this portion of the charge and the exceptions noted thereto as a whole, the statement "that there was no evidence one way or another as to the absence of a spark arrester," being, as it is, in direct answer to an opposing position evidently taken and urged by the counsel for plaintiff, and followed immediately by the instruction "that, as to other defects about the machinery," the jury would consider the facts and say whether the machinery was defective could, by correct interpretation, only have the significance, and be so understood, that the position taken by plaintiff had no evidence to support it. The court evidently had the testimony relevant to the question well in mind, and gave to the jury a clear charge making full reference to it, and his ruling therefore, in direct denial of plaintiff's position, was one on the free and legal effect of the testimony, and presents a question of law or legal inference properly reviewable on appeal; this being to our mind the true concept of the record. It has been held in numerous cases that, when a fire causing damage of this kind is shown to have been started by a spark or sparker from a defendant's engine, locomotive or stationary, a prima facie case is made that calls for satisfactory explanation and requiring that the cause be submitted to the jury on the issue of defendant's negligence. Boney v. Railroad, 175 N. C. 355, 95 S. E. 560; Simmons v. Roper Lumber Co., 174 N. C. 221, 93 S. E. 736; McRainey v. Railroad, 168 N. C. 570, 84 S. E. 851; Williams v. Railroad, 140 N. C. 623, 53 S. E. 448. And a perusal of many of the cases on the subject will disclose that this rule of proof bears with more directness on the absence or presence of a spark arrester or its defective condition. That is its more usual and natural significance. Hardy v. Lumber Co., 160 N. C. 113, 75 S. E. 855, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 759; Williams v. Railroad, 140 N. C. 623, 53 S. E. 448; Lawton v. Giles, 90 N. C. 374; Aycock v. Railroad, 89 N. C. 321; Anderson v. Steamboat Co., 64 N. C. 399; Ellis v. Railroad, 24 N. C. 138.

[8] Not only were there facts in evidence tending to show that the fire originated from defendant's engine, breaking out within a few hours after defendant Dodd started the operation of his engine and calling for an application of the principle approved in these and many other cases of like kind, but, speaking directly to the defendant's engine and its structure and condition, Raeferd Smith, a witness for plaintiff, testified, among other things, and without objection noted, as follows:

"I live near the Jones land; knew the mill. On the 14th of March, 1916, I was dipping turpentine about a half a mile from the mill, heard the whistle, saw the smoke, and ran rapidly to the mill. The fire was burning from the mill with the wind, and eight or ten feet from the mill, was burning back towards the boiler against the wind. The boiler had just been fired up that day. The mill had a short smokestack, about 10 feet high, and would throw out live sparks and hot coals of fire, for I was there loading some shingle blocks a few days after the fire, and if you were not careful it would set your clothes on fire. The pine straw, wire grass, and leaves were lying around the mill on the ground, and had not been raked up or burned off."

[9] On this and other apposite testimony, and under the principles of the authorities cited, there was error in the ruling that there was no evidence as to the absence of a spark arrester, and we are of opinion that a general new trial should be ordered.

New trial.

REVIER v. STATE. (No. 1242.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 13, 1919.)

1. HOMICIDE ~~§~~309(5)—CHARGE—EVIDENCE—INVOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER.

There was nothing in the evidence for the state or the accused, nor in the statement made by him to the jury, which authorized an instruction as to the law of involuntary manslaughter. In his statement to the jury the accused denied that he shot the person killed, and the evidence submitted in his behalf tended to support his statement: The evidence for the state, considered most favorably for the accused, made out such a case as fell within the rulings made in Smith v. State, 124 Ga. 213, 52 S. E. 329 (1), and Hamilton v. State, 129 Ga. 747, 59 S. E. 803 (3), where the facts were quite similar to those made by the evidence for the state, and was governed by the proviso, in Penal Code 1910, § 67, "that where such involuntary killing shall happen in the commission of an unlawful act which, in its consequences, naturally tends to destroy the life of a human being, or is committed in the prosecution of a riotous intent, or of a crime punishable by death or confinement in the penitentiary, the offense shall be deemed and adjudged to be murder."

2. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and the court did not err in refusing a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Colquitt County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Claude Revier was convicted of crime, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Parker & Gibson and W. A. Covington, all of Moultrie, for plaintiff in error.

C. E. Hay, Sol. Gen., of Thomasville, Clifford Walker, Atty. Gen., and M. C. Bennet, of Atlanta, for the State.

FISH, C. J. Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

YOUNG v. STATE. (No. 1199.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 13, 1919.)

1. HOMICIDE ~~§~~203(3)—DYING DECLARATIONS—ADMISSIBILITY.

On the trial of one indicted for murder, a physician testified that he saw the person killed within an hour after he was wounded, that he had been shot three times with a pistol, twice in the abdomen and once through the thigh, and "was in a very serious condition at the time, in a state of extreme shock, very bad circulation, and clammy and cold. I considered that he was in a dying condition. I so stated to him that he was in a dying condition, and asked him if he realized it, and he said he did. * * * I saw him about 10 o'clock that night, and he died about 6, I think, the next afternoon from these wounds. * * * I didn't state he was dying. I asked him if he realized he was in a dying condition, and he said he did. He never said anything about hoping to get well." Another witness testified that he saw the decedent before the physician arrived; decedent "was mighty bloody, and was talking and groaning like he was in a lot of misery. * * * I didn't have to ask him how bad he was hurt; looked like he was hurt bad. He said he was shot, and shot bad, and said, 'I don't believe I will get over it.'" This witness was afterwards present when the conversation between the physician and the decedent above noted occurred, and testified that the physician said, "Mr. Baughcum [the decedent], you realize that you are shot, and shot pretty bad, and you are likely to die. * * * If you have anything to say, you better say it." Another witness testified that he was present during the conversation between the physician and the decedent, and that the latter told the physician "that he realized he was in a dying condition." Held, that such testimony constituted a sufficient foundation for the admission, as prima facie dying declarations, of statements made by the decedent, at the time indicated, "as to the cause of his death and the person who killed him." Pen. Code 1910, § 1026; Harper v. State, 129 Ga. 770, 59 S. E. 792 (3); Hawkins v. State, 141 Ga. 212, 80 S. E. 711 (3).

2. HOMICIDE ~~§~~196—MOTIVE—EVIDENCE.

One ground of the motion for a new trial was that, as the defense of the accused was that he shot the decedent on account of his attempted illicit relations with the wife of the accused (the daughter of the decedent), the court erred in refusing to permit a witness to testify in behalf of the accused to the effect that the decedent, in June next prior to August when he was killed, "admitted" to the witness that he, the decedent, "had illicit relations" with the witness' wife, another daughter of the decedent, and stated to the witness that "he [the decedent] would kill the man who caught up with him," and that the witness "told [the accused] about this conversation." This testimony was properly rejected as irrelevant. Pen. Code 1910, § 1019; see Cawthon v. State, 119 Ga. 395, 46 S. E. 897 (5); Alsobrook v. State, 126 Ga. 100, 54 S. E. 805 (3).

3. HOMICIDE ~~§~~221—DYING DECLARATION—CONSTRUCTION.

The court instructed the jury: "I charge you further that if there was a statement made by the deceased, after he was wounded and before he died, and at a time when he was conscious of his approaching end—his approaching death—as to the cause of his death and the person who killed him, you may consider such statement along with the other testimony in the case, in ascertaining what the truth of the transaction is." The criticism on this charge is to the effect that it fails to state that the decedent must be in the article of death in order to render a statement of his a dying declaration. The instruction is not fairly subject to the criticism made. Moreover, the charge on the subject of dying declarations, from which the excerpt above quoted was taken, was full and clear, and gave the accused no just cause for complaint.

4. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and the refusal of a new trial was not error.

Error from Superior Court, Walton County; A. J. Cobb, Judge.

Harlin Young was convicted under an indictment for murder, his motion for new trial was denied, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Rogers & Knox, of Covington, for plaintiff in error.

W. O. Dean, Sol. Gen., of Monroe, Clifford Walker, Atty. Gen., and M. O. Bennet, of Atlanta, for the State.

FISH, C. J. Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

STEVENS v. STATE. (No. 1181.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 15, 1919.)

HOMICIDE \S 309(5) — EVIDENCE — CHARGE — VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER.

Neither under the evidence nor under the statement of the accused was the offense of voluntary manslaughter involved in the case, and the court properly refused to charge the jury upon that subject.

Error from Superior Court, Wilkes County; B. F. Walker, Judge.

Will Stevens was convicted of murder, his motion for a new trial was overruled, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Colley & Colley, of Washington, Ga., for plaintiff in error.

R. C. Norman, Sol. Gen., of Washington, Ga., Clifford Walker, Atty. Gen., and M. O. Bennet, of Atlanta, for the State.

BECK, P. J. Will Stevens was tried under an indictment charging him with the offense of murder, it being alleged that he did kill and murder one Hattie Thomas. Upon the trial of the case the jury returned a verdict of guilty, with a recommendation. The accused made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled.

The only ground of the motion for a new trial urged in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error is based upon the contention that the court erroneously failed to give in charge to the jury the law of voluntary manslaughter, counsel insisting that this grade of homicide was involved in the evidence in the case. With this contention we cannot agree. The evidence in the case is not voluminous. That which bears upon the only question raised in the case is contained in the testimony of a few eyewitnesses who stated briefly the circumstances of the killing. Excepting the witnesses who were introduced by the state for the purpose of impeaching the testimony of the witness Jim Fink, the testimony for the state made a case of unprovoked murder. Witness Jim Fink testified:

"She [the deceased] called my wife and says: 'Come on out here, Clara. I want you to hear this mess.' Clara went on down there around them, and when I went on down there Gene [the husband of the deceased] tells Will, 'You are a lie,' and Will says: 'You are a lie; I didn't say so.' And Gene's wife, Hattie, was standing up there, and Hattie said: 'Will, you are a lie; you know you did say so.' And Will says: 'Looks like you have got it in for me; I haven't bothered you all.' She turned around and looks at Gene, and Gene looks at her. She pulls a pistol up in her apron like that, a nickel-plated pistol. She pulled it up, I saw it, and Will shot her. He just beat her to it; that's all. If he hadn't shot her, she would have killed him. I ain't going to tell no lie for Gene or Will. I got shot. When Hattie was shot, Gene runs to her and says, 'Gi'me the pistol,' and he grabbed it out of her apron and took out after Will. That's what he done. I will tell the truth about it. She had this hand on her apron. The pistol come out, but when she fell Gene grabbed the pistol and run after him, about a hundred yards, I guess."

Clara Fink testified:

"She [the deceased] come on nearly to my house and called me. She says to me, 'Step out here a little bit,' and I says: 'What do you want? I haven't got time. I am busy.' And she says: 'Come on; it won't take long. I just want you to come down here and hear what me and Gene got to say to Will.' I goes on down there with her, and when I got down there Gene and Will were swapping lies with each other, and Gene says: 'Will, you are a lie; you did say so.' And Will says to Gene: 'You are a lie; I didn't say it.' And Will says: 'Look like you all got it in for me; look like you all want to get something. Don't call me another lie.' Hattie looks to Gene, and Gene looks to Hattie. Hattie repeats the lie there again, and as she repeats it again she had a pistol in her apron, and as she called him a lie again she raised her pistol, and as she raised her pistol up Will shot her, and when he had shot her Hattie was falling. Gene run a little piece, and she fell. As she was falling, Gene says to Hattie, 'Gi'me the pistol, nigger'— called her 'nigger,' to Hattie, but Hattie failed to give him the pistol. She had fallen by that time, and Gene runs to Hattie and gets the pistol and made after Will; and that all I know."

The defendant, as a part of his statement to the jury, said:

"The way this thing started, Gene Thomas come through the lot where I was feeding, and told me to come on down the path, he wanted to see me; and I went on down there, and his wife was with him, and he stopped and said: 'Let's don't go any further. I want to see you about what you have been telling Mr. Nash I cussed him for.' I says, 'I didn't tell him that.' I told him that 'when Mr. Nash come to my field to see if you were working, that Mr. Nash says for you to go to that new corn, and you says you are getting damn tired of this, and that you was getting damn tired of so much cussing.' One day Mr. Nash and myself were talking along, and I told him, and he went to see Gene, and Gene went to see me; and I says, 'If he sees Gene, Gene will get mad with me,' and so I went to the house and got my pistol. I was expecting him after me. I went on down the path, and he got after me; and I says: 'What is it? You know you told me. What are you going to do about it?' His wife come got close side of me. Gene says, 'You are a lie,' and I says, 'You are a lie, I didn't,' and about that time his wife says, 'You are a lie, you did say it,' and I looked around like that, and when I turned she pulled up her pistol and tried to shoot me, and I had my hand like this, and Gene says, 'I know he has got a pocket full of rocks, but its all right,' and when I looked at her she pulled up a pistol, and I did like that and shot her, and then Gene went and took the pistol from her, but I didn't want to shoot nobody else. I was just defending my own life. I run, but I saw him coming with the pistol in his hand, and I got in some bushes. I said, 'What I done I was obliged to do to save my life, and I am going back.'"

From the evidence quoted and the statement of the defendant, it will be seen that the defendant relied entirely upon the theory of self-defense. The evidence of two of his witnesses and his statement tended to establish the theory that the decedent had in her hand a pistol which she was about to raise, and that, acting under the apprehension that his life was in jeopardy, the defendant fired in his own defense. There was no suggestion in the evidence for the defendant, or in his statement, that the woman whom he killed was making any attempt to use the pistol in any way, except that she was raising, or about to raise, it as if to shoot him, and, acting under the fear that she was about to do so, he shot. If the defendant's theory of the case was true, he acted in self-defense. The evidence for the state, which we will not attempt to set out, made a case of murder—of murder unprovoked except by words. The epithet applied by the woman to the accused could not justify the shooting, nor reduce the homicide from murder to manslaughter. The theory of the state and the theory of the defense made by the evidence and the defendant's statement were duly presented to the jury in the court's charge, and the failure of the judge to charge the law of voluntary manslaughter affords no ground of complaint to the plaintiff in error.

GEORGE v. DORTCH et al. (No. 1107.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 15, 1919.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER \S 265(1)—LIEN FOR PURCHASE MONEY—SUBSEQUENT TRANSFERS.

Where one sold land and executed to the purchaser a deed of conveyance, but inserted in the deed a stipulation that the note for the unpaid purchase money, "by express agreement of the maker of this deed, is held as a second mortgage note subject to a certain loan which shall be a prior lien on the property conveyed," this reservation had the effect of creating such a lien on the property as was enforceable by the vendor against any subsequent transferee of the property, or mortgagee, except the one whose loan was expressly provided for in connection with the reservation.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Proceedings between M. M. George and J. R. Dortch and others. Judgment for the latter, and the former brings error. Affirmed.

Richard B. Russell and Holbrook & Corbett, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Napier, Wright & Wood, R. Low Reynolds, Dorsey, Shelton & Dorsey, and Phillip N. Jobson, all of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

BECK, P. J. J. R. Dortch owned a tract of land which he sold to T. L. McCurry on April 14, 1916, and executed a deed of conveyance to the same. The grantor undertook to reserve a lien or second mortgage on the land, by writing in the conveyance executed by him to McCurry the following stipulation:

"The consideration of $2,250.00 hereinabove recited as the consideration of this transfer is as follows: $1,075.00 cash in hand paid, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged at the time of the delivery of this deed, and one purchase-money note signed by the vendee herein, payable to the vendor herein, and due April 14, 1917, for the sum of $1,175.00, bearing interest from date at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, which said note, by express agreement of the maker of this deed, is held as a second mortgage note subject to a certain loan which shall be a prior lien on the property conveyed herein, in the sum of $1,000.00 in favor of the Georgia Savings Bank, and which said loan the vendee is expressly authorized to make as a first lien on said property herein conveyed."

The conveyance was duly recorded, and subsequently thereto the grantor executed a deed to secure a loan of $1,000 to the Georgia Savings Bank, thus creating the first lien upon the property as provided for in the conveyance from Dortch to McCurry in the stipulation above quoted. Thereafter, and prior to the maturity of the purchase-money note described in the conveyance from Dortch to McCurry, the latter undertook to create a mortgage lien upon the property in favor of George, the plaintiff in error. The property was afterwards sold under proceedings instituted by the bank, and the lien in favor of the bank was satisfied, leaving a balance in the hands of the sheriff; and, in proceedings duly instituted to distribute this balance between Dortch and George, the question arose as to whether or not the lien in favor of Dortch was superior to that of George. The court held that it was, and awarded the money to Dortch; and the sole question in the case is whether Dortch had, under the stipulation in the deed of conveyance to McCurry, a prior lien to the mortgage lien of McCurry. The court properly awarded the money to the claim of Dortch. The reservation in the deed which the latter executed to McCurry was sufficient to give him a valid subsisting lien against any subsequent lien created by McCurry, except in favor of one whose loan was expressly provided for in connection with the reservation. Any subsequent grantee of McCurry, or mortgagee taking a mortgage upon the property conveyed by Dortch, was bound to take notice of the lien created by the grantor in the deed to McCurry.

Discussion of this proposition is unnecessary. It has been ruled in a case substantially like the instant case. From the statement of facts in the case of Atlanta Land & Loan Co. v. Halle, 106 Ga. 498, 32 S. E. 606, it appears that Halle sold certain land to the Atlanta Land & Loan Company, conveying the same by an instrument purporting to be a warranty deed, which was duly recorded, and in this instrument the grantor reserved a lien on the land for the balance of the purchase-money due. Thereafter the grantee conveyed the land to Mrs. R. C. Halle, who claimed that she paid a valuable consideration therefor without actual notice of the reservation of the lien. In the course of the decision in that case it was said:

"Under the view we take of this case, we think the undisputed evidence demanded a verdict for the plaintiff, and that the court did not err in directing the jury to so find. We think the court below was clearly right in concluding that the contract entered into by the parties when the property in dispute was sold by A. J. Halle to the company created a lien in favor of that grantor and his assigns upon the property for the payment of the purchase money. This contract is evidenced by the deed, and the purchase-money notes specifically recite upon their face that such a lien is retained by the grantor. * * * Even without this recital in the deed under which this defendant claims, she could not have obtained any greater title from the company than that company itself had; and we think she is chargeable with knowledge of the recitals in the deed by virtue of which her grantor held title. It is a well-settled principle of law that recitals in deeds bind, not only the parties thereto, but their privies in estate. Civil Code, § 5150; Lamar v. Turner, 48 Ga. 329; Cruger v. Tucker, 69 Ga. 557, and authorities cited in the opinion of Speer, Justice, on page 562. The recital of the lien, therefore, in the deed from A. J. Halle to the company, not only bound it, but Mrs. R. C. Halle as grantee of the company; she being its privy in estate."

That decision rules the controlling question in this case. This is not a case where one sells land and conveys the same by an absolute deed and attempts afterwards to enforce a vendor's lien against a bona fide purchaser from the grantee in the absolute deed. Dortch was not relying, in this case, upon any vendor's lien. He was asserting a lien reserved in the deed of conveyance. That reservation will prevail against any one who afterwards took a conveyance from the grantee named in the deed in which the reservation appears.

Judgment affirmed.

SMITH v. MILTON, Sheriff. (No. 1235.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)*1. HABEAS CORPUS \Leftrightarrow 56, 72—LEGAL RESTRAINT—REMAND—GENERAL DEMURRER.

Where an application for the writ of habeas corpus affirmatively shows on its face that the restraint complained of is legal, the court before whom the writ is made returnable has the power, on general demurrer, to dismiss the writ and remand the applicant. In such instance the general demurrer, under our practice, serves the purpose of a motion to quash the writ for insufficiency of allegation in the petition.

2. HABEAS CORPUS \Leftrightarrow 29 — DISCHARGE — GRAND JURY—ILLEGALITY.

One imprisoned under a bench warrant regular on its face and issued by a judge of competent jurisdiction will not be released on habeas corpus, because the grand jury that found the indictment on which the warrant issued was illegal.

3. HABEAS CORPUS \Leftrightarrow 4—WRIT OF ERROR.

A writ of error is the available remedy; the warrant not being void, but merely voidable.

Error from Superior Court, Gilmer County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

Petition for writ of habeas corpus by Claude Smith against R. L. Milton, Sheriff. General demurrer to petition sustained, and petition and writ dismissed, and petitioner remanded, and he brings error. Affirmed.

B. L. Smith, of Blue Ridge, for plaintiff in error.

Herbert Clay, Sol. Gen., of Marietta, for defendant in error.

GEORGE, J. Claude Smith, averring that he was being illegally restrained of his liberty by R. L. Milton, sheriff and jailer of Gilmer county, presented to the judge of the superior court his petition for the writ of habeas corpus, alleging substantially the following:

Petitioner is held under and by virtue of three bench warrants issued by the judge of the superior court upon three separate indictments returned by the grand jury of said county at the May term, 1918, charging petitioner with murder, with public drunkenness, and with having in his possession a quantity of whisky. In August, 1916, the legally appointed and qualified jury commissioners of said county revised the jury lists of said county, as required by law, and the lists so revised contained the legally qualified grand and traverse jurors for said county for the two years next ensuing. In April, 1917, two of the jury commissioners having resigned, the judge of the superior court by order, removed the four remaining commissioners and appointed six other named citizens of said county. In May, 1917, in a mandamus proceeding brought by certain citizens and taxpayers of the county (to which petitioner was not a party) against the newly appointed commissioners, the judge of the superior court ordered a revision of the jury lists of said county, and the defendant commissioners, at the time named, proceeded to revise the lists as ordered. The persons serving as grand jurors at the May term, 1918, of said superior court were drawn from the box thus made up by the new board. Only eight of the persons who acted as grand jurors and returned the indictments against petitioner were in the jury box as legally made up by the old commissioners in August, 1916. The acts of the new board of commissioners are nugatory and void; the indictments against petitioner, as well as the bench warrants issued thereon, are likewise nugatory and void. The jury commissioners revised the jury lists, as required by law, in 1916, and the judge of the superior court of Gilmer county had no authority to order the revision in 1917. Copies of the several orders, of the mandamus proceeding, and of the indictments and warrants, were attached to the petition. The indictments and warrants were in all respects regular in form.

The sheriff answered, denying the illegality of the restraint, but admitting that petitioner was held under the warrants issued by the judge of the superior court upon the indictments returned by the grand jury as alleged. He also demurred generally to the petition for the writ, upon the ground that the allegations thereof affirmatively showed that the restraint was lawful.

[1, 2] The judge sustained the general demurrer, dismissed the petition and writ, and remanded the petitioner. He excepted, and contends that the court should have declined to consider the demurrer to the petition for the writ of habeas corpus, but should have determined the legality of the restraint upon the merits; the writ having issued and he having been brought before the court to receive its judgment. Simmons v. Georgia Iron, etc., Co., 117 Ga. 305, 43 S. E. 780 (3), 61 L. R. A. 739, is cited to support this contention. In that case it was ruled:

"The technical rules of pleading are not applicable in a proceeding of this character; and where a writ has been issued, and in response thereto the person detained has been brought into court, it is not the proper practice to demur to the petition for want of sufficient allegations. While a motion to quash the writ may be made on this ground, the better practice, when the person detained is before the court, is to inquire into the cause of the restraint and pass such order as the justice of the case requires."

In Plunkett v. Hamilton, 136 Ga. 72, 80, 70 S. E. 781, 784 (35 L. R. A. [N. S.] 583, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1259), it was said:

"It [the writ of habeas corpus] is peculiarly a writ which involves substance, not mere technical skirmishing. The question is whether the detention is lawful or not, rather than whether niceties of pleading and exactness of allegation have been duly followed"—citing the Simmons Case, supra.

However, the Simmons Case admits the power of the court, on motion, to quash the writ because of insufficient averments in the petition, and in the opinion (117 Ga. at page 312, 43 S. E. 783 [61 L. R. A. 739]) it is said:

"Of course, if the petition clearly shows on its face that the detention is lawful, there is nothing to investigate."

We are of the opinion that the petition for the writ in the instant case clearly shows on its face that the alleged illegal restraint was lawful, and that the court did not err in sustaining the general demurrer thereto, which, in a proceeding of this character, serves the purpose of a motion to quash the writ.

[3] Conceding, without deciding, that the names of the persons selected to serve as grand jurors were not on the legally constituted grand jury list, nor in the grand jury box of the county, the case is only the common one of an indictment and warrant of the judge based thereon, merely voidable, not void, and the law's step to make it void is writ of error, not habeas corpus. It is universally recognized that habeas corpus is not a substitute for a writ of error. 1 Bishop's Crim. Proc. § 1410 (2); McFarland v. Donaldson, 115 Ga. 567, 568, 41 S. E. 1000. The accused may waive defects in the indictment, gross irregularities in selecting the grand or trial jury, and conceded disqualification of the grand or trial jurors. It has been held that, after a conviction on an indictment regular on its face, yet alleged never to have been found by the grand jury, habeas corpus is not the remedy. Ex parte Twohig, 13 Nev. 302. It has also been held that the fact that the grand jury which found the indictment was illegal, will not be considered upon hearing of habeas corpus. Ex parte Springer, 1 Utah, 214. See, also, 12 R. O. L. 1190, 1191, and note to State v. Smith, 100 Am. St. Rep. 26, 36. Objections to the grand jury must be made by challenge, or raised by plea in abatement, according to the circumstances. Teem v. Cox, 96 S. E. 131. Our Penal Code (section 1305) declares:

"No person shall be discharged upon the hearing of a writ of habeas corpus in the following cases: * * * Where the party is imprisoned under a bench warrant regular upon its face."

And section 957 defines a bench warrant to be a warrant "issued by a judge for the arrest of one accused of a crime by a grand jury." The jurisdiction of the court is not destroyed or taken away by the alleged disqualification of the grand jury; and, the indictments and warrants being regular upon their faces, habeas corpus will not avail the plaintiff in error.

EAKIN et al. v. EAKIN et al. (No. 3688.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 4, 1919.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨161—APPEAL FROM PART OF DECREE—ACCEPTANCE OF BENEFITS.

Generally, a party availing himself of a decree so far as favorable to him cannot appeal from the decree wherein it is not favorable to him, if his acceptance of the benefit on the one hand is totally inconsistent with appeal on the other.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨161—PROSECUTION OF APPEAL—WAIVER OF ERRORS.

No waiver or release of errors operating as a bar to the further prosecution of an appeal or writ of error can be implied except from conduct which is inconsistent with the claim of right to reverse the decree or judgment which it is sought to bring in review.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨161—APPEAL FROM PART OF DECREE—ACCEPTANCE OF BENEFITS—WAIVER OF APPEAL.

Where the parts of a decree are separate and independent, and the receipt of a benefit from one part is not inconsistent with an appeal from another, the party receiving the benefit will not be deemed to have waived his right to appeal.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨161—APPEAL FROM PART OF DECREE—ACCEPTANCE OF BENEFITS—WAIVER.

Where, after confirmation of a judicial sale, the court later sets it aside because of a higher offer, orders a resale, and directs the return of the money paid and notes delivered by the first purchaser, the portion of the decree directing the return of the money and notes is clearly separable and independent from that part of the decree which totally deprives the purchaser of all his rights under the sale confirmed to him, and the acceptance of the one under protest at the direction of the court cannot reasonably be construed into a waiver of his right to appeal the other.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨150(1)—VACATION OF JUDICIAL SALE—PURCHASER'S RIGHTS OF APPEAL.

A purchaser at a judicial sale which has been confirmed has acquired such a fixed interest in the property sold as entitles him, though not a party to the original suit, to appeal to a higher tribunal to protect his rights against an improper setting aside of such sale, at least where the resale has been made and confirmed by the court.

6. JUDICIAL SALES — 34 — CONTROL OF COURT — CONFIRMATION.

There is a wide difference between the court's power of control over a sale before and after confirmation.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR — 983(3) — JUDICIAL SALES — 40 — CONFIRMATION — RIGHTS OF PURCHASER — DIRECTION OF RESALE — DISCRETION.

Before confirmation the rights of the purchaser are inchoate, and upon a showing of inadequacy of price, or upon an offer of a higher bid, properly secured, it is discretionary with the court whether it will confirm the sale or set it aside and direct a resale. The exercise of this discretion depends in large measure upon the facts of each case, abuse thereof when effecting inequities being subject to review by the appellate court.

8. JUDICIAL SALES — 31(3), 38 — CONFIRMATION — RIGHTS OF PURCHASER — AVOIDANCE.

Upon the confirmation of a judicial sale the rights of the purchaser become vested. Thereafter nothing except fraud, accident, mistake, or some other cause for which equity would avoid a like sale between private parties, will warrant a court in avoiding the sale or in opening it for other bids. Mere inadequacy of price or tender of a higher bid will not suffice, unless they themselves clearly import fraud, or are accompanied by other facts or circumstances constituting good causes such as are above stated.

9. JUDICIAL SALES — 43 — VACATION OF CONFIRMATION — DECREE.

The decree setting aside the confirmation should clearly set forth the facts relied on as good cause warranting a resale, and generally it is not sufficient to use the indefinite phrase "good cause appearing."

10. JUDICIAL SALES — 35 — CONFIRMATION — AVOIDANCE.

The general rule that courts have control of decrees during the term at which they are rendered does not confer power to avoid confirmed judicial sales except for such cause as is mentioned in a preceding point.

11. JUDICIAL SALES — 42 — CONFIRMATION — AVOIDANCE.

The only effect of this rule on judicial sales is to enable courts to consider alleged reasons for avoiding them during the term on motion or order to show cause after due notice without requiring formal bills for that purpose.

12. CASE OVERRULED.

Statements in National Bank of Kingwood v. Jarvis, 26 W. Va. 785, and 28 W. Va. 805, are overruled in so far as they are inconsistent with this opinion.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Monongalia County.

Suit for partition by Roscoe Eakin and others against Marion B. F. Eakin and others. From a decree setting aside the confirmation of a sale to them and ordering a resale, James A. Provins and others, purchasers at former sale, obtained an appeal and supersedeas, and the Hess Coal & Coke Company moves to dismiss appeal. Motion to dismiss denied, and decrees reversed and remanded, with directions to reinstate and reconfirm the sale to appellants upon condition.

E. M. Everly and Cox & Baker, all of Morgantown, for appellants.

Stewart & John and Donley & Hatfield, all of Morgantown, for appellees.

LYNCH, J. In a suit to partition lands there was assigned to infants and decreed to be sold for their benefit upon specified terms and conditions, subject to the usual approval and confirmation by the court, a tract of 22½ acres, part of the estate divided. The right so to dispose of the property by sale and the propriety or necessity therefor are not controverted or questioned in any manner.

The sale first partially effected and reported was not confirmed, but a readvertisement and resale were ordered because the purchaser failed or refused to comply with the terms prescribed in the decree and notice. The second was not accepted or confirmed, and again a readvertisement and resale were ordered, this time because of an increased offer for the property by another prospective bidder. The third was made, reported, and confirmed, and the deed ordered to be executed and delivered to the purchasers, James A. Provins, Lewis Ladone, and Frank Ladone, who before the confirmation had in all respects complied with the terms and conditions of the decree of sale and advertisement by paying to the commissioner the amount required in cash, and by delivering to him the notes for the deferred payments, as to the regularity and adequacy of which there was no objection or exception interposed by anyone interested as a party or otherwise, until after the record entry of the confirmatory decree.

Thereafter and before but near the close of the term, the court, upon the petition and upset bid of Robert E. Guy, an attorney practicing at the bar of the court, who, it is charged and not denied, had notice and knowledge of the proceedings in the cause and the efforts to consummate the sales, set aside the decree of confirmation, and for the fourth time directed the property to be sold, and it was sold, at the bar of the court in the presence and under the supervision of the judge thereof, and purchased by or for the Hess Coal & Coke Company upon competitive bidding for an amount about $8,000 in excess of the accepted offer of Provins, Ladone, and Ladone, the former purchasers, the sale to whom had been ratified and confirmed without objection and the deed for the land directed to be executed and delivered. From the decree last referred to, Provins and the Ladones obtained an appeal and supersedeas, and the writ is now before us upon their motion to reverse, made upon leave applied for and granted and notice of the motion duly given and served, and upon a counter motion made without leave first had, but after due notice, by Hess Coal & Coke Company to dismiss the appeal and supersedeas. The motion to dismiss rests solely upon the ground that, as Provins and his copurchasers, pursuant to and as directed by the decree setting aside the sale confirmed to them, accepted from the commissioner the money paid and notes executed by them to him required by the decree of sale, they were not entitled, and should not be permitted, to prosecute this writ. To the hearing of the motion appellants object because no leave of court was applied for or granted.

[1-4] Differently stated, the proposition relied on as warranting dismissal is that, as appellants accepted the benefit of the decree annulling the sale confirmed to them by receiving from the commissioner the money paid and notes executed by them, they waived the right to obtain and prosecute an appeal from the later decree confirming the sale to the appellee. The leave without which it is said the motion cannot be allowed or entertained may not always be essential. Where a meritorious cause for the dismissal of an appellate process exists, a motion therefor can be made at any time when not directly or impliedly prohibited by statute or some rule of law. Our statute, section 26, c. 135, Code 1918, as amended by Chapter 69, Acts 1915 (Code Supp. 1918, c. 135, § 26 [sec. 5006]), however, seems to require leave and notice of a motion to dismiss an appeal for cause, as well as for a motion to affirm or reverse the decree or judgment complained of. Whether it does or not as applied to the situation here disclosed ceases to be important, if, admitting the fact to be as stated by appellee, but not conceding the conclusion based on that fact, and according to the motion the same consideration and force it would justly be entitled to had leave been granted, it nevertheless appears that upon a full hearing upon the merits of the cause the fact relied on cannot avail to dismiss the appeal.

Have the matters urged by appellee the preclusive force and effect attributed to them? That is, does the acceptance of the money paid and the notes executed by appellants after the decree setting aside the sale confirmed to them deprive them of the right to prosecute this appeal? The answer to the question stated depends upon whether or not the acceptance was voluntary or inconsistent with a claim of right to appeal from another portion of the decree. The general rule is that a party who enforces or otherwise accepts the benefit of a judgment, order or decree cannot afterward ask to have it reviewed for error or deny the authority which granted it. McKain v. Mullen, 65 W. Va. 558, 64 S. E. 829, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1; Bright v. Mollohan, 75 W. Va. 116, 83 S. E. 298; Marshall v. McDermitt, 79 W. Va. 245, 90 S. E. 830, L. R. A. 1917C, 883; 3 C. J. § 552. In McKain v. Mullen, cited, 65 W. Va. p. 562, 64 S. E. 831, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1, the basis of the rule is thus stated:

"A person who does a positive act, which according to its natural import is so inconsistent with the enforcement of a right in his favor as to induce a reasonable belief that such right has been dispensed with, will be deemed to have waived it." 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 1103. It is this principle of acquiescence and waiver which gives existence to the general rule we have quoted. True, the law favors appeal. The act of waiver must be clear and decisive. And it has been authoritatively said that 'no waiver or release of errors operating as a bar to the further prosecution of an appeal or writ of error can be implied except from conduct which is inconsistent with the claim of a right to reverse the judgment or decree, which it is sought to bring in review.' Embry v. Palmer, 107 U. S. 8 [2 Sup. Ct. 25, 27 L. Ed. 346]."

A similar exception to or limitation upon the rule is recognized in Bright v. Mollohan, cited, 75 W. Va. 116, 83 S. E. 298, point 3 syllabus, where it is said:

"A party availing himself of a decree as favorable to him cannot appeal from the decree wherein it is not favorable to him, if his acceptance of the benefit on the one hand is totally inconsistent with appeal on the other."

And in 3 C. J. § 552, the same exception is noted:

"The rule does not apply * * * where the parts of the judgment or decree are separate and independent, and the receipt of a benefit from one part is not inconsistent with an appeal from another, * * * or in other cases in which the acceptance of the benefit or partial enforcement of the judgment is not inconsistent with an appeal and reversal." Notes 25 and 27, and cases cited.

Still another form of exception to the rule is applied in Gay v. Householder, 71 W. Va. 277, 76 S. E. 450, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 297. And where the performance of a decree is involuntary, the right of appeal is not affected. Schaeffer v. Ardery, 238 Ill. 557, 87 N. E. 343; 3 C. J. § 549.

Here the acceptance under protest of the money paid and notes executed was not such conduct as is inconsistent with a claim of right to reverse the decree. The portion of the decree directing their return is clearly separate and independent from that part of the decree which totally deprives appellants of all their rights under the sale confirmed to them, and the acceptance of the one at the direction of the court cannot reasonably be construed into a waiver of their right to appeal the other. The so-called "benefit" existed more in name than in fact, for appellants did not desire the return of their advances, but claimed full right in and to the property sold, and, being under protest, their acceptance cannot be said to have been voluntary. Provins, Ladone, and Ladone not only protested against the receipt of the money and notes before accepting them, but on the commissioner, who pressed upon them for his own protection performance of the terms of the decree setting aside the former confirmatory decree, served the notice which we quote:

"To John L. Hatfield, Special Commissioner: We accept the check and notes for the purchase money of the 22½ acres of land, which you sold us as special commissioner, in the suit of Roscoe Eakin v. Marion B. F. Eakin et al., in compliance with the decree entered in the above styled cause, setting aside the sale and confirmation thereof to us, and directing you to return to us the said cash payment and the notes which were executed for deferred payments. But we further notify you that we stand ready, willing and anxious to repay same to you and fully comply with the terms of the decree entered in the above styled cause, confirming the sale of said property to us, if the appellate court shall so direct. This the 9th day of May, 1918. [Signed]."

From these circumstances we cannot say that appellants' acceptance of the money and notes was voluntary or such an expression of full acquiescence in the decree as to amount to a waiver of their rights to an appeal and review of the case. This question, therefore, must be answered in favor of appellants.

[5] The next question for decision is whether appellants can now have, or are entitled to have annulled or held for naught, first, the decree setting aside the sale confirmed to them, and, second, the decree confirming the sale to appellee. The important point to note and bear constantly in mind is that this essentially is a controversy between purchasers of the same property sold at a judicial sale, neither of whom originally was and is not now a party to the suit, though under our decisions they are now properly here presenting and defending their rights in respect of the property. The purchaser at a judicial sale which has been confirmed has acquired such a fixed interest in the property sold as entitles him to appeal to a higher tribunal to protect his rights against an improper setting aside of such sale, at least where, as here, the resale has been made and confirmed by the court. Kable v. Mitchell, 9 W. Va. 492; Childs v. Hurd, 25 W. Va. 530; Bank v. Jarvis, 26 W. Va. 785; Childers v. Loudin, 51 W. Va. 559, 563, 42 S. E. 637. No other person is complaining, and none are interested in the result of this appeal except the infants thereby affected; and infants are bound by a judicial sale of their lands, when free of fraud, to the same extent and with like effect as adults, except when and as provided otherwise by law. Lafferty v. Lafferty, 42 W. Va. 783, 26 S. E. 262; Ammons v. Ammons, 50 W. Va. 390, 400, 40 S. E. 490; Harrison v. Wallton, 95 Va. 721, 30 S. E. 372, 41 L. R. A. 703, 64 Am. St. Rep. 830; Litton v. Flanary, 116 Va. 710, 82 S. E. 692; section 7, c. 132, Barnes' Code 1918 (Code 1913, c. 132, § 7 [sec. 4911]).

So that, as remarked, this controversy is limited to an investigation respecting the rights of the purchasers under a decree of sale of the land, the sales being made upon the same terms and conditions, save the consideration to be paid therefor, and each being confirmed. Hess Coal & Coke Company at the time of its purchase is presumed to have known what the record revealed as to the prior sale to Provins, Ladone, and Ladone. With this simplification of the issues there is presented for solution the original question as to the substantial rights of the parties involved.

[6, 7] There is a wide difference between the court's power of control over a sale before and after confirmation. Trimble v. Herold, 20 W. Va. 602, 612; Coles v. Coles, 83 Va. 525, 5 S. E. 673; Todd v. Gallego Mfg. Co., 84 Va. 586, 5 S. E. 676; Insurance Co. v. Cottrell, 85 Va. 857, 9 S. E. 132, 17 Am. St. Rep. 108. A bid, though accepted by the commissioner conducting the sale, does not become a contract until reported to and confirmed by the court. Up to that time it is merely an offer to buy; but as an offer it becomes binding upon the bidder when accepted and confirmed by the court, and may be enforced against him. Stout v. Philippi M. & M. Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. 571; 56 Am. St. Rep. 843; Lowman v. Funkhouser, 78 W. Va. 742, 90 S. E. 340; Richardson v. Jones, 106 Va. 540, 56 S. E. 343. Until then the right of the purchaser is inchoate; the sale is an incomplete bargain, merely an offer which the court may or may not accept as circumstances and conditions may require. That is the stage at which the court may open anew the bidding upon an advanced offer, substantial and made in good faith. But even at this stage it is always discretionary with a court whether it will confirm a sale, though made and complied with in all respects as required by its decree, or set it aside and direct a resale. Whether a court will confirm must depend in great measure on the circumstances in each case, abuse of the discretion when effecting inequities being subject to review by the appellate court. Lowman v. Funkhouser, supra; 8 Enc. Dig. Va. & W. Va. Rep. 722, 723.

[8, 9] But after it has been approved and confirmed by the court, thus completing the contract, it can be set aside only for good cause. It is then not a matter of discretion with the court, but some special ground must be laid, such as fraud, collusion, accident, mistake, misconduct upon the part of the purchaser or some other person connected with the sale, or such other cause as would warrant relief in equity had the sale been by the parties interested instead of by the court. Berlin v. Melhorn, 75 Va. 639; Langyher v. Patterson, 77 Va. 470; Todd v. Gallego Mfg. Co., 84 Va. 586, 5 S. E. 676; Insurance Co. v. Cottrell, 85 Va. 857, 9 S. E. 132, 17 Am. St. Rep. 108; Allison v. Allison, 88 Va. 328, 13 S. E. 549; Syndicate v. Johnson, 100 Va. 774, 42 S. E. 995; Morrison v. Burnette, 154 Fed. 617, 83 C. C. A. 391; 16 R. C. L. 100. Public policy and fair dealing alike demand protection to purchasers at judicial sales, when they have complied with the terms prescribed by the decree and the sale has been confirmed.

The importance which attaches to the confirmation of a judicial sale is shown by the rights and duties which are the purchaser's from that date. After confirmation it is an executed contract, and, if not tainted by fraud or otherwise vitiated by other wrongful acts or conduct participated in by the bidder, such confirmation relates to, and vests title in him from, the date of the sale. Taylor v. Cooper, 37 Va. 317, 34 Am. Dec. 737; Kable v. Mitchell, 9 W. Va. 492; Donahue v. Fackler, 21 W. Va. 124; Childs v. Hurd, 25 W. Va. 530, 535; Cale's Adm'r v. Shaw, 33 W. Va. 299, 10 S. E. 637; Stout v. Philippi M. & M. Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 350, 23 S. E. 571, 56 Am. St. Rep. 843. See also Hardman v. Brown, 77 W. Va. 478, 88 S. E. 1016. Not only does he get title upon confirmation, but ordinarily he thereby becomes entitled to possession of the property sold. Hudgins v. Marchant & Co., 69 Va. 177; Whitlock v. Johnson, 87 Va. 323, 12 S. E. 614. See, also, Childs v. Hurd, supra, 25 W. Va. p. 535. And, as said before, when the offer of the bidder is accepted and confirmed, it may be enforced against him.

[10-12] In this case the inducement prompting the court to set aside a sale which it had already confirmed was the upset bid of $21,500 offered by Robert E. Guy, an advance of $1,137.33 over the price at which it had been sold to appellants. But the offer of a higher bid alone is generally held not to be one of the substantial reasons for which a sale will be set aside after it has been confirmed. Berlin v. Melhorn, supra; Langyher v. Patterson, supra; Todd v. Gallego Mfg. Co., supra, 84 Va. p. 590, 5 S. E. 676; Allison v. Allison, supra; Syndicate v. Johnson, supra; Morrison v. Burnette, supra; 16 R. C. L. 100. See, also, Pewabic Mining Co. v. Mason, 145 U. S. 349, 367, 12 Sup. Ct. 887, 36 L. Ed. 732; Watkins v. Jones, 107 Va. 6, 57 S. E. 608. There is an unusual analogy between the facts of the case of Berlin v. Melhorn, just cited, and the facts of the case before us. Several resales of the property had been made and for one cause or another had not been confirmed, except the last sale which was confirmed; but at the same term the decree of confirmation was set aside and a resale ordered, but not confirmed. This ruling of the Virginia court is cited, approved, or followed and applied in numerous later decisions of that court, heretofore cited, and in Nevada Nickel Syndicate v. National Nickel Co. (C. C.) 103 Fed. 391, 398, and in Morrison v. Burnette, 154 Fed. 617, 83 C. C. A. 391.

It must be admitted that the result reached on this question is not consistent with certain statements in Bank v. Jarvis, 26 W. Va. 785, and 28 W. Va. 805, 811, where this court sustained a decree setting aside a prior decree confirming a sale and ordering a resale. This was done on two grounds: (1) Because "the rule in this country seems to be that all decrees are in fieri and in the breast of the court and subject to its absolute control, until after the end of the term; that is, that it does not properly become a decree until the term ends." (2) Because it appeared to the court "that the land had been sold at an inadequate price * * * shown by the best possible evidence and in the most conclusive manner by the upset bid for an advance price of more than 20 per cent., * * * of itself sufficient to set aside the confirmation and order a resale. Kable v. Mitchell, 9 W. Va. 493."

With respect to the first ground, it is true that all decrees are in the breast of the court until the end of the term; but that does not mean that they may be set aside except for good cause, and it is generally the rule that an advance bid is not such good cause. The case of Thompson v. Land & Coal Co., 77 W. Va. 782, 88 S. E. 1040, is an example of good cause sufficient to justify setting aside a confirmatory decree, for there the first decree "directing a sale of an undivided half interest, had been made through oversight or inadvertence," where "the entire interest in the tract should have been sold."

With regard to the second ground, the court squarely states that an inadequate price evidenced by an advance bid is of itself sufficient to set aside a confirmatory decree, but cites to support that holding only the case of Kable v. Mitchell, 9 W. Va. 493, where, because of an advance bid, the sale was set aside before, not after, confirmation, and hence could not be an authority to support that decision. It is the only authority cited in the case of Bank v. Jarvis, supra, to support its holding, and, since in that respect it is contra to the generally accepted view, it must be overruled to that extent.

True, as just stated, where the sale is yet inchoate and unconfirmed, it is the rule in this state that, if such sale appears from the tender of a properly secured upset bid to be at an inadequate price, it will be set aside and a resale ordered. Kable v. Mitch- ell, supra; Gillmor v. Rinehart, 73 W. Va. 779, 81 S. E. 549. But reason, principle, and public policy require that some character of finality be given to confirmed sales, and that they be set aside only for some good cause, other than the offer of a higher bid, clearly set forth in the decree. Otherwise such sales will assume an inconclusive and unstable character, and bona fide purchasers will be deterred from bidding. The interests of the owner are protected by permitting resale on upset bids tendered before confirmation, when sufficient to show a substantial inadequacy of price. In Virginia, however, the courts refuse to set aside sales solely upon upset bids of 10 per cent. advance, even if tendered before confirmation. Moore v. Triplett, 96 Va. 603, 32 S. E. 50, 70 Am. St. Rep. 882; Howell v. Morien, 109 Va. 200, 63 S. E. 1073; Hardy v. Coley, 114 Va. 570, 77 S. E. 458; Litton v. Flanary, 116 Va. 710, 82 S. E. 692. See, also, note, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 3. Likewise, according to the rule in this state respecting unconfirmed sales as laid down in the two cases cited above, the amount of advance required to warrant setting aside a sale depends upon the facts in each case.

The mere phrase, "good cause appearing," contained in a decree annulling a prior confirmation decree, cannot be accorded the weight contended for by appellee. The indefinite recital means nothing, and an appellate court cannot lift the veil to see what it conceals. If good cause existed, that is, such cause as the decisions recognize and enforce as sufficient to vacate such a decree, as fraud, accident, mistake, the decree should have disclosed it in the interest of fairness and justice. Such matters ought not be left doubtful, uncertain, or conjectural. The phrase, it is said or implied in argument, was inserted to refer to what had occurred at the bar of the court and in the presence of the judge during the progress of the hearing of the cause before and at the time the sale was made to the appellee. So far as divulged, there appears nothing deserving censure or warranting the action taken in depriving appellants of the benefits attributable to the purchase; nothing to show bad faith, fraud, mistake, or other conduct recognized as lawfully justifying such action. The infants concerned are alike the wards of all courts, appellate and circuit, and an examination is made with regard to this duty. But as said already, protection of their interests does not authorize the punishment of another against whom no charge of wrongful conduct is preferred, or, if preferred, sustained.

Acting upon the faith of the decree ratifying and approving the sale to appellants and undisturbed for nearly two weeks thereafter, E. M. Everly in the meantime innocently acquired rights disclosed by him in answer to the petition of Guy and insisted on by him in court at the hearing upon the petition, knowledge of which appellee must have had then and subsequently. The attempt to deprive Everly and appellants of these rights so acquired in the manner proposed by appellee, itself the owner or operator of coal lands in the same county and perhaps near the land in controversy, and not prevented from bidding earlier so far as appears, does not recommend the course pursued by it, when to do so may work serious results to others relying on rights lawfully vested in them by judicial decree.

Hence it follows that the rights of the appellee are clearly subordinate to, and must yield to, those of the appellants, Provins, Ladone, and Ladone. As other questions raised by counsel cannot affect the result in this or any similar case, they may be dismissed without further discussion. The decrees complained of our order will reverse and hold for naught upon appellants' motion, and remand the cause, with direction to reinstate and reconfirm the sale to them upon the repayment of the cash consideration and the redelivery of the notes for the deferred payments.

HUFFMAN v. MANLEY. (No. 3596.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 4, 1919.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES ⇨122—EVIDENCE ⇨423(8)—ACCOMMODATION MAKERS—COSURETIES—PRESUMPTION.

As between accommodation makers of a promissory note the presumption is that they are cosureties, and as such liable to contribution to one of their number discharging the obligation, but this presumption may be rebutted by parol evidence showing that the one last signing was and is a surety for the prior accommodation makers, and not their cosurety.

2. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY ⇨191—IMPLIED AUTHORITY OF PRINCIPAL.

If one sign a note as surety and intrust it to his principal, he thereby gives the latter implied authority to obtain either additional sureties or guarantors indefinitely until the note is fairly launched in the market as a security.

3. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY ⇨194(1)—STIPULATION AGAINST CONTRIBUTION.

One who signs as surety on such note may stipulate at the time of entering into the obligation that he will not be liable for contribution with other sureties who signed before him.

4. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY ⇨191—STIPULATION—EXTENT OF SURETYSHIP.

One who thus signs such a note, at the request of the principal debtor, to enable him to discount it, may, without the knowledge of the prior surety, and without any agreement or understanding with him, stipulate with the principal debtor that he signs only as surety for the prior parties.

5. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY — 191—STIPULATION BY SURETY—CONSTRUCTION—PAROL EVIDENCE.

Such stipulation need not be in writing, and parol evidence is admissible to show an express contract to that effect, or such contract may be implied from facts and circumstances shown.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County.

Suit by Nora Huffman against Charles E. Manley and others. Decree for defendant Manley, dismissing the bill, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James A. Meredith and M. W. Ogden, both of Fairmont, for appellant.

Harry Shaw, of Fairmont, for appellee.

RITZ, J. Plaintiff brought this suit to compel contribution from the defendant Charles E. Manley upon the contention that he was a cosurety with her upon a note executed by her husband, herself, A. A. Hamilton, and the defendant Manley to Allison S. Fleming. It appears that on the 9th of December, 1910, D. Straud Huffman executed his note for $1,000 to Allison S. Fleming. The plaintiff, who is his wife, also signed this note as likewise did the defendant A. A. Hamilton and the defendant Charles E. Manley. So far as the face of the paper is concerned they are all makers, and their signatures to the note are in the order above mentioned. The plaintiff's contention is that in fact and in truth D. Straud Huffman is the principal and the other three parties are his sureties, while the contention of the defendant Manley is that so far as he is concerned Huffman and his wife are the principals, and he and Hamilton are cosureties for them. Huffman and Hamilton are insolvent. A judgment being obtained upon the note against all four of the parties, Mrs. Huffman was compelled to pay it, and brought this suit alleging the insolvency of her husband and of Hamilton, and asking that Manley be compelled to contribute one-half of the amount paid by her. The circuit court dismissed her bill, finding that Manley was not her cosurety, but was a surety for her and her husband.

The facts appear without substantial conflict to be that Huffman procured this $1,000 for his own purposes, and that his wife was not a beneficiary therein; that she signed the note simply as surety to assist him in procuring the money, and that he told her at the time she signed it that Hamilton and Manley would also become sureties; that he then took the note to Hamilton and Manley, and upon the representation that he and his wife were procuring this $1,000 to make some repairs and additions to their dwelling Hamilton and Manley signed it as sureties for Huffman and his wife. Huffman denies, of course, that he made such representations to Manley and Hamilton, but it satisfactorily appears from the evidence that Manley refused to become a surety for Huffman alone, and the same appears from the testimony of Hamilton. It is true, Mrs. Huffman knew nothing about the arrangements that her husband had with Hamilton and Manley, nor did Hamilton and Manley have any understanding or agreement with Mrs. Huffman as to the manner in which they should be bound upon the note, whether as cosureties with her, or as sureties for her and her husband. The contention is made by the appellant that, inasmuch as Huffman is shown to be the principal in this transaction and the beneficiary thereof, the other three parties to the note, while they appear as makers, must be cosureties, and are liable to contribution to the one discharging the obligation; while the contention of the appellee is that it may be true that Mrs. Huffman was only a surety for her husband as between them, but so far as he is concerned she and her husband were the principals; that his contract of suretyship was only to become surety for the husband and wife, and not for the husband alone. The appellant contends that this situation not appearing from the face of the paper, it cannot be shown in the absence of an agreement to which she was a party.

[1] It is very well settled that where parties execute a note like this they are prima facie joint makers, but as between them they may show what the real understanding was, and what their real relation is. Of course, so far as the holder of the note is concerned, unless he discounts it with full knowledge and with the understanding that some are sureties for the others, they are all joint makers and equally liable. This proposition is not controverted. In fact both of the parties to this suit are put to the necessity of introducing evidence allunde to show that they are sureties, inasmuch as the face of the paper would make them both principals.

[2-5] But does the fact that Mrs. Huffman was, as between her and her husband, only surety necessarily make her a cosurety with Manley? There is no reason why an accommodation maker on a note cannot enter into an agreement with the principal to fix his liability in any way that he chooses, or that they may agree upon. Prima facie when it is shown, as it is shown here, that there was only one party principally liable for the debt, the others are cosureties, but this presumption may be overcome by proving what the real contract was. Brant on Suretyship and Guaranty, § 291; 21 R. C. L. p. 948; 32 Cyc. 18; Bulkeley v. House, 62 Conn. 459, 26 Atl. 352, 21 L. R. A. 247, and note; Singer Mfg. Co. v. Bennett, 28 W. Va. 16; Harrison v. Lane, 5 Leigh (Va.) 414, 27 Am. Dec. 607

But it is contended by Mrs. Huffman that, even though Manley did sign his name to this note with the understanding that he was only surety for herself and her husband, instead of being a cosurety with her for her husband, she, not being a party to that understanding and agreement, could not be bound or affected thereby. This contention is not tenable. When Manley was asked by Huffman to sign his name to this note as surety he had a right to enter into an agreement with the party who had the note as to the nature of the obligation he was assuming. Mrs. Huffman signed her name to the paper and turned it over to her husband. She put it in his power and conferred upon him authority to get such other or additional sureties as might be necessary, or that he might be advised would be necessary in order to procure the money upon the note, and it necessarily follows that he could make such contracts with the parties so becoming surety as would enable him to procure their signatures to the note. If Mrs. Huffman desired to prevent herself from becoming liable in any other way than as cosurety with Hamilton and Manley, she should not have intrusted her husband with this paper. She having signed the paper, it devolves upon her, if she would limit her liability in the way she now seeks to do, to see that the parties whose names were sought and procured signed it as cosureties with her, in accordance with her understanding with her husband. She was the one who first signed this paper and put it in the power of her husband by reason of having her signature thereon to procure the signatures of the other two parties. One of them declined to sign the paper as surety for her husband. While she did not know this, that fact can make no difference so far as her relation to the note was concerned. Her husband might have taken this note and procured its discount without procuring any other signatures after her own thereon, and she would be bound unless she could show that the party taking the note knew that she was not to be bound unless other sureties joined her thereon. Instead of doing this the party beneficially interested procured others to become surety for him and his wife, instead of discounting the note. Suppose Manley in this case, instead of becoming surety, had discounted this note himself, Mrs. Huffman could not say that she signed this note with the understanding that Manley was to become surety, and therefore that she is not bound thereon except as his cosurety, unless she could say that he had full knowledge of such an understanding. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Bennett, 28 W. Va. 16; 32 Cyc. 18; Craythorne v. Swinburne, 14 Vesey, Jr., 160; Robertson v. Deatherage, 82 Ill. 511; Bowser v. Rendell, 31 Ind. 128; *Bobbit v. STATE v. CRAWFORD. (No. 3264.)

March 4, 1919.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW §576(9) — DISCHARGE FROM PROSECUTION—TERMS OF COURT.

Under section 25 of chapter 159 of the Code 1913 (sec. 5601), the third unexcused term after the one at which an indictment for a felony was found is countable for the accused on his motion for a discharge from prosecution, notwithstanding lack of termination thereof at the date of the entry of a nolle prosequi setting him at liberty.

2. CRIMINAL LAW §178—WANT OF PROSECUTION—DISCHARGE.

One in whom such right has so vested is entitled to a discharge from prosecution on a second indictment for the same offense, returned several years after the vesting thereof; such dismissal and reindictment being in contravention of the spirit and purpose of the statute.

3. CRIMINAL LAW §1187—REFUSAL TO DISCHARGE DEFENDANT — CONVICTION — REFUSAL.

If, in such case, the motion of the accused, for his discharge, fully sustained by the record and evidence adduced, has been overruled, and he put upon trial and convicted, the judgment will be reversed, and the verdict set aside, on a writ of error, and the appellate court, rendering such judgment as the trial court should have rendered, will sustain the motion and forever discharge the accused from prosecution for the offense so charged.

4. STATUTES §181(2) — CONSTRUCTION—VALIDITY.

Statutes must be so construed as to effectuate, and not to defeat, the legislative intent.

5. CRIMINAL LAW §178—NOLLE PROSEQUI—EFFECT.

A nolle prosequi does not preclude a reindictment.

6. CRIMINAL LAW §178—DISMISSAL—REINDICTMENT.

By dismissal before right of discharge vested under Code 1913, c. 159, § 25 (sec. 5601), upon expiration of third unexcused term without prosecution, the state may always save its right to prosecute on a new indictment.

Error to Circuit Court, Mingo County.

James Crawford was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, his motions for new trial and for a discharge were overruled, and he brings error. Reversed, and defendant discharged.

Goodykoontz & Scherr, of Williamson, and Marcum & Marcum, of Huntington, for plaintiff in error.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., Henry A. Nolte, Asst. Atty. Gen., and B. Randolph Bias, of Williamson, for the State.

POFFENBARGER, J. If the defense underlying the first assignment of error on this writ is well founded and fully established, there will be no occasion for consideration of any of the others. On a second indictment charging the murder alleged in the first, the accused moved the court for a discharge on the ground of detention without trial, under the former indictment, for such a period of time as confers right of discharge from the offense. The court having overruled his motion, he entered a plea of not guilty and was convicted of voluntary manslaughter. After having unsuccessfully moved for a new trial, he renewed his motion for discharge, which the court overruled, and sentenced him to confinement in the penitentiary for a period of three years.

The identity of the offenses charged in the two indictments is not questioned. Each of them charges James Crawford with the murder of Lewis Rutherford, and the identities of these persons and the homicide averred, respectively, are proved by the oath of the prosecuting attorney. They differ only as to the date of the homicide, but the allegation thereof is an immaterial one.

[1, 2] The motion is founded upon section 25 of chapter 159 of the Code (sec. 5601), reading as follows:

"Every person charged with felony, and remanded to a circuit court for trial, shall be forever discharged from prosecution for the offence, if there be three regular terms of such court, after the indictment is found against him, without a trial, unless the failure to try him was caused by his insanity; or by the witnesses for the state being enticed or kept away, or prevented from attending by sickness or inevitable accident; or by a continuance granted on the motion of the accused; or by reason of his escaping from jail, or failing to appear according to his recognizance, or of the inability of the jury to agree in their verdict."

Before the end of the third term of the criminal court of Mingo county after the one at which the first indictment was found, a nolle prosequi was entered, and the principal inquiry is whether that term can be counted in favor of the accused; continuances having occurred on the motion of the state at the other two terms. That indictment was found at the January term, 1911. In that term there was a continuance on the motion of the accused until April 11, 1911. At the April and July terms, 1911, there were continuances of the case on motions of the state. At the next term, the third after the date of the indictment, the nolle prosequi was entered. At the January term, 1918, the new indictment was returned. On the motion for discharge the accused proved his readiness for trial at the April, July, and October terms. Presumptively the state was unable to prove facts applying the exceptions prescribed by the statute relied upon, so as to deprive the accused of the benefit of any of the terms, for it made no effort to do so. It merely denies his right to count the October term, 1911, because he was not held for trial until it ended.

Whether such a term is to be counted seems never to have been a subject of inquiry in this court or any reported Virginia decision. Upon the legal fiction that a term of court is a single day, the first day thereof, and the tendency of the interpretation urged by the accused to defeat the ends of justice and work a perversion of the statute, it was held in Bell's Case, 7 Grat. (Va.) 646, 8 Grat. (Va.) 600, that a person remanded for indictment and trial was not entitled to the benefit of the term in which he was remanded. It had occurred and become complete and full before the remand took place. Besides, a person might be committed for indictment at a date within the term so late as to render it impossible to afford an opportunity for such action. There is a similar holding in Sands v. Com., 20 Grat. (Va.) 800. The first ground of these decisions would bring the October term, 1911, within the statute in this case; for it would make it complete before the entry of the nolle. The other argument is inapt, for there is, under the circumstances obtaining here, time for trial and a total lack of adventitious circumstances working surprise. The Virginia decisions just referred to have been incautiously interpreted as requiring full and complete terms. Ex parte Anderson, 81 W. Va. 171, 94 S. E. 31. This observation was made merely arguendo and is therefore simply an obiter dictum. The question here presented was not involved in the case at all, nor was it really considered.

[3] Application of the legal fiction invoked in Bell's Case might result in the loss of the third term to the state, if strictly adhered to, for the impossibility of holding a prisoner into the third term without passing the first day thereof is obvious, and, if that day makes the term complete for the purposes of the statute, he could not be held beyond it.

However this may be, the interpretation urged by the attorneys for the plaintiff in error accords with the spirit and purpose of the statute, while that adopted by the state is highly objectionable, because it tends to deprive the accused of the constitutional right for the enforcement and protection of which the statute was passed. When a prisoner has stood ready for trial through two full terms and substantially through the third one, and, no doubt, until the jury has been discharged and the opportunity for trial at that term annihilated, he has substantially performed all the statutory conditions requisite to his right of discharge. Although such a discharge is not the moral equivalent of an acquittal, and he may be guilty, his constitutional right to have his guilt or innocence determined by a trial within a reasonable time cannot be frittered away upon purely technical and unsubstantial ground. Nor is the legislative act designed to enforce such right to be interpreted otherwise than in accordance with the recognized rules of construction. To permit the state to enter a nolle prosequi within the third term and reindict for the same offense, and thus deprive the prisoner of the terms fully elapsed as well as the term about to end, would make it possible to keep the prisoner in custody or under recognizance for an indefinite period of time, on charges of a single offense, unless, perhaps, he could enforce a trial by the writ of mandamus. Such a construction as substantially tends to the defeat or undue limitation of the purpose of a statute is not permissible in any jurisdiction.

[4] That statutes shall be so construed as to effectuate the legislative purpose, not defeat it, is fundamental and all-pervasive in statutory construction. The remedy given by law for failure to accord a prompt trial to one charged with a felony is right to be discharged, not mandamus to obtain such a trial. Whether the latter would be adequate to due enforcement of the constitutional right is a legislative question, not a judicial one. The conclusion indicated by these observations harmonizes with the construction given the statute in Ex parte Dudley, 55 W. Va. 472, 47 S. E. 285, in which the state endeavored to prolong the detention by a retirement of the case from the docket. Of course, there is a difference between a retirement from the docket and a setting at liberty by a nolle prosequi and between a reinstatement and reindictment, but the decision just mentioned emphasizes the inability of the state to prevent a discharge under the statute, or prolong the detention, by a retirement of the case, to do indirectly what it cannot do directly. To nolle and reindict is strictly analogous, and just as clearly contravenes the purpose of the statute. Judge Lynch and I expressed the opinion that it could not be done by an adjournment of the third term of court after the one at which the indictment was found, in Denham v. Robinson, 72 W. Va. 243, 255, 77 S. E. 970, 45 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1123, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 997.

[5, 6] That a nolle prosequi does not preclude reindictment is well settled, but that proposition is not inconsistent with the prisoner's right to a discharge by reason of unlawful detention, nor does it argue anything against legislative intent to enforce the constitutional right of speedy trial. By a dismissal before the right of discharge vests, the state may always save its right to prosecute on a new indictment, and, moreover, every accused person does not stand ready for trial, as did the prisoner in this case. That a dismissal and reindictment do not prevent the operation of the statute has been judicially declared in well-considered decisions in other jurisdictions. Brooks v. People, 88 Ill. 327; Newlin v. People, 221 Ill. 166, 77 N. E. 529; People v. Helder, 225 Ill. 347, 80 N. E. 291, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 257; State v. Wear, 145 Mo. 162, 46 S. W. 1099. The effect of such a discharge depends upon the terms of the statute conferring the right. Ours clearly makes it absolute and equivalent to an acquittal, as regards further prosecution. Adcock's Case, 8 Grat. (Va.) 661, 681. For an elaborate review of the cases arising under the statutes of the several states, see the note to Re Begerow, 56 L. R. A. 513.

The motion for discharge should have been sustained, and this court, rendering such judgment as the trial court should have rendered, will sustain the motion and enter a judgment forever discharging the accused from prosecution for the offense charged in the two indictments set forth in the record.

MAYNARD et al. v. SHEIN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 4, 1919.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. EQUITY ⚡90—PARTIES—INTEREST.

It is a general rule that all persons materially interested either legally or beneficially in the subject-matter involved in a suit, who are to be affected thereby, should be made parties thereto, either as plaintiffs or defendants.

2. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS ⚡35(1)—ACTION TO SET ASIDE DEED—PARTIES.

Where a suit is brought to set aside a deed because of lack of capacity of the grantor therein or for some other cause, and deeds of trust made by the grantee in such deed to secure certain of his debts, as clouds upon the title of the plaintiffs to the real estate conveyed thereby, and the trustees in such deeds of trust have only a bare power of sale thereunder, the beneficiaries therein are necessary parties to such suit.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚡1177(3)—REVERSAL—WANT OF PROPER PARTIES.

Where a decree is entered without proper parties before the court, the same will be reversed, and the cause remanded, that proper parties may be impleaded.

4. DEPOSITIONS ⚡96—READING OF DEPOSITION—AMENDED BILL—NEW PARTIES.

If after depositions are taken and filed in a cause the plaintiff files an amended bill making new parties, such depositions previously taken cannot be read against the new defendants.

From Circuit Court, Mingo County.

Bill by Young Maynard and others against S. Shein and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Wade H. Bronson and Goodykoontz & Scherr, all of Williamson, for appellants.

F. H. Evans and L. A. Sampselle, both of Williamson, for appellees.

RITZ, J. The plaintiffs, the widow and heirs at law of Martin Van Buren Maynard, deceased, brought this bill to set aside certain deeds made by the said Martin Van Buren Maynard in his lifetime, and deeds made subsequent thereto based thereon, as clouds upon the title of the plaintiffs to a tract of land situate in Mingo county.

It appears that in 1870 Richard Maynard and wife conveyed to their son Martin Van Buren Maynard a tract of land said to contain about 146 acres. As to whether or not a life estate was created by the deed in Martin Van Buren with remainder to the children of himself and his wife is a question of construction of the deed. There is a provision in it, however, authorizing the grantee to sell and convey said tract of land to any of his brothers or sisters. The grantee in this deed, upon the theory that there was vested in him a fee simple absolute, sold and conveyed the mineral in the tract of land to Henry R. Phillips, trustee. Subsequently, upon the theory that he was not the owner of the fee simple, but had the right to sell and convey it to any of his brothers and sisters, he sold and conveyed the entire tract of land to his sister Harriett Simpkins, who in turn sold and conveyed it to the defendant S. Shein. After the death of Martin Van Buren Maynard this suit was instituted by his widow and children against Shein and his grantor for the purpose of setting aside the deed made by Maynard to Mrs. Simpkins, and by Mrs. Simpkins to Shein, as clouds upon their title to the land, their contention being that Martin Van Buren Maynard had no right to sell the land, he having only a life estate therein, but more particularly averring that he was not of sound mind and had not the capacity to make a deed at the time he made the deed to Mrs. Simpkins. The defendant Shein demurred to this bill, and, his demurrer being overruled, he filed his answer in which, among other things, he averred that since he became the owner of said tract of land he had laid off a part thereof into town lots, and had sold and conveyed a number of such town lots to various parties whose names he gives in the answer, and further that he had executed a deed of trust conveying said land to Wells Goodykoontz, trustee, to secure two certain notes to different parties whose names are given in the answer, and also that he had subsequently executed another deed of trust conveying said tract of land to Harry Scherr and Sigmund Freiberg, trustees, to secure the payment of certain other debts, the amounts thereof and the names of the holders thereof being set out in said deed of trust, a copy of which is exhibited with said answer. Upon this showing said defendant Shein contended that the court did not have jurisdiction to further proceed because of the absence of necessary parties. Plaintiffs thereupon amended their bill and made parties defendants some, if not all, of the grantees of Shein of the town lots, and also the trustees in the two deeds of trust above referred to, but did not make parties defendants the beneficiaries in said deeds of trust. To this bill the trustees demurred because of lack of necessary parties, contending that the beneficiaries in said deeds of trust should be before the court before any decree could be properly entered. This demurrer was overruled. Said trustees thereupon moved the court to suppress certain depositions which had been taken and filed in the case before they were made parties, and moved the court not to read said depositions to affect any rights which might have been conveyed to them in said deeds of trust, or of the beneficiaries in said deeds of trust. This motion was overruled, however, and upon a hearing the court entered a decree canceling the deed from Martin Van Buren Maynard to Mrs. Simpkins, from Mrs. Simpkins to Shein, the two deeds of trust above referred to, and the deeds from Shein to the various purchasers of lots above referred to, as clouds upon the title of the plaintiffs. From this decree the defendants Shein, Goodykoontz, trustee, and Scherr and Frelberg, trustees, prosecute this appeal.

[1-3] The only grounds of error urged by the appellants are that the court had no jurisdiction to enter a decree canceling the deeds of trust aforesaid, and the other deeds in the chain of title, upon which they are based, without having before it the beneficiaries in said deeds of trust, and that the court should have refused, upon the hearing of the cause, to read the depositions taken and filed before said trustees were made parties. It is well settled that all persons materially interested in the subject-matter involved in a suit who are to be affected by the proceedings and result of such suit should be made parties thereto. It is contrary to the policy of our law that the rights of parties should be materially affected or be entirely destroyed without giving to them an opportunity to be heard. Poore v. Clark, 2 Atk. 515; Horton v. Bond, 28 Grat. (Va.) 815; Hill v. Proctor, 10 W. Va. 59; Burlew v. Quarrier, 16 W. Va. 108; Rexroad v. McQuain, 24 W. Va. 32; Sadler v. Taylor, 49 W. Va. 104, 38 S. E. 583; Gall v. Gall, 50 W. Va. 523, 40 S. E. 380; Bryan v. McCann, 55 W. Va. 372, 47 S. E. 143; Beckwith v. Laing, 66 W. Va. 246, 66 S. E. 354; Bragg v. Coal Co., 70 W. Va. 655, 74 S. E. 946. There can be no question but that the beneficiaries under the deed of trust referred to are interested in this real estate. They hold the same as a security for the payment of their debts. Neither is there any doubt but that their interests are affected by the decree entered. The deeds purporting to create the security to them are canceled and annulled, and this without their presence in court. There are some cases in which the beneficiaries in a deed of trust may not be necessary parties to a suit seeking to affect the interest created thereby, but this is only where the trustees therein are given full power and authority to control the debts thereby secured, and to do whatever may be necessary to protect the rights of parties, as in the case of Abney Barnes Co. v. Davy Pocahontas Coal Co. et al., decided at this term of this court, 98 S. E. 298. This is not that kind of a case, however. Here the deeds of trust conferred upon the trustees no title or interest in the debts, no right to control them, but simply the naked legal title, with a bare power to sell for the satisfaction of the debts secured. We are clearly of the opinion that it was error to enter the decree canceling these deeds of trust, or any other decree affecting the interest of the parties secured by these deeds, in their absence from the suit. This conclusion, under the authority of Oil Co. v. Moore's devisees, 58 W. Va. 540, 49 S. E. 449, and Ralphsnyder v. Titus, 63 W. Va. 469, 60 S. E. 494, results in the reversal of the decree complained of and the remand of the cause in order that proper parties may be brought before the court.

[4] The contention that the depositions read upon the hearing of this cause, taken before even the trustees were made parties to the suit, and without notice to them, should not have been considered, is likewise well taken. Every party interested in the result of the litigation is entitled to an opportunity to be present at every stage of it. These depositions, having been taken before the amended bill was filed, and before the trustees were brought into the case, should not have been read on the hearing over their protest. It was held in Edgell v. Smith, 50 W. Va. 349, 40 S. E. 402, that depositions proving matters not in the original bill cannot be read in support of an amended bill subsequently filed. While it may be said that the matters alleged in the amended bill in this cause were the same as those alleged in the original bill, the parties were not the same, the interests to be affected were different. In Jones v. Williams & Tomlinson, 1 Wash. (Va.) 230, it was held that if, after answer filed and depositions taken, the plaintiff makes new parties, and files a new bill, the depositions previously taken cannot be read against the new defendants. So in this case we are of opinion that the depositions taken cannot be read against the parties made defendants since the taking of the same.

March 4, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. TAXATION §=734(7) — TAX SALE — MISDESCRIPTION IN ADVERTISEMENTS—EFFECT.

Misdescription in a sheriff's advertisement of a tax sale of a town lot, by reference to it by the wrong number, will not vitiate the tax sale and deed.

2. TAXATION §=798—CANCELLATION OF TAX DEED—FRAUD.

A false statement in relation to the land actually purchased, made by the purchaser at a delinquent tax sale, to the former owner, who applies to him for the purpose of redeeming within the time allowed by law, and on the truth of which the former owner relies and permits the time of redemption to expire, constitutes a fraud entitling the former owner to a cancellation of the tax deed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wyoming County.

Suit by M. F. Matheny against Silas Jackson. From a judgment dismissing the bill, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with instructions to enter decree for plaintiff on condition.

F. B. Shannon, of Pineville, for appellant.
Toler & Moran, of Mufflens, for appellee.

WILLIAMS, J. This suit was brought by M. F. Matheny against Silas Jackson to cancel at tax deed made to defendant on the 10th of January, 1917, by Will P. Cook, clerk of the county court of Wyoming county, for an undivided one-half interest in lot No. 23 in the town of Sizemore in said county, pursuant to a sheriff's sale, made the 13th of December, 1915, for delinquent taxes, assessed for the year 1913 in the name of Elizabeth Sturgill, plaintiff's grantor. Defendant answered, and depositions were taken and filed, pro and con. Upon the hearing, on the 16th of February, 1918, the court held plaintiff was not entitled to relief and dismissed his bill, and he has appealed.

[1] Two issues are raised, one of law and the other of fact. The issue of law is that the misdescription of the lot in the sheriff's advertisement of sale is fatal to the validity of the tax deed, it being described in the advertisement as lot No. 13, when, in fact, the lot returned delinquent and sold is No. 23. This point is not well taken. Sections 6 and 25 of chapter 31, Barnes' Code (Code 1913, c. 31, §§ 6, 25 (secs. 1064, 1084)), expressly provide that such a misdescription shall not affect the sale and deed. The following decisions settle this point: Hamill v. Glover, 74 W. Va. 152, 81 S. E. 970, and Fleming v. Charnock, 66 W. Va. 50, 66 S. E. 8, 18 Ann. Cas. 711.

[2] The issue of fact is that plaintiff applied to defendant, within the time allowed for redemption, for the purpose of redeeming his lot, and was misled by his false and fraudulent statement, on the truth of which plaintiff relied. Plaintiff testifies that, some time in November, he thinks about the 10th, 1913, he was in Pineville, and was then informed by Floyd Lusk that defendant had bought in plaintiff's lot at a tax sale, that plaintiff immediately went to see defendant for the purpose of redeeming it, and told him he understood he had bid in lot No. 23 in the town of Sizemore, or an interest therein and, if it was true, he wanted to redeem it, and defendant replied that he had made no such purchase, that he and some friends of his had made several purchases at the delinquent sale, but that plaintiff had no property in the list. This was within the time to redeem. Defendant admits plaintiff came to see him, but denies he told plaintiff that none of his property was in the list of properties he had purchased, because, he says, he did not then know who owned the lot. He swears plaintiff said to him, "I understand you have bid in some of my property," and witness replied that, if he had, he did not know it, and then got his receipts and looked over them, and told plaintiff he had bought nothing that was sold in his name, and further says plaintiff only asked about lots sold in his name, and that he did not know at the time of sale, and did not learn, until after the year of redemption had expired, that plaintiff owned lot No. 23. But defendant is contradicted and plaintiff supported by witness Floyd Lusk, who gave plaintiff the information about the sale. Lusk was the owner of lot No. 13, and says John Riley Sizemore had told him that defendant had bid in his (witness') lot, and got a copy of the paper containing a notice of the sale and showed it to witness, and that it was lot No. 18 that was advertised. Lusk was therefore especially interested in ascertaining if lot No. 13 had been sold and bid in by defendant, and says he went to him and asked him if he had bought his lot and defendant replied he had not. Witness says further that he was not sure he had all the tax receipts, and went the second time to ask defendant about his purchase, and says he replied, "It wasn't my lot at all, that it was Mike Matheny's," and further said something about Matheny's causing him to pay out a lot of money, and that he would like to get some of it back, or wanted a show to get some of it back. After witness had told plaintiff that defendant had bought his lot, he says plaintiff went immediately, directly across the street and into defendant's store. Defendant admits witness Lusk came to see him twice about the matter, and fixes the time of the second conversation after the time to redeem had expired, but says he does not remember the month or day. The time of this second visit is very material, and, in regard to that matter, defendant is evidently mistaken, because he does not deny that plaintiff had come to see him about the lot, at the time fixed by plaintiff, which was within the time of redemption. It was evidently after both visits to defendant by witness Lusk that Lusk told plaintiff of the tax sale, for defendant admits he told Lusk that he "had found out it was Mike Matheny's lot and as it was (he) didn't care to stick Mike a little, that he had caused (him) to pay out a little money unnecessarily, (he) thought." And this, in substance, is what plaintiff and Lusk both swear the latter told the former on the day, and immediately before, he went to see defendant. Plaintiff says he relied on defendant's statement to him as being true and was misled by it, and allowed the year of redemption to expire before he ascertained the fact to be that his lot had been sold in the name of his grantor, Elizabeth Sturgill, for delinquent taxes of 1913, and a one-half interest therein purchased by defendant. This was a fraud upon plaintiff, entitling him to a cancellation of the tax deed. James v. Piggett, 70 W. Va. 435, 74 S. E. 667.

Plaintiff, by his bill, tendered the amount of taxes, interest, and costs, and offers to pay the same. This, of course, he should do, it being admitted that the taxes, for which the lot was sold, were unpaid.

The decree will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the lower court to enter a decree canceling the tax deed after payment has been made by plaintiff to defendant of the sum tendered, awarding costs to appellant both in this court and the court below.

TROTTER v. E. I. DU PONT DE NEMOURS & CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 13, 1919.)

1. PLEADING ⇨252(2)—AMENDED DECLARATION—EFFECT OF FORMER DECLARATION.

Where case was tried on the second amended declaration, which was intended as a substitute for the first two declarations, the case stood as though the first two declarations had not been filed, and allegations therein with reference to how accident happened did not bind plaintiff.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨806(2)—RULING ON DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

The trial court having sustained defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's evidence, the court on appeal will only consider whether a verdict for plaintiff, if found, would be set aside as without evidence to support it.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨927(5)—RULING ON DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

In determining whether demurrer to plaintiff's evidence was properly sustained, court on appeal must admit the truth of plaintiff's evidence and all inferences therefrom, favorable to plaintiff, which the jury might have fairly drawn.

4. TRIAL ⇨139(1)—DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE.

If verdict for plaintiff would not have been set aside as without evidence to support it, demurrer to plaintiff's evidence should have been overruled.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨286(17)—NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In action for injuries to plaintiff servant, due to falling of a scaffold which he was using in the course of his employment, and which had been erected by defendant master, question of defendant's negligence held for the jury.

6. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨103(1)—NON-ASSIGNABLE DUTIES.

One of the nonassignable duties of the master is to use due care to furnish his servant with a reasonably safe place in which to work, and reasonably safe tools and utensils with which to work, and if he fails to do so he is liable to the servant for injuries proximately resulting from such failure.

7. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨276(3)—PROXIMATE CAUSE OF INJURY—FAULTY CONSTRUCTION OF SCAFFOLD.

In action for injuries to plaintiff servant, due to falling of a scaffold which he was using in the course of his employment, and which had been erected by defendant master, held, under the evidence, that the faulty construction of the scaffold was the proximate cause of the injury.

8. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨280—FAULTY CONSTRUCTION OF SCAFFOLD—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

In action for injuries to plaintiff servant, due to falling of a scaffold which he was using in the course of his employment, and which had been erected by defendant master, held, under the evidence, that plaintiff did not assume the risk.

9. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨217(7)—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—KNOWLEDGE OF DANGER.

Plaintiff had the right to assume, when put to work on scaffold, that it was in a reasonably safe condition, and, if defect and danger therefrom was not so plain and clear that he must necessarily have been at fault in failing to observe it, he cannot be charged with knowledge of the defect on account of its obvious character.

Error to Circuit Court, Prince George County.

Action by Millard F. Trotter, Jr., against E. I. Du Pont de Nemours & Co. The trial court sustained a demurrer to plaintiff's evidence, and entered judgment for the defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Lassiter & Drewry, of Petersburg, for plaintiff in error.

Plummer & Bohannon, of Petersburg, for defendant in error.

BURKS, J. This action was brought by Trotter against the defendant to recover damages for injuries received by him by the fall of a scaffold, erected by the defendant, and which the plaintiff was using in the course of his employment as the servant of the defendant at the time the injury was inflicted. The defendant offered no evidence, but at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence demurred thereto. The trial court sustained the demurrer and entered judgment for the defendant, and to that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

On the oral argument in this court, counsel for the defendant abandoned the defense of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, and relied upon the defenses (1) that the defendant was not guilty of any actionable negligence; (2) that, if it was negligent at all, its negligence was not the proximate cause of the injury complained of; and (3) that the plaintiff assumed the risk of the danger resulting in his injury.

[1] Before discussing these defenses, we will notice briefly the pleadings which have been made the subject of some discussion by counsel. The plaintiff filed a declaration containing three counts, to which the defendant demurred. Before the demurrer was passed upon, the plaintiff filed an amended declaration of three counts, to which the defendant also demurred. Before this demurrer was passed upon, the plaintiff filed a second amended declaration of three counts, to which the defendant also demurred. The trial court overruled the last-mentioned demurrer and the trial proceeded. The statement in the brief of counsel for the defendant in error is this:

"The second amended declaration, that upon which the case was tried, differs from the first two declarations, in that it omits certain allegations with reference to how the accident happened, which are found in the original and first amended declaration, and upon which allegations we submit the plaintiff in this case is bound. * * * These averments are omitted in the third declaration, but, as they are not stated differently, it is contended that the plaintiff is bound by the averments which he makes in the first and second declarations."

The contention cannot be sustained. The omission was doubtless made because counsel for the plaintiff foresaw that they could not be sustained by the evidence, and they did not wish to be hampered by their allegation. An examination and comparison of the declarations will show that the third declaration was intended as a substitute for the other two, and it is admitted by counsel for the defendant that the case was tried upon the third declaration. Under such circumstances, the case stood as though the first and second declarations had not been filed, so far as it related to the mere statement of facts, and did not affect the question of making a new case or the statute of limitations. 31 Cyc. 465, and cases cited; United States v. Gentry, 119 Fed. 70, 55 C. C. A. 658. In Woodworth v. Thompson, 44 Neb. 311, 62 N. W. 450, it is said that, the original pleading being considered as abandoned, the adverse party cannot read it to the jury, or comment on it in his argument, unless he first offers it in evidence.

[2-4] As the defendant demurred to the plaintiff's evidence, no question about conflict of evidence arises; but we are only to consider whether or not we would set aside a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, as without evidence to support it, if one had been found by the jury, and, in so considering, we must admit the truth of the plaintiff's evidence and all inferences therefrom, favorable to the plaintiff, which the jury might have fairly drawn therefrom. If such a verdict would not have been set aside, the demurrer to the evidence should have been overruled.

Considering the case from this standpoint, the jury might have found that the plaintiff was employed by the defendant to do light electrical construction work in August, 1915; that prior to that time he had seven years' experience in that class of work; that from the time of his employment till the time of his injury he had done conduit work, similar to that in which he was engaged at the time of his injury; that he was familiar with the construction of scaffolds, and was not "scaffold scared"; that on April 18, 1916, the plaintiff was set to work by the defendant in erecting and placing conduits and conduitlets for the transmission of electric lights on one of the defendant's buildings then under construction; that these conduits and conduitlets were to be placed about 22 feet from the ground; that, in order to enable the plaintiff to do this work, the defendant had previously constructed a scaffold for the use of the plaintiff; that the scaffold at the point where the injury was inflicted was composed of an upright "ripping" about an inch thick and 3 or 4 inches wide, to which was nailed, with eight-penny nails, a piece of timber 2x4 inches thick, and about 3 feet long, the other end being fastened to a beam 6x8 inches running across the building, and upon this 2x4 piece of timber there was laid for a floor a single piece of timber 2 inches thick and about 10 or 12 inches wide; that the upright ripping extended 3 feet above the floor of the scaffold; that this scaffold was about 90 feet long and 12 feet above the concrete pavement below; that the place at which the plaintiff was injured was at the far end of the scaffold, near the end of the building; that at the other end of the scaffold the outside supports were timbers 2x4 inches, instead of plank 1x4 inches, and the floor of the scaffold consisted of two pieces of timber, instead of one, 2 inches thick and 10 or 12 inches wide; that this was a rush job, near the completion of this class of work at defendant's plant, and the scaffold was built of old materials; that the plaintiff observed the scaffold when he went upon it; that he and another man had been on the scaffold at the same time, but not on the same section thereof at one time; that the scaffold was "absolutely an inadequately built scaffold," and "any ordinary man would have broken it under almost any circumstances"; that a 1x4 inch board, 12 feet long, would not withstand the vibration; that the plaintiff had been working on this job about two hours when he reached the far end of the scaffold described above, and, while attempting to insert a conduit in the conduit pipe, the conduit broke—an exceedingly unusual occurrence—and he staggered, or lost his balance, and reached out and took hold of the 1x4 plank above mentioned, and immediately the scaffold collapsed, in consequence of the breaking of said plank about 4 feet from the ground, and he was thrown down with the scaffold and received the injuries of which he complains.

It was earnestly insisted by the counsel for the defendant in error that the scaffold was strong enough to support two men as long as they were working on it, and that it only broke when the plaintiff caught it in falling. The plaintiff, while testifying on this subject, said that two men had been on the scaffold at the same time; but he distinctly states that they both were not on that section at the same time.

[5] If upon this evidence the jury had found that the defendant was negligent in the construction of the scaffold, we could not say that their finding was without evidence to support it.

[6, 7] It is one of the nonassignable duties of the master to use due care to furnish the servant a reasonably safe place in which to work, and reasonably safe tools and utensils with which to work, and if he fails to do so he is liable to the servant for injuries proximately resulting to such servant from such failure. It is insisted, however, that the defendant is not liable, even if the scaffold was negligently constructed, because such negligence, if any such there was, was not the proximate cause of the injury complained of. Many cases, from this and other jurisdictions, have been cited to show what is and what is not a proximate cause. It is always dangerous to attempt to give definitions, and this is especially true of the term "proximate cause"; and we shall not attempt it, nor shall we attempt any analysis of the cases on the subject in this and other jurisdictions, preferring that each case shall stand on its own circumstances and be decided on its own merits. There is not so much difficulty in declaring what is a proximate cause in the abstract as there is in applying the principle to the facts of particular cases. We concur in the observations of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in Yoders v. Amwell Township, 172 Pa. 447, 33 Atl. 1017, 51 Am. St. Rep. 750, where it is said:

"Speculating on the doctrine of proximate and remote cause in supposed or hypothetical cases seems to have been a sort of intellectual recreation with text-writers on the subject, since the squib case in 2 W. Black. 893. With many, the rule laid down in Hoag v. Lake Shore, etc., R. R. Co., 85 Pa. 293, 27 Am. Rep. 653, would be criticized as lacking in scientific precision; but approximate certainty in the administration of justice, on evidence in an issue, is all we can hope to attain to. The same rule was, in substance, though in somewhat different language, adopted in many cases before Hoag v. Lake Shore, etc., R. R. Co., 85 Pa. 293, 27 Am. Rep. 653. In terse language, without leaving room for theorizing, where the evidence is conflicting and no fault is attributable to the plaintiff, it brings the jury at once to the ascertainment of the controlling fact: Was the consequence such as under the circumstances might and ought to have been foreseen and provided against? It eliminates all speculation as to the cause of the cause, which often is merely interesting, and aids not in determining just responsibility. As is said by Strong, J., in Insurance Co. v. Boon, 95 U. S. 130 [24 L. Ed. 395], the proximate cause is the dominant controlling one, and not those which are mere incidents."

In the case from which we have quoted, a horse was driven, in the nighttime, across a bridge upon which there was no handrail, and was stepped after he had safely crossed the bridge and gotten 14 feet beyond it. He then took fright and backed over the side of the bridge, causing the injury complained of. The court held that the lack of a proper handrail was the proximate cause of the injury. In arriving at this conclusion, the court announced several propositions which are stated in the headnote to 51 Am. St. Rep., supra, as follows:

"Township authorities are bound to know that a bridge may be crossed by a spirited horse in the nighttime, and that such horse may take fright; and if, by neglecting to place a guardrail upon such bridge, an injury results from the fright of such horse, their neglect is the proximate cause of the injury, and the township is liable therefor."

"Township authorities are bound to foresee, and reasonable provide against, common dangers to ordinary travel on the highway. The fright of a spirited horse, and that his conduct when in fright may be unreasoning, insane, and unlooked for, are common dangers, which should be expected. Such authorities cannot excuse their negligence in failing to erect a guardrail upon a bridge, or make it the remote cause of an injury, by asserting that they could not foresee a particular freak of conduct in a frightened horse."

"If township authorities neglect to place guardrails upon a bridge in the highway, and a horse drawing a vehicle passes safely over the bridge, and then, taking fright, backs the vehicle onto and off of the bridge over its side, thereby causing injury to its occupants, such neglect is the proximate cause of the accident, and the township is liable therefor."

In Standard Oil Co. v. Wakefield, 102 Va. 824, 47 S. E. 830, 66 L. R. A. 792, it was held that—

"In order to excuse a party guilty of negligence on account of the intervening act of another, the intervening act must be the superseding or responsible cause of the injury. The liability is not averted if the act relied upon is one which might, in the natural or ordinary course, be anticipated, and defendant's negligence is an essential link in the chain of causation. In such cases defendant's negligence is the efficient and proximate cause of the injury."

There are many cases to the same effect. See monographic note, 36 Am. St. Rep. 807-852. The precise form of the injury need not have been foreseen. It is enough if, after the injury has been inflicted, it can be seen that it was a natural and probable result of the negligent act complained of.

"When the act complained of was such that, in view of all the circumstances, it might not improbably cause damage of some kind, the doer of the act cannot shelter himself under the defense that the actual consequence was one which rarely follows from that particular act." 36 Am. St. Rep. 810, and cases cited.

We do not understand counsel for the defendant in error to controvert this proposition, but he insists that master cannot be held liable because its negligence, if any, was "merely a condition, as opposed to the efficient cause of the injury," to wit, the taking hold of the upright piece of timber by the plaintiff under the circumstances hereinbefore detailed. The weakness of the scaffold, as shown by the testimony of the expert, consisted in its inability to withstand vibration. His testimony on this subject was as follows:

"Then I would say, gentlemen, any responsible man that would erect a scaffold for a man to work on, that high from the ground—that it was absolutely an inadequately built scaffold. Now, if he had reversed his timbers and had a 2x4 upright with a 1x4 bracket—that 2x4, in the technical term of building is called a bracket—that would have held all of the weight, if it wasn't 3 feet long, that one man or two men would have put on it; but not with the vibration of 12 feet of 1x4 board; it is entirely inadequate; it don't make any difference how it was put up. I would say that any ordinary man would have broken it under almost any circumstances."

The scaffold was built for utility, not to walk on in the most careful and guarded manner; it may have been adequate for the latter purpose. The defendant knew that the work to be performed by the plaintiff was above his head, that he had to use a wrench to unscrew and tighten pipes for the purpose of inserting the conduitlet at the proper places, and that while doing so he had to stand upon this scaffold. It also knew, or was chargeable with knowledge, of the character of work the plaintiff was called upon to perform. The plaintiff describes the work to be done as follows:

"You work conduits anywhere from 3-inch pipes down to half-inch, and, in doing this, you have to thread your own pipe, cut it, and handle it, and it requires quite a bit of strength to thread a 2½-inch pipe, or a 1½-inch pipe, or a 1-inch pipe; in fact, when you go to do it, you have to get up on your die and push down."

While the breaking of the conduitlet was a very unusual occurrence, and was not to be anticipated, still the work of the plaintiff, as described by him, would necessarily cause more or less vibration of the scaffold, and it should have been so constructed as to have withstood any amount of vibration to which it might reasonably have been expected it would have been subjected, and not so that "any ordinary man would have broken it under almost any circumstances." While the plaintiff was using a wrench to put in a conduitlet, the conduitlet broke, and an eyewitness testifies:

"I saw him lift his hands up, and he staggered a little bit, and he brought his hands down and caught hold of the board."

Again, he says he—

"just moved a little bit (indicating a few inches backwards), and put his hand back, and caught hold of the piece that was standing there, and it went over—broke."

Speaking of the situation of the plaintiff at the time of the accident, the same witness says:

"He was not staggering very much; he just staggered very little."

The plaintiff himself testifies:

"I lost my balance—rather, when the pipe broke, I was standing up like this; when the pipe broke, I just caught to that, and the pieces gave away, and I went down to the floor."

The upright piece, which the plaintiff caught hold of, did not break at or above the floor of the scaffold, but below the platform between 3 and 6 feet from the ground. The evidence does not show that the upright was grasped by the plaintiff with any degree of violence; on the contrary, both witnesses state that he "caught hold" of the piece, not that he grabbed hold of it. The taking hold of the piece of timber in this manner and under these circumstances did not supersede the negligence of the defendant in the manner of constructing the scaffold; for, as said in Clinchfield Coal Corp. v. Ray, 121 Va. 315, 93 S. E. 601:

"It is elementary that a cause, to be a superseding cause, must entirely supersede the operation of the negligence of the defendant, so that such cause alone, without the defendant's negligence contributing in the slightest degree thereto, in fact produced the injury."

Under these circumstances, we are of the opinion that the faulty construction of the scaffold was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury.

[8, 9] It is further claimed by the defendant that the plaintiff assumed the risk of the safe condition of the scaffold. This defense rests upon a rather slim foundation. The plaintiff was under no obligation to inspect the scaffold. He had the right to assume, when put to work on the scaffold, that it was in a reasonably safe condition; and if it is sought to charge him with knowledge of the defect on account of its obvious character, the defect and the danger therefrom must have been so unquestionably plain and clear that, if he did not see it, he must necessarily have been in fault. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Cheatwood, 103 Va. 358, 49 S. E. 489. This cannot be said of the plaintiff in this case. This scaffold was 90 feet long, and the plaintiff went upon it at the end farthest from where he was injured, and he noticed the construction of the scaffold when he went upon it. This was nearly 90 feet from the weak spot in the scaffold, which gave way and caused his injury. No complaint is made of the method of construction of the scaffold at the point where he entered upon it. Indeed, it seems to be conceded by the witnesses that, at that point, the scaffold was safely constructed; but, reading the evidence as a whole, it does not appear that the plaintiff either knew, or was chargeable with knowledge, of the weak construction at the point of the injury. We are of opinion that the risk was not assumed by the plaintiff.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the trial court erred in sustaining the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence, and for this error its judgment must be reversed; and this court, proceeding to enter such judgment as the trial court should have entered, will enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant for the sum of $10,000, with legal interest thereon from December 11, 1917, the date of the verdict, until payment, and for the costs.

GOODMAN v. GOODMAN.

1. PARTITION §55(2)—ESTATES SUBJECT.

Code 1904, § 2582, authorizes a partition suit in equity between one claiming an undivided fourth by inheritance and another an undivided three-fourths, partly by inheritance and partly by purchase.

2. PARTITION §55(2)—PLEADING—TITLE.

It is not necessary in a bill for partition to make a formal disavowment of title, or any de-raignment further than is necessary to show how parties became coparceners and entitled to partition.

3. PARTITION §55(2)—PLEADING.

The complainant in a partition suit must aver and prove that he occupies such a relation to defendant as entitles him to invoke equity jurisdiction.

4. PARTITION §56—EQUITY JURISDICTION—DISMISSAL.

If bill for partition shows that complainant occupies relation to defendant entitling him to invoke equity jurisdiction, and the answer denies it, then upon a hearing on bill and answer, either with or without a replication, bill will be dismissed.

5. PARTITION §56—JURISDICTION—COURTS OF EQUITY—PLEADING.

Although a suit for partition cannot be made a substitute for an action of ejectment, a defendant to a bill which states a good case for partition cannot defeat jurisdiction in equity merely by denying in toto and ab initio complainant's title and asserting in himself a title independent of and hostile to that under which complainant claims.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hanover County.

Suit by Charles H. Goodman against John A. Goodman. Decree for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Haw & Haw, of Richmond, for appellant.
W. Sydnor, of Richmond, for appellee.

KELLY, J. This suit in equity was brought by Charles H. Goodman against John A. Goodman, alleging that the complainant, as one of the heirs of Agnes Doyle, who married Benjamin Goodman, inherited an undivided fourth interest in the land described in the bill; that complainant's nephew, John A. Goodman, is the owner by inheritance and purchase of the other three-fourths undivided interest therein; and praying for a partition.

The defendant filed an answer to the bill, which, so far as material here, is as follows:

"The defendant states that he is the owner in fee, and is now in possession of, a tract of land lying in Henry magisterial district, Hanover county, Va., which is bounded on the north by the lands of W. Calvin Martin, east by the lands of L. J. Boze and Cornelius Mantlo, south by the lands of Peter A. Peace, and west by the lands of Robert L. Goodman and John Rosbach." (Same description as in the bill.) "And if this is the tract of land that the plaintiff claims 'an undivided one-fourth interest in,' this defendant positively denies that the plaintiff has any right, title, interest, or estate therein. And the defendant denies that the plaintiff is entitled to any portion of said land. And defendant denies each and every other allegation in said bill contained which has not been hereinbefore specially mentioned."

To this answer the complainant replied generally, and at a subsequent day the circuit court entered the decree from which this appeal was granted, and which, so far as it need be here set out, is as follows:

"This cause came on again this day to be heard upon the bill of the plaintiff, the answer thereto by the defendant, the replication thereto of the plaintiff, and on motion of the defendant to dismiss the plaintiff's bill for want of jurisdiction; and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, the court, being of opinion that upon the case as made out on the bill and answer, with general replication thereto, it is without jurisdiction to try this cause, doth so decide, and doth sustain said motion of the defendant; and doth adjudge, order, and decree that the bill of the plaintiff be dismissed."

The sole question presented for our decision is: Did the court err in dismissing the cause, merely upon the pleadings, for want of jurisdiction, instead of awaiting a further development of the facts as to the claims of title on the part of the complainant and defendant, respectively? We have no difficulty in answering this question in the affirmative.

[1] The allegations of the bill were quite meager; but no objection to its form or sufficiency was interposed, and in substance it was good as a bill for partition. Upon a natural and reasonable interpretation it makes out a case in which the complainant and defendant claim under a common ancestor, Agnes Doyle, the complainant claiming an undivided one-fourth of the land by inheritance, and the defendant an undivided three-fourths, partly by inheritance and partly by purchase. The complainant and defendant were thus coparceners as to a part and tenants in common as to the residue of the land, and therefore clearly within the express terms of the statute (Code, § 2562) authorizing a partition suit in equity.

[2] It is not necessary in a bill for partition to make a formal deraignment of title, or any deraignment, further than is necessary to show how the parties became coparceners and entitled to partition. Ransom v. High, 37 W. Va. 838, 17 S. E. 413, 38 Am. St. Rep. 67; Martin v. Martin, 95 Va. 26, 27 S. E. 510.

[3, 4] We are not concerned here with the question of where the burden of proof would have rested if the case had been submitted and decided merely upon the bill, answer, and replication. Undoubtedly the complainant in a partition suit must aver and prove that he occupies such a relationship to the defendant as entitles him to invoke the equity jurisdiction. If his bill fails to show this, it is bad on demurrer. If it does show this, and the answer denies it, then upon a hearing on bill and answer, either with or without a replication, the bill will be dismissed. But the submission of this case by the parties, as well as the decision thereof by the court, was distinctly upon the defendant's motion to dismiss the complainant's bill, not for failure to prove his allegations, but for want of equity jurisdiction. We must deal with the case practically, and it is clear, from the decree itself, taken with briefs and oral arguments and admissions of counsel in this court, that the defendant contends, and that the court decided, that, even though a bill in equity should state a perfectly good case for partition, the defendant could defeat the jurisdiction by a mere denial of the complainant's allegations, and a mere assertion of an independent hostile claim going to the whole of the property involved.

[5] It is settled and familiar law that a suit for partition cannot be made a substitute for an action of ejectment (Pillow v. Southwest, etc., Co., 92 Va. 144, 23 S. E. 32, 53 Am. St. Rep. 804; Litz v. Rowe, 117 Va. 752, 86 S. E. 155, L. R. A. 1916B, 799; Bailey v. Johnson, 118 Va. 509, 88 S. E. 62); but a defendant to a bill which states a good case for partition cannot defeat the jurisdiction in equity merely by denying in toto and ab initio the complainant's title, and asserting in himself a title independent of and hostile to that under which the complainant claims. In Pillow v. Southwest, etc., Co., supra, Judge Buchanan, speaking for this court, said:

"Of course, a partition suit cannot be made a substitute for an action of ejectment; and if the defendant in such suit does not claim under any one who was a joint owner, such as a coparcener, joint tenant, or tenant in common with the complainant, or those under whom he claims, then it is clear that such suit would not be proper; but if the defendant does claim under one who was a joint owner with the complainant, or those under whom he claims, the defendant cannot defeat the right of the complainants to have their legal rights settled in a suit for partition by merely alleging and proving that he denies the rights of the complainant, and holds adversely to him. If the jurisdiction of the circuit court could be defeated in this manner, the statute would be of little value, and would fail to attain the chief object for which it was passed."

The instant case, so far as it has proceeded, is not within the influence of the decision of this court in Litz v. Rowe, supra, and in Bailey v. Johnson, supra, cited and relied upon by counsel for defendant. The essence of the decision in those cases is summed up in the following language from the opinion in the Bailey Case:

"An independent, hostile claim, going to the whole property involved, and denying in toto and ab initio the title of the parties claiming the joint ownership of the land, cannot be set up and adjudicated in a partition suit brought by the latter," (that is to say, in a partition suit brought by the joint owners, or some of them).

In the Litz Case and in the Bailey Case, an outside party, who had never at any time had any community of interest with any of the parties to a partition suit which had been properly brought, sought to intervene as actors in the partition suit under a claim of title distinct from and hostile to that under which the parties to the partition suits were claiming, and sought to have the court adjudicate therein the questions of title and boundary existing between such outside independent claimant and the parties claiming jointly under a different title. In other words, the adverse claimant in each of the cases cited was endeavoring to come into a partition suit in the attitude of a complainant for the purpose of trying a claim of title and boundary which both his pleadings and his proof showed could only be asserted in a court of law. In the present case, on the contrary, the defendant is seeking to defeat the jurisdiction in a partition suit, regularly brought, before the cause has proceeded far enough for the court to say whether the questions of title arising between the complainant and defendant are such "questions of law, affecting the legal title," as section 2562 of the Code expressly authorizes courts of equity in a partition suit to adjudicate and determine. It may be that when the case is fully developed upon the evidence the defendant can show that there has never been any community of interest at any time between him and the complainant; but, upon the record as it now stands, the case is clearly one for equity jurisdiction.

The decree complained of will be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings to be had therein not in conflict with the views herein expressed.

Reversed.

TALIAFERRO et al. v. EMERY.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 13, 1919.)

1. CONTRACTS §99(3) — VALIDITY — INTOXICATION—RATIFICATION WHEN SOBER.

In an action for specific performance of a contract made, while defendant was intoxicated, evidence held insufficient to support the finding of the commissioner that the contract was agreed to or ratified by the defendant when sober.

2. CONTRACTS §92 — VALIDITY — INTOXICATION.

Where plaintiff furnished whisky to defendant, who was addicted to its use, and after he became drunk secured his signature to a contract more favorable to plaintiff than he had theretofore been able to secure, the contract was voidable, both at law and in equity.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Prince William County.

Bill in equity by C. H. Emery against C. D. Taliaferro and another. From a decree for complainant, defendants appeal. Decree reversed, and bill dismissed.

C. E. Nicol, of Alexandria, and A. T. Embrey, of Fredericksburg, for appellants.

Thos. H. Lion and H. Thornton Davies, both of Manassas, and Jno. S. Barbour, of Fairfax, for appellee.

WHITTLE, P. This suit was brought by appellee, C. H. Emery, to enforce specific performance of a contract for exchange of properties between himself and appellant C. D. Taliaferro, and incidentally to set aside a deed to two lots in Quantico, subsequently conveyed by Taliaferro and wife to appellant G. W. Wallace, that were included in the deal. The contract bears date May 17, 1917, and by its terms Emery agreed to convey 92 acres of land in Prince William county, with a dwelling and storehouse thereon, to Taliaferro in exchange for 5 acres of land near Bell Fair Mills, in Stafford county, similarly improved, and the two vacant lots in Quantico above referred to. By prearrangement, on the morning of May 17th, Taliaferro rode on horseback from his home to Emery's a distance of about five miles, where the negotiation was carried on. Taliaferro in his answer denies the binding effect of the contract, a copy of which is exhibited with the bill and purports to have been signed by the parties and acknowledged before a justice. He avers that in the preliminary discussion of the stipulations of the proposed contract it developed that the parties could not agree, Emery demanding an even exchange of properties, while respondent insisted upon $1,000 boot, and so the trade was declared off. But later on Emery plied Taliaferro with whisky, a supply of which he had on hand, to the point that he became intoxicated, and while he was in that condition, and unconscious of what he was doing, procured his signature and acknowledgment of the paper. The answer gives respondent's view of the disparity in values of the two properties, and points out certain alleged defects of title to the mineral rights in the Emery property, and the existence of a lien of $300 thereon, the latter of which was subsequently discharged. Respondent insists that in the circumstances detailed a court of equity should not grant specific performance.

By consent of parties the cause was referred to a master commissioner to ascertain and report the facts, returning the depositions with his report. The commissioner's findings were adverse to Taliaferro, especially upon the controlling questions of his intoxication and insistence upon the provision that he should receive $1,000 in money by way of owelty of exchange. Whereupon the circuit court passed the decree under review, overruling the exceptions and confirming the commissioner's report, and setting aside the deed from Taliaferro and wife to Wallace, conveying the two lots in Quantico, and decreeing specific performance of the contract of exchange.

[1] We are not unmindful of the weight to which, ordinarily, a commissioner's report is entitled upon findings of fact, and in the conclusion we have reached will not transgress that rule, as correctly understood in the instant case. Yet we are of opinion that the commissioner and court have erroneously applied the law of the case to its facts. It is true that in some inconclusive particulars the evidence is conflicting; but the outstanding dominant facts and circumstances make out a case of imposition and unfairness which should not receive the sanction of a court of equity. That Taliaferro was an inebriate is not denied; nor is it controverted that Emery piled him with whisky pending negotiations for the exchange of properties. The divergence of opinion among witnesses is only in degree as to the extent of his intoxication. It appears that, while Emery's messenger had gone in quest of Merchant, the justice who redrafted the contract of exchange fled with the bill and took the acknowledgment of the parties, Taliaferro lay on the counter in the store asleep or in a stupor for three hours, and was aroused by Emery after Merchant's arrival to sign and acknowledge the paper. On the same occasion, but later, he signed a second paper of similar import, that Emery had had prepared by an attorney at Manassas, which was witnessed by Merchant. Let us accept Emery's version of what occurred on the arrival of Merchant, after he had awakened Taliaferro. He testifies that he said to him (Taliaferro):

"You know what we have done; don't do nothing unless you know what you are doing."

Again he says, on cross-examination:

"I just simply waked him up and said, 'Mr. Taliaferro, do you know you done some business here;' and he said, 'By G—, I never got too drunk to do business,' and we walked right into the dining room, and I handed Mr. Merchant the contract I had drawn up, and he said he would change it a little, and asked if it suited Mr. Taliaferro, and he said it did. When Mr. Merchant had drawn this contract, he asked if that was what we wanted, and he said it was all right."

On his way home that evening, Taliaferro attempted to ride into the front porch to a dwelling, which he had mistaken for a gate, and the owner took the horse by the bit and turned him into the road. Mrs. Taliaferro testified that "he was very much under the influence of liquor" when he reached home, so much so that he could not tell her anything about his trip. She says with respect to the deed that Emery subsequently brought to their home for execution, when she learned that he could not give a clear title to the property, and had got her husband drunk and made him sign an agreement which left out the $1,000 clause, she refused to execute the deed and burnt it up. With respect to this $1,000, the commissioner reports:

"* * * In view of the fact that no mention is made of the sum of $1,000 claimed by the said Taliaferro in his answer, and there is no evidence, other than the statement of the said Taliaferro, that any such sum had been agreed to, your commissioner is of opinion that the contract should prevail, and the said deeds should be passed free from any addition."

This finding fails to recognize the significance of a letter written May 31, 1917, to Taliaferro, by Emery's counsel, at his request. The writer, after rectifying the fact that Emery and wife had executed a deed conveying the 92 acres to Taliaferro, says:

"This deed is now ready for delivery, and Mr. Emery is in position to comply with the remainder of his consideration in the exchange of these properties, and requests that you make a deed conveying to him the property you agreed to convey him. * * * Kindly let me know the day and place where we can meet to exchange properties by delivery of deeds and payment of the money." (Italics supplied.)

In the absence of explanation, and the record affords none, this must be construed as an admission that, in addition to the 92-acre tract, there was a money consideration to be paid under the contract of exchange. That contention had been insisted on by Taliaferro throughout the case, and must not be ignored in considering his supposed ratification, when sober, of the contract of exchange signed by him while drunk.

[2] The law applicable to cases of this sort is concisely stated, by Mr. Minor in his Institutes. After giving the ancient rule, he says:

"But for more than a century this rigorous doctrine has been much relaxed, and it is agreed that drunkenness invalidates or renders voidable all contracts and transactions where (1) the drunkenness was brought about by the opposite party; (2) a fraudulent advantage was taken of it; (3) it deprived the party of his reason, and of an agreeing mind. * * * The mere fact that one is drunk when he enters into a contract is no ground for setting it aside, at least in equity, unless under one or the other of the circumstances above stated; but, when a person's habitual addiction to intoxication renders him extremely subject to imposition, such habits, though not carried to an excess constituting absolute incapacity, lay a ground for strict examination whether any instrument executed by him does not in itself, or in the attendant circumstances, contain evidence that advantage was taken of those habits." 2 Minor's Inst. (4th Ed.) 644.

And the author further declares that, when the drunkenness is brought about by the party obtaining the contract, the act is so flagrant a badge of fraud that it always renders the contract voidable, both at law and in equity, and that when a fraudulent advantage is taken of the drunkenness, this, too, is so direct a fraud as always to render the transaction voidable in all courts. This rule is well settled. 1 Elliott on Contracts, § 440, and cases cited in note; Miller v. Sterringer, 66 W. Va. 169, 66 S. E. 228, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 596.

For these reasons, we are of opinion to reverse the decree of the circuit court, and enter an order here dismissing the bill, with costs.

Reversed.

NEAL v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 13, 1919.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS ⚡224—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE—PRESUMPTION.

Prohibition Act, § 65, making evidence of possession of specified liquor in specified amount "prima facie evidence" of possession for the purpose of sale is simply a rule of evidence, and, like other presumptions, may be rebutted.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS ⚡224—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE TO REBUT PRESUMPTION.

In prosecution for violating the Prohibition Act, defendant's evidence held to rebut presumption, under section 65, that the liquor found in his possession was for purpose of sale.

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS ⚡224—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In prosecution for violation of Prohibition Act, where state merely established prima facie case by proof of liquor in defendant's possession, raising presumption of guilt, under section 65, defendant's evidence, tending to show that such liquor was not for purpose of sale, threw burden of proof upon state to establish defendant's guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

4. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡823(9)—INSTRUCTION—CORRECTION.

In prosecution for violation of Prohibition Act, where state's evidence merely established prima facie case, under section 65, raising presumption that specified liquor in specified amounts found in defendant's possession is for purpose of sale, instruction placing entire burden upon defendant to show his innocence, where the presumption under such statute was overcome by defendant's testimony, was not cured by a subsequent instruction to acquit defendant if state failed to prove him guilty beyond reasonable doubt.

5. WITNESSES ⚡382—IMPEACHMENT—EVIDENCE.

In prosecution for violation of prohibition act impeaching testimony of defendant's statement that he had given away some of the liquor found on his premises, where such alleged statement was not shown to have been made by defendant when examined as a witness in his own behalf, was not admissible under Code 1904, § 3901.

Error to Circuit Court, Lunenburg County.

Charlie Neal was convicted of violating the Prohibition Act, and he brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Geo. E. Allen, of Victoria, for plaintiff in error.

Attorney General Jno. R. Saunders, for the Commonwealth.

WHITTLE, P. Neal was indicted under the Prohibition Act (Acts 1916, p. 215), and brings error to a judgment upon the verdict of a jury finding him guilty, and fixing his punishment at one month's confinement in jail and a fine of $50.

The indictment followed the form prescribed by section 7 of the act, and charged the accused with being guilty of all the offenses enumerated therein. In point of fact he was prosecuted under section 65, the pertinent part of which is as follows:

"The possession by any person * * * in his home of more than one gallon of distilled liquor, one gallon of wine or three gallons of beer, or other malt liquor, at any one time, shall, in any proceeding * * * under this act, be prima facie evidence that such person possesses such distilled liquors, wine and malt liquor for the purpose of sale."

To sustain the prosecution, the commonwealth proved that about two gallons of wine and eight or ten gallons of liquid in a state of fermentation were found in the dwelling of accused, but whether the latter was intoxicating or not was not shown. There was also discovered in a corner near the dwelling a barrel containing about fifteen gallons of some kind of "beverage or liquid," which appeared to be made out of meal and cane juice, and an analysis of which showed that it contained 2.14 per cent. alcohol.

In the case of Pine & Scott v. Commonwealth, 121 Va. 812, 93 S. E. 652, this court decided that the Prohibition Act does not interdict the possession in a home for private use of distilled liquor, wine, beer, or other malt liquor, the possession of which was lawfully acquired, but merely declares that the possession of more than the specified quantity shall be prima facie evidence of a "purpose of sale."

[1] This presumption is simply a rule of evidence, and, like other presumptions, may be rebutted. No evidence was adduced to prove that the accused had ever sold or unlawfully disposed of any of the articles found on his premises, or that he made or had them in possession for an unlawful purpose. The commonwealth proved the possession, and rested its case wholly upon the statutory provision that such possession constituted prima facie evidence of a "purpose of sale." In rebuttal the accused adduced evidence to the effect that the wine was made by his wife for his sick mother from canned berries, with California beer beans added to cause fermentation.

The other liquid found in the dwelling was not a beverage in any sense, but slop water left over from rinsing a molasses barrel. The liquid found in the crib was vinegar made from cane juice and intended for his own use.

[2] Certainly this evidence, if true, repels the prima facie presumption of guilt arising from the unexplained possession of the wine and vinegar.

In this condition of the evidence the court, over the objection of the accused, gave instructions 2, 3, and 5, as follows:

No. 2. "The court * * * instructs the jury that, where there is found in the possession of any person ardent spirits exceeding the amount allowed by law, the presumption is that such ardent spirits are being kept for unlawful purposes, as prescribed by the Prohibition Act, and throws upon the accused the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that such ardent spirits were kept for legitimate purposes. * * *"

No. 3. "The court further instructs the jury that it is unlawful for any person to have in his possession or in his home more than one gallon of distilled liquor, one gallon of wine, or three gallons of beer or other malt liquors, and that, so far as this case is concerned, the possession of more than one gallon of the beverage charged in this indictment is a presumed violation of the law, and throws upon the accused the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that such liquor or ardent spirits is not kept for the purpose of sale."

No. 5. "The court further instructs the jury that if they shall believe from the evidence that Charlie Neal had in his possession more than one gallon of the beverage which he had made or manufactured, which contained more than one-half of one per cent. of alcohol, that he is presumed guilty under this indictment."

In the case of Pine & Scott v. Commonwealth, supra, it was held, that the provision in the Prohibition Act that possession of more than the specified quantity of ardent spirits "shall be prima facie evidence of a purpose of sale, merely establishes a rule of evidence. * * * The presumption is merely prima facie and may be rebutted."

When the commonwealth has proved the possession of more than the specified quantity of ardent spirits, etc., and there is no rebuttal evidence of that fact, and none, that it was lawfully acquired, and was in the possession of the accused in his home for private use and not for sale, the prima facie presumption prescribed by the Prohibition

Act, that it was kept for the purpose of sale, would generally be sufficient to warrant a conviction. We say generally, because it is possible to conceive a situation in which the commonwealth's own evidence of possession might be such as to repel the presumption that it was unlawful. As in negligence cases, it sometimes happens that plaintiff's evidence develops such a case of contributory negligence as would bar a recovery.

[3] In the present case, as observed, the evidence on behalf of the accused tends to show the lawful acquisition and possession of the beverages in question; and the jury was confronted by a prima facie presumption that the decoction was in the possession of the accused for the purpose of sale, on the one hand, and by the presumption of innocence fortified by rebuttal evidence on the other. In such case, the burden of proof to establish the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt rested on the commonwealth, and constituted a continuing burden, which inheres in every stage of the prosecution.

It must follow from the foregoing postulate that any instruction which, in the final result, relieves the commonwealth of that burden and casts it upon the accused, is erroneous.

This principle is recognized and illustrated in Litton's Case, 101 Va. 833, 849, 44 S. E. 923, 927, where the court sustained the following instruction:

"The court instructs the jury that when the commonwealth has proven that the accused has committed a homicide, and it does not appear from the circumstances given in evidence by the commonwealth that the killing was of a lower degree than murder in the second degree or in self-defense, then it is a prima facie murder in the second degree, and the burden is cast upon the accused to prove that it was below murder in the second degree or in self-defense; and, if the commonwealth seeks to elevate the offense to murder in the first degree, the burden is upon it to do so. Yet when the evidence is all in, then, if the evidence both for the commonwealth and the accused leave a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the accused, the jury must find the prisoner not guilty."

So, in Potts' Case, 113 Va. 732, 73 S. E. 470, it was held:

"A person charged with the commission of a crime is presumed to be innocent, and that presumption follows him throughout every stage of the prosecution. Moreover, the plea of not guilty denies every essential allegation of the indictment, and lays upon the prosecution the burden of proving the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt. There is no shifting of this burden of proof. It remains upon the state throughout the trial. The evidence may shift from one side to the other, and the state may establish such a state of facts as must result in a conviction, unless the presumption they raise be met by evidence; but when the evidence is all in, if, upon a consideration of it as a whole, the jury entertain a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the accused, they must find him not guilty, as the state has not sustained the burden of establishing his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. The accused is not required to prove his innocence. The rule that the burden of proof is upon the commonwealth is not affected by the modification that in cases of homicide, where the defense of self-defense is interposed, it is incumbent upon the defendant to set it up by affirmative proof, unless the fact appears from the commonwealth's own evidence."

In the case of State v. Wilkerson, 164 N. C. 431, at page 435, 79 S. E. 888, at page 890, in a similar prosecution under the Prohibition Act of that state (the language of which in the matter here involved is practically identical with that of our own statute), the court says:

"The jury were instructed that the fact of his [accused] having in his possession more than one gallon of the liquor made out a prima facie case against the defendant. If the court had stopped here, and not qualified this instruction, it would have been correct; but it did not do so, but went beyond the terms of the statute and the law when it further charged that it then was the duty of the defendant 'to go forward and satisfy the jury, by the greater weight of the evidence, that he did not have the liquor in his possession for the purpose of sale.' In this further instruction we think there was error."

The court then proceeds to show that it was the province of the jury to consider the case in the light of all the evidence, giving weight to the prima facie presumption on the one side, the presumption of innocence on the other, and all the evidence adduced. This case was approved and followed in State v. Russell, 164 N. C. 482, 80 S. E. 66, where it was held:

"Where the statute makes the possession by one person of a certain quantity of spirituous liquor prima facie evidence of an unlawful intent to sell, the burden of the issue remains on the state to show the guilt, as charged in the indictment, beyond a reasonable doubt; and when the prima facie case has been established, under the provision of the statute, it does not forestall the verdict, for it only means that as evidence it is sufficient to establish the ultimate fact of guilt, and the jury may convict if they find that it is not explained or rebutted. The presumption of innocence is still with the prisoner, and the burden continues to rest upon the state to show guilt beyond a reasonable doubt."

Upon request of the accused, the court instructed the jury—

"that although they may believe from the evidence in this case that there was found in the home of the defendant beverages analyzing a per cent. of alcohol in excess of that allowed by law in quantities in excess of those allowed by law, yet if they shall further believe from the evidence that such beverages were not made or kept for purposes of sale they should find the defendant not guilty. The court further instructs the jury that if they have any reasonable doubt as to whether the said beverages were made or kept for sale, they should find the defendant not guilty."

[4] It is contended on behalf of the commonwealth that, in view of this instruction, the accused could not have been prejudiced by instructions 2, 3, and 5, granted on its behalf. An answer to that contention is found in State v. Wilkerson, supra, 164 N. C. at page 441, 79 S. E. at page 892, where it is said:

"It will be observed that in our case the court placed the entire burden upon the defendant to show his innocence, for the instruction to which exception was taken is that the statute requires him to satisfy the jury by the greater weight of the evidence that in fact he did not have the liquor in his possession for the purpose of sale, whereas, according to all the authorities, and especially in Barrett's Case [138 N. C. 630, 50 S. E. 506, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 626], the burden is on the state throughout the trial.

"The defendant profited little or nothing by the subsequent charge that, if the jury had a reasonable doubt about the facts recited by the court, being those which the defendant must prove by the greater weight of the evidence, they should acquit. This, to say the least of it, was very confusing, if not contradictory. What advantage did he gain by the charge as to reasonable doubt, after the jury had been told that there was a presumption against him, and he must 'satisfy them by the greater weight of evidence' of his innocence. It deprived him of the presumption of innocence, and practically eliminated the benefit of the doctrine as to reasonable doubt by so weakening it that it amounted to nothing; and all this was done under a statute (act of 1913) which merely establishes a prima facie case for the state, sufficient, it is true, to carry the case to the jury, with the right to convict, but leaving in full force the doctrine of reasonable doubt, and also the presumption of innocence; for a man, even under our present laws, may have more than a gallon of liquor in his possession for a perfectly lawful and innocent purpose. It is not the possession that is unlawful, but the forbidden purpose for which it is held."

In People v. Cannon, 139 N. Y. 32, 34 N. E. 759, 36 Am. St. Rep. 668, there is an instructive discussion of the effect and limitations upon the prima facie presumption rule in cases like the one in judgment. It is said:

"* * * The accused must have in each case a fair opportunity to make his defense, and to submit the whole case to the jury, to be decided by it after it has weighed all the evidence, and given such weight to the presumption as to it shall seem proper. A provision of this kind does not take away or impair the right of trial by jury. It does not in reality and finally change the burden of proof. The people must at all times sustain the burden of proving the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt. It, in substance, enacts that, certain facts being proved, the jury may regard them, if believed, as sufficient to convict, in the absence of explanation or contradiction. Even in that case, the court could not legally direct a conviction. It cannot do so in any criminal case. That is solely for the jury, and it could have the right, after a survey of the whole case, to refuse to convict unless satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused, even though the statutory prima facie evidence were uncontradicted. The case of Commonwealth v. Williams, 6 Gray [Mass.] 1, supports this view."

[5] With respect to the exception to the admissibility of the testimony of the witness H. T. Falson, attributing to the accused the statement that he had given away some of the beverages found on his premises: Accused denied having made such statement, and the purpose of the testimony was to impeach his credibility. The materiality of the evidence was not made to appear; but, however that may be, the statement was not shown to have been made by the accused "when examined as a witness in his own behalf," and therefore was not admissible. Code, § 3901.

For the error of the court in giving instructions 2, 3, and 5, and for the admission of the evidence excepted to, the judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

Reversed.

BYRD v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 13, 1919.)

1. DISORDERLY CONDUCT §1—ABUSING FEMALE RELATIONS—PRESENCE OF THIRD PERSON.

The offense denounced by Code Supp. 1910, § 3780a, is complete whenever insulting language is spoken to or about another, or about his female relations, in his presence and under circumstances reasonably calculated to provoke a breach of the peace, regardless of presence or absence of third person.

2. STATUTES §211—CONSTRUCTION—REFERENCE TO TITLE.

The title of an act properly may be referred to in determining its meaning.

3. CRIMINAL LAW §218(5)—SLANDER—SUFFICIENCY OF WARRANT.

Warrant charging, as amended, that defendant unlawfully slandered and abused another's wife by using vulgar and obscene language "to and about" her in the presence of her husband, etc., held sufficient to charge substantially that defendant had used abusive language about the wife in the presence of her husband under circumstances reasonably calculated to provoke a breach of the peace.

4. DISORDERLY CONDUCT §1—UNLAWFUL ABUSE OF WIFE OF ANOTHER—TRUTH AS DEFENSE.

Evidence that the offensive words spoken were true is not admissible in bar of a prosecution for a violation of Code Supp. 1910, § 3780a, for having unlawfully slandered and abused another's wife in the presence of her husband under circumstances reasonably calculated to produce a breach of the peace, but was admissible in mitigation of punishment.

5. CRIMINAL LAW §695(2)—GENERAL OBJECTION TO EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY FOR SOME PURPOSES.

Where evidence was admissible for some, though not all, purposes, general objection to it should have been overruled.

6. CRIMINAL LAW §1170(5)—PREJUDICIAL ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where defendant was fined in a materially larger amount than the minimum fixed by Code Supp. 1910, § 3780a, for having unlawfully slandered and abused another's wife in her husband's presence, error in excluding in mitigation of punishment evidence of truth of defamatory words was not harmless.

7. CRIMINAL LAW §935(2)—NEW TRIAL—VENUE—FAILURE OF PROOF.

Commonwealth was bound to establish venue in prosecution for having unlawfully slandered and abused another's wife in presence of her husband, in view of Code Supp. 1910, § 3780a, and, regardless of instructions, if there was no proof at all as to where offense was committed, verdict of guilty should have been set aside, and new trial awarded, particularly where defendant raised point of venue, and relied on it before case went to jury.

8. CRIMINAL LAW §1144(6, 14)—APPEAL—PRESUMPTIONS—FAVORING COURT BELOW—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

In absence of bill of exceptions showing all instructions given or all evidence introduced, Supreme Court will presume that rejected instruction was covered by some other one given, and that there was evidence not certified as part of record which showed offense was committed within jurisdiction of trial court.

9. CRIMINAL LAW §1121(4), 1122(1)—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—CONSTRUCTION.

Where trial court, to bill of exceptions, certified that following evidence was introduced by commonwealth to maintain issue, and then set out evidence, which, in light of other bills, could not have been intended as anything but a certificate of all evidence, and such matter was followed by statement that court instructed as follows, setting out a single instruction purporting to apply to evidence as whole, bill of exceptions must be taken as embracing all evidence and all instructions.

Error to Corporation Court of Hopewell.

R. J. Byrd was convicted of unlawfully slandering and abusing another's wife by using vulgar and obscene language to and about her in the presence of such other, and he brings error. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for new trial.

W. L. Devany, Jr., of Hopewell, for plaintiff in error.

Jno. R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

KELLY, J. This is a prosecution for an alleged violation of section 3780a of the Code, which is as follows:

"If any person shall, in the presence or hearing of another, curse or abuse such person, or use any violently abusive language to such person concerning himself or any of his female relations, under circumstances reasonably calculated to provoke a breach of the peace, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction fined in any sum not less than two dollars and fifty cents nor more than five hundred dollars, in the discretion of the justice trying the case." Acts 1910, p. 18.

[1, 2] It is necessary in the outset to construe this statute. The defendant contends that, in order to constitute an offense thereunder, the insulting words must be used in the presence of some third person, as well as in the presence of the person to or about whom they are spoken. The statute is possibly not entirely clear in this respect, and the construction contended for finds support in the obvious fact that as a rule the presence of third persons adds aggravation to direct personal insults. To adopt this view, however, it would be necessary to read into the statute some additional expression with which to connect the words "such person." Taking the language as a whole, and considering the subject-matter and reason of the enactment, we are of opinion that the contrary view, advocated by the commonwealth, is correct. In other words, the expression, "such person," refers to the person "in the presence or hearing of" whom the insult is offered; and the offense is complete whenever insulting language is spoken to or about another, or about his female relations, in his presence and under circumstances reasonably calculated to provoke a breach of the peace, regardless of the presence or absence of third persons. The title of the act, to which we may properly refer in determining its meaning (36 Cyc. 1133; C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Pew, 109 Va. 288, 293, 64 S. E. 35), declares its purpose to be "to punish a person for using abusive language to another" without any reference whatever to the presence of third persons. Similar statutes in other states plainly omit any requirement of the presence of others than the person insulted as an element of the offense. See, for example, Moore v. State, 50 Ark. 26, 6 S. W. 17; Watkins v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 44 S. W. 507; Dyer v. State, 99 Ga. 20, 25 S. E. 609, 59 Am. St. Rep. 228.

The defendant, R. J. Byrd, was tried by a justice of the peace in the city of Hopewell, and fined $25 upon a warrant charging that in said city he "did on various times in June, 1918, unlawfully slander and abuse Mrs. M. J. Connelly by using vulgar and obscene language to and about her." On appeal to the corporation court, the warrant was amended, on defendant's motion, by adding, after the words last quoted, the words, "in the presence of her husband, under circumstances reasonably calculated to produce a breach of the peace." In a jury trial which followed, he was again found guilty, and sentenced to pay a fine of $25. It is this sentence which is now under review.

The only evidence offered to sustain the warrant showed that Byrd had made derogatory and insulting remarks about Mrs. Connelly to her husband, but not in her presence. Whether any person, except Byrd and Connelly, was present does not appear.

This evidence was objected to on the ground that it did not tend to prove the offense charged in the warrant, which, as contended by the defendant, was the use of insulting words to Mrs. Connelly in the presence of her husband. The action of the court in overruling this objection is the subject of the first assignment of error.

[3] The court was right. The only objection made to the form of the warrant was met by the amendment already indicated. As thus amended, while it was imperfectly phrased, the warrant was sufficient, in substance, to charge that the defendant had used abusive language about Mrs. Connelly in the presence of her husband under circumstances reasonably calculated to provoke a breach of the peace.

It was further urged, upon the hearing in this court, that the evidence was inadmissible, even if it did tend to prove the charge in the warrant as amended, because no third person was shown to have been present. This argument is disposed of by the construction which we have placed upon the statute.

During the course of the trial, the defendant offered to prove that the offensive words spoken by him to Connelly about the latter's wife were true. The court, upon the commonwealth's objection, refused to admit this evidence, and its action in that regard is assigned as error.

[4, 5] Counsel for defendant concedes, and it is clear upon reason and authority, that the evidence was not admissible in bar of the prosecution (Dyer v. State, supra; 8 R. C. L. p. 286, § 307); but the contention here is that the defendant ought to have been allowed to prove the truth of the defamatory words in mitigation of the punishment. For this latter purpose the evidence was proper, and should have been admitted. The objection seems to have been general in its form, and as the evidence was admissible for some, even though not for all purposes, the objection ought to have been overruled. Washington R. Co. v. Trimyer, 110 Va. 856, 860, 67 S. E. 531.

[6] We do not understand that the commonwealth controverts the admissibility of the evidence in question for the purpose indicated. Its contention is that, as the fine was comparatively small, the error should not be regarded as prejudicial. The amount of the fine is materially larger than the minimum fixed by the statute, and we cannot say that the error was harmless. It is probably true that in many cases, as in this particular case, the insulting words spoken to or in the presence of another about his female relations may be of such a character as that their truth would not be accorded very much, if any, weight in mitigation of the offense; but, by analogy to the rule in civil actions for defamation (Code, § 3375, and cases cited), and in accordance with what we regard a safe and proper general practice, such evidence, when offered, should be received for what it is worth as an aid in fixing the punishment.

The only remaining assignments of error requiring any particular discussion may be dealt with jointly. They relate to: (1) The refusal of the court to instruct the jury that the commonwealth had to prove that the alleged offense was committed within the local jurisdiction of the court; and (2) the denial of the motion for a new trial because of a total failure of proof on that point.

[7] It will be conceded that the commonwealth was bound to establish the venue, and that, regardless of instructions, if there was no proof at all as to where the offense was committed, the verdict should have been set aside and a new trial awarded. Fitch's Case, 92 Va. 824, 827, 24 S. E. 272.

The failure clearly to prove venue is usually due to inadvertence, flowing naturally from the familiarity of court, counsel, witnesses, and jurors with the locality of the crime; and appellate courts will generally and properly lay hold of and accept as sufficient any evidence in the case, direct or otherwise, from which the fact may be reasonably inferred. In this case, however, there is nothing in the evidence before us upon which to base even a surmise as to where the insulting words were spoken. Nor is there any reason to regard the question as lacking in substantial merit. The record discloses that the defendant raised the point and seriously relied upon it before the case went to the jury.

[8] To meet this situation, it is contended on behalf of the commonwealth that there is no bill of exceptions showing all the instructions given or all of the evidence introduced, and that, therefore, this court must presume that the rejected instruction was covered by some other one given in the case, and, likewise, that there was evidence, not certified as a part of the record, which showed that the offense was committed within the jurisdiction of the court. If the assumption on which this argument is based were correct, the conclusion contended for would follow. McArter v. Grigsby, 84 Va. 159, 4 S. E. 369; 4 Min. Inst. (3d Ed.) 1080; Burks' Pl. & Pr., p. 518, § 239a; Teter v. Ins. Co., 74 W. Va. 344, 82 S. E. 40.

[9] But the defendant's seventh bill of exceptions manifestly contains the whole of the evidence, and also shows that the one and only instruction given did not relate to the venue. The court certifies therein that "the following evidence was introduced by the commonwealth to maintain the issue," and then sets out evidence which, when taken in the light of the other bills, could not have reasonably been intended by the court as anything but a certificate of all the evidence in the case. This is followed, in the same bill, by the statement that "the court instructed the jury as follows," setting out a single instruction which plainly purported to apply to the evidence as a whole. This bill of exceptions, the final one in the record, is purposeless and meaningless except in one embracing all the evidence and all the instructions.

In principle we have here the same situation, and must apply the same rule as this court applied in Manchester Loan Association v. Porter, 106 Va. 528, 533, 56 S. E. 337, 338, where Judge Buchanan said:

"It is quite true, as argued, that the bill should state, or it should appear by clear inference, that the evidence which is certified is all the evidence; otherwise the appellate court will not know upon what the lower court based its action, and its judgment on the evidence will be presumed to be right. McArter v. Grigsby, 84 Va. 159, 4 S. E. 369, and authorities cited. When a court certifies that the evidence introduced on the trial was as follows, and sets it forth without anything in the record to show, as in this case, that it was not all the evidence, it is not only a clear, but a necessary, inference that it was all the evidence introduced."

It follows that there was plain and vital error in denying the motion for a new trial.

There were two other assignments of error, but they were not sound, resting upon the fallacious theory that proof of insulting words spoken to Connelly about his wife, but not in her presence, or in the presence of a third party, did not constitute any offense either as charged in the warrant or as chargeable under the statute. The effect of the warrant and of the statute in this regard has already been sufficiently discussed.

For the errors above pointed out, the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, to be had not in conflict with the views herein expressed.

Reversed.

(124 Va. 628)

MOORE v. NORFOLK & W. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 13, 1919.)

1. VENUE ⇨32(1)—OBJECTION TO JURISDICTION—TIME OF MAKING.

Where defendant was served with process according to Code 1904, §§ 3225, 3227, and permitted the action to go to judgment by default, a subsequent objection to venue of the action came in the wrong form and too late, since section 3260 expressly provides that such objection must be taken by plea in abatement.

2. VENUE ⇨21, 32(1)—JURISDICTION—STATUTE—WAIVER.

Code 1904, §§ 3214, 3215, providing actions may be brought in any county or corporation wherein the cause of action arose, where defendants reside, or where defendant corporation's principal officer or officers reside, do not confer jurisdiction upon any courts, but confer upon defendant a privilege as to venue of trial which may be waived by failure to plead in abatement as provided by section 3260.

3. VENUE ⇨8—TRANSITORY PERSONAL ACTIONS.

Under Code 1904, § 3058, the circuit court had original and general jurisdiction of all civil cases at law, including a transitory action for personal injuries, regardless of where the cause of action arose, where the defendant company was served with process under sections 3225 and 3227, and jurisdiction of the cause does not depend upon sections 3214 and 3215.

4. ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL ⇨3—COURTS ⇨39—JURISDICTION—MODE OF OBJECTION.

Code 1904, § 3260, requiring objection to certain defects of venue affecting jurisdiction to be made by plea in abatement, has no application where the defendant is not before the court, nor where the subject-matter of the action or suit, although within its territorial jurisdiction, is not in fact before the court, and in such cases the defect may be pleaded in bar or by other defense, as by motion to quash process of summons or dismiss action. The court should dismiss upon its own motion where such facts appear.

5. PLEADING ⇨35—VENUE—SURPLUSAGE.

In an action for personal injuries, an allegation that the injuries were inflicted in the city of Lynchburg was a wholly unnecessary averment for the purpose of laying venue, and under Code 1904, § 3244, may be treated as an allegation of original venue or fact venue not affecting the place of trial, or as matter of description, or mere surplusage.

Error to Circuit Court, Campbell County.

Action by Thomas W. Moore against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff by default, and defendant's motion to dismiss the case for lack of jurisdiction was allowed, and plaintiff's motion to be allowed to amend his declaration was overruled, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

This is an action by the plaintiff in error against the defendant in error in seeking to recover damages for alleged personal injuries. The parties will be hereinafter referred to as plaintiff and company, respectively.

The cause of action arose in the city of Lynchburg, the alleged injuries having occurred there on the railroad of the company, and this appears on the face of the declaration.

The action was instituted in the circuit court of Campbell county against the company as sole defendant, and was commenced by process returnable at rules. There was service of the process in Campbell county in accordance with sections 3225 and 3227 of the Code, on a depot agent and telegraph operator of the company employed in such county on its railroad. The company failed to appear at the return day of the process, and failed then to demur, plead or answer, and, the plaintiff having filed his declaration, a conditional judgment was entered as to the defendant in accordance with the statute (section 3284 of the Code) in such case made and provided; and at the subsequent rules, the company continuing in default, judgment was entered against it at rules, with an order for damages to be inquired into, in pursuance of such statute. Thereafter, at term, the company appeared specially, and, after due notice thereof to the plaintiff, filed the following motion in writing, namely:

"And now comes the defendant, and, limiting its appearance to the point of questioning the jurisdiction of this court, says that this court has no jurisdiction over this suit, because it appears upon the face of the declaration filed herein that the entire cause of action arose without the jurisdiction of this court, to wit, within the limits of the city of Lynchburg, whose courts properly have jurisdiction of the subject-matter of this suit and of the parties, and that the circuit court of the county of Campbell ought not to retain jurisdiction of this cause, and hence the defendant moves the court to dismiss this suit and no longer retain jurisdiction thereof. * * *

"Said motion will also be based upon the fact that it appears by the sheriff's return that the summons in this case was served on J. N. Finch, a depot agent and telegraph operator of the defendant at Rustburg, Campbell county, on February 5, 1918, there not being in said county either the president, cashier, treasurer, general superintendent, or any one of the directors of said Norfolk and Western Railway Company on whom the same could be served."

The court below sustained such motion on the ground that it appeared of record that the court was without jurisdiction of the case, and dismissed the same, with costs against the plaintiff.

Thereupon the plaintiff moved the court to allow him to amend his declaration by striking out the portion thereof from which it appeared that the cause of action arose in the city of Lynchburg, which motion the court overruled, and refused to allow such amendment.

And the plaintiff brings error.

A. H. Light, of Rustburg, for plaintiff in error.

F. S. Kirkpatrick, of Lynchburg, and W. H. Mann, of Petersburg, for defendant in error.

SIMS, J. (after stating the facts as above). The question raised by the assignments of error will be considered and passed upon in their order as stated below.

[1] 1. Did the trial court have jurisdiction of the action in the instant case?

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

The position of the plaintiff is that the trial court did have such jurisdiction, and that the motion of the company to dismiss the case was, in truth, an objection directed merely against the venue of the action, and came in the wrong form and too late under section 3260 of the Code (2 Pollard's Code 1904); that such an objection, as is expressly provided in such statute, cannot "be allowed, unless taken by plea in abatement," which, of course, could not be filed at the stage of the proceeding in which said motion was made.

We consider such position well taken.

Section 3260 aforesaid is as follows:

"Where the declaration or bill shows on its face proper matter for the jurisdiction of the court no exception for want of such jurisdiction shall be allowed unless it be taken by plea in abatement. No such plea or any other plea in abatement shall be received after the defendant has demurred, pleaded in bar, or answered to the declaration or bill, nor after a decree nisi or a conditional judgment at rules." (The italics are supplied, except of the word "nisi.")

[2] The company, on the other hand, relies upon sections 3215 and 3214 of the Code (2 Pollard's Code 1904) as being the authority which must, and the sole authority which can, be looked to as conferring jurisdiction of the instant case on the trial court.

Section 3215, so far as material, is as follows:

*"An action may be brought in any county or corporation wherein the cause of action, or any part thereof, arose. * * **

Section 3214, so far as material, is as follows:

*"Any action at law * * * may be brought in any county or corporation.*

"First. Wherein any of the defendants reside.

"Second. If a corporation be a defendant, wherein its principal office is, or where its mayor, rector, president, or other chief officer resides."

As to said section 3260 of the Code, the company contends that—

*"It appears upon the face of the declaration * * * that the entire cause of action arose without the jurisdiction of the court, to wit, within the corporate limits of the city of Lynchburg, whose courts properly have jurisdiction of the subject-matter of this suit and of the parties."*

Now, of course, it is true that under section 3215, the cause of action having arisen in the city of Lynchburg, its courts of general jurisdiction would have had jurisdiction of the instant case if it had been therein instituted and if process had been executed in accordance with the statute (section 3220 of the Code) in such case made and provided. It is also true that, if the action had been brought against the company in the county or corporation wherein its principal office is or its president or other chief officer resides, the court of general jurisdiction of such county or corporation would have had jurisdiction of the action, by virtue of said section 3214. But that is so because those sections of the Code so fix the venue of the action in such a case. Accurately speaking, such sections of the Code do not confer "jurisdiction" upon any courts. They concern only the procedure of the courts touching the place of trial, or the venue of actions at law or of suits in equity. They confer merely a privilege upon the defendant to have the action or suit against him in such a case heard and determined in the local courts therein specified. But it is a privilege which may be waived, and which, if about to be denied, must, in Virginia, be claimed by plea in abatement filed in pursuance of section 3260 of the Code aforesaid; otherwise it will be lost, if the court in which the action or suit is brought has general jurisdiction of such an action or suit and has the subject-matter and the proper parties, plaintiff and defendant, before it. Burk's Pleading & Pr. pp. 273, 280, 284, 916, 917; 40 Cyc. 12-14, 16, 22, 23, 41-43, 103-106, 107, 111, and notes; Notes on Eq. Procedure, Washington & Lee University, § 21; Lille's Notes on Eq. Jur. p. 8; Lille's Notes on Eq. Pl. & Pr. §§ 8, 9, 25; Shaver v. White, 20 Va. (6 Munf.) 110, 112, 8 Am. Dec. 730; The Resolute, 168 U. S. 437, 18 Sup. Ct. 112, 42 L. Ed. 533; Nelson v. C. & O. R. Co., 88 Va. 971, 14 S. E. 838, 15 L. R. A. 583; Wells v. Hughes' Ex'r, 80 Va. 543, 16 S. E. 689; Buster v. Ruffner, 19 Va. (5 Munf.) 27; Hughes v. Hall, 19 Va. (5 Munf.) 431; Reed et al. v. Gold, 102 Va. 37, 40, 45 S. E. 868.

[3] Sections 3214 and 3215 of the Code, therefore, are not the source of authority which should be looked to as conferring jurisdiction on the trial court of the instant case. Under section 3058 of the Code (2 Pollard's Code 1904) the trial court had " * * * original and general jurisdiction of all * * * civil cases at law." And, this being a transitory personal action at law, the trial court had jurisdiction of it, regardless of where the cause of action arose; the company having been so served with process (under sections 3225 and 3227 of the Code) as to bring it before the court as a party defendant. Nelson v. C. & O. R. R. Co., 88 Va. 971, 14 S. E. 838, 15 L. R. A. 583; 40 Cyc. 17-19, 35-38, 103-105, 107.

The "proper matter" for the jurisdiction of the court mentioned in section 3260 aforesaid has reference to subject-matter over which the court has territorial jurisdiction, and the "jurisdiction" referred to is the territorial jurisdiction of the court over such subject-matter, which jurisdiction involves the venue of the suit or action.

That is to say, where the proper parties are before a circuit court, then, by virtue of the statute (section 3058 of the Code) and the common-law rule on the subject, its territorial jurisdiction over persons and property is co-extensive with the bounds of the whole state, except as limited by the venue statutes, sections 3214 and 3215; and but for such venue statutes, if a party defendant be once gotten before such court, in a litigation over a subject-matter of which the court has general jurisdiction, and which subject-matter is actually before the court by proper pleading and otherwise, such party would have no privilege of demanding that the trial should be had in any other court of the state, it matters not where the cause of action may have arisen or where else in the state the defendant may reside. And since the defendant owes to statute law the venue privileges given by sections 3214 and 3215 of limiting the said broad territorial jurisdiction of the court aforesaid, the statute law may attach a condition to the enjoyment of such privileges. And section 3260 aforesaid has attached a condition thereto, namely, that such a privilege must be claimed by plea in abatement.

Therefore, since the declaration in the case before us showed on its face that the trial court had general jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, since there is no question raised but that the pleadings put such subject-matter in issue before such court (Linkous v. Stephens, 116 Va. 898, 908, 83 S. E. 417; Turner v. Barraud, 102 Va. 324, 327, 46 S. E. 318), and since the process summoning the company to answer was duly served so as to give the court jurisdiction of its person as party defendant (so that both the subject-matter of the action and the proper parties thereto were before it), the trial court had jurisdiction of the case. And since the company did not object to the venue by plea in abatement, as the statute in such case requires if it intended to claim its venue privilege, such jurisdiction remained undisturbed by the motion of the company aforesaid.

The case of Hilton v. Consumers' Can Co., 103 Va. 255, 48 S. E. 899, the quotation therein from Nye v. Liscombe, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 263, Burks' Pleading & Pr. pp. 269 and 327, Ratcliff v. Polly, 12 Grat. (53 Va.) 528, and 14 Cyc. 434, 435, are cited and relied on by the company as being contrary to such a conclusion as that above reached. But an examination of those authorities discloses that all of them concern cases where there was no subject-matter before the court which was within its general jurisdiction, or where the party objecting to the jurisdiction was not before the court.

[4] Those of the character of cases just referred to which concern the subject-matter of the litigation do not involve a "want of jurisdiction of the court" in the sense in which the terms here quoted are used in section 3260 aforesaid, which, as we have seen, is a lack of territorial jurisdiction of the subject-matter. The court in those cases had such jurisdiction; but it did not have the subject-matter before it so as to give it actual jurisdiction thereof (or "active" jurisdiction thereof, to use a word adopted by Mr. Lile in his learned and valuable work on Pleading and Practice above cited), which is a wholly different thing from a want of territorial jurisdiction in the premises. The other of such cases disclose also a want of jurisdiction of the court because of another reason, not referred to in such statute, namely, because of the lack of actual (or "active") jurisdiction of the proper party or parties. Both classes of such cases present a situation, as to subject-matter or parties, in which no court in the state would have had actual (or "active") jurisdiction. Hence we find that section 3260 aforesaid has no application where the defendant is not before the court, nor where the subject-matter of the action or suit, although within its territorial jurisdiction, is not in fact before the court. In such cases the defense of lack of jurisdiction is a substantial defense, and is in its nature a bar to the action. It is not merely a dilatory defense. It does not go merely to the venue. Hence in such cases the defense need not be pleaded by a plea in abatement. It may be pleaded in bar, at rules or at term, or the defense may be otherwise made at term by motion to quash the process of summons or by motion to dismiss the action or suit, as may be most appropriate; and, indeed, the court should, ex officio, mero motu, dismiss the action or suit upon the facts disclosing the lack of jurisdiction appearing or being made to appear of record by any method which is in accordance with the prevailing practice. Warren v. Saunders, 68 Va. (27 Grat.) 259; Deatrick's Adm'r v. State Life Ins. Co., 107 Va. 602, 59 S. E. 489; Hilton v. Consumers' Can Co., supra, 103 Va. 255, 48 S. E. 899; Raub v. Otterback, 89 Va. 645, 16 S. E. 933; Noell v. Noell, 93 Va. 433, 25 S. E. 242; Lane v. Bau- serman, 103 Va. 146, 48 S. E. 857, 106 Am. St. Rep. 872; Green v. Massie, 62 Va. (21 Grat.) 356, 362; Jones v. Bradshaw, 57 Va. (16 Grat.) 355, 361.

But, as aforesaid, such a case is not now before us.

[5] 2. Was there error in the action of the trial court in its refusal to allow the plaintiff to amend the declaration so as to eliminate therefrom the portion thereof which alleges that the injuries complained of were inflicted in the city of Lynchburg?

That, under section 3244 of the Code, was an unnecessary averment for the purpose of laying the venue. N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Ampey, 93 Va. 108, 128, 25 S. E. 226. It may therefore be treated as surplusage. Or it may be treated as an allegation of "original venue," or "fact venue," which "raise no question as to the proper place of trial for the action," i. e., raised no question as to the "action venue" (40 Cyc. 11-15); or it may be treated as matter of description (Burks' Pleading & Pr. pp. 917, 918; 40 Cyc. 24). But

In any view of the allegation, however, as we have seen above, the fact that the cause of action arose beyond the bounds of the county in which the action was instituted did not affect the jurisdiction of the trial court in the case in judgment, because the latter had actual jurisdiction both of the subject-matter of and of the proper parties to the action. Hence the amendment of the declaration sought was an immaterial amendment.

The question under consideration must therefore be answered in the negative.

However, for the reasons above given, the order of the trial court dismissing the action must be reversed.

VIRGINIAN RY. CO. et al. v. AVIS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 13, 1919.)

1. RAILROADS ¶73(4) — CONSTRUCTION — USE FOR DEPOT PURPOSES.

Under deed conveying land to railway company "to be used for depot purposes and facilities connected therewith," held, company was to use such part of land as it needed for a depot and residue exclusively for facilities connected therewith, so that company could not lease the residue to a third person for other uses.

2. CONTRACTS ¶152 — LANGUAGE — ORDINARY SIGNIFICATION.

In determining the meaning of what the parties have said in a written contract or conveyance, the language used is to be taken in its ordinary signification, unless it has acquired a peculiar meaning or unless the context plainly shows that it is used in some peculiar sense, and, if when so read the meaning is plain, the instrument must be given effect accordingly.

3. CONTRACTS ¶169 — CONSTRUCTION — AMBIGUITY—SITUATION OF PARTIES.

If the meaning is ambiguous, then unless the parties have, by their subsequent unequivocal conduct, placed a practical construction upon their language, the rule to be first applied is for the court to place itself as nearly as possible in the situation of the parties at the time of the execution of the instrument, and consider the facts and circumstances attending the same.

4. DEEDS ¶90 — CONSTRUCTION AGAINST GRANTOR.

The rule that the language in a deed poll must be construed most strongly against the grantor is not a favorite and is generally said to be one of last resort when all other rules of construction have failed.

5. COVENANTS ¶21—CONSTRUCTION IN FAVOR OF FREE ALIENATION.

The rule that restrictive covenants are not favored simply means that all doubts are to be resolved in favor of the free alienation of realty.

6. COVENANTS ¶21 — CONSTRUCTION — INTENTION OF PARTIES.

Neither the rule that the language in a deed poll must be construed most strongly against the grantor, nor the rule that restrictive covenants are not favored, can operate when there is no room for doubt as to the intention of the parties.

7. INJUNCTION ¶62(1) — ENFORCEMENT OF COVENANTS—USE OF PROPERTY.

Where a grantor has clearly restricted the use of land granted and the restriction itself is not illegal, the covenant creates a trust which, in a proper case, courts of equity will enforce by means of an injunction against an inconsistent use.

8. CONTRACTS ¶143 — DEEDS ¶90 — CONSTRUCTION.

Courts cannot read into contracts and conveyances language which will add to or take from the meaning of the words already contained therein.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Isle of Wight County.

Suit by James E. Avis against the Virginian Railway Company and others. From the decree rendered, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Loyall, Taylor & White and G. A. Wingfield, all of Norfolk, and Hugh L. Holland, of Suffolk, for appellants.

Jno. N. Sebrell, Jr., of Norfolk, for appellee.

KELLY, J. James E. Avis, being the owner of all the land on both sides of the right of way of the Virginian Railway Company at what is now Colosse station, conveyed to that company two small parcels of land on opposite sides of the railroad tracks at that point, containing, respectively, .65 of an acre and .92 of an acre. The deed expressed a consideration of $1, and there was incorporated therein, after the granting clause, this sentence:

"The above-granted land is to be used for depot purposes and facilities connected therewith."

The deed was prepared by the railway company, and, as originally drafted, did not contain the last-mentioned provision. Avis refused to sign it in that form, and the sentence quoted above was either inserted by him or by the company at his direction. This fact does not appear in the record, but is admitted by counsel for the company.

Avis conducts a mercantile business in a storehouse owned by him and located on his own land at Colosse.

On the larger of the two parcels conveyed to it, the company has erected and maintained a passenger and freight depot of the class used by it at other similar stations on its line, ample for the present needs of itself and the public, and intends to provide more commodious freight and passenger facilities there if they should hereafter be necessary.

The company leased to Henry Darden, under a contract which can be canceled at any time, a portion of the smaller parcel, and he has erected thereon a warehouse, a storehouse, a shed, and cotton gin, and is using the same for his personal benefit and profit. In the storehouse he conducts a general merchandise business similar to that in which Avis is engaged.

This suit in equity was brought by Avis against the company and Henry Darden, alleging, in substance, the facts stated above, claiming that "it was made a condition of the said grant that the said property should be used for depot purposes and facilities connected therewith," and "was the true intent and meaning of said conveyance that the property should be used for depot purposes only, and that when it should cease to be used for such purposes, or was not used for such purpose, it should revert to the grantor," and praying that the company and Darden be enjoined from the use of the property otherwise than for depot purposes and facilities connected therewith, that the land be declared to have reverted to Avis, and that the defendants be required to pay him proper damages for their unauthorized use of the premises.

The cause was heard upon the bill, the deed filed therewith as an exhibit, the separate demurrers and answers of the defendants, and an agreed statement of facts (from which the facts above recited appear); and thereupon the circuit court rendered a decree which in its material parts, was as follows:

"And the court, overruling the demurrer and being of opinion that it was the intention and agreement of the grantors and grantee in the deed * * * that the land therein conveyed should be used only for (depot) purposes and facilities connected therewith, and that particularly it was not the intention and agreement of the parties, as contained in the deed, that the said property should be used by the said railroad for the purpose of erecting thereon storehouses, warehouses, cotton gins, etc., to be rented out to private individuals, to be operated in competition with the grantor in said deed, the court doth adjudge, order, and decree that the Virginian Railway Company and Henry Darden, their agents, officers, and employes, and all other persons, be forever restrained and enjoined from using, for purposes other than depot purposes and facilities connected therewith," the two parcels of land conveyed by Avis to the company.

Error is assigned to the action of the court: (1) In overruling the demurrers; and (2) in decreeing upon the merits in the manner above set out.

[1] Both assignments present practically the same question. Although the bill charges that the language of the deed referring to the use of the land constituted a condition subsequent, for breach of which the land would revert to the grantor, the circuit court did not so decide, and no such contention is made before us. All the parties now agree that the provision is a covenant and not a condition, and the controversy here is as to the construction and effect of the covenant. The appellee contends that it is restrictive in its nature, and limits the use of the land exclusively to depot purposes and facilities connected therewith. The position of the appellant, on the other hand, is that the stipulation merely requires that as much of the land as may be necessary therefor shall be used for depot purposes and facilities connected therewith, and that unless and until all of the land shall be required for that purpose the company has the right to use the residue for any legitimate purpose, so that such purpose be not inconsistent with the future use of the property for depot and railroad purposes when and as necessary.

[2, 3] The purpose of all written contracts and conveyances is to say what the parties mean, and the only legitimate or permissible object of interpreting them is to determine the meaning of what the parties have said therein. In doing this, the language used is to be taken in its ordinary signification, unless it has acquired a peculiar meaning with reference to the subject-matter, or unless the context plainly shows that such language is used in some other peculiar sense. If, when so read, the meaning is plain, the instrument must be given effect accordingly. These propositions are familiar and elementary, and they embody the fundamental rule of construction to which all others are subordinate and subservient. If the contract is so drawn and expressed as to render the meaning of the whole, or any part of the instrument, ambiguous, then unless the parties themselves have, by their subsequent unequivocal conduct, placed a practical construction upon their language, the auxiliary or subordinate rule to be first applied, and the one of most usefulness and importance, is for the court to place itself as nearly as possible in the situation of the parties at the time of the execution of the instrument, and to consider the facts and circumstances attending the same, including, in particular, the relations of the parties, the nature and situation of the subject-matter, the negotiations leading up to, and the apparent purpose of, the transaction. 17 A. & E. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 21, 22; 13 Cyc. 607; Bank v. McVeigh, 32 Grat. (73 Va.) 530, 538; Starke v. Berry, 118 Va. 706, 711, 88 S. E. 68; Walker v. Gateway Milling Co., 121 Va. 217, 226, 92 S. E. 826; Atlanta, etc., Ry. Co. v. McKinney, 124 Ga. 929, 53 S. E. 701, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 436, 110 Am. St. Rep. 215.

A conveyance of land to a railway company, "to be used for depot purposes and facilities connected therewith," if taken upon its face and given its primary and most apt and natural meaning, immediately conveys the thought that the company will be expected to use at least a part of the land for a depot, and the residue for facilities connected therewith; and to say that it means that the company will only use such part as it needs for a depot and incidental facilities, and may lease the residue to outsiders for business purposes wholly apart from its passenger and freight operations, is to say something which the parties did not say, and to ascribe a meaning to their words which comes as a second thought, and finds its support, not in the words used, but in a refinement of construction based upon secondary and inapplicable rules of interpretation. The secondary rules will be presently mentioned; but we say they are inapplicable, because, if it be conceded that the covenant is not clear on its face, we must next look to the circumstances surrounding its execution, and they certainly remove all doubt as to its meaning.

Avis owned all the adjacent land at that point. He wanted a depot there, and the company likewise desired to establish one. The conveyance was for more land than was needed then, and more, perhaps, than would ever be needed merely for a depot site. When the deed was presented to Avis for his signature, it contained a correct description of the land, but stated a nominal consideration of $1,000, omitting any reference to the use for which the property was to be employed. He refused to execute the deed in this form and required the covenant to be inserted. This was the consideration upon which he parted with the property. It did not stipulate merely for the establishment of a depot, but fixed a use coextensive with the property conveyed, and one which would enhance rather than depreciate the value of the rest of his land. It seems to us that both parties must have understood that the company would use such part of the land as it needed for a depot, and would use the residue for facilities connected therewith. They knew that the whole of the land would not be occupied by the depot building, and they definitely specified the use which should be made of the residue.

[4-7] Much reliance is placed by counsel for the railway company upon the general rule that the language in a deed poll must be construed most strongly against the grantor, and upon the further general rule that restrictive covenants, like all other impediments to the free alienation of real estate, are not favored. The first rule here mentioned is itself not a favorite, and is generally said to be the one of last resort when all other rules of construction have failed. It certainly is never to be resorted to unless the language involved can be said to be ambiguous. The second rule, which declares that restrictive covenants are not favored, simply means that all doubts are to be resolved in favor of the free alienation of real estate. Neither rule can operate when there is no room for doubt as to the intention of the parties. It is well settled that where the grantor has clearly restricted the use of the land granted, and the restriction itself is not illegal, the covenant creates a trust which, in a proper case, courts of equity will enforce by means of an injunction against an inconsistent use. Graves' Notes on Real Property, § 240, and citations; Wells v. Chapman (N. Y.) 4 Sand. Ch. 312; Whitney v. Union Ry. Co., 77 Mass. (11 Gray) 359, 71 Am. Dec. 715; Haskell v. Wright, 23 N. J. Eq. 389; Winulpesaukee, etc., v. Gordon, 63 N. H. 505, 3 Atl. 426.

[8] It is argued that the construction adopted by the lower court and approved by us cannot be reached without making the covenant read, "only for depot purposes and facilities," thereby supplying a word which the parties did not use. The argument is plausible but not sound. We might, with equal plausibility, say that the covenant cannot be construed in accordance with the contention of the railway company without adding thereto the words, "but if not needed for depot purposes and facilities, the land hereby conveyed may be used for any other lawful purpose." It is, of course, true that courts cannot read into contracts and conveyances language which will add to or take from the meaning of the words already contained therein; but, if this rule could be applied as appellants attempt to apply it here, the result would be that courts could never undertake to construe an instrument without being confined to the exact language employed therein. There are more ways than one of expressing an idea clearly, and the language of the decree of the circuit court, declaring that "it was the intention and agreement of the grantors and grantee in the deed that the land therein conveyed should be used only for depot purposes and facilities connected therewith," was simply another and more emphatic way of stating the already clear import of the provision in question.

The case of Bolling v. Petersburg, 8 Leigh (35 Va.) 224, is strongly relied upon as sustaining the contention of the appellants. An examination of that case will show a substantial and vital distinction between it and the instant case. As unmistakably shown by the several opinions delivered in the case, the sole intention of the grantors in the deed there involved was to require the maintenance of a courthouse on the land conveyed, and not to further restrict its use. In the brief of counsel for the appellee, it is said:

"The distinction is plain. In the Bolling Case, the intention of the parties was to require the use which should be made, while in this case the intention of the parties was to specify the use which might be made."

This, we think, is the true distinction between the two cases. If the deed from Avis had said that the land was conveyed on condition that a depot should be erected and maintained thereon, then it would be simple and easy enough to say that there was no restriction upon the use of any part of the land not needed for the depot; but the language of the covenant which actually was embodied in the deed seems to us to plainly limit the use of the additional land to facilities connected with the depot.

We find no error in the decree, and it is affirmed.

Affirmed.

ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. v. TYLER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 13, 1919.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR §1002—REVIEW—VERDICT ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—ERRORS OF LAW.

Verdict of jury on conflicting evidence is conclusive on Supreme Court, and will not be disturbed unless some harmful error of law was committed by the trial court.

2. EVIDENCE §73—PRESUMPTION—COMPLIANCE WITH STATUTE.

In action against railroad for injuries at crossing, there is a presumption, from the fact that the railroad erected gates, that they were erected in obedience to a city ordinance.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR §231(5)—RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—OBJECTION TO ORDINANCE.

In action for injuries at railroad crossing, where defendant objected to introduction of city ordinance requiring vertical arm gates at crossing, without specifying any ground therefor, it cannot complain on appeal that ordinance was inadmissible because relating only to gates to be erected when deemed necessary and required by committee on streets.

4. RAILROADS §307(4)—INJURIES AT CROSSING—DUTY TO ERECT GATES—NEGLIGENCE.

It was absolute duty of railroad to erect vertical arm gates at city crossing as required by city's ordinance, not merely its duty to use ordinary care to obey the ordinance, and any failure to erect such gates, if the sole proximate cause of injury to plaintiff, was negligence sustaining recovery.

5. RAILROADS §317—INJURY AT CROSSING—INSTRUCTION.

In action against railroad for injuries to plaintiff at city crossing, trial court properly instructed that if train which struck plaintiff's buggy was operated at more than four miles an hour, speed fixed by ordinance, railroad was negligent, and if jury believed such negligence was proximate cause of accident, and plaintiff was not negligent, they must find for plaintiff.

6. RAILROADS §351(22)—INJURIES AT CROSSING—INSTRUCTION ON LAST CLEAR CHANCE—EVIDENCE.

In action against railroad for injuries to plaintiff whose buggy was struck at city crossing, where it was held on the track by a lowered gate, evidence held sufficient to justify giving of an instruction on last clear chance.

7. RAILROADS §346(5)—INJURIES AT CROSSING—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In action against railroad for injuries at crossing, burden to prove plaintiff's contributory negligence is on the railroad, unless it appears from plaintiff's evidence.

8. TRIAL §229—INSTRUCTIONS—REPETITION—EMPHASIZING PROPOSITIONS.

It would be improper to repeat and emphasize propositions of fact and law which already had been clearly stated.

9. TRIAL §252(9)—ABSTRACT INSTRUCTION.

In action for injuries at railroad crossing, when plaintiff in her buggy was caught on tracks by lowered gates, and struck by freight train, instruction based partly on supposition that gates on one side were being let down at time buggy was driven on tracks on other side held properly refused as without support in evidence.

10. TRIAL §260(1)—INSTRUCTIONS—REPETITION.

An instruction, based on a theory, supported by evidence, on which the jury had already been sufficiently instructed, was properly refused.

Error to Hustings Court of Richmond.

Action by Mattie Tyler against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Bernard Mann, of Petersburg, E. P. Cox, of Richmond, and Wm. B. McIlwaine, of Petersburg, for plaintiff in error.

Nunnally & Miller, of Richmond, for defendant in error.

PRENTIS, J. The Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company complains of a verdict and judgment in favor of Mattie Tyler, in an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by her.

The substantial facts, as shown by the plaintiff's evidence, are that she was being driven in a buggy from Manchester to her home in the country shortly after midnight; that, when she reached the three tracks of the company crossing Hull street, the gates were up; and that, just as the horse crossed the third of the railroad tracks going towards Swansboro, the gate was lowered in front of the horse which prevented him from going further; and that while thus stopped on the track a freight train, coming from the south, which consisted of 18 cars and an engine, being pushed backwards, collided with the buggy and caused her injuries. The evidence submitted in her behalf also tended to show that, although the crossing was fairly lighted, she could not at night see far down the track in the direction from which the train was coming, and that no warning signals of any kind were given.

The company's evidence tends to prove that the gates on the Swansboro side of the track were already lowered and that at the time the buggy was driven between the gates on the Manchester side of the track they were being lowered; that the gateman endeavored to prevent the driver of the buggy from going upon the tracks; and that the train was stopped as quickly as it possibly could have been stopped, after the plaintiff's position of peril was discovered.

[1] These conflicting theories were submitted to the jury. Upon well-settled principles their verdict is conclusive on this court, and will not be disturbed unless some harmful error of law was committed by the trial court. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Church, 120 Va. 733, 92 S. E. 905, and cases there cited.

The errors of law alleged are:

[2, 3] 1. That the court gave instruction No. 1 for the plaintiff, reading thus:

"The court instructs the jury that under the ordinance of the city of Richmond it was the duty of the defendant to provide and erect vertical arm gates at this crossing of its track over Hull street, and it was the further duty of the said defendant to erect and maintain the said gates, and to provide for the closing of them at the approach of engines or trains so as to prevent accident and the failure to perform the duty set forth above is negligence; and if you believe from the evidence that the defendant failed to perform the said duty and the said failure was the proximate cause of the accident to the plaintiff, without negligence on her part, then you must find for the plaintiff."

Two points are made against this instruction. One is that the ordinance which was introduced relates to gates which are to be erected when deemed necessary and required by the committee on streets, and that there is no evidence in the record to show that the committee on streets ever required these gates to be erected and maintained. A sufficient answer to this objection is that this point was not made at the time the ordinance was introduced. The defendant at the trial simply made a general objection to the introduction of the ordinance, without specifying any ground therefor. There is a presumption, growing out of the fact that the gates were erected, that they were erected in obedience to this ordinance, and, if the question had been raised in the trial court which is raised here, the court would doubtless have excluded the evidence until the facts with reference thereto had been ascertained. Such a point cannot be raised for the first time in this court.

[4] The other objection to the instruction is that, instead of telling the jury that it was the company's absolute duty to obey the ordinance, they should have been instructed that the company was bound to exercise ordinary care to obey it. The suggestion is without merit. It is the absolute duty of all to obey valid statutes and ordinances enacted for the protection of human life, and the failure to do so, if this be the sole proximate cause of an accident, is negligence which will sustain a recovery. The instruction followed the ordinance and is correct. Atlantic & Danville R. Co. v. Reiger, 95 Va. 427, 28 S. E. 595; A. C. L. Co. v. Church, supra.

[5] 2. The second instruction complained of was one given for the plaintiff, and related to the speed of the train, and told the jury that, if the train was operated at a rate of speed greater than four miles an hour, the rate fixed by an ordinance of the city, then that this was negligence, and that, if they believed that this negligence was the proximate cause of the accident and that the plaintiff was free from negligence, then they must find for the plaintiff. No authority is relied upon to support this objection, and we find no error in the instruction.

[6] 3. The third instruction relates to the last clear chance doctrine, and the jury were told that if by the exercise of ordinary care the servants of the defendant in charge of the train, or the gatekeeper in charge of the gates, could, after the peril of the plaintiff had been discovered, by the use of ordinary care have prevented the accident, then it was their duty to do so. There is sufficient evidence in the record to sustain this instruction.

[7] 4. The other instruction complained of relates to the defense of contributory negligence, and shows that the burden of proving the plaintiff's contributory negligence is upon the defendant, unless it appears from the plaintiff's evidence. This instruction, in substantially this form, has been many times approved by this court.

[8] 5. The defendant complains of the refusal of the court to give instruction No. 7, offered in its behalf. It is sufficient to say as to this that the court had already given at the instance of the defendant six instructions which fully and sufficiently instructed the jury as to the defendant's theory, and it was unnecessary and improper to repeat and emphasize propositions of fact and law which had already been clearly and sufficiently stated to the jury.

[9, 10] 6. Instruction No. 8, which was offered by the defendant and refused, seems to be based in part upon the supposition that the gates on the Swansboro side were being let down at the time the buggy was driven upon the tracks on the Manchester side. There is no evidence submitted by the defendant tending to prove this. The company undertook to prove by several witnesses that the gates on the Swansboro side were already down, and that the gates on the Manchester side were being let down at the time referred to and upon this evidence rested its defense. The instruction was properly refused because there was no evidence to support the fact thereby suggested. Another part of the same instruction is based upon the theory that the evidence does support, namely, that the gates on the west or Swansboro side were already down at that time; but, as the jury had already been sufficiently instructed on this point in instruction No. 5 which the court did give, such repetition was unnecessary. In that instruction, No. 5, they were clearly and distinctly told that, if the gates on the west or Swansboro side were down and the gates on the east or Manchester side were being lowered (and the evidence of the defendant tended to prove that state of facts), then the plaintiff could not recover.

Upon the whole case, it seems to us that the jury were sufficiently instructed, and that no harmful error is shown.

CITY OF RICHMOND v. MERCHANTS' NAT. BANK OF RICHMOND.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 13, 1919.)

1. TAXATION — 499 — BANK STOCK — CORRECTION OF ASSESSMENT — MOTION — PARTIES.

Error in bringing action to correct assessment of capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits of bank, in name of corporation instead of stockholders, was cured by consent order nunc pro tunc, whereby the amount of taxes ascertained to be due from stockholders was assessed against them; the court having power, by virtue of consent order, to admit stockholders as parties.

2. TAXATION — 12 — BANK STOCK — DISCRIMINATION — UNITED STATES STATUTE.

General purpose of U. S. Rev. St. § 5219 (U. S. Comp. St. § 9784), prohibiting taxation of national bank stock "at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of the state," was to prevent discrimination by the states in favor of state banking associations against national banking associations.

3. TAXATION — 12 — DISCRIMINATION — NATIONAL BANK STOCK.

Ordinance founded upon Acts 1915, c. 85, imposing tax of $1.40 on $100 on national bank capital, instead of 30 cents, the rate imposed on other moneyed capital in the hands of individuals, is not a discrimination against the bank capital in favor of the other moneyed capital, in violation of Rev. St. U. S. § 5219 (U. S. Comp. St. § 9784), prohibiting taxation of national bank stock at a greater rate than other "moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens."

Error to Hustings Court of Richmond.

Petition by the Merchants' National Bank of Richmond against the city of Richmond, to correct an assessment. Order granting plaintiff relief prayed for, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

H. R. Pollard, of Richmond, for plaintiff in error.

Coke & Pickrell and Legh R. Page, all of Richmond, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, P. This case originated in the hustings court with a petition by the Merchants' National Bank of Richmond against the city of Richmond, to correct an alleged erroneous assessment for the year 1915, directly against the bank upon its capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits, less the assessed value of its real estate and other deductions allowed by law, instead of being levied and assessed against the shareholders of the stock of the bank upon the value of their shares ascertained as the law prescribes. Moreover, complaint was made that the assessment, instead of being limited to the alleged maximum rate of 30 cents on each $100 of the ascertained value of the shares of stock, was fixed, levied, and collected at $1.40 on each $100 of such value. To an order of the hustings court granting the relief prayed for, this writ of error was allowed.

Two assignments of error were pressed: (1) That the court erred in overruling the motion of the city to dismiss the proceeding for want of jurisdiction. (2) In establishing 30 cents on the $100 of value as the maximum rate that could be levied by the city on the shares of bank stock in place of $1.40.

The first assignment rests upon the contention that the assessment, in essence, is against the stockholders, and therefore the proceeding should have been in their name, and could not be maintained by the bank. Main St. Bank, Inc., v. City of Richmond, 122 Va. 574, 95 S. E. 386.

[1] Whatever merit there may have been in this assignment in the first instance, the error in procedure was cured by the consent order, nunc pro tunc, whereby the amount of taxes ascertained to be due from the shareholders was assessed against them. The court, by virtue of the consent order, was within its powers thus to admit the shareholders (the real persons in interest) as parties, and to make a correct assessment against them. Commonwealth v. Schmelz, 114 Va. 364, 76 S. E. 905.

2. The remaining controverted question for our determination is, What was the maximum rate which the city of Richmond could lawfully levy on the shares of bank stock for the year 1915?

By way of premise to the consideration of this feature of the case, we may observe that the city of Richmond, under its charter, possesses plenary power of taxation, subject only to such limitations as may be placed upon the exercise of that power by the Constitution and Legislature.

The ordinance approved April 9, 1915, is founded upon the city charter and the segregation act passed by the General Assembly at its extra session of 1915, and approved March 15, 1915 (an emergency was declared to exist with respect to it, so that the act was in force from its passage). Acts 1915, c. 85, p. 119. The gravamen of the bank's complaint is that its capital is taxed at the rate of $1.40 on the $100, instead of 30 cents, the rate imposed on other moneyed capital in the hands of individuals. Its contentions are based on an alleged conflict between the ordinance and section 1040a of the Code; section 168 of the state Constitution; the fact that at the date of the assessment the rate of taxation on all intangible property taxed that was also taxed by the state was at the rate of 30 cents on the $100; and that a higher rate than 30 cents contravened section 5219, Rev. Stat. U. S. (U. S. Comp. St. § 9784). All of these objections except the last were practically disposed of by the construction placed upon the segregation act by the decision of this court in the case of City of Richmond v. Drewry-Hughes Co., 122 Va. 178, 94 S. E. 989.

The history of the litigation of which that case is the sequel was this: By authority of the ordinance (one of the features of which is here drawn in question) the city assessed the capital employed by Drewry-Hughes Company (and other merchants residing and doing business in the city) in their business as merchants at $1.40 on the $100. From an order of the hustings court declaring the correct rate of taxation in that case to be 30 cents on the $100, the city appealed, and at the November term, 1916, of this court that judgment was affirmed. The case again came before us on rehearing, and was ably argued by the original counsel, and also by others, whose localities were affected by the decision, on briefs; and in an exhaustive opinion, written by Judge Kelly and concurred in by all the other judges, the judgment of the hustings court was reversed. The last opinion covers the contentions stressed in this case, save the insistence that the exception in the segregation act as therein construed would, if applied to national banks, be violative of section 5219, supra.

Since, therefore, we have no purpose to recede from the conclusions reached in the merchants' tax case, further elaborate discussion of the questions settled by that decision is unnecessary. This statement is predicated upon the view that the exceptions in the act of 1915, in respect to the capital of merchants and the shares of stock of banks in the particular here involved, are so concatenated as necessarily to demand the same construction.

The act after segregating the several kinds and classes of property, so as to specify upon what subjects state taxes and upon what subjects local taxes may be levied, respectively, and limiting the maximum local rate of taxation on segregated intangible personal property at 30 cents on the $100 of assessed value thereof, contains the following exception:

"Except that the capital of merchants shall not be subject to the state taxation, but may be taxed locally as prescribed by law; and the shares of stock of banks, banking associations, and other institutions enumerated in section seventeen in Schedule D of the act aforesaid, which shares of stock shall be taxed as provided by law."

Judge Kelly, in his opinion, justly observes:

"If the purpose of the draftsman had been to restrict local taxation of the capital of merchants to the rate previously named in that particular act, undoubtedly he would have used the words 'as prescribed by this act,' or their equivalent, instead of 'as prescribed by law.' If this be not true, then it would follow that 'shares of stock of banks' could only be taxed locally at the 30-cent rate, for, as we think, it cannot be plausibly contended that the words, 'as prescribed by law,' when applied in the act to merchants' capital, have any other or different meaning than the words 'as provided by law,' when applied therein to bank stock. The necessary result of the decision of this court in Tresnon v. Board of Supervisors [120 Va. 203] 90 S. E. 615, is that the local taxation of bank stock is not controlled by the terms of the segregation act."

Judge Kelly also points out that section 168 of the Constitution does not conflict with the right of the taxing power to tax different classes of intangible personal property at different rates, citing Judson on Taxation, § 441; 37 Cyc. 746; Bradley v. City of Richmond, 110 Va. 521, 524, 66 S. E. 872.

[2] Advertising briefly to the contention that the construction we are disposed to place upon the segregation act and the city ordinance is in conflict with section 5219 of Revised Statutes of the United States, in that the tax of $1.40 on the $100 on the shares of bank stock is a higher rate than is assessed upon other "moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of the state," obviously the general purpose of the federal statute is to prevent discrimination by the states in favor of state banking associations against national banking associations; and no such discrimination is suggested or shown from this record to exist.

In 9 U. S. Comp. Stat. (1916) title "National Banks," at page 11993, note 29, it is said:

"Moneyed Capital."—The purpose of this section is to prevent unjust discrimination against United States banks, so that the phrase 'moneyed capital' used therein means capital engaged in the operations of banking, which is used as a source of profit, so that Act N. Y., July 1, 1882, § 312, declaring that the stockholders in banks organized under the authority of the state or United States shall be assessed for the value of their stock, was not void under this section because the assessment roll showed that the securities of life insurance companies, the stock of state corporations, the deposits of savings banks, the stock of trust companies, and companies created outside of the state and owned in the state, virtually escaped taxation, since such property, excepting that of savings banks and trust companies, was not 'moneyed capital in the hands of individuals,' as contemplated by this section." Mercantile Nat. Bank v. New York (1887) 121 U. S. 138, 7 Sup. Ct. 826, 30 L. Ed. 895; National Bank, etc., v. Boston (1888) 125 U. S. 60, 8 Sup. Ct. 772, 31 L. Ed. 689; Palmer v. McMahon (1890) 133 U. S. 660, 10 Sup. Ct. 824, 33 L. Ed. 772; Talbot v. Board of Commissioners, etc. (1891) 139 U. S. 438, 11 Sup. Ct. 594, 35 L. Ed. 210; First Nat. Bank v. County of Chehalis (1897) 166 U. S. 440, 17 Sup. Ct. 629, 41 L. Ed. 1069; New York ex rel. Amoskeag Sav. Bank v. Purdy (1913) 231 U. S. 373, 34 Sup. Ct. 114, 58 L. Ed. 274.

[3] These decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States (and authorities might be multiplied on the subject) show that the fundamental grievance of defendant in error, that the rate of tax imposed under the segregation act and the ordinance of the city upon the shareholders of bank stock constitutes "a gross and illegal discrimination against that species of property as compared with all other moneyed capital," is groundless.

In conclusion, it is only fair to the learned judge of the hustings court to state that on August 3, 1917, when he delivered his judgment in this case fixing the maximum amount of tax against shareholders of bank stock at 30 cents on the $100, the first decision of this court in City of Richmond v. Drewry-Hughes Co. was still in force, and he naturally regarded it as strongly persuasive, if not controlling, authority in the instant case.

For the reasons given, the order complained of must be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings to be had therein in conformity with the views expressed in this opinion.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v. BOWLES.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 13, 1919.)

1. COMMERCE ⇐28—NATURE OF—TRANSMISSION OF MESSAGES.

Transmission of intelligence by wire is commerce.

2. COMMERCE ⇐8(7)—INTERSTATE COMMERCE—REGULATION—TELEGRAPH COMPANIES.

Congress by Act Feb. 4, 1887, to regulate commerce, as amended by Act June 18, 1910, has occupied the whole field of regulation with respect to interstate telegrams, and has thus ousted the state of its jurisdiction over the subject.

3. COMMERCE ⇐28—INTERSTATE COMMERCE—TRANSMISSION OF MESSAGES.

The transmission of a message between two points in a state which in the course of its transmission passed out of the state is interstate commerce, though the message in the first instance passed through point of destination, and could have been sent there direct, where the route by which it was sent afforded the quickest service and was the one in regular use.

4. COMMERCE ⇐8(7)—INTERSTATE COMMERCE—REGULATION OF TELEGRAPH COMPANIES.

Where message passes out of state during transmission and becomes an interstate message, the state, in view of Act of June 18, 1910, loses its jurisdiction, and has no right to say that the message should have been sent by a different route.

5. COMMERCE ⇐59—INTERSTATE COMMERCE—TELEGRAPH COMPANIES.

In view of Act Cong. Feb. 4, 1887, to regulate commerce, as amended by Act June 18, 1910, depriving the state of its jurisdiction over regulation of interstate messages, Act approved March 21, 1916 (Acts 1916, c. 439), defining interstate messages, is invalid, being an attempt to legislate upon the subject over which the state has no jurisdiction.

6. COURTS ⇐97(5)—DECISIONS—INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Upon the question of what constitutes interstate commerce, the state laws must give way to federal law as laid down by federal judicial decisions.

7. COMMERCE ⇐8(1)—INTERSTATE COMMERCE—LAWS APPLICABLE.

On the question of interstate commerce, state laws must give way to federal laws, whether such laws take the form of judicial decisions or legislative enactments.

8. COURTS — 366(1)—DECISIONS—CONSTRUCTION OF STATE LAWS.

Upon all questions arising under state Constitutions and laws, where nothing is involved of national authority or national right, the federal courts are bound to accept the construction placed by the courts of the state upon its Constitution and statutes whenever the former courts are called upon to decide similar questions.

Error to Circuit Court, Henry County.

Action by I. S. Bowles against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Whittle & Whittle, of Martinsville, and Hughes, Little & Seawell, of Norfolk, for plaintiff in error.

Wm. M. Peyton and I. M. Clingenpeel, both of Martinsville, for defendant in error.

KELLY, J. I. S. Bowles delivered to the agent of the Western Union Telegraph Company at Bassett a prepaid message to be transmitted to Dr. M. E. Hundley, at Martinsville. The points of origin and destination are both within this state.

Following the method then, and for some years theretofore, in regular use by the company, this message was forwarded from Bassett to Richmond over a direct wire which passes through two telegraph offices in North Carolina before it reaches Richmond, the relay point for messages coming into the territory in which Martinsville is situated. This wire passes through the Martinsville office, but is not designed for direct use there. From Richmond the message, like all others of its class, was sent over another direct wire which runs through two other North Carolina offices before reaching Martinsville. The agent at Bassett testified that the message could have been sent direct to Martinsville, but that the route by which he did send it was the one which afforded the quickest service to patrons, and was the one in regular use under the practice and requirements of the company. This testimony is not in any way disputed or contradicted.

No complaint was made of any delay in transmission or delivery, but the message as given to Dr. Hundley was signed "O. S. Bowles," the first initial of the sender's name having been changed from "I" to "O"; and the present action was brought by Bowles, based upon this error, to recover the statutory penalty of $100, prescribed in section 1294h, cl. 5, of the Code of 1904. There was a verdict and judgment below in his favor.

The decisive question in the case is whether the message, as handled by the company, constituted interstate commerce, and thus lay beyond the realm of state control and regulation. As a matter of established law, we think it did.

[1-3] In Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Bolling, 120 Va. 413, 91 S. E. 154, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 1036, the following propositions are shown to be conclusively settled by authority, and are accordingly adopted as law in this jurisdiction: (1) Transmission of intelligence by wire is commerce. (2) The transmission of a telegraph message between two points in the state which in the course of its transmission passes out of the state is interstate commerce. (3) Congress, by the act to regulate commerce (Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, 24 Stat. 379), as amended June 18, 1910 (36 Stat. 539, c. 309), has occupied the whole field of regulation with respect to interstate telegrams, and has thus ousted the state of its jurisdiction over the subject.

The fact that the message here involved went in the first instance through Martinsville, and might, if the company's rules had so required, have been received there without passing out of the state, does not, as contended by the defendant in error, differentiate the case in principle from the Bolling Case. It is true that in the latter case there appeared to be no means of transmitting the message except through a relay point outside of the state; but in the companion case of Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Mahone, 120 Va. 422, 91 S. E. 157, decided the same day, the message involved might have been sent from the point of origin to the point of destination without leaving the state; and this court there said:

"There is no substantial difference between the law applicable to this [Mahone] Case and that applicable to the case of Western Union Telegraph Company v. Bolling, * * * this day decided."

It was contended in the Mahone Case, as here, that, inasmuch as the message could have been sent over an intrastate route, the company could not impress upon it an interstate character by a different routing. But this court held, upon authority, that the interstate character of the message must be tested by the actual facts as to its transmission, and not by the motives of the company; and, further, as a necessary corollary from the decision in the Bolling Case, that the adoption by the company of an interstate route of transmission relegated the transaction to the domain of federal control.

[4] Whether the power of regulation rests with the state or with the United States, the really important question is one of public service. If only the patrons of the company at Bassett and Martinsville were concerned, there would seem to be little doubt, certainly to a mind unfamiliar with the art of telegraphy and untrained in its practical use, that the best and quickest way to serve these two points would be by the use of a direct instead of a circuitous line. But the company serves a vast territory and a multitude of patrons, and in doing so maintains a large organization and a complex system, which it is by law required to so direct and control as to best and most efficiently serve the general public. If it is failing in its duty in this respect as to messages of the kind here involved, the question is one with which (whether unfortunately or not) the state cannot deal, for the reasons already set out. We can no more say that the message from Bassett to Martinsville should have been sent direct than we could have said that the message in the Mahone Case should have been so sent.

[5] It follows from what has been said that the act of the General Assembly, approved March 21, 1916 (Acts 1916, p. 757), entitled "An act to define intrastate messages and what is held not to be such a message," strongly relied upon by the defendant in error, is of no force, being an attempt to legislate upon a subject over which the state has no jurisdiction or power of control. The act is as follows:

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Virginia, that any message accepted by any telegraph company doing business in this state to be sent to another point in this state, shall be deemed to be an intrastate message. Any telegraph company that would give such message as aforesaid the character, or fix upon such message an interstate character by virtue of the fact that in the course of transit of said message it is relayed or carried out of the state in sending it, shall introduce evidence * * * that the route used in sending said message was the only practicable or feasible and the most expeditious manner of sending said message, and shall introduce as a part of said evidence, charts and maps showing lines of wires and relay stations to prove such route as the most desirable and proper route to have been used, upon request of any complainant."

[6-8] This statute undertakes to define interstate commerce, as to telegraphic communications, and to confer upon the courts of the state the right and power to inquire into and pass upon the reasonableness and expediency of the rules and methods by which such commerce is carried on. That messages between two points within, but transmitted over lines passing without the state, constitute interstate commerce, and, as such, are subject to federal control, is a proposition based upon federal decisions and federal statutes, as fully appears from the Bolling and Mahone Cases and the authorities therein cited. This being true, state laws upon the subject must give way, whether such laws take the form of judicial decisions or legislative enactments. Upon all questions arising under state Constitutions and laws, where nothing is involved of national authority or national right, the federal courts are bound to accept the construction placed by the courts of a state upon its Constitution and statutes whenever the former courts are called upon to decide similar questions. Cooley's Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) p. 31, and citations; 5 R. C. L. p. 705, § 17, and citations in note 10. But the decision of all questions arising under the laws of the United States, including, in particular, the definition and meaning of the commerce clause of the Constitution, rests finally and conclusively with the federal courts. Cooley's Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) p. 25, and notes; 5 R. C. L. p. 705, § 17, and citations in note 9; United States v. Hill, 248 U. S. 420, 39 Sup. Ct. 143, 63 L. Ed. —.

For the foregoing reasons, and upon the authorities cited in support thereof, the judgment must be reversed.

Reversed.

ADAMS v. TRI-CITY AMUSEMENT CO.,
Inc.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 13, 1919.)

1. CONTRACTS ⇨302—BUILDING—DEFECT IN WALLS—LIABILITY.

A building contractor cannot be held responsible for defect in not having walls of a building heavy enough to stand in wet ground, where he followed the plans and specifications furnished by the architect as the agent of the owner.

2. CONTRACTS ⇨232(2) — BUILDING CONTRACTS — UNFORESEEN ACCIDENT — AGREEMENT FOR RECONSTRUCTION.

Where the wall of a building in construction fell, not by contractor's fault, but because of defective plans, its re-erection by the architect's directions, contractor and owner each to bear half of the expenses, cannot, upon owner's complaint, be said to be inequitable, particularly where the owner's president, general manager, and corporate directors were informed of and agreed to such re-erection.

3. CORPORATIONS ⇨432(12)—CONTRACT—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to show that a letter from the defendant corporation's general manager to contractor authorizing the re-construction of a wall at cost plus 10 per cent., of which the treasurer had notice, had come to the general knowledge of the corporation, and that the corporation agreed to it by acquiescence.

4. ARBITRATION AND AWARD ⇨85(3)—PARTIALITY OR MISCONDUCT OF ARBITRATORS—EVIDENCE.

In a suit involving an award made under provisions of a building contract fixing the value of work, evidence held insufficient to show that the arbitrators were dishonest, prejudiced, or unfair.

5. CONTRACTS ⇨232(2)—IMPLIED CONTRACT—RATIFICATION.

Where, owing to a defect in plans, and not from contractor's fault, walls collapsed, requiring additional work to be done, and the corporate owner accepted and utilized the work done, even without an express contract, the contractor is fairly entitled to recover the value of the work performed.

6. MECHANICS' LIENS ⇨254(2)—FORECLOSURE—COUNTERCLAIM—DEFECTS.

In the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien by contractor, who failed to waterproof basement walls because of the caving in of the earth, and where there were leaks and other defects in the roof, although the building was accepted by the corporate owner, allowance should be made for such defects.

7. COURTS ⇨475(10)—JURISDICTION—ENFORCEMENT OF MECHANIC'S LIEN.

If a suit in a city corporation court against the corporate owner of a building in which receiver was appointed was instituted before a contractor's mechanic's lien foreclosure suit was instituted in the circuit court, the contractor should be required to intervene in the corporation court; but, if the mechanic's lien suit was first instituted, the receiver should appear and defend.

Don P. Halsey, of Lynchburg, and A. B. Dickinson, of Richmond, for appellant.

J. O. Heflin, of Colonial Beach, and A. L. Jones, for appellee.

PRENTIS, J. C. E. Adams (hereinafter called the contractor) erected a theater building in the city of Hopewell for the Tri-City Amusement Company, Incorporated (hereinafter called the company). After the completion of the structure, the defendant filed his mechanic's lien, claiming that there was a balance due him of $5,893, and thereafter instituted this suit to enforce such lien.

The history of the transaction appears to be: That the original contract in writing was entered into on February 2, 1916, and provided for the erection of a building at the price of $7,335; thereafter the company authorized the contractor to build a basement as an addition to the building for $4,407, and certain extra work was directed. The decree of the court which is complained of reduced the claim of the contractor to the sum of $1,977.60, and of this reduction the contractor is here complaining.

[1] The controversy grows out of the fact that the basement walls of the building twice fell and had to be re-erected. The balance claimed by the contractor is for the extra work imposed upon him in the re-erection of these walls. When the walls fell the first time, they were reconstructed in accordance with the original plans and specifications of the architect, except that by the architect's instructions they were braced with iron columns. It is claimed for the company that the contractor rebuilt these walls without complaint, and at his own expense, and that his claim now for compensation for one-half of the cost of such re-erection is an afterthought. Upon this, as upon most of the controverted questions, there is a hopeless conflict in the testimony. It appears, however, from the evidence of the architect, who must, under the plain terms of the written contract, be held to be the agent of the company, to direct the work in its details, that he, although at first of the opinion that the falling of the walls was due to the fault of the contractor, upon learning the facts (the principal fact in this connection being that the company had failed to furnish the timbers which were necessary for the superstructure and for bracing the work), changed his opinion, and in accordance with the agreement of the parties directed the re-erection of the walls at the joint expense of the company and the contractor. It is perfectly manifest that the design of this wall was inadequate. Whether sufficient or not, under ordinary conditions, it appears that by reason of the low, wet character of the ground and the consequent drainage through it, such a wall as the architect designed was not sufficient to stand the strain of the water and the earth which was washed against it. For such a defect a building contractor cannot be held responsible, for it is his duty to follow the plans and specifications furnished as his guide by the architect as the agent of the owner.

[2] The theory of the company, that, because of the contract for the erection of a complete building, the loss arising from such an accident should fall upon the contractor, is unsound, in cases like this where the loss was caused, not by any fault of the contractor, but because of the defective plans of the architect. So that the walls having been re-erected by the direction of the architect, the settlement and agreement made under these circumstances of imposing half the cost upon the contractor and half upon the company cannot be said to be inequitable, and this adjustment of an unanticipated difficulty, in which the interest of the company required some prompt adjustment, is supported by the testimony of the architect and the contractor to the effect that the president, general manager, and directors of the company were informed of and agreed to this division of the expense of such re-erection.

[3] The walls, however, fell a second time, after the frame superstructure had been erected, and the larger part of the amount here in controversy grows out of the claim of the contractor for the additional cost of erecting these walls the third time. For the contractor it is shown that he had strictly followed the plans and instructions of the architect; that after the accident there was a meeting of the directors; and that at that meeting he told them that he could build a wall which would stand in that place, but that it would be necessary to make it 3 feet wide at the bottom, instead of 18 inches, as the architect had planned, and that it should be gradually narrowed to the width of 18 inches at the top; that he estimated the cost of the additional labor and material which would be required to make this change at from $1,200 to $1,600, and that he would undertake to do the work, which involved the removal of a large quantity of earth and the cleaning off of bricks of the old wall, as well as the additional material and labor, at its actual cost plus 10 per cent. thereon; and that this was agreed to. In a short while he asked for some written memorandum of this agreement, and said that he was otherwise unwilling to do the work. Thereupon Mr. Xippas, who was named as general manager in the charter of the company and had never been removed from office, gave him this letter:

"Hopewell, Va., August 21, 1916.

"Mr. C. E. Adams, Hopewell, Va.—Dear Sir: You are hereby authorized to proceed with the following work as extra work at the Marcelle Building in Hopewell, Va.

"Re-erect the walls that caved in and take down walls that are not safe, at actual cost and 10 per cent. commission.

"Order frames for the theater as per sketch furnished you same not cost more than $75.00 (5 frames in all).

"Order electric fixtures for theater as selected by me, same not to cost over $300.00 (10 brackets, 5 auditorium ceiling lights & 5 lobby lights, 4 exit lights).

"Wire building for six intercommunicating phones.

"Wire sidewalk for two street lights.

"The above electric fixtures are to be bought for us at cost price and same is being done for us by you as an accommodation.

"Yours truly, Tri-City Amusement Co., Inc.,
"S. A. Xippas, Genl. Mgr."

He thereupon proceeded with the work, relying upon the assurance of that letter that he would receive the actual cost of such re-erection with 10 per cent. commission thereon added. This letter was promptly shown to Saunders, the treasurer of the company, and according to Xippas it was in substance authorized and directed by all of the other directors. There is no conflict about the fact that it was shown to Saunders, but all of the other directors testified that they knew nothing whatever about the letter and denied that there was any agreement for the erection of the walls at cost plus 10 per cent. Their version of the transaction is that the contractor agreed to re-erect these walls for a sum not exceeding $1,600; but there is striking confirmation of the contractor's understanding in the fact that each one of the witnesses says that the estimate of $1,600 was stated to be for the additional material and work made necessary by the change in design and the widening of the walls.

In considering such testimony, the equities of the situation naturally influence the impartial mind. In this case the contractor would have been justified in refusing to re-erect the walls which had fallen because of defects in design (for which the company and its agent, the architect, were responsible) and not for defects in construction (for which he would have been responsible). There was no reason for expecting the contractor to incur the expense of such re-erection. Then, in considering the weight of the testimony, we find that Xippas was the original promoter of the company; that the plans and contract for the building were originally made in his name, he having originally secured the architect to make such plans, and the written contract was altered just before it was executed by the insertion of the name of the company; that Xippas was the general manager; that he ordered many extras during the construction of the work, some of which appear in the letter above quoted; that he countersigned the checks which were drawn by the treasurer in favor of the contractor as the work progressed; and that he did all these things with the knowledge of the president and directors from which their acquiescence must be inferred; and that they have accepted the benefit of his labors and attention to the business of the company, during the construction.

Upon the whole case, we are clear that the weight of the testimony sustains the contractor's claim, and that, notwithstanding the denials of the other directors (whose veracity may be conceded), the corporation must be charged with notice of the letter referred to, written by Xippas, the general manager, and communicated to Saunders, its treasurer, and this whether the other directors knew of it or not; for it appears that Xippas was in the habit of giving orders, that the affairs of the company were conducted in a loose and unbusinesslike way, and that no record of either stockholders' or directors' meetings, or of any formal action taken by the company at any time, appears to have been kept by anybody.

[4] Then, again, there is another phase of the controversy, which, though merely persuasive, tends to sustain the contractor's claim. In the original agreement it was provided that—

"Should any dispute arise respecting the true value of any such works added or omitted by the contractor, the same shall be arbitrated by appealing to three men who have been mutually selected, and whose decision shall be final and binding on all parties."

Pursuant to this agreement, three building experts were chosen as arbitrators. They met for the purpose of arbitrating the controversy on the 18th of January, 1917. At the request of the company, through its president, Mr. Temple, who said that an important witness was absent, they adjourned to a date apparently agreeable to all, January 23d: the order of adjournment being signed by all three of the arbitrators. When they met pursuant to such adjournment, the arbitrator chosen by the company, by its direction, withdrew; whereupon, the other two arbitrators proceeded with their investigation and awarded the contractor the full amount of his claim. This award was based entirely upon the evidence of the contractor himself. No sufficient justification or excuse for this refusal by the company to observe their agreement to submit to arbitration is shown by the record. The president, Mr. Temple, says:

"I got information which I did not like, showing which way things were going, and as I afterwards found out was correct from the witnesses herein. All those that attempted to arbitrate were on Mr. Adams' side, just as I had been told they were; therefore, I declined to arbitrate."

And later he says, in explaining why he refused to submit the evidence to the arbitrators, "After I found out how things were, we quit, and I did not propose to arbitrate," and that he did not feel bound by the arbitration and "did not pay any attention to it at all." In response to a question as to whether he meant to say that any of the arbitrators would have acted unfairly, he replied:

"No, sir; I mean to say that they were lined up for the arbitration just as they are lined up here in these depositions, as witnesses for the plaintiff."

Now, the two arbitrators who made the award were examined as witnesses in the case, and a close scrutiny of their testimony fails to indicate the slightest bias or prejudice against the company or against its claim. They were experts especially well fitted to determine such a controversy, and there is not the slightest suggestion in the record above quoted that they are not honest men of high character, who wished to do the work which they were requested to do with the determination to do justice. So that, so far as this record discloses, the withdrawal by the company from the arbitration was without justification or excuse.

[5] There is still another view which may be taken of the case. It sufficiently appearing that the cause of the trouble was the defect in the plans at that particular place, because of the character of the soil and drainage, and that there was no defect in the construction for which the contractor was responsible, and the additional work having been done for the benefit and advantage of the company, and having been accepted and utilized, even without an express contract the contractor is fairly entitled to recover the value of the work so performed. The losses of the stockholders of the company have been serious, but the contractor cannot be held responsible therefor.

[6] From every aspect of the case, then, we are convinced that the trial court erred in failing to sustain the claim of the contractor, substantially for the amount claimed.

It appears, however, that under one of the contracts the basement walls were to be waterproofed, and that because of the sudden caving in of the earth against the wall this was not done. There is also testimony tending to show that there are leaks in the roof and some other defects, though the building has been accepted and is in use by the company. For these defects there should be an allowance in favor of the company, and in our opinion this allowance should be $500.

The decree will therefore be amended, and the amount adjudged to be due the contractor increased from $1,977.60 to the sum of $5,393, with interest thereon from the 13th day of January, 1917, and costs.

[7] It appears that the trial court, after determining the amount due, decreed that, instead of enforcing the lien by further proceedings in the cause, the complainant should intervene by petition in a suit then pending in the corporation court of the city of Hopewell, in which a receiver had been appointed who at that time held the property of the company. If the suit in the corporation court of the city of Hopewell was instituted before this suit, then there is no error in requiring the contractor to intervene by petition in that suit; but, if this suit was first instituted, the circuit court of the city of Hopewell should proceed with this case and give the contractor complete relief by the enforcement of his lien against the property of the company; or for greater convenience one of the causes should be removed to the other court and both thereafter heard together.

The cause will be remanded for such further proceedings as may be necessary to effectuate the views herein expressed.

Amended and remanded.

(124 Va. 548)

COMPTON et al. v. RIXEY'S EX'RS et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 13, 1919.)

1. WILLS §794—RELINQUISHMENT OF PROVISIONS—TIME.

Where a widow entered into enjoyment of property under a will and after seven years relinquished its provisions, it was too late for her to claim the provision made for her by statute.

2. WILLS §440 — CONSTRUCTION — INTENTION.

The testator's intention is that spoken by the words of the will, and not the intention deduced from speculation as to what he would have done had he anticipated a change in the circumstances surrounding him at its execution.

3. WILLS §802(2) — REMAINDERS — ACCELERATION.

Where testator designates remaindermen to take upon the death or remarriage of his wife as "my children then living and the descendants per stirpes of such as may be then dead without issue surviving," no one can tell, until the happening of the event which is to terminate wife's life estate, which of the children answer the description of being "then living," and the wife living and not remarrying cannot by renunciation of rights under a will accelerate the taking by the remaindermen.

4. WILLS §802(2) — CONSTRUCTION — INTENTION — ACCELERATION OF VESTED REMAINDER.

Where the remainder is vested, it does not follow that the time of enjoyment will be accelerated by the renunciation of the life holder, since the testator's intention, as shown by the will read as a whole, may not permit it under the existing circumstances.

5. WILLS §834(8) — REMAINDERS — SUBSTITUTIONARY REMAINDER—ACCELERATION.

A remainder to a person after a life estate to another, or if such person be dead then to his heirs, is not contingent but substitutionary, and the mention of his heirs is intended to prevent a lapse in event of the death of the remainderman in the lifetime of the life tenant, and, if the particular estate ceases in such tenant's lifetime, the remainder may be accelerated as a vested remainder.

6. WILLS §853—CONTINGENT REMAINDERS —ACCELERATION OF ENJOYMENT.

Although there can be no acceleration of a contingent remainder, yet, where the contingency is the death of a life tenant, whatever terminates the life estate or prevents it from taking effect is equivalent to the death of a life tenant.

7. WILLS §853 — CONSTRUCTION — ACCELERATION OF REMAINDER.

When it appears that the life tenant and remainderman are sufficiently designated and testator intended that they together should take the whole estate, acceleration will be accorded the remainderman when the life estate is eliminated in any manner, for such must have been testator's intention.

8. WILLS §554 — CONSTRUCTION — ACCELERATION OF REMAINDER.

A gift to testator's "descendants per stirpes of such as may be then dead without issue surviving" is not substitutionary, but creates contingent remainders in the persons mentioned, and they take as purchasers, and only those living at "the death or remarriage" of the wife, life tenant, answer the description of donees under the provisions of the clause.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fairfax County.

Suit by Mary B. Compton and others against John S. Barbour and another, as executors of the estate of John F. Rixey, deceased, and others. From a decree dismissing the bill, the complainants appeal. Decree affirmed.

Jos. F. Moore, of Berryville, for appellants.

R. E. Thornton and John S. Barbour, both of Fairfax, and H. Thornton Davies, of Manassas, for appellees.

BURKS, J. This case involves the construction of the will of Jno. F. Rixey. The fourth and fifth clauses of the will are as follows:

"Fourth. Upon the majority of my youngest child, my wife being alive and unmarried, I direct one-third of the net annual income from my entire estate, comprising that mentioned in the third as well as in the second clause hereof, to be paid over to my wife, as long as she lives, and remains my widow, and the remaining two-thirds to be divided equally between my surviving children and the descendants per stirpes of such as may be dead leaving descendants.

"Fifth. Upon the death of my wife, or her marriage, my youngest child living being of age, I direct my entire estate to go to and be divided equally between my children then living and the descendants per stirpes of such as may be then dead with issue surviving."

After accepting the provision of the will and enjoying the benefit thereof for a period of seven years, the widow executed, acknowledged, and caused to be recorded the following paper:

"Know all men by these presents, that I, Ellen B. Rixey, widow of the late John F. Rixey, deceased, for reason satisfactory to myself and which are known to my children, do hereby forever renounce and disclaim all my life estate in the estate of the said John F. Rixey, deceased, and all right, title and interest of whatsoever nature therein given to me by the provisions of the will of my late husband, the said John F. Rixey, which is of probate in the clerk's office of the circuit court of Culpeper, Virginia. And I do renounce and disclaim all right, title and interest of whatsoever nature to which I am now entitled in said estate, whether under the said will or by way of dower or widow's portion. I do hereby bind myself and declare that I will not accept, either at present or in the future, from the executors, their successors or assigns, any portion of the income of said estate or any interest therein which may be sought to be paid to me in accordance with any right, title or interest which I had at any time before the execution of this instrument, it being my intention in executing this instrument to terminate my life estate in the estate of the said John F. Rixey as effectively as would my death.

"In witness whereof I hereunto set my hand and seal this ninth day of June, 1916.

"Ellen B. Rixey. [Seal.]"

At the time of the death of the said John F. Rixey, he had four living children, all of whom were still living and had attained the age of 21 years at the date of the renunciation by his widow. After the renunciation, these children called upon the executors of the estate of said Rixey for a settlement of their executorial accounts, and a delivery to them of the testator's estate, which delivery the executors declined to make, and thereupon they instituted this suit to compel such delivery. The circuit court dismissed their bill, upon demurrer, on the ground that the complainants had contingent and not vested remainders, and that nothing they had done, or could do, could operate to accelerate the time fixed by the testator for the distribution of his estate. We are of opinion that the decree of the circuit court is right.

[1] The widow relinquished the provision made for her by her husband's will, and it was too late for her to claim the provision made for her by the statute. Her children claimed that her renunciation was equivalent to her death, and that by such renunciation the remainders to them became vested and their enjoyment thereof accelerated.

[2, 3] "Acceleration" is the hastening of the enjoyment of an estate which was otherwise postponed to a later period, and the doctrine is only applied in furtherance, or in execution, of the presumed intention of the testator. It is never applied to defeat the testator's intention. The intention of the testator which is to be considered in the interpretation of his will is the intention spoken by the words of the will, where he has so spoken as to disclose his intention, and not the intention to be deduced from speculation as to what he would have done had he anticipated a change in the circumstances surrounding him at time of the execution of his will. The latter would amount to making a will for him, and not to be the interpretation of a will he has made. When he says, "I wish A. to take my estate at a designated time," we have no right to say that he meant that B. should take it at a different time. If we could call upon him to say what he meant, he might, and probably would, say, "I meant what I said." In the case in judgment, the testator designates the remaindermen who are to take upon the death or remarriage of his wife as "my children then living and the descendants per stirpes of such as may be then dead with issue surviving." The wife is still living and has not remarried, and no one can tell until the happening of the event which is to terminate the particular estate, which of his children will answer the description of being "then living." As said in Blatchford v. Newberry, 99 Ill. 11, 46:

"Surviving at the time of distribution is a part of the description given by the will of the donees, and there is no gift to any one who does not answer the description in this element of time—who is not at that time living."

The children of the testator took, under the will, contingent, not vested, remainders. Howbert v. Cauthorn, 100 Va. 649, 42 S. E. 683; Smoot v. Bibb, 97 S. E. 355; Purdy v. Hayt, 92 N. Y. 446.

[4] There are many cases holding that where the remainder is vested, and it is apparent that the only object of postponing the remainderman is that the property may be enjoyed by the tenant for life, as where an estate is given to A. for life and after his death to B., so that it is manifest that A. and B. are to take the whole estate, on the termination of the estate of the life tenant in any way, or his incapacity or refusal to take, the estate of the remainderman will be accelerated. Here the testator's intention is inferred from the language of the will. In re Rawling's Estate, 81 Iowa, 701, 47 N. W. 992; Clark v. Tannison, 33 Md. 85; Hinkley v. House of Refuge, 40 Md. 461, 17 Am. Rep. 617; Augustus v. Seabolt, 3 Metc. (Ky.) 155; Jull v. Jacobs, L. R. 3 Chay. D. 711. But even where the remainder is vested, it does not necessarily follow that the time of enjoyment will be accelerated. We are still to seek to ascertain the intention of the testator from his will read as a whole, and acceleration may not comport with that intent. There may be vested remaindermen for different parts of the estate, or vested remaindermen and residuary legatees, and perhaps other situations, where acceleration would not accord with the testator's intention, and will not be accorded. In Jones v. Knappen, 63 Vt. 391, 22 Atl. 630, 14 L. R. A. 293, the widow renounced the provisions of her husband's will and took what the law gave her, and thereby destroyed the whole scheme of distribution of her husband's estate, and, although certain legacies were vested, their payment was not permitted to be accelerated because it would be detrimental to the interests of the residuary legatees and for that reason did not accord with the presumed intention of the testator. See, also, Wood v. Wood, 1 Metc. (Ky.) 512; Dean v. Hart, 62 Ala. 308. In Gallagher's Appeal, 87 Pa. 200, it was held:

"Where a widow elects not to take under a will, her substituted devise and bequests are a trust in her, for the benefit of the disappointed claimants, to the amount of their interest therein. * * * A court of equity will sequester the benefit intended for the wife to secure compensation to those whom her election disappoints."

In McReynolds v. Counts, 9 Gratt. 242, the testator gave a tract of land to his wife for life with remainder in fee to his son, Isaac. He directed his personal estate to be divided into eight equal shares, one of which he gave to each of his seven living children, and the other to a child of a deceased son. The widow renounced the provisions made for her by the will and thereby destroyed the whole scheme of testamentary disposition. One-third of the tract of land was assigned to her as dower. The widow by her renunciation of the will disappointed the legatees in respect to one-third of their respective legacies, and by her waiver she gave up a life estate in two-thirds of the real estate, and it was said that familiar principles of equity authorize and require courts of chancery jurisdiction to sequester the property thus given up, and apply its profits to indemnify the disappointed legatees, and that, after these legatees had been indemnified for their disappointment, the two-thirds of the land should pass into the hands of Isaac Reynolds, the remainderman. To this extent, but to this extent only, the vested remainder of Isaac was accelerated.

[5] A remainder to a person after a life estate to a third person, or if such person be then dead to his heirs, is not contingent, but substitutionary, and the mention of his heirs is intended to prevent a lapse in the event of the death of the remainder in the lifetime of the life tenant, and, if the particular estate ceases to exist in the lifetime of the tenant for life, the remainder of such person may be accelerated under like conditions as a vested remainder. In re Disston's Estate, 257 Pa. 537, 101 Atl. 804, L. R. A. 1918B, 62; Small v. Marburg, 77 Md. 11, 25 Atl. 920; Schulz's Estate, 113 Mich. 592, 71 N. W. 1079; In re Woodburn's Estate, 151 Pa. 587, 25 Atl. 145.

[6] There can be no acceleration of a contingent remainder, for until happening of the contingency it is uncertain who is to take the estate. 16 Cyc. 651. But where the contingency is the death of a life tenant, the courts have been very liberal in declaring that whatever terminates the life estate, or prevents it from taking effect, is equivalent to the death of the life tenant. But this holding is based upon the presumed intention of the testator, and if such presumption is not warranted by the language of the will, construed in the light of the circumstances surrounding the testator, it will not be made. It has arisen most frequently in the construction of wills where a wife is given a life estate, followed by a remainder to take effect at her death, and the wife renounces the provision made for her, and takes what the law accords her, and thereby defeats the testator's scheme for the distribution of his estate. Generally, the remainder has been either vested, defeasible, or an estate to one person followed by a substitutionary gift, and the courts have found a presumed intention on the part of the testators that the renunciation of wife was equivalent to her death, and have applied the doctrine of acceleration.

Quite a number of such cases have come before the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, some of which have been hereinbefore cited in another connection; but they all recognize the rule that the application of the doctrine must be in furtherance of the intention of the testator, and never in contravention thereof. Many of these cases were brought under review by that court in 1917 in the case of In re Disston's Estate, 257 Pa. 537, 101 Atl. 804, L. R. A. 1918B, 62. In that case there was a life estate to the wife, with remainder after her death to the testator's children, or, if any of the children were dead leaving issue, the parent's share was to go to such issue; if no issue, to certain nephews and nieces or their issue. The court regarded the gift over to the issue of the children or to the nephews and nieces as substitutionary. Referring to other cases, it said, among other things, that the fact that alternate remainders may be provided for in the event of the decease of such children in the lifetime of the widow, will not take a case out of the general rule, if, on a view of the whole will or the particular part in question, such alternate remainders appear to be merely secondary or substitutionary in character. It was conceded all through the opinion, however, that if the intention of the testator can be gathered from the will, it must prevail, and, considering the facts of the particular case before it, it was said that the literal provisions of a will may be departed from so as to carry out what appears to be a superior or preferred intent; but, when this is done, the object in view must always be "to approximate as closely as possible to the scheme of the testator, which has failed by reason of intervening rights or circumstances." It was further said that the effort must be to find and carry out the testator's chief intention with the minimum disturbance of the general plan of the will, and that, after the provisions for the wife, the testator's children were the natural and primary objects of his bounty, and not their issue, still less nephews and nieces or their issue, and that the alternate provisions for others, after the testator's children, were undoubtedly intended as substitutionary, in case the latter died during the life of the mother, should she take under the will; but that a testator is presumed to know that a widow's statutory rights are paramount, and that she may take against his will, and that a testator is presumed to know also, the general rule that the election of a widow to take under the intestate laws is equivalent to her death, and that, unless his will plainly indicates a contrary intent, remainders are accelerated accordingly.

It was said, however, in the course of the opinion, "of course, an intent that there shall be no acceleration may be shown by inevitable implication," and among other instances given is "where the contingency upon which the remaindermen are to take is such that, in the nature of things, the person entitled can be ascertained only by the physical death of the widow."

The same view was taken in Schulz's Estate, 113 Mich. 592, 71 N. W. 1079, where there was a substitutionary provision. The holding is based on Woodburn's Estate, 151 Pa. 537, 25 Atl. 145; Coover's Appeal, 74 Pa. 143; and Small v. Marbury, 77 Md. 11, 25 Atl. 920.

There have been similar holdings in Maryland (Small v. Marburg, supra; Randall v. Randall, 85 Md. 430, 37 Atl. 209); but there, as elsewhere, the holdings have been based upon the presumed intention of the testator, and always in subordination to that intention when it could be discovered. In Rogers' Trust Estate, 97 Md. 674, 677, 55 Atl. 679, 680, it is said:

"The doctrine of the acceleration of estates is founded upon the desire of courts of equity to give effect to the manifest intention of the testator; and, when such intention would be frustrated by allowing it, it will be denied. The cases are too numerous to do more than refer to some of the leading cases in this state."

Then follows a citation of seven Maryland cases.

[7] The principle underlying this class of cases seems to be that wherever it appears that the life tenant and the remainderman are sufficiently designated, and it was intended they together should take the whole estate, acceleration will be accorded the remainderman whenever the life estate is eliminated in any manner whatever, for such must have been the intention of the testator.

The case of Blatchford v. Newberry, 99 Ill. 11, involved a large estate and was most elaborately argued and carefully considered. The testator gave his wife an estate for her life, and provided that, immediately after the decease of his wife, the trustees mentioned in the will should divide his estate into two equal shares, and at once proceed to distribute one of such shares among "the lawful surviving descendants of my own brothers and sisters, such descendants taking per stirpes, and not per capita," and the other to a public library. The widow renounced the will and took the provision made for her by the statute. During the lifetime of the widow, the then living descendants of the brothers and sisters, claiming that the renunciation of the widow was equivalent to her death, insisted that there should be acceleration of the enjoyment of their estates. The court said:

"The question for determination is: Can there be now, during the lifetime of Mrs. Newberry, a legal division of the estate by the trustees, one half to the descendants of the testator's brothers and sisters, and the other half to the public library?"

This question the court answered in the negative. In the course of the opinion of the court, it is said:

"Under the form of gift here, there is no gift to any one except such as are surviving and capable of taking at the time of distributing. Surviving at the time of distribution is a part of the description given by the will of the donees, and there is no gift to any one who does not answer the description in this element of time—who is not at that time living. The donees then, here, are the descendants living at the time of distribution, whenever that time may be. * * * Until the time of distribution it is uncertain who will be alive to take then, and until that time arrives it cannot be ascertained and much less certain who the donees are."

Further:

"This doctrine of acceleration, however, is not an arbitrary one, but it is founded on the presumed intention of the testator that the remainderman should take on the failure of the previous estate, notwithstanding the prior donee may be still alive, and is applied in promotion of the presumed intention of the testator, and not in the defeat of his intention. And, when it is the evident intention of the testator that the remainder should not take effect till the expiration of the life of the prior donee, the remainder will not be accelerated."

Three of the eight judges sitting in this case dissented, but the conclusion of the majority of the court seems to be approved in Slocum v. Hagaman, 176 Ill. 533, 539, 52 N. E. 332. In the latter case, there was a substitutionary gift, and the renunciation of the wife was held, under the circumstances, to be equivalent to her death, and acceleration was accorded in favor of those designated to take after the death of the wife.

In Augustus v. Seabolt, 3 Metc. (Ky.) 155, there was a gift of property to a wife for life, with remainder to the children of the testator's brother, "or such of them as may be living at the time of her death." The will also provided that as to certain designated land the estate given the wife should cease upon the remarriage of the wife, and she did remarry. The wife claimed no further interest in this land, but the heirs of the testator and the brother's children aforesaid each claimed that they were entitled to it from the date of the remarriage till the death of the widow. The court said:

"But it is said that the remainder interest in the devise was a vested one, and took effect as completely upon the marriage of the widow as though she had died. This view is clearly erroneous. The remainder is manifestly contingent in one respect, and cannot therefore be properly denominated a vested remainder. * * *

"Here the estate in remainder is limited to take effect upon the happening of a certain event—that is, the death of the widow—but it is limited to such of the children, of the brothers designated, as shall be living at her death. Whether any of such class will be then alive, or, if so, how many, is of course uncertain, and cannot be known until the event occurs."

The court refused to accelerate the enjoyment of the estate by the brother's children, because it regarded their estates as contingent until the death of the widow.

In Bradenburg v. Thorndike, 139 Mass. 102, 28 N. E. 575, there was a gift to the wife for life, and upon her death "one share to each of my following nieces and nephew, then surviving" (naming them), and "one share to the issue of each of said nieces and nephew then deceased leaving issue then surviving, according to their right of representation." The widow renounced the will and the nieces and nephew sought acceleration; but the court said:

"We must construe the bequest in favor of the nieces and nephew in the same manner as if the widow had accepted the provisions of the will. Recurring to this bequest, it is clear that it cannot now be determined who will take under it. It is a bequest to the nieces and nephew 'then surviving,' and to the issue of each niece and nephew 'then deceased leaving issue then surviving.' It cannot be known that any of the nieces and nephew now living will take anything under this bequest."

To the same effect is Lovell v. Charlestown, 68 N. H. 584, 32 Atl. 160.

We have examined many more cases from other states, but those cited are sufficient to show the trend of the decisions in other jurisdictions.

In Poythress v. Harrison, 1 Pat. & H. 197, a testator devised to his wife for life all his property, and at her death to certain devisees upon the condition that said devisees should raise the sum of $1,000 to be paid at the death of said testator's wife, to Thos. P. Harrison, and, in the event of his death before the said life tenant, the said sum was to be paid to his sister. Soon after the said will was probated, the widow renounced the provisions made for her in the said will.

Thereafter the said Thos. P. Harrison instituted suit to recover the said $1,000, claiming the same by reason of the renunciation of the widow, who was still living.

The court denied Harrison the right to recover the said legacy of $1,000 for two reasons:

"First, because the said legacy was not payable to him until after the death of Mrs. Poythress, the testator's widow, although she had renounced the provisions made for her in her husband's will; and, secondly, because the legacy, until after the death of Mrs. Poythress, was contingent, and, if the appellee had died in her lifetime, it would have been payable to his sister."

[8] Under the will of Mr. Rixey, if any one of his children should die in the lifetime of the widow, the descendants of such child would take as purchasers directly under his will; but, if the renunciation of Mrs. Rixey is given the effect claimed for it, the child would take the estate now, and, if he should die in the lifetime of the widow, his descendants would take nothing under the will of Mr. Rixey, although the will gives them the whole of it. The effect would be to make a will for Mr. Rixey. He has made his own will, and no relinquishment by Mrs. Rixey of what was given her can change the direction given by Mr. Rixey of the residue of his estate. In the case at bar, we conclude that the gift in the fifth clause of the testator's will to the "descendants per stirpes of such as may be then dead with issue surviving" is not substitutionary, but that said fifth clause creates contingent remainders in the persons mentioned therein; that they take as purchasers under the will; that only those children who are living at the death or remarriage of the wife answer the description of donees under said clause; that the renunciation of the wife in this case is not the equivalent of her death; that it does not in any way affect or disturb the scheme of the testator in the distribution of his estate, but is simply a relinquishment to the estate of the testator of all interest of the wife therein, without receiving anything in lieu thereof; and that there can be no acceleration of the enjoyment of the remainders created by said clause.

The decree of the circuit court will therefore be affirmed.

Affirmed.

LEACHMAN, County Treasurer, v. BOARD OF SUPRS OF PRINCE WILLIAM COUNTY.(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 13, 1919.)1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨56—JUDGMENTS APPEALABLE—AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY.

Where court, on exception to disallowance of claims to an amount upward of $900, paid by county treasurer, affirmed the disallowance and gave judgment for costs against him, the judgment was appealable, under Code 1904, § 3454, as in effect a final judgment for money to amount of claims disallowed.

2. TRIAL ⇨370(3)—SUBMISSION OF ISSUES TO JURY—BILLS ALLOWED BY TREASURER.

A cause in the circuit court on exceptions to the commissioner's report refusing to allow certain items paid by the county treasurer raises an issue presenting a question of law, which should have been decided by the court, and not submitted to the jury.

3. TRIAL ⇨370(2)—EX PARTE MATTERS—TREASURER'S SETTLEMENTS—RIGHT TO JURY.

Upon a county treasurer's exceptions to the report of the commissioner of accounts refusing to allow items paid, authority is not conferred upon the court by Acts 1914, c. 330, or by analogy under Code 1887, § 2698, as amended by Acts 1904, c. 154 (Code 1904, § 2698), for the calling of a jury.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1062(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—SUBMISSION TO JURY.

While it was error, in an ex parte settlement of a county treasurer, taken to the circuit court upon exceptions to the commissioner's report, to submit the issues to a jury, such error was harmless, where the court itself properly passed upon such exceptions.

5. OFFICERS ⇨111—LIABILITY—PUBLIC POLICY.

For reasons of public policy fiscal officers are held to a very strict liability for public funds intrusted to their care, and are required to assume all risk of loss and account for all funds going into their hands.

6. COUNTIES ⇨165—OFFICERS—BOARD OF SUPERVISORS—ALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS—"LEGAL."

Code 1904, § 851, provides that every warrant to the county treasurer shall be signed by the clerk and countersigned by the acting chairman of the board of supervisors, that no warrant shall be issued except upon recorded vote or resolution of the board, and to be legal a warrant must conform thereto; and the word "legal," as used in reference thereto by sections 859, 860, 863, is equivalent of "lawful."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Legal.]

7. COUNTIES ⇨168(5)—OFFICERS—SUPERVISORS—ALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS—WARRANTS.

The chairman of the board of supervisors is a public officer, and not the agent of the board upon whom the county treasurer could rely as to the validity of warrants he signs, or as to their having been approved by the board.

8. COUNTIES ⇨168(5)—OFFICERS—TREASURER—POWER TO PASS ON CLAIMS.

Although a county treasurer is a mere disbursing officer, without power to question the action of the board of supervisors in ordering warrants drawn on him, yet he is not authorized to pay warrants not passed upon by the board.

9. COUNTIES ⇨168(5)—TREASURER—LIABILITY—ILLEGAL WARRANTS.

A county treasurer was not authorized, by the fact that warrants were signed by the chairman of the county board of supervisors, in indulging the presumption that they were authorized by the board, and where he did so, and the warrants were illegal, he was liable for the loss sustained.

Error to Circuit Court, Prince William County.

Proceeding by J. P. Leachman, as treasurer of Prince William County, to secure allowance of his accounts. On exceptions heard by court and jury, judgment was entered against him for certain claims, and he brings error. Affirmed.

C. M. Nicol, of Alexandria, and Allen L. Oliver, of Cape Girardeau, Mo., for plaintiff in error.

H. Thornton Davies, of Manassas, for defendant in error.

BURKS, J. The commissioner of accounts of Prince William county audited the accounts of the treasurer of said county, pursuant to Acts 1914, p. 640, c. 330, and filed his report October 4, 1915. The report was excepted to by the board of supervisors of the county, and the circuit court of the county recommitted it to the commissioner, with directions to restate it in conformity with oral instructions given the commissioner in open court. The commissioner accordingly restated the account in accordance with his instructions, and filed his report July 26, 1916. To this report the treasurer filed several exceptions. The chief question involved was whether the treasurer should have credit for sundry warrants paid by him for which the board of supervisors denied the liability of the county. Before passing upon the exceptions, the court summoned a jury and had tried at its bar the following issue:

"Whether or not the items represent a legal and valid claim against the county, so as to justify the treasurer in being entitled to credit therefor, which items are as follows:

"County fund, the sum of.....	$617.91
Special road fund.....	140.19
Occoquan district.....	100.19
Brentsville district road fund...	35.49

Total $893.78"

The commissioner refused to allow the treasurer credit for these items. The jury, by their verdict, also refused to allow credit for these items, and thereupon the exceptions of the treasurer to the report of the commissioner were overruled, and a judgment for costs was entered against the treasurer. From this order of the circuit court, which also refused to set aside the verdict of the jury as contrary to the law and the evidence, this appeal was taken.

[1] The appellee moves to dismiss the appeal as improvidently awarded, on the ground that no appeal lies to this court from an order of an inferior court merely overruling exceptions to and confirming a commissioner's report, and he cites in support of his motion Owen v. Owen, 109 Va. 432, 63 S. E. 990. That case arose upon the settlement of an administration account under section 2699 of the Code, providing that—

"The report, to the extent to which it may be so confirmed, shall be taken to be correct, except so far as the same may, in a suit, in proper time, be surcharged or falsified."

There the party appealing had the right to file a bill surcharging and falsifying the account. The case in judgment arises under an entirely different statute, where no right to file such a bill is given the treasurer. The judgment of the circuit court is, in effect, a judgment against the treasurer for upwards of $900, and is a final judgment. Under the provisions of section 3454 of the Code, he has the right of appeal to this court, and the motion to dismiss should therefore be overruled.

[2-4] It is stated in the record that, on the calling of this case for hearing on the exceptions to the commissioner's report, "the defendant demanded a trial by jury," and the court directed a jury to be summoned "to try the issue in this cause." The jury was summoned, and they heard and decided the issue hereinbefore set forth, finding a verdict adverse to the defendant. The issue, as framed, presented a question of law, which should have been decided by the court, and not submitted to a jury. Moreover, there was no authority for summoning a jury on the hearing of the exceptions to the report of the commissioner. No such authority is conferred by the act under consideration, nor is it to be inferred by analogy to the proceedings under section 2698 of the Code (1904). Not only does that section not apply to ex parte settlements by treasurers, but the power to impanel a jury to inquire into matters of fact under section 2698 of the Code of 1887, which had been in force since the Code of 1849, was taken away by Acts 1904, p. 268 (Code 1904, § 2698). It was error, therefore, to have summoned the jury; but the error was harmless, as the court itself properly passed upon the exception to the commissioner's report, and it is the correctness of the court's ruling on the exception which is the matter in controversy here.

[5] The controversy in this case is over the refusal of the board of supervisors to allow the treasurer of Prince William county credit for certain warrants paid by him and upon which the board denied liability. The appellant does not state in his petition the origin of said warrants, nor is the record full and clear on the subject; but the brief for the appellee gives a statement of the facts relating to this matter, which was not controverted by the appellant in the oral argument, but in fact accepted and made the basis of his argument here, and which is no doubt correct. That statement is as follows:

"Blank county warrants, in book form similar to check books, were filed in the clerk's office of Prince William county. Without authority from the board of supervisors, or from any other source, the chairman of the said board signed his name to a number of said blank warrants, as chairman, and not at or during any meeting of said board, but when said board was not in session. The clerk or deputy clerk thereafter, likewise without authority from said board or any source, and not at or during any session of said board, signed the clerk's name to said warrants. In a number of said warrants so signed was inserted, in the blank spaces left, the date, payee's name, such amount as he desired, and the fund on which drawn. This was done without authority from or knowledge of said board. On a number of these warrants the payee's indorsement was genuine, but a number contained the forged indorsement of the payee. These warrants were made payable to persons who had no claims against said board, and in whose favor no warrants had been ordered issued.

"When the report which was reviewed by the circuit court was made, the commissioner allowed him credit for all of the said forged warrants, except those upon which the payee's name was forged. He denied him credit for those, and those only, which bore the forged indorsement of the payee. To this report the treasurer filed exceptions.

"The court held that said treasurer was not entitled to credit for the said warrants upon which the payee's name had been forged, sustaining the report of the commissioner."

For reasons of public policy, fiscal officers are held to a very strict liability for public funds intrusted to their care. They have been held liable for losses resulting from fire, theft, robbery, burglary, failure of banks in which money was deposited, and, in fact, losses sustained by almost every cause, except the act of God or a public enemy. See cases collected in notes 22 R. C. L. § 140, p. 470. In Mecklenburg v. Beales, 111 Va. 691, 69 S. E. 1032, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 285, it was said that the court favored the rule of strict liability, which requires a public official to assume all risk of loss, and imposes upon him the duty to account for the public funds which go into his hands.

[6] The statutes of this state give in detail the method by which boards of supervisors may allow and pay claims within their jurisdiction. No provision is made for paying such claims, except by a warrant on the treasurer, and Code 1904, § 851, provides that—

"Every warrant shall be signed by the clerk and countersigned by the acting chairman of the board, and the name of the person to whom it is issued shall be entered in a book to be kept by him in his office for the purpose; but no warrant shall be issued except upon a recorded vote or resolution of the board."

A warrant, therefore, to be legal, must be made in conformity with this section. This idea of a "legal warrant" runs through the chapter on the subject of county treasurers. Section 859 speaks of "warrants legally drawn upon him by the board," section 860 of a "warrant legally drawn upon him," and section 863 of a "legal warrant." The word "legal," in this connection, is the equivalent of "lawful." It is said in Black's Law Dictionary, under the word "Lawful":

"But there are some connections in which the two words are used as exact equivalents. Thus a 'lawful' right, warrant or process is the same as a 'legal' right, warrant or process."

[7] It is not claimed by counsel for the appellant that the warrants in this case were legal warrants, but only that they were apparently legal, and because of the apparent legality the county should pay them.

It was insisted by counsel for the appellant that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer a loss resulting from the negligence, fraud, or deceit of a third person, or of his agent, he should suffer the loss who reposed confidence in such person, and not the other party, and a number of cases are cited to support the proposition. But that doctrine has no bearing upon the question in controversy. The chairman of the board was in no sense the agent of the board, and the doctrine of agency does not apply. He was not held out by the board as a person upon whose acts or statements the treasurer could rely. He was a public officer, charged with certain duties, for the discharge of which he alone was responsible. The statute imposed upon the chairman, and not upon the board of supervisors, the duty of countersigning the warrants, and nothing that the board did, or omitted to do, could, in any proper sense, be said to have affected his conduct in signing the warrants. He acted as a public officer under the mandate of the law, and all persons were charged with knowledge of his powers and duties. These were prescribed by the statute, and not by any resolution of the board of supervisors. But, even if the relation of principal and agent had existed between the board of supervisors and the chairman, the latter was not acting for the benefit of the former in signing warrants for which no claims had been allowed, and there is very high authority for the statement that in such case the principal is not liable. British Mutual Banking Co. v. Charnwood Forest Ry., L. R. 18 Q. B. 714, 717; Friedlander v. Texas, etc., Ry., 130 U. S. 416, 9 Sup. Ct. 570, 32 L. Ed. 991. It must be conceded, however, that the doctrine of these cases is seriously controverted. New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 30; Allen v. South Boston R. Co., 150 Mass. 200, 22 N. E. 917, 5 L. R. A. 716, 15 Am. St. Rep. 185; Amer. Wire & Nail Co. v. Bayless, 91 Ky. 94, 15 S. W. 10; Appeal of Kisterbock, 127 Pa. 601, 18 Atl. 381, 14 Am. St. Rep. 868.

[8] Quite a number of cases have also been cited to sustain the proposition that the treasurer is a mere disbursing officer, and has no right or power to question the action of the board of supervisors, or to go behind it, but is bound to pay warrants drawn upon him by the board. Undoubtedly the treasurer has no supervisory power over the board, to determine the validity of accounts allowed by the board. He cannot refuse to pay claims for which warrants have been legally issued, simply because he thinks they are not just or lawful, nor for any other reason which has been passed upon by the board where it had power to act. If the matter is within the jurisdiction of the board, and the board has acted upon the claim and issued a legal warrant therefor, it is plainly the duty of the treasurer to pay it. It will be unnecessary to examine these cases, as the legal proposition involved is not in controversy, but only its application. In the case in judgment, the claims had not been passed upon by the board, and no legal warrants therefor had been issued, so that no such question is involved as that determined by the cases referred to.

[9] It is earnestly insisted that a ministerial officer will be protected in the service of process which is fair on its face and emanates from proper authority. A number of cases from the United States Supreme Court are relied on to support the doctrine. The rule in that class of cases is well stated by Mr. Justice Field in Erskine v. Hohnbach, 14 Wall. 613, 616 (20 L. Ed. 745), where he says that it is well settled that—

"If the officer or tribunal possess jurisdiction over the subject-matter upon which judgment is passed, with power to issue an order or process for the enforcement of such judgment, and the order or process issued thereon to the ministerial officer is regular on its face, showing no departure from the law, or defect of jurisdiction over the person or property affected, then, and in such cases, the order or process will give full and entire protection to the ministerial officer in its regular enforcement against any prosecution which the party aggrieved thereby may institute against him, although serious errors may have been committed by the officer or tribunal by reaching the conclusion or judgment upon which the order or process issued."

It was this principle only which was enforced in Bryan v. Ker, 222 U. S. 107, 32 Sup. Ct. 26, 56 L. Ed. 114, so earnestly relied on by the appellant. But the case in judgment is not a case of the service of process, or the execution by a ministerial officer of a process emanating from a tribunal having jurisdiction over the subject-matter, and it is not controlled by the same principles. The cases referred to on this subject belong to the class where the acts of the officer executing the process presuppose the validity of another act by the tribunal from which the process emanated; but, as held in Langford v. Few, 146 Mo. 142, 47 S. W. 927, 69 Am. St. Rep. 608, there is a difference between indulging a presumption in favor of an officer having done a duty which the law cast upon him, and indulging a presumption that a fact exists which the statute requires to exist in order to give the officer power to act. See, also, Reed v. Lowe, 163 Mo. 519, 63 S. W. 687, 85 Am. St. Rep. 578.

In French v. Edwards, 13 Wall. 506, 511 (20 L. Ed. 702), it was held that where the provisions of a statute are intended for the protection of a citizen, "and to prevent a sacrifice of his property, and by a disregard of which his rights might be, and generally would be, injuriously affected, they are not directory but mandatory. They must be followed or the acts done will be invalid." If this be true of statutes affecting private rights, it must, of necessity, be true of statutes affecting the public revenue, around which every safeguard is thrown for its protection. An officer disbursing the public revenue must comply substantially with every provision of the statute enacted for its protection, and if he fails to do so, and loss ensues in consequence thereof, he must bear it. The right of the chairman of the board to sign warrants for claims which had to be audited by the board was dependent upon the allowance of the claims by the board. The previous action of the board was, in a sense, jurisdictional. Without it, the warrant was a nullity, into whosoever hands it passed, and creates no liability upon the county. The treasurer had no right to presume that the claims had been audited by the board of supervisors and a recorded vote taken allowing the claim, and that in pursuance thereof the chairman and clerk had issued the warrants in controversy. The chairman of the board and the clerk had no right or power to issue the warrants until the claims had been passed upon by the board. It is very rare that warrants are ever issued, except after compliance with section 851 of the Code, and there was comparatively little risk in the treasurer paying warrants bearing the signature of the chairman of the board and the clerk; but this risk, whether large or small, was the risk of the treasurer, and not of the board of supervisors, and the loss which ensued therefrom must fall upon the treasurer. The clerk was required to keep a list of all the warrants, and the treasurer was required to attend all regular meetings of the board. He had but to consult the clerk's list to ascertain whether or not warrants had been authorized. It was his failure to do this that occasioned the loss in controversy, and, while it is conceded that the treasurer was guilty of no fraud in the transaction, but acted in the utmost good faith, yet the loss is the result of a failure on his part to exercise proper care for his own protection. He had the means readily at his command to have protected himself against loss, but failed to use them, and he cannot now call upon the county to bear a loss which he could so easily have prevented.

We have not deemed it necessary to consider what was the effect of forging the indorsements of the payee on said warrants, as the illegality of the warrants themselves is an insuperable obstacle to their payment. Other questions were raised in the case, but they were only incidental to the main question hereinbefore considered, and need not be noticed.

For the reasons hereinbefore stated, the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

VIRGINIA IRON, COAL & COKE CO. v. GRAHAM et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 13, 1919.)

1. CONTRACTS \Leftrightarrow 309(1, 2)—IMPOSSIBILITY OF PERFORMANCE—DESTRUCTION OF SUBJECT-MATTER.

If one makes contract which is in itself possible, he will be liable for a breach, notwithstanding it is beyond his power to perform, but where it is apparent that parties contracted on basis of continued existence of substance to which contract related, a condition is implied that if performance becomes impossible because that substance does not exist, this will excuse performance.

2. MINES AND MINERALS \Leftrightarrow 70(3)—ROYALTIES UNDER LEASE—EXHAUSTION OF ORE.

A 40-year mining lease, providing compensation to lessor "for each ton of good merchantable ore mined and shipped * * * not less than 20,000 tons to be shipped each year," held not to contemplate that lessee should be bound when ore was exhausted.

3. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS — 4 — GROUNDS—MISTAKE OF FACT.

Relief may be had in equity for the cancellation or rescission of a contract if mistake of fact affects its very substance and is not a mere incident or inducement for entering into it.

4. CONTRACTS — 93(5)—VALIDITY—MISTAKE OF FACT.

If certain facts are assumed by both parties as basis of a contract, and it subsequently appears that such facts did not exist, the contract is inoperative.

5. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS — 13 — GROUNDS—DEFENSE AT LAW.

Although a lessee of a mine could have set up in action for royalties or rent failure of consideration due to mistake of fact as to amount of ore, it was under no obligation to wait institution of such an action, but could resort to equity for cancellation of lease, where existence of lease and possibility of having to assume liabilities thereby imposed constituted a contingent liability, tendency of which would be to impair its credit, especially where rights of trustees and bondholders were involved.

6. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS — 4 — GROUNDS—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION.

Failure of consideration is a ground of equity jurisdiction.

7. EQUITY — 46—JURISDICTION—ADEQUACY OF REMEDY AT LAW.

In order to justify court of equity in refusing to take jurisdiction, remedy at law must be adequate, and must attain the full end and justice of case, reaching whole mischief and securing whole right of party in a perfect manner at present time and in future.

Appeal from Corporation Court of Roanoke.

Suit by the Virginia Iron, Coal & Coke Company against Nannie M. Graham and others. From a decree for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

W. B. Kegley, of Wytheville, and Jackson & Henson and D. D. Hull, Jr., all of Roanoke, for appellant.

Stuart, B. Campbell and Robert Sayers, both of Wytheville, and Waller R. Staples, of Roanoke, for appellees.

PRENTIS, J. The briefs herein filed are unique in that (either purposely or inadvertently) counsel have observed rule 2 (120 Va. v. 94 S. E. vi). This rule requires the briefs to contain a concise abstract or statement of the facts admitted and controverted, which are disclosed by the record. When fairly observed, the precise questions involved are manifest, and much subsequent labor for the court and counsel will be thereby avoided.

The facts here to be considered are: That by indenture of December 31, 1897, David P. Graham and wife demised unto Carter Coal & Iron Company for 40 years from January 1, 1898, that certain iron ore property in Wythe county, Va., known as "Cedar Run," theretofore granted to Graham by Franklin Carter and wife, said to contain about 3,600 acres, with the right during the term to mine and remove all the iron ore which the lessee might or could mine on these lands, with certain easements and privileges fully set forth in the instrument. By deed of January 27, 1899, Carter Coal & Iron Company conveyed unto Virginia Iron, Coal & Coke Company (appellant, hereinafter called the lessee), together with other property, the rights and privileges granted by the said lease. Theretofore, on October 1, 1898, the Carter Coal & Iron Company executed a deed of trust to the Continental Trust Company of the city of New York, conveying the leased property and privileges to secure a bond issue of $2,000,000. The New York Trust Company has succeeded the Continental Trust Company as trustee in that conveyance. On February 23, 1899, the lessee (Virginia Iron, Coal & Coke Company) conveyed the leased estate, together with much other property, to the Manhattan Trust Company, trustee, to secure a bond issue of $10,000,000. David P. Graham, the original lessor, having died, his successors in title, Nannie M. Graham, his widow, and others (hereinafter called the lessors), on May 13, 1903, modified the lease so as to reduce the minimum quantity of ore required to be shipped from 20,000 tons to 12,000 tons per annum. A partial partition of the real estate of the original lessor has been made, whereby the rights of his widow and heirs to participate in royalties under the lease are fully set forth and established by conveyance of August 20, 1904.

The original lease fixed a royalty of 50 cents per long ton (N. & W. Ry. Co. or its successor's weight) for each ton of good merchantable ore mined and shipped from the leased premises, to be paid to the lessor on or about the 25th days of April, July, October and January of each year for the ore shipped the preceding three months, with the following provisions as to minimum:

"Not less than twenty thousand tons to be shipped each year. If less is shipped, royalty is to be paid on twenty thousand tons, and if more than twenty thousand tons are shipped in one year, and less than that quantity in the next preceding or succeeding year, the surplus of the one year, and the royalty paid thereon, may be carried to the credit of the other year, either preceding or succeeding, to make the required minimum. If the minimum quantity is not shipped in any year or paid for in sixty days after the expiration of the year, or if the ore shipped is not paid for in sixty days after the rent therefor is due, the said David P. Graham, his heirs, representatives, or assigns, may terminate this lease on ten days' notice of intention so to do."

And the following clause:

"The said David P. Graham, his representatives, heirs or assigns, or their agent, may enter the property at any time for the purpose of inspecting the mining operations, and of requiring the same to be carried on in a proper way, and with due regard to the rights of each party."

The lessee is given the right to remove, at the end of the term, all tramways, machinery and appliances, all pipes, sluices and troughs, and everything used in connection with the mining and washing operations, except the houses and the timber used as supports in the mines, and except pipe lines, tramways and washing plant which were there prior to October 1, 1897. Provided, however, that nothing put on the property by the lessee for use in mining and washing operations shall be removed until the rents are paid; and the privileges and easements granted are to be enjoyed in the operation of the mines leased. The mine had been in operation prior to the date of the lease, and was operated at that time.

The Carter Coal & Iron Company took possession and continued to operate the mine until it conveyed its rights to the Virginia Iron, Coal & Coke Company, and thereafter the last-named company continued to operate it until July 25, 1916, upon which date it gave written notice to Nannie M. Graham and others, the lessors, of the cancellation or surrender of the original lease of December 31, 1897, to become effective as of September 1, 1916. The reason therefor stated in the notice was that iron ores could no longer be found on the leased premises, either of the quality or in the quantity that could be profitably mined; the cost of such tonnage as could be gotten out being altogether prohibitive. The lessors replied to this notice August 29, 1916, advising that they intended to hold the lessee strictly to the terms of the contract, and conceded no authority to cancel it.

The lessee, in accordance with such notice, ceased operations upon the leased premises, has abandoned possession thereof for all the purposes of the lease, though it has not removed its property therefrom, has paid all royalties accrued up to the date designated for the cancellation and surrender to become effective, and has not since that time occupied the property or exercised any of the privileges granted by the lease. After the attempted cancellation and surrender, the lessee undertook to remove from the leased premises the machinery, rails, and equipment placed thereon by its predecessor, which under the terms of the lease it had the right to remove upon its termination, but, under threat of proceedings by the lessors to secure an injunction, has for the present abandoned its claim of right to remove such property. It seems that this allegation of threatened injunction proceedings is made in an amendment to the bill, and that this threat was made after the institution of this suit. The cancellation and surrender of the lease has been ratified by the board of directors of the lessee, and the deed of release tendered to the lessors with the bill and amended bill.

The lessee, on January 30, 1917, filed its original bill, and thereafter filed an amended bill against Nannie M. Graham and others, successors in title to the original lessor, and the trustees in the deeds of trust referred to, setting forth these facts, and praying for a decree cancelling the lease, permitting it to remove its personal property from the premises, enjoining the lessors from prosecuting any actions for the recovery of royalties under the lease, and for general relief. The lessors, defendants, filed their demurrer and answer, and the trial court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the bill. Of this action the lessee is here complaining.

Fairly stated, the demurrer is based upon two grounds:

(1) That the bill and exhibits filed show that the contract between the parties is a contract of hazard, that the risk as to the quantity and quality of ore was assumed by the lessee, and that this appears from the lease itself; that it also appears therefrom that it is a definite contract, under seal, for the rental of the property for 40 years, including the right to the lessee to mine ore and do certain other things on the land; that the consideration of the lease is a sum certain as rent reserved; and that there is no warranty on the part of the lessors that the ore will be found of any particular quantity or quality, and hence that the existence or nonexistence of such ore in any quantity or of any quality is immaterial.

(2) That even if the lessee is entitled to be relieved from paying the royalty on account of exhaustion of the ore in the premises, a court of equity has no jurisdiction to grant such relief, upon the ground that the complainant has a complete and adequate remedy at law.

The trial court sustained the demurrer upon the ground last stated.

(a) Taking up these grounds in the order in which we have just stated them, we come to consider whether the bill is demurrable upon the ground that the contract was one of hazard as to the lessee.

The question is quite an interesting one, and we have been greatly enlightened by the exhaustive briefs of the learned counsel on both sides. While no precisely similar question has ever been decided in Virginia, we have been referred to many cases in other jurisdictions, and the principles involved seem to be fairly well established.

As to contracts in general, this is said in 13 Corpus Juris, p. 376:

"Where certain fact, assumed by both parties are the basis of a contract, and it subsequently appears that such facts did not exist, there is no agreement."

And many cases are cited in support of that general statement.

Applying this to mining leases, this is said in 27 Cyc. p. 718:

"Mining leases frequently contain a provision for the release of the lessee from payment of rents or royalties in case the mineral becomes exhausted or is found not to exist in paying quantities, and in such case the happening of such contingencies releases the lessee. Even in the absence of such a provision, it is usually held that a lessee on a royalty basis is released from payments if the mineral becomes exhausted, or is found not to exist in paying quantities, although the lease provides that he shall take out and pay royalties on a certain amount each year, or that the royalties shall not be less than a fixed amount per year, for by such an undertaking the lessee contracts merely for promptitude and thoroughness in taking out existing mineral. But where the lessee retains possession he is not relieved of liability for the fixed rental, or royalty based on minimum production. Where the lease provides for the payment of rent irrespective of product and whether the mine is worked or not, which is termed a dead or sleeping rent, the lessee cannot be relieved from payment of the rent because the mineral proves not to be worth the expense of working, because mineral is not found in paying quantities, or even because the mine supposed to exist develops no mineral at all, and such rent is payable even after the mine is exhausted"—citing many authorities.

A most interesting and instructive note upon the subject of the intervening impossibility of performance of a contract as a defense is found in L. R. A. 1916F, at page 10. Ancient and modern cases involving both mining leases and other contracts are there gathered and analyzed.

In a comparatively recent English case, Krell v. Henry, [1903] 2 K. B. 740, 72 L. J. K. B. N. S. 794, 89 L. T. N. S. 328, 19 Times L. R. 711, 52 Week. Rep. 246, this language, which seems to be particularly pertinent to the case in judgment, is used:

"But, on the other side, it is said that the condition or state of things need not be expressly specified, but that it is sufficient if that condition or state of things clearly appears by extrinsic evidence to have been assumed by the parties to be the foundation or basis of the contract, and the event which causes the impossibility is of such a character that it cannot reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties when the contract was made. In such a case, the contracting parties will not be held bound by the general words, which, though large enough to include, were not used with reference to a possibility of a particular event rendering performance of the contract impossible. I do not think that the principle of the civil law, as introduced into the English law, is limited to cases in which the event causing the impossibility of performance is the destruction or nonexistence of some thing which is the subject-matter of the contract, or of some condition or state of things expressly specified as a condition of it. I think that you first have to ascertain, not necessarily from the terms of the contract, but, if required, from necessary inferences, drawn from surrounding circumstances recognized by both contracting parties, what is the substance of the contract, and then to ask the question whether that substantial contract needs for its foundation the assumption of the existence of a particular state of things. If it does, this will limit the operation of the general words, and in such case, if the contract becomes impossible of performance by reason of the nonexistence of the state of things assumed by both contracting parties as the foundation of the contract, there will be no breach of the contract thus limited. * * * Each case must be judged by its own circumstances. In each case one must ask oneself: First, what, having regard to all the circumstances, was the foundation of the contract? Secondly, was the performance of the contract prevented? Thirdly, was the event which prevented the performance of the contract of such a character that it cannot reasonably be said to have been in the contemplation of the parties at the date of the contract? If all these questions are answered in the affirmative. * * * I think both parties are discharged from further performance of the contract."

[1] If one makes a contract to do a thing which is in itself possible, he will be liable for a breach of the contract, notwithstanding it is beyond his power to perform it. But where, from the nature of the contract itself it is apparent that the parties contracted on the basis of the continued existence of the substance to which the contract related, a condition is implied that if performance becomes impossible because that substance does not exist, this will and should excuse such performance. Walker v. Tucker, 70 Ill. 527.

The case of Muhlenberg v. Henning, 116 Pa. 188, 9 Atl. 144, is strikingly like this case. There was a 5-year lease in which the lessees covenanted to pay 35 cents a ton for every ton of merchantable ore mined, and to mine at least 1,500 tons annually during the term, or, in default thereof, to pay a royalty of $525 annually; and that the lease should be forfeited at the option of the lessors, if at the end of each year at least $525 as rent or royalty had not been paid. In an action to recover unpaid royalty for two years, an affidavit of defense was filed, averring that, though the defendants had operated the mines in a workmanlike and skillful manner for about nine months, yet, on account of the nonexistence of sufficient ore and its inferior and unmerchantable quality, they were unable to continue. It was held that the affidavit exhibited a good defense to the action, and the court there distinguished such a lease from those involved in the cases which were there and are here relied upon to support a contrary view, notably Jervis

v. Thompson, 1 Exch. (H. & N.) 195, and Marquis of Bute v. Thompson, 13 M. & W. 486, in both of which cases the contracts were construed to import an absolute covenant to pay the rent whether the mines could be made to produce the mineral or not.

In Williston on Sales, § 661, it is said:

"It is probable that the tendency of the law is towards an enlargement of the defense of impossibility, and in any case where it may fairly be said that both parties assumed that the performance of the contract would involve the continued existence of a certain state of affairs, impossibility of performance due to a change in this condition of affairs will be an excuse."

And this, in Bishop on Contracts (2d Ed.) § 588:

"Where by the intent of the parties the continued existence of a specific subject-matter is essential to the performance of the contract, its destruction will operate as a discharge, where neither of the parties have assumed such risk."

In Mineral Park Land Co. v. Howard, 172 Cal. 289, 156 Pac. 458, L. R. A. 1916F, 1, it is said that:

"Where performance depends upon the existence of a given thing, and such existence was assumed as the basis of the agreement, performance is excused to the extent that the thing ceases to exist or turns out to be nonexistent"—citing Beach, Contr. § 217; 9 Cyc. 631.

This is said in Boyer v. Fulmer, 176 Pa. 282, 35 Atl. 235:

"It is perfectly manifest that the parties contracted entirely with reference to iron ore which was supposed to exist, and did exist, on the land demised. The lessee was * * * to use all proper efforts * * * to find ore, and, if found, to mine and take it away, and to take out at least enough in each year to yield $400 annually, and if he did not take out that much he was bound to pay the $400 annually in any event; but, of course, this obligation proceeded upon the assumption that the ore was there, and continued to be there, in sufficient quantity to enable the lessee to perform his contract in this respect. If the ore was not there at all, * * * so that it could no longer be taken out in such quantity, the lessee was not bound to pay for it. He could not do an impossible thing, and therefore could not be held liable for not doing it. * * * Neither the lease nor the contract is a sale of the ore in place for a definite * * * minimum sum, as was the case in Timlin v. Brown [158 Pa. 606, 28 Atl. 236]."

Ridgley v. Conewago Iron Co. (C. C.) 53 Fed. 988, construes a mining lease which required the lessee to mine at least 4,000 tons annually, and to pay therefor a fixed sum per ton, or, in case he fails to take out such quantity, to pay therefor. It was held that the lease imposed no obligation to pay the minimum royalty after the ore in the premises had become exhausted. There Dallas, Circuit Judge, said:

"Mining leases commonly include, in addition to the usual undertaking to pay for what may be actually mined, a covenant that some fixed or ascertainable sum, at least, shall be annually paid. These covenants are not all the same, or to the same effect. They may be divided into two classes: First, those which require the payment of rent irrespective of product; second, those which require that, upon failure to take out a stipulated quantity, royalty with respect thereto shall nevertheless be paid. Where the covenant is of the first class the tenant is liable for the rent, even if nothing could be gotten by mining. * * * Where the covenant is of the second class his obligation is to pay for the stipulated quantity, whether mined or not; not whether it exists or not. He contracts for promptitude and thoroughness in mining; not for the productiveness of the mine. Lord Clifford v. Watts, L. R. 5 C. P. 577; Muhlenberg v. Henning, 116 Pa. St. 138, 9 Atl. 144. This covenant is of the second class."

The general rule, substantially as stated by Judge Dallas, is recognized in the following cases: Diamond Iron Mining Co. v. Buckeye Iron Mining Co., 70 Minn. 500, 73 N. W. 507, 19 Mor. Min. Rep. 197; Brooks v. Cook, 135 Ala. 219, 34 South. 960, 22 Mor. Min. Rep. 456; Blake v. Lobb's Estate, 110 Mich. 608, 68 N. W. 427, 18 Mor. Min. Rep. 462; Hewitt Iron Mining Co. v. Dessau Co., 129 Mich. 590, 89 N. W. 365, 22 Mor. Min. Rep. 111; Gribben v. Atkinson, 64 Mich. 651, 31 N. W. 570, 15 Mor. Min. Rep. 428; Muhlenberg v. Henning, 116 Pa. 138, 9 Atl. 144, 15 Mor. Min. Rep. 423; McCahan v. Wharton, 121 Pa. 424, 15 Atl. 615, 16 Mor. Min. Rep. 239; Bannan v. Graeff, 186 Pa. 648, 40 Atl. 805; Scioto Fire Brick Co. v. Pond, 38 Ohio St. 65; Adams v. Washington Brick Lime & Mfg. Co., 38 Wash. 243, 80 Pac. 446; Hiller v. Walter Ray & Co., 59 Fla. 285, 52 South. 623, 20 Ann. Cas. 1162; Fritzler v. Robinson, 70 Iowa, 500, 31 N. W. 61; Bloomfield Coal & Min. Co. v. Tidrick, 99 Iowa, 83, 68 N. W. 570; Edwards v. Trinity B. V. Ry. Co., 54 Tex. Civ. App. 334, 118 S. W. 572; St. Louis S. W. Ry. Co. of Texas v. Johnston, 58 Tex. Civ. App. 639, 125 S. W. 61; Williams v. Miller, 68 Cal. 291, 9 Pac. 166; Min. Park Land Co. v. Howard, 172 Cal. 289, 156 Pac. 458, L. R. A. 1916F, 1; Carr v. Whitebreast Fuel Co., 88 Iowa, 136, 55 N. W. 205.

There are other cases which cannot be reconciled with this view, though some of them may be distinguished. There is a line of cases in which the lessee has been required to pay the minimum royalty, notwithstanding the exhaustion of the mine, if he continues in possession of the leased premises claiming under the lease. Vandalia Coal Co. v. Underwood, 55 Ind. App. 99, 101 N. E. 1047; Lehigh & Wilkes-Barre Coal Co. v. Wright, 177 Pa. 387, 35 Atl. 919; N. Y. Coal Co. v. New Pittsburgh Coal Co., 86 Ohio St. 140, 99 N. E. 198; McDowell v. Hendrix, 67 Ind. 513.

Then in Lehigh Zinc Co. v. Bamford, 150 U. S. 665, 14 Sup. Ct. 219, 37 L. Ed. 1215, it is held that where the right to mine ore in the premises was not the substantial inducement for the lease, and the covenant to pay a fixed royalty as rent per year is not qualified, the lessor is not released even if the mineral is exhausted. Then there are cases where it is said that the amount of mineral was known to the parties at the time the lease was entered into, and the contract was for the sale and purchase of such mineral. Timlin v. Brown, 158 Pa. 606, 28 Atl. 236; Bute v. Thompson, 13 M. & W. 487, 153 Eng. Rep. 202; Jervis v. Tompkins, 4 Week. Rep. 683.

[2] Applying these principles to the bill and lease here involved, it appears clear that the main purpose of the contract was to mine iron ore, the existence of which in quantities great enough to justify the continuance of mining operations for 40 years was assumed as a fact by both parties, and by its express language the lessor was to receive 50 cents per long ton as compensation, "for each ton of good merchantable ore mined and shipped." The subject and substance of the contract is merchantable iron ore, to be mined and shipped, and the obligation is to pay therefor, or to pay such royalty on the minimum quantity which both parties assumed could be so produced. This language in the lease confirms this view:

"Not less than twenty thousand tons to be shipped each year. If less is shipped, royalty is to be paid on twenty thousand tons, and if more than twenty thousand tons are shipped in one year, and less than that quantity in the next preceding or succeeding year, the surplus of the one year and the royalty paid thereon may be carried to the credit of the other year, either preceding or succeeding to make the required minimum."

How is it possible for the lessee to receive the benefit of these credits unless the ore exists? The contingency provided against was the failure to mine and not the exhaustion of the ore which both parties assumed to exist. It is manifest then that if the facts alleged in the bill can be proved, and the ore does not exist, the lessee should be relieved of its obligation to pay the royalty provided for in the lease, because the paramount consideration of the contract has failed, and performance thereof by the lessee has become impossible. Cases relating to the general subject could be added, but those referred to which construe the contracts involved as we have construed the contract under review are so convincing, so securely rest upon right reason and justice, that additional citations are unnecessary. This, as we understand, is the view which the trial judge entertained, but he sustained the demurrer because of opinion that the defense could and should be made at law.

(b) This brings us to the second ground of demurrer.

[3] Equity jurisdiction to decree cancellation of an instrument, because at the time of its execution either one or both of the parties labored under a mistake of fact, is well recognized. 4 R. C. L. 506.

In Briggs v. Watkins, 112 Va. 26, 70 S. E. 555, this is quoted from Mowatt v. Wright, 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 355, 19 Am. Dec. 508:

"An error of fact takes place, either when some fact which really exists is unknown, or some fact is supposed to exist which * * * does not exist."

In Lee v. Laprade, 106 Va. 597, 56 S. E. 720, 117 Am. St. Rep. 1021, 10 Ann. Cas. 303, in which it was held that a court of equity had jurisdiction to rescind a deed for a plain mistake which was material in its character and of the very substance of the transaction—that is, that the lot conveyed was a part of a public street—this is quoted from 4 Min. Inst. (4th Ed.) 697:

"In cases of plain mistake or misapprehension, though not the effect of fraud or contrivance, equity will rescind the conveyance, if the error goes essentially to the substance of the contract, so that the purchaser does not get what he bargained for, or the vendor sells that which he did not design to sell."

It is clearly settled that relief may be had in equity for the cancellation or rescission of a contract, if the mistake affects its very substance, and is not a mere incident or inducement for entering into it. The subject is discussed in a comprehensive note to Steinmeyer v. Schroepel (228 Ill. 9, 80 N. E. 564, 10 L. R. A. [N. S.] 114) 117 Am. St. Rep. 228.

In the note to Miles v. Stevens, 3 Pa. 21, in 45 Am. Dec. 632, this is stated:

"No principle of equity is more firmly settled than that relief will be granted from the consequences of a mistake of fact, provided that such mistake is in reference to a fact material to the transaction, and was not occasioned by the parties' own neglect of a legal duty. There is no doubt of this general rule. The great difficulty arises in applying it to the multiform circumstances attending various kinds of transactions. A mistake of fact may arise in two ways, either in reference to the subject-matter of the contract, such as its situation, value, extent, boundaries, amount, and so forth, or in reference to its terms, as where the mistake consists in reducing a verbal agreement to writing. It may be either a mistake as to a fact past or present, arising from unconscious ignorance or forgetfulness, or a mistake occasioned by a belief in the past or present existence of a fact. Under all circumstances, in order to obtain equitable relief, the mistake must have been unintentional"—citing a number of cases.

[4] If certain facts are assumed by both parties as the basis of the contract, and it subsequently appears that such facts did not exist, the contract is inoperative. Fink v. Smith, 170 Pa. 124, 32 Atl. 566, 50 Am. St. Rep. 750; note, Du Bois Borough v. Du Bois City, etc., Co., 176 Pa. 430, 35 Atl. 248, 34 L.

R. A. 92, 53 Am. St. Rep. 682; Bluestone Coal Co. v. Bell, 38 W. Va. 307, 18 S. E. 493; Laing v. Price, 75 W. Va. 192, 83 S. E. 499; Coffinberry v. Sun Oil Co., 68 Ohio St. 488, 67 N. E. 1069; Long v. Inhabitants of Athol, 196 Mass. 497, 82 N. E. 665, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 96.

[5] The question at issue is whether this contract comes within this doctrine. As to this we have no doubt whatever. Both parties assumed that iron was upon the land in sufficient quantity to justify its operation for at least 40 years. The production of iron ore and the payment to the lessor of the royalty on such ore was the very substance of the contract. Assuming the allegations of the bill to be true, as we must upon this demurrer, it is clear that the parties were grossly mistaken as to the quantity of the ore. This mistake was mutual, and as a consequence thereof there is a substantial failure of the consideration. While the lessee was not bound to go into court of equity and could have made its defense at law, if sued by the lessor, it was under no obligation to await the institution of such an action. The existence of the lease and the possibility of having to assume the very large liability thereby imposed constituted a contingent liability, the tendency of which would be to impair its credit. If that action had been postponed, the lessee would have been left with a contract of vast importance outstanding, with impending litigation, and the the consequent uncertainty as to whether the claim would be adjudged valid or invalid. The court of law could not either require a cancellation of the lease, or in that action adjudicate questions which may arise affecting the rights of the parties as to the property upon the leased premises. The bill and exhibits also show that there are two outstanding deeds of trust upon the property, securing large bond issues and only a court of equity could conclude and determine the rights of those claiming thereunder, for a common-law court would be powerless to do so. It is not inconceivable that these trustees and the bond-holders they represent may differ with the lessee as to the value of the privileges granted by the lease; and, before any action affecting the property upon which they have a lien is taken they have the right to be heard.

[6, 7] If the facts alleged are true, the lessee is entitled to relief in equity upon the ground of failure of consideration arising out of mutual mistake, and both failure of consideration and mutual mistake are grounds of equity jurisdiction. In order to justify the court in refusing to take such jurisdiction, the remedy at law "must be adequate; for if at law it falls short of what the party is entitled to, that founds a jurisdiction in equity. And it must be complete; that is, it must attain the full end and justice of the case. It must reach the whole mischief and secure the whole right of the party in a perfect manner, at the present time and in future; otherwise equity will interfere and give such relief and aid as the exigencies of the particular case may require." 1 Story's Eq. Jur. § 33; Stuart v. Pennis, 91 Va. 688, 22 S. E. 509; Southern Ry. Co. v. Franklin, etc., R. Co., 96 Va. 704, 32 S. E. 485, 44 L. R. A. 297. Even if sued at law, the lessee would not be bound to make its equitable defense, which is allowed under Code, § 3299, for it is expressly provided by section 3300 that failure to make such defense in the common-law action does not preclude a subsequent proceeding in equity for such relief, and the statute is thus construed in Selden v. Williams, 108 Va. 551, 62 S. E. 380.

The discussion could be prolonged, and many other authorities are cited in the briefs, but those to which we have referred are sufficient. We are convinced that the trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer. A decree will therefore be entered here overruling it, and the cause will be remanded for trial upon the issues of fact tendered by the answer.

Reversed and remanded.

et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 13, 1919.)

1. PROCESS ¶168—"ABUSE OF PROCESS"—CAUSE OF ACTION.

"Abuse of process," as distinguished from malicious prosecution and from false imprisonment, constitutes an independent cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Abuse of Process.]

2. PROCESS ¶168—"ABUSE OF PROCESS."

The distinctive nature of an action for "abuse of process," as compared with actions for malicious prosecution and false imprisonment, is that it lies for the improper use of a regularly issued process, not for maliciously causing process to issue, or for an unlawful detention of the person.

3. PROCESS ¶171—ABUSE—ALLEGING AND PROVING MALICE.

In action for abuse of process, it is not necessary to allege or prove that process was maliciously sued out, as in malicious prosecution, but it is necessary to allege and prove that process, after being properly sued out, was maliciously misused or abused; law implying malice from intentional and willful perversion, facts of which must be alleged.

4. PROCESS —168 — ABUSE — REDRESSING PRIVATE WRONG.

It is illegal to use the criminal processes of the state merely to redress a private wrong.

5. PROCESS —168—ABUSE OF PROCESS—ENFORCING COLLECTION OF DEBT—SETTLEMENT OF PROSECUTION.

Under Code 1904, § 3973, authorizing private adjustments between parties immediately concerned in misdemeanors for which there is a remedy by civil action, despite section 3760, against compounding offenses, tobacco warehousemen who procured plaintiff's arrest for misdemeanor denounced by Acts 1912, c. 130, plaintiff having failed to repay money borrowed on pledge to sell tobacco through such person, held not guilty of abuse of process, having released him on settlement, despite any intention to use process to enforce collection of debt.

6. CRIMINAL LAW —40—STATUTES—SETTLEMENT OF PROSECUTION—EJUSDEM GENERIS.

The general words, "or other misdemeanor," in Code 1904, § 3973, authorizing private adjustments between parties immediately concerned in misdemeanors for which there is remedy by civil action, following the specific words, "assault and battery," are not to be limited, under the principle of ejusdem generis, to other misdemeanors of the same kind.

7. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION —35(2)—VOLUNTARY COMPROMISE—BAR TO ACTION.

Voluntary compromise of a criminal prosecution by the procurement, or with the consent of accused, in itself defeats a recovery in a subsequent action for malicious prosecution based on the proceeding.

8. PROCESS —168—ABUSE—WANT OF PROBABLE CAUSE.

The element of want of probable cause is immaterial in an action for abuse of process.

9. PROCESS —168—ABUSE—CRIMINAL PROCESS TO COLLECT DEBT.

Criminal process cannot be wrongfully used to collect a debt, if by "wrongful" is meant a perversion or oppressive use of process, as distinguished from secret motive party may have had in procuring issuance.

10. PROCESS —168 — ABUSE — PRECLUSION TO ATTACK VALIDITY.

In action for abuse of process, presupposing an originally valid and regular process duly and properly issued, plaintiff cannot contend warrant on which he was arrested was barred by limitation, and that act under which warrant issued was unconstitutional.

11. APPEAL AND ERROR —1068(3)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, on evidence, verdict for defendants was only one which jury properly could have rendered, if there was any error in regard to instructions, it was harmless to plaintiff.

12. APPEAL AND ERROR —1060(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE.

Where evidence admitted over plaintiff's objection was of such a character that its exclusion could not properly have produced a different result, its admission was harmless to him.

Error to Circuit Court, Lunenburg County.

Notice of motion by J. Y. Glidewell against Murray-Lacy & Co. and others. To review judgment for respondents, movant brings error. Affirmed.

Geo. E. Allen, of Victoria, for plaintiff in error.

Booker, McKinney & Settle, of South Boston, for defendants in error.

KELLY, J. Section 1 of an act of the General Assembly, approved March 11, 1912 (Acts 1912, p. 232), declares:

"That it shall be unlawful for any person to borrow money from any person, firm or corporation conducting a business as sales tobacco warehousemen upon a written promise or pledge to sell with or through said person, firm or corporation, any tobacco, and thereafter fail or refuse to comply with the conditions of said written promise or pledge."

And section 2 thereof provides that any person who shall fail to comply with such written pledge, or to repay the amount borrowed, with legal interest, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and punished by fine, or imprisonment, or both.

A warrant, issued by a justice in Halifax county, at the instance of Murray-Lacy & Co., tobacco warehousemen, charging J. Y. Glidewell with having obtained from and failed to repay to them the sum of $93 under circumstances constituting a violation of this statute, was placed in the hands of J. T. Bass, a constable of the county, who was also an employé of Murray-Lacy & Co., and as such charged with the duty of collecting outstanding obligations due to them. He took the warrant to the home of Glidewell, who resided in Lunenburg county some six or seven miles from the town of Victoria, and, not finding him at home, proceeded to Victoria and delivered the warrant to the town sergeant with instructions to execute the same, having first, however, had it duly indorsed by a Lunenburg justice as provided by section 3957 of the Code. The arrest was effected by the sergeant about 3 o'clock in the afternoon of that day. Bass was notified and returned at once to Victoria. Upon his return, he asked Glidewell "what he expected to do." After some conversation not detailed in the record, it was tentatively agreed between them that if Glidewell would execute a new note, with security, covering the $93 mentioned in the warrant, the correctness of which as a civil liability he did not deny, he would be at once released and the warrant dismissed. He was not willing, however, to definitely conclude any adjustment of the matter without consulting counsel, and accordingly the parties repaired to the law office of his attorney, Mr. Geo. E. Allen. Upon being asked by Mr. Allen, "What do you want?" Mr. Bass replied, "We want money." The subject of compromise was then taken up, and, upon an offer made by Glidewell (but against the advice of his attorney, who stated that Bass had no right to make the arrest, and that the law under which the warrant was issued was unconstitutional), the new note, with security, was executed, and Glidewell was immediately released. Bass then promptly proceeded to Halifax county and had the warrant dismissed.

In order to show fully all the circumstances under which Glidewell made the settlement, the following additional incidents should be mentioned: He had walked from his home to Victoria to get medicine for his sick child, but whether Bass was informed of this fact does not appear. The child's illness does not seem to have been regarded very seriously by him, as he remained in Victoria for some time after the settlement was made. He was told by Bass that unless the matter was settled he would not be released, but would be taken before the Halifax justice, and would certainly be convicted. After his arrest, he was not confined in jail, was allowed to stay at his brother's home, apparently without guard, was subjected to no harsh or oppressive treatment by the officers, but was kept under formal arrest from 3 o'clock in the afternoon until the settlement was concluded about 11 o'clock that night. During the negotiations, Bass refused to release the prisoner upon an offer by the latter's counsel to be responsible for his appearance to answer the warrant at a future day.

Shortly after the termination, in the manner already set out, of the criminal prosecution against Glidewell, he instituted the present proceeding, by notice of motion, against Murray-Lacy & Co. and T. J. Bass, to recover damages of them alleged to have resulted from his arrest and imprisonment. The notice charged that the defendants wrongfully, unlawfully, and maliciously sued out a criminal warrant against the plaintiff, and caused his arrest thereunder, "not for the purpose of enforcing the criminal laws of the commonwealth, but solely for the ulterior and unlawful purpose of enforcing the collection of a debt of which plaintiff would otherwise have been discharged." The notice, which was entirely informal, did not attempt to designate eo nomine the cause of action; but the petition upon which this writ of error was granted interprets it as "a tort consisting of the abuse of process in using the criminal law to collect a debt." The case, as attempted to be made out by the plaintiff, was tried upon this interpretation, and we shall deal with it accordingly.

Upon the trial, there was a verdict and judgment for the defendants.

[1] The cause of action sought to be maintained in this proceeding is not malicious prosecution or false imprisonment, but the kindred, though less common one, of abuse of process. So far as we know, there is no Virginia case upon the subject. It is well settled, however, as a general proposition of law, that abuse of process, as distinguished from malicious prosecution and from false imprisonment, may constitute an independent cause of action.

[2] The distinctive nature of an action for abuse of process, as compared with the actions for malicious prosecution and false imprisonment, is that it lies for the improper use of a regularly issued process, not for maliciously causing process to issue, or for an unlawful detention of the person.

In Wood v. Graves, 144 Mass. 365, 11 N. E. 567, 59 Am. Rep. 95, the court said:

"There is no doubt that an action lies for the malicious abuse of lawful process, civil or criminal. It is to be assumed, in such a case, that the process was lawfully used for a just cause, and is valid in form, and that the arrest or other proceeding upon the process was justifiable and proper in its inception. But the grievance to be redressed arises in consequence of subsequent proceedings. For example, if after an arrest upon civil or criminal process the person arrested is subjected to unwarrantable insults and indignities, is treated with cruelty, is deprived of proper food, or is otherwise treated with oppression and undue hardship, he has a remedy by an action against the officer, and against others who may unite with the officer in doing the wrong."

Freeman, in a note to Bradshaw v. Frazier, 86 Am. St. Rep. 406, says:

"An action for the abuse of a process of arrest usually presupposes that the arrest under the process was proper in its inception, and is founded on grievances arising in consequence of subsequent proceedings"—citing Whitten v. Bennett, 86 Fed. 406, 30 C. C. A. 140; Wood v. Graves, supra.

In 1 Ruling Case Law, pp. 101, 102, with reference to this particular cause of action, it is said:

"There has been considerable confusion in the books as to the scope of the action for abuse of process, and numerous cases may be found where it has been confounded with other classes of actions. * * * Abuse of process consists in the malicious misuse or misapplication of that process to accomplish some purpose not warranted or commanded by the writ. In brief, it is the malicious perversion of a regularly issued process whereby a result not lawfully or properly attainable under it is secured. * * * The cases based upon a pure abuse of process are comparatively few, though there are numerous cases referred to and cited as such which are in fact actions for malicious prosecution. * * * The distinctive nature of an action for malicious abuse of process, as compared with an action for malicious prosecution, is that it lies for the improper use of process after it has been issued, not for maliciously causing process to issue."

In Cooley on Torts (3d Ed.) p. 355, the author says:

"Two elements are necessary to an action for the malicious abuse of legal process: First, the existence of an ulterior purpose; and, second, an act in the use of the process not proper in the regular prosecution of the proceeding. Regular and legitimate use of process, though with a bad intention, is not a malicious abuse of process." (Italics added.)

See, also, to the same general effect as the foregoing, 32 Cyc. 541; 3 Ann. Cas. 722, note; Malone v. Belcher, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 830, note 831, 832.

[3] The civil injury now under discussion is sometimes referred to, even by the same text-writers and in the same judicial opinions, as "malicious abuse of process," and at other times merely as "abuse of process." This alternative use of these expressions is not usually intended to be discriminative, but there is at least a conflict of statement in the authorities as to the necessity of averring and proving malice in cases of this character. 3 Ann. Cas. 722; Ann. Cas. 1915A, 832. It seems to us, however, that there is no reason for any confusion of thought, or for any difference of opinion, as to the part which malice plays in such cases. The true rule would plainly seem to be that it is not necessary to allege or prove that the process was maliciously sued out, as in malicious prosecution, but that it is necessary to allege and prove that the process, after being properly sued out, was maliciously misused or abused. The authorities are practically unanimous in holding that to maintain the action there must be proof of a willful and intentional abuse or misuse of the process for the accomplishment of some wrongful object—an intentional and willful perversion of it to the unlawful injury to another. From such use or employment of the process, as from any other willful wrong, the law implies malice. It is safe to say that no action for abuse of process can be maintained without proof that the process was used under circumstances amounting to either actual or implied malice.

To sum up this branch of the discussion, if process is willfully used for a purpose not justified by the law, it is an abuse for which an action will lie. The abuse consists in the unlawful use. While it cannot be wrong to do a lawful act in a lawful way, it is a wrong to do a lawful act in an unlawful way. It is the unlawful method by which the act is done that gives rise to the action, and the intentional use of this method constitutes malice in law. The malice need not be expressly charged; but, if not, there must be an averment of facts from which the law implies the malice.

The texts and judicial opinions to which we have referred are replete with citations to other similar discussions covering every conceivable phase of the tort known as "abuse of process." Further elaboration or more extended citation here would serve no good purpose. The opening brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error contains a very satisfactory collection and review of the leading authorities on the subject, and concludes with a summary which we believe to be a correct and a sufficiently complete compendium of the law for all of the purposes of the instant case. We therefore quote from the brief as follows:

"An examination of these authorities will clearly show that the only essentials of the action of abuse of process are, first, an ulterior motive, and, secondly, an act in the use of the process not proper in the regular prosecution of the proceeding, though it is immaterial whether such process is baseless or not, the abuse consisting in its perversion to some unlawful purpose and in the willful and oppressive use of it after its issue."

[4, 5] The plaintiff's case, however, when tested by the law as thus correctly stated by his counsel, cannot be maintained. It may be conceded that the first essential element of the tort, an ulterior motive, was established. To say the least of it, the evidence tended strongly to show that the real purpose of the defendants was not to enforce the criminal law, but to collect their debt, and as a general proposition, it is illegal to use the criminal processes of the state merely to redress a private wrong. But before this ulterior purpose can be made the basis of a recovery in an action for the abuse of process, it must be coupled with the second essential element; that is, with "an act in the use of the process not proper in the regular prosecution of the proceeding," amounting to its perversion to some unlawful purpose. Proof of indirect motive will not alone sustain the action. 1 R. C. L. 108; 86 Am. St. Rep. note p. 399; and other authorities cited, supra. It is at this point that the plaintiff's case unmistakably breaks down.

Whatever motive and purpose the defendants might have had, what they actually did was in keeping with the object of the act of March 11, 1912, and with the general legislative policy of the state with reference to misdemeanors of a minor character for which the party aggrieved has also a private remedy. There can be no doubt that the act under which the warrant was issued was primarily intended to protect tobacco warehousemen against the loss of advances of the kind made by the defendants in this case. Nor was there anything reprehensible or unlawful in the settlement which the defendants made with the plaintiff by virtue of which the prosecution was withdrawn and the warrant dismissed. The transaction does not fall within the condemnation of section 3760 of the Code against concealing or compounding offenses, but rather within the spirit, if not within the terms, of section 3973, authorizing a private adjustment between the parties immediately concerned in misdemeanors for which there is a remedy by civil action. The section last cited, so far as it need be quoted here, is as follows:

"When a person is in jail or under recognizance to answer a charge of assault and battery or other misdemeanor, for which there is a remedy by civil action, * * * if the party injured appear before the judge or justice who made the commitment or took the recognizance, and acknowledge in writing that he has received satisfaction for the injury, such judge or justice, in his discretion, may, by an order under his hand, supersede the commitment or discharge the recognizance as to the accused and witnesses."

It is contended that the formalities of the foregoing section were not complied with in the instant case. It does not affirmatively appear that the defendants ("parties injured") "acknowledged in writing that they had received satisfaction for the injury," nor just what were the terms of the final order of dismissal; but it does appear that they in fact received satisfaction, appeared before the justice, and had the warrant dismissed. This was done upon a proposition made by the accused, and was so much in accord with what he desired that he concluded the arrangement against the advice of his counsel. We need not stop to inquire whether this possibly irregular dismissal of the warrant would have constituted a valid and complete defense on his part against any subsequent effort by the commonwealth to proceed against him criminally for the same cause. It is certain that he himself cannot be heard to complain of the alleged irregularity.

[6] It is further argued, however, that section 3973 of the Code does not apply to cases of this kind, because the general words, "or other misdemeanor," following the specific words, "assault and battery," must, under the principle of eiusdem generis, be limited to other misdemeanors of the same kind as assault and battery, or, as otherwise expressed in the reply brief, "to cases of assault and battery or other misdemeanors resulting in personal injuries." Mr. Lile, in his Notes on Statutes (page 29, § 48), states the familiar rule of construction here invoked as follows:

"Where particular classes of persons or things are mentioned in a statute, general words preceding or following are to be restricted to persons or things of a like kind with those particularly mentioned, unless plainly otherwise intended."

It is clear that the construction of section 3973 is not within the rule, because "plainly otherwise intended." The statute, instead of impliedly restricting the meaning of the words "other misdemeanor" to offenses of a kindred nature with assault and battery, expressly extends their meaning so as to include the misdemeanor here involved along with all others "for which there is a remedy by civil action."

[7] A voluntary compromise of a criminal prosecution, by the procurement or with the consent of the accused, in itself defeats a recovery in a subsequent action for malicious prosecution based upon the criminal proceeding. Russell v. Morgan, 24 R. I. 134, 52 Atl. 809, 811; Langford v. Railroad Co., 144 Mass. 481, 11 N. E. 697, 699. If it be true, as contended on behalf of the plaintiff in error, that this rule does not apply in a case of abuse of process, still the existence of the rule itself shows that private adjustments of criminal prosecutions are not unusual and are frequently recognized as proper. We have seen that in Virginia settlements of this character are expressly provided for by statute as to misdemeanors like that for which the plaintiff in error was being prosecuted, and this is in accord with the general policy of the law. Of course, compounding or concealing crimes, or stifling prosecutions to defeat the ends of justice, will not be countenanced or permitted; but, as said in 3 Wharton's Criminal Law, § 1877, p. 2079:

"In prosecutions for offenses and cheats not involving any great offense against the public, the courts will encourage settlements between the parties as less injurious to the public than litigation."

Our conclusion is that there was no abuse, no malicious use, and no perversion of the process sued out against the plaintiff in error. There was no extortion thereunder, no collection of money not due from him, and he was subjected to no oppression, and to no indignity except such as was incident to an orderly arrest under due and regular process. The averment, in his notice of motion, that but for the criminal prosecution he "would have been discharged" from the payment of the debt, and the statement in his bill of particulars that he had been adjudicated a bankrupt, are not supported by any proof, and appear to have been abandoned. Whatever motive may have prompted the defendants, they had a moral and legal right to accept satisfaction and withdraw the prosecution substantially as they did; and there is no ground upon which the plaintiff can legally ask for damages against them in this action.

[8, 9] A number of decisions from other jurisdictions are cited in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error to support the proposition there advanced that criminal process cannot be wrongfully used to collect a debt, and that in such cases it is not necessary to prove malice or want of probable cause. The last-named element, want of probable cause, is of course immaterial in all such cases, because that relates to the suing out and not to the use of the process. We concede also, and indeed it follows from what we have already said in this opinion, that criminal process cannot be wrongfully used to collect a debt, if by "wrongfully" is meant a perversion or oppressive use of the process as distinguished from the secret motive which the party may have in procuring its issuance. As to the proof of malice, we have seen that such proof is not necessary as to the issuance, but is necessary to the use, of the process, in order to sustain an action of this character. If any of the decisions relied upon by counsel for the proposition recited at the beginning of this paragraph, or for any other proposition, are in real conflict with the conclusions we have reached, we should feel obliged to disregard them; but we think it will be found that there is no substantial conflict between those cases and our decision in the present case. We will advert to a few of them, by way of illustration:

In the case of McClenny v. Inverarity, 80 Kan. 569, 103 Pac. 82, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 301, which more nearly supports the plaintiff's contention than any other authority to which our attention has been called, "the evidence disclosed the fact that a warrant for the arrest of the plaintiff upon a criminal charge was used to collect a debt, and, it seems, to extort an additional amount"; and, moreover, there were aggravating and oppressive circumstances in that case in connection with the arrest.

Lockhart v. Bear, 117 N. C. 298, 23 S. E. 484, was a case in which a process of arrest was used to force a debtor to pay a debt out of property legally exempt from execution, and thus became a case for recovery because the process was used to compel the accused to do something which he was under no legal obligation to do, and against which he would have had a good defense in a civil proceeding.

Shaw v. Spooner, 9 N. H. 197, 32 Am. Dec. 348, was a case in which a criminal prosecution was instituted against a nonresident defendant, by virtue of which extradition was procured, and the defendant, thus brought within the jurisdiction, was then induced to settle a civil liability in order to rid himself of the criminal prosecution. The opinion clearly indicated that the process was improperly, if not dishonestly, used to bring about the extradition, and that the settlement made with the defendant was one not in accord with a sound legislative and judicial policy.

In Wood v. Graves, supra, a recovery was sustained, but the opinion in that case directly supports our conclusion here. That this is true is shown, not only by our quotation therefrom in a previous paragraph, but from the following language with which that opinion, after reviewing the instructions, concludes:

"Under these instructions, the jury could not properly hold the defendants responsible for merely setting the criminal law in motion, and arresting the plaintiff and holding him in custody until his discharge; but only for some distinct act or omission, which amounted to a misuse or abuse of the process after it had issued, some indignity or oppression beyond the mere fact of arrest and detention, some separate pressure to compel him to make the settlement."

We may well conclude this reference to the authorities cited for the plaintiff by saying, in the language of the court in Bartlett v. Christliff, 69 Md. 219, 14 Atl. 518:

"All these are instances in which the writ, regularly and properly sued out, was perverted, abused, and made an instrument of oppression"—a classification which does not embrace the case at bar.

[10] It only remains to consider briefly two contentions on behalf of the plaintiff in error, not embraced in the foregoing discussion. The first is that the warrant was barred by limitation; and, the second, that the act of March 11, 1912, is unconstitutional. Regardless of their merits, neither of these propositions can be availed of by the plaintiff in this proceeding. Whether either or both of them are sound propositions, and what effect they might have had in an action for false imprisonment or malicious prosecution, are questions which suggest themselves, but which are not material to the present controversy. They have to do, not with the use or abuse of process, but with its original issuance and validity. The plaintiff chose to sue for abuse of process, apparently and perhaps correctly believing that, in view of the facts of his case, this form of action was more favorable to him than any other he might adopt. We need hardly repeat that an action for abuse of process presupposes an originally valid and regular process, duly and properly issued. Authorities cited, supra. There might, of course, be actionable abuses of process not thus originally regular and properly issued; but any action for such abuse would necessarily ignore the infirmities in the process itself and rely upon the abuse of it after it had been sued out, the latter constituting the gist of the action.

Having reached the foregoing conclusions, it becomes unnecessary to discuss in detail the numerous assignments of error upon which we are asked to reverse the judgment of the lower court. They relate to instructions given or refused, to the admission of certain evidence, and to the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict as contrary to the law and the evidence.

[11, 12] Upon the evidence as introduced, a verdict for the defendants was the only one which the jury could have properly rendered; and, as a result, if there was any error in regard to the instructions, it was harmless. Perrow v. Rixey, 119 Va. 192, 89 S. E. 101, and cases cited. The evidence which was admitted over the plaintiff's objection was of such a character as that its exclusion could not properly have produced a different result. Its admission, therefore, did not prejudice his rights. Norfolk v. Southern Ry. Co., 117 Va. 101, 110, 83 S. E. 1085.

There is no error in the judgment complained of, and it is affirmed.

Affirmed.

BARRETT BROS. v. FELIE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 13, 1919.)

1. TRESPASS §56—REMOVAL OF FURNITURE—DAMAGES—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

Where defendants removed sublessee's furniture from premises as the result of a mistake, thinking the furniture belonged to lessee, and was not prompted in so doing by malice, sublessee was entitled to compensatory damages merely, and not punitive damages.

2. PARTNERSHIP §153—LIABILITY OF PARTNER—TRESPASS BY COPARTNER—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

A partner who knew nothing of alleged trespass until after suit was brought, and neither authorized nor ratified such trespass, was not liable for punitive or exemplary damages.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Newport News.

Action by D. Felle against Barrett Bros. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed, and case remanded, with directions.

J. A. Massie, of Newport News, for plaintiffs in error.

T. J. Christian and W. T. Moss, both of Newport News, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, P. Defendant in error brought this action of trespass quare clausum fregit against plaintiffs in error, a partnership composed of W. E. Barrett and F. M. Barrett, to recover damages for breaking and entering his close and removing his furniture and effects from a building located in the city of Newport News leased by plaintiff from the defendants. There was a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff for $500 to which judgment this writ of error was granted.

The material facts may thus be summarized: Plaintiffs in error, as partners, were general rental agents, the business being under the direction and control of F. M. Barrett, who leased and collected the rents of a house in the city of Newport News owned by W. E. Barrett and W. B. Vest. One A. Francesco verbally leased the ground floor for a restaurant and the upstairs for living rooms. Francesco subsequently sold his restaurant and assigned both leases to the purchaser, who thereupon took possession and occupied the premises for some time. The purchaser failing to pay the entire purchase price, Francesco took the property back, including the leases, and then sold the restaurant to plaintiff, Felle, and transferred the possession of the entire building to him. Plaintiff conducted a restaurant on the ground floor and occupied the flat above, paying a rental of $12.50 per month for each in advance, for the restaurant to August 1st, and for the upstairs rooms to August 10th. He failed to meet his deferred payments on the restaurant, and Francesco in July took possession of the same and refunded to plaintiff part of the cash payment he had made therefor. Francesco then went to the office of defendants and informed F. M. Barrett that he had taken the place back, and that plaintiff had removed to Richmond, and inquired if plaintiff owed them any rent, and was told that he only owed $2 for water rent; that the rent for the restaurant and upstairs had been paid as before stated. Thereupon Francesco notified F. M. Barrett that he had sold the restaurant to one Beauchamp, and desired to put him in possession. F. M. Barrett informed Beauchamp that the rent had been paid for some days, and there would be no rent due until the beginning of the new month. F. M. Barrett inquired of Francesco what he was going to do about some furniture he owned upstairs, and Francesco told him that he would remove it next day. A day or two afterwards, F. M. Barrett sent Berger, who was employed in their office, to remove into the hall, as he thought, one or two pieces of old furniture belonging to Francesco in the upstairs rooms, so that Beauchamp might take possession of the entire premises. Berger went to the house to remove the stuff as directed, but found more furniture than was anticipated, and an old woman in the upstairs rooms, who subsequently proved to be Mrs. Felle, though F. M. Barrett did not know that it was Mrs. Felle, but thought she was another Italian woman who had been squatting in their property in that vicinity. Berger then, with the help of two colored men, had the furniture, consisting of three iron beds, three tables, six chairs, four rocking chairs, two beds, two trunks, with bed clothing and wearing apparel in them, moved into the alley, and fastened up the house. The articles remained in the alley until next morning, when a neighbor had them removed to his house, where some of them yet remain; the rest having been shipped to plaintiff in Richmond. This neighbor also took care of Mrs. Felle, without charge, until she joined her husband in Richmond. W. E. Barrett, the other partner, knew nothing of the alleged trespass until after the institution of the suit, and then authorized his counsel to investigate the matter and pay the parties any actual damage they had sustained. F. M. Barrett thought the Felles had moved all their belongings, and that the furniture found on the premises belonged to Francesco, and directed it to be put in the hall, so that Beauchamp, to whom Francesco had turned over the property, could occupy it.

Plaintiff testified that he bought the furniture three years before at a cost of $500, and that it "was worth more to-day than it was then and could not be replaced for less than $500." At the request of the plaintiff, among other instructions, the court told the jury that if they should find for the plaintiff, in assessing his damages, they might take into account compensation for damage to his household furniture, and for mental suffering, if any, sustained by reason of such wrongful act or acts, including injury to his feelings, if any, sustained by reason of the occasion; and if the jury believed that the act complained of was committed with actual malice, forcibly, and with a design to injure or oppress the plaintiff, he might also recover punitive or exemplary damages—that is to say, the jury would not be limited to mere compensation for the actual damages sustained by him, but might give such further damages as they thought right, in view of all the circumstances proved at the trial, by way of punishment to the defendant as a salutary example to others to deter them from offending in like manner, but not exceeding $1,000, the amount demanded.

In the case of Wood v. American National Bank, 100 Va. 306, 40 S. E. 931, it was held:

"Under the common-law system of pleading, damages which do not necessarily flow from the act or omission complained of must be specially pleaded, but damages which are the necessary and proximate result of such act or omission are termed general, and are legally imported, and may be recovered, although not specially claimed in the declaration. If the facts averred in the declaration show that the plaintiff is entitled to recover exemplary damages, they need not be claimed eo nomine. If a more specific statement of the elements of damage be desired, it may be demanded under the provisions of section 3249 of the Code."

The declaration in the present case is in common form, and covers general and not special damages. Punitive or exemplary damages are not only not claimed eo nomine, but the declaration does not aver such a state of facts as shows that the recovery of such damages was contemplated. It is not even alleged that the trespass was done willfully, negligently, wrongfully, or maliciously; and the defendants had no reason to suppose that they would have to answer for other than actual or compensatory damages.

In a similar action to recover damages for breaking and entering plaintiff's close, and cutting and converting trees, this court held that, where the trespass was not willful, the damages were merely compensatory. Wood v. Weaver, 121 Va. 250, 92 S. E. 1001.

[1] The case of Norfolk & Western Ry. Co. v. Neely, 91 Va. 539, 22 S. E. 367, illustrates the considerations that should govern in assessing damages in this class of cases. Judge Riely delivered the opinion of the court, and it was held that—

"A passenger who is unlawfully expelled from a railroad train by the conductor thereof is entitled to recover damages therefor of the company. If the expulsion, though unlawful, did not proceed from any ill motive, and was not rudely or recklessly done, nor in such manner as to evince malice or a conscious disregard of the rights of others, and was simply the result of a mistake, the passenger cannot recover punitive damages, but only compensation, and, on the evidence certified, his damages should be limited to compensation for the inconvenience, delay and fatigue to which he was put, and a suitable recompense for the injury done to his feelings, in being expelled from the train."

[2] It should also be observed that the judgment under review is against the partnership, and rests equally upon W. E. Barrett, who knew nothing of the alleged trespass until after suit brought, and neither authorized nor ratified it. In these circumstances he was plainly not liable for punitive or exemplary damages. Henry Myers & Co. v. Lewis, 121 Va. 50, 92 S. E. 983.

Obviously, the case was tried upon an erroneous theory as to the correct measure of damages, both under the pleading and evidence, and that conclusion renders it unnecessary to notice in detail the other assignments of error, most if not all of which are not likely to arise at the next trial.

Upon these considerations, the judgment must be reversed and annulled, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial to be had conformably to the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed.

In action against owner of mill for damages caused by fire originating in mill, plaintiff cannot recover on mere allegations that defendants were negligent and allowed fire to escape from their premises; it being necessary to state facts and circumstances showing in what respect defendants were negligent.

3. NEGLIGENCE \S 139(8) — INSTRUCTIONS — PERSONS LIABLE.

In action for damages caused by fire escaping from a mill, court erred in adding words "or were interested in the proceeds of the business" to a requested instruction that jury could not find against defendants unless they had some control over the engine alleged to have caused the fire; evidence being very meager as to interest of one of defendants, and there being no evidence that the other had any control or was interested in proceeds.

Error to Circuit Court, Buckingham County.

Action by one Lang against C. H. Clark and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

F. C. Moon and A. L. Pitts, Jr., both of Buckingham, for plaintiffs in error.

Hubard, Gayle & Boatright, of Buckingham, for defendant in error.

BURKS, J. Lang recovered a judgment in the circuit court of Buckingham county against the Clarks for $2,000 damages, for negligently burning certain buildings and personal property belonging to Clark, and the case is here on a writ of error to that judgment.

The following errors are assigned: (1) Overruling defendants' motion to set aside the verdict as contrary to the evidence; (2) overruling defendants' demurrer to the third count of the declaration; and (3) in giving and refusing instructions.

It is unnecessary to pass upon the first assignment of error, as the verdict will have to be set aside for other reasons hereinafter set forth.

[1, 2] The next assignment of error is to the action of the trial court in overruling the demurrer of the defendants to the third count of the declaration. That count is as follows:

"And for this also, to wit, that the said plaintiff was on the day and year last aforesaid the owner of a certain farm in the county of Buckingham on which farm there were a number of buildings of great value and that in said buildings was stored much valuable farm machinery, tools, hay, grain, etc., of great value, to wit, of a total value of $3,000; on the said day and year the said defendants, being the owners and operators of a certain sawmill, steam engine and boiler, using wood as fuel, all of which plant was located near the said buildings of the said plaintiff, and the said plaintiff avers that the said defendants well knew that his said buildings together with their valuable contents, were so located; and the place where said mill, etc., was located being filled with brush, and trash and other combustible material, it became and was the duty of the defendants to use all due and proper care to prevent the escape of fire from their said plant, but the said defendants, failed, neglected and refused to use due and proper care on their behalf, but so carelessly and negligently conducted themselves that fire escaped from their said plant on the day and year last aforesaid and burned, consumed and totally destroyed plaintiff's said buildings and their contents, to the damage of the plaintiff of $3,000."

The right of the plaintiff to recover of the defendants is based upon the negligence of the defendants. This will not be presumed, but must, like any other fact, be established by evidence, direct or circumstantial. The burden was on the plaintiff. If he had the means of proving the negligence, he had knowledge of the facts and circumstances necessary to enable him to state in what respect the defendants were negligent, and this should have been done in the declaration. If he did not have such means, he had no right to hale the defendants into court on a mere guess or suspicion. The declaration does not measure up to the standard required by the former decisions of this court. Ches. & Ohio Ry. Co. v. Hunter, 109 Va. 341, 64 S. E. 44, and cases cited. [3] The next error assigned is to the action of the court in modifying instruction No. 1, tendered by the defendants. The instruction as given, with the modification shown in italics, is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that unless they believe from the evidence that the defendants, C. H. Clark and M. W. Clark, at the time of the fire had some control of the engine which is alleged to have caused the fire complained of in the declaration, or were interested in the proceeds of the business, they cannot find against the defendants, C. H. Clark and M. W. Clark."

We are of the opinion that the court erred in making the modification. The evidence, as certified, is very meager as to the interest of C. H. Clark, if any, in the sawmill and its operation, and there is no evidence that M. W. Clark had any control over the operation of the mill, or was "interested in the proceeds of the business."

The case was tried on the third count of the declaration only. The other counts were stricken out on demurrer, and the ruling of the trial court thereon is not assigned as cross-error.

For the errors aforesaid, the judgment of the trial court must be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the defendants' demurrer to the third count of the declaration sustained, but with liberty to the plaintiff to amend his declaration if he shall so desire.

Reversed.

KEISTER'S EX'RS v. PHILIPS' EX'X.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 13, 1919.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶1039(10)—HARMLESS ERROR—BILL OF PARTICULARS.

In a suit on a note, error, if any, in denying defendant's motion based upon Code 1904, § 3249, for a bill of particulars stating the consideration, was harmless, where defendant's allegation that the note was given for stock in a corporation was admitted by plaintiff upon the trial.

2. PLEADING ¶816—DISCRETION OF COURT—FILING BILL OF PARTICULARS.

A motion to file a bill of particulars is addressed to the court's discretion and should be sustained, where the pleadings are not so drawn as to give the defendant a proper notice of the particulars of the claim.

3. EVIDENCE ¶271(5)—SELF-SERVING DECLARATIONS TO ATTORNEY.

Testimony by an attorney, in a suit on a note, that the payee, after the date of an alleged receipt indicating payment, sent him the note for collection, was not a self-serving declaration by the payee, but explained the attorney's possession of the note and tended to prove his principal's ownership.

4. EVIDENCE ¶123(1)—RES GESTÆ—STATEMENTS AS TO OWNERSHIP.

Testimony, by an agent of the payee, that, after the date of an alleged receipt indicating payment, the note was sent him for collection, if considered a declaration by the payee, was admissible in evidence, upon the issue of ownership, as part of the res gestæ.

5. PLEADING ¶299—VERIFICATION—FILING OF AFFIDAVIT—TIME.

In an action on a note permitting plaintiff during the trial to file an affidavit under Code 1904, § 3279, denying the genuineness of a signature to an alleged receipt, was not error; the court having a large discretion as to the time of filing such an affidavit.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶960(1)—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF COURT—FILING OF PLEADINGS.

Action of the trial court in exercising its discretion as to the time of filing and perfecting pleadings will not be reviewed unless clearly erroneous.

7. EVIDENCE ¶197—HANDWRITING—COMPARISON BY JURY.

In view of Code 1904, § 3388, permitting juries to take all documents introduced in evidence with them into the jury room, in an action on a note, in which the payee's signature to a receipt was disputed, specimens of the payee's handwriting, proved to be genuine, were properly received in evidence for comparison by the jury, without aid of expert testimony.

8. TRIAL ¶234(7)—INSTRUCTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Instruction that the burden of proving payment of the note sued upon rested upon the defendants held not erroneous as relieving plaintiff of the burden resting on him, defendants having pleaded payment.

9. PAYMENT ¶74(4)—RECEIPT—NOTE—AFFIDAVIT AS TO GENUINENESS.

A receipt is not prima facie evidence of payment of note, where the genuineness of the receipt is denied by affidavit.

Error to Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Suit by Mary E. Phillips, executrix of W. H. Phillips, deceased, against M. L. Keister and another, executors of Z. E. Keister, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants bring error. Affirmed.

E. R. F. Wells, of Norfolk, for plaintiffs in error.

Edward R. Baird, Jr., of Norfolk, for defendant in error.

PRENTIS, J. M. L. Keister and D. E. Keister, executors of the last will and testament of Z. E. Keister, deceased (defendants) complain of a verdict and judgment in favor of Mary E. Phillips, executrix of the last will and testament of W. H. Phillips, deceased (plaintiff).

The plaintiff's action is based upon a note for $500, made by Z. E. Keister, payable to her testator, W. H. Phillips. The defendants pleaded the general issue and filed a special plea alleging that on July 16, 1916, their testator, Z. E. Keister, had paid to W. H. Phillips, the payee of the note, $500 in part payment thereof, and that Phillips had signed and delivered to Keister a receipt in writing for that sum; and they paid into court a small balance admitted to be due.

[1, 2] 1. The first error alleged is that the court refused to require the plaintiff to file a bill of particulars stating the consideration of the note, basing their motion upon section 3249 of the Code. Such a motion is addressed to the sound discretion of the court and should be sustained in cases where the notice, declaration, or other pleading is so drawn as not to give the defendant proper notice of the particulars of the claim. Driver v. Southern Ry. Co., 108 Va. 654, 49 S. E. 1000. In this case the error, if error it was, is clearly harmless, because the plaintiff's case was based upon a negotiable note, and the only reason alleged for desiring a bill of particulars was in order to have the plaintiff state the consideration for which the note was given. Upon the trial the plaintiff admitted that it was given for stock in the Campostella Heights Company, as alleged by the defendants. So that there was no surprise, and no good purpose would have been accomplished by having such a bill of particulars.

[3, 4] 2. It is alleged that the court erred in permitting the witness McCoy, an attorney, to testify that W. H. Philips, after the date of the alleged receipt, sent the note to him for collection. It is claimed that this evidence should have been excluded upon the same ground that the self-serving declarations of Philips would have been excluded, and that it was tantamount to admitting Philips' statement to the effect that the debt had not been paid.

We cannot agree with this suggestion. The fact testified to was not a declaration of Philips, but was a fact explaining the attorney's possession of the note, and tending to prove his principal's ownership. Even if considered a declaration by Philips that the note belonged to him at that time, it is admissible, for declarations and conduct as to the ownership of property, made by a person in possession thereof, are generally admissible in evidence upon an issue as to such ownership as part of the res gestæ, 10 R. C. L. 984.

[5, 9] 3. It is alleged that the court committed error in allowing the plaintiff during the trial to file an affidavit denying the signature to the receipt, and in this way to put in issue the genuineness of that signature. The defendants relied upon section 3279 of the Code, reading thus:

"Where a bill, declaration, or other pleading alleges that any person made, indorsed, assigned, or accepted any writing, no proof of the fact alleged shall be required, unless an affidavit be filed with the pleading putting it in issue, denying that such indorsement, assignment, acceptance, or other writing was made by the person charged therewith, or by any one thereto authorized by him"

—and objected to any evidence denying the genuineness of the signature to the receipt. Their objection was properly sustained. Then upon motion of the plaintiff she was permitted to file an affidavit denying the genuineness of such signature. We have no doubt whatever of the correctness of this ruling. Trial courts have a very large discretion as to the time of filing and perfecting pleadings, which this court will not review unless such action is clearly erroneous and harmful. Whitley v. Booker Brick Co., 118 Va. 434, 74 S. E. 160; Dean v. Dean, 122 Va. 513, 95 S. E. 431.

[7] 4. The court allowed various specimens of the handwriting and signature of W. H. Philips upon checks and letters, proved to be genuine, to be introduced for the purpose of comparison by the jury, and this is also alleged to be erroneous. This question has been the subject of much discussion and of many statutes, and formerly there was the greatest contrariety of decision. In this state, in the case of Hanriot v. Sherwood, 82 Va. 1, this court, discrediting Rowt's Adm'x v. Kile's Adm'r, 1 Leigh (28 Va.) 216, and Burress v. Commonwealth, 27 Grat. (68 Va.) 934, held that expert testimony can be received by the jury to test by comparison disputed handwriting with other writings admitted or proved to be genuine; and this later ruling is followed in Johnson's Case, 102 Va. 927, 46 S. E. 789. The precise question, however, here is whether the jury, without the aid of expert testimony, may make such comparison. The multitudinous decisions on the subject are collected in a note to University of Illinois v. Spalding, 62 L. R. A. 817, and it is there said, on page 867, that—

"Comparison by the jury is allowed, it has been seen, in every jurisdiction except North Carolina and Louisiana; the exclusion of this kind of proof in North Carolina being in accordance with a supposed common-law rule refusing the jury permission to see written documents in the case; and in Louisiana owing to a statute limiting comparison to experts appointed by the court, according to the civil-law rule."

It is noted, in passing, that the reason for the rule prevailing in North Carolina does not apply in Virginia because of the statute (Code, § 3388) expressly permitting juries in this state to take all documents introduced in evidence with them to the jury room. The former rule has been repudiated in most, if not all, jurisdictions, and it is now generally held that such comparison of the writings is a rational method of investigation; that similarities and dissimilarities thus disclosed are of probative value; and that it is as satisfactory in the search for truth as any other method yet pursued. Indeed, it is difficult to understand why there should ever have been any doubt about it. Mr. Justice Coleridge, in Doe v. Suckermore, 7 A. & E. 706, suggests as an objection that "the English law has no provisions for regulating the manner of conducting the inquiry," and, as Mr. Wigmore so pungently says, this objection "illustrates that perverse disposition of the Anglo-Saxon judge—the despair of the jurist—to tie his own hands in the administration of justice; to deny himself, by a submission to self-created bonds, that power of helping the good and preventing the bad which an untechnical common sense would never hesitate to exerdise." 3 Wigmore on Ev. § 2000. The modern rule which is fully approved by this court is well stated in 10 R. C. L. p. 994.

We have no doubt whatever that genuine specimens of handwriting or the signature of the person whose handwriting is involved in the issue to be determined may be introduced, subject to proper control by the judge, and that, without the testimony of experts, such specimens may be subjected to comparison with the disputed writing by the jury. There should, of course, be no doubt whatever as to the genuineness of the specimens offered for such comparison.

Rowt's Adm'r v. Kile's Adm'r, supra, and Burress v. Commonwealth, supra, on this point are overruled.

[8] 5. It is alleged that the court erred in granting the instruction No. 1, reading thus:

"The court instructs the jury that the burden of proving payment on the note sued on is upon the defendants, and, unless they believe from the preponderance of the evidence that said note has been paid, they should find for the plaintiff."

It is claimed that the vice of this instruction is that it relieves the plaintiff of the burden, which always rests upon him throughout the trial, to prove his case by a preponderance of the evidence. While, of course, this burden never shifts and the instruction should have been more carefully drawn, we find no substantial objection to it. The possession and production of the note by the plaintiff, without other evidence, was sufficient to prove his case, and, the defendants having pleaded payment, the burden of proving such payment was upon the defendants. This is all the court intended to say to the jury, and there is no reason to doubt that they understood it.

[9] 6. It is also alleged that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that the receipt introduced in evidence is prima facie evidence of payment. No authority is cited for this proposition, and we think it unsound. The genuineness of the receipt had been denied by the affidavit filed by the plaintiff, as is above stated, and this shifted the burden to the defendants to prove the fact of payment. If genuine, the receipt was convincing evidence thereof, and, if a forgery, was unworthy of credit.

SMITH v. HOLLAND et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 13, 1919.)

1. EXEMPTIONS ¶119(1) — TIME FOR MAKING CLAIM—"SUBJECTED."

Where a creditor levied execution against property and other creditors entered into the controversy claiming prior liens, and there was a decree settling the priorities, which became final at adjournment of term of court, the property was "subjected" under a decree within meaning of Code 1904, § 3842, and judgment debtor could not set apart his homestead.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Subject.]

2. EXEMPTIONS ¶119(1)—TIME FOR MAKING CLAIM.

Where execution was levied against judgment debtor's property and other creditors entered into controversy which lasted for some time, and a decree was entered disposing of the property between the creditors, the decree, which became final after adjournment of term of court, precluded judgment debtor from thereafter setting apart his homestead.

3. JUDGMENT ¶713(2) — RES JUDICATA — MATTERS THAT MIGHT HAVE BEEN LITIGATED.

The effect of a final decree is not only to conclude parties as to every question actually raised and decided, but every claim which properly belonged to subject of litigation which parties in exercise of reasonable diligence might have raised at time.

4. JUDGMENT ¶650 — CONCLUSIVENESS — FINAL JUDGMENT.

A decree is final so as to conclude parties as to issues decided, where no further action is necessary except such as might be used to enforce the decree.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Northampton County.

Suits by Clarence W. Holland against William G. Smith, and by the latter and others against the former, which were heard together. From a decree refusing to grant his petition, praying that certain moneys be paid over to him as a part of his homestead exemption, William G. Smith appeals. Affirmed.

J. Brooks Mapp, of Accomack, for appellant.
Stanley Scott, of Eastville, and Jas. E. Heth, of Norfolk, for appellees.

PRENTIS, J. William G. Smith, who appears to have been largely indebted to persons from whom he rented lands, and to others who had made advances to him which were secured by crop liens, on June 30, 1916, conveyed the unsevered crops, on three farms rented and cultivated by him, to a trustee for the benefit of a number of other creditors. Among those other creditors was the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Cape Charles, Va.

Clarence W. Holland had, on November 10, 1908, recovered a judgment against Smith for $730, with interest, and upon that judgment had issued an execution on June 1, 1916, under which there had been a levy upon Smith's property. Under this state of facts, Holland brought a chancery suit against his debtor, claiming a lien in his favor on the unsevered crops, and the trustee and certain of the other creditors who alleged that their liens were superior to that of Holland also instituted a suit against Holland and the sheriff of Northampton county, praying for an injunction to prevent the levying upon or subjecting any of the severed or unsevered crops. The injunction was refused, but the attorneys for the opposing interests were appointed receivers to take possession of and to market the crops. The two suits were thereafter heard together. The receivers, acting under the decrees of the court, converted the crops into money, and all of the fund has been distributed under the decrees of the court except the residue thereof now here in controversy. That fund is the sum of $569.96, which represents the dividend assigned to, and which but for this litigation would have been paid upon the debt of the bank. Holland claimed a lien under his execution superior to the lien of the bank under the deed of trust, because he alleged that the bank had notice of his execution. He sustained this claim, and showed that the bank had been served with garnishee process on the 24th day of June, 1916, which was prior to the date of the deed of trust, June 30, 1916, under which the bank claimed. The court, therefore, on November 21, 1917, decreed that this amount, which would otherwise have been paid to the bank, should be paid to Holland, the execution creditor. The same decree directs the payment of all of the costs of the suit, and disposes of the entire fund in the hands of the receivers. After this, on the 14th day of December, 1917, Smith filed a homestead deed, claiming the amount so decreed to be paid to Holland as a part of his homestead exemption, and thereafter, at a subsequent term of court on March 22, 1918, filed his petition in the chancery causes referred to, praying that it be paid over to him as a part of his homestead. The court, over the objection of Holland, permitted the filing of this petition, but refused to grant its prayer, and dismissed it. Of this ruling Smith is here complaining.

[1-3] In the view which we take of the case, the question presented is single and narrow. The statute, section 3642, permits a householder to set apart his homestead "at any time before the same is subjected by sale or otherwise under judgment, decree, order, execution, or other legal process." So that we have only to determine whether the fund here involved had been "subjected" within the true intent and meaning of that statute before the execution of the homestead deed. As to this we have no doubt. The litigation had been pending for some time, and Smith was a party to it. While he had waived his homestead exemption as to the debt of the bank, and had not waived it as to Holland's debt, at the same time he knew of the controversy, and must be deemed to have known that the question might be decided in Holland's favor. When it was thus decided, he doubtless then could have claimed the fund as a part of his homestead at any time before that decree became final; that is, before the adjournment of that term of court. Having failed to exercise this privilege, he is concluded by that decree, not only because the fund had been subjected thereby, but because it was a final decree settling every controversy which had arisen in the cause. The effect of a final decree is not only to conclude the parties as to every question actually raised and decided, but as to every claim which properly belonged to the subject of litigation, and which the parties, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, might have raised at the time. Diamond State Iron Co. v. Rarig, 93 Va. 595, 25 S. E. 894; Miller v. Smith, 109 Va. 651, 64 S. E. 956.

[4] No further action of the court in this cause was necessary. If any further action had been necessary, it would not be in the cause, but beyond it; that is, in order to enforce the decree. The necessity for such further action does not prevent the decree from being final. Rawlings v. Rawlings, 75 Va. 76; Jones v. Buckingham Slate Co., 116 Va. 120, 81 S. E. 28. We are therefore of opinion that the question has been correctly determined.

BERNARD-SMITH CO. et al. v. BERNARD.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR §843(2)—REVIEW—MATTERS NOT AFFECTING MERITS.

Where, under undisputed facts, defendants clearly failed to establish their defense so that plaintiff was entitled to recover in any event, defendant's criticisms of instructions given at plaintiff's request need not be considered.

2. CORPORATIONS §121(5)—MISREPRESENTATION IN PROCUREMENT—EVIDENCE.

In action on note drawn by corporation, indorsed by stockholders, and given to manager as part consideration for his stock, in which defendants set up misrepresentation and failure of consideration, a defense under Negotiable Instruments Law, § 28, evidence held insufficient to show that defendants were misled to their damage by statement made by manager at annual meeting as to resources and liabilities of corporation.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Lynchburg.

Proceedings by S. M. Bernard against the Bernard-Smith Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Harrison & Long, of Lynchburg, for plaintiffs in error.

Caskie & Caskie, of Lynchburg, and S. W. Williams, of Roanoke, for defendant in error.

PRENTIS, J. This is a proceeding by motion on a note drawn by the Bernard-Smith Company, payable with interest to J. B. Bernard, and indorsed by J. R. Muse and others, stockholders of the company, and by the payee, J. B. Bernard, who assigned it after maturity to S. M. Bernard, the plaintiff, who took it, therefore, subject to all of the equities between the original parties.

The defendants (except J. B. Bernard) pleaded the general issue, and as grounds of defense allege misrepresentations in the procurement of the note sued on, and failure of consideration, making the defense authorized by section 28 of the Negotiable Instruments Act (Acts 1897-98, c. 866), which provides that—

"Absence or failure of consideration is matter of defense as against any person not a holder in due course; and partial failure of consideration is a defense pro tanto, whether the failure is an ascertained or liquidated amount, or otherwise."

The consideration of the note was one-half of the purchase price of 125 shares of the stock of the Bernard-Smith Company, of the par value of $12,500, which was purchased for the corporation by the other stockholders for $6,250—that is, 50 cents on the dollar—of which one half was paid in cash and the other half is represented by this note. There was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $3,125, subject to a credit of $675.

[1] The defendants complain of three instructions given by the court at the request of the plaintiff. While it may be true that some of the criticisms of these three instructions are justified, still, in the view which we take of the case, it is unnecessary to consider or discuss these alleged errors, because we think that, upon the undisputed facts of the case, the defendants clearly failed to establish the defense set up by them, so that upon proper instructions the plaintiff was entitled to recover in any event.

[2] The pertinent facts, as we understand them, omitting many details which do not affect our conclusion, are that J. B. Bernard, who owned $12,500 out of a total of $23,000 of the capital stock of the company, and had been the active manager thereof for 12 months, made a statement of the resources and liabilities of the company to the stockholders at their annual meeting February 11, 1913. The entire defense is based upon this statement, and it is shown that there were several material errors in it. It further appears, however, that the other stockholders had been long dissatisfied with the management and progress of the business, and frankly discredited the statement. They clearly desired to eject Bernard from the management. At this meeting, although the statement indicated a surplus of $1,794.11, they suggested a receivership or an assignment, and to this Bernard replied that he would rather sell his stock at 50 cents on the dollar than to accept this suggestion. Certain of the discrepancies were then pointed out in the statement, all of the books and papers on which Bernard had made it up were exhibited to the stockholders, and there was general dissatisfaction and failure to agree as to a future policy. This meeting adjourned without any action. There were two other meetings during the month of February, but no action taken for a settlement of their differences, except that Muse, the president, and Bernard were appointed a committee to secure another manager. Bernard, however, made no effort to do so. During this time Bernard offered, either to buy the remainder of the stock, or to sell all of his stock, at 50 cents on the dollar; but the other stockholders declined to do either. After the third meeting had adjourned without definite action, Bernard agreed with Muse to buy his 25 shares of stock at 60 cents on the dollar. After this and when Muse had gone to take a train, the other stockholders, at night, went to the house of J. B. Bernard and proposed to him to accept his proposition to buy his stock at 50 cents on the dollar. He replied informing them that he had just bought out Muse at 60 cents on the dollar, and that he could not consider their proposition unless Muse would release him from his contract. They then sought Muse at the station and induced him to release Bernard, and then, on the next day, Bernard sold his stock for the consideration above stated. There is no indication in the evidence that Bernard was anxious to sell, or sought to make the sale. Shortly after the defendants had taken charge of the business, they made a statement to a mercantile agency, showing that the capital stock of the company was unimpaired. They also employed an expert accountant to examine the books of the company; but they failed to produce this accountant as a witness at the trial, or to show the results of his investigation. They took charge of the business, and at the time of the last trial, three years after the transaction, the corporation was still a going concern.

The defendants' case is based upon the claim that they were misled to their damage by the statement of resources and liabilities above referred to; but, in our opinion, the evidence falls to sustain this defense, and it is perfectly clear from the evidence that the defendants did not rely upon this statement, discredited it from the beginning, and made such investigation as they desired before the transaction was consummated, and subsequently thereto made a complete investigation into the affairs of the company, the results of which latter investigation they do not disclose. The burden was upon them to establish the defense set up, and they have utterly failed to do so.

Affirmed.

SOUTH NORFOLK LAND CO. et al. v. TEBAUT et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 13, 1919.)

1. CORPORATIONS §189(1/2)—ACTION BY MINORITY STOCKHOLDERS—NATURE OF ACTION.

Minority stockholders' bill, against the corporation and majority stockholders, to enforce collection of debts due the corporation and charging management of corporation in the interest of the president, diversion of corporate funds, and refusal to hold regular and necessary meetings of stockholders and directors, is not an action for dissolution of a corporation, under Code 1904, § 1105a, par. 15, and is not demurrable for failure to state facts bringing action within such statute.

2. CORPORATIONS §189(10)—RIGHTS OF MINORITY STOCKHOLDERS—ACTION—RECEIVER.

Where corporation has been successfully managed, big dividends have been paid, and the assets have greatly increased in value, the business of the corporation will not be placed in the hands of a receiver on application of minority stockholders, who have been deprived of participation in the management of the corporation, but court will retain jurisdiction of the case, with leave to minority stockholders to apply for relief, if necessary.

3. CORPORATIONS §189(14)—ACTION BY MINORITY STOCKHOLDERS—COSTS.

Where minority stockholders' action against corporation and majority stockholders was made necessary by the misconduct of the president in refusing to permit minority stockholders to participate in the affairs of the corporation, the costs of the action were rightly awarded against president.

4. COSTS §237 — APPEAL — REVERSAL IN PART.

In minority stockholders' action against corporation, where injunction stopping the company's business is dissolved on appeal, but jurisdiction of the case is retained by the court, so that minority stockholders can apply for relief, if necessary, the costs on appeal will be taxed against the corporation and paid out of its assets.

WHITTLE, P. This suit was brought by Jennie T. Tebault and others, minority stockholders of the South Norfolk Land Company (a domestic corporation organized and chartered to acquire a certain boundary of land in South Norfolk, to be subdivided into lots for sale), against the company and the majority stockholders.

The bill sets forth in outline the history and formation of the corporation, and was filed to enforce the collection of debts due to the company, alleging that the stockholders and a majority of the board of directors had refused to authorize a suit for that purpose. It alleges that the corporation is practically managed and dominated by T. H. Synon, the president, who owns and controls the majority stock, and that it is being run in his interest. It charges delinquencies of both commission and omission on his part, which manifest a disregard of the rights and wishes of the minority in many particulars, such as withholding from them information affecting their interests, the diversion of corporate funds, and the neglect or refusal to hold regular and necessary meetings of the stockholders and board of directors, and that when such meetings are held the rights and recommendations of the minority are ignored. The prayer of the bill is for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the assets and business of the company, for an audit of the accounts of the officers, the ascertainment of debts due, especially from T. H. Synon, as president and administrator of the estate of his deceased wife, M. Denver Synon, late treasurer of the company, including all moneys received or that should have been received by them, and what disposition has been made of the same; that the court will wind up the affairs of the company, and take charge of its assets, and distribute them amongst those entitled; and, finally, for general and special relief.

The defendants filed a demurrer and answers to the bill. The demurrer was overruled and the case referred to a commissioner in chancery, to make certain inquiries and take certain accounts along the line of and in accordance with the allegations and prayer of the bill. The ground of demurrer that was chiefly stressed is that the facts charged do not bring the case within the provisions of section 1105a, par. 15, Va. Code 1904. This contention indicates a misapprehension of the scope and objects of the bill. It was not brought under section 1105a, supra, for the purpose of dissolving the corporation, nor are the facts alleged therein sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs to invoke that statutory remedy. This plainly appears from the foregoing statement of the case, read in connection with the opinion of this court in Radford, etc., & Co. v. Cowan, 101 Va. 632, 44 S. E. 753.

In the syllabus to the case of Camden v. Va. Safe Deposit Corp., 115 Va. 20, 78 S. E. 596 (which is a correct epitome of the decision), it is said:

"A bill filed by directors of a corporation, who are also stockholders, for the sole purpose of collecting its assets and distributing them equitably amongst those entitled, is in no sense a bill to wind up the corporation. The result may be the application of all the assets of the corporation to the discharge of its liabilities, and its consequent inability to continue business, but neither insolvency nor the appointment of a receiver operates a dissolution of the corporation. * * *

[1] The instant case comes within the influence of that decision, and is an appeal to the general equity jurisdiction of the court, and, consequently, the demurrer was rightly overruled.

On the merits, the record discloses no great conflict in the evidence upon the essential issues of the case. The special grievance of appellants is to that part of the decree which adopts the views of the commissioner with respect to the character and measure of relief to which the appellees are entitled. The plan proposed by the commissioner was suggested by and adopted from the decision of the Vice Chancellor in an analogous case of Fougeray v. Cord, 50 N. J. Eq. 185, 24 Atl. 499. In that case the Vice Chancellor advised a decree to ascertain and set off to appellees (the minority stockholders), by way of final dividend, their proportionate share (based on stock holdings) of the unsold lots, and the turning over of their stock to the majority stockholders. In other words, the decree operated a partition of the real estate of the company between the majority and minority stockholders. The facts of that case appealed much more strongly to the Vice Chancellor to grant the extreme relief accorded than do the facts of the case in judgment. In the former, the majority stockholders were systematically robbing their associates; the Vice Chancellor characterizing the whole transaction as "a piece of gross and bungling thievery." The situation in the case before us is essentially different. Here the original investment was $30,000, and the company, under the judicious and economical management of Synon, has already paid the stockholders $48,295, and it still owns 192 lots, of the estimated value of $80,000. Obviously, the machinery of the corporation and the good will and co-operation of all the stockholders is essential to the successful sale of the remaining lots. The commissioner's report, which is sustained by the evidence, shows that Synon "is not to be charged in any sense with dishonesty or fraud," and the phenomenal success of the company demonstrates his capacity, under proper restrictions, to manage its affairs.

"The head and front of his offending hath this extent, no more." In the language of the commissioner: "He had an exaggerated idea of the rights of the majority stockholders in a corporation and of their duties toward the minority interests." There is no question but that Synon carried this obsession to the indefensible length of stifling the voice of the minority in their participation in the management of the company's affairs. Nevertheless, the circumstances of the case do not call for the drastic remedy applied in the decree under review. Plainly, its affirmation would operate to the injury of all concerned. It is furthermore proper to observe that, on appeal to the Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey (Laurel Springs Land Co. v. Fougeray, 50 N. J. Eq. 756, 26 Atl. 886), the decree of the Vice Chancellor in the case of Fougeray v. Cord, supra, in the particular we are discussing, was reversed. The appellate court, with clearness and precision, defines the rights of minority stockholders, and says:

"So much of it [the decree] as * * * directs a transfer to the complainant of a part of its net assets, and a conveyance to him in fee of one-third of the unsold real estate, must be reversed. * * *

And in order that the matter might remain under the scrutiny and control of the court, it was held that the case, when remanded, should be retained, with leave to the complainant to apply to the court for relief in the premises, if it should become necessary for him to do so.

[2] The wisdom of the conclusion reached by the Court of Errors and Appeals commends itself to our judgment, and accords with our view in the instant case on the main proposition, and therefore will be followed. The injunction stopping the company's business, which is continued in force until the further order of the court, should be dissolved.

The remaining assignments of error are without merit and do not demand special notice.

[3, 4] The litigation was rendered necessary by the misconduct of T. H. Synon, and the costs accruing to the date of the decree appealed from were rightly awarded against him; but all subsequent costs, including the costs of this appeal, should be taxed against the company and paid out of its assets.

Upon the whole case, we are of the opinion that the decree appealed from, so far as it directs that a proportion of the assets of the company in kind be set apart to appellees jointly, and further directs that the injunction granted on July 27, 1917, be continued in force until the further order of the court, is erroneous, and must be reversed and annulled, and in all other respects is without error, and is affirmed. And the case will be remanded to the court of law and chancery of the city of Norfolk for further proceedings to be had therein, not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed in part and affirmed in part.

VIRGINIA TALC & SOAPSTONE CO., Inc.,
v. HURKAMP.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 18, 1919.)

1. WORK AND LABOR §24(1) — ISSUES, PROOF AND VARIANCE.

In assumpsit, though declaration contained only common counts, plaintiff was entitled to recover upon proof of a special, unbreached, fully executed contract calling for the payment of money as compensation for services to be performed.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR §1002—CONCLUSION BASED ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

Question of fact having been concluded against defendant by verdict based on conflicting evidence, court on appeal cannot disturb conclusion.

3. EVIDENCE §116—EXPLANATORY STATEMENTS—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where plaintiff, without objection, gave a narrative of his connections with defendant company, and stated that he had an agreement with defendant's president by which plaintiff was to be paid $300 a month for a year, but that he had accepted $1,600 in full for the first eight months, his further testimony as to how it was that he accepted $1,600 was relevant, to clarify his narrative.

4. WITNESSES §383 — IMPEACHMENT — CONTRADICTORY STATEMENTS.

Where defendant's president, on examination in chief, had testified that he had not made contract of employment, and on cross-examination denied that he had stated to impeaching witness that he had made the contract, this was not collateral or immaterial, but a matter directly in issue, and testimony of impeaching witness that president had made a statement, in conflict with testimony, was admissible.

5. TRIAL §251(2)—INSTRUCTION ON MATTERS NOT IN ISSUE.

Where services of plaintiff as secretary or director of defendant corporation were not alleged as a basis of recovery, or recovery sought for services performed by plaintiff as secretary or director, an instruction with reference thereto was properly refused.

6. WORK AND LABOR §9—EFFECT OF EXPRESS CONTRACT.

Where there is special contract, which has not been breached by either party during period covered by it, its provisions measure quantum of services to be performed by employé.

7. MASTER AND SERVANT §38—WRONGFUL DISCHARGE—RIGHTS OF SERVANT.

When contract of hiring is breached by discharge of person employed, latter cannot recover his hire or wages for whole original contract period, merely by continuing to perform services originally required thereby; right of action in such case being for damages for breach of contract.

8. MASTER AND SERVANT §42(1)—WRONGFUL DISCHARGE—MINIMIZING DAMAGES.

When contract of hiring is breached by discharge of employé, contract is at an end, and employé must minimize damages by doing all reasonably within his power to obtain employment elsewhere.

Error to Corporation Court of Fredericksburg.

Assumpsit by Charles H. Hurkamp against the Virginia Talc & Soapstone Company, Incorporated. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

This is an action of assumpsit, brought by the defendant in error, as plaintiff, against the plaintiff in error, to recover $4,000 of indebtedness of the latter to the former, alleged as existing as of June 30, 1915.

The declaration contains only the common counts. It does not declare specially upon any contract.

There is ample evidence for the plaintiff, however, in the record, to have warranted the jury in finding that Haas, the president of the defendant company, was authorized by it to employ the plaintiff, Hurkamp, as general manager for the period from July 1, 1914, to June 30, 1915, inclusive, and to bind the company to pay Hurkamp such an amount as such salary as the president and Hurkamp might agree upon; that such two parties did agree upon the sum of $3,500 as the amount of such salary which the company should pay for the services of Hurkamp as general manager for the period aforesaid; that Hurkamp was not discharged by the company from such employment during such periods; and that Hurkamp continued in such employment of the company during the whole of such period and fully performed the contract on his part, by doing all of the work he was obligated to do thereunder. Such evidence consists for the most part of the testimony of the plaintiff, Hurkamp.

There was evidence for the company in conflict with that above mentioned, consisting for the most part of the testimony of the said president and certain letters of the plaintiff, in which he did not make it plain that he claimed, prior to the bringing of his action, that there had been the express contract of hiring aforesaid.

In the progress of the trial there were two exceptions to the admission of testimony for the plaintiff, which are made the basis of assignments of error.

(a) The first of these admissions of testimony, over the objection of the company, will appear from the following questions and answers in the examination in chief of the plaintiff, Hurkamp:

"25Q. State to the jury how it was that you accepted the $1,600 for the period beginning November 1, 1913, to July 1, 1914. * * *

"A. Well, the company was hard up all the time; that is, it was hard to get money from them. I had different talks with Haas, occasionally with Buckingham, treasurer of the company, who practically conferred with Haas, and they said they were taking nothing out of it; couldn't I take less; that after a while they would make it up to me, and on the promises they made I scaled it from $300 to $200.

"27Q. To $200?

"A. Yes, sir."

(b) The second of these admissions of testimony, over the objection of the company, consisted of the admission of the testimony of a witness for the plaintiff, after due foundation had been laid therefor, to the effect that the president of the company, in July, 1914, made a statement to the witness in conflict with the testimony of such president that he had not made the contract of employment as claimed in the testimony of the plaintiff.

The court instructed the jury that they could consider such testimony only in connection with the purpose of the plaintiff to impeach the said president as a witness, "and for no other purpose whatever."

The instructions further clearly submitted to the jury the questions of fact referred to in the third and fourth paragraphs of the statement above.

The jury found a verdict for the sum of $3,500, which the trial court declined to disturb, and it entered the judgment under review accordingly.

A. T. Embrey, of Fredericksburg, for plaintiff in error.

Wm. K. Goolrick and C. O'Connor Goolrick, both of Fredericksburg, for defendant in error.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

The assignments of error raise the questions which will be passed upon in their order as stated below.

[1] 1. The action being one of assumpsit, the declaration containing no count declaring on a special contract, and the proof disclosing a special contract, but one which was not breached by either party thereto during the period covered thereby and one fully executed by the plaintiff, so as to entitle him to demand payment of the compensation fixed by the contract for the work done by him under it, and the contract calling for the payment of money by the defendant as such compensation, is the plaintiff entitled to recover on such a contract upon such a declaration?

The question must be answered in the affirmative.

It is true that the general rule is that an action of assumpsit, in which the declaration contains only the general counts, cannot be maintained on a special contract. But when "the claim is merely pecuniary, and is founded on a consideration past or executed, it is sufficient to declare upon the general, or, as they are often styled, the common, counts. * * *

4 Minor's Inst. (3d Ed.) pt. 1, p. 695. To the same effect are Burk's Pleading, pp. 132, 133, 4 Cyc. 328, and authorities cited by these works. See B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Polly, 55 Va. (14 Grat.) 447.

[2] Indeed, we do not understand that this well-settled proposition is disputed by the plaintiff in error. It is its contention, first, that no special contract of hiring existed; secondly, that the contract, if any, was an implied one, arising from a short continuance of service of the plaintiff after the expiration of a former service and that the plaintiff was discharged from such continuing service when it had existed only eight days; that plaintiff rendered little, if any, service to the defendant thereafter; and that for such service the plaintiff can recover, if at all, only upon proof of the value of such service. This position would be sound in law, upon the same authorities as are above cited, if correct in fact. The question of fact has been concluded against the defendant, however, by the verdict of the jury upon conflicting evidence, as outlined in the statement preceding this opinion. Under the familiar statutory rule governing our consideration of the evidence, we cannot disturb that conclusion.

[3] 2. Did the court below err in admitting the testimony of the plaintiff set forth in paragraph (a) of the statement preceding this opinion?

The objection of the defendant to the admission of such testimony was that it was irrelevant to the issue and that it tended to the prejudice of the defendant, and hence such action of the trial court is assigned as reversible error.

The witness, in his preceding testimony on examination in chief, had, without objection on the part of the defendant given a narrative of his connection with the company from its organization in 1912, in the course of which he had testified that he had an agreement with Mr. Haas, the president of the defendant company, by which plaintiff was to be paid, as general manager, $300 per month for the period from November 1, 1913, to November 1, 1914, but that he was actually paid only an aggregate of $1,275 or $1,280 of this salary by July 1, 1914, and that he was paid a balance of $325 or $320 in the fall of 1914, making $1,600, which he accepted in full of salary to July 1, 1914. He was then asked the questions and made the answers objected to as aforesaid.

We are of opinion that such testimony was relevant to clarify and make definitely understood his narrative of his prior dealings with the defendant, which was already in testimony unobjected to, and that the particular subject of these questions was material to an understanding of the testimony bearing on the direct issue in the case.

Hence we find no error in the action of the trial court in admitting such testimony.

[4] 3. Was there error in the action of the trial court in admitting the impeaching testimony referred to in paragraph (b) of the statement preceding the opinion?

The witness Haas, sought to be impeached, had on examination in chief testified that he had not made the contract of employment of the plaintiff as per the testimony of the latter. Thereupon, on cross-examination, Haas was asked, in substance, if he had on a certain occasion, etc., stated to the impeaching witness that he had made such contract.

The fact about which Haas was being cross-examined was the making of the contract in question. This fact was not collateral or irrelevant, but directly in issue. Therefore, under the authority, cited for the plaintiff in error on this point, of B. & A. R. Co. v. Hudgins, 116 Va. 27, 81 S. E. 48, and Forde v. Commonwealth, 57 Va. (16 Grat.) 547, 556, therein quoted from, the impeaching testimony objected to was admissible.

It was not the fact as to whether Haas had made such contradictory statement, about which he was being cross-examined (as is urged in the petition of the plaintiff in error), but the fact as to whether he had made the contract of employment which Haas had denied making.

The sole remaining question for our determination, raised by the assignments of error, is the following:

[5] 4. Was there error in the refusal of the trial court to give the following instruction asked for by the defendant in error?

"(7) The court instructs the jury that plaintiff, Hurkamp, is not entitled to recover any money in this action for any services performed or alleged to have been performed by him, as secretary or director of defendant company, since by the by-laws of said company its officers and directors were to perform their duties as such without compensation, unless he devoted his whole time thereto."

This instruction was properly refused, because such a recovery was not in issue in the case. Such a recovery was not sought by any testimony for the defendant in error, nor were services of the plaintiff as secretary or director alleged in any way as the basis for such recovery. It was an instruction upon an immaterial issue, and could have served no purpose except to confuse the jury.

[8-8] This instruction was especially likely to confuse the jury, because of its reference to the matter of the devotion of plaintiff in error's "whole time," which defendant in error erroneously contended throughout the trial was essential to the plaintiff in error's right of recovery; the true rule being that where there is a special contract, which has not been breached by either party during the period covered by it, its provisions measure the quantum of services to be performed by the plaintiff, suing or recovering thereon, for he in such case recovers, not upon the basis of quantum meruit, but the contract price of his services, if he proves that he has fully performed the services required by the contract, be they much or little. B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Polly, 55 Va. (14 Grat.) 447. When a contract of hiring is breached by the discharge of the person employed, then, of course, the latter cannot recover his hire or wages for the whole original contract period, merely by continuing to perform the services originally required thereby, for the contract is then at an end; his right of action is, in such case, not upon the contract, but for damages for the breach of it, and he must minimize the damages by doing all reasonably within his power to obtain employment elsewhere. Such is the principle on which rest the cases of Willoughby v. Thomas, 65 Va. (24 Grat.) 521, Crescent Co. v. Eynon, 95 Va. 151, 27 S. E. 935, and other like authorities cited on this point for the defendant in error.

If there had been any evidence in the case tending to show that the plaintiff devoted his whole time to services as secretary or director of the company (which there was not), there was no claim on his part or evidence tending to show that this kind of service would have entitled him to any recovery.

On the whole, therefore, we find no error in the action of the trial court complained of, and the judgment under review will be Affirmed.

ATLANTIC COAST REALTY CO. v. TOWNSEND.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 13, 1919.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF §59(6)—INTEREST IN LAND—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT.

Agreement, whereby land broker was given exclusive contract to sell land for one year, in consideration of agreement to advance funds for development and subdivision of land into lots and parcels, and for advertisement of land, and whereby broker was to receive stipulated share of profits after owner had received specified amount of the proceeds of sales of the lots, was a contract of agency, and not a partnership agreement, and therefore not required to be in writing by Code 1904, § 2840, subd. 6.

2. CONTRACTS §152 — CONSTRUCTION—WORDS.

In construing contracts, words are to be given, primarily, their usual and ordinary meaning, unless a contrary meaning plainly appears.

3. CONTRACTS §147(1) — CONSTRUCTION—INTENT.

In construing contracts, the intention of the parties, if not contrary to law, must be carried out.

4. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT §36—REVOCATION—ACTS CONSTITUTING.

An agency is effectually revoked when the principal disposes of his interest in the subject-matter of the agency in a manner inconsistent with the authority conferred, as by assignment, conveyance, contract of sale, or otherwise.

5. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT §33—REVOCATION—RIGHT TO REVOKE.

Though principal has power to revoke authority, where agency is not coupled with an interest, and does not involve rights of third parties, he has no right to revocation, where contract of agency otherwise provides.

6. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT §41—WRONGFUL REVOCATION—LIABILITY.

Principal is liable in damages to agent for wrongful revocation.

7. BROKERS §7—LAND CONTRACT—CONSIDERATION.

Land broker's agreement to advance money for the development and subdivision into small tracts of the land to be sold was a valuable consideration for the exclusive right to sell the land for a period of one year.

8. BROKERS §10 — AGENCY COUPLED WITH AN INTEREST.

Agreement, whereby land broker was given the exclusive right to sell land for a period of one year, in consideration of the advancement of money wherewith to develop and advertise the land, and whereby broker was to have stipulated share of profits, after owner had received specified amount of proceeds of sale, was not an agency agreement so coupled with an interest as to make it irrevocable.

9. BROKERS §11 — LAND AGREEMENT—LIABILITY FOR BREACH.

Where land broker was given the exclusive right to sell land for a period of one year, in consideration of advancing funds wherewith to develop, subdivide, and advertise the land, and where broker was to receive a certain share of the profits after owner had received stipulated amount from the proceeds of the sales, neither party could violate the agreement without becoming responsible to the other for the breach.

10. COURTS §107 — JUDICIAL OPINIONS—CONSTRUCTION.

Judicial opinions must be interpreted in the light of the particular facts to which they are applied.

11. BROKERS §11—REVOCATION BY PRINCIPAL—LIABILITY TO AGENT.

Where broker is given the exclusive right of sale for a definite period by agreement based upon a valuable consideration, principal cannot break contract without becoming liable in damages to broker.

12. DAMAGES §23—CONTEMPLATED PROFITS.

Where contemplated profits constitute the sole purpose and object of the contract, and the plaintiff alleges a breach and a subsequent loss of profits, he has stated a prima facie case.

13. DAMAGES §40(2) — LOSS OF PROFITS—CERTAINTY.

When profits claimed may reasonably be presumed to have been within the intent and mutual contemplation of the parties when the contract was made, the mere fact that the exact amount cannot be calculated with mathematical certainty does not preclude a recovery.

14. DAMAGES §40(2)—LAND BROKER—LOSS OF PROFITS.

Where land brokerage concern of many years' experience and success in business secured exclusive right for a year to sell large tract of land, under agreement whereby land was to be divided into small lots and broker was to receive certain share of profits after owner had received specified amount out of proceeds of sale, owner cannot defeat broker's recovery of damages for breach of the contract, upon ground that the enterprise of selling the lots had not been established, and that damages therefor could not be measured, where owner himself had sold the property at a large profit over the minimum he was to receive under the brokerage contract.

15. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT §41—BREACH BY PRINCIPAL—RIGHTS OF BROKER.

A principal cannot, after making a valid contract with an agent for the exclusive right to sell, render performance on the part of the agent impossible by making the sale himself, and then successfully defend an action for breach of the contract by claiming that the agent might not have made the sale.

Error to Hustings Court of Petersburg.

Action by the Atlantic Coast Realty Company against J. M. Townsend, executor of Wirt Robertson, deceased. Judgment sustaining demurrer to declaration, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Lassiter & Drewry, of Petersburg, and Mann & Tyler, of Norfolk, for plaintiff in error.

Mann & Townsend, of Petersburg, and O. V. Meredith, of Richmond, for defendant in error.

KELLY, J. This writ of error calls in question a judgment of the hustings court of the city of Petersburg sustaining a demurrer to a declaration in an action of assumpsit, wherein the Atlantic Coast Realty Company was plaintiff and J. M. Townsend, executor of Wirt Robertson, deceased, was defendant.

The allegations of the declaration were as follows:

That the plaintiff had for many years been engaged in the business of selling tracts of land for customers, by first improving, developing, and subdividing the lands into building lots and small acreage parcels, so as to make the same more valuable and salable; that such sales were made by it, both at public auction and private sale, and upon contracts with the owners for the exclusive right to sell, and for compensation to be measured either by commissions or by a fixed portion of profits over and above an agreed valuation of the land to be sold; that the defendant's decedent, Wirt Robertson, was the owner of 418 acres of land, called the "Baker property," so situated as to be peculiarly well adapted to profitable subdivision and sale under plaintiff's method of making sales; that on September 9, 1915, "the said Wirt Robertson made a contract with the plaintiff through a certain W. E. Burke, who was then, and is now, one of the agents of said plaintiff, authorized and empowered by it to enter into contracts on its behalf; that the said Wirt Robertson in substance and effect stated that he was familiar with the methods of business of said plaintiff, that he had followed its recent sales made in the neighborhood of the said 'Baker property,' that he knew the said plaintiff had acquired an interest in another piece of land called the 'Buren property,' situated near the said 'Baker property,' and that he was afraid said plaintiff would subdivide and sell said 'Buren property' before he could organize a sale of the 'Baker property'; that he wanted the said plaintiff to acquire a pecuniary interest in the sale of the said 'Baker property,' so that it would be just as vitally interested therein as he was, that he was unwilling to spend any money for development purposes, and proposed that said plaintiff take the exclusive agency for the development, subdivision, and handling, together with the exclusive right to sell the said 'Baker property' at public auction and at private sale within 12 months thereafter, and in a manner similar to the way in which the plaintiff had handled the Battle Ground addition, which had been sold, as was known to said Robertson, in lots and parcels upon terms of one-fourth cash and the balance in 4, 8, and 12 months, with interest at 6 per cent., the title to the said property to remain in said Wirt Robertson, and to be conveyed by him direct to the purchasers; that it provide a valuable consideration for this exclusive right to sell, by agreeing to spend its own money for engineers, laborers, tools, teams, advertising, auctioneers, and other necessary purposes in that connection; that out of the first proceeds of the said sales said plaintiff be reimbursed for its expenditures so to be made, upon expense vouchers to be submitted by it to him; that after the payment of said expenses the said Wirt Robertson should then receive out of the proceeds of said sales the sum of $40,000, and that whatever residue might be produced by such sales should be divided equally between said plaintiff and said Wirt Robertson; that said W. E. Burke, agent and contract representative of said plaintiff as aforesaid, forthwith accepted the said offer so made to him on behalf of said plaintiff, and suggested that he would immediately prepare a written memorandum of agreement embodying said proposition and its acceptance; that said Wirt Robertson replied that he preferred to have a contract drawn up in legal form by his lawyer, which he then and there promised to have done the next day; that said Burke then asked said defendant whether or not said Wirt Robertson understood said offer, and the acceptance thereof by him on behalf of said plaintiff, to be a contract between said Wirt Robertson and the said plaintiff, and said Wirt Robertson then and there replied that he did so understand it, whereupon the said Burke, agent as aforesaid, and the said Wirt Robertson shook hands in token of agreement; that forthwith said Burke informed J. W. Ferrell, president of the plaintiff corporation, who was then in Greenville, N. C., of the terms of the contract he had just concluded with said Wirt Robertson; that said Ferrell, acting for the said plaintiff and within his authority as its president, proceeded at once to buy a road machine, at a cost of, to wit, $200, and to hire additional men to enable the said plaintiff to begin at once to carry out its part of the aforesaid contract and undertaking; that on, to wit, the 13th day of September, in the year 1915, said J. W. Ferrell, accompanied by said W. E. Burke, went to the home of the said Wirt Robertson, in the county of Chesterfield, near Petersburg, Va., for the purpose of executing on behalf of said plaintiff the written memorandum of the contract so entered into, which the said Wirt Robertson had promised to have drawn by his lawyer; that, when asked whether the papers were ready for signature, said Robertson replied, 'No,' and when asked when said papers would be ready, said Robertson replied, 'Gentlemen, I have sold the land;' that said Robertson was then informed by said Ferrell that the plaintiff had given a valuable consideration for the exclusive agency to sell said 'Baker property,' and had already begun its part of said contract by spending money for necessary tools and by employing additional men; that said Wirt Robertson, notwithstanding his promises and undertakings aforesaid, then and there refused to perform his part of the said contract, and then and there refused to permit said plaintiff to perform its part of said contract, although the said plaintiff was then and there ready, willing, and able to perform the agreements on its part to be done, kept and performed. * * *

The declaration then states that sale by Robertson referred to in the latter part of the foregoing quotation was a sale of the entire property to Chas. S. Barrow for the sum of $80,000, and concludes thus:

"And the plaintiff says that the said Wirt Robertson and the said J. Morton Townsend, his executor, have hitherto neglected and refused, and still do neglect and refuse, to pay to the said plaintiff its part of the profits which might, should, and would have been derived from the sale of the said 'Baker property,' had the said plaintiff been permitted to improve, subdivide, and sell the same in accordance with the terms of the contract above mentioned.
* * *

The defendant demurred to the declaration on four grounds, which we shall presently take up and dispose of in their order. Before proceeding to do this, however, it may not be amiss to observe that neither of these grounds challenges the validity of the contract on account of the fact that a written memorandum thereof was to be subsequently executed. It is apparently conceded, as of course it must be under the contract as alleged, that the parties were fully agreed, and regarded the contract as complete and binding, notwithstanding that its terms were to be thereafter reduced to writing. Boisseau v. Fuller, 96 Va. 45, 30 S. E. 457.

[1] The first and principal reason assigned for the demurrer was as follows:

"It appears upon the face of said declaration that the alleged contract stated therein was one providing for a sale of an interest in real estate, and was not in writing, as required by the statute set forth in subdivision 6 of section 2840 of the Code of Virginia."

The statute here invoked, familiarly known as the statute of frauds, provides that no action shall be brought—

"upon any contract for the sale of real estate, or for the lease thereof for more than a year, * * * unless the * * * contract, * * * or some memorandum or note thereof, be in writing and signed by the party to be charged thereby, or his agent."

The leading contention of the defendant, and the chief ground upon which the lower court sustained the demurrer, is that the contract as alleged constituted a partnership between the parties, and thus made the transaction one whereby the plaintiff, instead of becoming merely an agent to sell land for the defendant, became interested as a principal—a joint owner—with the defendant in the real estate to be sold. In no other way, of course, could it be plausibly said that the contract was one "for the sale of real estate" within the meaning of the statute.

To sustain this position, the case of Burgwyn v. Jones, 113 Va. 511, 75 S. E. 188, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 120, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 564, is cited and confidently relied upon; but we think there is a clear distinction between that case and the one at bar. It will be observed that both cases rest upon the allegations of the party seeking to enforce the contract, and the distinction between the two not only appears at once in the respective designations of the contracts involved, but proves, upon analysis of the facts alleged, to be substantial and vital. The bill in the Burgwyn Case designates the contract as one of partnership, and the facts as alleged in detail disclose that the complainant was to acquire, not a mere interest in the profits in case of a sale, but an interest in the property itself equal to that of any of the then owners after deducting the cost of the property and the expense of maintaining the same. The prayer of the bill was for an ascertainment and recovery of complainant's share of profits on an undivided half of the land which Jones had already sold, and for the establishment and protection of his interest in the undivided interest remaining unsold and held in the name of Jones. In other words, he not only claimed to have acquired an interest in the land itself, by virtue of what he declared to be a partnership agreement, but he alleged facts which if true and evidenced by writing, would have entitled him to an interest in the corpus of the estate. This court, therefore, was of opinion:

"That the verbal agreement set up by the appellant in his pleadings was one providing for the sale of an interest in real estate and within the statute requiring the same to be in writing, and that the circuit court did not err in refusing the relief prayed for and dismissing his bills."

The opinion by necessary implication shows that there was room for serious debate as to whether the interest thus claimed to have been acquired in the real estate by virtue of a partnership agreement should be regarded as personal instead of real property, and therefore not within the statute of frauds. But, having decided that question against the complainant, thereby distinguishing the Burgwyn Case from the case of Miller v. Ferguson, 107 Va. 249, 57 S. E. 649, 122 Am. St. Rep. 840, 18 Ann. Cas. 138, the court plainly could not have reached any other conclusion than that the complainant's contract, to be enforceable, must have been in writing. It was a contract for a partnership in lands which at the time of the partnership were owned by other members of the firm than the complainant; and it was so, not merely because the complainant so named it, but also because his allegations showed that it was such in fact. All Burgwyn lacked was a written contract to enable him to have his interest in the property itself established and protected.

In the case at bar, on the other hand, the plaintiff alleges a contract of agency, claims no interest in the corpus of the property, and would clearly be entitled to none, if it did make such claim. If its contract, as it alleges it, had been in writing, no circumstances could have arisen under which it could have made any valid claim to an interest in the real estate itself. It simply bought, for an agreed consideration, the exclusive right of sale for one year, thereby acquiring "a pecuniary interest in the sale" (not in the property) for that period. If it had failed to make the sale within that time, it would have received what it bought, and the contract would have been at an end.

[2, 3] It is quite true, as contended, that parties cannot convert what in legal effect is a partnership agreement into a contract of agency merely by calling themselves principal and agent, respectively; but, in construing contracts, words are to be given, primarily, their usual and ordinary meaning, unless a contrary meaning plainly appears, and the intention of the parties, if not contrary to law must be carried out. In this case the contract was based upon defendant's proposition, "that the plaintiff take the exclusive agency," right of sale, etc., for a consideration to be provided by the latter; and all the facts and circumstances alleged tend to establish the relationship of principal and agent. In 1 Mechem on Agency (2d Ed.) p. 33, § 51, it is said that—

"While parties may create a partnership without actually intending that specific result, where they voluntarily enter into an arrangement whose necessary legal effect is the creation of a partnership, courts are reluctant to surprise parties into that relation, when they clearly did not intend it."

And in London Assurance Corporation v. Drennen, 116 U. S. 461, 6 Sup. Ct. 442, 29 L. Ed. 688, Mr. Justice Harlan said:

"Persons cannot be made to assume the relation of partners, as between themselves, when their purpose is that no partnership shall exist. There is no reason why they may not enter into an agreement whereby one of them shall participate in the profits arising from the management of particular property without his becoming a partner with the others, or without his acquiring an interest in the property itself, so as to effect a change of title."

In Jackson v. Haynie's Adm'r, 106 Va. 365, 56 S. E. 148, this court, in discussing the constituent elements of a partnership, said:

"The principles of the law of partnership lead to the conclusion that if a trader makes an arrangement in regard to a commercial business with another, by reason of which that other becomes interested as owner in the resulting profits, while they are undivided and remain as profits, the two are partners; the general rule being that to constitute a partnership there must be a community of interests inter sese, and that the parties should share the profits and losses. It is, however, far from being universally true that a mere participation in the profits constitutes the party a partner. At most it is true only sub modo. The same principle that leads to the general rule mentioned leads directly to the other conclusion that a mere payment, or promise to pay, out of the profits a sum of money as a specific proportion of the profits does not necessarily constitute the payee a partner, and gives him no interest in the profits, and no right to the profits, but only a personal claim for such share of the profits, after they are ascertained and may be divided. If a party has no interest whatsoever in the capital stock, and as between himself and the other party has no rights as a partner, or no mutuality of powers and duties, but is simply employed as an agent, and is to receive a proportion of the profits as a compensation for his labor and services, he will not be deemed a partner from that fact alone. Story on Partnership, § 30 et seq.; Parsons on Partnership, p. 72 et seq. It is clear from the authorities that, if the parties merely occupy the relation of principal and agent, or employer and employé, no partnership can be predicated upon the fact that such agent or employé receives a share of the profits as compensation for his services or other benefits conferred. This proposition is illustrated by numerous decisions of the courts. Bowyer v. Anderson, 2 Leigh [29 Va.] 598; Chapline v. Conant, 3 W. Va. 507, 100 Am. Dec. 766; Sodiker v. Applegate, 24 W. Va. 411, 49 Am. Rep. 252; Berthold v. Goldsmith, 24 How. 542, 16 L. Ed. 762; Blanchard v. Coolidge, 22 Pick. [Mass.] 151; Rice v. Austin, 17 Mass. 197; Loomis v. Marshall, 12 Conn. 69, 30 Am. Dec. 596; Richardson v. Hughitt, 76 N. Y. 55, 32 Am. Rep. 287. * * *

"In the case at bar the weight of the evidence shows that no partnership was intended by the parties, nor did one result from the verbal understanding between them. It sufficiently appears that the appellee's intestate was employed by the appellant to take charge of his mill as miller, and for his services in that behalf the deceased was to receive one-third of the profits. This interest in the profits, to which Haynie became entitled when they were ready to be divided, did not make him a partner. It merely constituted the manner of payment and the measure of his compensation for his services as miller."

An action on the contract here involved was first brought in the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Virginia, and, as alleged there, it was the same as stated in the declaration in this case, except that no time was specified for the duration of the agency. The defendant demurred upon the sole ground that the contract was not in writing. The District Court sustained the demurrer, basing its judgment upon Burgwyn v. Jones, supra. Upon appeal to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, that judgment was reversed, in an opinion by Judge Pritchard, concurred in by Judges Knapp and Woods. See 240 Fed. 372, 153 O. C. A. 296. After the cause had been remanded to the District Court for trial, the plaintiff asked leave to amend the declaration by inserting an averment that the sale was to be made within 12 months from the date of the contract. This leave was denied, and the plaintiff thereupon suffered a nonsuit, and instituted this action in the hustings court. Upon the branch of the demurrer now under consideration, the case, as passed upon by the Circuit Court of Appeals, was identical with this one. That court, in the course of a very satisfactory opinion, said:

"Thus it will be seen that the Burgwyn Case, supra, is not analogous to the case at bar. There the sole purpose of the suit was to ascertain the interest in the tract of land growing out of the partnership between the parties; also there was nothing in that case upon which plaintiff could reasonably contend that the agency had been established. * * *

"For the reasons stated, we are impelled to the conclusion that the contract as set forth in the complaint constitutes an agency rather than a partnership, and it necessarily follows that such contract is not required by the laws of Virginia to be in writing."

The first ground of the demurrer is not, in our opinion, well taken.

The second ground was this:

"It appears upon the face of said declaration that the alleged contract stated therein was revocable and that it was revoked by the defendant's decedent."

The learned judge of the hustings court, basing his decision solely on the first ground of demurrer, as appears from the written opinion filed with the record, made only a casual reference to the second, evidently leaning to the view, however, that the latter could not be maintained. His comment thereon was:

"Of course Robertson had the power to revoke; but it is questionable, if the contract were a valid one, whether he had the right."

No question as to rights of third persons is here involved, and there is no claim that the agency was, in a technical sense, coupled with an interest. Under the facts as alleged in the declaration, it is not denied, and it is clear, that the defendant not only had the power to revoke, but did in fact effectually revoke, the agent's authority, by making, on his own behalf and independent of the agency, a sale of the subject-matter of the contract. In 2 O. J. 554, it is said:

"An agency is effectually revoked when the principal disposes of his interest in the subject-matter of the agency in a manner inconsistent with the authority conferred, as by assignment, conveyance, contract of sale, or otherwise."

[4, 5] This is a familiar and settled proposition of the law of agency; but it by no means follows that such a revocation can be made by the principal as a matter of right and without liability to his agent. The latter question depends upon the character and terms of the agent's contract. Quoting again from 2 O. J. at page 533, the following general and comprehensive statement is peculiarly germane in this connection:

"As between principal and agent, the right to terminate the agency depends upon the ordinary principles of contract, and is governed by the same rules as apply to any other contract of employment. Although, as has been stated, a principal has the undoubted power, so far as the agency is executory, to revoke the agent's authority, it by no means follows that he has always a right to do so, since the contract of agency may provide otherwise. Accordingly, if he revokes the agency in violation of the contract, he becomes liable to the agent for the damages caused thereby, although it should be observed in this connection that the agent is limited to his action for damages; the courts will not specifically enforce the contract against the principal. But if the contract of agency contains no terms indicating the creation of an agency for a definite period, or if the contract is not supported by a sufficient consideration, it is terminable at will, and the principal by revoking the authority incurs no liability to the agent, unless the agent has entered upon performance of the contract so that a revocation of his authority will work him legal injury."

See, also, to the same effect, 1 Mechem on Agency (2d Ed.) § 568; 21 R. C. L. p. 823, § 8.

[6] It follows from these authorities, to which many more might be added, that when an agency is not such as to constitute what in legal parlance is called a power coupled with an interest, and no third party's rights are involved, the agency, so long as it remains unexecuted, may be effectually revoked at the will of the principal, but that a wrongful revocation will nevertheless render him liable in damages to his agent. In other words, the agency may always be revoked, but the contract of employment will not necessarily be thereby rescinded. The distinction, in principle, is well stated by Judge Cardwell in Rowland Lumber Co. v. Ross, 100 Va. 275, 281, 40 S. E. 922, 924, as follows:

"Either party to a contract, however solemn its character or binding its form, has the power to violate it, and the courts of law give no redress to him who is injured except compensatory damages, but it is not accurate in law or in morals to say that a party has a right to break its contract. It would be to assert that it is legally right to do what is legally wrong. A person bound by a contract to do or not to do a thing may find it to his advantage not to keep his engagement, for the obligation may be more onerous than the damages likely to be imposed for its breach, but the violation of the contract cannot be regarded as a contractual right."

[7-9] In the instant case we are of opinion that a valuable consideration for the agreement itself, as distinguished from the mere chance of the agent to earn a commission or compensation, was sufficiently allegin the declarations; and, while the agency was not coupled with such an interest as to make it irrevocable, the contract which created it was a mutual agreement between competent parties for a lawful purpose and upon a valuable consideration, with the result that neither party could violate it without becoming responsible to the other for the breach.

The case of Perrow v. Rixey, 119 Va. 192, 89 S. E. 101, is relied upon as sustaining the claim that the agency in the case at bar was revocable. That was a case in which the authority to sell was given by Rixey to Perrow in writing and to the following effect:

"I hereby agree to sell that portion of my 'Richlands' farm to the west of the fence * * * to any purchaser brought to me by B. F. Perrow, provided that said land nets me * * * $25 per acre cash and provided further that said sale is consummated within 30 days from date."

Before the 30 days expired, but also before the agent produced a purchaser, this authority was revoked, and the agent brought suit to recover commissions, on the ground that he had produced a purchaser within the 30-day period. There was a verdict and judgment for the defendant, and on appeal this court affirmed the judgment and held that as "the paper was unilateral, not under seal, and expressed no valuable consideration," it was a bare power, and revocable at will, without liability on the principal. The language quoted above differentiates the two cases, as does also the following quotation in the opinion in the Perrow Case, taken from Walker on the Law of Real Estate Agency, § 15:

"Ordinarily, unless a contract of employment is coupled with an interest, or is given for a valuable consideration, the authority of the agent may be terminated at will by giving notice, subject only to the requirement that it be given in good faith, and before the broker finds a purchaser."

It is true that in the Perrow Case there was in the paper conferring the power a time fixed within which it was to be exercised, and also true that this court quoted with approval the following language from the case of Brown v. Pforr, 88 Cal. 550:

"We are unable to perceive how, under any circumstances, a mere limit as to the time allowed for the performance of a contract of agency to sell land can be construed into an agreement on the part of the principal not to revoke the power."

[10, 11] This court was then dealing with a power not supported by a valuable consideration. It was, indeed, the case of a mere offer of a contract not consummated by a legal acceptance before the revocation was declared. See 2 Mechem on Agency, § 2446, cited below. All judicial opinions must be interpreted in the light of the particular facts to which they are applied, and the decision in the Perrow Case does not hold that a contract of agency, carrying the exclusive right to sell real estate, for a definite time, and based upon a valuable consideration, is revocable without liability on the principal. The three elements of (1) exclusive right of sale, (2) definite time limit, and (3) valuable consideration all appear in the case under review, and the authorities seem to show conclusively that in such a case the principal must respond to the agent in damages if he breaks the contract. See, in addition to the authorities already cited, 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 1104; 31 Cyc. 1528; 1 Mechem on Agency (2d Ed.) § 1552; 21 R. C. L. p. 835, § 18; 2 C. J. 535.

We may well conclude the discussion of this branch of the case with the following extracts from 2 Mechem on Agency (2d Ed.):

"Where a time is fixed for performance by the broker, a number of considerations arise. If all that the negotiations amount to is an offer by the principal that he will pay a commission if a purchaser be found within a certain time, the offer will only be accepted and ripen into a contract by the finding of a purchaser within that time. At any time before that event, the offer may be withdrawn by the principal." (This was the gist of the decision in Perrow v. Rixey, supra.)

But, again, on the same page, the author says:

"If what the negotiations amount to is a contract of employment for the fixed period, or a binding contract that a commission will be paid if a purchaser is found within that time, the broker will usually be entitled to damages in the first case, and usually to the amount of his commissions in the second, if he finds a purchaser within that period, although the principal may, in the meantime, have sold the property or withdrawn it from sale."

See page 2039, § 2446.

And again, after showing that a mere offer for a fixed time does not become binding on the principal until the agent has accepted it by producing a purchaser (because "until so accepted there is no contract, the broker has promised nothing, * * * he may perform or not as he pleases"), the author says:

"But, as has already been seen, there may easily be cases in which the principal has so invited the broker to enter upon an undertaking requiring time for its full completion that the actual commencement of the performance with the intention of completing it would be such an acceptance as would prevent the principal's withdrawal without liability." Id. § 2452, pp. 2049-2051.

The third ground of demurrer is as follows:

"It appears upon the face of the said declaration that the damages sought to be recovered for the breach of the alleged contract therein set out are too remote and speculative to be recovered in a court of law."

[12, 13] The plaintiff bought from the defendant's decedent the exclusive right to sell the property for a period of one year. The sole purpose of the contract was the acquisition of a profit. While there is more or less uncertainty and confusion in the authorities upon the general subject of profits as an element of damages in suits for breach of contracts, it is safe to say that, when contemplated profits constitute the sole purpose and object of the contract, and the plaintiff alleges a breach and a consequent loss of profits, he has stated a prima facie case, and is entitled to recover such amount as he can prove, with reasonable certainty, he would have made but for the breach. Of course, this general statement of the law is subject to the general qualification that, if the declaration should allege such a state of facts as would enable the court to say that no profits at all could be proved, a demurrer would end the case. But when the profits claimed may reasonably, or, as in this case, must necessarily, be presumed to have been within the intent and mutual contemplation of the parties when the contract was made, the mere fact that the exact amount cannot be calculated with mathematical certainty does not preclude a recovery. In such cases, as said in 1 Sutherland on Damages (3d Ed.) § 60:

"The injured party is entitled to gains prevented and losses sustained if he can prove them with sufficient certainty."

To the same effect is the following language from the opinion by Judge Riely in Burruss v. Hines, 94 Va. 413, 416, 26 S. E. 875, 876:

"The prohibition against the recovery of profits or gains, when not excluded as unnatural or remote [here they were natural and direct], is due mainly to the inability to prove with reasonable certainty that the injury prevented the receipt of profits or gains, and their amount. But if it be shown that the loss of profits or gains was the natural and proximate result of the wrongful act, and their extent is also satisfactorily proved, they may be recovered."

The same principle is recognized and approved in Bristol, etc., Ry. Co. v. Bullock Co., 101 Va. 652, 44 S. E. 892.

In United States v. Behan, 110 U. S. 338, 4 Sup. Ct. 81, 28 L. Ed. 168, the Supreme Court said:

"The prima facie measure of damages for the breach of a contract is the amount of the loss which the injured party has sustained thereby. If the breach consists in preventing the performance of the contract, without the fault of the other party, who is willing to perform it, the loss of the latter will consist of two distinct items or grounds of damage, namely: First, what he has already expended towards performance (less the value of materials on hand); secondly, the profits that he would realize by performing the whole contract. The second item, profits, cannot always be recovered. They may be too remote and speculative in their character, and therefore incapable of that clear and direct proof which the law requires. But when, in the language of Chief Justice Nelson, in the case of Masterton v. Mayor of Brooklyn, 7 Hill [N. Y.] 69 [42 Am. Dec. 38], they are 'the direct and immediate fruits of the contract,' they are free from this objection; they are then 'part and parcel of the contract itself, entering into and constituting a portion of its very elements; something stipulated for, the right to the enjoyment of which is just as clear and plain as to the fulfillment of any other stipulation.'"

Citation of authorities to the foregoing effect might be multiplied almost indefinitely, as will appear from the copious citations in those from which we have quoted.

The plaintiff is suing for the loss of profits which he alleges he would have realized if there had been no breach of the contract. Such profits having been the purpose of the contract, and mutually contemplated by the parties, and, the circumstances alleged tending clearly to show that the same to some extent would have been realized, he is entitled to go to the jury with his case, and to recover such amount as his proof will establish with reasonable certainty.

The last ground of demurrer is stated as follows:

"It appears upon the face of the said declaration that the damages sought to be recovered are profits which would have been realized from a business or enterprise never established; such damages cannot be measured, and hence cannot be recovered."

The case chiefly relied upon to sustain this branch of the demurrer is Whitehead v. Cape Henry Syndicate, 111 Va. 193 (68 S. E. 263). In that case the gist of the decision is stated thus in the syllabus:

"Pound fishing in which a party has been engaged only one month is a new business, and the profits to be derived therefrom depend, not only upon the future bargains and states of the market, but upon other contingencies, such as the run of the fish and the kind and quantity caught. Such profits are dependent upon too many contingencies and are too uncertain to furnish a safe guide in fixing the measure of damages for an injury to, or destruction of, such business, and hence cannot be recovered."

[14] The instant case might fall within the reason and influence of the case cited, but for these distinguishing features: (1) The commodity dealt with in the former was a certain tract of land, while in the latter it was an uncertain supply of fish to be caught; (2) Whitehead's business had only been under way for one month, and was held to be a new business, while the realty company had been in business for many years, and the successful conduct thereof in the immediate vicinity of Robertson's property was the avowed inducement on his part to engage the company's services; (3) in the Whitehead Case there was no way to prove, with any degree of certainty, that the fish, even if caught, could be sold at a profit, while in this case Robertson himself demonstrated the existence of a market by selling the property at a large profit over what he was to have as a minimum in his contract with the realty company, and he cannot be heard now to say that the company could not have done at least as well.

[16] A principal cannot, after having made a valid contract with an agent for the exclusive right to sell, render performance on the part of the agent impossible by making the sale himself, and then successfully defend an action for breach of the contract by claiming that the agent might not have made the sale. Sparks v. Reliable Dayton Motor Car Co., 85 Kan. 29, 116 Pac. 363, Ann. Cas. 1912O, 1251; Schiffman v. Peerless Motor Car Co., 13 Cal. App. 600, 110 Pac. 460, 462; Green v. Cole, 127 Mo. 587, 30 S. W. 135; 2 Mechem on Agency (2d Ed.) § 2445.

We are of opinion that the demurrer should have been overruled; and this court will enter an order to that effect, and remand the cause for further proceedings.

Reversed.

CITY OF RICHMOND v. VIRGINIA RY. & POWER CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 13, 1919.)

1. TAXATION ¶204(2)—EXEMPTIONS—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Statutory provisions relied on to have effect of relinquishing taxing power or of authorizing a municipality to do so will be strictly construed against claim of relinquishment, and intention of Legislature to make or to authorize making of such a relinquishment will not be inferred or presumed.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ¶967(2) — POWERS OF TAXATION—EXEMPTIONS.

Municipalities of a state have no power to exempt property from taxation, except as they are expressly authorized by the state.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ¶967(2) — TAXATION—EXEMPTIONS—"TERMS."

Acts 1874-75, c. 219, as to taxes, authorizing sale of certain land on such terms as the city shall deem proper, does not empower city of Manchester to exempt such land from taxation; the word "terms," as used in such statute, referring only to terms of payment of purchase money, including manner of securing any deferred payments, etc. (citing Words and Phrases, Terms).

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ¶967(1)—TAXATION—AGREEMENT TO EXEMPT PROPERTY —EQUITABLE SET-OFF.

A purchaser of land from a city, a very material part of consideration paid being an invalid agreement of city to exempt property from taxation, has no right of equitable set-off against an annual tax, in absence of a continued service to be rendered to city or proof of amount paid on account of tax exemption covenant.

Appeal from Chancery Court of Richmond.

Suit by the City of Richmond against the Virginia Railway & Power Company. Decree for defendant, and the plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

This is a suit in equity by the city of Richmond having for its object the enforcement of the lien of certain city taxes assessed in the year 1913 for that year, and also for the preceding years, 1909, 1910, 1911, and 1912, on certain real estate belonging to the Virginia Railway & Power Company located in the territory which was embraced in the city of Manchester prior to the annexation of the latter with the city of Richmond, which occurred in 1910. The bill prays for a renting or sale of said real estate, or a part thereof to enforce the payment of said taxes and interest thereon, and for general relief.

The real estate aforesaid consists of approximately 29 acres, including the Manchester Canal and certain appurtenant water rights.

The railway and power company acquired this real estate, along with a large amount of other property, by deed of date June 29, 1909, from certain special commissioners of court in execution of a decree of sale thereof, along with such other property, under which decree such company became its purchaser. The total consideration for such purchase and conveyance was $8,100,000. It does not appear in evidence what part thereof was the consideration paid by the railway and power company for the said real estate. Such real estate was assessed by the State Corporation Commission at a valuation of $200,750 for state taxation for the years 1909 to 1913, inclusive, and it was on such valuation that the city taxes aforesaid were assessed; and there is a stipulation of counsel in the record which provides, in substance, that such valuation should be adopted by the commissioner in chancery in stating an account of the fee-simple value of said real estate under the requirements of a decree in the cause before us made in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided.

The railway and power company's title to said real estate traces back of its said deed of 1909 to a sale and conveyance thereof by the city of Manchester in 1881 to the Richmond & Alleghany Railroad Company, a predecessor in title of the railway and power company.

It was covenanted in a written contract evidencing the last-named sale, and in the last-named conveyance, as follows:

"That a part of the consideration for the purchase by the party of the second part of said property is that the city of Manchester is to and does hereby exempt said property forever from taxation by its authorities, either direct or indirect, general or special, and also all improvements or other property now thereon or which may hereafter be added thereto."

$200,000 was the amount of the money consideration paid to the city of Manchester by its said vendee and its successors in title (the Virginia Railway & Power Company itself having paid a part thereof evidenced by certain bonds of the city of Manchester assumed by such vendee but what part does not appear in evidence), in accordance with the terms of the last-named sale and conveyance; of which, in accordance with the evidence in the cause, only about $100,000 was paid for the real estate, and the remaining $100,000 was paid as the consideration for three other things, viz.: (1) For said city tax exemption; (2) for the dismissal of a certain suit then pending of the city of Manchester against the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company for damages for alleged injuries done by it and others to certain water rights of the city and the release of all such claims of damages; and (3) for certain rights, so far as the city of Manchester could give them, of laying certain railway tracks in certain localities in such city and of contracting with another railroad company for the use of certain of its tracks in such city or for building tracks alongside or near to such tracks and connecting therewith, etc. But what portion of such $100,000 was for the said tax exemption, and what for the other subjects (1) and (2) aforesaid, does not appear in evidence. There is evidence in the cause, however, tending to show that such tax exemption "was a most vital part of the consideration, was thoroughly discussed by the attorneys for the railroad company and the city attorneys for the city of Manchester, * * * was considered by them to be proper and legal and necessary," and that perhaps the purchase would not have been made but for the tax exemption covenant aforesaid.

At the time of said 1881 sale, the reservoir of the city of Manchester was supplied with water from the said Manchester Canal by pumps furnished and operated by the city. The contract of sale of 1881 aforesaid contained an agreement that the city of Manchester might "continue to have the use of the water from said canal to the same extent it now has," but it was therein provided that in no event should this water be drawn off in excess of "a total of eighty feet (cubic) per second during twenty-four hours, this amount to include the supply to the reservoirs and the power necessary to pump the same"; and there was the additional provision that the city should have "the right of ingress, egress and regress to and from said pumps so long as they are so used as aforesaid." The deed aforesaid of 1881 conformed to such agreement on the subject of such water supply.

Such use of such water ceased following the annexation of the city of Manchester to the city of Richmond and before this suit was instituted.

There were a number of leases of certain of said water rights, from the city of Manchester to various manufacturing and other companies and persons, existing at the time of said 1881 sale and conveyance, which were for terms of years expiring at different times, but which it seems, from the evidence in the cause (the leases themselves not being in evidence), were renewable at the option of the leaseholders provided the terms thereof were complied with, which made such leases possible perpetual leases. By the contract and deed of 1881 aforesaid, the vendee and grantee thereunder took said real estate subject to such leases and covenanted "to carry out * * * the covenants" with the lessees in all of such agreements. It is shown in evidence, however, that the rental return to such vendee from such leases was some $5,000 per year in excess of all expense to it of carrying out such covenants, so that this undertaking was a benefit and not a burden, and has so continued in the hands of subsequent owners of said real estate down to the railway and power company, which received its conveyance of said real estate with notice of said leases and now holds such real estate subject to such of said leases as have not been forfeited under the provisions thereof.

The said real estate was acquired by the city (then the town) of Manchester in 1769, when Col. William Byrd, the founder thereof, as well as of the city of Richmond, laid off the town of Manchester in blocks and streets. The real estate involved in this suit was set apart as a "common forever." See Mayo v. Murchie, 3 Munf. (17 Va.) 358, decided in 1811, for a history of the subject. The town of Manchester was chartered by act of the Legislature in 1769 (8 Hening's St. at Large, p. 421); and, under subsequent acts of Assembly authorizing it so to do, the leases aforesaid were made. In 1874, the town became the city of Manchester by act of Assembly approved March 20th of that year (Laws 1874, c. 118).

It is in evidence that the city of Manchester was in the year 1875 seriously financially embarrassed and so continued, or grew worse, until the sale aforesaid was made in 1881, having difficulty in paying the outstanding interest on its bonded indebtedness; but that such sale wholly relieved it from such embarrassment, and that the sale was made for that purpose on the part of the city of Manchester.

The legislative authority under which the city of Manchester inserted said city tax exemption covenant in said 1881 contract of sale and deed is contained in Acts of Assembly 1874-75, p. 264, and, so far as material, is as follows:

" * * * It shall be lawful for the common council of the city of Manchester * * * to make sale of the Commons, including the water power * * * of said city, by such mode and upon such terms as said common council shall deem proper."

It is a concession in the cause that the common council of the city of Manchester made the sale and conveyance aforesaid and included therein the city tax exemption covenant aforesaid.

It is in evidence that the city of Manchester, after 1881 and until its separate corporate existence was extinguished by the annexation aforesaid, assessed no city taxes against said real estate or leaseholds or other water rights appurtenant to such real estate. Prior to 1881, as such property belonged to such city, it, of course, assessed no city taxes against it and derived no revenue by taxation from it.

The decree under review dismissed the bill of the city of Richmond, holding, as per the memorandum opinion of the court made a part of the decree, in substance, that the tax exemption covenant aforesaid is valid, that it ran with the land, and that the railway and power company holds said real estate exempt from municipal taxation.

H. R. Pollard and Geo. Wayne Anderson, both of Richmond, for appellant.

E. R. Williams, A. B. Guigon, and T. J. Moore, all of Richmond, for appellee.

SIMS, J. (after making the foregoing statement). We will consider and pass upon the questions raised by the assignments of error and the positions of the appellant, the city of Richmond, and the railway and power company, the appellee, in their order as stated below:

1. Is the municipal tax exemption above set forth valid?

If such question depended for its decision upon the inquiry as to the constitutionality of an act of the Legislature authorizing such exemption, it would arise under sections 1 and 8 of article 10 of the Constitution of 1870. The language of those sections of that Constitution are different from the provisions on the same subject in sections 168 and 183 of our present Constitution of 1902. The former Constitution differed from the latter in this: It did not unquestionably contain an express provision that all property should be taxed except such as it mentioned as subject to exemption by the Legislature; and, with respect to the clause allowing the Legislature to exempt certain property mentioned, it did not contain an express statement that no other property should be exempt. The Constitution of 1902 supplies the defects mentioned in both particulars by providing, in section 168, that "*All property, except as hereinafter provided, shall be taxed, * * " and, in section 183, that, "except as otherwise provided in this Constitution, the following property and no other, shall be exempt from taxation. * * *" (Italics supplied.)

Because of the absence in the Constitution of 1870 (and in the preceding Constitution of 1851) of such express provisions as those in the Constitution of 1902 above italicized, a difference of opinion existed among the eminent and learned judges of this court, in the cases which arose prior to the Constitution of 1902, involving the question of whether it was in the power of the Legislature to exempt, or to authorize a municipality to exempt, other property from taxation than that mentioned in the tax exemption clauses of such former Constitutions; and that point was left undecided. See Whiting v. Town of West Point, 88 Va. 905, at pages 911, 913, 14 S. E. 698, 15 L. R. A. 860, 29 Am. St. Rep. 750, and cases cited. And we may also leave such point undecided, although it is urged upon us in argument.

In the view we take of the statute of 1875 (Acts 1874-75, p. 264), relied on by the railway and power company as furnishing legislative authority to the city of Manchester to make the tax exemption in question, the Legislature in this instance has not undertaken to authorize such exemption.

[1, 2] Statutory provisions relied on to have the effect of relinquishing the taxing power or of authorizing a municipality to do so will be strictly construed against the claim of relinquishment, even when the legislative right to so act in the premises unquestionably exists. The intention of the Legislature to make or to authorize the making of such a relinquishment will certainly not be inferred or presumed from the language of a statute which is plainly capable of another construction.

As said by Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet. 514, at page 561 (7 L. Ed. 939), in speaking of the taxing power:

"It would seem that the relinquishment of such a power is never to be assumed."

As said on the same subject by Mr. Justice Field, in Minot v. Phil., etc., R. Co., 18 Wall. 206, 21 L. Ed. at page 894:

" * * * Before any exemption * * * can be admitted, the intent of the Legislature to confer the immunity * * * must be clear beyond a reasonable doubt."

As said in 4 Dillon on Mun. Corp. (5th Ed.) § 1401:

"As the burden of taxation ought to fall equally upon all, statutes exempting persons or property are construed with strictness, and the exemption should be denied to exist unless it is so clearly granted as to be free from fair doubt. Such statutes will be construed more strongly against those claiming the exemption"—citing numerous authorities.

The same principle applies in the construction of a statute relied on to confer the power of tax exemption upon a municipality. Accordingly, it is well settled that a charter provision (which is, of course, a statute), or other statute, will not be construed to confer upon a municipality the authority to make a tax exemption, unless such authority is expressly given. Whiting v. Town of West Point, supra (88 Va. 905, at pages 906, 910, 14 S. E. 698, 699 [15 L. R. A. 860, 29 Am. St. Rep. 750]), and authorities cited; 1 Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.) p. 344.

As said by the last-cited authority:

"Pertaining, as it does, to the sovereign power to tax, the municipalities of a state have not the exempting power, except as they are expressly authorized by the state"—citing numerous authorities.

[3] The language in the statute of 1875 (quoted in the statement preceding this opinion) on which the railway and power company must rely to confer the power in question merely confers the power of sale of the property upon the common council of the city "upon such terms as said common council shall deem proper." The word "terms" may have a broad meaning, it is true, and might be given the meaning contended for by the appellee in the case before us. But, to say the least, such language is equally susceptible of the construction that the terms referred to are merely the terms of payment of the purchase money, including the manner of securing any deferred payments, etc., as it is of the construction that a tax exemption was thereby intended to be authorized. Similar language is frequently used in deeds, wills, and other writings creating powers of sale, and the former is the usual and ordinary meaning of the word "terms" when used in connection with provisions conferring a power of sale. 8 Words and Phrases (1st Ed.) p. 6922; Id. (2d Ed.) pp. 884, 885. And such, as we think, is the meaning with which the language we are dealing with was used in the statute under consideration.

The above question must therefore be answered in the negative.

We come now to the consideration of another subject:

2. Although invalid, the tax exemption covenant aforesaid unquestionably constituted a very material part of the consideration to the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company to make the purchase of the real estate and to pay the consideration therefor aforesaid. This was perhaps also true, although probably in a lesser degree, of the purchases by its successors in title down to and including the appellant, the Virginia Railway & Power Company; but such facts are not shown in evidence. It is assumed by the last-named company, without any sufficient evidence thereof in the record as we think, that said tax exemption covenant entered into the consideration for its purchase of said real estate to an amount in excess of the city taxes which have accrued thereon for 1909 to 1913, inclusive, and which may accrue in future, and appellee contends that, if such taxes are held to be assessable and enforceable, there has been a failure of consideration to appellee to that extent, and that (as is said in the brief for appellee), "without going into a careful analysis of the doctrines of set-off, or recoupment, or counterclaim, or the statutes pertaining thereto, it is plain that in this court of equity, if the covenant be held to be invalid, the defendant company" (the appellee) "is entitled to receive due credit and compensation for this large investment which has enured to the benefit of the city, without any return to the company," and that hence the appellee is entitled "to an equitable offset against the city for an amount at least equal to the taxes claimed." (The quotations just made, from the brief of counsel for appellee, are not in the order in which the language quoted is used, but are believed to fairly convey the meaning intended.)

Neither the issues made by the pleadings nor the evidence in the cause are, or is, sufficient to enable us to enter upon the decision of the questions which are here presented, even if the court below had jurisdiction of the subject in this cause—as to which we express no opinion. At any rate, such questions were not in issue in the court below so far as appears in the record, and they were not passed upon by such court so far as appears from the decree under review and the memorandum opinion made a part of the decree, nor have they been argued before us, except the narrow question of whether the principle of the case of Phillips v. City of Portsmouth, 115 Va. 180, 78 S. E. 651, and kindred cases referred to below, is applicable to the said claim of an equitable set-off; so that we wish to be understood as expressing no opinion on such questions, except upon the narrow question last referred to. The last-mentioned question having been fully argued before us, we feel that we should pass upon it, and will, accordingly, now do so.

The question last mentioned may be stated as follows:

[4] 3. Is the appellee, the Virginia Railway & Power Company, under the doctrine of the cases last above referred to, entitled to the set-off claimed by it as aforesaid against the annual city taxes which have been assessed against said real estate and appurtenant water rights owned by it, as aforesaid, and which may in all future time ("forever," per said tax exemption covenant) be so assessed, whether "direct or indirect, general or special, * * *" not only on the land and other property conveyed by the 1881 deed aforesaid, and "also (on) all buildings and improvements and other property thereon," but likewise on all such property and on all "other property which" (since 1881 may have been added and which) "may hereafter be added thereto, including capital added thereto or used or employed thereon"?

The cases relied on by the Virginia Railway & Power Company to support an affirmative decision of the question just stated, or which are cited in the brief for such company on the point urged, viz. that tax exemptions are valid which are supported by a valuable consideration, are the following: City of New Orleans v. New Orleans Waterworks Co. (1884) 36 La. Ann. 432; Conery v. New Orleans Waterworks Co., 41 La. Ann. 910, 7 South 8; s. c. 142 U. S. 79, 12 Sup. Ct. 142, 35 L. Ed. 943; City of Frankfort v. Capital, etc., Co. (Ky. 1895) 29 S. W. 855; Bartholomew v. City of Austin, Texas, (1898) 85 Fed. 359, 29 C. C. A. 568; Montclair Water Co. v. Town of Montclair (1911) 81 N. J. Law, 573, 79 Atl. 258; Grant v. City of Davenport (1873) 36 Iowa, 396; Maine Water Co. v. City of Waterville (1900) 93 Me. 586, 45 Atl. 830, 49 L. R. A. 294; Phillips v. City of Portsmouth (1913) 115 Va. 180, 78 S. E. 651.

The whole extent to which the holdings of those cases go, on the question under consideration, is this: That where a continuing service is to be rendered to a municipality for which it has the power to contract, and it does make a contract for such service which is reasonable and valid in other respects, and therein, either expressly or substantially, agrees to pay each year for such service the amount of the city taxes on certain property, and the amount so agreed upon appears to be only a fair return, or but a reasonably adequate consideration for the service rendered, the courts will hold such an agreement not to be, in truth, a tax exemption, but an agreement to make compensation for such service, and that hence such an agreement is enforceable, either by action to recover for the service rendered at the contract price therefor, which is the annual tax, or by set-off of the value of such service against the annual tax as it accrues, so long as such service continues under such contract.

In those cases the failure of consideration, caused by a holding of the tax exemption to be invalid, was a failure of consideration for service actually rendered or to be rendered to the municipality. In the cause before us, it does not appear that the appellee has ever rendered or is obligated to render to the appellant, the city of Richmond, any service whatsoever. The only service which its predecessors in title rendered to the city of Manchester under the 1881 tax exemption covenant aforesaid was the water supply from the Manchester Canal mentioned in the statement preceding this opinion. That ceased certainly following the annexation aforesaid which occurred in 1910. It does not appear in evidence whether such water supply was furnished in 1909 by appellee. If so, that fact might, upon proper pleading, if the court has jurisdiction of the matter in such a suit as this, furnish a basis for future decree in the cause in the court below for the relief of the appellee from the city taxes for that year, but no farther.

No authority has been cited before us extending the doctrine of the cases next above discussed to the point of holding that a municipality may, for any other valuable consideration than services to it such as aforesaid, contract away its taxing power, and that such contract will be held not to be a tax exemption. And, on principle, it will be at once perceived that such a broad power of contract would annul all constitutional provisions against exemption of property from taxation. It is not a question of the presence or absence of a valuable consideration to support tax exemptions against which such constitutional provisions are directed. There has seldom, if ever, arisen a case of tax exemption where such a consideration was not supposed by the taxing authority to exist at the time, and a supposedly sufficient consideration. But the evil of allowing such a power to exist, even in the Legislature, is so manifest that the rules of construction applicable to every alleged tax relinquishment, above adverted to, and the constitutional inhibitions which are now in force in Virginia against the exercise of such a power, have been adopted, and have their foundation deep-seated in principles which are immutable under our form of government.

The foregoing has proceeded upon the idea that the tax exemption in fact sought in the case before us was but an exemption for a reasonable time upon property reasonably certain as to its identity and value. Such, however, is not the case before us. The exemption sought is "forever"; it extends, not only to certain property which existed in 1881, but to all which may have been placed thereon since, and, also, to all "other property which may hereafter be added thereto, including capital added thereto or used or employed thereon." This would apply to the leaseholds heretofore created or which may hereafter be created touching the real estate and water rights aforesaid, as well as to the remainder of the property, and doubtless to others besides the appellee who may now hold portions of the original property, and, if the construction of said covenant for tax exemption contended for by appellee were upheld, there would be established within the city upon the 29 acres of real estate involved in this cause an imperium in imperio indeed, which we cannot hold to have been within the power of the city of Manchester to create under the authority of the act of Assembly under which it made the covenant aforesaid; aside from any consideration of the power of the Legislature under the Constitution of 1870 to have granted such authority.

For the foregoing reasons, we are constrained to reverse the decree under review and to remand the cause for such further proceedings therein as may be proper, not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed.

GEORGIA RY. & POWER CO. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF GEORGIA et al.
(No. 1174.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 15, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CARRIERS §12(9) — STREET RAILROAD FARES—REGULATION—CONTRACTS.

Under the proviso contained in the fifth section of the act approved August 23, 1907, now embodied in Civil Code 1910, § 2682, the Railroad Commission of this state was without authority to exercise the powers conferred and extended by that act, so as to determine or fix fares upon lines of street railroads within the limits of any town or city between which and the street railroad company operating such lines there was a valid, subsisting contract at the time of the passage of the act.

(a) There was such a contract between the city of College Park and the Georgia Railway & Power Company, and between that company and the city of Decatur as to one line running from Decatur to Atlanta.

(b) But as between the cities of Atlanta and East Point and the Georgia Railway & Power Company there was no such contract.

(c) But there was a contract covering the subject of transfers, which provided that upon the payment of one full fare a transfer should be given; and the Railroad Commission was without jurisdiction to deal with the matter of transfers.

2. CARRIERS §12(1) — MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS §57 — DELEGATED POWERS — CONSTRUCTION—STREET RAILROAD FARES.

"A grant of power to a municipal corporation must be strictly construed; and such a corporation can exercise no powers except those which are expressly given, or are necessarily implied from express grants of other powers." Applying this principle to the facts contained in this record, the city of Atlanta was without authority to pass an ordinance fixing the rates of fare upon the lines of the street railroad company which it had constructed within the limits of the municipality, and any attempt by the municipality to pass such ordinances was nugatory.

3. CARRIERS §12(1) — STREET RAILROAD FARES—REGULATION—JURISDICTION.

In the absence of a valid, subsisting contract and ordinance upon the subject of fares, it was the duty of the Railroad Commission, upon application by the Georgia Railway & Power Company, a street railroad company, to fix and determine the rates of fare upon the lines of the street railroad in the city, in accordance with the law defining the powers and duties of the commission.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

4. CARRIERS §12(1)—POLICE POWER—RAILROAD FARES—REGULATION.

The regulation of passenger tariffs, and the fixing of fares on street and steam railways, is a matter falling within the police power.

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS §593—POLICE POWER.

Under Const. art. 4, § 2, par. 2 (Civ. Code 1910, § 6464), neither the Legislature nor any municipality can, by ordinance or contract, abridge the exercise of the state's police power, but a municipality may make a contract on such subject, where state has not exercised its police power with reference thereto.

6. STREET RAILROADS §24(3)—GRANT OF PRIVILEGE — CONDITIONS — CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Under Const. art. 3, § 7, par. 20 (Civ. Code 1910, § 6448), forbidding General Assembly to authorize construction of street passenger railway within city or town without consent of corporate authorities, such authorities may impose conditions upon which a street railway may construct its track in streets, and contract with corporation as to conditions on which it may construct railway within municipal limits.

7. CARRIERS §12(9) — STREET RAILWAYS — CONTRACT.

Where the state has not exercised, and is not seeking to exercise, its police power as to street railway fares, a municipality and a street railroad may enter into valid contracts on such subject.

Fish, C. J., dissenting, and Hill, J., dissenting in part.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Mandamus by the Georgia Railway & Power Company against the Railroad Commission of Georgia and others for an increase in street railroad fares. Judgment for defendants, and petitioner brings error. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

King & Spalding, C. T., L. C., & J. L. Hopkins, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, Colquitt & Conyers, and Rosser, Slaton, Phillips & Hopkins, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

James K. Hines, J. L. Mayson, R. R. Arnold, S. D. Hewlett, E. E. Pomeroy, C. E. Cotterill, A. C. Broom, and G. M. Watkins, all of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

BECK, P. J. The plaintiff in error, hereafter called the railway company, filed a petition to the Railroad Commission of Georgia, for an increase in street railway fares. In the application it was claimed that an increase of rates for street car and suburban fares was absolutely essential in order for the applicant, in view of the unusual war conditions which had prevailed for more than a year, to effectively discharge obligations of the company to the public. The facts upon which this claim of the necessity for a raise in the rates of street car fares was based were fully and elaborately set forth in the petition to the commission. Upon hearing the application the commission held that, by reason of certain contracts between the railway company and the cities of Atlanta, Decatur, East Point, and College Park, it had no jurisdiction to grant increased fares, and reached the conclusion that, having found the contracts referred to to be physically existent, their validity was not a question for the commission, but for the courts, to decide; that when dealing with the rates of a street railroad under the terms of the act of 1907, embraced in Civil Code, § 2662, they were brought face to face with a contract or an ordinance in existence at the time of the passage of that act, and still subsisting, that the commission could go no further in dealing with the rates until the obstacle should be removed by legal procedure before a court of competent jurisdiction, or until the General Assembly should further act. The commission, having concluded that there were contracts in existence which were an obstacle to their further proceeding, stated as their opinion that the applicant was entitled to an increase in street car fares, and that a six-cent fare would be reasonable and just "so long as existing abnormal war conditions prevailed," and recommended to the municipal authorities of Atlanta, Decatur, and College Park the justice of granting the increase "by amendment to existing contracts or ordinances." The railway company then brought to the superior court of Fulton county its petition against the commission, and prayed that the writ of mandamus issue, requiring the commission to take jurisdiction in the matter of fixing the rates, it being insisted that the commission had erred in declining to take jurisdiction in the matter, for the reason that there were no contracts, valid or otherwise, between the city of Atlanta and petitioner fixing the street railroad fares, or that there was in existence in 1907 an ordinance, valid or otherwise, passed by the city of Atlanta fixing street railroad fares, and that if there existed at said time any such contracts or ordinances the same were invalid because the city of Atlanta lacked the charter power to make such contracts or ordinances, and because, if the city of Atlanta had charter power to make such contracts and ordinances they would be void because violative of article 4, § 2, par. 1, of the Constitution of the state of Georgia, conferring upon the General Assembly alone the power of regulating passenger tariffs, preventing unjust discrimination, and fixing reasonable and just rates. Applicant also insisted that the alleged contracts between applicant and the towns of Edgewood, East Point, Decatur, and College Park were invalid because these towns were without charter power to make such contracts, and that if they had such power the contracts would be void because in violation of that section of the Constitution referred to. The further contention was made that, even if there were valid contracts between the petitioner and one or more of the municipalities referred to, the existence of such valid contract would not prevent the commission from exercising its jurisdiction to fix street railroad fares in cases other than those covered by such valid contracts, and that if there were with the cities, whose streets were occupied by petitioner, valid existing contracts, the act of the commission in fixing and approving just and reasonable rates would not be an impairment of such contracts under the Constitution of this state.

[1] 1. We will first consider the question as to whether, if there were contracts in existence on the 23d day of August, 1907, between the municipalities named, or any of them, by the terms of which the street railroad fares were fixed as to that municipality, such a contract would prevent the fixing of the street railroad fares by the commission. The act to revise and enlarge the powers and duties of the Railroad Commission of Georgia, etc., approved August 23, 1907, contains the statutory provision now embraced in section 2662 of the Civil Code, and so far as relates to the questions under consideration in this case reads as follows:

"The powers and duties hereinbefore conferred by law upon the Railroad Commission are hereby extended and enlarged, so that its authority and control shall extend to street railroads and street railroad corporations, companies, or persons owning, leasing, or operating street railroads in this state: Provided, however, that nothing herein shall be construed to impair any valid, subsisting contract now in existence between any municipality and any such company; and provided that this section shall not operate as a repeal of any existing municipal ordinance."

Until the passage of the act of 1907 the commission was without authority to deal with the subject of fixing fares for street railways. Until the enactment of that statute they did not exercise, as to street railway companies, the power to make the rates of charges for transportation of passengers on the lines of street railways operated by street railway companies, like that of the applicant in this case. But the act of 1907, as indicated by its caption, extended and enlarged the powers and duties of the commission, and embraced in these enlarged and extended powers and duties there was, among other things, the authority to fix fares upon street railroads, and to otherwise exercise control over street railroad corporations or companies operating street railways, but in section 5 the section of the act of 1907 extending the powers of the commission so as to embrace authority to fix fares upon street railroads, the Legislature enacted as a part of that section the proviso "that nothing herein [in the statute extending the powers and duties of the commission] shall be construed to impair any valid, subsisting contract now in existence between any municipality and any such company [street railroad company]."

In our opinion the effect of the proviso is to leave the commission where it was before the enactment of the statute as to its power and authority to determine and fix fares upon street railroads in any municipality which had a valid subsisting contract covering that subject with the street railroad company.

[4, 5] Counsel for the railway company contend in their arguments that it was not competent for the municipality to enter into a contract with the street railroad company upon this subject; that the fixing of fares upon street railroads and other railroads is a matter that falls within the police power of the state, and that under the provisions of the Constitution of the state, especially that part of the Constitution which declares that the exercise of the police power of the state shall never be abridged (Civil Code, § 6464) the municipality and the railway company could not make a binding contract upon this subject. We cannot agree with this contention in full. We readily assent to the proposition that the regulation of passenger tariffs, the fixing of fares upon street railways, as well as upon steam railways, is a matter falling within the police power, and that neither the Legislature of the state nor the legislative body of any municipality can, by ordinances or contracts, abridge the exercise of the police power of the state, but we do not think that in all cases and in reference to every subject which might fall within the police power of the state it is incompetent for a municipality or other corporation to make a contract in reference to such subject-matter, where the state has not seen fit to exercise the police power in reference thereto.

[6] Under the Constitution of this state (article 3, § 7, par. 20; Civil Code, § 6448) the General Assembly cannot authorize the construction of any street passenger railway within the limits of an incorporated town or city without the consent of the corporate authorities. Under such provisions the city authorities may withhold their consent for the construction of a street railroad upon any of the streets of the municipality. It would seem that if they can do this they might impose conditions upon which a railroad company might construct its tracks in the streets and enter into a contract with the corporation as to the conditions upon which it should be permitted to construct a railway within the limits of a municipality. In the case of Atlanta, etc., Co. v. Transit Co., 113 Ga. 481, 39 S. E. 12, it was said:

"Our Constitution, in paragraph 20, § 7, art. 3, declares that the General Assembly shall not authorize the construction of any street passenger railway within the limits of any incorporated town or city without the consent of the corporate authorities. But when a corporation to duly construct such a railway has been created. * * * it is within the power of the corporate authorities of the city, in whose streets it is proposed to be constructed, to refuse it admission altogether, as well as to confine it to certain streets and routes, and to impose, as a condition precedent to such construction, such reasonable terms as the corporate authorities, looking to the interests of the citizens, may deem best."

Where application is made to the municipal authorities by a street railroad company for the consent of the authorities to the construction of a railway in its streets it does not seem to be sound to say that the city authorities could only say "yes" or "no" to such a petition; that the city is compelled to refuse admission altogether or to admit it without any conditions whatever. In the case of St. Louis, etc., Co. v. City of Kirkwood, 159 Mo. 239, 60 S. W. 110, 53 L. R. A. 300, the Supreme Court of Missouri says:

"It would be difficult to conceive of a more positive and unequivocal veto than that conferred upon the cities, towns, and villages of this state by section 20 of article 12 of the Constitution and section 2548, Rev. St. 1889, to prevent the construction and operation of railroads upon their streets and highways, without their consent. When such power is given to cities and towns it is not limited to a mere 'Yes' or 'No,' but they may impose such conditions upon their consent as they see fit. * * * Judge Elliott, in his work on Railroads (volume 3, section 1081), says: 'When a municipal corporation has the power to grant or refuse a railroad company the right to use its streets as it sees fit, or when its consent is required before any company can so use them, it has, as we think, the authority to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which the company shall have the right to construct and operate a railroad in its streets.'"

In the case of People v. North Tonawanda, 70 Misc. Rep. 91, 126 N. Y. Supp. 186, the Supreme Court of New York says:

"A city may refuse to assent to the construction of a railroad in its streets and may, therefore, impose any conditions it thinks proper as conditions precedent to the giving of its assent; and if the city attaches conditions which the company deems unreasonable, the only remedy of the latter is to refuse to accept the assent."

See, also, People v. Barnard, 110 N. Y. 548, 18 N. E. 354; Quinby v. Public Service Commission, 223 N. Y. 244, 119 N. E. 433. In Kalamazoo v. Circuit Judge, 200 Mich. 146, 166 N. W. 998, it is said that a constitutional provision, giving cities reasonable control of their streets, authorizes them to impose reasonable rates upon a public utility as a condition to the occupancy of the streets, the reasonableness of the rate being reviewable by the courts. In the case of Detroit v. Detroit Citizens' Railway, 184 U. S. 368, 22 Sup. Ct. 410, 46 L. Ed. 562, it is said:

"The rate of fare is among the most material and important of the terms and conditions which might be imposed by the city in exchange for its consent to the laying of railroad tracks and the running of cars thereon through its streets. It would be a subject for grave consideration and conference between the parties, and, when determined by mutual agreement, the rate would naturally be regarded fixed until another rate was adopted by a like agreement."

See, also, City of Barre v. Barre & M. Traction & Power Co., 88 Vt. 304, 92 Atl. 237, and State v. Public, etc., Commission (Mo.) 204 S. W. 497.

[7] We do not base our opinion that a street railroad company and a municipality may, under certain circumstances, contract with reference to rates of fare entirely upon that part of the Constitution which provides that the Legislature shall not authorize a street railroad company to construct its railways in the limits of a municipality without the consent of the municipal authorities. We think that where the state has not exercised its police power, and is not seeking to exercise its police power, over the subject of fares upon street railroads, the municipality and the street railway might enter into contracts upon this subject that will be valid; but the right of the municipality to refuse absolutely its consent to the construction of a street railway within its limits, and the constitutional and statutory provisions in regard thereto, strengthen us in the view that it is competent for the municipality and the street railroad company to enter into contracts upon this subject.

Having reached this conclusion, in the further consideration of the issues involved in this case we must inquire whether there was a contract between the city of Atlanta and other municipalities named and the railway company upon the subject of fares.

We take up first the question as to whether or not the city of Atlanta had a contract on August 23, 1907, and prior thereto with the railway company upon the subject of fares. Whether it had such a contract is to be gathered from the facts, which we state briefly as follows: The Atlanta Street Railroad was Atlanta's original and principal railway. It included the lines upon several of the principal streets of the city. On January 1, 1866, the city granted consent to this street railroad company to occupy the streets of said city, by an ordinance, one of the conditions of which was as follows:

"Fourth. The charges for passage on said road shall not exceed 20 cents for any through line, and not exceeding 10 cents for half lines or short distances."

On December 18, 1882, the city of Atlanta granted its consent to the Metropolitan Street Railway Company to occupy certain streets upon condition that—

"Franchises granted subject to the conditions and limitations of ordinances heretofore passed in reference to the Atlanta and Gate City Street Railroad Companies."

On July 4, 1877, a like grant on the same terms was made to Atlanta & Edgewood Street Railway Company. On December 7, 1891, a grant was made to Atlanta Consolidated Street Railway Company to occupy certain streets in the following language:

"The rights and franchises consented to and granted to said several street railroad companies (including Atlanta Street Railroad Company) * * * are hereby reconferred and regranted to said Atlanta Consolidated Street Railroad Company on the terms specified in said grants both as to privileges and obligations."

Subsequently, August 23, 1899, the city of Atlanta granted a consent to the Atlanta Rapid Transit Company to occupy with its lines certain named streets. Among the terms of this consent was the following:

"This grant is made on the further condition that the charge for fare for a single passenger from any point on the lines of said company to any other point on the lines of said company within the city limits of Atlanta as now or hereafter defined shall not exceed five cents, except on cars that may be run after midnight and before five o'clock, a. m., for which fares for single passengers as aforesaid shall not exceed ten cents."

Prior to February 8, 1902, the name of Atlanta Consolidated Street Railroad Company had been changed to that of Atlanta Railway & Power Company, and there was in existence at said time in Atlanta only two street railway companies, the Atlanta Railway & Power Company and Atlanta Rapid Transit Company. These two railroad companies, together with the Georgia Electric Light Company and the Atlanta Steam Company, desired to consolidate, and the consent of the city was sought to permit and authorize such consolidation. This consent of the city was obtained, and was embodied in what is known as the "consolidation ordinance" of February 8, 1902. In this ordinance in which the consent was granted, it was provided:

"The said consolidated company shall, for the purpose of giving one continuous ride inside the city of Atlanta from a point on one of its lines to a point on another of its lines grant one transfer ticket on the payment of one full fare."

We have gone carefully through these ordinances conferring certain rights and franchises upon the street railroad companies mentioned, have considered the terms of what might be called the consent contract in the consolidating ordinance, and we cannot find that there were the elements of a contract existing in view of the provisions of the consolidating ordinance. The Railroad Commission of the state, in passing upon the question when the application for increase in fares was before it, in rendering their decision set forth at some length the grounds upon which they based the conclusions reached, and in announcing the conclusion and decision used, as a part of their opinion, the following language:

"The physical existence of a contract in 1907 between the town of Decatur and the lessor of applicant, prescribing a five cent maximum fare between Decatur and Atlanta, is admitted. A similar contract between College Park and applicant's lessor, was in existence.

"The Georgia Railway & Electric Company obtained its Atlanta franchises under an ordinance of the city of Atlanta, approved February 8, 1902, known as the 'Consolidating Ordinance.' This ordinance contained the terms and provisions upon which the consolidation of the street railways therein named could be made. It was accepted by the Georgia Railway & Electric Company. The proposition of the city and its acceptance by the company constituted a contract, which contract was in existence in 1907.

"The 'Consolidating Ordinance' does not, in direct terms, prescribe rates. It, however, contains this provision: 'The said consolidated company shall for the purpose of giving one continuous ride inside the city of Atlanta from a point on one of its lines to a point on another of its lines, which, however, does not carry the passenger on a parallel line or in the same general direction from which he came, grant one transfer ticket upon the payment of one full fare, provided such transfer is requested at the time of the payment of the fare.'

"At that time the universal fare throughout the city of Atlanta upon each and all of the lines embraced in the ordinance was five cents. A 'full fare' must have meant the then prevailing fare. To compel the grant of transfers and at the same time throw no restrictions upon an increase in the primary rate would have been to leave the way open to nullify the free transfer, by increasing or doubling the original and customary charge without transfers.

"But whether this be the correct view as to what was a 'full fare' or not, it is immaterial to a proper conclusion as to the grant of the prayer of petitioner for authority to charge two cents for a transfer; to grant it would, to that extent, repeal the consolidating ordinance under which the petitioner is now operating."

It will be seen that the commission laid especial stress upon that clause which we have already quoted from the consolidating ordinance. Whether, as they say, the uniform prevailing fare at the time of the adoption of the ordinance was five cents or not, this consolidating ordinance, that is, the clause which we have quoted, does not fix the fare at five cents. It deals directly and expressly with the question of transfers, declaring that upon the payment of one "full fare" the consolidated company shall "grant one transfer ticket." That means, it seems to us clearly that upon payment of one full fare, whatever that may be, whether four cents, five cents, six cents, or more or less, the transfer shall be granted. We find nothing in the contract tending to bind either the company or the municipality as to the amount of a full fare. No attempt was made to state what was a full fare, and it does not appear to us to have been the intention of the contract and parties to do this. The thing contracted about was transfers, and we cannot assume from the words of the ordinance that one "full fare" was a five cent fare. Upon this point we agree with counsel for plaintiff in error that the matter of fares was so important that it would not have been left to inference, but would have been the subject of definite contract if the city intended at that time to fix the amount of fares.

As between the municipality of East Point and the railroad company, the contract was to the effect that—

"Passengers from all other parts of the town of East Point shall be accorded each and every privilege which may be accorded citizens of Atlanta with regard to transportation."

If that is a contract upon the subject of fares at all the fares would seem to follow, as to amounts, the fares for passenger transportation fixed for Atlanta.

The contract with the municipalities of College Park and Decatur stand upon a different footing. Those contracts were in existence on the 23d day of August, 1907, and are still subsisting contracts. As we decided in the first part of this opinion, these contracts are not invalid, but are valid and subsisting contracts, and were valid and subsisting contracts on the 23d day of August, 1907, and the commission properly held that they were without jurisdiction to fix the fares between the two towns just referred to and the city of Atlanta over the lines of the railway company.

Nothing that we have said in regard to the matter of contracts between municipalities and street railway companies upon the subject of fares is to be construed as in any way impairing the police power of the state. We are of the opinion that at any time that the state may act in regard to this matter and extend the powers of the Railroad Commission so as to cover the matter of fares upon street railways in towns where there are existing contracts, then, regardless of such contracts, the commission, in the exercise of the branch of the power thus conferred, can act.

But we are of the opinion that the effect of the proviso in the section of the act of August 23, 1907, which we have quoted above, is to leave the commission without authority to fix rates of fare upon street railroads in towns and cities where there were existing contracts at the time of the passage of the law between such towns and cities and the street railroad companies, and that therefore the commission did not have the authority to determine and fix rates of fare as between the town of College Park and the city of Atlanta and upon one line running from Decatur to the city of Atlanta, because these two last lines referred to are expressly covered by contracts which were valid subsisting contracts at the time of the passage of the law. Nevertheless, there was no existing contract which prevented the commission from taking jurisdiction of the matter of rates of fare in the city of Atlanta and upon lines of the railway company running into the city of Atlanta, except from the two points just mentioned.

[2] This leaves for consideration and determination any valid ordinance upon the subject of fares which would bring the city within the purview of the proviso that the act should not operate as a repeal of any existing municipal ordinance, and we are of opinion that so far as concerns the question of fares there was not in Atlanta any municipal ordinance which could prevent the jurisdiction of the commission over the question of rates of fare from attaching. Under the view we take of the case we do not think it is necessary to determine whether there was or was not among the ordinances of the city one purporting to regulate the matter of fares on the street railroad, for whether there were such ordinances, or whether those ordinances on this subject had been repealed, cannot affect the decision on his branch of the case under the principles of law which we have held to be sound, for we are of opinion that the city of Atlanta was without authority to enact such an ordinance, and an ordinance passed without authority cannot have the effect of a law, but is void and without effect. Towns and cities have only such powers as are granted them by the state, either in their charters or in general laws, and in determining the question as to whether cities have the power to pass any ordinances in question we have to examine their charters and the general laws, for in that way are to be found the sources of their powers as municipalities, and in doing this it must be remembered that all grants of power to municipalities are to be strictly construed, and, if not expressly granted or necessarily implied from express grant of other powers, then no such grant of powers exists. "A grant of power to a municipal corporation must be construed strictly, and such a corporation can exercise no powers except such as are expressly given or are necessarily implied from express grants of other powers." Lofton v. Collins, 117 Ga. 438, 43 S. E. 710, 61 L. R. A. 150; Walker v. McNelly, 121 Ga. 114, 48 S. E. 718. In the case of Lockwood v. Muhlberg, 124 Ga. 662, 53 S. E. 92, it is said:

"And the rule is general that the powers granted to municipal corporations are to be strictly construed; and if there is a reasonable doubt of the existence of a particular power, the doubt is to be resolved in the negative. 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 950, and citations. 'The intent of the Legislature should be sought for in every instance, and carried out if possible; but the courts have generally favored the common-law rule that municipal like all grants of power from the state are to be construed in favor of the state, and against the grantee, whenever a reasonable doubt exists.' Tied. Mun. Corp. § 110. See, also, Dill Mun. Corp. § 88; McQuillin's Mun. Ord. § 48." Mayor v. Wilson, 49 Ga. 476; Frank v. City of Atlanta, 72 Ga. 428.

Applying these principles to the facts of the present case, we do not find that the city of Atlanta, nor the other municipalities whose right to fix fares upon street railroads is involved in this case, have the charter power to pass ordinances upon this subject. We do not think that the sections of the charter of the city of Atlanta giving them control over the streets, nor that authorizing the municipality to prescribe "reasonable charges to be collected by hacks, cabs, drays or other licensed vehicles for the transportation of persons," etc., nor that part of the charter authorizing them to pass ordinances generally for a municipal purpose not in conflict with the charter nor the Constitution or laws of this state or of the United States, nor similar provisions in the charter, grants to the city the power to fix the rates of fare upon lines of street railroad; that power is not expressly given in any of these provisions of the charter, nor is it to be necessarily inferred from any of the powers actually granted. Many authorities, including text-books, decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States, and decisions by the courts of other states, might be here quoted and cited to support the ruling which we have made, but we do not deem it necessary, as the doctrine here restated is so generally recognized, and the conclusion which we have reached under the facts in this particular case necessarily follows from an application of that doctrine.

[3] 3. In those cities, where there was no valid contract upon this subject, which we have pointed out, the Railroad Commission had power and authority, and it was their duty, to fix the fares upon the lines of railroad of the Georgia Railway & Power Company, for no ordinance passed by any of these municipalities upon the subject would be valid or binding, because where such ordinances were passed it was without charter authority to do so, and, as we have ruled in the preceding division of this opinion, any attempt to pass an ordinance on this subject was nugatory. Under the provisions of the act of 1907, except as to the two municipalities which we have indicated, the way is clear for the Railroad Commission of the state to perform the duty and exercise the power of fixing the rates in the municipalities involved in this case other than the two expressly named above.

No question as to the right to have the writ of mandamus issue in the event the Railroad Commission of the state has jurisdiction of the street railroads touching the matter of fares was raised; indeed it is stated in the bill of exceptions that both sides agreed that "procedure by mandamus was the proper procedure in the cause, and the parties so stated in open court."

It follows then from what we have above held that the court should have granted the writ requiring the commission to pass upon and determine the rates of fare upon the other lines of street railroad not covered by the contracts between the railway company and the cities of Decatur and College Park, and the judgment of the court below is reversed in so far as it refused to issue the writ of mandamus requiring the commission to take jurisdiction as indicated. The judgment is affirmed in so far as it refused the writ as to passenger fares covered by the contract between the towns of Decatur and College Park and the railway company.

Judgment reversed in part and affirmed in part.

All the Justices concur, except FISH, C. J., who dissents, and HILL, J., who dissents in part.

FISH, C. J. I cannot concur in the entire conclusion reached by the majority of the court. To my mind the state Railroad Commission, in view of the facts of the case and the law applicable thereto, rightly held that it was without jurisdiction to grant the relief sought by the railway company, and that the judge of the superior court correctly refused to grant the writ of mandamus against the commission. It follows, of course, that in my opinion the judgment under review should be affirmed in its entirety.

HILL, J. I cannot concur in the opinion of the majority of the court in its entirety. I concur in the judgment in so far as it reverses the judgment of the trial court, and dissent from that portion which affirms the judgment in part. The view I take of this case is that the Constitution of the state confers the exclusive power to make passenger rates, etc., upon the Legislature. Article 4, par. 1, of the Constitution (Civil Code 1910, § 6463), declares:

"The power and authority of regulating railroad freights and passenger tariffs, preventing unjust discriminations, and requiring reasonable and just rates of freight and passenger tariffs are hereby conferred upon the General Assembly, whose duty it shall be to pass laws, from time to time, to regulate freight and passenger tariffs, to prohibit unjust discriminations on the various railroads of this state, and to prohibit said roads from charging other than just and reasonable rates, and enforce the same by adequate penalties."

In pursuance of that authority the Legislature provided for the creation of the Railroad Commission of the state, with authority to regulate and fix freight and passenger rates, etc., over the railroads of this state, street railroads being excepted. Acts 1878-79, p. 125. In 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 72; Civil Code 1910, § 2662) the Legislature amended the act of 1878-79, and enlarged the powers of the Railroad Commission so as to include street railroads within its jurisdiction. Nowhere else is express authority conferred to make just and reasonable passenger fares or rates. Under the Constitution the General Assembly must fix the rates, and even that body could not contract as to rates. And if this is so, it could not authorize a municipality to so contract. Ga. R. R. v. Smith, 70 Ga. 694. article 3, § 7, par. 20, of the Constitution (Civil Code 1910, § 6448) provides:

"The General Assembly shall not authorize the construction of any street passenger railway within the limits of any incorporated town or city, without the consent of the corporate authorities."

And section 2600 of the Civil Code of 1910 declares:

"All the provisions of the preceding division shall govern in the incorporation, control, and management of suburban and street railroad companies, in so far as the same are applicable and appropriate thereto. Any number of persons, not less than ten, who desire to be incorporated for that purpose, may form a company as provided in the preceding division, with this additional requirement: That they must in their petition specify what city, town, or village, and in what streets thereof, they propose to construct and build said railroad: Provided, that no street railroad incorporated under this division shall be constructed within the limits of any incorporated town or city without the consent of the corporate authorities: And provided further, that all such street railroad companies incorporated under this division shall be subject to all just and reasonable rules and regulations by the corporate authorities, and liable for all assessments and other lawful burdens that may be imposed upon them from time to time: And provided further, only such of the powers and franchises that are conferred by said divisions shall belong to said street railroad companies as shall be necessary and appropriate. * * *

It is insisted that the last-quoted provision of the Constitution and Code section confer the power upon municipalities to contract rates. To this I cannot agree. Power cannot be granted which is inconsistent with the Constitution or the general law of the state. Civil Code, §§ 6391, 6392. To grant power to a municipality to make contract rates in this state would be inconsistent with both the Constitution and general law. The Constitution does provide that railways shall not be constructed on streets without the consent of the municipality. Civil Code, § 6448. But the power to consent to the construction and operation of street railroads over city streets does not include the power to make rates. City of Chicago v. O'Connell, 278 Ill. 591, 116 N. E. 210; Public Utilities Commission v. Chicago, 275 Ill. 555, 114 N. E. 325, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 50; Tampa Waterworks v. Tampa, 199 U. S. 241, 26 Sup. Ct. 23, 50 L. Ed. 170. Nor does the power to make rules and regulations as to the construction of street railroads in the streets of a city confer the authority to make rates. The city of Atlanta has not, by authority of the Constitution, nor its charter, nor general law of the state, authority to make rate ordinances or rate contracts relatively to the state itself. Rate making is not inherent in municipalities, and no such authority has been conferred in Georgia on them, either by the Constitution or general law of the state. See Henderson v. Heyward, 109 Ga. 377, 34 S. E. 590, 47 L. R. A. 366, 77 Am. St. Rep. 384. Even if the rate ordinances and contracts under review are "valid subsisting contracts," they must give way to the demands of the state whenever the state undertakes to exercise its police power in order to make change or revise rates through the Railroad Commission. And this would not have the effect of impairing the obligation of contracts. In Union Dry Goods Co. v. Ga. Public Service Co., 142 Ga. 841, 83 S. E. 946 (3), L. R. A. 1916E, 358, it was held by this court:

"The Railroad Commission Act of 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 72), giving to the commission jurisdiction over electrical lighting and power companies, and the order of the commission fixing maximum rates in the instant case, are not void as in opposition to the clauses in the federal and state Constitution prohibiting the passage of any ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or the taking of property without due process of law, or for public use without just compensation."

MAULTSBY v. GORE. (No. 296.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 2, 1919.)

RECEIVERS ⇨ 167—RIGHT TO RECOVER PROPERTY—AGREEMENT BY PERSON IN POSSESSION.

Where receiver made demand on defendant for possession of personalty, and defendant and son surrendered possession, and receiver rented property to defendant on his agreement to abide by court's order, and court ordered property to be delivered over to person for whom the receiver was such, and on demand defendant refused to surrender as he had agreed, receiver is entitled to recover property from defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Columbus County; Devin, Judge.

Action by E. A. Maultsby, receiver for Nellie Bright, against C. O. Gore, to recover possession of a mule, a buggy, and harness. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Donald MacRackan, of Whiteville, and S. Brown Shepherd, of Raleigh, for appellant. Irvin B. Tucker, of Whiteville, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. The plaintiff testified as follows:

"I know the property described in the complaint filed in this action. The property consists of one grey mule, one top buggy, and one harness. I was appointed receiver in the case of Nellie Bright v. T. L. Bright. I went out to see Mr. C. O. Gore. His son claimed the property. He said the property was his, and did not much want to give it up. They said they wanted to see their attorney. I told them, 'All right;' if they would agree to bring me the property next morning, I would leave the property with them; and they said, 'All right.' I left their place, and when I had gone about one mile Mr. Gore and his son overtook me. They said they had decided to give me up the property, and I took the property and brought it to Whiteville and kept it all night.

"The next day there was a hearing in the case of Nellie Bright v. T. L. Bright before Judge Bond, and the case was continued, and I released the mule to C. O. Gore. Alton Gore claimed the mule. I rented the mule to C. O. Gore, the defendant, in the presence of Joe Byrd, and the understanding was he would keep the mule, and pay me a nominal price for the use of the mule, not exceeding $3, provided Judge Bond ordered the mule to be returned back to Mrs. Nellie Bright, and they agreed to this. When Judge Bond ordered me to turn the property over to Mrs. Nellie Bright, I went to Mr. C. O. Gore, to whom I rented the mule, and told him what the order of the court was, and he said he would have to see his lawyer, and when he came back and told me he would not give up the mule, the matter went on for several days, and I did not take any other steps, and finally I did take claim and delivery."

This evidence shows that the plaintiff was appointed receiver in the case of Nellie Bright v. T. L. Bright; that as receiver he made demand upon the defendant for the possession of the property in controversy; that the defendant and his son surrendered the possession of the property to the plaintiff; that the plaintiff then rented the property to the defendant for a nominal rent, upon his agreement to abide by the order of the court in the action in which the plaintiff was appointed receiver as to the disposition of the property; that the court ordered the property to be delivered over to Mrs. Nellie Bright, and that upon demand the defendant refused to surrender the property as he had agreed to do; and this, in our opinion, is ample evidence, if believed by the jury, to entitle the plaintiff to recover possession of the property.

There is error in the judgment of nonsuit.

Reversed.

COX et al. v. KINSTON CAROLINA R. & LUMBER CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 26, 1919.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐660(1)—DISMISSAL FOR FAILURE TO DOCKET—CERTIORARI—LACHES.

Where appellee was entitled to dismiss under Court Rule 5 (174 N. C. 823, 81 S. E. vii) and Rule 17 (81 S. E. ix), and moved to dismiss at 1:30 p. m. on a certain day, and appellant thereafter at 6 p. m. on same day moved to docket and asked for certiorari for case on appeal on ground that judge had not settled case on appeal, motion of the appellee will be granted, as appellant was guilty of laches.

2. COURTS ⇐85(1)—RULES OF COURT—OBSERVANCE.

The rules of Supreme Court are necessary for regular and orderly dispatch of business and not perfunctory, to be observed or not as the parties may choose, and, where not observed, the negligent party must pay penalty of his neglect.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐567(2)—SETTLING CASE—TIME.

The time in which cases shall be settled on appeal being statutory, the court below has no power to extend the statutory time.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐567(2)—SETTLING CASE—EXTENSION OF TIME—CONSENT OF PARTIES.

Although parties by consent may extend the statutory time for the settling of a case on appeal, such practice will not be encouraged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Allen, Judge.

Action by James W. Cox, Jr., and others, against the Kinston Carolina Railroad & Lumber Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed.

By consent 30 days was given to serve case on appeal and 20 days thereafter to serve counter case. The appeal was required by the rules to be docketed here on or before Tuesday, February 25th, at 10 a. m., or the appellant was entitled to docket and dismiss under Rule 17 (81 S. E. ix), unless the case was docketed or a certiorari on good ground was applied for before the motion to dismiss was made.

Cowper, Whitaker & Hamme, of Kinston, for appellants.

J. S. Manning, of Raleigh, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. Rule 5 of this court (174 N. C. 823, 81 S. E. vii) provides:

"Rule 5. When Heard.—The transcript of the record on appeal from a judgment rendered before the commencement of a term of this court must be docketed at such term seven days before entering upon the call of the docket of the district to which it belongs, and stand for argument in its order; if not so docketed, the case shall be continued or dismissed under rule 17, if the appellee files a proper certificate prior to the docketing of the transcript."

[1] The appellee docketed and moved to dismiss at 1:30 p. m. on Saturday, March 1st, and was entitled to have the motion allowed. The appellant thereafter at 6 p. m. on the same day moved to docket and asked for a certiorari for the case on appeal upon the ground that the judge had not settled the case on appeal.

Without going into the controversy as to whose fault it was that the case was not settled in time, it is clear that the appellant was in laches in not applying for certiorari before the time at which under the procedure and practice of this court the appellee was entitled to docket and dismiss.

[2] As Judge Merrimon well observed in Walker v. Scott, 102 N. C. 490, 9 S. E. 488, the rules of the court are necessary for the regular and orderly dispatch of business and not perfunctory, to be observed or not as the parties may choose. If not observed, there would be a great waste of the time of this court in arguing whether or not the rule ought to be observed in a given case or ought not. It is absolutely necessary that these rules shall be observed and that a party who neglects to do so shall understand that he must pay the penalty of his neglect.

[3, 4] This court has always held that, the time in which cases shall be settled on appeal being statutory, the court below has no power to extend the statutory time. Gup-ton v. Sledge, 161 N. C. 213, 76 S. E. 527, and cases there cited. Though we have recognized the right of the parties by consent to extend the statutory time, it is not a practice to be encouraged and very frequently leads to such controversies as in this case. In this case, however, there was ample time to settle the appeal after the expiration of the extended time.

The appellee, having docketed the motion to dismiss, under rule 17, before the appellant filed his application for certiorari, was within his rights and is entitled to have the appeal dismissed, and the motion for certiorari must be denied. The necessity of the court adhering to its rules has been repeatedly stated. Among other cases, this is discussed in Calvert v. Carstarphen, 133 N. C. 25, 45 S. E. 353; Vivian v. Mitchell, 144 N. C. 477, 57 S. E. 167; Lee v. Baird, 146 N. C. 363, 59 S. E. 876.

We have, however, read the record with care and find no merits in the appeal which was probably taken merely for delay. In any event, the appellee is entitled to have his motion to dismiss allowed.

Appeal dismissed.

WILLIAMS v. KEARNEY et al. (No. 250.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 26, 1919.)

1. USE AND OCCUPATION \Leftrightarrow 1—CHARGEABILITY WITH RENTAL VALUE.

Defendant, having had the use and possession of plaintiff's farm, and having been credited with repairs held chargeable with the rental value, in plaintiff's action to recover money due by note and open account.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR \Leftrightarrow 1144 — REMAND—FAILURE TO PASS ON ITEM.

Where plaintiff, suing to recover money due by note and open account, defendant pleading a counterclaim, on hearing of exceptions to referee's report produced check drawn by himself in favor of defendant, and contended it had been collected by defendant without crediting plaintiff, and court did not pass on contention, plaintiff's application to court will be treated as in nature of motion for new trial for newly discovered evidence, and cause be remanded, with direction to hear evidence and find facts, and to allow or disallow credit for check accordingly, though the judgment as modified is affirmed.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR \Leftrightarrow 1144—AFFIRMANCE—ADDITIONAL FINDINGS.

Where Supreme Court, though affirming judgment as modified, is not able to determine from referee's report, in action to recover money due by note and open account, just how far contentions of plaintiff as to items of account have been passed upon in findings of fact, trial court will be directed to make additional findings thereon.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR \Leftrightarrow 1022(2)—REVIEW—SUPPORT OF FINDINGS.

The referee's findings of fact, supported by evidence, and adopted by the trial court, are conclusive on the Supreme Court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Franklin County; Calvert, Judge.

Action by O. S. Williams against Isaac H. Kearney and another. From a judgment for plaintiff for a less amount than claimed, he appeals. Judgment, except as modified, affirmed, with reservation, and cause remanded.

This is an action to recover money alleged to be due by note and by open account, in which the defendant pleaded a counterclaim.

The plaintiff alleges in his complaint that the defendant is indebted to him in the sum of $10,000 or $12,000, by note and open account, and the defendant in his answer admits part of the debt to be due and alleges that the plaintiff is indebted to him in the sum of about $14,000, due by open account.

The accounts of the plaintiff and the defendant involve many items and cover several years.

The issues raised by the pleadings were tried before a referee and an account stated, and they were then heard by his honor on exceptions filed by the plaintiff to the report, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $946.22 with interest from August 26, 1918, from which the plaintiff appealed, contending that he was entitled to a larger recovery.

T. T. Hicks, of Henderson, for appellant.
W. M. Person, of Louisburg, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. The defendant admits that there is a mistake in the account against the plaintiff of $33.51 for sawing timber, and that he was in possession of the McGee farm and was allowed in the account $288, for repairs made while in possession, and that he was not charged with the rental value of $200.

[1] The judgment must be reformed in these two particulars, as the mistake as to the timber is admitted, and the defendant, having had the use and possession of the McGee farm, and being allowed for his repairs, is justly chargeable with the rental value.

[2] At the hearing of the exceptions before his honor, the plaintiff produced a check drawn by himself in favor of the defendant and showing on its face that it had been given for cotton seed, and contended that the check had been collected by the defendant, and that, although he had been charged with the value of the cotton seed, he had not been given credit for the check.

His honor, not understanding that the check was offered in evidence, did not pass on this contention of the plaintiff, and to the end that a true account may be stated, and treating the application of the plaintiff as in the nature of a motion for a new trial for newly discovered evidence, the cause is remanded, with the direction to hear evidence and find the facts, and to allow or disallow the credit for the check according as the facts are found.

The court is also directed to make more specific findings on the following contentions:

1. The plaintiff contends that the purchase price of the Hight land was $3,775.50, and that the note executed for a part of the purchase money was $3,303.56, and that he paid the difference between these two amounts and has been allowed no credit therefor.

This seems to be admitted by the defendant, but the fact is not specifically found by the referee or by the court.

2. The plaintiff contends that he paid for the Armory lot for the benefit of the defendant, and that certain cotton delivered to him and with which he has been charged, was in payment therefor, and that this ought to be stricken out, or that he ought to be credited with the price of the lot.

[3] We are not able to determine from the report just how far these contentions have been passed upon in findings of fact, and the court will therefore make additional findings thereon.

[4] The other exceptions of the plaintiff, except as to interest, which has not been pressed upon the argument because interest was not allowed on either account, involve practically findings of fact, supported by evidence, which are conclusive upon us, and the judgment, except as modified by correcting the mistake as to the timber and the rental value of the McGee lot, is affirmed, reserving, however, further modification of the judgment in accordance with the findings upon the three items herein specifically referred to, to wit, the check presented to his honor, the difference between the note executed and the purchase price of the Hight lot and the items of debit and credit as to the Armory lot.

Remanded.

JONES-ONSLOW LAND CO. v. WOOTEN
et al. (No. 219.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 26, 1919.)

1. JUDGMENT ¶143(10)—DEFAULT—"EXCUSABLE NEGLIGENCE."

Failure of defendant to pay any attention to cause, though complaint had been on file six months and his counsel two months previously had left the county to enter the army, was not "excusable neglect."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Excusable Neglect.]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶1024(4)—FINDINGS—REVIEW.

On appeal from order setting aside judgment by default final, the facts found by the trial judge are conclusive if there is any evidence on which to base findings.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶842(1)—MATTERS OF LAW—REVIEW.

On appeal from order setting aside judgment by default final, whether the facts found constitute excusable neglect or not is a matter of law and reviewable on appeal.

4. JUDGMENT ¶145(2)—DEFAULT—SETTING ASIDE—MERITORIOUS DEFENSE.

Although the facts found justify conclusion that neglect was excusable, the court cannot set aside default judgment, unless there is a meritorious defense.

5. ADVERSE POSSESSION ¶73—ACTUAL POSSESSION—COLOR OF TITLE.

Where plaintiff has an unbroken chain of title running back to a grant issued about 1795, and defendants' claim of title runs back to a grant in 1893, any actual possession of defendants or those under whom they claim would be of no avail, in view of Revisal 1905, § 1699, providing that every grant made since March, 1893, of land theretofore granted shall constitute no color of title.

Appeal from Superior Court, Onslow County; Allen, Judge.

Action by the Jones-Onslow Land Company against J. S. Wooten and another. From an order setting aside a prior judgment by default final, obtained by plaintiff, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

T. D. Warren and A. D. Ward, both of Newbern, for appellant.

Cowper, Whitaker & Hamme, of Kinston, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. [1] This was a motion by J. S. Wooten, one of the defendants, to set aside a judgment by default final, rendered at October term, 1918, on the allegation that the judgment was irregular, and also on the ground of excusable neglect. There was no irregularity in taking the judgment, and upon the facts found the neglect of the defendant was not excusable.

This action was begun by the plaintiff, alleging that it was in possession and asking to set aside the claim of the defendant as a cloud upon title. The summons issued in June, 1913, returnable to Onslow. The complaint, duly verified, was filed at April term, 1918. There was no answer filed at that term, and the July term of the court was not held. At October term, 1918, no answer having been filed, the plaintiff took judgment by default final. The judge finds that the defendant originally employed T. C. Wooten, counsel residing at Kinston to defend him; that subsequently he dispensed with the services of said counsel, though it does not appear when, and employed J. Frank Wooten, counsel resident in Jacksonville, to attend to the case; that on August 15, 1918, said J. Frank Wooten entered the army, but he had not entered an appearance in the action, and had filed no answer. It does not appear that the defendant had paid any attention to the cause at all, though the complaint had been on file six months and his counsel two months previously had left the county to enter the army, which must have been a matter well known to him. This was not such conduct as a man of ordinary prudence would have given to his important business matters.

In Roberts v. Allman, 106 N. C. 391, 11 S. E. 424, it is held:

"It is not enough that parties to a suit should engage counsel and leave it entirely in his charge. They should, in addition to this, give to it that amount of attention which a man of ordinary prudence usually gives to his important business."

This case cites many others to same effect, and has itself been cited often since. See 106 N. C. Anno. Ed. Besides, it is not necessary to discuss the point, for there is no finding by the judge that the defendant has a meritorious defense, nor would the facts found have sustained such finding.

[2,3] Unless the judge finds that there was excusable neglect and this finding is correct as a matter of law, he is not authorized to set aside the judgment. The facts found by him are conclusive if there is any evidence on which to base such finding of fact. Whether the facts found constitute excusable neglect or not is a matter of law, and reviewable upon appeal.

[4] But even when the facts found justify a conclusion that the neglect was excusable, the court cannot set aside the judgment unless there is a meritorious defense. Norton v. McLaurin, 125 N. C. 185, 34 S. E. 269, where the subject is fully discussed with full citation of authorities. See, also, cases cited thereto in the Anno. Ed. In the recent case of Glisson v. Glisson, 153 N. C. 188, 69 S. E. 56, Brown, J., says:

"Unless the court can now see reasonably that defendants had a good defense, or that they could make a defense that would affect the judgment, why should it engage in the vain work of setting the judgment aside? Jeffries v. Aaron, 120 N. C. 169 [26 S. E. 696]; Cherry v. Canal Co., 140 N. C. 423 [53 S. E. 138, 111 Am. St. Rep. 850, 6 Ann. Cas. 143]."

This is cited with approval by Walker, J., Harris v. Bennett, 160 N. C. 347, 76 S. E. 217.

In the still more recent case of Lumber Co. v. Cottingham, 173 N. C. 329, 92 S. E. 12, Walker, J., after citing and approving the analysis set out in Norton v. McLaurin, supra, says:

"It would be idle to vacate a judgment if there is no real and substantial defense on the merits. But we need not decide as to this feature of the case, for there must be both excusable neglect and a meritorious defense, as the cases cited by us will show."

In Crumpler v. Hines, 174 N. C. 284, 93 S. E. 780, Allen, J., citing many authorities, says:

"One who asks to be relieved from a judgment on the ground of excusable neglect must show merit, as otherwise the court would be asked to do the vain thing of setting aside a judgment when it would be its duty to enter again the same judgment on motion of the adverse party."

[5] The judge further finds as facts that the plaintiff's and defendants' chain of title both cover the land in controversy; that defendants' chain of title is a grant March 10, 1898, mesne conveyances to T. C. Wooten, who on February 17, 1911, conveyed to the defendants by deed, which was recorded February 27, 1911; also that the "plaintiff's claim is under grant issued about 1795, which covers land in controversy, also under tax deeds, and connected with same by unbroken chain of title"; and also that it acquired the T. C. Wooten title (under which defendants claim) by lien which attached prior to the said Wooten's deed to defendants, by virtue of a regular sale under execution on a judgment against T. C. Wooten docketed in Onslow on February 10, 1911, 11 days before the deed from said Wooten to the defendants was registered, and 7 days before it purports to have been executed.

There is not only no finding, or evidence set out in any affidavit to justify such finding, of any actual possession by defendants or those under whom they claim; but, even if they had been in actual possession from the date of the grant, it would have been of no avail, as the grant was issued after 1893, to wit, March 10, 1898. Revisal, § 1699, provides:

"Every grant of land made since the sixth day of March, eighteen hundred and ninety-three, in pursuance of the statutes regulating entries and grants shall, if such land or any portion thereof has been heretofore granted by this state, so far as relates to any such land heretofore granted, be absolutely void for all purposes whatever, shall confer no rights whatever upon the grantee or grantees therein or those claiming under such grantee or grantees, and shall in no case and under no circumstances constitute any color of title * * * to any person whomsoever."

The statute was sustained in Weaver v. Love, 146 N. C. 414, 59 S. E. 1041.

Upon the facts found the defendant has not shown any meritorious defense, and the judge has not so found.

The judgment below must be reversed.

(177 N. C. 256)

BARNES et. al. v. SALEEBY et al.
(No. 105.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 2, 1919.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE ⇨161(1)—APPEAL—TIME FOR.

Appeals from justice's judgments should be docketed at the next term of the superior court.

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE ⇨161(1)—APPEAL—"NEXT TERM."

The phrase "next term," within rule requiring appeals from justice's judgments to be docketed at the next term, means any term, whether civil or criminal, that begins next after the expiration of the ten days allowed for service of notice of appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Next Term.]

3. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE ⇨161(1)—APPEAL.

The superior court has no power to permit the docketing of an appeal at a term subsequent to the one to which it should have been returned, though if the appeal is docketed it can allow for cause the notice of appeal to be entered nunc pro tunc.

4. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE ⇨161(1)—APPEAL—ABSENCE OF COURT AT ENSUING TERM.

An appeal from a justice of the peace to superior court should be docketed at the next ensuing term, though the judge did not attend such term; all matters pending thereat being carried over to the next term in view of Revisal 1905, § 1510.

5. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE ⇨202(1)—APPEAL—RECORDARI.

On appeal from a justice of the peace to the superior court, where justice did not make a return of the notice of appeal during the next term, it was appellant's duty, where superior court judge was absent from such next term, to file motion for a recordari during such next term to preserve his right to have the case tried at the next succeeding term of the superior court.

6. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE ⇨161(1)—APPEAL—FAILURE TO DOCKET AT NEXT TERM.

Upon appellant's failure to docket appeal from justice of the peace to superior court at the next term, appellee, under Revisal 1905, § 608, could move to dismiss at such term, but his failure to so do did not estop him from asserting appellant's failure to docket appeal at the next term as a bar to the trial of the case in the superior court.

7. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF ⇨44(4) — PAROL LEASE FOR INDEFINITE PERIOD.

Landlord's verbal agreement not to rent property while it was occupied by tenant without first giving the tenant an opportunity to renew his five-year lease, being a verbal contract to lease for an indefinite period, is void under the statute of frauds.

8. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇨86(1) — CONTRACT TO LEASE—CONSIDERATION.

Landlord's agreement during the lease, and not constituting part of lease, not to lease property without first giving tenant an opportunity to renew lease was unenforceable, being without consideration.

9. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF ⇨129(7) — PAROL CONTRACT TO LEASE—IMPROVEMENTS.

That tenant had made improvements did not take landlord's parol agreement not to rent property while tenant was in occupancy, without first giving tenant opportunity to renew his lease, out of the statute of frauds.

10. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF ⇨129(5)—VERBAL CONTRACT TO LEASE—PARTIAL PAYMENT.

A partial payment of the purchase money or of lease money would not validate a verbal contract rendered void by the statute of frauds.

11. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇨89½—RIGHTS OF TENANT—RENEWAL OF LEASE.

Tenant, in the absence of an agreement, has neither a legal nor an equitable right to a renewal of the lease.

12. EVIDENCE ⇨441(4) — LEASE — PAROL AGREEMENT.

In the case of a written lease, evidence of an oral contemporaneous agreement to renew or extend the lease is not admissible to add to the written lease, in accordance with the general rule that evidence of oral contemporaneous agreements is inadmissible to add to or vary written contracts.

13. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇨86(1)—OPTION TO RENEW—CONSIDERATION.

An option in the original lease to renew would not be without consideration, but a promise during the lease to give the tenant such option is without consideration.

14. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨786—DISPOSITION—DISMISSAL.

Wherever it appears upon the record that no serious assignment of error is made, the appeal will be dismissed.

15. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨786—DISMISSAL—FRIVOLOUS APPEAL—EFFECT OF BOND.

A frivolous appeal by hold-over tenant will be dismissed, though bond had been given for payment of rent, as landlord is entitled to his property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wilson County; Bond, Judge.

Action by E. T. Barnes and another against G. R. Saleeby and others. From a judgment dismissing appeal from justice of the peace to the superior court, defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed.

This action—summary proceedings in ejectment—was begun before a justice of the peace in Wilson county on January 2, 1919, and heard the same day. Judgment for possession and for costs was rendered, from which the defendant, in open court, January 2, 1919, gave notice of appeal to the superior court, and filed with the justice a bond to stay execution. The next ensuing regular term of the superior court was scheduled by statute to be held the week beginning January 13, 1919. The judge did not attend that term of the court, although the clerk had placed all cases returnable to and pending in the court on the docket. The justice before whom the case was heard did not make any return of the notice of appeal until February 1, 1919. The appellant did not file with the clerk any motion or papers of any kind, with reference to the case during the week commencing January 13, 1919.

A regular two-weeks term of the superior court of Wilson convened on February 3, 1919. On the first day of the term, the plaintiff made a motion, on notice to the defendant, to dismiss the appeal, stating that he desired the appeal dismissed, but if the defendant would consent to a trial of the case on its merits, the motion to dismiss the appeal would be withdrawn and the case tried on its merits. The court continued this motion until Thursday of that week, when the motion was again made; the plaintiff again offering to withdraw the motion if the defendant would consent to a trial of the case on its merits. The case could not be tried except by consent because of rule 24 of Practice in Superior Court (81 S. E. xix). Upon the defendants again declining to consent to a trial of the case on its merits, the plaintiff insisted on his motion, and judgment dismissing the appeal was entered as set out in the record. From the judgment dismissing the appeal the defendant gave notice, in open court, of an appeal to the Supreme Court, and filed bond for rent, to stay execution as provided by statute.

As appears from the certificate of the clerk of the superior court, the defendant has paid into the office of the clerk of the superior court $70 rent due from January 1, 1919, to the date of the judgment, February 6, 1919.

On February 8, 1919, the appellees served notice on the appellant that motion would be made in the Supreme Court at the opening of court on Tuesday, February 18, 1919, to docket the appeal and dismiss same for the reason that the appeal was not taken in good faith from any error in the judgment, as would appear from an inspection of the record, but was taken merely for the purpose of delay.

This motion was made on February 18th, and the court ordered the transcript printed and the appeal placed at the foot of the calendar of the Seventh District for hearing.

John E. Woodard, of Wilson, for appellants.

W. A. Lucas, of Wilson, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. The defendants entered into the possession of a store on Nash street in Wilson on January 1, 1914, under a written lease, by the terms of which the defendants were to make certain repairs, in consideration of which they were to enjoy the occupancy of the premises at a stipulated rent for a term of five years ending December 31, 1918.

In the answer of the defendants to the motion made in this court to dismiss the appeal, the defendants say that after the repairs had been made and they had been in the possession of the property for two years or more, they approached the plaintiff, E. T. Barnes, and requested him to negotiate with them before the property was leased to others, and the plaintiff, Barnes, said that he would do so.

On January 1, 1917, the plaintiff, E. T. Barnes, in a written contract leased the property to the Barnes-Graves Grocery Company, his coplaintiff, for a term of three years commencing January 1, 1919, and immediately notified the defendants of this fact. On January 1, 1919, the defendants refused to vacate and surrender the possession of the property, and this action was instituted.

There was no error in dismissing the appeal from the justice of the peace. Judgment was rendered, and notice of appeal to the superior court given in open court when the judgment was rendered on January 2, 1919. The next term of Wilson superior court was January 13, 1919.

[1, 2] Appeals from justice's judgments should be docketed at the "next term." Barnes v. Railroad, 133 N. C. 131, 45 S. E. 531; Sondley v. Asheville, 110 N. C. 89, 14 S. E. 514; Ballard v. Gay, 108 N. C. 544, 13 S. E. 207. "Next term" means any term, whether civil or criminal, that begins next after the expiration of the ten days allowed for service of notice of appeal. Blair v. Coakley, 136 N. C. 408, 48 S. E. 804; Johnson v. Andrews, 132 N. C. 376, 43 S. E. 926; Pants Co. v. Smith, 125 N. C. 588, 34 S. E. 552; Davenport v. Grissom, 113 N. C. 38, 18 S. E. 78; Sondley v. Asheville, supra.

[3, 4] The superior court has no power to permit the docketing of an appeal at a term subsequent to the one to which it should have been returned, though if the appeal is docketed it can allow for cause the notice of appeal to be entered nunc pro tunc. Davenport v. Grissom, supra; Abell v. Power Co., 159 N. C. 348, 74 S. E. 881. The fact that the judge did not attend the January term did not relieve the appellant of the duty of seeing that his appeal was properly docketed at the "next ensuing term." All matters pending at the January term were, by operation of Revisal, § 1510, carried over to the next term in the same plight and condition. State v. Horton, 123 N. C. 695, 31 S. E. 218.

[5, 6] If the defendant had filed his motion for a recordari during the week commencing January 13th, as it was his duty to do, then the motion would have gone over to the February term, and the rights of the defendant would have been preserved. Besides no merits were shown to justify the application for a recordari. It is true the appellee could have docketed the appeal at the January term of the superior court and have moved to dismiss (Revisal, § 608), but this was optional and not a requirement, and failure to do this was not an estoppel upon the appellee. Davenport v. Grissom, supra.

In the third paragraph of the defendant's answer to the petition filed in this court for a dismissal of the appeal, the defendant attempts to justify his holding over after the expiration of the term, and uses the following words:

"In 1916, long before the expiration of his lease, the respondent, desiring to retain possession of said premises, so expressed himself, with interest and earnestness, to the petitioner, who, in the conversation referred to above, and upon several occasions, both prior and subsequent to that time, assured respondent that he had improved the property, had paid his rents promptly, and had, in every way, made an entirely satisfactory tenant, and that he would not rent the property while it was occupied by respondent, without first giving the respondent the refusal thereof, and an opportunity to renew his lease."

[7, 8] This was denied by the plaintiff, and, being on its face a verbal contract to lease for an indefinite period, is void; moreover, it is not enforceable because without consideration.

[9, 10] The allegation, if it were admitted, that, the defendant having made some improvements on the land, the plaintiff verbally promised to renew the lease, would not avoid the statute of frauds when pleaded. Product Co. v. Dunn, 142 N. C. 474, 55 S. E. 299. Even partial payment of the purchase money, or of lease money, would not validate a verbal contract rendered void by the statute of frauds.

[11, 12] "As between a landlord and his tenant, the latter, in the absence of an agreement therefor, has neither a legal nor an equitable right to a renewal of his lease, and, in the case of a written lease, evidence of an oral contemporaneous agreement to renew or extend the lease is not admissible to add to the written lease, in accordance with the general rule that evidence of oral contemporaneous agreements are inadmissible to add to or vary written contracts." 16 R. C. L. 883, and cases there cited. The promise here alleged to have been made during the term is void because not in writing and of uncertain duration.

[13] Even where the agreement is in writing, and in the lease itself, giving the lessee the "privilege of occupying the premises till such further time as he may wish on the same terms, the right to renewal has been denied upon the ground that the duration of the proposed new lease was uncertain." 16 R. C. L. 886. A fortiori is this true where the alleged agreement is oral, and is without any consideration to support it. An option in the original lease to renew would not be without consideration, but "a promise during the lease to give the tenant such option is without consideration, besides being void if not in writing." 16 L. R. A. 886.

[14, 15] The plaintiff's motion to dismiss in this court should be allowed. Wherever it appears upon the record, as in this case, that no serious assignment of error is made, the appeal will be dismissed. Blount v. Jones, 175 N. C. 708, 95 S. E. 541; Ludwick v. Mining Co., 171 N. C. 61, 85 S. E. 949. It is true that the defendant has given bond for the rent during the delay, but this does not deprive the plaintiff of his right to the custody of his own property. He may have leased the property to his coplaintiffs at a higher rent, or it may be that he has objection to the continuance of the defendant as his renter. Otherwise, he would doubtless have renewed the lease. It is not incumbent upon the plaintiff to show why he did not renew the lease to the defendant.

The defendant was offered opportunity in the court below at the February term to try his case, and did not choose to avail himself of it. In the court below, and here, the ground asserted by the defendant for retaining the plaintiff's property after the expiration of the lease is on its face invalid and frivolous.

There was no error in the dismissal of the appeal below, and the motion to docket and dismiss in this court is allowed. The plaintiffs should not longer be kept out of possession, without legal cause.

Appeal dismissed.

In a negligence case, where defendant sets up contributory negligence of an employe of plaintiff, such defense must be proven by the defendant by the greater weight of the evidence.

5. NEGLIGENCE §90—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE OF EMPLOYE—SCOPE OF EMPLOYMENT.

In an action against a railroad for damages caused by fire, plaintiff is not responsible for the negligence of an employe in failing to put out a fire, where putting out fires was not within the scope of the employe's employment.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR §216(2)—MATTERS REVIEWABLE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the court instructed clearly upon an issue, a party cannot complain that the instruction should have been fuller, where he asked no instruction upon such point.

Appeal from Superior Court, Franklin County; Stacy, Judge.

Action by I. H. Kearney against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company.

This action is to recover damages for property alleged to have been burned by the negligence of the defendant. From a verdict and judgment for $10,000, the defendant appealed. No error.

White & Malone, W. H. Yarborough, and W. M. Person, all of Louisburg, for appellee.

CLARK, O. J. [1] Owing to the amount involved, this case has required very full consideration of all the exceptions, but it really turned almost entirely upon controverted facts of which the jury were the arbiters. The plaintiff contended that the fire was due to the negligence of the defendant in permitting its right of way to become foul and its engine emitting sparks, which set fire to the right of way and thus destroyed his property. The defendant contended that the fire originated in the plaintiff's boiler room. The train alleged to have set out the fire passed about 3 p. m., and the fire was discovered raging about 2:30 next morning. There was evidence that there was a fire on the defendant's right of way after the train passed. There was evidence that this fire was put out by a clerk of the plaintiff, and circumstantial evidence that, though he attempted to put it out, he failed to do so. There was conflict in the testimony of the witnesses of plaintiff and of defendant as to what was the first building to burn. The plaintiff's witnesses testified that the building nearest the railroad burned first, while defendant's witnesses said the fire originated in plaintiff's boiler room, which was about the center of the lot. These were matters for the consideration of the jury, and there was sufficient evidence to be submitted to them tending to show that the fire resulted from the negligence of the defendant. It has been uniformly held by us that, in passing upon the motion to nonsuit, the evidence in support of plaintiff's claim must be accepted as true, and construed in the light most favorable to him. Boney v. Railroad, 175 N. C. 354, 97 S. E. 560. There is no need to review the evidence. The motion to nonsuit was properly denied.

[2] The defendant relies strongly upon the lapse of time between the passage of the train at 3 p. m. and the outbreak of the fire burning the buildings; but this was a matter for the consideration of the jury. In Hardy v. Lumber Co., 160 N. C. 118, 75 S. E. 855, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 759, there was a lapse of 12 days, during which the fire seems to have smoldered. The question of proximate cause in this case was submitted to the jury in accordance with the principles and authorities in that well-considered case.

[3, 4] The other exceptions are settled by Hardy v. Lumber Co., supra, and the cases therein cited. We need only to consider at more detail exceptions 18, 31, and 32, that the court refused to charge the jury that—

"If the jury shall find from the evidence that Emmett Edwards, as an employe of the plaintiff, failed to put out the fire when by the exercise of a prudent man he should have done so, the plaintiff could not recover."

There is no averment in the answer to support such a plea, which would be an allegation of contributory negligence. Revisal, § 483, specifically requires that such plea should have been set up in the answer. See Hardy v. Lumber Co., supra. If this defense had been set up in the answer, and if there had been evidence tending to show that it was within the scope of Edwards' duty, still the prayer would have been defective, because such defense must be proven by the defendant by the greater weight of the evidence.

[5] Besides, though Edwards was an employe of the plaintiff, there is no allegation, and no evidence which tends to show, that it was within the scope of his duty to put out fires. He was a clerk or manager of the store. An employer is not responsible for the negligence of his employe outside the scope of his employment. Especially in respect to preventing damages from fire the rule is thus stated in 83 Cyc. 1346, note 56:

"An employe of the owner in another business not connected with the property is under no legal obligation to protect it, and his omission to do so is not contributory negligence on the part of the owner."

[6] We do not think that the other exceptions require discussion. The court instructed clearly upon the question of proximate cause, and, though the defendant expects that the charge should have been fuller in that regard, the defendant asked no instructions upon that point. Hardy v. Lumber Co., supra.

The charge of the court seems sufficiently clear and full. The defendant was charged in the complaint with negligence in two respects, and the plaintiff put on evidence to sustain both allegations, yet the defendant put on no evidence in denial of either the foul right of way or of negligence in putting out fire on such right of way. The controversy, as submitted to the jury upon the facts, was whether fire was set out by the negligence of the defendant, and whether the fire thus set out spread to and destroyed the plaintiff's property.

The amount involved justified the very thorough discussion in the argument and briefs here, and the facts were doubtless fully presented to, and thoroughly understood by, the jury, who have found their verdict in favor of the contentions of the plaintiff.

Upon the questions of law presented to us by the exceptions of the defendant we find—
No error.

THOMPSON v. STANDARD OIL CO.
(No. 323.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 2, 1919.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT §101, 102(1) — DUTY OF EMPLOYER—SAFE PLACE TO WORK.

Employer in exercise of reasonable care is required to furnish employes a safe place in which to work.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT §101, 102(1) — DUTY OF EMPLOYER—SAFE APPLIANCES.

Employer in the exercise of reasonable care is required to furnish employes implements, tools, and appliances suitable for the work in which they are engaged.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT §230(1)—INJURY TO EMPLOYE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—INEXPERIENCE.

The extent of injured employe's experience is not always necessarily controlling upon question of the employe's contributory negligence.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT §289(37)—JURY QUESTION—NEGLIGENCE OF MASTER.

Where employe was ordered to scotch moving car, and the only implement he had for such purpose was a pinch bar, which was inadequate, and the order given the employe was one calling for instant obedience, and one which was naturally obeyed with the only implement the employe had, the submission to jury of the question of employer's negligence was not prejudicial to employer.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT §288(16) — ASSUMPTION OF RISK — OBEDIENCE OF COMMAND—USE OF INADEQUATE TOOL.

Where employe used pinch bar, the only tool furnished him, in effort to scotch moving car in obedience to order, and was injured because of inadequacy of pinch bar for such purpose, the submission to jury of question of assumption of risk was not prejudicial to employer; such order being one calling for instant obedience, and was naturally obeyed with the only implement the employe then had.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alamance County; Devin, Judge.

Action by Samuel Thompson against the Standard Oil Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

The action is to recover damages for injuries caused by the negligence of defendant company, the employer, in supplying plaintiff, an employe, with an improper tool or implement with which to do his work, to wit, placing a car on a railroad track in proper position, and by a negligent order as to the present use of said implement, given by a Mr. Fowler, who was there in personal charge of the work and who stood towards plaintiff and his coemployes in the position of vice principal. On denial of liability and pleas of contributory negligence and assumption of risk, the jury rendered a verdict for plaintiff, assessing substantial damages. Judgment on the verdict for plaintiff, and defendant excepted and appealed. There was no evidence offered by defendant, and the errors assigned are that, at close of plaintiff's testimony, his honor failed to instruct the jury as requested that, if they should find the facts to be as testified to by the witnesses, they must answer the issue of negligence and of contributory negligence and assumption of risk for defendant.

Parker & Long, of Graham, and Jas. H. Pou, of Raleigh, for appellant.

R. C. Strudwick, of Greensboro, and T. C. Carter, of Mebane, for appellee.

HOKE, J. From the admissions in the pleadings and the facts in evidence, it appears that, in July, 1917, plaintiff and one or two others, co-workers in the employment of the defendant company for the purpose, were engaged in placing a tank car of the company, then on the railroad track, in a proper position in reference to one of its subsidiary tanks, to the end that its contents might be emptied into the stationary tank by means of a hose, etc.; that the work was being done in the presence and under the personal supervision and direction of one

J. O. Fowler, also an employé of the company, and who stood towards plaintiff and his co-workers in the position of vice principal; that, the tank car being a short distance out of position and downgrade, plaintiff and his coemployés were "pinching" it upgrade using for the purpose a pinch bar supplied by said Fowler from the company's toolhouse on the premises. This pinch bar is not described in the record, but it is evidently an implement or a tool made of wood and iron, designed for pushing a car upgrade and affording a leverage, in part, by means of a long handle, fitted in some way into the contrivance or annexed as a part of it. It is sometimes spoken of, by the witnesses, as a crowbar, and it is evidently similar to some extent, though it is, as stated, in some way so constructed as to fit it for the purpose in which it was then being used. Speaking more directly to the occurrence, the plaintiff, testifying in his own behalf, said, among other things:

"The car was on the side track, south of the main track, and when we got there the car was not at the right place, and Mr. Fowler said, 'Boys, it has got to be pinched up a little; it is not at the place.' We pinched it up, and pinched a little too far ahead, and he applied the brakes and said, 'Boys, this car is a little too far ahead now.' He took a plough point and put in where he wanted the car to come; and he got back on the car to let the brakes off, so the car would come down, but the car stood still, and he said, 'Boys, get behind there and give it a little start.' I had the pinch bar, and I went behind and pinched it, and it started to rolling, and I made right back for the front, and I looked up, and Fowler was putting the brakes on, and he said, 'Scotch it! Scotch it!' And I put the bar under it, and that is all I know. Fowler called, 'Scotch it! Scotch it!' And I attempted to scotch it with the pinch bar. That was all I had to scotch it with. There were brakes on both ends of the car, and Fowler was on front, or west end of car. When we commenced to pinch he was on the car at the brakes, and he said, 'Boys, it is a little bit too far ahead now.' Me and Sam and Hoskins were pinching the car, and we pinched it too far east. Fowler put on brakes, and they held the car. The grade there slopes west. He told us to go behind, to the east end of the car, and give it a start. He had released the brake, and we pinched the car, and it began to roll west, and I came around on the south side of car and had pinch bar in my hand, and had gotten about middleways of car when Fowler said, 'Scotch it! Scotch it!' and I put pinch bar under front end of the car, and that is all I remember."

Other witnesses confirmed this statement, saying also: That just before getting on the car to manage the brakes Fowler put a plough point on the track to indicate where it should be stopped and, having directed his helpers to give the car a start, it rolled down the track, crushing the plough point, and he called to plaintiff, who had walked forward with the bar in his hand, "Scotch it, Sam, scotch it!" That plaintiff in the endeavor to obey his order, put the end of the pinch bar before one of the wheels, when it was knocked up, the end striking plaintiff under the chin and knocking him onto the track and causing him to receive permanent and painful physical injuries. Further, Sam Caine, testifying for plaintiff, said:

"Mr. Fowler got on top of car and took off brakes, and it would not start, and he told us to give him a little start. Mr. Fowler had put plow point on track where he wanted car to stop. Me, Sam Thompson, and Hoskins went to east end of car and pinched it, and it started to roll west, and we started back to west end of car on south side, and Mr. Fowler said 'Scotch it,' and I don't know whether he said Sam or not, but Sam Thompson ran with the crowbar and put it under the wheel, and the crowbar hit him under the chin, and that knocked him into the middle of the track. I had started to get a stick of wood at the brickkiln, which was not far, when I saw Sam Thompson was struck. I went back to him and did not get the wood. Thompson was lying in middle of track, and his foot was mashed, and his head and tongue cut. When the car rolled on the plow point, it mashed it all to pieces. Sam Thompson had crowbar when Mr. Fowler said 'Scotch it,' and neither of the other two had anything. Mr. Fowler had provided nothing to scotch it with except plow point."

[1, 2] It is the accepted principle in this state that an employer of labor, in the exercise of reasonable care, is required to furnish his employes a safe place to work and provide them with implements, tools, and appliances suitable for the work in which they are engaged. Kiger v. Scales Co., 162 N. C. 133, 78 S. E. 76; Mincey v. Coast Line, 161 N. C. 467, 77 S. E. 673; Reid v. Rees Co., 155 N. C. 231, 71 S. E. 315; Hicks v. Manufacturing Co., 138 N. C. 319, 50 S. E. 703. And it has been repeatedly held that the position may be recognized in the case of simple, ordinary tools, where the defect "is of a kind importing menace of substantial injury, having due regard to the nature of the work and the manner of doing it, and it is further shown that the employer knew of such defect, or should have found it out under the duty of inspection ordinarily incumbent upon him in tools of that kind, etc. King v. Atlantic Coast Line, 174 N. C. 89, 93 S. E. 378; Rogerson v. Hontz, etc., 174 N. C. 27, 93 S. E. 376; Wright v. Thompson, 171 N. C. 88, 87 S. E. 963; Reid v. Rees, 155 N. C. 231, 71 S. E. 315; Mercer v. Railroad, 154 N. C. 399, 70 S. E. 742, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 1002. And, in this connection, there are numerous decisions to the effect that the general directions or present and special orders of a boss or higher employé, one who represents the employer and stands towards the workmen in the position of vice principal, may be considered as a relevant fact when it is one from which in itself or in connection with the attendant circumstances the fact of negligence may be reasonably inferred. Atkins v. Madry, 174 N. C. 187, 93 S. E. 744; Howard v. Oil Co., 174 N. C. 651, 94 S. E. 412; Howard v. Wright, 173 N. C. 339, 91 S. E. 1032; Wade v. Contracting Co., 149 N. C. 177, 62 S. E. 919; Holton v. Lumber Co., 152 N. C. 68, 67 S. E. 54; Noble v. Lumber Co., 151 N. C. 76, 65 S. E. 622, 134 Am. St. Rep. 974; Allison v. Railway, 129 N. C. 336, 40 S. E. 91; Patton v. Railway, 96 N. C. 455, 1 S. E. 863.

Not only is an employer supposed, as a rule, to control the conditions under which the work is done and to have a more extended and accurate knowledge of such work and the tools and appliances fitted for same, but the order itself given by the employer or his vice principal directing the work, and the natural impulse of present obedience on the part of the employé, are additional and relevant facts to be considered in passing upon the latter's conduct in reference to the issue. Accordingly, several of the cases just cited are in illustration and support of the position that there is or may be a distinction in weighing the conduct of the employer and employé even when the principal objective facts are open to the observation of both. Thus, in Patton v. Railroad, supra, defendant was held liable for a negligent order which caused an employé to jump from a moving car, while the employé, obeying the order, was relieved of responsibility. The ruling apposite was stated as follows:

"One who is injured by jumping from a moving train is generally barred of a recovery by reason of his contributory negligence, but where a servant was ordered by his superior to do so in order to perform a duty for the company, it not appearing to the servant at the time that obedience would certainly cause injury, it was held, that there was no such contributory negligence as would prevent a recovery."

A similar position is approved in Noble v. Lumber Co., supra, and in Allison v. Railroad, it was held:

"Where a section master fails to use reasonable care for the protection of persons working under him and one of them is injured, the * * * company is liable for the negligence of its servant."

And further:

"Where a section master orders a person under him to throw a hand car off the track to prevent a collision with a freight train and the employé is injured in the execution of the act, he is not guilty of contributory negligence."

[3] True, in several of these cases, it is made to appear, and weight is given to the fact, that the employé in question was inexperienced but this is not always or necessarily controlling, and, furthermore, in this instance it is not shown that these subordinates were regular employés of the company, or that they had been doing work of this kind. On the contrary, it would seem from the record that they were engaged in other work and under another employer, and were called in and hired by Fowler, the vice principal, to do this particular job, and it is the natural, certainly the permissible, inference that they were inexperienced in the work they were then doing. And, in reference to the issue as to assumption of risk, the court, in Wallace v. Power Co., 176 N. C. at page 561, 97 S. E. at page 612, speaking to the question, said:

"In the recent case of Howard v. Wright, 173 N. C. 339, 91 S. E. 1032, the position as it obtains here is stated as follows: 'The defense of assumption of risk is one growing out of the contract of employment, and extends only to the ordinary risks naturally and usually incident to the work that the employé has undertaken to perform, and does not include risks and dangers incident to a failure on the part of the employer to perform his own nondelegable duties'—the opinion citing in approval Yarborough v. Geer, 171 N. C. 335, 88 S. E. 474; Norris v. Holt-Morgan Mills, 154 N. C. 474-485, 70 S. E. 912; Pressly v. Yarn Mills, 138 N. C. 410, 51 S. E. 69; Hicks v. Mfg. Co., 138 N. C. 319-327, 50 S. E. 703.

"Even in those jurisdictions where a different concept of assumption of risk prevails, as exemplified in the decisions of the federal courts construing the Employers' Liability Act [Act Cong. April 22, 1908, c. 149, 35 Stat. 65 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665)], it is held that the position does not obtain in cases attributable to the employer's own negligent breach of duty, unless the conditions thereby created are of an enduring kind or under circumstances that afford to the injured employé a fair opportunity to know of these conditions and appreciate the risks and dangers which they present. Gila Valley Ry. v. Hall, 232 U. S. 94, 34 Sup. Ct. 229, 58 L. Ed. 521; Jones v. Railroad, 97 S. E. 48, present term; King v. Railroad, 97 S. E. 29, present term."

[4, 5] Under the principles stated and upheld in these and other like authorities, there was no error, to the defendant's prejudice, certainly, in referring to the jury the questions of negligence, contributory negligence, or assumption of risk. It was admitted on the argument for the defendant that the pinch bar, the implement supplied by company, was not fitted for stopping the car, and that its use for that purpose threatened injury. The latter fact would seem to stand revealed from the evidence, and, the injury having undoubtedly resulted, defendant's liability on the first issue was practically conceded, and on the second and third issues the facts, showing that the car rolling down-grade had already run over and crushed the plow point, which Fowler, the boss, had placed to stop the car at the proper position, presented a case of emergency, and the order of Fowler to plaintiff, standing by in position with the bar in his hand and nothing else offered or available, "Scotch it, Sam, scotch it!" was one calling for instant obedience, and was not unnaturally or unreasonably obeyed with the implement he then had. And these conditions having been presently created and, in part, influenced by the negligent order of the vice principal, affording to plaintiff no fair and reasonable opportunity to weigh or appreciate the danger attendant upon his act, there seems to be very little, if any, ground to support the defense either of contributory negligence or assumption of risk.

We find no reversible error in the record, and the judgment for plaintiff is affirmed.

No error.

NOBLES v. NOBLES et al. (No. 170.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 28, 1919.)

1. QUIETING TITLE §6—ADVERSE CLAIM TO REMAINDER.

One claiming to own land in fee may maintain suit to quiet title against his children, asserting that he has only a life estate, with remainder in them.

2. WILLS §608(3)—ESTATE DEVISED—RULE IN SHELLEY'S CASE—"LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES."

Devise to O. for life, and then to his legal representatives, gives him a fee simple, under the rule in Shelley's Case; "legal representatives" being used as synonymous with "heirs of the body."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Legal Representative.]

3. JUDGMENT §736—ESTOPPEL—JUDGMENT IN PARTITION.

A partition proceeding between O. S. & J., devisees of undivided interests, only contemplating a severance of the possession between them, and an affirmation of the division they had made by deed, judgment awarding O.'s share to him "and his legal representatives" did not estop him to claim, as against his children, that he had been devised a fee simple.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Allen, Judge.

Action by Osborne C. Nobles, Sr., against Stephen F. Nobles and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The action was to remove a cloud on the title of plaintiff, claiming to own the land in fee simple under a devise in his mother's will as follows:

"Item 1. I give and devise to my son, Osborne C. Nobles, the home in which I now live, together with all the buildings and one-half of the tract of land on which they are situated, during his lifetime, then to his legal representatives;"

the other half of the land having been devised, one-fourth each to Stephen F. and

John C. Nobles. That, in 1910, Stephen F. and John C. Nobles, and plaintiff, Osborne C. Nobles, made an attempt to divide same, and executed deeds to each other in pursuance of their agreement, and on the theory that Osborne C. had a fee-simple interest in the portion of land divided to him. Question having been raised as to the fee-simple title of O. C. Nobles, with a view of perfecting the division and mutually assuring the title, a proceeding was instituted, and partition was made by commissioners duly appointed by the court, and in which the share of O. C. Nobles was allotted to "him and his legal representatives." It was contended and claimed by defendants, children of O. C. Nobles, that their father, under the devise, only had a life estate in the property, and that said defendants owned the remainder in fee.

There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendants excepted and appealed.

F. C. Harding, of Greenville, for appellee.

HOKE, J. [1] In Setterwhite v. Gallagher, 173 N. C. 528, 92 S. E. 370, speaking to the proper interpretation and effect of our statutes now controlling in actions of this character to remove a cloud from the title, the court said:

"Having reference to the board and inclusive language of the statute, the mischief complained of, and the purpose sought to be accomplished, we are of opinion that the law, as its terms clearly import, was designed and intended to afford a remedy wherever one owns or has an estate or interest in real property, whether he is in or out of possession, and another wrongfully sets up a claim to an estate or interest therein which purports to affect adversely the estate or interest of the true owner, and which is reasonably calculated to burden and embarrass such owner in the full and proper enjoyment of his proprietary rights, including the right to dispose of the same at its fair market value. And it should and does extend to such adverse and wrongful claims, whether in writing or parol, whenever a claim by parol, if established, could create an interest or estate in the property, as in case of a parol trust or a lease not required to be in writing. And it should be allowed, too, when existent records or written instruments reasonably present such a claim, the statute preventing all hardship in such cases by its provision that if the holder does not insist on the same in his answer or does not answer at all the plaintiff shall pay the costs."

And in same volume, Smith v. Smith, 173 N. C. 124, 91 S. E. 721, the principles so stated were applied to a case like the present, where the father, claiming to own the land in fee, was allowed to maintain a suit against the children, who asserted that he only had a life estate in the property, with the remainder to his said children.

[2] Coming, then, to the principal question, we concur in his honor's view that the devise in his mother's will, "to my son Osborne C. Nobles the home and buildings and one-half the land for his lifetime, and then to his legal representatives," confers upon the devisee a fee-simple estate in the property under the rule in Shelley's Case. The principles of this notable case have been discussed and applied in several of our later decisions, and the rule appearing in Coke's Reports and Preston on Estates is given, respectively, as follows:

"That, when an ancestor by any gift of conveyance taketh an estate of freehold, and in the same gift or conveyance an estate is limited, either mediately or immediately, to his heirs in fee or in tail, the word 'heirs' is a word of limitation of the estate, and not a word of purchase." 1 Coke, 104.

And in Preston on Estates:

"When a person takes an estate of freehold legally or equitably under a deed, will, or other writing, and in the same instrument there is a limitation by way of remainder, either with or without the interposition of another estate, of an interest of the same legal or equitable quality to his heirs or the heirs of his body, as a class of persons to take in succession from generation to generation, the limitation to the heirs entitles the ancestor to the whole estate."

So stated, the rule in question has always been recognized with us, and a perusal of these and other like cases will disclose that, when the terms of the instrument, by correct interpretation, convey the estate in remainder to the heirs of the first taker as a class "to take in succession from generation to generation," to the same persons as those who would take as inheritors under our canons of descent, and in the same quantity, the principle prevails as a rule of property, both in deeds and wills, and regardless of any particular intent to the contrary otherwise appearing in the instrument. Crisp v. Biggs, 176 N. C. 1, 96 S. E. 662; Cohoon v. Upton, 174 N. C. 88, 93 S. E. 446; Ford v. McBrayer, 171 N. C. 421, 88 S. E. 736; Robeson v. Moore, 168 N. C. 389, 84 S. E. 351, L. R. A. 1915D, 496; Jones v. Whichard, 163 N. C. 241, 79 S. E. 503; Price v. Griffin, 150 N. C. 523, 64 S. E. 372, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 935; May v. Lewis, 132 N. C. 115, 43 S. E. 550; Nichols v. Gladden, 117 N. C. 497, 23 S. E. 459. It will be noted that in both Coke and Preston, supra, the words "heirs or heirs of the body" are used in defining the estate in remainder; but in the case of wills, and in courts and instruments which permit and recognize other words as their equivalent and as descriptive of all those who will take in succession by reason of their hereditary blood, such words are not essential, and the rule is effective where the equivalent of heirs or heirs of the body are used in defining the estate in remainder. In the very full discussion of the subject by my Lord Macnachten, appearing in Gruen v. Foxwell, Appeal Cases, L. R. 1897, 658 (case of a will), after stating the rule as given in Coke's Rep., on pages 667-669, he proceeds as follows:

"Every part of that statement is, I think, deserving of attention from the opening words, which declare the rule to be 'a rule of law,' to the last clause, which says, 'the heirs can never take by purchase in a case where the rule applies.' It is hardly necessary to observe that any expression which imports the whole succession of hereditary blood has the same effect in bringing the rule into operation as to the word 'heirs,' though perhaps it was not always so."

And again, at page 676:

"The authority of Jesson v. Wright was restored, and its supremacy finally established, in Roddy v. Fitzgerald, and the question now in every case must be whether the expression requiring exposition, be it 'heirs' or 'heirs of the body,' or any other expression having like meaning, is used as the designation of a particular individual or a particular class of objects, or whether, on the other hand, it includes the whole line of successors capable of inheriting."

And in the same case my Lord Davy expresses himself as follows:

"In my opinion the rule in Shelley's Case is a rule of law, and not a mere rule of construction; i. e., one laid down for the purpose of giving effect to the testator's expressed or presumed intention. The rule is this: that wherever an estate for life is given to the ancestor or propositus, and a subsequent gift is made to take effect after his death, in such terms as to embrace, according to the ordinary principles of construction, the whole series of his heirs, or heirs of his body, or heirs male of his body, or whole inheritable issue, taking in a course of succession, the law requires that the heirs, or heirs male of the body, or issue, shall take by descent, and will not permit them to take by purchase, notwithstanding any expression of intention to the contrary."

In Yarnall's Appeal, 70 Pa. 335, interpreting a will, it was held, among other things:

"If the testator intends the estate to go to the whole line of descent, lineal and collateral, he means 'heirs.' * * *

"The rule in Shelley's Case is not a real exception to the rule that the intention of the testator must guide in interpreting a will; it sacrifices a particular to a general intent. * * *

"'Heirs,' 'heirs of the body,' 'issue,' 'children,' 'sons,' and similar expressions are words of limitation or purchase, according to the intent of the testator in each particular will."

In the extended and valuable note on several decisions discussing the rule in Shelley's Case, among others Price v. Griffin, 150 N. C. 523, 64 S. E. 372, which appears in 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) at page 1014, the author says:

"In the statement of the rule in the argument in Shelley's Case the words of limitation used are 'heirs' or 'heirs of the body.' To bring the rule into operation, however, it is not necessary always to use such words. Equivalent expressions will do. When the statement is made that the word 'heirs' must be used, what is meant is that the word 'heirs' or equivalent words are necessary."

In the case of wills the same position is approved by the standard text-books on the subject, uniformly, so far as examined. 3 Jarmon on Wills, p. 116; 2 Underhill on the Law of Wills, p. 890; Powell on Devises, 22 L. Library, vol. 2, pt. 2, p. 435; Tiedeman on Real Property, § 434; Burdick on Real Property, pp. 370, 371. In the citation to Jarmon the author says:

"In respect to the limitation to 'heirs,' we have before suggested that it is immaterial whether they are described under that or any other denomination, since it is clear that, in any case in which the word 'issue' or son has been construed as a word of limitation, and follows a devise to the parent for life or for any other state of freehold, he becomes tenant in tail by the operation of the rule in Shelley's Case. The words in question are used as synonymous with 'heirs of the body,' and consequently the effect is the same as if those words had been actually used; and upon the same principle, in the converse case, where the words 'heirs of the body' are explained to mean some other class of persons, the rule does not apply."

In Handy et al. v. McKim, 64 Md. 561, 4 Atl. 125, the court was construing a deed, and the application of the rule was denied on the ground that in that jurisdiction, and as to a common-law deed, only the word "heirs," or "heirs of the body," would suffice to describe all of those who could take by inheritance.

And in Zane v. Weintz, 65 N. J. Eq. 216, 55 Atl. 641, in a bill for specific performance, relief was denied on the ground chiefly that the construction of the particular instrument was attended with so much doubt that defendant would not be compelled to accept the title; but, both in this case and the one preceding, it seems to have been conceded that at common law, and unaffected by statute controlling the question, in case of a will the word "heirs" or "heirs of the body" were not necessarily required for the operation of the rule in Shelley's Case, but that equivalent words would suffice. This being the established position, it is very generally held here and elsewhere that, in construing a will which makes disposition of real estate to one and his legal representatives, with nothing in the instrument to qualify or restrict their import, the words "legal representatives" should be considered as the equivalent of heirs, and the quality and quantity of the estate determined in reference to that interpretation. Little et al. v. Brown, 126 N. C. 752, 36 S. E. 175; Moore v. Quince, 109 N. C. 85-90, 13 S. E. 872; Ewing v. Jones, 130 Ind. 247, 29 N. E. 1057, 15 L. R. A. 75; Olney v. Lovering, 167 Mass. 446; 2 Underhill on Wills, p. 852, § 638. And a correct deduction from these principles is in full support of his honor's ruling that under the will of his mother, and by operation of the rule in Shelley's Case the plaintiff becomes the owner of the land in fee simple.

[3] The objection that the plaintiff is estopped from asserting such ownership by reason of the proceedings for partition is without merit. The record of that proceeding is not sent up, but it is very apparent that the partition in question only contemplated a severance of the possession between the tenants, and in affirmance of the division that the owners had already made by their deeds. As a general rule, a judgment does not work an estoppel of record as between parties supposed to represent the same interest, unless their rights and interests have been made the subject of inquiry and decision, nor, in any event, does an adversary judgment constitute an estoppel as to matters beyond the scope of the issues as presented and embraced in the pleadings. Weston v. Roper Lumber Co., 162 N. C. 165, 77 S. E. 430, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 931; Holloway v. Durham, 176 N. C. 550, 97 S. E. 486; Hobgood v. Hobgood, 169 N. C. 485, 86 S. E. 189.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment for plaintiff must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

(177 N. C. 271)

In re GORHAM. (No. 287.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 2, 1919.)

1. WITNESSES ⇨140(2, 19) — TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEASED PERSONS — "INTEREST" OF WITNESS.

The interest which disqualifies one from testifying under Revisal 1905, § 1631, relating to transactions with deceased persons, is a direct, legal, or pecuniary interest in event of the action, and such statute did not apply to testimony of one to whom an administrator paid a claim in a controversy between administrator and widow of deceased in which widow was seeking to have administrator account for amount so paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Interest.]

2. JUDGMENT ⇨747(2)—RES JUDICATA—PARTITION—DOWER.

A decree in a petition to sell land for assets, not purporting to finally adjudicate the rights of a widow as to dower in the proceeds of sale, providing that after payment of $2,600 to a bank, not a party to the proceeding, entire funds should be subject to the further order of the court, cannot operate as an estoppel to prevent administrator in a controversy involving amount of dower from showing that amount really due bank was a much greater sum.

3. DOWER \Leftrightarrow 88, 107—ACCOUNTING—RENTS AND INTEREST.

A widow is entitled to an accounting of the rents and profits from lands in which she is entitled to dower from the death of her husband up to the time of sales of the land, and, after the sales, to interest upon the value of her dower in the proceeds.

4. DOWER \Leftrightarrow 107—LIABILITY OF HEIR—RENTS AND PROFITS.

Under rule that a widow is entitled to an accounting as to rents and profits in lands in which she is entitled to dower, heir is not chargeable as a trustee, but only with rents received while dealing with property in good faith, or for the reasonable value of premises if occupied by himself.

5. DOWER \Leftrightarrow 100—PURCHASE OF LANDS BY WIDOW—ACCOUNTING.

Where lands subject to dower rights are sold and are bid in by widow, who does not then pay the amount of the bid, she is on final settlement entitled at her election to take one-third of the rents collected after the sale or interest on the amount of her dower, but she is chargeable with interest on purchase price.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cumberland County; Lynn, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of John C. Gorham, deceased. Submission of controversy between E. E. Gorham, administrator, and Mrs. Georgia Chedester. From an adverse decree, the latter appeals. Modified and affirmed.

A controversy having arisen between E. E. Gorham, administrator of the estate of John C. Gorham, and the commissioner appointed to sell the lands of his intestate to create assets for the payment of the debts of the estate, on the one hand, and Mrs. Georgia Chedester, the intestate's widow, who has since married H. C. Chedester, on the other, and wishing the same to be determined without action, they submitted a case the material parts of which are as follows:

(1) That John C. Gorham died intestate, February 28, 1910, leaving him surviving the aforesaid widow, a brother, and sisters.

(2) That E. E. Gorham qualified as administrator upon his estate March 10, 1910; the widow renouncing in his favor.

(3) That in May, 1911, said administrator filed a petition to sell intestate's lands, to make assets to pay his debts, to which ex parte proceeding the widow and heirs at law of the intestate and F. H. Cotton and wife, Ila H. Cotton, as well as E. E. Gorham as an individual, were parties, which petition and all of the orders, reports, judgments, and decrees therein are hereby made a part hereof, and asked to be so considered.

(4) That at a public sale of some of the lands on December 16, 1912, the intestate's widow became the successful bidder for the first or residence tract, at the price of $9,200, and upon report thereof the same was confirmed on May 12, 1913.

(7) That by agreement the $9,200 was not paid, but was to await the determination of her claims against the estate, and she and the administrator have been constantly endeavoring to ascertain the exact amount due her by him so that she could pay the difference, if any, between such sum and the amount of her said bid.

That the administrator rented the said residence from July 10, 1912, until October 10, 1917, the amount of rent ($1,890) being used by him as assets in his hands, for the payment of debts of the estate, and his annual accounts are made a part thereof, and asked to be so considered.

(13) That prior to the filing of the aforesaid petition in May, 1911, there was another special proceeding in said court, to which the administrator of John C. Gorham and the intestate's widow and heirs at law were parties, and also F. H. Cotton and his wife, numbered 2,066 and 2,214 on the special proceeding docket, in which E. E. Gorham was appointed commissioner to sell the McKethan lots Nos. 5, 6, 7, and 9, alleged and adjudged to have been owned by intestate and F. H. Cotton, under authority of which the said commissioner sold lots 5, 6, and 7 for $2,900 on December 1, 1910, and lot No. 9, February 8, 1912, for $1,600.

It was further alleged in the petition and adjudged by the court that the indebtedness due the bank on the purchase price of said lots was about $2,600. The aforesaid proceeding is made a part hereof, and asked to be so considered. The administrator now contends that his intestate and F. H. Cotton were not in fact the owners of the said McKethan lots, but were the selling agents for the Bank of Fayetteville, who were the owners, and that they had taken title thereto to facilitate a conveyance of the same; that under the terms of the selling agreement with the bank the administrator turned over all proceeds of sale to the bank and received $275 as full payment of the amount due the estate of John C. Gorham on the sale of all the said lots; and that the allegations of the petition and the judgment rendered thereon were based upon such information as the administrator then had as to the ownership of said lots and the indebtedness due thereon, and which information he believed to be true at the time said petition was filed and judgment rendered, but which information he afterwards found to be incorrect and the facts to be as hereinbefore stated. Mrs. Chedester pleads the said proceeding as an estoppel against such claim and contention. She denies that John C. Gorham and F. H. Cotton were not the owners of said lots. Subject to her denial and plea of estoppel as aforesaid, it is agreed that the judge to whom this controversy is submitted may hear competent evidence on this point and find the facts in regard thereto.

It was also agreed that the administrator was due Mrs. Chedester certain amounts from the proceeds of sales of certain lands as the value of her dower interest, but the parties could not agree as to the dates from which these amounts would bear interest.

The special proceedings referred to in the findings 8 and 13 were ex parte and were for the purpose of selling the McKethan lots for assets.

It was alleged in the petition in these proceedings that F. H. Cotton was owner of an undivided one-half interest in said lots, and that the heirs of John O. Gorham were the owners of the other one-half subject to the dower, and that all of said interests were subject to the claim of the Fourth National Bank of Fayetteville for $2,600, the balance of purchase money, and the decrees of confirmation in the proceedings were in accordance with the allegations in the petition and recited the several interests as therein set forth.

The decree further required the administrator to collect the purchase money, total of the McKethan lots $4,500, pay off the bank debt, and hold one-half of the balance for distribution under the orders of the court.

The bank was not a party to the proceeding.

The McKethan lots were conveyed by the Bank of Fayetteville to the Southern Real Estate Company and then by the Southern Real Estate Company to Frank H. Cotton and John C. Gorham.

At the hearing of the agreed case, the administrator was permitted to prove by John O. Ellington and Dr. Lilly, officers and stockholders of the bank, that at the time Cotton and Gorham took the title to said lots there was a written agreement, which was lost, that they would hold the title to the lots, as selling agent for the bank to repay a larger sum than $2,600, and that, after the sales were made and upon a settlement in accordance with the agreement, there was only $275 which went into the hands of the administrator from the McKethan lots, and this was paid as commissions for making the sales.

Mrs. Chedester objected to this evidence:

(1) Because Ellington and Lilly were incompetent to testify under section 1631 of the Revisal. (2) Because the administrator was estopped by the special proceedings to show that more than $2,600 was due to the bank.

His honor found upon this evidence:

"That Gorham, administrator and commissioner as aforesaid, is not estopped by the proceedings for the sale of said property, and that Cotton and Gorham held the same as selling agents for the bank, and that intestate's estate was entitled to $275 as commissions, and that Mrs. Chedester is not entitled to dower in said property."

Mrs. Chedester again excepted.

His honor entered judgment upon the agreed case from which Mrs. Chedester appealed, assigning as error, in addition to the exceptions before stated, the following:

(1) "For that the court did not find and adjudge that Mrs. Chedester is entitled to interest on the value of her dower from February 28, 1910, the date of the death of her former husband John Gorham, and that, if she is not entitled to it from that date, then from the filing of the petition for the sale of the McKethan lots as to them, to wit, November 19, 1910, and from the filing of the petition as to all the other lands, to wit, May, 1911, and that in no event should the interest be calculated for a less period of time than from March 10, 1912, which is two years after the qualification of E. E. Gorham as administrator, as claimed and contended for in the case agreed, paragraphs 15 (a) and (b)."

(2) "For that the court did not find and adjudge that she is entitled to interest on the value of her dower in the home place in accordance with her contentions as above set forth in the twenty-second assignment, instead of from September 18, 1916, the date of Judge Winston's judgment in the former action between the parties concerning her claim for lien on said property, during which time the administrator received the rents therefor."

The facts and rulings thereon entering into the judgment of Judge Winston will be found in 173 N. C. 272, 91 S. E. 950.

Sinclair & Dye, of Fayetteville, for appellant Mrs. Chedester.

Q. K. Nimocks, of Fayetteville, for appellee administrator.

ALLEN, J. The appeal presents three questions for decision:

1. Were the witnesses Ellington and Lilly competent, under section 1631 of the Revisal, to testify that Cotton and Gorham held the title to the McKethan lots as selling agents for the bank of which they were stockholders?

2. If competent to testify, is the administrator estopped by the special proceedings to sell lands for assets?

3. What are the rights of the widow of John C. Gorham as to interest on the value of her dower in the proceeds of lands sold and as to rents?

[1] 1. The interest, which disqualifies one from testifying under section 1631 of the Revisal, is a direct, legal, or pecuniary interest in the event of the action (Helsabeck v. Doub, 167 N. C. 205, 83 S. E. 241, L. R. A. 1917A, 1), and as the bank has been paid in full, and there is no effort to make it refund any part of the money collected, and it is in no way interested in the result of this action, there is nothing which disqualifies the witnesses Ellington and Lilly to testify.

Besides, they were not necessarily testifying to a conversation or transaction with the deceased, but as to the contents of a lost paper, and their testimony was in behalf of the administrator and not against him.

[2] 2. The decree in the petition to sell land for assets did not purport to finally adjudicate the rights of the widow as to dower in the proceeds of sale, and, on the contrary, it only gave her a dower right in the interest of John C. Gorham after payment of the amount due the bank, stated to be $2,600, and left the entire funds subject to the further order of the court.

The bank was not a party to the proceeding, and its debt was not in issue, nor was it litigated, and the amount was stated simply as one of the reasons for asking for a sale of the lands, and the proceeding therefore cannot operate as an estoppel to prevent the parties from showing the true amount due to the bank.

The case of Latta v. Russ, 53 N. C. 111, which is approved in Austin v. Austin, 132 N. C. 265, 43 S. E. 827, 95 Am. St. Rep. 637, and in Trust Co. v. Stone, 176 N. C. 272, 97 S. E. 8, is in point.

There a petition was filed to sell land for assets, in which the several debts were stated and decrees of sale and confirmation entered, the lands sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of debts. The administrator then died, and an action was commenced for an accounting of the estate, in which a referee found that, allowing credits for vouchers, there remained in the hands of the administrator $882.22; but, if the debts be allowed as stated in the decrees, there would be in hand only $252.45.

The judge of the superior court held that the decrees were binding on the parties as to the amount of the debts as stated in the petition, but this was reversed on appeal; the court saying:

"We do not concur with his honor, in the view taken by him of the question reserved, in respect to the effect of the decree giving the administratrix license to sell the land. That decree was an adjudication that it was necessary to sell, and is conclusive in favor of the title acquired by the purchaser, but it is not conclusive of the question of debt or no debt, as against or in favor of creditors, or as against or in favor of the heirs."

As the evidence was competent, and as there is no estoppel, the finding thereon by his honor is binding on us and concludes the claim of the widow to dower in the McKethan lots.

3. The claim of the widow for dower, while paramount to that of the heir, is not an estate but a right until allotment. Spencer v. Weston's Heirs, 18 N. C. 214.

"It is true, indeed, that she cannot enter until assignment made; and that in point of tenure, for feudal reasons, she holds of the heir or of the person in whom is the reversion of the land assigned for dower. But, in point of title, her estate does not arise or take effect out of the ownership of the heir or other person making the assignment, but is considered a continuation of that of the husband; and, although between the death of the husband and the assignment of dower a seizin of the heir or another person intervenes, yet upon the assignment she is in by relation from the death of the husband; for 'the law adjudgeth no mesne seizin between the husband and wife.' Perkins, § 414; Co. Lit. 241." Norwood v. Marrow, 20 N. C. 584, approved in Love v. McClure, 99 N. C. 295, 6 S. E. 247, 250, and in other cases.

This being the nature of the estate, it was held at common law to be the duty of the heir to allot dower to the widow immediately upon the death of the husband, and under Magna Charta she could remain in the mansion house 40 days until the allotment was made, called her right of quarantine, and, upon default on the part of the heir, she could sue out her writ of dower, but, although establishing her right, she could not recover damages, nor was she entitled to an accounting of the rents and profits. This remained the law until the Statute of Merton, 20 Henry III, which not only perfected the process for the assignment of the dower, but also stimulated the heir to activity by permitting the recovery of damages for the detention of the dower.

The proceeding was at first in the courts of the common law; but, the broader and more generous rules of equity being better adapted to adjust the rights between the heir and the widow, it soon became recognized as within the jurisdiction of courts of equity (9 R. C. L. 608 et seq.), and in this state, while a statutory remedy, by proceeding before the clerk, is afforded, the jurisdiction of the courts of equity has not been disturbed, although usually some equitable element, such as the necessity for an accounting, must be alleged. Efland v. Efland, 96 N. C. 488, 1 S. E. 858, and cases cited.

The recovery under the Statute of Merton, and under our statutory remedy, was "not rents (which suppose a privity of estate), but damages for the detention of her dower; in assessing which, the value of the rents is the proper guide to the jury" (Sutton v. Burrows, 6 N. C. 81), and it was held, with some hesitation, that at law the damages could only be recovered from demand (Spencer v. Weston's Heirs, 18 N. C. 216, approved Brown v. Morisey, 126 N. C. 772, 36 S. E. 284).

"But it has been long settled that, in equity, a widow is entitled to an account of the mesne profits, from the death of the husband up to the assignment of dower. Indeed, this was one of the grounds upon which that court assumed jurisdiction." Pearson, J., in Campbell v. Murphy, 55 N. C. 364.

[3] Applying these principles, this proceeding being in equity, we are of opinion that the widow, Mrs. Chedester, is entitled to an accounting of the rents and profits from the death of her husband up to the time of the sales of the several lots of land in which she was entitled to dower, and after the sales to the interest upon the value of her dower in the proceeds of the sales, and the case of Campbell v. Murphy, supra, is a direct authority upon both questions.

In that case Marsden Campbell, the husband, died in 1841, and his heirs rented the property until the buildings were destroyed by fire in 1843. In 1844 the land was sold under order of court for $4,000, and the court held that the widow was entitled to recover the rents from 1841, the time of the death of the husband, until 1843, this being the time when the heirs rented the property, and that she was entitled to interest upon one-third of $4,000 for which the land was sold under order of court.

The court says:

"It must be declared to be the opinion of the court that the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendant Murphy the interest upon one-third of the sum for which the lot was sold at the sale, made by the clerk and master mentioned in the pleadings, to wit, $4,000, from the date of that sale up to the taking of the account; and also interest upon such third part of the purchase money, to be paid annually, up to the time of her death, for which the plaintiff will have a lien upon the premises as security, unless she elects to take the bond of the said Murphy, with approved sureties, in lieu thereof; or the plaintiff may elect to take a decree for such part of the purchase money aforesaid, absolutely, with interest from the date of the sale, as is equal to the value of her life estate in one-third part thereof; as to which there may be a reference."

And again:

"These defendants insist that they are not chargeable with the rent received by them for the house, from the death of the husband up to the time it was burnt.

"There was no judgment for damages in a writ of right, or a writ of entry, or a writ of dower at common law, on the ground that the terre-tenant during the time he was seized, had performed the feudal services. Damages were given against a disseisor by statute in an assize of novel disseisin; and damages are given to the widow by the Statute of Merton in a writ of dower unde nihil; but it has been long settled that in equity a widow is entitled to an account of the meane profits, from the death of the husband up to the assignment of dower. Indeed, this was one of the grounds upon which that court assumed jurisdiction."

[4] It will be observed that under this doctrine the heir is not chargeable as a trustee, but only with the rents received while dealing with the property in good faith, or for the reasonable value of the premises if occupied by himself.

[5] These principles also cover the claim of the widow in the proceeds of the sale of the lot bought by her, except that she may, at her election, take one-third of the rents collected after the sale in lieu of interest for the period covered by the rents, and she will be chargeable with interest on the purchase price.

The judgment will be modified in accordance with this opinion after the parties have agreed upon the amounts allowed the widow or after the facts have been ascertained by a reference.

Modified and affirmed.

BRYANT MFG. CO. v. HESTER et al.
(No. 284.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 2, 1919.)

1. REGISTER OF DEEDS ⇐6—MORTGAGES—FAILURE TO INDEX AND CROSS-INDEX—LIABILITY.

Failure of a register of deeds to properly index and cross-index a mortgage on timber, as required by Revisal 1905, §§ 2658, 2665, does not render him liable to one subsequently lending money and taking a mortgage, where latter's negligence was proximate cause of his losses.

2. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT ⇐104—NOTICE TO ATTORNEY.

Knowledge of an attorney and opportunity to know, in making an examination of the records to find whether timber was unincumbered, will be imputed to his client.

3. REGISTER OF DEEDS ⇐6—IMPROPER REGISTRATION OF MORTGAGE—DAMAGES.

In an action against a register of deeds for a failure to index and cross-index a mortgage on timber, as required by Revisal 1905, §§ 2658, 2665, one lending money on the security of the timber cannot recover more than nominal damages, unless he shows that the timber is not of sufficient value to satisfy the prior incumbrance and also to reimburse him; it being incumbent on him to establish the amount of his loss.

Appeal from Superior Court, Bladen County; Calvert, Judge.

Action by the State, on the relation of the Bryant Manufacturing Company, against R. J. Hester and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. New trial.

The action is against the register of deeds of Bladen county and the surety on his official bond to recover damages alleged to have been caused by the register's negligence in failing to properly index and cross-index a prior mortgage, whereby the relator of plaintiff, holding a record mortgage and contract, suffered substantial damage. The court ruled that liability on the part of defendant was admitted in the pleadings, and the issue was only on the question of damages. The cause was then submitted to the jury on the following issues, defendant excepting:

"(1) Did the plaintiff advance money to Moore & Moore upon the execution of the mortgage by Moore & Moore to the plaintiff to secure the same, and, if so, what amount?

"(2) Were Moore & Moore entitled to any credits on the amount so advanced by the plaintiff, and, if so, what was the amount of such credit?

"(3) What amount is the plaintiff entitled to recover?"

The court then charged the jury, if they found the facts to be as testified to by the witnesses, they would answer the first issue, Yes; $2,000; second issue, Yes; $758.85; third issue, $1,241.15, with $15 accrued interest.

Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant excepted and appealed.

Bayard Clark, E. F. McCulloch, Jr., and R. S. White, all of Elizabethtown, for appellants.

McClammy & Burgwin, of Wilmington, for appellee.

HOKE, J. It may be well to note that the recent decisions to the contrary, Ely v. Norman, 175 N. C. 298, 95 S. E. 543, and Fowle & Son v. O'Ham, 176 N. C. 12, 96 S. E. 639, being prospective in operation and the rights of these parties having been acquired and held under our registry laws as they were construed and applied in Davis v. Whitaker, 114 N. C. 279, 19 S. E. 699, 41 Am. St. Rep. 793, to the effect that indexing and cross-indexing were not essential to a valid registration, notwithstanding the defects alleged in this instance, the prior incumbrance was properly registered, and constituted a valid lien on the property. And, again, that this is not a case where the title to the timber is directly involved, and in which case no notice, however full and formal, will supply the place of a valid registration (Robertson v. Willoughby, 70 N. C. 358; Todd v. Outlaw, 79 N. C. 235), but the suit is an action to recover damages for the negligent breach of duty on the part of the register of deeds in failing to index and cross-index an instrument by means of which plaintiff suffered pecuniary loss. Considering the record in view of these positions and on the question whether liability was admitted in the pleadings, it is alleged in the complaint, in effect, that, in 1914, Moore & Moore, as owners of certain timber on a designated tract of land in Bladen county, contracted with relator of plaintiff to cut the timber on said land and deliver the same to relator in rafts at their landing within bounds of the property, at the rate of $7 per thousand feet and at the rate of not less than 60,000 feet per week till same was all cut and delivered, and relator, the Bryant Manufacturing Company, hereafter spoken of as plaintiff, was to retain as much as $2 per thousand feet to reimburse plaintiff on advancements to be made under the contract, to the amount of $2,000, to enable Moore & Moore to begin operations; that these advancements were to be made in case title was ascertained to be good by plaintiff's attorney, and before same was made Moore & Moore were to give a mortgage on the timber to secure repayment to plaintiff of sums advanced; that, plaintiff's attorney having informed plaintiff that there were no incumbrances on the property, the mortgage was given, recorded, and plaintiff advanced the $2,000 to Moore & Moore as agreed upon; that Moore & Moore entered on the work of cutting and rafting the timber, and, having delivered sufficient timber to make a repayment thereof of $758.85, this from the $2 per thousand, authorized to be retained, and having failed to deliver further, on inquiry, told plaintiff they could not go on without more pecuniary help; that plaintiff declined to advance more except under its own supervision; and himself entered on the work, when he was stopped by court injunction, in a suit by N. H. Carter and B. F. Keith, who held a prior mortgage on the timber, duly registered and executed to them by Blackburn and Jackson, from whom Moore & Moore had bought the same, said mortgage purporting to secure Carter & Keith, the original owners of the timber, in the sum of $6,000, the original purchase price; that plaintiff had frequently endeavored to obtain repayment of the balance due on the advancements from Moore & Moore, to wit, the $1,241.15, with said accrued interest, and had failed to do so. The defendants, alleging that the register had duly recorded the prior mortgage and indexed the same, showing the names of the grantees, admitted that the same had not been fully indexed and cross-indexed as the statute required. The answer then, having put in issue the other allegations of the complaint tending to fix liability, made further averments, to the effect that the condition and records appearing in the register's office were such as to put the plaintiff on full notice of the existence of the prior mortgage; that it was referred to and fully described in the bill of sale by which Blackburn and Jackson conveyed the timber to Moore & Moore; that the paper containing such recital was on record, and was read by counsel for plaintiff when making an examination of the title and a copy thereof taken, and for this the index and cross-index would have fully disclosed the page and book, etc., showing the existence and proper registry of the prior mortgage complained of, and the answer denies, further, that the plaintiff's attorneys ever reported to him that the title to the timber was unincumbered, but that plaintiff knew or had every reason and opportunity to know of the existence of this prior mortgage, and that his loss, if any was suffered by him, should be properly attributed to his own negligence and not otherwise.

[1, 2] On these, the averments chiefly relevant, we are of opinion that there was error in the ruling and liability for this alleged default was admitted in the pleadings. Our statutes on this subject (Revisal, §§ 2658, 2665) impose on the register of deeds the duty of diligently and promptly registering instruments filed with him for the purpose and of indexing and cross-indexing the same within 24 hours after registry, and action lies by the person injured for default in this respect. State ex rel. Daniel v. Grizzard, 117 N. C. 105, 23 S. E. 93. In section 301 he is required to give a bond not to exceed $10,000 for the safe-keeping of the books of his office and otherwise for the faithful performance of his duties. By section 3600 he is made indictable for a misdemeanor for failure to index and cross-index instruments as required by the law, and within 24 hours after registry. While the proper performance of the official duties of this officer are thus rigidly insisted upon and have taken on even greater significance since our court has held that the indexing and cross-indexing are essentials of a valid registration, a liability does not arise to individuals unless the default of the register in these particulars has been the cause and the proximate cause of pecuniary injury to the claimant. Unless otherwise provided by the statute itself or arising as it may do in certain instances from its very nature and characteristics, this prerequisite to the maintenance of an action for breach of a statutory duty that it should be the proximate cause of the injury complained of is very well illustrated in several of our more recent decisions, as in Paul v. Railroad, 170 N. C. 230, 87 S. E. 66, L. R. A. 1916B, 1079, McNeill v. Railroad, 167 N. C. 390, 83 S. E. 704, and Ledbetter v. English, 166 N. C. 125, 81 S. E. 1066. And in this connection, it is held, in well-considered cases, that liability will not be imputed to the officer when a given duty has been imposed with more especial reference to the protection of individuals, and the negligence of the individual claimant or his employé or agent, charged with the duty of looking after the matter, has caused or concurred in causing the injury. Burris v. Austin, 85 S. C. 60, 67 S. E. 17, 20 Ann. Cas. 1806, and authorities cited; Lick v. Madden, 36 Cal. 208, 95 Am. Dec. 175; 23 Amer. & Eng. (2d Ed.) p. 379. See, also, 34 Cyc. p. 1021. And the general principle has been recognized in a case at the present term, in Rice v. Ins. Co., 98 S. E. 283, citing for the position, among other cases, Dare v. Constr. Co., 152 N. C. 23, 67 S. E. 87. In this last case, it was held:

"While a person cannot take advantage of his own wrong, the court will not furnish a person a remedy for a wrong when he cannot prove a legal claim for damages without showing that his own negligence intervened between the act of the alleged wrongdoer and the result complained of, which was the real and efficient cause of the injury."

Recurring to the answer, there are allegations to the effect that the prior mortgage was indexed, in the name of the grantees therein, showing also the book and page of the registry. In the deed or written bargain and sale, conveying the timber to Moore & Moore, the immediate grantors of plaintiff, there was distinct reference to the prior mortgage to Carter & Keith from Jackson & Blackburn, vendors to Moore & Moore; that plaintiff's attorneys, in making their examination and whose knowledge and opportunity to know will be imputed to plaintiff, took a copy of the bill of sale, and included same in their report on the title, and that "any sums of money advanced to Moore & Moore was done with full knowledge of said paper writing, and in face of the recitations that Carter & Son & Keith held a mortgage on the timber for $6,000, and, further, that if plaintiff did not have actual notice of said mortgage, it was due to his own negligence and carelessness, and not to any act of conduct of this defendant" (the register of deeds); and, under the principles heretofore stated, the issue of liability is, in our opinion, distinctly raised, and must be determined on the question whether the default, charged and admitted by the register of not fully indexing and cross-indexing the prior incumbrance, was the proximate cause of pecuniary loss to plaintiff, or was the same due to his own negligent default on the facts known to him, or which he should have known if reasonably attentive to his own interest.

[3] And, on the question of damages it does not necessarily follow that plaintiff is entitled to recover the sum of $1,241.15, with some accrued interest, the difference between the amount advanced and that paid back by the debtor, as his honor ruled. The jury may award that sum, but it does not follow as a conclusion of law from the facts in evidence. On a breach of duty of this kind, causing injury, the plaintiff may recover the damages that were probable under the facts as they existed, and which can be ascertained with a reasonable degree of certainty. The default complained of here was the failure to index and cross-index a prior mortgage, by reason of which plaintiff was misled and induced to take a second contract and mortgage, to his injury, and the damages would properly be referred to the existence of such prior mortgage and its effect on plaintiff's security.

The only witness examined on the trial was J. N. Bryant, one of the plaintiffs; and, while his evidence tended to show that the Moores, plaintiff's debtors for their outlay, were insolvent, it is not an inference that the court can draw from his testimony, and, while there is allegation that the prior mortgage had been foreclosed, leaving nothing subject to plaintiff's claim on the timber, that allegation is denied in the answer, and we do not recall any evidence tending to show such a foreclosure.

In addition to this, it is admitted that plaintiff held the second mortgage on this timber to reimburse him for the $2,000, and it is nowhere shown in the evidence that the timber is not of sufficient value both to satisfy the prior incumbrance and also to reimburse the plaintiff. In an action of this character, it is incumbent on plaintiff to establish both the injury and the amount of the loss, and, though liability be established, the damage will be only nominal, unless the loss be shown or facts presented from which it can be reasonably ascertained. Johnson v. Brice et al., 102 Wis. 575, 78 N. W. 1086; Gordon v. Stanley, 108 La. 182, 32 South. 531; Title Guar. Co. v. Commonwealth, 141 Ky. 570, 133 S. W. 577; Appleby v. State of New Jersey, 45 N. J. Law, 161; State ex rel. Phillips v. Greene et al., 112 Mo. App. 108, 90 S. W. 403; 2 Sutherland on Damages (3d Ed.) § 488; 1 Sedgwick (9th Ed.) §§ 107, 107a.

On the record, we are of opinion that the cause must be referred to the jury both on the question of liability and the amount of damages, and to that end a new trial is awarded.

New trial.

(177 N. C. 229)

GRANTHAM et al. v. JINETTE et al.
(No. 104.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 26, 1919.)

1. WILLS §489(2)—PAROL EVIDENCE—CONTRADICTION WILL—DEVISE TO LEGAL HEIRS.

There being no ambiguity, parol evidence is not admissible to show that by "legal heirs," to whom devise was made, was meant testator's next of kin, he being illegitimate.

2. WILLS §491—QUESTION FOR JURY—LEGAL HEIRS.

Who are "my legal heirs," to whom devise was made, is not a question for jury, but of law.

3. WILLS §489(1)—DESIGNATION OF BENEFICIARIES—EVIDENCE.

Evidence, even were it competent, held insufficient to show that by "my legal heirs," to whom an illegitimate devised, he meant certain blood relatives.

4. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION §52(2)—WIDOW AS HEIR—STATUTE.

Revisal 1905, § 1556, providing that, when any person shall die leaving none who can claim as heir to him, his widow shall be deemed heir and as such shall inherit his estate, applies only in case of no will or a will not disposing of the entire estate.

5. ESCHEAT §4—WILLS §524(6)—CONTINGENT REMAINDER.

Under a will giving all the property, with an exception, to testator's wife for life, and providing, "after her death," all such property "left by" her shall be sold and the proceeds divided among "my legal heirs" subject to certain bequests, the class designated as "legal heirs" is to be ascertained as of the date of the wife's death, so that she does not take the remainder, but it escheats; testator then having no legal heirs.

Allen, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Daniels, Judge.

Action by D. C. Grantham and others against Ezra Jinnette and others to recover property in defendant's possession, the University of North Carolina intervening and being made a party by order of the court. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants and intervenor appeal. Reversed.

Bryant & Brogden, of Durham, Hood & Hood, of Goldsboro, and Murray Allen, of Raleigh, for appellant University of North Carolina.

Langston, Allen & Taylor, J. L. Barham, Dickinson & Land, and J. F. Thomson, all of Goldsboro, W. W. Cole, of Smithfield, and D. C. Humphrey, of Goldsboro, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. The case turns upon the construction of the following clauses of the will of Haywood Bizzell:

"Item 3. I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Elizabeth, for the term of her life, all the balance of my real estate, all personal property of every kind of which I shall die seized or possessed."

"Item 5. After her death I desire that all property, real and personal left by her under item 3 of this will, shall be sold publicly or privately, as he (the executor) shall think best, and the proceeds shall be divided among my legal heirs subject to the following bequests."

The following admissions were made on the trial and entered in the record:

(1) That the testator was an illegitimate son, born in 1833; that his mother was never married, and died in 1862, and that the testator was her only child; that the testator married in 1856, but no children were born of said marriage; that he died in December, 1896, leaving his widow and the will in question; that at the time of his death he was seized in fee and possession of the lands in question which were all acquired by purchase.

The plaintiffs do not claim that they are the heirs at law of the testator, nor that they are entitled to any part of his estate under the statute of descents. Bettis v. Avery, 140 N. C. 184, 52 S. E. 584. But they contend that they are the persons referred to and intended by the testator in the use of the words "my legal heirs," and that by parol testimony they can show that by the devise of his property, after the life estate given his wife, to "my legal heirs," he intended Mack McCullen and Frank McCullen. Cal (or Mack) McCullen and Frank McCullen were the sons of Ann Bizzell, the sister of the testator's mother who married a McCullen. Mack McCullen and Frank McCullen are dead, and the plaintiffs are their heirs at law. The language on which the plaintiffs rely is the testimony of one Odum that on one occasion his father said to the testator, "Haywood, what are you going to do with your property?" to which he replied: "Well, I don't know. I have never decided exactly what I will do with it." And when further asked, "Haven't you got no kin people?" to which he said: "Yes, I have got some kin people. Mack McCullen and Frank McCullen are kin to me." He said that that was about 25 years ago and about 3 or 4 years before testator died.

R. A. Whitfield, witness for the plaintiff, testified that he heard the testator say that Mack McCullen was the nearest kin he had. John White testified that he had seen the testator a few times; that a year or a year and a half before he died, when he went to pay him some rent, the testator "got to talking with him, and he said he had no children and no kin folks, but the McCullens were kin to him and would be his heirs, he reckoned." Davis Wiggins testified that the testator "took dinner with him on one occasion, and stated in conversation that his mother was a Bizzell, that Annie McCullen was her sister, and spoke of his mother and Cal's mother being sisters; that he does not remember hearing him speak of any one else."

[1-3] This evidence taken to be true cannot vary the expression in the will that the property, after the life estate given to his wife, should go to his "legal heirs." There is no ambiguity. The devise is to a class—"my legal heirs"—and who they were is a matter of law, even if the testator had erroneously supposed that under the law illegitimates could inherit as heirs (but the evidence and the will show that he did not).

Upon the evidence the motion for nonsuit as to the plaintiffs should have been granted. This is not the case where there is a latent ambiguity as to the person intended and evidence is admitted which shows that the testator was in the habit of calling the person by the name set out in the will, though it was not the true name of the person. It often happens that the person is known by a nickname or some other name in common use, and such designation is shown by parol testimony to point out the devisee who was intended; but in all those cases the person was clearly intended, and the question is only of identification.

But here the class is clearly and definitely stated in terms that admit of only one construction, "my legal heirs," and admittedly Mack McCullen and Frank McCullen did not come within that designation.

Besides, the will was written several years before the death of the testator, when his wife was some 40 years old. It was by no means improbable that he might have children by her, or that she might die and he might have children by a second marriage. If the loose words used were sufficient to substitute Mack McCullen and Frank McCullen in lieu of the words "my legal heirs," it would not only contradict the terms of the will which is unambiguous, but if there had been the subsequent birth of children by his then wife, or by any subsequent wife, they would have been incapable of inheriting as against the two McCullens. This construction is therefore not to be entertained, and it would be useless to cite the numerous cases which are to be found in all the books to the effect that, when an unambiguous expression is used in a will, such as "my legal heirs," it cannot be contradicted by verbal statements put in evidence 25 years later, or at any other time showing that the testator recognized as related to him persons who were not his legal heirs and that he intended that the property should go to him in spite of his devising his estate not to them but to "his legal heirs." Who are the "heirs" is not a matter for the jury, but a matter of law for the court. Bradford v. Erwin, 34 N. C. 291; Morrison v. McLaughlin, 88 N. C. 255; Patterson v. Wilson, 101 N. C. 597, 8 S. E. 341. Besides, the testimony, if competent, was not sufficient to be presented to the jury.

[4] The defendants who are in no wise related to the testator claim as heirs of the wife, and insist that she was entitled under Rev. § 1556, which provides:

"When any person shall die leaving none who can claim as heir to him, his widow shall be deemed his heir, and as such shall inherit his estate."

This would apply only if there had been no will or a will not disposing of the entire estate. In such case, this property would have gone to the wife and then to the defendants as her heirs. But here the testator disposed of all his property by his will, and intended to dispose of it fully, which conclusively appears from the will itself; and, this being the case, when there is a default in the "legal heirs" to whom a part of the remainder of the estate is devised, it does not go to the wife, but to those who fill the designation of legal heirs at the time the remainder should fall in.

[6] The testator devised and bequeathed to his "wife, Elizabeth, for the term of her life, all the balance of my real estate, all personal property of any kind of which I shall die seized and possessed." She elected to take under the will and never dissented.

In item 2 of the will, the testator had given to Preston Thornton 106 acres of land described in the will, and the balance of the estate to his wife for life.

Item 4 of the will provides:

"After the death of my said wife I devise and bequeath to the Oxford Orphan Asylum $1,000 to be collected from the sale of the property, real or personal, left at my said wife's death."

Item 5 provides:

"After her death, I desire that all property real and personal, left by her under item 3 of this will shall be sold publicly or privately, as the executor shall think best, and the proceeds thereof shall be divided among my legal heirs, subject to the following bequests, to wit:

"Item 6. I give to D. A. Bizzell, son of Albert Bizzell, five hundred ($500) dollars, after my wife's death.

"Item 7. I give to Ann Eliza Cox, daughter of W. E. Cox, two hundred dollars, to be paid after my said wife's death.

"Item 8. I give to Selah Church built by my wife, namely, two hundred dollars to be paid after my wife's death.

"Item 9. I hereby appoint John S. Bizzell, executor of this will."

The questions presented are:

(1) As of what time is the class designated by the testator as his "legal heirs" to be ascertained—at the time of his decease, or at the decease of his widow?

(2) What was the effect of the widow's failure to dissent? This last need not be determined, unless we were of opinion that the class was to be ascertained as of the time of the testator's decease.

Although in the absence of clear and unambiguous indications of a different intention to be derived from the context of the will, read in the light of the surrounding circumstances, the class described by the testator as his legal heirs, etc., to whom a remainder or executory interest is given by the will, is to be ascertained at the death of the testator, the fact that the property is to be converted into personalty and distributed as such at the death of the first taker is indicative of an intention that the class shall be ascertained at the termination of the life estate. The fact that, at the time of the making of the will, the person to whom a particular estate was given will presumably be at the testator's death the sole member of the class to whom the same property is limited, and the use of terms importing plurality in the membership of the class, and requiring a division among them, while not conclusive of an intent to postpone the ascertaining of the membership of the class, are other indications of such an intention properly to be taken into consideration.

The fact that the widow seems to have been given by implication power to use so much of the principal as she might see fit for her own benefit tends to negative the supposition that she was intended to take under the ultimate limitation. Hardy v. Gage, 66 N. H. 552, 22 Atl. 557; Bisson v. R. R., 143 N. Y. 125, 38 N. E. 104.

Under this will, all the property was given to the wife for life (except the devise to Preston Thornton), and there was no devolution over till after her death. At that time, the provision that the property should all be sold, and after the payment of the bequests to the orphan asylum, to D. A. Bizzell, to Eliza Ann Cox, and to Selah Church, and the provision that the remainder should be divided among his "legal heirs" by his executor, show, not only that the remainder was not devised to the wife nor intended to go to her heirs, but that it was devised and should go to his "legal heirs" in existence after his wife's death. The devise of the remainder speaks of that date.

There was no defect in the will. The property was fully devised, and the wife acquiesced therein. The defect is that at the time the division was to be made there were no "legal heirs." If there had been any legal heirs at that time, they would have taken the property, and only those who were his legal heirs after his wife's death could have taken, for the provision is that the property should be sold and divided "among the legal heirs" at that time.

If, at the testator's death, there had been legal heirs other than his wife, they could not have taken if they had predeceased the wife. His "legal heirs" could be those only who were in existence and entitled to receive the legacy at the time of her death. Those only could share in the division "among my legal heirs," for they alone could answer to the description.

It may well be that the testator expected that he would leave legal heirs by his then wife, who was 40 years of age at the time the will was made, or he may have contemplated the possibility of legal heirs by a future marriage.

In Bowen v. Hackney, 136 N. C. 187, 48 S. E. 633, 67 L. R. A. 440, the will provided for a division of the property between the children of the testator "at the expiration of the life estate," and it is said in the opinion by Walker, J., that—

"The division is not to be made until the death of the life tenant, and that is the time fixed by the terms of the will when it shall be definitely and finally determined who shall take."

The language of this will brings it within the principle of the decision in Bowen v. Hackney, and it follows that the legal heirs of M. H. Bizzell, the testator, are to be determined as of the time of the death of his wife, the devisee of the life estate.

The language of the will in our case is not only sufficient to bring it within the authority of Bowen v. Hackney, but is much stronger than in that case in expressing the intention of the testator to annex the time fixed, i. e., the death of the life tenant, to the substance of the gift as a condition precedent, as well as to the time of enjoyment, which Mr. Justice Walker says creates a contingent remainder. Though similar to Bowen v. Hackney, it is stronger than that case, because there the will did not provide for a sale of the property by the executor and a division of the proceeds, but provided only for the division of the specific property devised to the wife for life.

The contention of the defendants that the legal heirs of testator must be determined at the time of testator's death is based upon assumption that this "is a devise to E. for life, and after her death to the heirs of devisor," and that the will of M. H. Bizzell devised to his legal heirs a remainder which vested at the time of his death, and that, the testator's wife being his sole heir at law at that time, the life estate and the remainder merged in her as a fee-simple estate.

At common law, the widow was not her husband's heir. She is made so by statute (Revisal, § 1556, rule 8), but the very statute creating the status limits its application to undivided property of the husband. Section 1556 of the Revisal provides that—"When any person shall die, seized of any inheritance, or of any right thereto, or entitled to any interest therein, not having devised the same, it shall descend" as set forth in the several rules of descent.

This language, when considered in connection with rule 8, cannot have the effect of making the wife the husband's heir where the property is devised by the husband to his heirs, and certainly not where the wife is devised a life estate with remainder to the heirs of the husband. The language of the will in this case precludes any intention on the part of the testator to devise to his wife a life estate and also a fee-simple estate in his property. It directs the sale of the property "left by" his wife and to divide the proceeds among his legal heirs.

The property to be sold was not simply all of the property which had been devised to the wife for life, but "all property, real and personal, left by her under item 3 of this will." How could the property be "left by her," if the life estate and the fee merged in the wife at the death of the testator, as contended by appellants? By item 4 of the will the testator bequeaths $1,000 to the Oxford Orphan Asylum, to be collected from the sales of property, real or personal, "left at my wife's death"; again demonstrating the fact that it was not the intention of the testator to devise to his wife the life estate and the remainder.

The testator devised to his "heirs at law" a contingent remainder, and that such heirs should be determined at the time of the death of the wife. This is supported by the decisions of this court and the courts of other states.

In Latham v. Lumber Co., 139 N. C. 9, 51 S. E. 780, 111 Am. St. Rep. 764, it is held that a contingent and not a vested remainder was created by the provisions of a will devising a life estate to the testator's daughter, "and after her death the said land and negroes are to go to the children of my said daughter and the children of such as are dead."

"Where a testator devises and bequeaths the whole of his estate, real and personal, to his wife during her natural life, except certain amounts to equalize gifts among his children, and then without any express or implied legacy, except as contained in the direction to his executor to convert into personalty and distribute, makes the following dispositive clause, viz., 'After the death of my wife I desire that the whole of my property, both real and personal, be sold by my executor and after expenses are paid to distribute equally to my legal heirs,' the rule that a bequest in the form of a direction to pay, or to pay and divide at a future period, vests immediately, if the payment be postponed for the convenience of the fund or estate, or merely to let in some other interest, does not apply. * * * In such case the direction to the executor to pay or to distribute to the testator's 'legal heirs' confers a contingent interest, which does not vest until the period of distribution; and the direction 'to distribute equally to my legal heirs' is equivalent to a direction to make distribution in accordance with the statutes providing for descent and distribution." Barr v. Denney, 79 Ohio St. 358, 87 N. E. 267.

"A devise to the widow for life, and 'at her death' to testator's 'heirs at law,' creates a contingent remainder, and the estate goes in fee to such persons only as, at the widow's death, answer to the description of 'heirs at law' of the testator." Forrest v. Porch, 100 Tenn. 391, 45 S. W. 676.

"A testator bequeathed to his wife 'the use of thirty shares in the Oxford Bank; said shares, at her decease, to be equally divided between his heirs'—and died leaving several children. It was held that the reversionary interest of any one of the children in these shares was contingent, and consequently not liable to be attached as his property in the hands of the executor." Rich v. Waters, 39 Mass. (22 Pick.) 563.

"Though the heirs of the testator were determinable at his death, yet the gift to them was not, by the terms of the will, to vest in possession until after the termination of the life estate given to the widow. That was the time fixed for the gift to take effect, and then was the time when the persons would be ascertained, who, coming under the description of heirs of the testator, would be entitled to share with the heirs of his widow in the distribution of the estate. Within that time the number of his heirs might be diminished by death, or increased by birth." Bisson v. R. R., 143 N. Y. 130, 38 N. E. 105.

In construing a will containing language very similar to that used by the testator in our case, the Supreme Court of New York says:

"The widow received a life estate. There was no gift in terms of remainder. But the will contained a direction to sell the land after the termination of the particular estate, and divide the proceeds among the objects of the testator's bounty. The rule is well settled that where there is no gift, but by a direction to pay or divide at a future time, the vesting in the beneficiary will not take place until the time arrives. * * * As futurity is annexed to the substance of the gift, none can take except those designated by the will as qualified to take at the time of the division." Bryer v. Finnen, 178 App. Div. 671, 165 N. Y. Supp. 805.

"Where the only words of gift are found in the direction to divide or pay at a future time, the gift is future, not immediate; contingent, and not vested." Hirsch v. Gillespie, 167 N. Y. Supp. 855; Matter of Crane, 164 N. Y. 76, 58 N. E. 47.

In Read v. Fogg, 60 Me. 479, a father by deed of warranty conveyed certain land to his daughter "for her use and benefit during her lifetime, and after her decease to her legal heirs, to them and their heirs and assigns forever," and it was held that the deed created a remainder that was contingent until the daughter's death, when it vested in those who were then her heirs at law.

The terms of the will indicate plainly:

(1) That the wife was restricted as devisee to her life estate, and was to receive nothing more.

(2) That after the wife's death—which was repeated five times in the will—the property was to be sold, and, after the payment of the four legacies named, the remainder was not to go to the wife, and certainly the testator did not intend that it should go to her heirs, nor was it left undevise. It was devised to those who should be his "legal heirs" after her death. There is a specific devise, clearly and unmistakably made, of the remainder after her death to be "divided among my legal heirs," which could not contemplate that the remainder was undevise. There being no legal heirs at that time, our statute directs that it shall go to the university, as the representative of the general public, who take in default of "legal heirs" in such cases.

This would have been the case if the wife had predeceased the husband, and this could not be changed by the fact that she took and enjoyed the unrestricted life estate which he gave her. At her death the property was devised to his legal heirs, existing at that time, and there were none other than as designated by the statute in such cases as this, i. e., the University of North Carolina.

The clear and unmistakable intent of the testator was to dispose of all his property after his wife's death, and that such property should go to those who should be after her death his "legal heirs." He had a right to so direct, and, having so directed, the property can go to no others than those who fill such description "after her death." There being none under the provisions of the state Constitution, the judgment should direct that after payment of the legacies the residue of the estate shall be paid over to the trustees of the University of North Carolina, the interveners.

The sale and division of all the property devised to the wife was specifically directed to take place "after her death." She could not possibly then be his heir. The decision is fully supported by Mr. Justice Hoke in Jenkins v. Lambeth, 172 N. C. 466, 469, 90 S. E. 513.

The judgment will be entered accordingly. Reversed.

ALLEN, J. (dissenting). I think I may assert with confidence that this is the first instance on record in which it has been held that property escheated when the owner left a will undertaking to dispose of it, and when, if he had died intestate, there was one who could take as his heir.

That the owner intended to dispose of his entire estate appears from the will in the record, and that one survived him, his widow, who could take as heir in case of intestacy, is shown by rule 8 of descents, which is as follows:

"When any person shall die, leaving none who can claim as heir to him, his widow shall be deemed his heir, and as such shall inherit his estate."

We should not, I submit with deference, reach such a conclusion unless forced to do so by imperative legal rules, as it thwarts the will of the testator, and is at variance with the spirit of the statute of descent, which in this instance names an heir, and with the law of escheats, which substitutes "the university in the place of the public in regard to all such real property as fell to the state for want of heirs capable to take." University v. Gilmour, 3 N. C. 130.

In determining the rights of the parties, I attach no importance to the words in the will "left at my said wife's death" and "left by her," which are emphasized in the opinion of the court, because in item 3 the testator gave to his wife for life personal as well as real property, and knowing that she could not dispose of the land, and that much of the personal property would be consumed, the words naturally refer to the personal property left by her.

The controversy depends on the legal effect to be given to the devise to the "legal heirs" of the testator in the fifth item.

When one "has made a will, the presumption is that he thereby intended to dispose of his entire property," and "the instrument must be construed in reference to that presumption" (McCallum v. McCallum, 167 N. C. 311, 83 S. E. 251); and in this case we not only have the legal presumption, but the will shows unmistakably the purpose to dispose of all his property.

"The intention must be gathered from the will itself, as read, in view of all the facts and surrounding circumstances." Wooten v. Hobbs, 170 N. C. 214, 86 S. E. 813.

"The meaning attributed by him [the testator] to words and phrases, when it appears, must prevail, however different this may be from that ordinarily implied by such words and phrases in other wills or other written instruments. The sole and controlling purpose is to ascertain what the testator, whose will may be under consideration, intended." Gray v. West, 93 N. C. 444, 53 Am. Rep. 462.

If there is "no defect in the description of either the person or thing on the face of the instrument, it becomes necessary to fit the description to the person or thing; in other words, to identify it. Here, as a matter of course, evidence dehors is admissible." Institute v. Norwood, 45 N. C. 69, approved McLeod v. Jones, 159 N. C. 76, 74 S. E. 733.

"Words of every kind, technical as well as others, and particularly when used in last wills, are liable to be varied in their meaning, to meet the intention of those who use them. When shown in an authentic manner the word 'heir' may mean some other person than him on whom the law casts the inheritance in a real estate." Croom v. Herring, 11 N. C. 396.

It is true in the Croom Case the word "heir" was used in connection with personal property, and there was other language in the will indicating that it was not used in its technical sense; but the case is authority for the position that "heir" "may mean some other person than him on whom the law casts the inheritance in a real estate."

Applying these principles, it appears that there is no defect on the face of the will, as the term "legal heirs" has a known signification; but, when construed technically, there is no one to answer the description, and, as it is presumed the testator intended to dispose of his whole estate and had some one in mind who could take, it is necessary to look at the situation of the testator and the surrounding circumstances in order that the persons called "legal heirs" may be identified and it was for this purpose the parol evidence was admitted, and it shows that the plaintiffs are the children of Frank and Cal McCullen, and are the lineal descendants of the sister of the mother of the testator; that the testator spoke of Frank and Cal McCullen as "first cousins," as "kin to me," as "the nearest kin he had," and said "he had no children and no kin folks but the McCullens and that the McCullens was kin to him and would be his heirs, he reckon." Webster defines "reckon" "to conclude, as on an enumeration and balancing of chances; hence to think; suppose." And, as so understood at the time the will was made, the testator concluded, thought, or supposed the McCullens were his legal heirs, and so devised his property to them. He was thinking of some one, and, if not of the McCullens, of whom, since he had declared they were not only his nearest kin, but that he had no other kin, and he thought they were his heirs.

The suggestion that the testator may have had in mind the birth of a child by a second marriage, or by his wife then living, has nothing to support it. Wills speak as of the death of the testator (Rev. § 3140), and the possibility of a second marriage died with him, and it is not within the bounds of probability that he had even a remote idea that the wife with whom he had lived 39 years, and who had given birth to no child, would bear him a child and "legal heir" within 9 months after his death.

I therefore think the verdict of the jury, finding that the testator meant, by the use of the words "my legal heirs," Frank and Cal McCullen, ought to stand, and the judgment be affirmed and the same conclusion would be reached if the property devised is treated as personalty.

But if this is not so, it does not follow that the university takes by escheat; and, on the contrary, if the plaintiffs have no title, it seems to me clear the defendants are the owners, as devisees of the widow of the testator.

The court says:

"There is no ambiguity. The devise is to a class—my legal heirs—and who they were is a matter of law."

Granted, for the purpose of the discussion, and the law says:

"When any person shall die, leaving none who can claim as heir to him, his widow shall be deemed as heir to him, and as such shall inherit his estate."

In other words, the opinion of the court, as I understand it, proceeds upon the idea that the testator had no person in mind when he said "my legal heirs," and that he intended those to take who could answer the roll call, without regard to person, and, if so, the widow must be held to have the title, as she was the only legal heir under the statute when the will was made, when the testator died, and when she died.

Everett v. Griffin, 174 N. C. 107, 93 S. E. 474, is an instance of the word "heir" in a will being held to include a widow, and in Freeman v. Knight, 37 N. C. 75, the same effect was given to "my legal heirs."

The first case is also authority for holding that the proceeds of sale should be dealt with as personalty upon the ground of equitable conversion; but I do not think this affects the rights of the parties, as the widow would take the same, whether as heir or distributee.

The phrase "after her death" is no stronger than "at the expiration of my wife's interest," and it was held, in Taylor v. Taylor, 174 N. C. 538, 94 S. E. 8, that in a devise to the wife during widowhood "and at the expiration of my wife's interest in land and property, divide it equally among my living children," that the children, who were to take, must be ascertained as of the death of the testator, and the same rule would give this property to the widow.

The objection is made that this view cannot prevail because a life estate is given to the widow, and that this demonstrates that the testator did not intend for her to have more; but I respectfully submit that this is answered by the court, when it is held that the testator had no one in mind when he wrote "my legal heirs," and that his purpose was to give the remainder to those upon whom the law cast the inheritance, without regard to person, and if this is true, and the widow falls within the class, she must take.

Again, it is urged that the widow cannot take under the rule of descent, except when the husband dies "not having devised the same," and that the devise to "my legal heirs" prevents the operation of the rule; but the court has held that the property has not been devised, because there was no one to take.

If, however, the widow is not within the term "my legal heirs" and cannot take under the will, there is no one who can, no one has ever been in existence who could, and no one can now come into being to answer the description; and, if so, the devise in remainder lapsed and was void, and this upon the death of the testator left the life estate in the widow under the will, and the remainder in fee undisposed of, which the widow inherited under the rule of descent before referred to.

There is one other position in favor of the widow, which is amply supported by authority, and which was approved in a unanimous opinion of this court in Thompson v. Batts, 168 N. C. 334, 84 S. E. 347, and that is that the devise to "my legal heirs" was void as a remainder, and left the reversion in fee in the testator at his death, and, if so, it passed to the widow under the rule of descent.

Ferne says (page 51):

"A limitation to the right heirs of the grantor will continue in himself as a reversion in fee.

As where a fine was levied to the use of the wife of the co-user for life, remainder to the use of B. in tail, remainder to the use of the right heirs of the co-user, it was adjudged that the limitation of the use to the right heirs of the co-user was void, for that the old use of the fee continued in him as a reversion."

In Read & Morpeth v. Evington, Moor, K. B., 284, it was ruled that—"If a man seized in fee makes a feoffment to the use of A. in tail or for life, remainder to the use of his own right heirs, the land upon the death of A. without issue returns to the feoffor as his ancient reversion, and does not rest in his right heir as a remainder by purchase."

Sir Edward Coke says:

"If a man make a gift in tail, or a lease for life, the remainder to his own right heirs, this remainder is void and he hath the reversion in him, for the ancestor during his life beareth in his body (in the judgment of law) all his heirs." Co. Litt. 22.

In Hargrave and Butler's notes (1 Am. Ed. from 19 London Ed. of 1853), one of the notes to this section states the following case, being note 3:

"Feoffment to the use of a feoffee for forty years, remainder to B. in tail, remainder to the right heirs of the feoffor. It is the old reversion, and the feoffor may devise it; for the use returned to the feoffor for want of consideration to retain it in the feoffee till the death of the feoffor."

See, also, 2 Wash. Real Property, 692; Robinson v. Blankenship, 116 Tenn. 394, 92 S. W. 854; 24 A. & E. Enc. L. 396.

Referring to remainders limited to heirs of grantor, Chief Justice Parson, in Law Lectures (page 142, note) says:

"A grant to Z. for life, remainder to heirs of grantor, the limitation is not a remainder, but the grantor takes his old reversion."

Again on page 147, note:

"The test by which the applicability of the doctrine may be determined in any particular case is to strike out the devise to the heir, and if he would still take the same interest as the will gives him, the devise is void."

"An instance of this sort of remainder is exhibited in a grant to Z. for life, remainder to the heirs of grantor. This limitation, although denominated a remainder in the grant, really is not such. It does not devolve on the heirs of the grantor as purchasers, as it would do if a remainder, but remains in the grantor himself, as his old reversion in fee." Minor's Institutes, vol. 2, pp. 399, 400.

"It is a settled maxim of common law that a person cannot make a conveyance of realty to 'his own right heirs'; and a remainder thus limited is void, and will remain in the grantor as his old reversion, and his heirs at his death will take by descent, and not by purchase." Harris v. McLaran, 30 Miss. 533.

The same principle is recognized in King v. Scoggin, 92 N. C. 99, 53 Am. Rep. 410, where the court says:

"It is true, remainders are created by deed or writing, but the estate is sometimes created so that what is called a remainder is, in effect, only a reversion; as, for instance, when an estate is given to one for life, remainder to the right heirs of the grantor (2 Washburn on Real Property, 692; Burton on Real Property, 51), and this must be the kind of remainder classed with reversions which go to the donor or to him who can make himself heir to him."

"An estate in reversion is the residue of an estate left in the grantor, to commence in possession after the determination of some particular estate granted out by him. It is a present vested estate, although to take effect in possession and profit in futuro." 16 Cyc. 661.

"A reversion descends like the old inheritance." King v. Scoggin, 92 N. C. 102, 53 Am. Rep. 410.

Under this principle, twice approved unanimously by our court, so much of the estate as the testator attempted to devise to his legal heirs did not pass by the will, but remained in him as a present vested interest, and upon his death descended to his heirs, and at the time of his death his widow was his only heir.

If this is sound, it can make no difference that the devise to "my legal heirs" is after the death of the wife, because, the devise being to the heirs of the testator, it can never take effect as a remainder vested or contingent, and operates only as a reversion, which left in the testator at his death the interest attempted to be devised to his heirs, and, as "a reversion descends like the old inheritance," it would belong to the widow, who was the only heir at the death of the testator.

In other words, it never has been nor can be necessary to ascertain the legal heirs of the testator after the death of his wife, because the attempt to devise an interest to his heirs after the life estate of his wife is inoperative and has the legal effect of leaving that interest in the testator at his death, and it would descend to him who was then his heir.

It seems that a sale of the property will not be necessary, as all of the parties to the record have elected to treat the property involved in this litigation as land.

Why, then, is she not entitled to the property in preference to the university?

If it be said the testator did not intend for her to have more than a life estate, it is certain he had no intention of giving his estate to the university, and, as the university has abandoned the domain of intent and is relying upon technical legal rules, she may do likewise.

I have therefore come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, and, if not, that the defendants are the owners of the land, and that the university has no standing in court.

ARMENTROUT et al. v. LAMBERT.
(No. 3707.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 11, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. COSTS — 282 — INDEPENDENT ACTION TO RECOVER COSTS.

The successful party in a suit cannot maintain a subsequent independent action to recover the costs of litigation incurred in the necessary prosecution or defense of such suit, where the same were not adjudged to him therein.

2. JUDGMENT — 590(1) — OMITTING RECOVERY FOR COSTS — RES JUDICATA.

All costs properly recoverable by a successful litigant must be recovered in the suit in which they are incurred; otherwise, they are barred by the rule of res adjudicata.

Error from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Action in assumpsit by O. L. and O. S. Armentrout against L. D. Lambert. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

A. M. Cunningham, of Parsons, and Neil Cunningham, of Charleston, for plaintiffs in error.

J. W. Harman, of Parsons, for defendant in error.

RITZ, J. The original suit out of which this litigation grew began before a justice. The judgment of the justice was appealed to the circuit court of Randolph county, and from a judgment of that court a writ of error was prosecuted to this court, which resulted in the judgment of the circuit court being reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial. Lambert v. Armentrout, 65 W. Va. 375, 64 S. E. 260, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 556. After the case went back to the circuit court, the defendants Armentrout enjoined further proceeding in the action at law. This suit in equity was heard and resulted in a denial of the relief to the plaintiffs therein, and in a recovery over in favor of the defendant therein, Lambert, for the amount involved in the law suit. Upon appeal from that decree to this court the same was affirmed so far as it denied the plaintiffs relief, and was reversed in so far as it decreed over in favor of Lambert, and further provided that the dismissal of the equity suit should be without prejudice to either party upon the trial of the action at law, which had been enjoined in said equity suit. Armentrout v. Armentrout, 70 W. Va. 661, 74 S. E. 907. In the meantime, an order had been entered in the action at law reciting that, inasmuch as the matters in controversy therein had been determined by the decree entered in the above-mentioned equity suit, said law suit was dismissed satisfied. When the equity suit was disposed of, as above mentioned, Lambert, instead of reopening the law suit, which had been dismissed, brought a suit to recover upon his original claim. It appears that in the action at law originally brought before the justice, and which had been dismissed, satisfied as aforesaid, each party had incurred considerable costs, for the payment of which no provision was made in the order of dismissal. The amount of such costs incurred by the Armentrouts was $321.42. They thereupon brought this suit in assumpsit to recover from Lambert the costs incurred by them in the action at law, originally brought before the justice, and disposed of by the order of dismissal above mentioned. The declaration contained the common counts in assumpsit and two special counts setting up the facts as above shown. Upon a demurrer being interposed to said declaration, and to each count thereof, the court sustained the demurrer to the special counts, but overruled it as to the common counts, and entered an order of dismissal, which was construed on a former appeal as not being such a final judgment as would sustain a writ of error. Armentrout v. Lambert, 79 W. Va. 602, 91 S. E. 452. The writ of error was dismissed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court of Randolph county, and the plaintiff then withdrew the common counts in his declaration, and, declining to amend upon leave given for that purpose, the demurrer to the special counts was sustained, and judgment rendered in favor of the defendant, from which judgment this writ of error is prosecuted.

[1, 2] The sole question presented is: Can this suit be maintained having for its purpose the recovery of costs incurred in former litigation, in which no judgment or order was made allowing the same? The allowance of costs depends entirely on statute. At common law they were unknown. By our statute the party prevailing in a suit recovers his costs in that suit. This recovery is part of the final judgment. The question presented here is: In case no recovery is taken in such suit for such costs, can an independent suit be maintained therefor? The recovery of costs becomes one of the matters involved in the litigation. While it is only incidental, still their recovery is as much involved in the suit as is the main controversy, and it is familiar doctrine that every question fairly arising in a case is adjudicated by the judgment in that case, and that no other or further suit will be permitted to recover on account of a matter which should have been settled therein. No reason is perceived why this doctrine does not apply to recoveries for costs, as well as to the recovery of any other matter of substance involved in the litigation. In 15 C. J. P. 298, it is held that in the absence of a special statute authorizing it costs cannot be recovered in an independent action, but are only recoverable in the cause in which they are incurred. In Perlus v. Silver, 71 Wash. 338, 128 Pac. 661, it was held that a successful litigant cannot maintain a subsequent action to recover from his losing adversary the costs and expenses of litigation, but must resort to the statutory right to have the items thereof taxed as costs in the first action, and this holding is based upon the ground that a recovery for costs is a matter involved in the litigation, and all questions in regard thereto are res adjudicata. In Leslie v. Carter, 268 Mo. 420, 187 S. W. 1196, it is held that the successful plaintiff in a suit cannot maintain a subsequent independent action to recover the costs of litigation incurred in the necessary prosecution of that suit—the holding being that this question could only be determined in the suit in which the costs were incurred; that, inasmuch as they were properly recoverable in that suit, a failure to obtain a recovery therein would not justify the bringing of an independent suit therefor, but judgment rendered in that suit would be conclusive of all the matters which could be properly determined therein. In Massachusetts, in the case of Knight v. Hurley, 155 Mass. 486, 29 N. E. 1149, it is held that an interlocutory order entered in a cause allowing costs on a motion, such as a motion for a continuance or other like proceeding, would not sustain an independent proceeding brought to recover such costs, but that they could only be recovered by proper process in the suit in which they were incurred. This conclusion is supported by the English cases of Emerson v. Lashley, 2 H. Bl. 248, 126 English Reprint, 533, Fry v. Malcolm, 4 Taunt. 706, 128 English Reprint, 508, and Sheehy v. Assurance Co., 2 C. B. (N. S.) 211, 140 English Reprint, 395. Those cases have a very much stronger basis for recovery than the case presented here. In each of them, including the Massachusetts case, an interlocutory order was made allowing costs to a party to the suit, and the independent suit was brought upon the theory that such an interlocutory order was in effect a judgment in favor of the party claiming the benefit of it, but the court held that such was not the case, and denied the right to maintain the suit. We are clearly of the opinion that this suit cannot be maintained for the recovery of costs as such. If a final judgment had been rendered in the case in which was included a recovery for costs, then, of course, a suit could be maintained thereon having such judgment for its basis in the same manner as a suit may be maintained upon any other final judgment, but no suit can be maintained to recover an item of costs which was properly recoverable in the suit in which it was incurred. The judgment in such suit is res adjudicata.

Finding no error in the judgment complained of, the same is affirmed.

ROOT v. CLOSE et al. (No. 3623.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 11, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EQUITY ⇐195—CROSS-BILL—SCOPE.

A cross-bill, or an answer praying affirmative relief, must be limited in its scope to the subject-matter of the bill. It cannot introduce a new and distinct subject, even though such subject may be related in some way to that of the bill.

2. EQUITY ⇐195—CROSS-BILL—SCOPE.

The purpose of a bill being the establishment of a debt and assertion of a lien for the amount thereof against property alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed by the debtor, averments in the answer of title in the defendant, not only to the fund constituting the alleged debt, but also to a horse, notes, and a right of rescission of a deed, as ground for affirmative relief, introduce matters foreign to the subject-matter of the bill, and may properly be struck out, in so far as they are relied upon as constituting ground for cross-relief.

3. PAYMENT ⇐73(1) — GIFTS ⇐49(1) — DEFENSE—EVIDENCE.

In a suit for the recovery of money alleged to be a part of the estate of a deceased person from one with whom the decedent, a man well advanced in years, unwelcome among his relatives, but able to do a reasonable amount of work and having means of subsistence, had made his home for a comparatively short time, in whose hands he had placed the money, and who claims it as a gift, or as compensation for the care, support, and maintenance of the decedent and medical attention furnished him, while in life, and expenses of his burial, there is a right of recovery in the plaintiff, in the absence of clear and satisfactory evidence of such gift or payment. Mere loose and indefinite declarations of intention and purpose on the part of the intestate, accompanied by conduct and circumstances of equivocal import, do not sustain the defense in such a controversy.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐1009(2)—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES ⇐15—BADGE OF FRAUD—FINDING OF TRIAL COURT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A trial court's finding of fraud in a conveyance of real estate from a son to his mother, made with knowledge, on the part of the latter, of an assertion of a claim of indebtedness against the former and his intention bitterly and stubbornly to resist it, and attended by disposition of all of his personal property, participated in and aided by her, leaving him without property out of which compulsory satisfaction of the debt can be obtained, in the event of the establishment thereof, cannot be disturbed by the appellate court, even though there is oral evidence tending to prove payment of the purchase money of the real estate, some months before the deed was executed.

5. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES ⇐314—PERSONAL LIABILITY OF GRANTEE SELLING TO BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

If a fraudulent purchaser has sold the property to a bona fide purchaser, so that it cannot be reached by the creditor, a personal decree may be entered against him for the amount of the debt; the proceeds of the sale being sufficient to pay it.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tucker County.

Bill by John J. Root, administrator, etc., against William D. Close and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

D. E. Cuppett, of Thomas, and Chas. D. Smith, of Parsons, for appellants.

J. W. Harman, of Parsons, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, J. The principal inquiries in this cause are: (1) Whether the sum of $471, placed in the hands of William D. Close, one of the defendants, by the intestate, Jonathan Root, was a mere deposit or loan, on the one hand, or, on the other, a payment to Close for the care, support, and maintenance of said Root; and (2) if so, whether a deed to Mrs. Kate Close, his mother, was made with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the estate of the intestate in the collection of that sum of money. Having decided both issues in favor of the plaintiff, the court entered a personal decree against Mrs. Close for part of the money, $290; she having disposed of the house and lot to Willis Evans, an innocent purchaser for value. She and William D. Close, the principal debtor, have appealed from the decree.

At the date of the inception of the transaction out of which this controversy arose, Jonathan Root, the decedent, was about 70 years old, unmarried, eccentric, and homeless, but neither destitute nor wholly unable to work. Until a comparatively short time before that date, he maintained a nominal residence with his brother at a place in Preston county, W. Va., and owned a small farm in that county, but led a sort of wandering or migratory life. A great deal of his time was spent in the woods as an employé, or in some other capacity, and at one time he seems to have held a position on the police force in the city of Baltimore. The brother says his home was Jonathan's domicile for a period of about 45 years. Shortly before he gave it up, he conveyed his farm to T. B. Root, a son of his brother, for and in consideration of $1,600, of which $600 was paid in cash and the residue made payable in 10 equal annual installments, represented by notes bearing interest. This nephew says the deed provided that such of the notes as should remain unpaid, at the date of the death of the grantor, were not to be paid. After having executed the deed, Jonathan Root resided with his nephew, the grantee, in the house on the farm, for about one week. Leaving that place, he stayed with his brother, the father of the grantee, about 3 weeks, and then left, saying he intended to go in search of a job. Whether he went immediately to Leadmine, in Tucker county, the place of residence of William D. Close, does not appear.

[4] Close's location at Leadmine seems to have been substantially coincident with that of Root in point of time. In 1915 he either purchased or established a small general store at that place, and in some way, not disclosed by the record, obtained title to the house and lot in question, and resided therein. Root came there as a woodsman, and, shortly after his arrival, he became an inmate at Close's home. Before he was taken into it, he placed $380 in the hands of Close for safe-keeping, saying he did not want to carry it with him while working in the woods. Later he put into Close's hands an additional sum of $91. He also left in Close's hands the 10 $100 notes executed to him by T. B. Root, on account of purchase money of the farm. His other property consisted of a small amount of money due him from a relative residing in Thomas, W. Va., and a horse which he kept at Close's. The period of his residence at Close's seems to have been something more than a year, during all of which, except the last few days, he rendered Close more or less service in and about his store business and his home, using his horse. As to the amount and value of his services, the evidence is somewhat uncertain and conflicting. Close gave him a comfortable room and bed, and permitted him to take his meals with the family. He also furnished him suitable and sufficient clothing, and provided stable room and feed for the horse. It is established by a very decided preponderance of the evidence that he was treated kindly and well provided for. Though intelligent opinions might differ as to the value of his services and the use of his horse, the evidence as to it is not such as would justify this court in disturbing the finding of the trial court, to the effect that it constituted a substantial set-off against the value of the board, lodging, stable room, and feed furnished. Near December 1, 1916, he became ill of pneumonia, and died December 11, 1916. During the period of his illness, Close furnished him medical attention and all possible care, and, after his death, paid the expenses of his funeral.

Immediately after the death of Root, his relatives made a demand upon Close for the property left in his hands. He promptly delivered to them the notes, but declined to pay over the money or give up the horse, claiming the former as compensation for the care and maintenance of the intestate, and the latter upon the theory of gift thereof to his wife by the intestate, within the period of his last illness. The horse was afterwards recovered by the administrator in an action of detinue. There is a close relation in point of time between Root's death and Close's disposition of his property. By a deed, dated December 15, 1916, and acknowledged December 30, 1916, he conveyed the house and lot to his mother. In January or February, 1917, he made a bulk sale of his groceries, some of the dry goods, the showcases, the stove, and the scales to J. G. Beringer, for something less than $300, and removed the balance of the goods to his mother's store at St. George, a place situated a few miles from Leadmine. With the money derived from the sale of the house and lot and his stock of goods, he seems to have settled up all of his indebtedness, except what is involved in this suit.

[1, 2] As the bill aptly alleges the indebtedness claimed and fraud in the disposition of the property, conveyance of the real estate to the debtor's mother, and mingling of his store goods with hers, it is hardly necessary to observe that the demurrer thereto, on the ground of adequacy of legal remedy, was properly overruled. It is fair to counsel for the appellants to say they do not here insist upon the efficacy of the demurrer. They do complain, however, of the rejection of a portion of the answer, purporting to set up new matter constituting ground of affirmative relief. On an exception, the court partially eliminated seven paragraphs of the answer, upon the theory that the matter set up therein, as constituting ground for affirmative relief, was foreign to the purpose of the bill. The exception seems to have sought complete elimination thereof, but the court treated it as one seeking exclusion of such matters only in so far as they constituted a claim for cross-relief and only to that extent sustained it. In so far as the averments of the answer were merely defensive, they were allowed to stand, and the cause made by the bill and the answer, so restricted, was determined upon its merits. The prayer for affirmative relief in the answer was based upon averments of title in the defendant, William D. Close, to the entire estate of Jonathan Root, the amount of money left in his hands, the horse, the purchase-money notes, and right of rescission of the deed conveying the farm to T. B. Root, upon some theory not specifically stated, perhaps fraud in the procurement thereof, or nonperformance of a condition subsequent. Inasmuch as the relief sought by the crossbill answer was entirely outside of and beyond the subject-matter of the bill, the court properly excluded the matters upon which the prayer therefor was based. If there was right to retain the money held by the defendant, and also right to recover the other property that had been taken from him, both grew out of and rested upon the contract averred in the cross-bill answer, it is true, but the subjects were entirely different. The bill sought recovery of the money deposited, loaned, or paid, and nothing more, while the cross-bill answer sought recovery of the note, the horse, and all other personal property belonging to the intestate, and cancellation of the deed by which he had conveyed his land. These subjects are clearly foreign to that of the bill, and litigation respecting them would require new parties and might raise many new issues. Manifestly, they do not constitute proper matter for a cross-bill or ground for affirmative belief in an answer. W. Va. O. & O. L. v. Vinal, 14 W. Va. 637; Hansford v. Coal Co., 22 W. Va. 75; Peters v. Case, 62 W. Va. 33, 57 S. E. 733, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 408.

[3] The evidence relied upon to prove a contract between Root and Close, by virtue of which the latter was to have all of the property of the former, in consideration of care, maintenance, and support, lacks the definiteness and certainty that ought to characterize evidence relied upon for such purpose; and these qualities are not supplied by the situation and conduct of the parties and the surrounding facts and circumstances, relied upon for that purpose. The evidence consists largely of loose declarations of intention and purpose on the part of the intestate. Several of the witnesses say he had frequently declared himself to be well satisfied and highly pleased with the new home he had found, contrasting his treatment by Close and his wife with that which he had received at the hands of his relatives. These declarations were accompanied by others to the effect that, if Close continued to treat him well, he intended to always remain with him, and to leave him what property he might have at the time of his death. Close himself testifies that the money first received, $380, was placed in his hands for safe-keeping, before Root became a member of his family, and he does not say what the understanding between them was when the residue $91, was delivered to him.

Nowhere in his testimony does he say, in so many words, that Root ever told him he should have the entire $471 for the services rendered him, but he quotes language used by Root to a little child, importing intent to bestow something on it or upon its parents. In addition to that, he says he claimed the money as his own, when it was demanded of him by the administrator. A brother of his testifies that Root had told him he had let him have $471, and that he intended to see that Close got all he had, not that he had given that money for services rendered and to be rendered. Close's mother testifies to the same sort of a declaration. Witnesses for the plaintiff say Close did not claim the money, when it was demanded of him, but that he did claim right of compensation for the care, support, and maintenance of Root, against his estate, sufficient in amount to cover the money in his hands. That the old man's physical condition and personal habits were such as to render him an undesirable guest anywhere is very well established. There is evidence tending to prove that he was afflicted with a loathsome disease, which rendered his person unsanitary, and, at times, disagreeably odoriferous. He had an aversion for the cleansing properties of water, and what is popularly deemed to be the comfort of clean clothes, and he seldom, if ever, had his hair or beard trimmed. His slovenly habits made him unwelcome in the homes of his relatives, but his brother says he allowed him to make his home his domicile for a period of 45 years, but made him keep himself clean. A short time before he gave up his brother's home, his niece had trouble with him, on account of his slovenliness. There is a bare suggestion in the record, by way of hearsay, that the nephew to whom he conveyed his farm caused his bed to be moved out into, or over, a hog pen, in his absence, but this is flatly denied by the nephew.

The unkindness of his relatives, if any, and his estrangement from them, do not prove a contract between him and the defendant Close. He may have been, in a sense, an outcast; but whether he gave the defendant the money in question, in consideration of support and maintenance, depends upon the understanding and agreement between them. Although perhaps an outcast, he was not helpless. His affliction did not wholly incapacitate him for work. While he remained at the home of the defendant, he was industrious and enterprising. Many witnesses say he worked constantly and early and late, in all kinds of weather. The defendant himself says the old man insisted upon his purchasing an additional horse, so he could do his hauling, and that, on one or more occasions, he protested against his going out to work in bad weather. There is no suggestion of lack of capacity for work, until he was attacked by the disease that ended his life. Besides probable capacity to earn his living, he had some property and was able to take care of it and utilize it. The facts and circumstances proved are altogether different from those established in Bryson v. McShane, 48 W. Va. 126, 35 S. E. 848, 49 L. R. A. 527, and the evidence adduced to prove an agreement between the intestate and the defendant William D. Close lacks the definiteness and certainty found in the evidence in the case just referred to. In view of the looseness and conflict which characterize it, this court would not be justified in disturbing the finding of the trial court as to the agreement between the parties. White v. White, 64 W. Va. 30, 60 S. E. 885.

Nor is it possible to disturb the trial court's finding as to the amount due. The services of the old man and the use of his horse were probably nearly equal in value to the services rendered to him. The decree, however, allowed a credit of $225 for services rendered and burial expenses; the court being of the opinion that the services of the intestate partially discharged his obligation for lodging, board, stable room, and feed.

[5] The circumstances under which Close disposed of his property and the manner in which he did so precludes disturbance of the trial court's finding of fraud in the conveyance of the real estate. It was a transaction between mother and son and in plain view of a claim of indebtedness against the latter, depriving him of the means out of which compulsory satisfaction thereof could be obtained, in the event of its establishment. There is documentary evidence of payments or advancements from the mother to the son, dated May 24, 1916, August 7, 1916, and October 14, 1916; but these papers, two checks and a receipt calling for $450, the amount of the consideration recited in the deed, do not say what the money was paid for. They antedated the deed, and the oral evidence is that only the last one represented purchase money. The other two admittedly did not originally do so. Both parties to these transactions were parties to the removal of a portion of the goods and the sale of the balance. This circumstance constitutes a badge of fraud, and casts doubt and suspicion upon their explanation of the unusual circumstances attending the conveyance. Colston v. Miller, 55 W. Va. 490, 47 S. E. 268. About two months elapsed between the date of the last alleged payment and the date of the deed, and the date of the acknowledgment approximates that of the removal of the store goods, and all these events, except the alleged payments, occurred after this controversy arose. In view of the subsequent conveyance of the real estate to an innocent purchaser for value, the personal decree against Mrs. Close was proper. Vance Shoe Co. v. Haught, 41 W. Va. 275, 23 S. E. 553; Lockhart v. Beckley, 10 W. Va. 87; Heath v. Page, 63 Pa. 106, 3 Am. Rep. 533.

Upon these principles and conclusions, the decree will be affirmed.

JAMES v. STATE. (No. 10308.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
April 4, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. CRIMINAL LAW §594(3) — MOTION FOR CONTINUANCE—ABSENT WITNESS.

It being shown upon the hearing of the defendant's motion for a continuance, based upon the absence of a material witness for the defense, that the witness was beyond the jurisdiction of the court (in the United States army in France), and had not been subpoenaed, the court did not err in overruling the motion. Pen. Code 1910, § 987; Boyd v. State, 17 Ga. App. 162, 86 S. E. 411; Minder v. State, 113 Ga. 772, 39 S. E. 284 (1). This is true, although the defendant stated that he expected to have the witness at the next term of the court; it not being shown that the witness had promised to attend, or that there was any other ground for this expectation. Woolfolk v. State, 85 Ga. 69, 11 S. E. 814 (4); Owens v. State, 110 Ga. 292, 34 S. E. 1015.

2. CRIMINAL LAW §923(8) — NEW TRIAL—DISQUALIFICATION OF JUROR—DILIGENCE.

The fact that one of the jurors had been a member of the grand jury that found the bill against the defendant is not cause for a new trial. The defendant and his counsel, by due diligence, could have discovered this fact before the jury was impaneled. Britt v. State, 112 Ga. 583, 37 S. E. 886.

EVITT v. STATE. (No. 10254.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
April 4, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION §110(35) — DEMURRER—PLEA IN ABATEMENT.

The court did not err in overruling the general and special demurrers to the indictment, or in sustaining the motion of the solicitor general to strike the defendant's plea in abatement.

2. REFUSAL OF INSTRUCTIONS.

The refusal of the court to give the timely written request to charge, presented by counsel for the defendant, was not error.

3. RULING ON MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The overruling of the motion for a new trial was not error.

Error from Superior Court, Wilcox County; D. A. R. Crum, Judge.

A. L. Evitt was convicted of selling adulterated food, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Hal Lawson, of Abbeville, for plaintiff in error.

J. B. Wall, Sol. Gen., and J. S. Grantham, both of Fitzgerald, and Max E. Land, of Cordele, for the State.

BROYLES, P. J. The indictment under which the defendant was tried charged that, on the 11th day of May, 1918, in the county of Wilcox, he "did then and there, unlawfully and with force and arms, sell adulterated food, in that the said Evitt sold to S. A. Bowen a portion of an animal, to wit, a cow, unfit for food, not manufactured, and said portion of said cow being the product of a diseased cow, and being that of a cow that had died otherwise than by slaughter—contrary to the laws of this state, the good order, peace and dignity thereof."

The defendant interposed the following demurrer:

"(1) The facts as set forth in said indictment constitute no offense against the criminal laws of the state of Georgia.

"(2) The said indictment fails to allege that the food for the sale of which this indictment was preferred was ever examined by the state chemist, or under his direction, for the purpose of determining whether said food was adulterated within the meaning of the law, nor does it allege that any notice of the intention to have such examination was ever given the defendant, nor does it allege that as a result of such examination as aforesaid the commissioner of agriculture certified the case to the solicitor general of this court, after having determined that the provisions of the law touching the adulteration of foods had been violated by this defendant.

"(3) Defendant demurs to so much of the said indictment as alleges that the portion of an animal, to wit, a cow, which defendant was indicted for selling, was unfit for food, because it fails to show how or in what way the said portion was unfit for food.

"(4) Defendant demurs to so much of said indictment as alleges, 'said portion of said cow being the product of a diseased cow,' because said indictment fails to show what kind of product of said diseased cow defendant is indicted for selling, and further fails to allege how the said cow was diseased, and with what disease she was afflicted."

The defendant filed also the following plea in abatement:

"The food which is claimed in the said indictment to have been adulterated was not examined by the state chemist, or under his direction and supervision, for the purpose of determining from such examination whether such food was adulterated; and no notice was ever given this defendant and no opportunity to be heard was ever given him so that he could be present at any such examination; nor did the commissioner of agriculture ever determine, ascertain, or declare that any of the provisions of the pure food laws of Georgia had been violated by this defendant; nor did the said commissioner of agriculture of Georgia certify the facts and the case to the solicitor general of the Cordele judicial circuit. Of all this the defendant puts himself upon the country, and prays that said indictment do abate."

[1] In our judgment the indictment (which charged the offense substantially in the language of the statute) was not subject to any ground of the demurrer; and the facts stated in the plea in abatement were insufficient in law to require the abatement of the prosecution.

[2, 3] The verdict was authorized by the evidence, and has been approved by the trial judge; and, as no error of law appears, this court is without authority to interfere.

Judgment affirmed.

CITY COUNCIL OF AUGUSTA v. CLEVELAND. (No. 8996.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2, April 4, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS §747(4)—NEGLECT OF EMPLOYE—LIABILITY—GOVERNMENTAL DUTY.

While ordinarily a municipality is not liable to a private citizen for injuries caused by the negligence of employes of its board of health while engaged in work connected with the preservation of the public health, an exception to this rule occurs where there is negligence on the part of such employes, who are paid directly by the city and not by the board of health, in cleaning out a part of a sewer, and leaving a heavy iron lid to an opening in the sewer in such a position upon a sidewalk as to create a dangerous defect or obstruction in the sidewalk, in consequence of which one not chargeable with negligence is injured.

2. CHARGE OF COURT.

There is no reversible error in any of the excerpts from the charge of the court, as complained of in the special grounds of the motion for a new trial, when considered in the light of the charge as a whole.

3. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The verdict was authorized by the evidence, and the court did not err in refusing to grant a new trial.

Error from City Court of Richmond County; J. C. C. Black, Jr., Judge.

Action by Leroy Cleveland, by next friend, against the City Council of Augusta. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed in conformity to answer of the Supreme Court (148 Ga. 734, 98 S. E. 345) to certified question.

Isaac S. Peebles, Jr., of Augusta, for plaintiff in error.

Alexander & Lee, of Augusta, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, P. J. [1-3] The first headnote alone needs elaboration. The ruling therein stated is in accord with the decision of the Supreme Court in this case, rendered February 13, 1919, in answer to questions certified by this court. 148 Ga. 734, 98 S. E. 345. That decision follows:

1. "The duty of a city to maintain its sewerage drainage system in a good working and sanitary condition is a governmental function."

2. "Such maintenance of a sewerage system has reference to the preservation of the public health."

3. "This court will take judicial notice of that fact."

4. "This court will also take judicial cognizance of the fact that the cleaning out of an essential part of a city's sewerage drainage system for the purpose of keeping it open and unclogged by dirt, sand, or other foreign substances, so that it can properly perform its functions as a part of the system, is a necessary work in a proper maintenance of the system, and is a work connected with the preservation of the public health."

5. "Negligence on the part of employes of the board of health of a city, who were paid by the city, in cleaning out a part of the sewer and leaving a heavy iron lid to an opening into the sewer in such a position as to create a dangerous defect or obstruction in the sidewalk, in consequence of which one not chargeable with negligence was injured, would render the city liable to the injured party."

"The Court of Appeals has certified the following questions upon which it desires instruction:

"(1) Is the duty of a city to maintain its sewerage drainage system in a good working and sanitary condition, so as to prevent it from becoming or causing a nuisance, a governmental or a ministerial function?

"(a) Is such maintenance connected with, or has it reference to, the preservation of the public health?

"(b) Is the fact that such maintenance is connected with or has reference to the preservation of the public health so well known that this court can take judicial cognizance of it?

"(c) Can this court take judicial cognizance of the well-known fact that the cleaning out of a "sand trap"—an essential part of a city's sewerage drainage system—for the purpose of keeping it open and unclogged by dirt, sand, or other foreign substances, so that it can properly perform its functions as a part of the system, is a necessary work in the proper maintenance of the system, and is a work connected with the preservation of the public health?

"(2) A "sand trap" forming a part of the sewerage drainage system of the city of Augusta was being cleaned out by the employés of the board of health of the city by removing therefrom sand and dirt. The powers and duties of the board of health and its employés, and their relations to the city, are fixed by the act of the General Assembly of Georgia creating the board. Acts 1880-81, p. 365. While the men cleaning out this sand trap were employés of the board of health of the city of Augusta, it is inferable from the evidence that they were paid by the city of Augusta. The sand trap was on the edge of a sidewalk near the curbing, and the employés of the board of health, for the purpose of cleaning out the sand trap, removed its iron lid (which was about $3\frac{1}{2}$ or 4 feet square and weighed 200 or 250 pounds, and which, when the trap was closed, formed a part of the surface of the sidewalk used by pedestrians), and propped the lid up at an angle on the edge of the sidewalk by means of a steel bar some $2\frac{1}{2}$ or 3 feet long, while they were engaged in cleaning out the trap. While this work was being done, a boy 7 years old, who was upon the sidewalk, walked up to the trap to see what was going on, and accidentally struck with his foot the steel bar which supported the lid, thereby knocking the prop down and causing the lid to fall upon and break his leg. Under these circumstances, was the city in the performance of a governmental or a ministerial function, and was it liable for the negligence of the employés of the board of health (if they were negligent under the facts of the case) in improperly and insecurely propping up the lid, and in failing to warn the boy of his danger when approaching it?

"1-3. We are of the opinion that the duty of a city to maintain its sewerage drainage system in a good working and sanitary condition is a governmental function. That such maintenance is connected with, and has reference to, the preservation of the public health is so well known and so generally recognized that courts will take judicial cognizance thereof. It is unnecessary to cite authorities, either decisions of courts or text-books, to show what facts or classes of facts courts will take judicial notice of, in order to demonstrate that judicial notice will be taken of the fact that the sewerage system has a direct connection with and relation to the health of the inhabitants of the municipality. We will, however, call attention to the case of Townsend v. Smith, 144 Ga. 792, 87 S. E. 1039, in which it appears that this court took judicial cognizance of the fact that 'the prevention of an infectious malady which, unless checked, would become general among the cattle of a given county, and thereby render the flesh of such cattle and the milk of cows diseased, unwholesome, and unfit for food, was a matter affecting the health of the people of the community where this disease appeared.' The removal of garbage of all kinds, the prevention of the escape of noxious vapors and odors, the cleanliness of the persons residing in a city, are all to a large extent dependent upon the maintenance of a sewerage drainage system. It follows from what is here said, under the authority of several of our decisions, that the maintenance of the sewerage and drainage system of a city in a good working and sanitary condition is a governmental function. This conclusion is in accordance with what was said in the case of Love v. Atlanta, 95 Ga. 129, 22 S. E. 29, 51 Am. St. Rep. 64, and the other cases decided by this court. Watson v. Atlanta, 136 Ga. 370, 71 S. E. 664. See, also, 6 McQuillin, Mun. Corp. § 2669. In answering the question in regard to the sewers and drainage system of a city, we have assumed that the system referred to is not one operated for profit, and that no substantial charges are made for the ordinary use, enjoyment, and benefits of the system.

"4. It will be seen from what we have said above that an affirmative answer should be given to subdivision (c) of the first question, in the form in which that question is submitted. If the question had been propounded as to whether a court would take judicial cognizance of what a sand trap is, a different question would have been presented. But, where the sand trap is defined as an essential part of the sewerage system, then it follows from what we have previously stated that the keeping of it open and unclogged by dirt, sand, or other foreign substance, so that it could properly perform its functions as a part of the system, is a necessary part of the proper maintenance of the system, and has therefore a natural connection with the preservation of the public health.

"5. While it is one of the governmental functions and duties of a city to effectively maintain its sewerage system, and while, under the authority of the decision in Love v. Atlanta, supra, and the cases laying down the same doctrine as there stated, it follows that if, in the exercise of such functions and the discharge of the duties devolving upon the department of the city government having charge of the matters relating to the public health, a private citizen is injured by the negligence of one of the city's servants in and about such work, no right of action arises against the city, nevertheless that doctrine must not be allowed to destroy the other equally well-established doctrine that, if a city negligently and tortiously allows obstructions to remain in its streets or sidewalks, or negligently fails to repair defects in a sidewalk or street, and a citizen in the exercise of due care is injured in consequence of such act of negligence upon the part of the city, there can be a recovery therefor against the city. Each of these two doctrines must be given effect, and have been given effect. In the case of Mayor, etc., of Savannah v. Waldner, 49 Ga. 316, it was said: 'It is the duty of a municipal corporation, vested by law with authority over the streets, whilst dangerous works, such as sewers, etc., are being constructed across a street, to have proper precautionary measures taken to prevent accidents to passengers during such construction, whether the same is being done by the corporation through its own servants, or by contract, or by subcontractors under a primary contractor.' The defect in the street which is charged to be negligent and tortious conduct in the case just cited consisted in leaving open 'a ditch or sewer across the street.' See, also, Mayor, etc., of Savannah v. Spears, 66 Ga. 304. In the case of Kea v. Dublin, 145 Ga. 511, 89 S. E. 484, it was said: 'Although municipal authorities may have plenary power in the matter of collection, removal, and disposition of garbage, yet they cannot lawfully create, in connection therewith, a nuisance dangerous to health or life; and where such a nuisance is created and its effect is specially injurious to an individual by reason of its proximity to his home, he has a cause of action for damages.' Bell v. Mayor, etc., of Savannah, 139 Ga. 298, 77 S. E. 165. See, also, Mayor, etc., of Waycross v. Houk, 113 Ga. 963, 39 S. E. 577; Williams v. Washington, 142 Ga. 281, 82 S. E. 656, L. R. A. 1915A, 325, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 196; Langley v. Augusta, 118 Ga. 590, 45 S. E. 486, 98 Am. St. Rep. 133; Mayor, etc., of Americus v. Chapman, 94 Ga. 711, 20 S. E. 3; Cornelisen v. Atlanta, 146 Ga. 416, 91 S. E. 415. Consequently the last question propounded should be answered in the affirmative."

The evidence in this case authorized a finding that the employes of the board of health of the city of Augusta were paid directly by the city and not by the board of health, and that they were negligent in propping up, on the sidewalk, a heavy iron lid of a sand trap of a sewer, in such a way that it fell upon the sidewalk when the prop was accidentally struck by the foot of a child, and that they thereby created a dangerous obstruction upon the sidewalk, in consequence of which the injuries sued for were sustained; and that the plaintiff, a boy seven years old, had exercised the "due care" required of a child of such tender years under the circumstances.

Under these facts, and the foregoing decision of the Supreme Court, the city of Augusta was liable in damages to the plaintiff for the injuries sued for.

Judgment affirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by C. F. Spratling against the Volunteer State Life Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error, and defendant takes cross-exceptions. Judgment on the main bill of exceptions reversed, and on cross-bill affirmed in conformity to answer of the Supreme Court (148 Ga. 687, 98 S. E. 464) to certified questions.

Little, Powell, Smith & Goldstein, of Atlanta, and W. B. Miller, of Chattanooga, Tenn., for plaintiff in error.

Jones & Chambers and Samuel Barnett, all of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, P. J. In answer to questions certified by this court, the Supreme Court, on November 16, 1918, rendered the following opinion (the decision was held up, however, by a motion for a rehearing until February 24, 1919, when the motion was denied by the Supreme Court):

"A limited payment (20-pay) life insurance policy was issued on May 25, 1913. The insured paid the first premium on the date of issue, the second premium on May 25, 1914, and the third on May 25, 1915. The premium due on May 25, 1916, was not paid. The insured died on August 25, 1916. The insured had borrowed on the policy $337.11, and the interest on the amount had been paid up to May 25, 1916. The premium, as stated in the face of the policy, was $316.89, payable annually. The policy provided: 'The company will, at any time after three full years' premiums have been paid, advance upon the sole security of this policy, when legally assigned, a sum equal to the amount specified in the table below, less any indebtedness to the company on account of this policy. The interest on such loan shall not exceed 6 per cent. per annum, and shall be payable annually in advance.' The loan or surrender value of the policy, as stated in the table referred to, was $396 after the policy had been in force three years; $621 after four years. The policy further provided: 'In the event the insured should, at any premium date or within the days of grace thereafter, after three full years' premiums have been paid hereon, fail to pay or cause to be paid the then current premium, if the policy be not surrendered by the insured with a choice of one of the options herein guaranteed, and if at the time of the nonpayment of premium there is a loan value hereon in excess of all indebtedness that may then exist against the policy, together with interest, the company will apply such available loan value towards the payment of the premium then due, with interest thereon at a rate not exceeding six per cent. (6%) per annum, chargeable annually in advance, and will continue to carry said policy in force, in the form as written and at the rate of premium as provided for in the face hereof, subject to its terms and such indebtedness, the same as if the premium had been paid in cash, and will continue to so apply such loan value as long as such value, at the rate of premium provided in the face hereof, will suffice to pay for even one day's premium. At any time while this policy is thus in force the insured may resume payment of premiums thereon without medical re-examination, and in that event any indebtedness against the policy may either be paid in cash or allowed to remain as a loan hereon. All such indebtedness shall be a first lien on the policy, and the policy will lapse unless premium payments are resumed by the insured within the actual period of extension.' The nonforfeiture provisions of the policy, other than the automatic premium loan clause last above quoted, gave to the insured the option to surrender the policy to the company, after the policy has been in force three full years, and at any time prior to default in premium payment, or within the days of grace (one month) thereafter, and to take: (1) The cash surrender value, as indicated by the table set out in the policy, less any indebtedness to the company on account of the policy; or (2) a nonparticipating paid-up life policy for a reduced amount, as indicated by the table; or (3) a nonparticipating paid-up term policy for the full amount insured by the policy, as indicated by the table, with a provision in (2) and (3) as to any indebtedness to the company on account of the policy. The insured did not surrender the policy, and did not elect to take any of the options last above referred to.

"On June 26, 1916, the fourth annual premium having become due on May 25, 1916, the company offered to loan to the insured the full amount available after the policy had been in force four years, to wit, $621, at the time tendering the insured a loan agreement to be executed by himself and his wife; the latter being the beneficiary named in the policy. Along with the loan agreement the company furnished to the insured a statement of his indebtedness to it, showing former loan, $337.11, premium due on May 25, 1916, $316.89, and interest to May 25, 1917, $37.26, making a total of $691.26, and required the insured to pay the additional sum of $70.26 to cover the total of his indebtedness to the company. On June 27, 1916, the insured signed the agreement and forwarded it from Macon, Ga., to the beneficiary at Atlanta, Ga., with the request that she also execute the agreement and deliver it to the company together with the sum of $70.26. At the time of the receipt of the agreement by the beneficiary, she was 'ill and bedridden, and remained in this condition for several days, at which time she became wholly unconscious, and remained in this condition until after the death of the insured, and for said reasons was unable to execute said loan agreement prior to the death of the insured.' The insured died without knowing that the beneficiary had not complied with the 'wrongful' demands of the company. After the death of the insured, the beneficiary completed the agreement and tendered it, together with $70.26, to the company. One clause of the policy provided: 'This policy is issued with the express understanding that the insured may, without the consent of the beneficiary, receive every benefit, exercise every right, and enjoy every privilege conferred upon him by this policy.' Held:

"1. Under the foregoing facts, the available loan value on the policy, to wit, $58.89 (conceding, without deciding, that interest at 6 per cent. per annum in advance on the existing loan and on the amount appropriated to the payment of the premium due should not be first deducted), was, under the automatic premium loan clause quoted above, insufficient to 'carry the policy in force, in the form as written,' to the date of the insured's death, August 25, 1916.

"(a) The obligation of the company, under the automatic premium loan clause quoted above, was to apply such available loan value toward the payment of the premium due, and to carry the policy in force 'in the form as written and at the rate of premium as provided for in the face' of the policy. In a strict technical sense no 'rate of premium' is provided in the face of the policy. The reference is, however, to the contract as written, and the words quoted above are to be given their usual and ordinary signification. The parties were dealing with this contract of insurance, to wit, a limited payment life policy as distinguished from a purely protective policy or other form of contract."

2. "The insurance company was not estopped from declaring a forfeiture of the policy (conceding, without deciding that its demand that the loan agreement be executed by the beneficiary was wrongful and unauthorized); it affirmatively appearing that the sum of money necessary to pay the past-due premium, interest in advance upon the loan, and the existing loan upon the policy was neither paid nor tendered the company until after the death of the insured." 148 Ga. 687, 98 S. E. 464.

[1, 2] Under the foregoing decision, neither count of the petition set forth a cause of action; and the court properly sustained the general demurrer to the second count of the petition, but erred in overruling the general demurrer to the first count thereof, and in refusing to dismiss the entire petition.

Judgment on the main bill of exceptions reversed; on the cross-bill affirmed.

BROOKS v. CLINTSMAN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 20, 1919.)

1. DEEDS ⚡181—ALTERATION BY PARTIES.

No erasure or alteration in a conveyance, or cancellation thereof by mutual consent of the parties, can divest an estate already vested by operation of deed, in view of Code 1904, § 2413, providing that no estate in lands for a term of more than five years shall be conveyed unless by deed or will.

2. ESTOPPEL ⚡70(1)—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL—CHANGE OF POSITION.

In suit by plaintiff to have herself declared grantee in a deed from which her son, now deceased, erased her name and inserted his own as grantee, the doctrine of equitable estoppel cannot be invoked against plaintiff simply because she permitted the son and his family to occupy the farm covered by the deed free from rent for several years.

3. ESTOPPEL ⚡60—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL—CERTAINTY.

An equitable estoppel relied on to conclude another's known right of property must be certain to every intent, and is not to be taken by argument or inference.

4. EQUITY ⚡73—LACHES—LOSS OF EVIDENCE.

Contention that plaintiff's right to maintain suit to have herself declared grantee in a deed from which her son, now deceased, erased her name and inserted his own as grantee, is barred in consequence of her laches by which defendant, son's wife, is deprived of the benefit of the testimony of son, cannot be sustained; the son having died within less than one year after inserting his own name in the deed.

5. GIFTS ⚡49(4)—PAROL GIFT OF LAND—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held insufficient to establish a parol gift of land from plaintiff mother to her son, now deceased, which gift could have been enforced either by him or those claiming under him in a suit for specific performance.

6. GIFTS ⚡25—PAROL GIFT OF LAND—VALIDITY.

Since Code 1904, § 2413, took effect, no parol gift of land is enforceable.

Sims, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, King and Queen County.

Suit by M. L. Clintsman against Ida R. Brooks. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Isaac Diggs and C. R. Sands, both of Richmond, for appellant.

J. D. Mitchell, of Walkerton, and Herbert I. Lewis, of West Point, for appellee.

WHITTLE, P. This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of King and Queen county in a suit in which appellee was plaintiff and appellant defendant. The history of the case is this:

On January 3, 1902, appellee, Mrs. M. L. Clintsman, who lived at Grand Forks, N. D., by her son, Leslie L. Clintsman (husband of appellant), who resided with his family in King and Queen county, negotiated the purchase of a farm containing 132¼ acres of land located in that county for $700. The deed conveying the land to appellee was duly executed and acknowledged by the grantor, Alfred Bagby, and deposited with his brother-in-law and agent, R. N. Pollard, with instruction to deliver the deed upon payment of the purchase money. Payment was made with the personal check of appellee and passed by her son to Pollard, who in turn delivered the deed to him. The deed was not put to record until November 7, 1903, nearly two years after its execution and delivery. Shortly before it was admitted to record, Leslie L. Clintsman, in the presence of Mr. Pollard, erased the name of his mother from the deed and inserted his own name as grantee therein, and then had the deed in its altered condition recorded.

By permission of the mother the land was occupied by the son and his wife and children from the time of the purchase until his death (the exact date of which does not appear, but some time between the making of his will, July 2, 1903, and February 2, 1904, when the will was admitted to probate). Testator by his will bequeathed to his wife "all of my possessions and things now in my possession and name, * * * hoping if she outlives me, that she will look after my aged father and also if she can in any way assist my mother, that she will do so." The will does not in terms undertake to devise the land, nor is it shown whether his name was substituted for that of his mother in the deed before or after he made his will. Leslie L. Clintsman's father and mother had been divorced, and the father lived with the son on the land from the date of the purchase until the son's death. Afterwards, upon the alleged ground that the father was not a suitable person for her children to be associated with, appellant refused to permit him to remain in the home; and, a year or two after the death of her husband, she married a second time.

Mr. Pollard gave his deposition in the case about twelve years after the alteration of the deed, and says he thinks the son at that time produced a letter from his mother authorizing him to make the change. Appellant in her answer to the bill also states that there was such a letter, but that it had been lost. She and others likewise testified to alleged admissions by appellee that she intended the property for her son. Mr. Pollard, as a mutual friend, seems to have endeavored to adjust the differences between appellant and appellee; and in letters written by appellee to him about that period she manifested the tenderest devotion for the memory of her son, and absolved him from any intentional impropriety in the alteration of the deed. It is not clearly shown when Mrs. Clintsman first learned of the alteration.

Upon the case thus made the circuit court was of opinion that the substitution by the son of his name for that of appellee as grantee in the deed was a void act and invested him with no right or title to the land in controversy, and decreed accordingly. From that decree this appeal was allowed.

[1] The controlling principle in cases of this class is succinctly stated in 2 Minor on Real Property, § 1190:

"No erasure or alteration in a conveyance, nor even the cancellation thereof by mutual consent of the parties, can divest an estate already vested by operation of the deed; for that would be in conflict with the statute of conveyances, which declares that no estate of inheritance or freehold, or for a term of more than five years in lands, shall be conveyed unless by deed or will." 1 Va. Code, 1904, § 2413; 2 Min. Inst. 738.

The same doctrine was announced by this court in Suttle v. R. F. & P. R. Co., 76 Va. 284, 286, as follows:

"It has been long settled in this state that the disclaimer of a freehold can only be by deed or in a court of record. See the case of Bryan v. Hyre, etc., 1 Rob. R. [40 Va.] 101 [39 Am. Dec. 246]—a conclusive authority on this subject."

[2] Appellant also invokes the doctrine of equitable estoppel to reverse the decree. It is true that appellee permitted her son and his family to occupy her farm free of rent for a number of years; yet the doctrine of equitable estoppel cannot be rested alone upon that foundation. The son was fully advised of the state of the title to the land and the limitations upon his possession, and was induced by no declaration on her part to alter his position injuriously to himself. It may be that he was disappointed of the hope that some day his mother would bestow the property upon him; but the doctrine is not founded upon expectation; ordinarily it rests upon past or present considerations, and not on possible future events based upon opinion as to the supposed intention of another.

In the case of Newport News, etc., Co. v. Lake, 101 Va. 334, 343, 344, 43 S. E. 566, 569, it was said:

"Experience has shown that in controversies involving title to real estate it is far safer to rely on written muniments of title than 'the slippery memory of man.' Hence parol defeasances * * * are not favored; a mere equitable estoppel constitutes no defense to an action of ejectment (Haney v. Breeden, 100 Va. 781, 42 S. E. 916); and when such defense is set up on the equity side of the court, it must be distinctly charged and clearly proved."

[3] It is a familiar rule that an equitable estoppel relied on to conclude another's known right of property must be certain to every intent, and is not to be taken by argument or inference.

It is quite apparent that the claim of appellant to the land in controversy falls far short of the requirement of the equitable doctrine relied on, and cannot be maintained.

[4] The point likewise is stressed that Mrs. Clintsman has lost her right to maintain this suit in consequence of her laches in bringing it, by which appellant has been deprived of the benefit of the testimony of her late husband, Leslie L. Clintsman; that he had acted for his mother and himself throughout the transaction, and, if living, his evidence would be of the utmost importance upon the question involved.

This contention is demonstrably without merit. The record shows that Leslie L. Clintsman died within less than a year after inserting his own name in place of his mother's as the grantee in the deed. Appellant, of course, had no cause of action until after the alteration had been made; and therefore the loss of his evidence by death a few months later can neither be imputed to lapse of time nor to the laches of appellee in bringing her suit. As we have seen, she lived in a distant state, and the bill charges that "complainant instructed her son, the said Leslie L. Clintsman, to have the tract of land conveyed to her, and she gave him $700 to pay for the same, and, having explicit confidence in her son, * * * believed that he had obeyed her instructions until several months ago, * * * when she was reliably informed of the alteration of the deed. It is true that this allegation is controverted by the answer of appellant and by her testimony; but, however that may be, she suffered no loss of evidence from delay in bringing the suit.

[5, 6] Finally, in the absence of the statutory provision on the subject, upon elementary principles, the evidence falls far short of establishing a parol gift of the land from the mother to the son which could have been enforced either by him or those claiming under him in a suit for specific performance. But, since the Code of 1887 took effect, no parol gift of land is enforceable. Section 2413 provides:

"Nor shall any right to a conveyance of any such estate or term in land" (an estate of inheritance or freehold, or term of more than five years) "accrue to the donee of the land or those claiming under him, under a gift or a promise of gift of the same hereafter made and not in writing, although such gift or promise be followed by possession thereunder and improvement of the land by the donee or those claiming under him."

The latest case on this subject is Wohlford v. Wohlford, 121 Va. 699, 93 S. E. 629.

We find no error in the decree of the circuit court, and it must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

SIMS, J. (dissenting). This is a suit in equity brought by the appellee in October, 1915, to have herself declared to be the grantee in a deed which had been recorded over 12 years as a deed to her son as the grantee thereof, and under which the exclusive adverse possession of the real estate conveyed thereby had been taken by the son and held for such period before such suit by the son, the appellant, his devisee, claiming title to the same in fee, and so occupying and using such real estate during the whole of such time, and to have such deed set aside, and to have a parol trust declared to exist under such deed in favor of the appellee over 12 years after the death of the son.

The appellee in her bill seeks to explain her long acquiescence in the status aforesaid by the allegation that she was the grantee named in said deed as it was originally executed and delivered to her son for her, and that before it was recorded the son, without the knowledge or consent of the appellee, had his name substituted in the deed as grantee and then recorded it, and that the appellee had no knowledge that the son was named as grantee in the deed until a short time before the suit was instituted. The proof in the case is very clear that the real estate was purchased by the son and was paid for by the mother, the appellee, as a gift to her son; that the deed was dated January 3, 1902; that, as the grantor in the deed, from whom the real estate was purchased, understood, the deed was to be made, however, to the mother; that the grantor accordingly inserted the name of L. M. Clintsman in the deed as grantee, whom he thought to be the appellee, and delivered the deed to the son in Virginia in 1902, the appellee being in and a resident of North Dakota; that as a matter of fact L. M. Clintsman was not the name of appellee, M. L. Clintsman being her correct name. Whether this error in the deed was noticed at the time by the son or reported to the mother, or whether the deed in that form was acceptable to the mother, or was accepted by her, is not disclosed by the evidence. The original direction that the deed be made to the appellee as grantee came to the grantor through the son. Just when and why the appellee decided to change this plan and make the son the grantee is a subject of conflict in the evidence in the record, upon which the testimony of the son, if he were living, would throw valuable light. But, at any rate, the preponderance of the evidence in the record clearly and distinctly shows that the erasure of the name of L. M. Clintsman from said deed and the insertion therein of the name of the son as grantee was done by the son shortly before the deed was recorded by him; that the son at that time had in his possession a letter from his mother, the appellee, with a message or direction to Mr. Pollard authorizing him to do this; that this letter was presented to Mr. Pollard, the person acting as attorney or agent for the grantor in said deed, as evidencing the authority of the son to make this change; and that the grantor assented to such change through Mr. Pollard (as must be assumed from the record in this case), and the deed was accordingly recorded by the son in 1903 as a deed to himself.

A few months thereafter the son died leaving a will, which was probated on February 2, 1904, which devised "all of my possessions, and things now in my possession and name to Ida R. Clintsman" (the appellant). The will also continued with the following provisions: "Hoping that if she outlives me that she will look after my aged father and also if she can in any way assist my mother, that she will do so." This will is dated July 2, 1903, but, of course, spoke as of the death of the son, and said real estate, being in the possession of the son at the time the will was executed and both in his possession and name when he died, was intended by him to pass to appellant thereunder. The son, from the time he received the letter aforesaid from his mother until his death in 1904, believed, and was induced by the mother to believe, that it would so pass. He thus died, feeling ac-cure in the belief, induced by the mother, that the provisions of his will for his widow, the appellant, would stand. The mother did not question the sufficiency or the validity of the authority of said letter in the lifetime of her son. If she had done so, he might have established the validity of his action under such authority by his testimony. Upon his death the appellant thought that the authority of the letter had been validly exercised, and that the real estate passed under the will. Following the death of the son the appellee knew of this will and acquiesced in the exclusive adverse possession and enjoyment of said real estate by appellant under the will from the death of the son for over 12 years before this suit was brought, and for nearly 12 years before any question was raised by appellee in the premises. And while there is no express proof in the record of the precise fact that appellee knew that her son had acted on her letter authorizing him to change the name of the grantee in said deed as aforesaid, her knowledge of said will and subsequent acquiescence in the holding of the possession aforesaid by the appellant thereunder raises a strong inference that she had knowledge that such change of names had been so made prior to the death of her son.

And the question which was finally raised by appellee, about a year before the suit was brought, was due to the fact that appellant had refused to allow the father of her deceased husband to continue to live on said real estate.

The evidence makes it clear that this was the moving cause of the suit, and that but for that occurrence the appellee would have continued to have acquiesced in said status of said property.

Where the merits may be of the controversy over the right of said father to live on said real estate is a problem not involved in this suit; and it would serve no useful purpose to set forth here the details of that controversy. It is sufficient to say that the evidence discloses that prior to such controversy the appellee had acquiesced in the status quo ante aforesaid, and would have continued to so acquiesce in future but for such controversy. The record shows that the latter is the real controversy between the parties to this suit, although the bill asserts a wholly different cause of action.

Now, I have no difference with the majority opinion on the subject of the law therein laid down. If the deed in question was ever delivered, so as to have become an executed contract prior to the change of name of the grantee therein, then the legal title to the real estate thereby conveyed would have become vested in the grantee first named in the deed, if such grantee had been correctly named therein. 2 Minor on Real Property, § 1190; 2 Pollard's Code 1904, §

2413; 2 Minor's Inst. 738; Suttle v. R., F. & P. R. R. Co., 76 Va. 284, 286; Nelson v. Triplett, 81 Va. 237; Bryan v. Hyre, 40 Va. (1 Rob.) 101, 39 Am. Dec. 246. And at law the grantee could not be subsequently divested of the legal title except by matter of record or by deed or will. In equity, indeed, the situation might be different. I agree with the majority opinion, however, in the view that in the instant case the facts as disclosed by the record are not such as to make the doctrine of estoppel applicable so as to produce a different situation. But in the case before us the name in the deed was not the name of the appellee. Hence at law the legal title did not thus pass to her, even if the deed had been delivered. In equity, it is true, she would be held to be entitled to claim such title, as she was the person intended to be the grantee, if the fact was that the deed was delivered in the legal sense of that term. But the appellee in such case would have to seek the aid of a court of equity in order to obtain the benefit of such title. Should that court grant her such relief in view of her laches, under the circumstances of this case? I think not, for the reasons presently to be more particularly pointed out.

But suppose the case were regarded as if the name of the appellee had been correctly written in the deed so that by the operation of the deed the appellee would have become vested with the legal title to the real estate upon its delivery; still the question of fact would remain: Was it ever delivered in that form? If not, and if it remained undelivered when the alteration above named was made, it was still an executory contract, and the alteration aforesaid, if made with the consent of the appellee as well as of the grantor in the deed, was valid, and the deed took effect as a new execution of it as of the time of such alteration and delivery of the deed to the grantee then named therein, the son aforesaid. Cleaton v. Chambliss, 27 Va. (6 Rand) 92; Speake v. United States, 9 Cranch, 27, 37, 3 L. Ed. 645; 2 Rob. (New) Pr. p. 26. In such case the gift of the mother to the son of the real estate aforesaid would have become a gift completely executed, and hence as binding upon the mother, the appellee, as if it had been a purchase from her by the son for valuable consideration. Now, since the son was acting for the mother, the appellee, as well as for himself throughout this transaction, it is manifest that his testimony would be of the utmost importance upon the question of fact involved, namely, upon the question of whether the deed was ever delivered in its first form. By the laches and acquiescence aforesaid of the appellee the appellant has lost the evidence of said son by reason of his death. Further, the testimony of Mr. Pollard, a witness for the appellant, who was the attorney and agent for the grantor in said deed in charge of the matter of the first passing of the deed to the hands of the son, and who acted for the grantor in the subsequent transaction aforesaid when the name of the grantee was changed as aforesaid, was rendered to a considerable degree vague and indefinite by the lapse of time between the original occurrences and the giving of his deposition, as is clearly shown by his testimony.

As said by this court, speaking through Judge Staples, in Harrison v. Gibson, 64 Va. (28 Grat.) 212, and quoted with approval by this court, speaking through Judge Lewis, P., in Hatcher v. Hall, 77 Va. at page 576:

"If from the delay which has taken place it is manifest * * * that the original transactions have become so obscured by time and the loss of evidence and the death of parties, as to render it difficult to do justice, the court will not relieve the plaintiff. If, under the circumstances of the case, it is too late to ascertain the merits of the controversy, the court will not interfere, whatever may have been the original justice of the claim."

See, also, 1 Barton's Chy. Pr. 90, and cases cited.

Further, no particular lapse of time is necessary to raise in equity the bar of laches. It rests upon the principle that nothing can call courts of equity into activity "but conscience, good faith, and reasonable diligence; and, where these are wanting, the court is passive and does nothing." Id. p. 91. It may be that, if the appellee had instituted this suit promptly following the death of her son, which occurred some time in 1904, and she had frankly explained the situation of the title at the time of her letter, had admitted the writing of it, and had satisfactorily accounted for her delay in not bringing the suit sooner, the doctrine of laches might not have applied. But the situation before us is different. We find that, when she does, after long years of delay, bring her suit, she for one thing testifies therein positively denying that she ever wrote the letter. The truth of such testimony is seriously impeached by one other letter which she had written, if not in other letters in the record.

She testifies in her deposition, given on August 10, 1916, on this subject as follows:

"Q. 4. State if you ever wrote Mr. R. N. Pollard a letter instructing him to erase your name in the deed and insert the name of Leslie L. Clintsman.

"A. I never did.

"Q. 5. State if you ever sent a message to Mr. R. N. Pollard a letter instructing him to erase your name of Leslie L. Clintsman instead.

"A. I never did."

In a letter to the appellant, however, dated November 22, 1915, appellee wrote on this subject as follows:

"Yes; I told or wrote Leslie that I didn't care, but I never asked him if it had been done; there is no blame attached to Leslie or any one. * * *"

For another thing, she is disingenuous as to her real feeling of aggrievance against the appellant. She alleges one cause of action when in truth her actual cause of action was a wholly different one. In short, she does not come into a court of equity clothed with that conscience and good faith which can alone appeal to it, and, moreover, her long delay since the death of the son has weakened the character of testimony on which alone appellant was left to rely in the premises after the death of her husband, the son of appellant aforesaid.

I think, therefore, upon the whole case, that the appellee has so long acquiesced in the status which her bill seeks to disturb, that, under the circumstances of this case, she is barred in equity by her laches; that it is now too late for her to obtain in that forum the relief which she seeks; and hence that the decree under review is erroneous, in that it granted such relief, and should be reversed.

KEPPLER et al. v. CITY OF RICHMOND.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 13, 1919.)

1. DEDICATION \Leftrightarrow 2—OF ALLEY—CITY CHARTER PROVISION.

City charter provisions that, whenever any alley shall have been opened to and used by public for five years, it shall become an alley for all purposes, city having authority and jurisdiction over it as over others, are valid as statutory law, and, where the provisions apply, they are conclusive evidence of dedication.

2. DEDICATION \Leftrightarrow 44—OF ALLEY—CHARTER PROVISIONS—EVIDENCE.

Under Richmond City Charter, § 24, providing that, whenever any alley shall have been opened to and used by public for five years, it shall become an alley for all purposes, city having authority and jurisdiction over it, same evidence of dedication is necessary to put provision in operation as law requires to raise implication of common-law dedication from mere user of way.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \Leftrightarrow 648—STREETS—USE OF ALLEY—PRESCRIPTION.

Public user of alley by city, to give rise to public easement in land by prescription, must be under a claim of right, unequivocally adverse to owners.

4. EVIDENCE \Leftrightarrow 353(3)—DEED—ADMISSIBILITY AS AGAINST PLAINTIFFS NOT IN PRIVACY.

In suit by landowners to restrain city from claiming strip of land as alley, deed held not admissible in evidence on any ground that its recitals were binding on plaintiffs, under rule applicable to recitals or declarations in deeds to which parties to cause are parties or privies; there being no privacy of estate between plaintiffs and owners of land conveyed.

5. EVIDENCE \Leftrightarrow 372(1)—ANCIENT DEED—CONTROVERSY REGARDING ALLEY.

In suit to restrain city from claiming strip of land as alley, deed over 30 years old, declaring that rear line of lot it conveyed was on an alley, held admissible in evidence against plaintiffs, though they were not in privacy with property conveyed, under exception which ancient deeds afford to rule as to inadmissibility of hearsay evidence; such declarations being admissible, though going beyond description of monuments marking mere boundary lines of land conveyed.

6. EVIDENCE \Leftrightarrow 383(7) — ANCIENT DEEDS — WEIGHT.

Evidence afforded by recitals or declarations of ancient deed, over 30 years old, is not entitled to much weight, and may be repudiated by slight evidence of more definite character.

7. EVIDENCE \Leftrightarrow 372(3)—ANCIENT DEEDS—30-YEAR PERIOD.

Deeds less than 30 years old are inadmissible in evidence as ancient.

8. EVIDENCE \Leftrightarrow 372(1)—ANCIENT DEEDS.

In suit against city to restrain its claiming strip of land as public alley, deeds in chain of title of adjacent owner held admissible in evidence, as containing declaration with respect to alley being a wide alley, as ancient deeds over 30 years old.

9. DEDICATION \Leftrightarrow 15 — EXPRESS AND IMPLIED.

There are two classes of dedications of a street or alley to a city, express and implied; the intent to dedicate being essential to both, though an implied dedication is founded on doctrine of estoppel in pais, so that intent to dedicate need not actually exist in mind of owner.

10. DEDICATION \Leftrightarrow 37—STREET OR ALLEY—PUBLIC USER.

Where public user is relied on to establish dedication to public of street or alley, user must be such as to indicate that public claim to way is as of right, and that owner is fully aware of extent and character of use, and does not object, though actual knowledge by owner need not be proved.

11. DEDICATION \Leftrightarrow 35(1)—ALLEY—NOTICE OF CLAIM TO EASEMENT—MAP ADOPTED BY CITY.

Adoption by council of city of map or plan of city on file in city engineer's office held not sufficient to give notice to owners of land shown as alley of city's claim of public easement, in order to raise against owners presumption of dedication.

12. DEDICATION \Leftrightarrow 44—PUBLIC USE OF ALLEY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In suit to restrain city of Richmond from claiming strip of land as public alley, on ground it had been dedicated to public use, unobjected to, evidence held to show that use by public was not unequivocally a use as of right.

Appeal from Chancery Court of Richmond.

Suit by Charles B. Keppler and others against the City of Richmond. From a decree dismissing the bill, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, and decree entered for plaintiffs.

This suit turns upon the question whether the appellants, or those under whom they derive title, have dedicated a narrow strip of land, approximately 8x50 feet in size, at the rear of their lot in the city of Richmond, for the use of the public as a public alleyway.

The decree complained of held that the plaintiffs (the appellants here) "have not sustained their bill by showing that no dedication has ever been made of the 8-foot strip of land," refused to grant the injunction prayed for in the bill, which was to enjoin and restrain the city of Richmond "from claiming that said strip of land has been dedicated and from interfering with the rights of" the appellants therein, and dismissed the bill.

The controversy is solely between the appellants and the city of Richmond. No private property owner claiming any right of easement over such strip of land is before the court in this cause.

The brick tenement aforesaid and two buildings erected subsequently to 1851 occupied the whole of the front of the Keppler lot, but did not extend back very far on such lot. The then owner of the Keppler lot, in 1858 or 1859, erected thereon, just in the rear of the Broad street buildings, two brick stores, and about a year later another brick store, all three fronting on Seventh street, whereby the entire lot was covered with buildings, except a strip of ground approximately 11 feet wide by 50 feet long at the rear of the lot; there being approximately 11 feet of such vacant portion of such lot abutting on Seventh street and 50 feet thereof abutting on said alley.

The last-mentioned brick store building, erected about the year 1860, as aforesaid, was known and designated as 210 North Seventh street, and stood until 1911, when it was torn down at the same time that the other old buildings on the Keppler lot were torn down. This building was two stories high. The room on the ground floor had its front entrance on Seventh street and a side door entrance from said 11x50-foot strip of ground; the side door entrance being located about 30 feet from Seventh street. This room was rented out by the owners from time to time as a saloon or barroom, and was occupied and used as such by tenants practically from 1860 to 1907, when liquor license was refused in that locality, the side door being much used by customers and frequenters of the bar, and it was also used for the bringing in of beer and other things, and that side entrance of the premises added considerably to its rental value.

The second story of the building last mentioned contained an assembly room or club-room, to which the same side door barroom entrance aforesaid also gave access.

There was a board walk, which extended from Seventh street to said side door entrance, which lay near the side of the building, and was used for a great number of years prior and up to about 1907 in connection with the use aforesaid of said side entrance. This walk was kept in repair by tenants of the property.

There was a large coal vault with brick walls under the front part of the building, a portion of which extended out between 5 and 6 feet from the south side thereof into said 11-foot strip of ground, into which there was a manhole opening in such strip of ground. This coal vault and the manhole opening for storing coal was used for a great many years by tenants of the premises prior and up to 1911, as appurtenant to said premises.

There was a basement under the rear part of the building, to light which there were several areas, which extended 3 feet from the south line of the building out into said 11-foot strip of ground, and occupied that much of same until 1911, when the building was torn down as aforesaid.

There was an ordinance of the city under which the privilege might have been obtained of maintaining said coal chute or manhole opening and said areas, even if they had been in a public alley; but the preponderance of the evidence is that no such permits were ever asked for or obtained by the owners or tenants of the Keppler premises aforesaid.

There is a city sewer under Seventh street, which was constructed in 1857 from the direction of Grace street to an ending at a point opposite the mouth of said alley on Seventh street. A sewer was also constructed in that year along the whole length of said alley, passing the rear of the Keppler lot, approximately in the center of said 12-foot alley width, and connecting with the Seventh street city sewer at its ending point aforesaid. The preponderance of the evidence is to the effect that this alley sewer was not a public, but a private, sewer, and was appurtenant to the lots the rear ends of which abutted thereon.

The alley at the rear of the Keppler lot was first paved some time, more probably, about 1860, as shown by a preponderance of the evidence. It was then paved with cobble stones, and at the same time, as shown by such evidence, the whole of said 11x50-foot strip of land, not occupied by the coal vault manhole and the basement areas aforesaid, was paved with the same material. The preponderance of the evidence shows, however, that none of such paving was done by the city; and we must infer from the evidence that this paving was done in the 12-foot alley by the abutting lot owners and on the 11x50-foot strip by the then owner of the Keppler lot. Nor were any repairs made to such paving by the city at any time subsequently. On the other hand, there is direct evidence that the then owner of the Keppler lot, in 1896, 1897, and in 1901, repaired certain portions of the paving on the 11-foot strip, where it had become worn from the turning of vehicles delivering coal to said coal vault.

It was the purpose of appellants in 1911, when their buildings aforesaid were taken down, to erect new buildings, so as to cover the whole of said 11x50-foot strip of land; but it then developed that the city of Richmond, through its street department, claimed that there had been a dedication of the whole of such strip by its owners to the public for the purpose of widening said alley for public travel.

This was the first actual knowledge or notice which appellants, or those under whom they derive title to said lot, had of any such claim on the part of the city or of the public; and there is no evidence that the city, prior to this time, ever made any actual specific claim that such strip of ground was, or actually exercised any acts upon it as if it were, a public way, except the sole circumstance that a map of the city of Richmond, known as the "Pleasants map," adopted by the council of the city in 1872, and which was on file in the city engineer's office, showed the alley in question extending its whole length as of a width of approximately 17 feet, when such map is scaled; but there is no evidence that the appellants, or any of those under whom they derive title, ever had any knowledge or notice of the existence of such map prior to said claim of the city in 1911.

However, upon conference and correspondence between the parties, the city yielded any claim to 3 feet in width of said strip lying along what had been the south line of said 310 North Seventh street building, which 3-foot width of ground had been occupied by said basement areas and board walk, leaving a strip of approximately 8 feet in width by 50 feet in length at the rear of said Keppler lot, abutting 50 feet on said alley, which is the ground in controversy in this suit between the appellants and the city.

Other evidence and absence of evidence bearing on the points in controversy in the case are referred to below in the opinion of the court.

Daniel Grinnan and Coke & Pickrell, all of Richmond, for appellants.

H. R. Pollard and Jas. Lewis Anderson, both of Richmond, for appellee.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

The argument in this case has covered many subjects, and the law bearing upon the essential requisites in such a case as this, both of a dedication on the part of the landowner and an acceptance on the part of the public, whether actual, or implied in fact or in law, or dispensed with by law, has been ably discussed by learned counsel on both sides of the cause, and numerous authorities have been cited. But after all we find but little difference between counsel as to the legal principles involved. They differ for the most part as to the facts, and as to the application thereto of well-settled legal principles.

We may say, also, at the outset, that, since in our view of the case a preponderance of the evidence does not establish that there was ever a dedication of the land in question for a public use, we shall not enter in this opinion upon the question of whether there was a valid acceptance of the land for public use on the part of the city or of the public. We may assume, so far as the questions we have to decide in this cause are concerned, that its charter provisions, and its ordinances, and the city map of 1872, relied on by the city, are sufficient to have constituted a valid acceptance, if there had been a dedication of the land in question for use as a public alleyway.

Confining our consideration, therefore, to the question of dedication, with the exception of what is hereinafter said concerning the right by prescription which is also relied on by the city, and concerning certain questions of evidence, we shall consider the positions taken by the parties, and pass upon the questions raised by the assignments of error in their order as stated below.

[1, 2] 1. Does the charter provision of the city of Richmond, presently to be quoted, have the effect of concluding, in favor of the city, the question of dedication?

Section 24 of the charter of the city of Richmond (Acts 1869-70, pp. 120, 128), so far as material to the question under consideration, provides as follows:

"24. Whenever any * * * alley * * * shall have been opened to and used by the public for a period of five years, the same shall thereby become a * * * alley * * * for all purposes, and the city shall have the same authority and jurisdiction over, and right and interest therein, as they have by law over the * * * alleys * * * laid out by it. * * *"

The following authorities are cited to sustain the position of the city that such charter provision is conclusive that there was a dedication in the case before us, namely: 3 McQuillin, Mun. Corp. § 1303; Bolger v. Foss, 65 Cal. 250, 251, 3 Pac. 871; So. Pac. Co. v. City of Pomona, 144 Cal. 339, 77 Pac. 929; Ellsworth v. City of Grand Rapids, 27 Mich. 250; Campau v. City of Detroit, 104 Mich. 560, 562, 62 N. W. 718; Speir v. Town of New Utrecht, 121 N. Y. 421, 24 N. E. 692.

It is undoubtedly true that city charter provisions such as that above quoted are valid as statutory law, and where the provisions apply they are conclusive evidence of dedication.

In all of the cases cited and above named, however, the public user was unequivocally a public and an adverse public user for the statutory period before the private use in suit was sought. These authorities go no farther than the holding that such a public user, by virtue of statute giving mere public user such effect, dispenses with all need of evidence of an actual dedication, and that the defense that there was no dedication in fact is not available to the landowner in such a case.

Moreover, all of the said authorities involve charters or statutes which contain merely the provision that a user by the public for the period prescribed therein shall, in substance, confer a right of way upon the public.

In the charter provision we have under consideration something more is added, namely, that the alley must be "opened to," as well as "used by, the public," for the period named therein, before the provision becomes operative. This added provision must be given some meaning, and it differentiates the case before us from those covered by the authorities cited on the point. Such provision is similar to that of the charter of the city of Brooklyn, which is construed in Strong v. Brooklyn, 68 N. Y. 1. That provision is as follows:

"That all streets and avenues in said city which have been or may be thrown out to public use, and have been or may be used as such for five years continuously, should be deemed public streets and avenues, and that the city officers should have jurisdiction and power in respect thereto, the same as if such streets and avenues have been or shall be opened by proceedings had for that purpose."

That decision holds, in substance, that such a charter provision requires the same evidence of dedication, to put it in operation, as the law requires to raise an implication of a common-law dedication from mere user of a way.

We are of opinion that the charter provision of the city of Richmond under consideration should receive the same construction.

The question under consideration must therefore be answered in the negative.

[3] 2. Has the city by public user acquired the right of a public easement in the land in controversy by prescription?

Under all of the authorities the user must be under a claim of right, and must also be unequivocally adverse, in order that the public may acquire the right in question by prescription. 22 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 1190, 1192; Jones on Easements, § 267; 3 McQuillin, Mun. Corp. § 1299; 1 Elliott on Roads and Streets, § 194; Skeen v. Lynch, 1 Rob. (40 Va.) 186, 194; Harris' Case, 20 Grat. (61 Va.) 833; City of Richmond v. A. Y. Stokes, 31 Grat. (72 Va.) 713; City of Richmond v. Gallego Mills, 102 Va. 165, 45 S. E. 877.

As we shall see below, such adverse user did not exist in the case before us, and hence this question must be answered in the negative.

3. Are the following named deeds in the chains of title of lots abutting in the rear on said alley, other than the Keppler lot (with the owners of which appellants are not in privity), and the provisions in such deeds quoted below, admissible in evidence against appellants? And, if so, what is the effect of such evidence?

[4-6] (a) The first mention which we find in the record of an alley, the northern side line of which is so located that, if extended to Seventh street, it would include the land in controversy, is found in a deed of date November 30, 1849, to Abraham Hirsh from Wm. H. McFarland and John E. Blair, trustees under a deed of trust from one John B. Richardson, securing the payment of certain indebtedness of the latter, which deed conveyed the lot marked 627 on the plat accompanying the above statement. At this time McFarland owned individually a lot fronting on Grace street which abutted in the rear on the alley shown on said plat, across from and opposite the rear of such lot 627; that is to say, before the Hirsh deed such alleyway ran past the rear of lot 627, and extended out to Seventh street, as shown on the above plat. The evidence which is set forth in the above statement shows that this alley, at the time of the Hirsh deed, was certainly an alley in common, if not a public alley.

It is unnecessary for us to decide in this cause whether such alley was the former or the latter character of alley. We shall hereinafter refer to it as the old alley, or alley in common. So considering it, the right of use of it was at the least an easement which was appurtenant to lot 627, as well as to the other lots on both sides of such alley and abutting thereon, including the Keppler lot.

This alley was, as aforesaid, referred to in a number of the conveyances establishing it as being a "10-foot alley"; but, as explained in the above statement, it was in fact approximately 12 feet wide as located on the ground in accordance with such conveyances. The deed of Hirsh aforesaid, however, contained the following language in its description of the metes and bounds of lot 627, viz.:

"Bounded on the south by an alley, which separates the premises hereby conveyed from the lot of said McFarland, but the southern line of the premises hereby conveyed shall be extended ten (10) feet further south to the center of said alley, provided the said alley east of the premises hereby conveyed shall be closed, or the use thereof to the premises be withheld, and upon the happening of these events, or either of them, the right or title to the said ten (10) feet of ground, extended as aforesaid, shall be vested in the said Hirsh, his heirs and assigns, forever." (Italics supplied.)

At the time of the Hirsh deed the Keppler lot belonged to said John B. Richardson, but was not conveyed by said deed of trust under which the deed to Hirsh was made.

At such time the situation also was that much more than 11 feet of the rear end of the Keppler lot was vacant and doubtless uninclosed. There was then an open space across the rear end of the Keppler lot much wider than 11 feet.

We are of opinion that the Hirsh deed was not admissible in evidence, on the ground that its recitals are binding on appellants, under the rule applicable to recitals or declarations in deeds to which the parties to a cause are parties or privies, since there is no privity of estate between the appellants and the owners of the property conveyed by the Hirsh deed. But—

We are of opinion that the Hirsh deed (being over 30 years old) was admissible in evidence against appellants, although they are not in privity therewith, under the exception which ancient deeds afford to the rule as to inadmissibility of hearsay evidence. It is admissible in evidence for what it may be worth, because of its declaration that the rear line of the lot it conveyed was on an alley. This is a declaration in the nature of a general reputation, or a traditional declaration, in regard to the fact that an alley existed at an ancient time in that location; either a public alley, or one in which a number of persons had an interest, being indicated. Such declarations in ancient deeds are admissible in evidence, although they go beyond a description of monuments marking the mere boundary lines of the land conveyed by such deeds. Jones on Evidence, § 301; 1 Greenleaf on Evidence (16th Ed.) §§ 128, 139; Morris v. Callanan, 105 Mass. 132; 2 Elliott on Evidence, 1278. In the case of such declarations in such deeds, the same principle upon which the authorities hold that hearsay evidence is admissible to prove boundary lines (Carruthers v. Eldridge's Ex'r, 12 Grat. [53 Va.] 670; Nowlin v. Burwell, 75 Va. 551; Harriman v. Brown, 8 Leigh [35 Va.] 697, and many other Virginia cases on the subject) is pushed, in its application, a step farther, so as to admit traditional evidence, not only that a certain tree or other monument marked a certain boundary line, but that a public body of land, such as a manor, or parish, or highway, or the like, or even that a private body of land in which a number of persons have a common interest, marked such boundary line, where the declaration comes from one having such common interest. 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 138a. A public alley, or an alley in common, as marking the boundaries of abutting property owners, may be a subject upon which such traditional declarations may be admissible in evidence, as tending to prove their existence in such cases, under such extension of such principle. See, to same effect, 1 Elliott on Roads and Streets, § 198, where it is said:

"* * * A deed between third parties referring to a way has been * * * held competent upon the question of the location and existence of the way as a matter of public and general interest upon which reputation is admissible"—citing authorities.

But, as stated by 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 139, such evidence is "not entitled to much weight." It may therefore be rebutted by very slight evidence of a more definite character.

And we find within the clause of the Hirsh deed itself above quoted the rebuttal of any inference which might otherwise be drawn therefrom that the 10 feet in width to the north of the old alley aforesaid, to which it refers, was at that time a public alley, or an alley in common, or a part of such an alley. It is apparent from the reading of such clause that such deed contains merely a conditional dedication or appropriation of a strip of land at the rear of the lot thereby conveyed, to be added to the previously existing old alley in that location, so as to make such alley 20 feet wide, instead of 10 feet, as theretofore delimited by the conveyances of abutting property owners along its course as aforesaid; and the condition was that "the said alley east" of the lot 627 (which clearly meant a strip from the southern end of the Keppler lot adjacent and in addition to the old alley existing there, as aforesaid, so as to make such alley at that location and all the way out to Seventh street 20 feet wide), should not "be closed or the use thereof to the [lot 627] be withheld." And the deed provided, in substance, that "upon the happening of these events, or either of them," the proffered dedication or appropriation of the extra 10 feet in width of land to widen the old alley at the rear of the lot 627 should stand withdrawn. This recognized the right of the owner of the Keppler lot, as existing at that time, to close or withhold the strip of land now in controversy in this cause from the use of it as an alley. So that, instead of being evidence against the appellants on the subject of dedication, it is a circumstance in their favor.

Subsequently the deed of 1851, quoted from in the statement preceding this opinion, conveyed the Keppler lot by metes and bounds, which, by well-established rules of construction of deeds, extended the lot back to the old alley; and such deed furnishes convincing evidence that up to the date thereof, in 1851, there had been no dedication by the owners of the Keppler lot of the strip of land in controversy for use as a public alley, or any appropriation of it by them as an alley in common.

[7] (b) The city relies upon three other subsequent deeds in the chain of title of said lot 627, or of portions thereof (with which deeds the appellants are not in privity), two dated in 1896 and the other in 1909, the first of which deeds described the real estate conveyed as abutting on an alley "20 feet wide," and the other two of such deeds describing such alley as a "public alley, 20 feet wide." These deeds, however, being less than 30 years old, were inadmissible in evidence against appellants under the authorities aforesaid.

[8] (c) The city also relies upon two deeds in the chain of title of the Young Men's Christian Association, to that portion of its real estate shown on the plat preceding this opinion which is on the corner of Grace and Seventh streets, and extends back to said long existing old alley on the opposite side of it from the strip of land in controversy in this cause; one of such deeds being of date December 2, 1861, and the other of date January 16, 1868, which describes the lot conveyed as running back a certain distance to "a wide paved alley."

We are of opinion that these deeds were admissible in evidence as containing the declaration with respect to the alley being "a wide * * * alley," on the same ground as that above noted on the subject of the admissibility in evidence of the Hirsh deed.

But manifestly the probative value of such evidence is even less than that of the Hlrah deed, since it gives no definite width. The actual width of 12 feet of the old alley aforesaid might satisfy such description, since such width was in excess of the record width thereof aforesaid, of which the grantors in such deeds were doubtless aware, as their deeds themselves refer to the chain of title to the lot being conveyed, in which chain of title appears of record deeds which refer to such alley as a "10-foot alley." It may well be that the language, "a wide * * * alley," was used in the deeds in question, because the grantors therein knew from their chain of title that, by the encroachment above mentioned on the front, or fronts, of the lots which abutted on the old alley, the actual location of the latter had made it wider than 10 feet, but how wide they did not accurately know. And the evidence, to say the least of it, leaves it equally probable that it was for that reason that such deeds did not refer to any exact width as being the width of the alley, as the older deeds in their chain of title did, but referred to it as "a wide * * * alley," rather than that such reference was intended as a declaration that such alley was public alley. And as to the reference of the two deeds in question to an "alley," the presence there of the old alley aforesaid satisfied that description, so that any inference that such description referred to a public alley is thereby rebutted.

We come now to consider the principal question involved in this cause, and that is: [9, 10] 4. Has the user by the public of the strip of land in controversy been sufficient to raise the implication or presumption of a dedication of it to the public?

Since, as we have above seen, neither its charter provision above mentioned nor prescription has conferred upon the city of Richmond or the public the easement in question, the city must rely upon a common-law dedication. There are two classes of such dedications, express and implied. The intent to dedicate is essential to both classes in order to complete a dedication. The city in this cause must rely upon an implied dedication, since there is no evidence tending to show that there was ever any express dedication. An implied dedication is not founded upon a grant, nor does it necessarily presuppose one. It is founded on the doctrine of estoppel in pais. 1 Elliott on Roads and Streets, §§ 132-137; Benn v. Hatcher, 81 Va. 25, 29, 59 Am. Rep. 645; City of Norfolk v. Nottingham, 96 Va. 34, 30 S. E. 444; 2 Greenleaf on Evidence (2d Ed.) § 662; and many others of the authorities elsewhere cited.

It is very true that the intent to dedicate which may be implied need not have actually existed in the mind of the landowner. One is presumed to intend the usual and natural consequences of his acts. Hence, where public or private rights have been acquired upon the faith of conduct of the landowner under such circumstances as to make the doctrine of estoppel applicable, the law will imply the intent to dedicate, even where there is an entire absence thereof in the mind of the landowner, and even against a contrary intent. 1 Elliott on Roads and Streets, §§ 142, 146; City of Richmond v. A. Y. Stokes & Co., 31 Grat. (72 Va.) 713; Gillespie v. Duling, 41 Ind. App. 217, 83 N. E. 728; Morgan v. Railroad Co., 96 U. S. 716, 723, 24 L. Ed. 743; Tise v. Whitaker-Harvey Co., 146 N. C. 374, 59 S. E. 1012; 4 McQuillin, Mun. Corp. § 1561; Champ v. Nicholas County, 72 W. Va. 475, 78 S. E. 361; City of Los Angeles v. McCollum, 156 Cal. 148, 108 Pac. 914, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 378.

In the cause before us we cannot inquire or decide whether the doctrine of estoppel aforesaid is applicable in favor of any private owners of lots abutting on the alley in question, since no such parties are before us. With respect to the city, the facts in evidence disclose that the city has acquired no property, nor made any expenditure, on the faith of the strip of land in controversy being a public alley, or a part of such an alley. The sole ground on which it must rely in this cause for the application of said doctrine of estoppel is the long-continued user by the public, as it claims, of said strip of land as a public alley or as a part thereof. Now it is well settled that, where public user is relied on to establish dedication, the user must be of such a character "as would indicate to prudent men that the public claim is, as of right, to the way as a street or road, and that the owner is fully aware of the extent and character of the use and makes no objection. * * *" (Italics supplied.) 1 Elliott on Roads and Streets, § 179. To the same effect, see 4 McQuillin, Mun. Corp. §§ 1563, 1564; Harris' Case, 20 Grat. (61 Va.) 833; Talbott v. Richmond & Danville R. Co., 31 Grat. (72 Va.) 685. The actual knowledge aforesaid on the part of the owner need not be proved; but the user must be of such an adverse character that it may be reasonably expected to convey such knowledge to owners of the property affected, if they are alive to their own interests.

As said in Harris' Case, supra, 61 Va. (20 Grat.) at page 840:

"Where no public or private interests have been acquired upon the faith of the supposed dedication, the mere user, by the public, of the supposed street or alley, although long continued, should be regarded as a mere license, revocable at the pleasure of the owner, unless, indeed, there be evidence of an express dedication, or unless, in connection with such long-continued user, the way has been, by the proper town authority, recognized as a street, so as to give notice that a claim to it as an easement was asserted." (Italics supplied.)

[11] In the cause before us the preponderance of the evidence is to the effect that the city authorities never graded, paved, repaired the paving on, laid or repaired any sewer on, or did any other overt acts whatsoever upon, the strip of land in question, "so as to give notice that a claim to it as an easement was asserted." The sole act of the city authorities which could be regarded as having any tendency to give notice of such a claim was the adoption by the city council in 1872 of a map or plan of the city on file in the city engineer's office, which was on a small scale, and which upon close inspection showed an alley at the location of the 10-foot alley above referred to, which was in fact approximately a 12-foot alley as actually located on the ground as aforesaid. A careful scaling of this map discloses that such alley, as shown thereon, is approximately 17 feet wide. But, so far as the evidence goes, the appellants and those under whom they derive title had no notice of such disclosure of such map until the controversy involved in this cause arose, and if they had had prior notice of the contents of such map they might readily have taken the alley aforesaid shown thereon to have been the long-existing old alley aforesaid, which did not embrace the land in controversy. Hence such map is not of that character of evidence which is necessary in such a case to give the requisite notice aforesaid of the claim of easement in order to raise a presumption of dedication. As said by Judge E. C. Burks speaking for this court, in Talbott v. Richmond & Danville R. Co., supra, 72 Va. (31 Grat.) at page 688:

"Intent is the vital principle of dedication. In a case where acts and declarations are relied upon to show such intent, to be effectual, they must be unmistakable in their purpose and decisive in their character; and in every case it must be unequivocally and satisfactorily proved [citing authorities]. And this would seem to be the right guide to judicial interpretation in such cases, for we know that the individual owners of property are not apt to transfer it to the community, or subject it to the public servitude, without compensation, and such donation is not to be readily inferred."

To the same effect, 4 McQuillin, Mun. Corp. §§ 1368, 1369; City v. Lessee of White, 6 Pet. 481, 8 L. Ed. 452; Buntin v. Danville, 93 Va. 200-204, 24 S. E. 830; Winchester v. Carroll, 99 Va. 789, 740, 40 S. E. 87; Macon v. Franklin, 12 Ga. 239; West Point v. Bland, 106 Va. 792, 56 S. E. 802.

[12] As to the user by the public of the land in controversy as an alley, such use was not unequivocally a use as of right. On the contrary, the evidence is convincing that such strip was left unbuilt upon prior to 1860 merely because it was not needed for building purposes; and it was so left in 1860 as a private convenience appurtenant to the adjacent building belonging to the same owner, in order to afford a side entrance to both the first and second floors of such building. Such use of such strip was a valuable one to the owners of it during the whole time from 1860 to 1907, and that use, even if we left out of view other uses to which they put a part of such strip, satisfactorily accounts for its having been left uninclosed and unbuilt upon up to the time the building was torn down in 1911, and negatives any presumption of dedication to public use.

Since 1911 the facts leave no room for any presumption of dedication, and no claim is made on the part of the city that any dedication occurred since that time.

And with respect to the user by the public of the land in controversy, the whole of such user is satisfactorily accounted for by the existence of the old alley aforesaid adjacent thereto, without the need for any implication of a dedication of such strip to public use. Whether that alley was a public alley, or merely an alley in common appurtenant to the abutting property, is immaterial on that subject. Indeed, to what extent public use was made of said strip itself is left vague and undetermined by the evidence. Much of the public user in question was doubtless of the old alley aforesaid; and such of it as invaded the strip of land in controversy the evidence leaves equally consistent with being a user permitted by the landowners for their own private advantage, or a user in common with their private use, as with its being an adverse user by the public. Such public user, therefore, as there may have been, was not, as aforesaid, unequivocally such, but the contrary. The act of the appellants and those under whom they derive title in assenting to such public user was therefore not unequivocal in its meaning.

There are many other facts and circumstances in evidence, not mentioned in this opinion or in the statement preceding it, which would tend to strengthen, and none of them tend to weaken, the position we have above taken; but in the view we have taken of the case they are immaterial, and hence are not stated.

We conclude, therefore, that the question under consideration must be answered in the negative.

For the foregoing reasons, we are constrained to reverse the decree complained of, and we will enter a decree to the effect that we are of opinion that a preponderance of the evidence in the cause sustains the bill, and shows that no dedication to the public has been made of the 8-foot strip of ground in the bill and proceedings mentioned; that the appellants are the owners in fee of such strip of ground, as against the city of Richmond and the public; and that such city be perpetually enjoined and restrained from interfering with the rights of the appellants therein and thereto.

Reversed.

NORFOLK COUNTY v. CITY OF PORTSMOUTH.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. SAME.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 13, 1919.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 33(8) — ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY—POWER OF TRIAL COURT—APPEAL.

Under Const. 1902, § 128, and the general statute relative to the annexation of territory to cities, trial courts, in hearing such cases, exercise a constitutionally delegated power, which, though mainly judicial, is quasi legislative and political, and their conclusions on matters of fact are not to be disturbed unless plainly wrong, despite the provision of Code 1904, § 1014a, subsec. 5, that an appeal in such cases shall be heard without reference to the principle of demurrer to the evidence, etc.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR \S 1009(1)—REVIEW—DECISION OF CHANCERY COURT ON QUESTIONS OF FACT.

When the testimony is heard by the judge ore tenus in a chancery court, his decision of questions of fact is attended with a stronger presumption of their correctness than where the testimony is in the form of depositions.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 33(8)—ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY—PROCEEDINGS—APPEAL—FINDINGS OF TRIAL JUDGE.

While the appellate court, hearing appeals from decree for annexation of territory to a city, under Code 1904, § 1014a, subsec. 5, providing such appeals shall be heard without reference to the principle of demurrer to evidence, the evidence, being considered as on appeal in chancery cases, will not disregard any evidence or inferences, a presumption of correctness attends decision of trial court on questions of fact, which is greater than would adhere to it on testimony not delivered in presence of trial judge.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 33(6) — ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY—DENSITY OF POPULATION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to show that the normal population of a city proceeding to annex territory, exclusive of the annexation in question, might reasonably be expected to be very dense as compared with the population of other cities in the state, and much too dense for the city's welfare.

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 29(3) — ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY—FINANCIAL ABILITY OF CITY—VALUE OF FERRY FRANCHISE.

In determining value of city's half interest in a ferry franchise, the question being material, in proceedings by the city to annex territory, on the issue of its ability to take care of new and old financial obligations, the court will regard, not only the present rental value of the franchise, but also its sale value, and its prospective rental value after termination of the existing lease.

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 33(7) — ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY — SEWERAGE FOR OLD WARDS—ORDER.

Where it appears, in proceedings to annex territory to a city, that the interests of two wards of the city may suffer by the annexation, in that it may delay installation of an adequate sewerage system for such wards, the annexation order will be amended to require the city to install such a system after the next assessment of land, when it obligates itself to furnish sewerage to the annexed territory.

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 29(3) — ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY—OBJECTIONS—UNSETTLED CONDITIONS.

The objection that an annexation to a city was improper on account of the pendency of war, with consequent unsettled conditions, or at least of the transition period from war to peace while the peace treaty was being debated, was met by provision of annexation ordinance that city should not issue bonds mentioned until after next general assessment of land, which would not occur for twenty months.

8. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 29(3)—ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY—INCREASED CHARGES—BENEFITS.

Prospective increases in taxation charges upon property owners in territory sought to be annexed to adjacent city held not to afford reason why annexation should not be had, annexed territory being in fact an overgrowth from or adjunct to the city, and enjoying, without paying therefor, many benefits which residents of city paid for, such as fire protection, while annexation would bring about installation of many necessary improvements in way of sewerage and bringing in annexed territory.

9. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 29(3) — ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY—OBJECTIONS—INCREASED TAXES.

Part of land sought to be annexed by a city and occupied by a railroad and other industries, whose burdens of taxation would be largely increased by the annexation, was properly annexed, in view of benefits to railroad and industries from any benefits to annexed territory, particularly where land occupied by them was necessary to form annexed territory into a reasonably compact body of land, as required by statute.

10. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 86(2)—ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY — VALUATION OF COUNTY BUILDINGS—STATUTE.

Under Acts 1904, p. 145, Code 1904, § 1014a, subsec. 3, a city annexing territory from a county must repay to the latter the original reasonable cost of schoolhouses, etc., taken over, less a fair deduction for depreciation, and the statute does not require that the city pay the replacement value of the buildings.

11. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \S 36(3)—ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY—ASSUMPTION OF PORTION OF COUNTY DEBT.

Where a city annexed territory, thus subjecting the inhabitants to greater tax burdens, and such inhabitants could not carry with them the benefit of any part of a ferry franchise, standing as security for the county's bonded debt, in which they formerly had an interest, the court properly held the city need not assume any portion of the bonded indebtedness of the county; Code 1904, § 1014a, subsec. 3, requiring city to assume and provide for reimbursement to county only a "just" proportion of any existing indebtedness.

12. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⇐36(3) — ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY — ASSUMPTION OF COUNTY SCHOOL BONDS.

Under Code 1904, § 1014a, subsec. 3, a city annexing territory was properly required to pay the county a sum in cash and to assume an amount of the county school bonds, which, with the sum paid in cash, equaled the valuation, as properly made, of schoolhouses in the annexed territory taken over from the county.

13. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⇐36(2) — ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY—COST OF BRIDGE—REPAYMENT TO COUNTY.

A city annexing territory which included one-half of a bridge was not required to pay the county half the cost of such bridge, principle being that public improvements fully paid for go with the territory, the annexation constituting merely a change of the form of government, and Code 1904, § 1014a, subsec. 3, in so far as departing from such principle, being subject to a strict construction.

14. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐843(1) — ASSIGNMENT RAISING MOOT QUESTION—CONSIDERATION.

An assignment of error which raises merely a moot question need not be considered.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Norfolk County.

Annexation proceedings by the City of Portsmouth. From decree of annexation, the County of Norfolk and the Southern Railway Company appeal. Amended and affirmed.

A. B. Carney, E. R. F. Wells, and Williams, Tunstall & Thom, all of Norfolk, for plaintiffs in error.

Jno. W. Happer, of Portsmouth, and S. Heth Tyler, of Norfolk, for defendant in error.

SIMS, J. The above-entitled appeals involve proceedings in the court below in one case only, being appeals taken by the respective plaintiffs in error, the county of Norfolk and the Southern Railway Company, from the same order of court. The questions raised by the assignments of error upon the appeal of the former will be first considered, and thereafter the questions so raised upon the latter appeal.

Hon. P. H. Dillard, judge of the Seventh judicial circuit, having been designated for that purpose in accordance with the statute in such case made and provided, held and presided over the trial court, and heard and determined the issues in the case, and it is the decree entered by him at the final hearing thereof which is before us for review on appeal.

[1-3] Under the Constitution of 1902, § 126, and the general statute law enacted in pursuance thereof, Code 1904, § 1014a, the trial courts in this class of cases, in passing upon the questions of what amount of territory, if any, due consideration of the interests of the state, the city, the county, and the territory sought to be annexed, may require, upon the questions of how such interests may be affected by the proposed annexation, in view of the size and crowded condition of such territory and of such city, or the contrary, and in view of the financial ability of the city, the health of the respective communities, their past growth, their needs in the reasonably near future for development and expansion, and upon other facts and circumstances shown in evidence in such a proceeding, exercise a power formerly exercised by the Legislature itself by the passing or refusing to pass special statutes for the enlargement of the limits of cities and towns. Henrico County v. City of Richmond, 106 Va. 282, 55 S. E. 683, 117 Am. St. Rep. 1001. Hence the trial courts in such cases exercise a constitutionally delegated power, which, although mainly judicial, and not without limits, is to some extent quasi legislative and political in its character. See the case last cited, and also Winchester, etc., Co. v. Commonwealth, 106 Va. 264, 55 S. E. 692. And the statute law on the subject having made special and eminently fair and just provisions for the Constitution of the trial courts, and such courts having peculiar opportunities to ascertain the very right of the case, by a view of the locus in quo, and by the examination of witnesses in the presence of the court, their conclusions and decisions on matters of fact are not to be disturbed unless plainly wrong, notwithstanding the provision of the statute that an appeal in such cases "shall be heard without reference to the principles of demurrer to evidence—the evidence to be considered as on appeal in chancery cases." Pollard's Code 1904, subsec. 5, sec. 1014a. For, when the testimony is heard by the judge ore tenus in a chancery case (as for example in a divorce case), his decision of questions of fact arising thereon is attended with a stronger presumption of their correctness than where the testimony is in the form of depositions. And while the appellate court, under the statute last quoted, will not disregard any of the evidence or inferences which may properly be drawn therefrom, but will consider all of the evidence in the record, yet, in such court, a certain presumption of correctness will attend the decision by the court below of such questions of fact, which is greater than would adhere to it if based on testimony not delivered in the presence of the trial judge.

It is from this standpoint that we approach the consideration of the facts in this case.

The assignments of error are few; but, as is to be expected in such a case, the testimony is voluminous and covers a multitude of details of facts and circumstances.

The assignments of error of the county of Norfolk are the following:

"(a) The court erred in annexing any portion of said territory, because the evidence shows that it was not necessary or expedient at this time to do so.

"(b) The court erred in adjusting the rights of the city of Portsmouth and the county of Norfolk, in that it failed to allow a proper valuation for the school property included in the annexed territory, and failed to require the city of Portsmouth to assume any portion of the bonded indebtedness of the county of Norfolk."

There are also the following cross-assignments of error by the city of Portsmouth:

(c) That the court erred in requiring the city of Portsmouth to assume $95,000 of the school bonds which were a lien on the schoolhouse property in the annexed territory.

(d) That the court erred in requiring the city of Portsmouth to pay the county of Norfolk $13,500, being one-half of the cost of the Port Norfolk and West Norfolk bridge.

The substantive law as to the considerations which should govern the trial court in annexation proceedings is so fully defined by the statutory provisions and in the decisions in Virginia on the subject that we do not feel that any general exposition of it here would serve any useful purpose. See Henrico County v. City of Richmond, 106 Va. 282, 55 S. E. 683, 117 Am. St. Rep. 1001; Alexandria v. Alexandria Co., 117 Va. 230, 84 S. E. 630; Warwick Co. v. Newport News, 120 Va. 177, 90 S. E. 644.

There is, indeed, no conflict before us over what are the general considerations which should so govern. Any conflict which there may be as to the law as applicable to particular branches of the case will be considered below in this opinion.

Proceeding, therefore, to take up for decision the questions arising in the case:

1. We will consider the first assignment of error from the standpoint of the interest of the state, the city of Portsmouth, the annexed territory, and the county of Norfolk.

(a) The record does not disclose that the state has any interest which is divergent from that of the city of Portsmouth and of the inhabitants and property owners thereof, or of the annexed territory and its inhabitants and property owners.

[4] (b) Concerning the city of Portsmouth, and its inhabitants and property owners, exclusive of the annexed territory in question, the following outline of the material facts will be given:

The present area of the city of Portsmouth is only about 1,687 acres or about $2\frac{1}{2}$ square miles. Its population by the United States Census of 1910 was 33,190, of which 5,329 were in the Sixth ward and 5,699 were in the Seventh ward, which were annexed to the city in 1909. It increased in population 90.5 per cent. during the preceding decade, according to such United States Census report, but about two-thirds of this increase was due to the annexation last mentioned of 1909, leaving such increase for such decade in the old territory about 50 per cent. The record does not disclose what is its present population. It does disclose that the latter was abnormally congested when the decree under review was entered, due to government operations in the vicinity. But the government navy yard at Portsmouth is a permanent institution, and an increase of population of Portsmouth beyond the normal may reasonably be expected to continue after normal conditions ensue following the formal proclamation of peace, which may be expected before very long to end the world war. Making every due allowance, therefore, for the abnormal congestion aforesaid and for its decrease when conditions become stabilized, it is deemed sufficient to say that a preponderance of the evidence in the record shows that the normal population of Portsmouth, exclusive of the annexation in question, may reasonably be expected to be very dense as compared with the population of other cities in the state and much too dense for the welfare of the city.

Owing to its proximity to the city of Norfolk and its physical surroundings on other sides, the city of Portsmouth can expand only in one direction, and any expansion would first embrace the territory which the city seeks to annex in the proceeding now before us.

[5] With respect to the financial ability of the city to make proper provision for the future welfare of the area annexed by the order under review, there is not so much conflict in the evidence as in the opposing views taken of it by witnesses and counsel in the case. There is but little difference in the evidence as to what are the present financial resources of the city. There is a very great difference, however, in the views taken of such resources for the near future, and this difference consists chiefly in the valuations placed on the interest which the city of Portsmouth owns in the Norfolk county ferries. That is a one-half interest in such ferries, which has been and is now under lease, yielding a rental return to the city of $67,000 per year. The position taken in behalf of the county of Norfolk, which is to the effect that the city of Portsmouth will not be financially able to discharge both its obligations to the newly annexed territory and its inhabitants and property owners, and to the inhabitants and property owners of the old city, especially to the Sixth and Seventh wards thereof and their inhabitants and property owners is reached by regarding such ferries as available as an asset of the city only to the extent of its present annual rental return aforesaid. It ignores entirely any further realizable value to the city of such asset. We are of opinion that this is plainly a mistaken view of the subject. It appears in evidence that such asset is free from all bonded indebtedness of the city and that it could be sold without interfering with any of its municipal functions, and, if sold, the preponderance of the evidence shows that it would sell for at least some two millions of dollars. Furthermore, the existing lease of such ferries will expire next year, and the preponderance of the evidence is that it may reasonably be expected to be let for a net rental to the city thereafter of at least $120,000 per annum. Taking such valuations to be approximately correct, we entertain no doubt of the financial ability of the city of Portsmouth in the premises, without the necessity for any increase in its current tax rate. And the power to increase the tax rate is, of course, an additional resource of the city. The present tax rate, however, is high, and doubtless no increase thereof will be resorted to, except in an unexpected and temporary emergency.

Coming now to the subject of the duty of the city of Portsmouth with respect to improving the streets and constructing a sewer system for the Sixth and Seventh wards aforesaid, about which there is much testimony in the case:

The storm center of the testimony against the annexation now in question from the standpoint of the future welfare of the city of Portsmouth and of the inhabitants of its older territory, and especially of those who live or own property in the said Sixth and Seventh wards, converges around the problem whether the city will have the financial ability to discharge its obligations to the new area and its inhabitants and property owners, without rendering it unable to discharge its existing duty to make reasonable and much needed improvements of its existing streets, especially in said wards, and to provide a long-needed improvement of constructing a sewerage system in said wards. And these are the chief questions in the case concerning the welfare of the old city and its inhabitants and property owners.

On the subject of the streets, the preponderance of the evidence in the case tends to show that their bad condition may be due in part to the fault of contractors who constructed certain improvements thereof for which they may be held responsible, and that the enforcement of that responsibility may perhaps be depended upon to solve the most serious portion of the street problem aforesaid. And the preponderance of the evidence shows that the city officials now having jurisdiction of the street improvement matters are alert to the importance of such improvements, and, the city having the financial ability to accomplish it, we must assume that all reasonable improvement of the streets in question will be made in a reasonable time, whether or not it shall turn out that the supposed liability of the contractors aforesaid can be enforced.

[6] On the subject of providing a sewerage system for the Sixth and Seventh wards, however, there is more difficulty. The evidence is uncontradicted that the city has never even taken up for consideration when it will supply these wards with a sewerage system. Those wards are at present absolutely without any sewerage system, and the evidence shows that the sanitary conditions due to that want are much worse than exist in the annexed territory, where there are some private sewers, and where the dry closets are more efficiently attended to by the county authorities than are those in such wards under the city management. It is true that the evidence shows that a general sewerage system, to serve both the newly annexed territory and the Sixth and Seventh wards, can be more efficiently and practically planned and more economically executed, if it is all done at once and as parts of one system. But, without going further into details, we are constrained by the evidence to say that we feel that, as the order under review stands, the inhabitants and property owners of the old city are left with just grounds for reasonable apprehension that the more pressing need for the construction of a sewerage system in the said wards may be postponed until after the sewer system is constructed in the newly annexed territory. This apprehension may be removed, however, by an amendment by us of the provisions of said order which we are of opinion should be made, to the effect that the plans for the sewerage of the annexed territory shall be a part of one sewerage system making reasonable provision also for the sewerage of said wards, and that the actual construction and installation of said system in said annexed territory shall not precede in time the completion of the construction and installation of said system for said wards. The following position on this subject is taken, indeed, in argument for the city, as quoted from its reply brief in the case:

"An inspection of the maps will show that it is but reasonable to suppose that after the next assessment of land, when the city of Portsmouth obligates itself and is obligated to furnish sewerage to the territory annexed under this order, it will install a comprehensive system of sewerage, including the Sixth and Seventh wards. * * *

The amendment of the order of court which will be made, as just stated, will therefore but put into effect the existing purpose of the city on the subject as urged for it in argument.

[7] Only one further objection to the annexation from the standpoint of the interest of the city is deemed material to be specifically mentioned and passed upon. Such objection has been much pressed in the petition of and in argument for the county of Norfolk, and that is that the entry of any order of annexation was inexpedient at the time the order aforesaid was entered, when "the country was at war, conditions were unsettled and abnormal, and it was impossible to foresee what the situation would be at the end of the war"; and, as is now urged in argument, any order of annexation is still inexpedient, only in perhaps a less degree, notwithstanding the armistice, since conditions are yet far from normal. But we are of opinion that it may reasonably be expected that normal conditions will be restored within 20 months after the proclamation of peace, and hence we think that the objection under consideration is fully met by the provision in the annexation ordinance that the city shall not issue the bonds therein mentioned until after the next general assessment of land, which will not occur until 1920, and by the provisions contained in the order which postpone the execution of certain provisions thereof until the expiration of the period of twenty months after the peace proclamation.

We are of opinion, therefore, that, with the said order amended as aforesaid, the annexation will be manifestly for the best interest of the whole of the old city of Portsmouth and its inhabitants and property owners.

We come now to consider the annexation from the standpoint of the interest of the annexed territory, which includes, of course, the interest of its inhabitants, property owners, railroads, and other industries.

The opposing testimony and evidence in the record is directed against the annexation of the very large territory sought to be annexed by the ordinance. The order of court aforesaid annexed something less than one-half of the territory sought to be annexed by the city.

The territory in fact annexed by the order of court is for the most part laid out into building lots for residential purposes, and contains a population of some 10,000 people—sufficient under our laws for it to obtain a charter as a city. It is practically without any fire protection, except that which the railroads and certain other large industries provide for themselves. It has some sewers, but those have been constructed without system and are grossly inadequate. A large part of its population has been forced for many years to go 5 miles to traverse a distance of only about 1½ miles to reach a much-used ferry, on account of having no bridge across Scott's creek. There are many other circumstances appearing in evidence which tend to show conditions in the annexed territory with which a county government is inadequate, and is not expected under our laws, to deal, and which should be dealt with by municipal authority (Henrico County v. City of Richmond, supra, 106 Va. 282, 55 S. E. 683, 117 Am. St. Rep. 1001); but it is not thought that any useful purpose would be served by mentioning them here in further detail.

[8] The annexed territory, aside from that occupied by railroad and other industries which will be presently more particularly mentioned will be benefited by the annexation in the following especial ways which may be mentioned: All of the revenue from taxation therein must be expended therein for the period and for the purposes prescribed by statute and by the order of court aforesaid. It will receive city fire protection and consequent reduction of fire insurance rates which will aggregate a large pecuniary saving to the property owners thereof. It will be provided with a sewerage system. It will have a bridge provided across Scott's creek which will be a great public convenience to a large part of its population and one long needed. And it will be placed in position to obtain many other needed public improvements and advantages which in the nature of things a county government is unsuited to provide and which may reasonably be expected from municipal government.

On the other hand, it may be expected that an increased burden of taxation will eventually be placed upon the property owners of the annexed territory; but this is inseparable from the attainment of increased public benefits and advantages, and should not be allowed to bar the future welfare and progress toward a more advanced and higher stage of civilization of the whole community, including that contained in the older boundaries of the city as well as that within its newly enlarged boundaries.

Indeed, the population of the annexed territory above mentioned has been but an overgrowth of the old city. As is said in the opinion of this court in Alexandria v. Alexandria County, supra (117 Va. at page 241, 84 S. E. at page 633), of the people of such a suburban community:

"The people * * * market, shop and transact their business in the city * * * and many of them are employed in the city. They attend the churches, places of amusement, participate in the social life of the city, and are, practically, as closely connected with city life as are the people residing within the city's boundaries. They use its streets. * * * Being without * * * fire protection, * * * the fire department of the city * * * [has] always responded to calls for assistance from these outlying sections. In other words, the people in these * * * localities enjoy in a large degree many of the benefits of the city without having to bear any of its burden. * * *"

Having due regard, therefore, for the mutual rights affected, we are clearly of opinion that the expected future imposition of the added burdens, which are inseparable from and are incident to an annexation in such a case, does not afford an adequate reason why the annexation should not be had.

[9] With respect to the railroad and other industries whose plants are embraced in the annexed territory, the following should be said: It is true that these concerns will not derive as great benefit from annexation to the city as will other incorporated and individual property owners in other parts of the annexed territory; and the added burdens of taxation when the city government goes fully into effect will be much greater on the former than the latter. Yet the ultimate best interests of such concerns cannot be severed from that of the community in which they are located. What will best promote the future welfare of the latter is, when all things are considered, for the best interests of such industries also. Moreover, we are of opinion that the inclusion of the land occupied by the industries in question was necessary to conform the annexed territory into "a reasonably compact body of land," as the statute in such case requires.

It remains for us to consider the interest of the county of Norfolk as opposed to the annexation in question. On this subject nothing is interposed by the assignments of error of the county as standing in the way of the annexation. And the complaints made by its other assignments of error go, not to the necessity or expediency of the annexation, but only to certain details of the terms of the order aforesaid. These assignments of error will be presently considered.

Our conclusion at this point, therefore, is that, subject to the amendment of the order under review which we will make in our order in the case, as above indicated, there was no error in the action of the court below in annexing the territory it did as aforesaid to the city of Portsmouth.

The second assignment of error of the county of Norfolk embraces two questions. We shall consider them in their order as stated below.

[10] 2. Did the court below err in that it failed to allow a proper valuation for the schoolhouses included in the annexed territory?

The brief for the county of Norfolk and oral argument in its behalf raise no question as to the valuation of the school property, except with respect to the schoolhouses in question. Nor is there any cross-assignment of error on the part of the city of Portsmouth touching the allowance of compensation to the county for the schoolhouse lots. We must therefore confine our consideration of the first question raised by the second or "(b)" assignment of error of the county, quoted in the outset of this opinion, to the valuation of the schoolhouses included in the annexed territory.

The court below proceeded in this matter upon the following principle:

The court based its valuation of the buildings on their original reasonable cost, less their depreciation due to age and use; and it adopted 2½ per cent. of the cost price of the buildings as the annual depreciation.

The county especially objects to such a principle being adopted by the court as the basis of the valuation of the buildings, and contends that the court should have allowed the amount for the buildings which it would have cost to rebuild them anew at the time of the court's order, less a proper percentage for depreciation.

The statute on this subject is as follows:

"In every case of annexation, such city or town shall assume and provide for the reimbursement of the county or counties of such just proportion of any existing debt of such county or counties as may be determined in said proceeding, and also for compensation to any county for any schoolhouse or other public building of such county located within the annexed territory, which shall not be reserved in the proceeding to the county." Acts 1904, p. 145, 1 Pollard's Code 1904, § 1014a, subsec. 3.

It will be observed that the statute does not use the word "value," but merely requires the municipality to provide "for compensation" to the county for any schoolhouse, etc. We are of opinion that the true intent and meaning of the statute is, not that the county shall sustain a loss or reap a profit by any depreciation or enhancement of what would be the cost of reconstruction of the buildings; but that the county shall be repaid the original reasonable cost thereof, less a fair deduction for depreciation.

We are therefore of opinion that there was no error in the action of the court in adopting the principle it did in arriving at the valuation it made of the buildings in question.

The county also objects to the figures of valuation of the buildings fixed by the court. There is not much, but some, conflict of evidence on that subject. We deem it sufficient to say that we are of opinion that the preponderance of the evidence sustains the figures adopted by the court.

The following is the other question embraced in the second, or "(b)," assignment of error of the county of Norfolk:

[11] 3. Did the court below err in that it failed to require the city of Portsmouth to assume any portion of the bonded indebtedness of the county of Norfolk, other than the school bonds hereinafter mentioned?

The county indebtedness in question, outstanding at the time of the order of annexation, amounted approximately to $374,710. It is secured by first lien on the county's one-half interest in the Norfolk county ferries, above mentioned. The annexation takes over the territory embraced therein, and relieves the county from all future outlay on account thereof, but the county will still continue to receive its one-half of the rental return from said ferries, and will continue to own its whole one-half interest in such ferries, subject to said lien thereon, which will constitute an asset far more than sufficient to pay the accruing interest and principal of said indebtedness, and the county will have a large balance remaining with which to help in bearing any burden of taxation resting on the remaining territory and people of the county, so that no burden of taxation is left on the people of the remainder of the county on account of such indebtedness. On the other hand, the burden of future taxation, inseparable from the annexed territory, accompanies it and its people into the municipality, and yet no part of the equitable share of such territory and its people in the county's share of said ferries passes to the municipality with the annexed territory or its people. That is to say, the bonded indebtedness aforesaid is secured on an asset in which all the people of the whole county of Norfolk, as it stood prior to the annexation, had a common equitable interest; and we are of opinion that it would be inequitable to hold that that portion of the county and its people embraced in the annexation aforesaid must carry with them a part of the burden of such indebtedness, when they cannot carry with them the benefit of any part of the security therefor in which they formerly had an interest.

Such being the situation, the position taken by the county of Norfolk on this point is plainly inequitable and cannot be maintained, unless the statute aforesaid (1 Pollard's Code 1904, § 1014a, subsec. 3) sustains it.

The language of the statute on such point above quoted, so far as material, is as follows:

"In every case of annexation, such city * * * shall assume and provide for the reimbursement of the county * * * of such just proportion of any existing indebtedness of such county * * * as may be determined in said proceeding. * * *"

We are of opinion that the statute does not require the assumption by the municipality of some proportion "of any existing indebtedness" mentioned, but only of such proportion thereof as may be "just," if any.

We are therefore of opinion that there was no error in the holding of the court below complained of on this point.

We will now consider the cross-assignments of error of the city of Portsmouth above mentioned, which may be again stated and will be passed upon in their order as set forth below.

[12] 4. Did the court err in requiring the city of Portsmouth to assume the $95,000 of school bonds, which were an existing lien on the schoolhouse property in the annexed territory?

This question must be answered in the negative.

It is urged in the brief for the city of Portsmouth that the order of court under review "required the city to pay for these schoolhouses just as though they were free from lien." In this position such brief is in error. The order requires only that—

"The city of Portsmouth shall pay to the county of Norfolk the sum of $241.50 in cash when this order takes effect, and shall assume $95,000 of the bonds * * * now outstanding, and shall pay the interest thereon until maturity, as compensation for the said schoolhouses and seven lots located within said annexed territory. * * *"

The $241.50 and the $95,000 of said bonds aggregate $95,241.50, the total value of said schoolhouses and lots as such value was ascertained and fixed by the court below.

No complaint is made by the city of Portsmouth of its having been required to pay the $241.50 as compensation for the said lots. Hence we cannot decree on that question.

It is a concession in the case that the school bonds in question constituted a debt of the county within the meaning of the statute next below quoted.

The requirement aforesaid of the assumption by the city of Portsmouth of said $95,000 of existing indebtedness falls within the requirements of the aforesaid statute (1 Pollard's Code 1904, § 1014a, subsec. 3) that, "in every case of annexation, such city * * * shall assume * * * such just proportion of any existing debt of such county * * * as may be determined in said proceeding, * * *" unless, indeed, the equitable interest of the annexed territory and its people in the Norfolk county ferries aforesaid made it inequitable and unjust that this should be done.

On the latter question it must be borne in mind that these school bonds are not a lien on the said ferries; whereas, the other indebtedness of the county of Norfolk above mentioned is a lien thereon. Hence the principle upon which the conclusion was above reached, that the city of Portsmouth cannot under the statute last mentioned be required to assume any part of the indebtedness of the county of Norfolk aforesaid which is a lien on such ferries, can have no application to said $95,000 of school bond indebtedness so as to remove it from under the requirements of such statute. That being so, the statute is applicable to such school bond indebtedness and requires the city of Portsmouth to assume the same as the said order of court provides.

[13] 5. Did the court err in requiring the city of Portsmouth to pay the county of Norfolk $13,500, being one-half the cost of the Port Norfolk and West Norfolk bridge?

One-half of the bridge in question was included in the annexed territory.

The position taken for the city on this subject is that the statute (1 Pollard's Code 1904, § 1014a, subsec. 3) does not contemplate compensation being made to the county for territory, and that it is only because of the express provisions of the statute requiring that compensation shall be provided for to the county "for any schoolhouse or other public building," that any compensation for territory or improvements thereon can be required.

We are of opinion that such position is well taken. On principle, annexation proceedings cannot be regarded as transactions of purchase and sale between private parties. They in truth involve merely a change of form of government of the territory affected from that of a county to that of a town or city. The county, town, or city are all alike mere political subdivisions of but one and the same government, that of the state. Whatsoever has been done by the county government in the past and paid for, in the way of public improvements in the territory in question, has been done, as a general rule, by the people and property owners of such territory by their contributions of taxes, and, if not, to the extent that such improvements have exceeded such contributions, their construction has been justified upon the consideration that their creation was for the general welfare of the whole of those upon whom the burden was placed of bearing the expense of such construction. So far as paid for, therefore, the corpus of such improvements constitutes no existing burden. The debit and credit side of the account of their construction is closed. They pass, it is true, with the territory covered by an annexation into the jurisdiction of and under a new form of government. But the new government is still a government of the same territory and of the same people and over the property therein. To require the new government to pay for the public property in the territory it receives would be the same thing in effect as to require such government to make again the same outlay which has been already made; which, of course, would have to be met in future by taxation; and which taxation, in part at least, would fall upon the former people and property owners of the annexed territory, and to that extent would result in compelling them to pay twice for the same public improvements, or to pay for what the general welfare never required that they should pay.

With respect to existing indebtedness for the improvements mentioned, indeed, the principle is different. The inhabitants and property owners of the annexed territory have never made that outlay. When they pass under the new form of government, it is but just that they should carry that indebtedness with them. But it is not just to them that they should be made to carry a greater burden than that with them.

From the foregoing considerations it will be observed that the statute under consideration, in requiring that the municipality shall assume and provide for the reimbursement of the county, not only for a just proportion of any existing indebtedness, but "also for compensation for any schoolhouse or other public building of such county located within the annexed territory," etc., in truth departs from the true principle involved; and hence the statute will be strictly construed, upon an application for compensation for improvements upon the annexed territories, and the courts should not compel compensation such as that under consideration, which is beyond the requirements of the terms of the statute, whenever objection is properly made thereto.

Such was the view of the law, in principle, taken at circuit in the case of Richmond v. Henrico and Chesterfield, 20 Va. Law Reg. 268, at page 272, where the learned judge who therein presided (Judge A. A. Campbell, of the Twenty-First Judicial Circuit), said:

"* * * the policy of the act does not seem to contemplate compensation for territory to the county."

The precise point we have under consideration was not involved, however, and was not decided in that case.

The order under review will therefore be amended so as to omit any allowance of the item in question.

We have now to consider the assignments of error of the Southern Railway Company in its appeal in this case.

All the questions raised by the assignments of error of the Southern Railway Company have been disposed of by what has been said above, except that raised by the following assignment, namely:

[14] 6. That the failure to include the Southern Railway Company along with the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and the two other railroad companies mentioned in the clause of the order of annexation under the heading "Terms and Conditions," Subdivision E, which provides that the City of Portsmouth will take no steps to increase the assessment of any of the property of the railroads mentioned until the expiration of a period of 20 months after peace has been declared, and which also provides that the city shall not seek to have established any additional crossings or crossing safeguards, other than those now established, until the expiration of that period, was an unwarranted and unjustifiable discrimination against the Southern Railway Company.

Of this assignment of error we deem it sufficient to say: First, that it raises merely a moot question, as it does not appear that any such action such as is referred to has been in fact taken by the city; and, secondly, it has been developed in the argument before us that no unfair discrimination against the Southern Railway Company was intended by the omission of the name of such company from such clause of the order, and, counsel for the city in argument at the bar, of this court having stated that there is no objection on the part of the city to the insertion of the name of the Southern Railway Company in such clause by the order which will be entered by this court, this will be accordingly done.

7. It having been suggested in argument before us that some confusion may arise with regard to what fiscal year is meant by clause "c" of the "Terms and Conditions" of the order of the court below, because of the pendency of the appeal in this case and the supersedeas awarded upon the allowance of such appeal, it will be ordered that the fiscal year mentioned in said order is the year for which the levies therein mentioned were imposed in 1918, and that all county levies which were imposed in the year 1918 by the county of Norfolk on persons and property within the annexed territory shall be paid to the county of Norfolk.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion to amend the order of the court below in the four particulars above mentioned, and, subject to such amendments, to affirm such order, with costs to the city of Portsmouth, as the party substantially prevailing.

Amended and affirmed.

(124 Va. 769)

ROSENBERG v. TURNER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 27, 1919.)

1. CUSTOMS AND USAGES §15(1, 2) — CONSTRUCTION OF WORDS—"EXCAVATE"—PAROL EVIDENCE.

Ordinary words or phrases may by usage of trade acquire a restricted or limited meaning, and when they do, that meaning may be shown by parol evidence, and hence word "excavate" as used in a building contract may be shown to be used in a certain locality to mean removal of dirt only and not stone.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Excavate.]

2. CONTRACTS §152, 175(1)—CONSTRUCTION—MEANING OF WORDS.

Words in a contract are generally construed in their usual ordinary and popular sense, unless it can be legitimately shown in some way that they were used in some other sense; the burden of showing this being always upon party alleging it.

3. CUSTOMS AND USAGES §12(1) — KNOWLEDGE OF PARTIES.

A custom of trade in using a word in other than its ordinary sense, cannot change intrinsic character of contract of parties who are ignorant of such custom.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR §237(2)—OBJECTIONS IN LOWER COURT—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE.

Where evidence was admissible to show custom, and if followed by evidence sufficient to charge defendant with knowledge thereof would have affected contract involved, its reception will not be considered error; there being no motion to strike or instructions asked to disregard the evidence.

5. CONTRACTS §188(5)—"EXCAVATE."

The word "excavate" as ordinarily used in a construction contract covers the removal of solid rock, as well as earth and loose material.

6. CONTRACTS §285(2)—ARCHITECT'S DETERMINATION—EXTRA WORK.

In a construction contract providing "that in case any difference of opinion shall arise between said parties in relation to the contract, the work to be done or that has been performed under it, etc., the decision of the architect shall be final and binding on all parties hereto," gave to architect power to determine whether or not extra compensation should be paid by owner for work which contractor claimed was not covered by the contract.

7. TRIAL §295(5)—INSTRUCTIONS.

Two instructions presenting the two opposing theories of the parties should be read together to determine the sufficiency of either.

8. TRIAL §267(4)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTED INSTRUCTION.

The trial court may disregard all instructions tendered and give instructions of its own; and, if they correctly state the law covering all the phases of the case presented by the evidence and fairly submit the case to the jury without obscurity or ambiguity, no one can complain.

9. CONTRACTS §353(11)—INSTRUCTIONS—EXTRA WORK.

The court properly refused to instruct the jury not to find for plaintiff unless they "further believed from the evidence that defendant expressly agreed with plaintiff to pay for said excavation as an extra," the use of the word "expressly" being misleading, where one of claims of plaintiff was that a contract to pay for such work was created by implication.

Sims, J., dissenting in part.

Error to Hustings Court of Petersburg.

Action by W. R. Turner against Joseph L. Rosenberg. There was a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and the defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Lassiter & Drewery, of Petersburg, for plaintiff in error.

Charles Hall Davis and Paul Pettit, both of Petersburg, for defendant in error.

BURKS, J. Joseph L. Rosenberg let to contract the construction of a hotel in the city of Petersburg, according to plans and specifications which were made a part of the contract. Haynes Bros., general contractors, agreed to furnish all the materials and labor and do a complete job for a stated sum agreed upon with Rosenberg. The specifications, amongst others, contained the following clauses:

Under the title of "Excavating and Grading":

"The contractor shall visit the site of the building and examine for himself the condition of the lot, and satisfy himself as to the nature of the soil.

"Excavate to the depth as shown by the drawings for the cellar, areas, and outside entrance, and for trenches under all walls and piers, all trenches shall be excavated to the neat size as far as practicable, and each shall be leveled to a line on the bottom, ready to receive the foundation. The contractor must be careful not to excavate the trenches below the depth shown by the drawings; should he do so he must pay the mason for the extra mason work thereby made necessary, as under no conditions will dirt filling be allowed."

Under the title of "General Provisions," the following:

"In any and all cases of discrepancy in figures, the matter shall be immediately submitted to the architect for his decision, and without such decision, said discrepancy shall not be adjusted by the contractor, save and only at his risk; and in the settlement of any complications arising from such adjustment, the contractor shall bear all extra expense involved.

"The plans and these specifications are to be considered co-operative; and all work necessary to the completion of the design drawn on plans, and not described herein, and all works described herein and not drawn on plans, are to be considered a portion of the contract, and must be executed in a thorough manner, with the best of materials, the same as if fully specified."

The general contractors sublet to the defendant in error, Turner, the brickwork and excavating. The plans and specifications called for the excavation of a cellar of given dimensions to a depth of 10 feet. After excavating to a depth of about 2 feet, Turner struck solid rock. This was a great surprise to Turner, Rosenberg, the supervising architect, and every one connected with the work. Thereupon Turner stopped work, and notified the supervising architect, who was the same person who had drawn the plans and specifications, and Rosenberg, that he did not consider blasting within the terms of his contract, and that he would proceed no further unless he was paid for the blasting as extra work. Turner was a subcontractor, and up to this time had no contract with Rosenberg. He claims, however, that the supervising architect was the agent of Rosenberg, and as such authorized him to proceed with the blasting as extra work. He completed the work, and presented to Rosenberg an account of the actual costs thereof, which Rosenberg refused to pay, and thereupon Turner proceeded by motion for a judgment against Rosenberg, and obtained the judgment to which this writ of error was awarded.

The notice of the motion is quite vague as to the contract upon which it is founded. It simply describes it as "a certain special contract or account, a copy of which is hereto attached," but no contract is attached, only an account for labor and materials. In the bill of particulars which the plaintiff was required to furnish, he states that the labor was rendered and the materials were furnished "under a special verbal contract made between W. R. Turner, the plaintiff, and Joseph L. Rosenberg, the defendant, acting by R. A. Munden, architect for the building and agent for the said Rosenberg." The plaintiff does not claim to have made any contract with Rosenberg directly, or that any contract was implied from anything said or done by Rosenberg directly, but that the contract was the result of the language and conduct of the supervising architect. The latter contract is denied by Rosenberg and the architect.

If the removal of solid rock as well as earth was within the meaning of the word "excavate" used in the specifications, which Turner had seen and inspected, although the presence of solid rock was a surprise to him, he had no right to demand extra pay for its removal. It was important, therefore, for him to show that it was not so included. This he attempted to do by showing that, by a local custom or usage in Petersburg, the word "excavate" in such contracts did not embrace solid rock, but referred only to earth and loose material. Turner himself apparently recognizes the fact that ordinarily "excavate" covers stone as well as earth, for he says, when examined as to the local custom, "if the parties know there is rock there, it is specified specifically." It is then and then only that the word "blasting" is used, and hence the necessity for falling back on the custom. The evidence offered on the subject consisted of the testimony of the plaintiff himself and of one other witness. On this subject, the plaintiff testified as follows:

"Q. In the custom of the trade, here, in contracting, what is the meaning, or the generally accepted meaning of the word 'excavating'?"

"A. We always figure it as meaning excavating only earth, or soil, and we took it for granted that this was soil, particularly so, all that way through, because he specified, if you dig a foot deeper, it shall not be filled up with soil, but would have to be built back up with brick—even a foot deeper than the plans showed.

"Q. According to the custom of the trade, is there any special term which is currently and ordinarily used here in reference to the removal of hard rock, solid rock?"

"A. Well, if the parties know there is rock there, it is specified specially.

"Q. Well, in speaking of removing hard rock, in what terms would you speak of it?"

"A. Blasting the rock.

"Q. So that, as I understand it, when you used the term 'excavating,' you mean the removal of earth and loose dirt, and when you are referring to the removal of hard rock, you used the term 'blasting'?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. That is generally customary in the trade around here, is it?"

"A. Yes, sir."

The witness, Wilkinson, testified as follows:

"Q. Have you ever done any contracting yourself?"

"A. Yes, sir; I have. I am contracting now."

"Q. According to the custom of the trade, what is the meaning of the term 'excavate' when used in a contract?"

"A. According to the custom that we have here in Petersburg, all excavations are of dirt. When it comes to any blasting, that is stone; that is blasting strictly. It is just the removal of dirt and any other debris that may fall in from a burned building, or anything like that—any loose stuff."

"Q. And when you speak of removing solid rock, you usually use the term 'blasting'?"

"A. Yes, sir."

[1-3] This line of examination was objected to by the defendant, but his objection was overruled, and he excepted. Although the word "excavate" be not a word of art requiring explanation from those skilled in a particular branch of trade or learning, even ordinary words or phrases may by usage of trade acquire a restricted or limited meaning, and, when they do, that meaning may be shown by parol evidence, and this is no violation of what is usually termed the parol evidence rule, but the custom is deemed to be a part of the contract. 12 Cyc. 1081, and cases cited; Brown on Parol Evidence, § 57. Words, however, are generally construed in their usual, ordinary, and popular sense, unless it can be legitimately shown in some way that they were used in some other sense, and the burden of showing this is always upon the party alleging it. It would doubtless be a surprise to the public to learn that the word "excavate," as used in the case at bar, did not include solid rock, in the absence of any evidence of a local usage or a general trade usage such as is here claimed to exist. It was necessary, therefore, to establish such usage. The mere establishment of the usage, however, was not sufficient. It was also necessary to bring home to the defendant knowledge of such usage, or else to show that it was of such long continuance and so certain, general, universal, and notorious that knowledge thereof would be imputed to the defendant. A custom of trade cannot change the intrinsic character of the contract of parties who are ignorant of such custom. Ferguson v. Gooch, 94 Va. 1, 26 S. E. 397, 40 L. R. A. 234; Consumers' Ice Co. v. Jennings, 100 Va. 719, 42 S. E. 879. In Syer & Co. v. Lester, 116 Va. 541, 82 S. E. 122, it was held that—

"Evidence of a local custom or usage will not be received to affect the terms of a contract unless the party to be affected thereby had actual knowledge of such custom, or it was so well established, notorious, and generally accepted that notice of it will be imputed to him."

See, also, on the subject of local customs or usages of trade, Richlands v. Hildebeitel, 92 Va. 91, 22 S. E. 806; Southwest Va. M. Co. v. Chase, 95 Va. 50, 27 S. E. 826; Richmond v. Barry, 109 Va. 274, 63 S. E. 1074; Straus v. Fahed, 117 Va. 633, 85 S. E. 969; Sutherland v. Gibson, 117 Va. 840, 86 S. E. 108.

We have not deemed it material in this case to consider whether or not it is necessary for the party relying upon a local custom or usage to set it up in his pleadings. On that question the authorities are in conflict. Oriental L. Co. v. Blades L. Co., 103 Va. 730, 741, 50 S. E. 270, and authorities cited.

[4] The objection, however, was general, and did not specify any ground. It was admissible for the purpose of showing the local custom or usage, and, if followed by evidence sufficient to charge the plaintiff with knowledge thereof, would have affected the contract. It was not so followed, nor was any motion made to strike it out, nor any instruction asked to disregard it. When offered it was admissible for the purpose for which it was offered. The objection to its admissibility was general. No grounds were stated; and under the circumstances of this case the defendant will not be permitted to say that its reception may have affected the verdict.

[5, 6] While we are of the opinion, as hereinbefore stated, that the word "excavate," as used in the case at bar, covers the removal of solid rock as well as earth and loose material, yet as held in Stokes v. Amerman, 8 N. Y. Supp. 150, the contrary claim by Turner was not so clearly without foundation to support it as to create a suspicion of good faith in raising the question. As soon as he struck solid rock, he stopped work and notified the supervising architect that he would proceed no further unless he was paid extra therefor. The architect was the agent of the owner to see that the plans and specifications were carried out. There is some conflict in the evidence as to whether or not the architect agreed that he should be paid extra therefor, but if the architect had the right to decide whether or not he was entitled to extra compensation, the question was one for the jury, and there is sufficient evidence to support their finding. Under the terms of the contract between Rosenberg and the general contractors, it was provided:

"That in case any difference of opinion shall arise between said parties in relation to the contract, the work to be done or that has been performed under it, or in relation to the plans, drawings and specifications hereto annexed, the decision of Richard A. Munden, the architect, shall be final and binding on all parties hereto."

We are of opinion that this provision of the contract gave to the said architect the power to determine whether or not such extra compensation should be paid by the owner, and that the verdict of the jury supporting that view, rendered upon the conflicting evidence, is conclusive of the question.

Instructions 2 and 3, given by the trial court, of its own motion were as follows:

"(2) If the plaintiff, who, as subcontractor, was making the excavation, in prosecuting the work of excavation, struck rock which required blasting, and thereupon notified the supervising architect that blasting was not contemplated in the contract and would be extra work; and if the architect directed him to proceed with the work, but keep a separate account of the cost of the blasting, and that he would be paid therefor, then, under the contract, this decision of the architect was binding upon his principal, the defendant, and the jury should find for the plaintiff.

"(3) If, however, the architect informed the plaintiff that the blasting was covered by the contract and was not extra work, but directed him to proceed with the work, keeping a separate account of the cost of the blasting, and he would take the matter up with the defendant, and he did take it up with the defendant and the defendant refused to pay for the same as extra work, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover."

No objection is made to instruction 3. Objection is made, however, to instruction 2, because it "fails to inform the jury that the consent of the owner was necessary before the architect could order extra work. Moreover, under the contract in this case, it was not for the subcontractor, Turner, to decide what was extra work. It was provided by the contract and specifications that the decision of the architect, Munden, should be final and binding. Munden decided that the excavation of the cellar to the depth shown in the drawings was not extra work."

[7] The two instructions should be read together, as they present the two opposing theories of the plaintiff and the defendant, and when so read, we do not think they are amenable to the objection raised. Under the contract between the defendant and the general contractors, it was the province of the architect to decide whether work was or was not extra, and the owner's consent to such decision was given when he signed the contract.

[8] The trial court committed no error in refusing instructions II, III, and IV tendered by the defendant, as the instructions already given by the court sufficiently instructed the jury on the points covered by the rejected instructions. It is said in the petition for the writ of error (and authorities are cited to support the statement) that—

"A party has a right to have his instructions given in his own language, provided there are facts in evidence to support them, that they contain a correct statement of the law, are not vague, irrelevant, obscure, ambiguous, or calculated to mislead."

This statement should always be accompanied by the further statement, "provided the jury has not already been sufficiently instructed on the subject." The trial court may discard all instructions tendered and give instructions of its own, and if they correctly state the law, cover all the phases of the case presented by the evidence, and fairly submit the case to the jury without obscurity or ambiguity, no one can complain. E. I. Du Pont, etc., Co. v. Sneed's Adm'r, 97 S. E. 812. This practice will often relieve the difficulties arising out of a multitude of instructions.

Instruction V, tendered by the defendant, was properly refused because it was misleading. The plaintiff was not claiming by virtue of the contract he had made with the general contractors at the time his bid was made, but by a subsequent contract alleged to have been made with the architect as the agent of the owner. The instruction tendered dealt with the original letting only, and made no reference to any subsequent agreement between the parties. Its tendency was to lead the jury to believe that they should find for the defendant, notwithstanding a subsequent agreement, if the plaintiff failed to consult the architect as to the meaning of certain terms before submitting his bid.

[9] Instruction VI tendered by the defendant was also properly refused, as the latter part of the instruction exempted the defendant from liability unless the jury "further believe from the evidence that Rosenberg expressly agreed with said Turner to pay for said excavation as an extra." The jury may have been misled by the use of the word "expressly." One of the claims of the plaintiff was that he stopped work as soon as he struck rock and refused to proceed further unless he was paid extra for the blasting, and that the architect thereafter directed him to proceed with the excavating and to keep a separate account of the costs thereof, thereby creating a contract by implication. There was conflict in the evidence as to whether there was an express contract to pay extra for the work, but if there was a contract by implication it was as binding on the defendant as if it had been expressed in words, and this view of the case should not have been excluded from the jury.

For the reasons hereinbefore stated, the judgment of the hustings court is affirmed. Affirmed.

SIMS, J., concurs in the foregoing opinion, except in its conclusion as to the usual and general meaning of the word "excavate," as used in building contracts and as used in the case in judgment.

PRENTIS, J., concurs in the result.

(177 N. C. 543)

STATE v. PITTS. (No. 345.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 9, 1919.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW §407(2) — EVIDENCE — ADMISSION — ACCUSATION OF CRIME IN DEFENDANT'S PRESENCE—SILENCE.

In a prosecution for violation of the intoxicating liquor law, it was competent to show that two parties, while driving away from defendant's shop, stated to witness in defendant's hearing that they had just bought intoxicating liquor from defendant which they then had in their possession, and that defendant remained silent under the accusation, since defendant had full and fair opportunity to answer the accusation.

2. CRIMINAL LAW §408, 781(1)—EVIDENCE — ACCUSATION OF CRIME—CONFESSION BY SILENCE WHEN ACCUSED—INSTRUCTIONS.

Evidence of a witness that parties in defendant's presence stated defendant had illegally sold intoxicating liquors to them, and that defendant remained silent, should be received cautiously, and the jury should be carefully instructed to disregard it, if they ultimately find that any of the elements essential to make it competent are missing.

3. WITNESSES §52(7) — EVIDENCE OF DEFENDANT'S WIFE AS TO LIQUOR KEPT ON PREMISES—COMPETENCY.

Evidence of the wife of defendant accused of violation of the law against sale of intoxicating liquors as to officers having been to their place three times that fall, and as to the jugs and kegs and liquor kept on the place, and as to its secret hiding places, was competent.

4. CRIMINAL LAW §696(6) — MOTION TO STRIKE TESTIMONY—OBJECTIONS MADE TOO LATE.

In a prosecution for the sale of intoxicating liquors, it was not error to refuse to strike out testimony, where defendant's objections thereto came too late.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Lane, Judge.

Ed. Pitts was convicted of violation of the law relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. T. Wilson, of Winston-Salem, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PER CURIAM. The indictment, with four counts, was for selling liquor, for keeping liquor in defendant's possession for sale, for receiving more than one quart of liquor within a period of 15 days, and for shipping or transporting from places within and places without this state to persons in this state, in one package and at one time, more than one quart of spirituous and vinous liquor and intoxicating bitters, and more than five gallons of malt liquors, it being transported and delivered in one package, which was contained in more than one receptacle. The defendant was convicted, and from the judgment upon the verdict, having excepted, he appealed.

There was evidence fully sufficient and very convincing to support the verdict of guilty, and there is no ground of complaint on that score.

[1] It was competent to show by the witness Geo. W. Flynt that Sam Johnson and a negro, who were in a buggy driving away from defendant's shop, stated to him, in the presence and hearing of the defendant, that they had just bought from the defendant the liquor which they then had in their possession, and that the defendant said nothing when this accusation of selling liquor was made against him, but remained silent and mute. Sam Johnson had two pints, for which he gave $2 a pint, and the negro one pint, for which he gave $2, and this was stated in the hearing of the defendant, and he again made no reply to the charge, but stood mute. Objection was taken to this evidence, but it was undoubtedly competent, as an innocent man similarly situated would naturally speak in denial; the charge of his guilt being direct and explicit, and calling for a denial if he was innocent. He also had full and fair opportunity to answer the accusation. The case is therefore well within the rule as stated in State v. Jackson, 150 N. C. 831, 64 S. E. 376. It was said in State v. Suggs, 89 N. C. 530 (approved and cited in State v. Walton, 172 N. C. 931, 90 S. E. 518):

"A declaration in the presence of a party to a cause becomes evidence, as showing that the party, on hearing such a statement, did not deny its truth; for, if he is silent when he ought to have denied, there is a presumption of his acquiescence. And where a statement is made, either to a man or within his hearing, that he was concerned in the commission of a crime, to which he makes no reply, the natural inference is that the imputation is well founded, or he would have repelled it."

[2] This kind of evidence is admitted under the maxim that he who is silent when he is called upon to speak in the protection of his interests, and has the opportunity of doing so, is to be taken as assenting to what is said by another in his presence and hearing. 2 Taylor on Evidence (Am. notes by Chamberlayne) p. 527; State v. Jackson, supra; State v. Walton, supra. Such evidence should be received cautiously, and while the judge may have held it to be prima facie admissible on the facts as they appeared to him, the jury should be carefully instructed in regard to it, and directed to disregard it, if they ultimately find that any of the essential elements which are required to make it competent, and which should be explained to the jury, are missing. State v. Walton, supra; State v. Booker, 68 W. Va. 8, 69 S. E. 295. Defendant's conduct should be free and voluntary, and not influenced by duress or promises held out to him, as in the case of other confessions or admissions.

[3, 4] The remaining exceptions are without any merit. Most of the questions to which objection was taken were answered favorably to the defendant, or, at least, in a way that did not prejudice him, and the others, if not competent, were harmless. The evidence of Mrs. Ed. Pitts, to which the defendant objected, was competent, when it is considered in connection with the other parts of her testimony, and at least so upon the charge of keeping liquor for sale. Besides, one of the three objections came too late, and it was discretionary with the judge whether he would strike out the testimony. The answers to the other objections were harmless, if not favorable to defendants. The last question was not answered. In re Smith's Will, 163 N. C. 464, 79 S. E. 977; Schas v. Insurance Co., 170 N. C. at page 421, 87 S. E. 222, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 679. None of these rulings was prejudicial, and therefore they cannot be assigned as error. State v. Shoemaker, 101 N. C. 690, 8 S. E. 332; State v. Eller, 104 N. C. 853, 10 S. E. 313; State v. Anderson, 92 N. C. 732; State v. De Graff, 113 N. C. 688, 18 S. E. 507.

We cannot find in the record any cause to reverse the judgment and grant a new trial. No error.

BRISTOL GROCERY CO. v. BAILS et al.
(No. 353.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 9, 1919.)

1. EXEMPTIONS — 19 — RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN — EFFECT OF STATUTE.

Revisal 1905, § 2118, relating to filing certificates and displaying the name of a married woman at the place of business when she is a partner, while fixing as a penalty for its violation that the married woman shall be deemed a free trader and liable for her debts, does not deprive her of her rights to personal property exemption as against execution, and noncompliance therewith has no effect on such right.

2. EXEMPTIONS — 104 — RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN — FORFEITURE.

A married woman's right to a personal property exemption guaranteed by Const. art. 10, § 1, is not forfeited even by a fraudulent conveyance.

3. EXEMPTIONS — 19 — RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN — PARTNERS.

A married woman who is a partner with her husband in a mercantile business, and therefore jointly and severally liable with him under Laws 1911, c. 109, is entitled to her personal property exemption as against execution, under Const. art. 10, § 1, exempting the personal property of any resident of the state to the value of $500.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ashe County; Lane, Judge.

Action by the Bristol Grocery Company against W. Bails and others. From a judgment allowing a personal property exemption, plaintiff appeals. No error.

The defendant W. Bails was a general merchant and purchased goods from the plaintiffs. Later W. Bails and his wife, Essie Lee Bails, made an assignment for benefit of creditors, alleging that they were partners in the mercantile business and each of them claiming their personal property exemption. The plaintiffs brought an action attacking the deed of assignment for fraud on the part of W. Bails in the purchase of the goods and contesting the right of Essie Lee Bails to exemption, and charging that J. E. Shumate was a partner, and asking judgment against him. The jury found as a fact that she was a partner in the business, and that J. E. Shumate was not. Judgment upon the verdict allowing the personal property exemption to the wife, and appeal by the plaintiffs.

J. B. Council and G. L. Park, both of Jefferson, for appellant.

T. C. Bowle, of Jefferson, and R. A. Dough-ton, of Sparta, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. The only point presented in the argument in this court was as to the correctness of the judgment permitting Essie Lee Bails to have her personal property exemption allotted.

The right to the homestead and personal exemption is guaranteed to "every resident" by the Constitution. The liability of the wife on her contracts has been settled ever since the statute which provided:

"Every married woman shall be authorized to contract and deal so as to affect her real and personal property in the same manner and with the same effect as if she were unmarried." Chapter 109, Laws 1911.

See Lipinsky v. Revell, 167 N. C. 508, 83 S. E. 820; Bowen v. Daugherty, 168 N. C. 244, 84 S. E. 265, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 1161; Royal v. Southerland, 168 N. C. 406, 407, 84 S. E. 708, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 623; Warren v. Dail, 170 N. C. 410, 87 S. E. 126; Thrash v. Ould, 172 N. C. 730, 90 S. E. 915.

The wife, therefore, has been held, ever since, liable jointly and severally whenever a partner or a surety. There is no question arising here between husband and wife as to the validity of the contract of partnership as between them under Rev. § 2107, nor as to title derived from them. But they each admit the partnership and assent to the other asserting the claim to exemption as a partner. Scott v. Kenan, 94 N. C. 300; Richardson v. Redd, 118 N. C. 877, 24 S. E. 420. The jury have found as a fact that such partnership existed, and the Constitution decrees (article 10, § 1) that "the personal property of any resident of this state, to the value of five hundred dollars" shall be exempt from execution.

It was held even prior to the Martin Act of 1911 that on a judgment against the wife she is entitled to her personal property exemption. Harvey v. Johnson, 133 N. C. 353, 45 S. E. 644. There are other parts of that decision which do not obtain since the passage of the Martin Act.

[1, 2] The plaintiffs contend that Essie Lee Balls had failed to comply with Rev. § 2118, and chapter 77, Laws 1913, as to filing a certificate with the clerk of the superior court and displaying her name at the place of business, and therefore that she could not be a partner in the business, and hence not entitled to her legal exemption. Rev. § 2118, fixes as a penalty for the violation of that section that the married woman shall be deemed a free trader and shall be liable for her debts, but does not attempt to deprive her of her rights to her personal property exemption. Indeed, such right to an exemption, being guaranteed by the Constitution, is not forfeited even by a fraudulent conveyance. Crummen v. Bennet, 68 N. C. 494; Arnold v. Estis, 92 N. C. 162; Rankin v. Shaw, 94 N. C. 405; Dorch v. Benton, 98 N. C. 190, 3 S. E. 638, 2 Am. St. Rep. 331; Rose v. Bryan, 157 N. C. 173, 72 S. E. 960. Stone v. McLamb, 153 N. C. 378, 69 S. E. 281, holding a married woman liable as a free trader formerly in such cases, is applicable to all married women under the Martin Act, but does not deprive her of her constitutional exemption.

[3] On the findings of the jury, Essie Lee Balls was a partner in the business, was liable for all its debts, and is entitled to her constitutional exemptions against an execution upon the judgment rendered against her. No error.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨928(1)—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS—CORRECTNESS OF CHARGE.

Where there is no exception to the charge, and charge is not set forth in the record, the court on appeal will assume that it was correct in every respect and satisfactory to appellant.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨930(2)—PRESUMPTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

Jury will be presumed to have followed instructions.

3. TRIAL ⇨343—VERDICT—CONSTRUCTION.

Verdict will be construed in the light of the evidence and what presumably was the charge.

Objection to exclusion of question addressed to witness cannot be sustained on appeal, where answer witness would have given does not appear.

6. WITNESSES ⇨240(6)—LEADING QUESTION—INSTRUCTIONS BY THIRD PARTY.

In action involving issue of whether there was a usurious agreement between plaintiff bank and defendant maker of notes, requiring defendant to maintain 20 per cent. of indebtedness on deposit, question, "Did * * * instruct you to maintain a balance of 20 per cent. of the indebtedness of (defendant) with (plaintiff) bank," held leading.

7. WITNESSES ⇨240(2)—LEADING QUESTIONS—DISCRETION.

Whether leading question should be excluded was discretionary with court.

8. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1058(2)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

Exclusion of question was harmless, where witness would have testified to fact previously testified to without objection, and which was not seriously contested.

9. EVIDENCE ⇨242(1) — DECLARATIONS — AGENT—SCOPE OF AUTHORITY.

Evidence as to agent's declaration as against principal is competent, where made about matters within the scope of his authority, and relates to the transaction in which he was then engaged on behalf of principal.

10. EVIDENCE ⇨244(2) — DECLARATIONS — CORPORATE OFFICERS.

Evidence of declarations of president of corporation is competent to bind corporation; the president being an agent of the corporation.

11. WITNESSES ⇨142—COMPETENCY—TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEASED.

In bank's action against defendant corporation, stockholder and officer of bank could testify as to declarations made by deceased president of defendant, not being a party to action or claiming through or under a party, and not testifying against representative of deceased person, or against any person deriving his interest through such person, nor as to personal transaction or communication between witness and a deceased, under Revisal 1905, § 1631.

Appeal from Superior Court, Durham County; Devin, Judge.

Action by the Fidelity Bank against the Wysong & Miles Company, Incorporated. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

The plaintiff alleged that the defendant corporation is indebted to it in the sum of $13,320, with interest as stated, being the balance due on the three notes, one of $1,000, another of $8,000, and the remaining one of $4,500, due 90 days after their respective dates, and given by defendant to it, for money loaned, in the months of March and April, 1918.

The defendant denied that any money had been loaned, but admitted the execution of the three notes, and alleged, as a counterclaim, that they had an agreement, under which it was to borrow of the plaintiff a large sum of money from time to time, but upon the condition, and as a part of the consideration for the loans, that the defendant should keep on deposit with the plaintiff bank a sum of money equal to 20 per cent. of the total amount of the loan as made to it, which should not be subject to check; or, in other words, the defendant borrowed the money and gave its three notes for the full amount of the loan, but received twenty per cent. less than the amount of it or the same per cent. less than the face value of the notes.

Defendant further alleged that it borrowed other money from the plaintiff bank, under a similar agreement as to the keeping of the 20 per cent. of each loan on deposit with the bank, so that, in all, the defendant had borrowed, and executed its notes for, $45,000, and had received only $36,000 thereon, when the plaintiff applied the 20 per cent. kept on deposit under the agreement, and amounting then to $3,700, to the indebtedness of the defendant; that during the entire course of these transactions, it further alleges, the interest on the respective loans, or the notes given therefor, was regularly paid by defendant at the rate of 6 per cent., and that "the requirement on the part of the plaintiff that the defendant should keep on deposit with the plaintiff 20 per cent. of the amounts represented by the said notes was simply a scheme by which the plaintiff charged, reserved, and collected a greater rate of interest than that allowed by law;" that under this scheme, which was devised for the purpose of exacting and receiving excessive and unlawful interest, under the guise of a fair and valid transaction, the defendant had paid to the plaintiff, and the latter has received, as usury, the sum of $5,232.50, and for this amount it demands judgment.

The plaintiff answered to the counterclaim and denied that it had received any excessive or unlawful interest from the defendant, or that it had agreed to do so, or to enter into any scheme or device for the purpose of reserving usurious interest in any form or manner, and specially that it required a deposit to be kept by defendant in its bank of 20 per cent. of the loans, or that it charged, reserved, or received interest, either directly or indirectly, on any amount which was really larger than that which was actually loaned. The defendant circumstantially denied all of the averments of the counterclaim as to the alleged usury.

There was evidence that when 20 per cent. of a discounted loan is kept on deposit, it amounts to $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the original indebtedness.

O. C. Wysong was former president of the defendant company. He is now dead.

Defendant asked Guy Branson, its own witness, this question:

"Did Mr. Wysong, president of this company, while you were there, ever instruct you to maintain a balance of 20 per cent. of the indebtedness of the Wysong & Miles Company with the Fidelity Bank? (Objection by plaintiff. Objection sustained, and defendant excepted.)

"By the Court: Any declaration by the deceased president is incompetent and hearsay."

J. F. Wiley, witness of plaintiff, testified that he was a stockholder and an active officer, as cashier, of the plaintiff bank at Durham, N. C.; that he had a conversation with Mr. Wysong, and agreed to refer the defendant's application for a loan to the directors of the plaintiff bank, if defendant would send a statement of its financial condition, and would give a satisfactory reference, and that after that the loan was made. The witness then testified that the balance of defendant's account with the bank varied, sometimes considerably below the 20 per cent. level, and at other times above it; in July it dropped to $899, and at other times it was as low as $1,000, $1,200, $1,400, and $1,600, the defendant having the right to check on the deposit at will. This witness stated that the $3,700 was credited on defendant's note under its instructions, given by Mr. Wysong, who was its president. The latter evidence was objected to by defendant, and the objection was overruled. Defendant excepted. He then further testified that he had never heard of any usury agreement until this suit was brought, and that defendant ratified what was done by the plaintiff as to the $3,700 by giving the note for $1,300, which was the balance. The witness further testified as follows:

"The account varied every day because they checked on us. There was nothing unusual about the account. The account has been practically dead since the time of the application of the $3,700, May 6, 1914. The final statement shows a balance of $33.02. I have never objected to their drawing that out, and did not know it was in the bank until we worked up this statement. * * * I have made demand for payment of the notes now due for $4,500, $1,000, and $7,820, total $13,320. Mr. Wysong did not sign these notes, and I am asserting no claim against his estate. I am simply pressing these notes. They never made any suggestion of usury. We were requested to renew these notes, but refused. (Plaintiff here offers three notes in evidence as follows: April 6, 1918, $4,450; March 6, 1918, $1,000; March 29, 1918, $7,820."

Cross-examined, he said:

"Mr. Wysong was indorser on the first notes, and I think on all the notes given up to the time of his death. I think he died last January. Up until the time Mr. Wysong died he was indorser on these notes."

He did not indorse those now sued on.

Several letters of a correspondence between the parties were introduced by the defendant, the first letter, dated January 10, 1912, asking for "a line of credit," and proposing to keep a 20 per cent. balance of all discounted papers in the bank. This could not be answered, as Mr. Wiley, cashier of plaintiff bank, was about to leave Durham for a business trip, and he so wrote to defendant in a letter dated January 10, 1912. In the third letter, dated May 12, 1912, the defendant refers to it having kept such a balance in another Durham bank, where it had an account, and stated that it was favorable to that bank, as it averaged between $7\frac{1}{4}$ and $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest on the loans. This letter was answered by the plaintiff on January 24, 1912, in which it said:

"We beg to say that the matter mentioned in your letter has been considered, and it looks like we can accommodate you. If convenient, come down some day and talk it over, and in that way we can understand each other much better than by attempting to do so by correspondence."

The other letters written in 1912 refer merely to a loan of $5,000. A letter of May 6, 1914, refers to the application of the $3,700 to the note in the bank, which would leave a balance of $33.02. The letter of May 6, 1914, also stated that Mr. Vaughn, who represented the defendant and was then in Durham, had assented to the suggested application of the $3,700, or rather had said it was the proper thing to do. The remaining letter, dated May 23, 1917, asked for a detailed statement of defendant's account with the plaintiff, so that it will show the balance on deposit subject to check; a list of defendant's notes discounted by the plaintiff, with face value dates, and maturity of the same, giving as a reason for making the request that defendant had just employed a new auditor, who would post and balance its books for the closing fiscal year.

The jury under the evidence (and the charge of the court, which is not in the record), rendered the following verdict:

"(1) Did the plaintiff knowingly take, receive, reserve, or charge a greater rate of interest than 6 per cent. per annum on the notes set up in the complaint, or any notes of which the said notes set up in the complaint are renewals, as alleged in the answer? Answer: No.

"(2) What amount, if any, is the defendant entitled to recover of the plaintiff on the counterclaim set up in the answer? No answer.

"(3) What amount, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover of the defendant? No answer."

Judgment was entered upon the verdict for the plaintiff, and an appeal taken by the defendant.

Jerome & Scales, of Greensboro, for appellant.

Bryant & Brogden and Fuller, Reade & Fuller, all of Durham, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-3] The exceptions in this case, as will appear by reference to our statement of it, relate chiefly to the admission and exclusion of testimony. There is no exception to the charge, which is not set forth in the record, and we must therefore assume that it was correct in every respect, and perfectly satisfactory to the appellant. Muse v. Motor Co., 175 N. C. 466, 95 S. E. 900. We make brief reference to this fact because it makes it unnecessary for us to decide whether the transaction between the parties was usurious on its face, or tainted per se with usury, if it were such as the defendant contends that it was, or if, in other words, the defendant has established his claim that the 20 per cent. of the discounted notes was left in the bank by it, and held by the bank, without being subject to defendant's check, under an express agreement of the parties to that effect. As the charge is presumed to have been correct, we must conclude that the judge instructed the jury as to all phases of the case, and that they found under the evidence and charge, either that there was no such agreement, or, if there was such an agreement, the jury were instructed that it was not usurious on its face, and therefore they must find whether there was any actual intent to charge unlawful interest, and that under the last instruction they did find that there was no such intent. If they had found that there was an agreement, as claimed by the defendant, and the judge charged that it was usurious in law, they could not have answered the first issue, "No," if they had followed the judge's instructions, which we assume that they did. So that, upon a fair and proper construction of the verdict, which should be read in the light of the evidence and what presumably was the charge (Southerland v. Brown, 176 N. C. 187, 96 S. E. 946; Jones v. Railroad, 176 N. C. 260, 97 S. E. 48), they either found that there was no such agreement, or that there was no intent to violate the statute.

[4] We are of the opinion, though, that the jury found there was no agreement reserving unlawful interest, which, of course, would cut the defendant's case up by the roots, as the existence of such an unlawful agreement is the basic fact of his whole contention. In any aspect of the case, therefore, the question as to whether there was a transaction infected with usury is not before us, and will not be hereafter, unless there was some substantial error in the rulings upon the evidence, which we now proceed to consider, but as preliminary to this discussion, we may state tentatively, and without being committed to them, a few general principles of the law concerning the main question, and as they are found in books. The test of usury in a contract is whether it would, if performed, result in securing a greater rate of profit on the loan than is allowed by law. To sustain the defense of usury, there must be satisfactory proof of some unlawful gain or advantage secured by the creditor. The form of the agreement is immaterial, since any shift or device by which illegal interest is arranged to be received or paid is usurious. As above stated, it is not essential to usury that the contract to pay illegal interest should be absolute; the payment of the illegal interest may depend upon the happening of some contingent event, provided the principal is not put at hazard. Neither is it at all necessary that the parties shall have designated the usurious compensation as interest eo nomine. If the money, property, or other thing of value agreed upon is intended as compensation for the use of the principal sum, it is, as a matter of law, interest. Thus it has been held that an agreement for unlawful interest may, it seems, be inferred from an unexplained retention by the lender of a portion of the loan, the whole amount of which bears interest at the highest rate. Webb on Usury, § 28, and notes; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, p. 925, citing Cummins v. Wire, 6 N. J. Eq. 73; Andrews v. Poe, 30 Md. 485; MacKenzie v. Garnett, 78 Ga. 251; Uhlfelder v. Carter, 64 Ala. 527; Vilas v. McBride, 62 Hun, 324, 17 N. Y. Supp. 171. And in another case it was said that, where a person went to obtain discount at a bank voluntarily leaves a sum of money on deposit, with the expectation that he will be thus enabled to obtain discount more readily, but without any understanding to not withdraw his money at any time, there is no usury. Appleton v. Fiske, 8 Allen (Mass.) 201.

The following illustrations have been given: Where, in a state in which the legal rate of interest is 10 per cent., a municipal corporation attempts to satisfy a judgment against it by issuing warrants at the rate of $1 in warrants for every 75 cents of the judgment, such warrants are void for usury. Clark v. Des Moines, 19 Iowa, 199, 87 Am. Dec. 423. In determining whether usury exists in any particular case, the proper inquiry is not necessarily whether the borrower is to pay for the use or forbearance, but what is the lender to receive for the loan or forbearance of his money? Where the entire gain of the lender is derived from the borrower, the profit to the former and the cost to the latter are commensurate; but where there are intervening sources of profit to the lender or expense to the borrower, the proposition stated in the last preceding sentence may have application. Webb on Usury, p. 30, and notes.

In Ehringhaus v. Ford, 25 N. C. 522, where a bank of this state agreed to lend to an individual notes of a Virginia bank, which were at a depreciation in the market, below both specie and the notes of the bank of this state, and the borrower was to give his note at 90 days, to be discounted by the bank, and to be paid in specie or in the notes of the bank making the loan, it was held that the note given in pursuance of this agreement was void for usury, though the borrower stated at the time that he could make the Virginia notes answer his purpose in the payment of his debts to another.

Usury consists in the unlawful gain, beyond the rate of 6 per cent., taken or reserved by the lender, and not in the actual or contingent loss sustained by the borrower. The proper subject of inquiry is, what the lender is to receive, and not always what the borrower is to pay, for the forbearance. It is generally true that, to constitute usury, there must be an agreement between the lender and the borrower by which the latter pays or promises to pay and the former knowingly receives or secures a higher rate of interest than is allowed by the statute. Webb on Usury, p. 30, § 30. As to the practice and procedure, it has been said that in all cases the purpose should be to ascertain the intention of the parties. The intent may be construed by the law upon the face of the usurious contract, as we have clearly shown, or it may be proved as a fact. Since, therefore, the question of usury may depend sometimes upon the purpose and intent of the parties, it follows that usury may be a question of law, or fact, or a mixed question of both law and fact. There cannot be usury without facts; and those facts, which may include the actual intent, when they are controverted, must be tried and ascertained by the jury. Whether upon those facts the transaction be usurious is a question of law which addresses itself alone to the court. But the question of unlawful interest is commonly one for the jury, where it does not follow as a clear deduction from undisputed facts, or is not imputed by the mere construction by the court of a written instrument, unaided by extrinsic evidence, when it becomes a question of law to be determined by the court. The latter is the case where the contract on its face and by its own terms per se imports usury. Webb on Usury, § 434; Lynchburg v. Norvell, 20 Grat. (Va.) 601; Smith v. Hathorn, 88 N. Y. 211;

Walker v. Bank of Washington, 44 U. S. (3 How.) 62, 11 L. Ed. 494; Levy v. Gadsby, 3 Cranch, 80, 2 L. Ed. 404; Banning v. Hall, 70 Minn. 89, 72 N. W. 817; Woolsey v. Jones, 84 Ala. 88, 4 South. 190. But we need not decide these questions, as they are not directly involved, and merely refer to them incidentally, as they serve to throw some light upon the other questions which are presented for decision. They will all be found fully treated in Webb on Usury, §§ 27 to 41, pp. 27 to 31, and sections 454, 455, pp. 500, 501, and cases in the notes. See, also, Grant v. Morris, 81 N. C. 150; Burwell v. Burgwyn, 100 N. C. 389, 6 S. E. 409; Bennett v. Best, 142 N. C. 168, 55 S. E. 84; Yarborough v. Hughes, 139 N. C. 199, 51 S. E. 904; Miller v. Insurance Co., 118 N. C. 612, 24 S. E. 484, 54 Am. St. Rep. 741; Meroney v. B. & L. Asso., 116 N. C. 882, 21 S. E. 924, 47 Am. St. Rep. 841; Arrington v. Goodrich, 95 N. C. 462. This brings us to the rulings on evidence.

[5-7] First. The objection based upon the exclusion of the question addressed to the witness Guy Branson as to instructions from Mr. Wysong cannot be sustained for several reasons, one of which is that it does not appear what answer he would have given. Jenkins v. Long, 170 N. C. 269, 87 S. E. 47; Rawls v. Railroad Co., 172 N. C. 211, 90 S. E. 116; Smith v. Commissioners, 176 N. C. 466, 97 S. E. 378. He might have answered, "No," in which case the defendant would have proved nothing. If we should hold this ruling to be error, and reverse, when the witness is called at the next trial, he may answer, "No," and we will have been at great pains to decide a matter utterly immaterial. The question also was leading, and it was discretionary with the court whether it should be excluded. State v. Price, 158 N. C. 641, 74 S. E. 587; McKeel v. Holloman, 163 N. C. 132, 79 S. E. 445; State v. Williams, 168 N. C. 191, 83 S. E. 714.

[8] The defendant's witness J. R. Brown testified four times, and without objection, that a 20 per cent. deposit was required at all times, though we do not place our decision on this ground. It merely goes to show that defendant was not materially harmed, even if the ruling was technically erroneous. The witness J. R. Brown testified at least three times, under cross-examination, to the instructions from Wysong as to the 20 per cent. deposit without any protest from the plaintiff. It would seem, therefore, that the fact was not seriously contested, and, if so, no real harm was done by the judge's ruling (Weathersbee v. Goodwin, 175 N. C. 234, 95 S. E. 491), and we would be slow to reverse, unless it was reasonably clear that the ruling was prejudicial (Weathersbee Case, supra; State v. Davis, 175 N. C. 723, 729, 95 S. E. 48; Goins v. Indian Tr. School, 169 N. C. 737, 86 S. E. 629; Elliott v. Smith, 173

N. C. 265, 91 S. E. 954; Mitchell v. Bottling Co., 174 N. C. 771, 93 S. E. 850).

We need not, therefore, consider whether the order given by Wysong to the witnesses J. R. Brown and Guy Branson, and testified to by them, should be regarded as a self-serving declaration by Wysong, as contended by the plaintiff. They swore to the fact of retaining the 20 per cent., and it is claimed by defendant to be therefore competent for them to state that it was done under an order given at the same time, which was pars rei gestae as qualifying or explaining their act (Jones on Ev. § 346); but however this may be, the result will be the same, in the view we take of the case.

[9-11] Second. As to the testimony of John F. Wiley, plaintiff's cashier, relating to conversations with O. C. Wysong, defendant's former president, who is dead: A corporation can act only through its agents, and it is competent to prove the agent's declaration as against the principal, when it was made about matters within the scope of his authority and relates to the transaction in which he was then engaged on behalf of the principal. Gwaltney v. Assurance Society, 132 N. C. p. 925, 44 S. E. 659; Walker v. Cooper, 159 N. C. 536, 75 S. E. 727; Molyneux v. Huey, 81 N. C. 107; Roberts v. Railroad, 109 N. C. 670, 14 S. E. 106; Sprague v. Bond, 113 N. C. pp. 551, 557, 18 S. E. 701. Mr. Wysong was acting as defendant's agent throughout the transaction, and was its leading officer. The evidence, therefore, falls within the principle just stated. But the defendant's objection is mainly founded upon another ground, that the conversations between the two officers, one of them, Mr. Wysong, the defendant's agent, being dead, is forbidden by Revisal 1905, § 1631. We do not think so. A slight examination of the clear and excellent analysis of that section (Code of 1883, § 589), made by the present Chief Justice in Bunn v. Todd, 107 N. C. 266, 11 S. E. 1043, will show that no such case is presented as will exclude Jno. F. Wiley as a witness, or render his testimony incompetent. Mr. Wiley is not a party to the action, nor did he claim through or under any one who is a party. He did not testify in behalf of himself or in behalf of any party succeeding to his title, for he had none, but solely as a witness for the plaintiff; nor did he testify against the representative of a deceased person, or against any person deriving his interest through such person, nor as to any personal transaction or communication between the witness and the person since deceased, whose representative is a party to the action. The exception to this rule of exclusion stated in Bunn v. Todd, supra, does not apply to the facts of this case. That the suit must be prosecuted against the representative of a deceased person, which is the capital requirement of the section, has no application here, as this is not that kind of a suit, there being no representative of a deceased person as defendant, or even as plaintiff. There is nothing but the bare fact that Mr. Wiley had an interest as stockholder in the plaintiff bank and was one of its officers, and Mr. Wysong had an interest in the defendant corporation and was one of its officers. But this does not bring the testimony admitted by the court within the prohibition of section 1631. It may be that the section should be broadened so as to include such a case, but that must be done by legislation and not by our construction. If it would be wise and fair for this change to be made, the Legislature, which declares the policy of the state, must say so, as it makes the law and we merely declare what it is. This case is not within the spirit of the section, and certainly not within its letter. Bunn v. Todd, supra, has frequently been approved since it was decided, the two most recent cases which expressly indorse its statement of the rule and apply it being Brown v. Adams, 174 N. C. 490, 93 S. E. 989, L. R. A. 1918C, 911, and Pope v. Pope, 176 N. C. 283, 96 S. E. 1034. Mr. Wysong was not a party to the last notes of the series of renewals, which are now sued on, nor is his estate sought to be charged with any liability in this action through his personal or legal representatives. As no claim was being or could be asserted in this action against the estate of Mr. Wysong or his representatives, and as the defendant derived no title, or interest through or under him, Mr. Wiley's testimony did not relate to such a personal transaction or communication with a deceased person, as is forbidden by section 1631 of the Revisal. Roberts v. Railroad, 109 N. C. 670, 14 S. E. 106; Sprague v. Bond, 113 N. C. pp. 551, 557, 18 S. E. 701; Gwaltney v. Assurance Society, 132 N. C. 925, 44 S. E. 659, supra. Wysong's estate will not be affected in law by the event of this action, although he may have been an indorser on some of the renewals given prior to the notes in suit, and, if he had such a vague, indirect, and eventual interest, the suit is not against Mr. Wysong's representatives, and the witness was not, therefore, testifying against the latter within the meaning of the statute, but only against the defendant, which is an incorporated company.

We do not see how Mr. Wysong derived any interest in this suit under the defendant, as was argued; and, if he had any personal interest in the transaction, it is not represented by his administrator in this action.

There are other answers to the contention, which need not be stated.

It results that there is no error in the record, and it must be so certified.

No error.

BOWEN PIANO CO. v. NEWELL et ux.
(No. 356.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 9, 1919.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶93—MATTERS REVIEWABLE—REFUSAL TO DISMISS ACTION.

An appeal does not lie from the refusal to dismiss an action under Revisal 1908, § 587.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶93—MATTERS REVIEWABLE—REFUSAL TO REMOVE BECAUSE OF WRONG VENUE.

An appeal lies from the refusal to remove because of a wrong venue under Revisal 1908, § 587.

3. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT ¶55—GROUNDS—VENUE.

Where court has general jurisdiction of cause of action, motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction will not reach objection based on venue.

4. COURTS ¶183—JURISDICTION OF COUNTY COURT—CIVIL ACTIONS.

The county court has general jurisdiction of actions to recover debts secured by conditional sale notes and to recover possession of the property described therein for purpose of sale.

5. VENUE ¶15—INCIDENTAL RELIEF—RECOVERY OF PERSONAL PROPERTY AS INCIDENT TO SUIT.

In an action to recover a debt secured by a conditional sale note, and to recover the personal property described therein for the purpose of sale, the recovery of the personal property not being the chief relief demanded, the action need not be brought in the county wherein the property is located, but may properly be brought in the county of plaintiff's residence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Bryson, Judge.

Action by the Bowen Piano Company against J. J. Newell and S. C. Newell, his wife, doing business under the firm name and style of Newell & Newell. Defendants' motion to dismiss was denied, the denial affirmed on appeal to the superior court, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This action was brought to recover a debt secured by a conditional sale note. The plaintiff, who lives in Forsyth, also sought to recover possession of the personal property—one piano, described in the note, which was situated in Lee county. Plaintiff demands possession of the piano and for an order to sell the same and apply the proceeds of the sale to the payment of the note sued on.

Defendants are residents of Lee county, where, as defendants allege, the contract was made. Plaintiff lives in Forsyth county, where this action was commenced and is pending. Defendants, in apt time, and in writing, moved to dismiss the action because the court had no jurisdiction to try the case.

This motion was overruled and defendants excepted. They then asked, in writing, that the case be removed to the superior court, so that the trial can be held in the proper county, as provided by statute. This request was also denied, and they again excepted.

The facts found by Judge Starbuck as to the motions were as follows:

"The plaintiff is, and was at the time of beginning this action, a resident of Forsyth county. The piano described in the complaint is, and was at the time of beginning his action, at the home of the defendants in Lee county, and the defendants are now, and were then, residents of Lee county. The court is of opinion, under sections 2 (b), 9, and 17 of the acts creating the Forsyth county court (chapter 520, Public Local Laws of North Carolina, Session 1915), that actions falling within the provisions of civil procedure relating to venue are removable from said court to the superior courts of other counties, but upon inspection of the complaint the court considers that the plaintiff's cause of action is for the recovery of the amount alleged to be due by the defendants to the plaintiff on the note set out in the complaint, and that the recovery of possession of the piano is incidental thereto for the purpose of foreclosure and application of so much of the proceeds as may be necessary to the satisfaction of the judgment on the note. It is therefore ordered that the motion to dismiss be denied, and that the motion to remove be denied."

In the superior court the findings of fact by Judge Starbuck were approved and adopted as those of the latter court, which affirmed the ruling of the county court, and refused to dismiss the action or to remove it. Defendants again excepted and appealed.

Fred S. Hutchins and Louis M. Swink, both of Winston-Salem, for appellants.

Frank T. Baldwin, of Winston-Salem, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. [1-4] While, as a general rule, an appeal does not lie from the refusal to dismiss an action (Pell's Anno. Revisal, vol. 1, p. 313, c. 12, § 587, where many of the cases are collected), it does lie from a refusal to remove because of a wrong venue (Pell's Revisal, vol. 1, p. 309, c. 12, § 587, citing Brown v. Cogdell, 136 N. C. 32, 48 S. E. 515 and other cases). The motion to dismiss, though, was properly overruled, as it was not a question of jurisdiction, but of venue or place of trial. The court had general jurisdiction of such actions, and we must therefore confine our inquiry to the second ground of the motion. We are of the opinion that both Judge Starbuck and Judge Bryson were right in refusing a removal on this ground.

[5] The matter has been thoroughly well settled by our decisions, and an independent discussion of it is not called for. A removal was requested in Woodard v. Sauls, 134 N. C. 274, 46 S. E. 507, in a case similar to this one and denied in the superior court. The judgment was affirmed here. It was there held that—

"Where the recovery of personal property is not the sole or chief relief demanded, an action need not necessarily be brought in the county in which the property is located."

Referring to that case in another of a like kind (Clow v. McNeill, 187 N. C. 212, at page 214, 83 S. E. 808, at page 309), Justice Allen said:

"The action was improperly removed to the county of Lee, as it is an action for an accounting, and the ownership of the notes and bonds was only raised incidentally. The case of Woodard v. Sauls, 134 N. C. 274 [46 S. E. 507], is directly in point. In that case it was alleged that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff by promissory notes and for further large sums, and that, to secure such indebtedness, had turned over to the plaintiff sundry notes, that the defendant afterwards got possession of a portion of said notes, to be collected by him as agent of the plaintiff and applied on said indebtedness, which the defendant had not done, and that the defendant got possession of another portion of said collaterals surreptitiously, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, and retained the same, to recover which notes plaintiff sued out the ancillary proceeding of claim and delivery; and it was held that, where the recovery of personal property is not the sole or chief relief demanded, an action need not necessarily be brought in the county in which the property is located, and that the action ought not to be removed. This case is not in conflict with Brown v. Cogdell, 136 N. C. 32 [48 S. E. 515], and Edgerton v. Games, 142 N. C. 223 [55 S. E. 145], as in the first of these cases the only question involved was the ownership of certain furniture, and in the second a separate and distinct cause of action was alleged in the complaint for the recovery of a horse."

It is also apparent, from reading the two cases, that Manufacturing Co. v. Brower, 105 N. C. 440, 11 S. E. 313, and Connor v. Dillard, 129 N. C. 50, 39 S. E. 641, are not authorities in favor of a removal of this case, because the first of them was, as the court says, substantially for the foreclosure of a mortgage of land, and the second for the sole subjection of the particular tract of land, described in the pleadings to the payment of the debt, confining the entire relief for the satisfaction of the debt to that tract. That case was also in the nature of one for the foreclosure of a lien upon land. Manufacturing Co. v. Brower, supra.

There was no error in the proceedings of the county and superior courts, and we therefore affirm the judgment.

Affirmed.

(177 N. C. 261)

HEADMAN et al. v. BOARD OF COM'RS OF BRUNSWICK et al. (No. 282.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 2, 1919.)

1. PLEADING —214(3)—ADMISSIONS BY DEMURRER.

In an action to cancel tax deed as a cloud upon plaintiffs' title, allegations in complaint that plaintiffs were willing and able to pay the taxes in question, and tendered them to defendant entitled to receive them, and that he will not receive them, must be considered as admitted for the purpose of deciding the legal questions presented by demurrer.

2. TAXATION —800(2)—TENDER OF TAXES—WAIVER.

Refusal to accept payment of taxes by defendant entitled to receive them is a waiver of further tender, and dispenses with it; this being also the usual rule as to tender.

3. TAXATION —814(1)—JUDGMENT REMOVING DEED AS CLOUD—RELIEF—REIMBURSEMENT.

Though refusal of taxes tendered was a waiver of further tender, the court will require, as a condition of entry of judgment in favor of plaintiffs in action to remove tax deed as cloud upon title, that amount of taxes, together with any other amount due by way of penalty or interest, be paid by plaintiffs.

4. TAXATION —734(3)—TAX SALES—LISTING LAND IN NAME OF OTHER THAN TRUE OWNER.

That the land was in the hands of a receiver appointed while taxes were due, and that the land was listed in the name of some one other than the true owner, did not invalidate sale for taxes which was otherwise free from fatal defects, in view of Revisal 1905, §§ 2862, 2879, 2894.

5. TAXATION —806—SUIT TO CANCEL TAX DEED—PARTIES.

Receiver appointed while taxes in question were due would be a proper party to action to cancel tax deed as cloud upon plaintiffs' title.

6. TAXATION —745—TAX DEED—STATUTE—NECESSITY OF FORECLOSURE.

While formerly, the only remedy of a county or city in case either was the purchaser at tax sale was by foreclosure under Revisal 1905, § 2912, the statute has been changed by Laws 1901, c. 558, § 18, giving the right to tax deed without resorting to foreclosure.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR —840(4)—MATTERS EMBRACING ONLY A PART OF CAUSE OF ACTION—REVIEW.

Court, on appeal having considered those grounds of demurrer to complaint which may finally dispose of action, will not review the overruling of demurrer to allegation embracing only part of cause of action, and which, if sustained, will not dismiss it; appeal from ruling in such case being fragmentary and premature.

Appeal from Superior Court, Brunswick County; Stacy, Judge.

Action by Frank C. Headman, executor, and others against the Board of Commissioners of Brunswick and the City of Southport and another. From the judgment rendered, defendants appeal. Modified.

C. Ed. Taylor, of Southport, for appellant Brunswick Co.

Cranmer & Davis, of Southport, for appellant City of Southport.

Russell W. Richmond, of Providence, R. I., and Joseph W. Ruark and Robert Ruark, both of Southport, for appellant Allen.

E. K. Bryan, of Wilmington, for appellees.

WALKER, J. The plaintiffs alleged in their complaint that a deed under a tax sale of their land had been fraudulently obtained, and that the notice required by the law, before such a deed is executed, was not given, and that plaintiffs' only remedy was by foreclosure; and that the land was in the hands of a receiver, and was improperly listed in the name of the Southport Land Company, and by reason of the defects in the sale and deed a cloud has been put upon their title, which they ask to be removed.

The defendants demurred to the complaint, assigning the following grounds of demurrer, which will be stated and considered in their proper order:

[1] First. That plaintiffs had not paid the taxes due for the years 1914 and 1915, for which the land was sold. The plaintiffs alleged that they were willing and ready to pay the taxes, and tendered them to the defendant entitled to receive them, and that he will not receive them. This, of course, is admitted by the demurrer, or rather to be considered as admitted, for the purpose of deciding the legal questions raised by it. Balfour Quarry Co. v. West Const. Co., 151 N. C. 345, 66 S. E. 217; Brewer v. Wynne, 154 N. C. 467, 70 S. E. 947; Kendall v. Highway Commission, 165 N. C. 600, 81 S. E. 995.

[2] The defendant cannot be forced to accept payment of the taxes, and his refusal is a waiver of further tender, and dispenses with the necessity of it. Beck v. Meroney, 135 N. C. 532, 47 S. E. 613 (a tax sale case). This is also the usual rule as to a tender. Abrams v. Suttles, 44 N. C. 99; Bateman v. Hopkins, 157 N. C. 470, 73 S. E. 133, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 642; Gallimore v. Grubb, 156 N. C. 575, 72 S. E. 628; Blalock v. Clark, 133 N. C. 306, 45 S. E. 642; and Gaylord v. McCoy, 161 N. C. 685, 77 S. E. 959, where this court said:

"It is a general rule that when the tender of performance of an act is necessary to the establishment of any right against another party, this tender or offer to perform is waived or becomes unnecessary when it is reasonably certain that the offer will be refused; that payment or performance will not be accepted."

And this was also held in Mobley v. Fossett, 20 N. C. 96, bottom page 78; Martin v. Bank, 131 N. C. 121, 42 S. E. 558; Terrell v. Walker, 65 N. C. 91.

[3] In Mobley v. Fossett, supra, it was held that, when a party is bound by his agreement to make a tender of an article at a particular place, and the other party apprises him that he will not receive the article at all, it dispenses with the necessity of making the tender, citing 2 Starkie on Evidence, p. 778. But while this is so, if the plaintiff finally prevails in this action, the court will require as a condition of entering a judgment upon the verdict that plaintiffs pay into the court the amount of the taxes, for the use of the party entitled thereto, or to him directly, with any other amount due by way of penalty or interest. Brunswick county and the city of Southport, it is presumed, already have received their taxes, and the defendant Philip Allen may have paid them, so that no other payment is now necessary, but inquiry will be made as to this matter and the facts found, so that the proper judgment may be rendered and the amount of taxes, and other amounts due may be paid. McLaurin v. Williams, 175 N. C. 290, 95 S. E. 559. The county and city, or their assignee, must have all taxes and charges due to them, or to those claiming under them, before any decree is entered, on the verdict, if the plaintiff finally gets one. The payment of taxes is only required to be shown, not pleaded. Beck v. Meroney, 135 N. C. 532, 47 S. E. 613; Moore v. Byrd, 118 N. C. 688, 23 S. E. 968.

[4] Second. That listing the land in the name of some one other than the true owner did not invalidate the sale of the land for the taxes, as alleged by the plaintiff. We have so held in several well-considered cases. Peebles v. Taylor, 118 N. C. 165, 24 S. E. 797; Moore v. Byrd, supra; Eames v. Armstrong, 146 N. C. 1, 59 S. E. 165, 125 Am. St. Rep. 436; and the recent case of Stone v. Phillips, 176 N. C. 457, 97 S. E. 375, in which attention is called to Revisal 1905, § 2894, which reads, as follows:

"That no sale of real estate shall be void because such real estate was charged in the name of any other person than the rightful owner, if such real estate be in other respects sufficiently described. But no sale of property so listed in the name of the wrong person shall be held valid where the rightful one has listed the same and paid the taxes thereon."

Stone v. Phillips, supra, cites Taylor v. Hunt, 118 N. C. 168, 24 S. E. 359, as approving the principle embodied in the statute, and distinguishes Rexford v. Phillips, 159 N. C. 213, 74 S. E. 337, in which case it appeared that there had not been any listing of the property as the law required, but the placing on the books of an indefinitely described part of a large body of land by a person having no semblance of authority, in law or in fact for doing so. To have permitted such a false and unauthorized listing and description to bind and conclude the owner would have been a plain act of injustice, which is not warranted by any reasonable construction of the statute, and is directly contrary to its expressly declared purpose. The Stone Case holds, in a well-considered opinion by Justice Hoke, that the listing of property in the name of a person other than the true owner will not invalidate a sale of it for the taxes, which is otherwise free from fatal defects, and this opinion we again approve. Counsel who argued the present case before us (Mr. Robert Ruark) correctly understood and stated in his argument, and in his brief, the palpable distinction between Rexford v. Phillips, 159 N. C. 213, 74 S. E. 337, and the cases holding that the mere listing in the wrong name, when the property is sufficiently described, will not invalidate a sale for taxes.

[5] It can make no difference, as to the validity of a tax sale, that the property was in the custody of a receiver, appointed by the court, while the taxes were due. Revisal 1905, § 2879, provides fully for such a case, and section 2862 requires a receiver and other fiduciaries named therein to pay the taxes assessed against the trust property, and makes him liable personally to the sheriff, by an action against him, and in damages to the owner of the property, who suffers loss by his default, for the failure to pay the taxes out of the trust fund in his hands. But we do not think this section deprived the owner of the right to protect his property, although held in trust by a receiver, by making a tender of the taxes to save it from a sale and the consequent loss of it by him. Such was not the intent and meaning of this section, which was to give an easy remedy to the sheriff, against the trustee or receiver, which was cumulative to that against the owner, and it could not have been intended that the owner should be made to see his property sacrificed by the neglect of a receiver, and not be able to save it by paying the taxes, and such an injustice would be aggravated and more apparent when the receiver really had no funds with which to pay them, as may happen to be the case in some instances. It would be proper, at least, to make the receiver a party to this action, as he has an interest in it. The court, by which he was appointed, would, upon proper application, direct him to make himself a party, as the fund in his hand is involved, and will be lost in the event the sale eventually is held to be valid.

[6] Third. The plaintiff further alleges that the only remedy of the county and city was by foreclosure. This was so at one time, but the statute has been changed, and each case must be decided under the law existing at the time of the particular transaction. With reference to this question, the Chief Justice said, in Townsend v. Drainage Commissioners, 174 N. C. 556, 559, 94 S. E. 104, 106:

"The appellant contends that Revisal, § 2912, requires the purchaser at a tax sale to bring an action to foreclose upon his tax certificate, and that this is his only remedy. In this he is in error, for section 2912 gives this as an additional remedy and uses the following language: 'The holder of a deed for real estate sold for taxes shall be entitled to the remedy provided in this section [2912] if he elect to proceed thereunder,' or he may proceed to acquire a deed from the sheriff as otherwise pointed out in sections 2899 to 2907 of the Revisal. Every individual purchaser has two remedies, one to proceed under the statute to require a deed, and the other to foreclose by action in court under section 2912. Formerly, if the county was purchaser it had only the right to foreclose (Wilcox v. Leach, 123 N. C. 74 [31 S. E. 374]), but this was changed by Laws 1901, c. 558, § 18 (now Pell's Revisal, § 2905), which provides that the sheriff can execute a deed upon the demand of the county commissioners or the governing board of a municipal corporation in the same manner as in cases where individuals have purchased."

And Justice Hoke said in Kivett v. Gardner, 169 N. C. 78, 80, 85 S. E. 145, 146:

"It may be well to note that, under the present law (Revisal, § 2906) a county purchasing land for taxes may take a deed therefor without resorting to foreclosure (McNair v. Boyd, 163 N. C. 478 [79 S. E. 966]), and this case holds, too, that it is only when the owner has been in possession that the ordinary statutes of limitations do not operate against him."

So we find this matter to be settled by statute and adjudication.

[7] Fourth. We have so far considered only those grounds of objection which, if sustained, would dismiss the action. In other words, they cover the entire case, and may finally dispose of it. But the next allegation of the plaintiff, as to the failure of the purchaser to give notice before the deed was made by the sheriff, which also was demurred to, embraces only a part of the cause of action, and, if sustained, will not dismiss it, as there is another ground left upon which the plaintiff may recover. When this is the case, we do not review the overruling of the demurrer, but allow defendant to except and leave a decision upon the question to the final hearing. An appeal from the ruling is premature and fragmentary. We so held in Shelby v. Railroad Co., 147 N. C. 537, 61 S. E. 377, which was approved in Chambers v. Railroad Co., 172 N. C. 555, 90 S. E. 590, citing numerous decisions of this court in support of the rule. There is a full discussion of the point in the latter case, but it may be well to quote the language of the present Chief Justice in Shelby v. Railroad Co., supra, where it is said, at page 537 of 147 N. C., at page 377 of 61 S. E.:

"The defendant pleaded in its answer two separate and distinct defenses. The plaintiff demurred to one of them, as he had a right to do. Revisal, § 435. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant appealed. This is obnoxious to the rule forbidding fragmentary appeals. An appeal from a ruling upon one of several issues will be dismissed. Hines v. Hines, 84 N. C. 122; Arrington v. Arrington, 91 N. C. 301. The plaintiff should have noted his exception and the judge should have proceeded with the trial upon both issues. If both issues or only the issue as to this defense were found with the plaintiff, he would not need to * * * review the order overruling the demurrer as to this, but should he desire to do so, the overruling the demurrer as to this issue can be as well reviewed on appeal from the final judgment. It is true that the plaintiff will have to try this issue, but, aside from the presumption that the judge ruled rightly, it is better practice that the issue raised by the second defense should be tried, even unnecessarily, than that an action should thus be cut in two and hung up in the courts till it is determined, after much delay, on appeal, whether two issues or one should be tried. It is better to try both, and after final verdict and judgment pass upon the validity of the defense demurred to, if the result is such as to make the plaintiff still desirous to review it, which he will not be if he gain the case, nor if he lose on the other issue without ground of exception thereto."

"Hence, fragmentary appeals like this, and premature appeals and appeals from interlocutory judgments, usually are not tolerated. It can prejudice neither party to have the issue as to the second defense found by the jury (plaintiff's exception being noted) at the same time the issue as to the other defense is found. With all the parties before the court and the facts fully brought out, a correct conclusion is more likely to be reached by both judge and jury."

In Knott v. Burwell, 96 N. C. 272, 2 S. E. 588, where there was a demurrer to a matter of defense and also to a counterclaim presenting a very strong illustration of the doctrine, it was said:

The demurrer "being sustained by the court and the counterclaim disallowed, the defendant appealed, and at the same time moved the court to suspend further proceedings in the action until the appeal could be heard and decided. This was also refused, and the trial ordered to go on. To these rulings the defendant's first exception is taken, and it is in our opinion without support in law. The proposed appeal was premature; and, the exception being noted upon the record, the ruling would come up for review after the final hearing upon an appeal then taken, and this opportunity is now afforded the defendant."

Commenting on these cases (and the same question we are now discussing) in Chambers v. Railroad Co., supra at pages 558 and 559 of 172 N. C., at pages 591 and 592 of 90 S. E., this court said:

"To the same effect is Bazemore v. Bridgers, 105 N. C. 191 [10 S. E. 888]. So it will be seen that the practice and procedure in such cases has been thoroughly settled by decisions above considered. Justice Reade, in Commissioners v. Magnin, supra [78 N. C. 181], strongly intimated that the result as declared in the above cases was in accordance with the true construction and meaning of the Code, and if there were any cases to the contrary it might be well for this court to settle the matter finally by the adoption of a rule forbidding such premature and fragmentary appeals and requiring an exception to be noted to the adverse ruling so that the trial of the case can proceed. The point may be reserved for consideration upon appeal at the final hearing. We think that it will, perhaps, be found that the cases in which appeals have been entertained in this court from the overruling of demurrers are those where a decision of the question would finally dispose of the case, and not merely be one step forward, and perhaps a useless one."

We further said in the Chambers Case:

"The practice we here adopt as the preferable one, besides having been settled by our decisions, is not, in principle, unlike that in cases of nonsuit, where the courts have held that, upon an adverse intimation of the court, the plaintiff may submit to a nonsuit, if he so desires, but he cannot appeal from the judgment of nonsuit, entered upon his submission, and have it reviewed in this court, if there is any ground left upon which he may recover, for the ruling must go to the whole case and prevent a recovery before an appeal will lie. We have so held during this term in Chandler v. Mills, 172 N. C. 336 [90 S. E. 299], where it is said: 'The nonsuit and appeal were prematurely taken. The law with respect to this matter has been thoroughly well settled by this court. Before a plaintiff can resort to a nonsuit, and have any proposed ruling of the trial court reviewed here by appeal, the intimation of opinion by the judge must be of such a nature as to defeat a recovery. If there is any ground left upon which the plaintiff may succeed before the jury, after the elimination of all others by an adverse intimation, the remedy is not by nonsuit and appeal, but the case should be tried out upon the remaining ground, for the plaintiff may recover full damages, in which case no appeal by him would be necessary. In other words, the threatened ruling must exhaust every ground upon which a verdict could be had, and therefore be fatal to plaintiff's recovery'"—citing Hayes v. Railroad, 140 N. C. 131, 52 S. E. 416; Hoss v. Palmer, 150 N. C. 12, 63 S. E. 171; Merrick v. Bedford, 141 N. C. 504, 54 S. E. 415; Midgett v. Mfg. Co., 140 N. C. 361, 53 S. E. 178.

It may well be said here, in illustration of the rule, and as showing its practical working to be in favor of a reasonable expedition of trials and how it is preventive of unnecessary delay, that, if we should consider the question, as to notice, and sustain the demurrer, we would be compelled to remand the case, for the trial of the issue, as to the fraud, and a demurrer may yet be filed to that cause of action and appeal taken, multiplying costs and causing vexatious delay, when defendant will lose nothing by excepting, and reserving the question raised by him until the final hearing. He may even then take advantage of the alleged defect in plaintiff's case by a simple request for an instruction covering the point. If the jury, as remarked by the present Chief Justice in Shelby v. Railroad Co., should answer the issue as to the fraud in favor of the plaintiff, the other question will never arise again. There will be no necessity for deciding it. Besides the delay, therefore, there will be a waste of labor and an idle consumption of time in passing upon a question which may become entirely immaterial. Not longer than the last term of this court it was said by Justice Brown, in Yates v. Dixie Fire Ins. Co., 176 N. C. 401, 97 S. E. 209:

"We suggest to the judges of the superior court that fragmentary and premature appeals be not permitted. It is best that all the issues be determined, and a final judgment rendered, before a case is brought to this court."

It, therefore, becomes unnecessary to consider what effect the want of notice from the parties, or the sheriff, of the sale and the intention to make a deed to the purchaser will have upon the case. The jury may find that there was an unlawful combination or conspiracy to defraud the plaintiffs, or that the notice was given, which would render vain and useless any decision upon the question just stated. The case of Matthews v. Fry, 141 N. C. 582, 54 S. E. 379, which was referred to by counsel on both sides was decided under the Public Laws of 1897, c. 169, and it has since been approved in several cases. S. C., 143 N. C. 384, 55 S. E. 787; Eames v. Armstrong, 146 N. C. 6, 59 S. E. 165, 125 Am. St. Rep. 436; Warren v. Williford, 148 N. C. 479, 62 S. E. 697; Rexford v. Phillips, 159 N. C. 213, 74 S. E. 337; Board of Education v. Remick, 160 N. C. 563, 76 S. E. 627; McNair v. Boyd, 163 N. C. 478, 79 S. E. 966. It was founded upon King v. Cooper, 128 N. C. 347, 38 S. E. 924 (opinion by the present Chief Justice), where the principle, which is applicable to such cases, is fully discussed. See Jones v. Schull, 153 N. C. 517, 69 S. E. 498 (by Manning, J.), in which King v. Cooper and Matthews v. Fry were especially approved and followed. The controversy in Matthews v. Fry and King v. Cooper, supra, was between the purchaser at the sale and the owner, and the notice of the purpose to make the deed to the former was intended to give a solitary, and last, chance to redeem the land by paying taxes, charges, costs, and expenses. It was a wise provision to prevent what might turn out to be gross injustice, that is, to take his land without notice and an opportunity of paying the taxes, costs, expenses, and the large interest or per cent. exacted by the statute, when no doubt he would be perfectly willing to pay it, and too, it might be a small amount, when compared with the true value of the land. But that statute was amended by Public Laws of 1901, c. 553, § 20 (Revisal, sec. 2909), in material respects, which is mentioned by Justice Connor in Eames v. Armstrong, supra, and though we do not decide the question, as to the effect of that change in the law, we may again say, as we have already said, that each case must be governed by the particular statute applicable to it Jones v. Schull, supra. It may be that the act of 1901 changes the law in the manner and to the extent that is claimed by the defendant, but we withhold our opinion upon this contention until it is properly presented.

We have carefully considered the case, and have been at much pains to state the contentions fully and to decide all questions within the compass of the appeal, as the whole matter, and every detail of it, came under elaborate discussion in this court, and the questions were ably argued by counsel.

As we have sustained some of the grounds of demurrer and overruled others, we direct, in the exercise of our discretion, that the costs of this court be equally divided between the parties, one half thereof to be taxed against the plaintiffs and the other half against the defendants.

The judgment is modified, as above indicated.

Modified.

ALEXANDER et al. v. RICHMOND CEDAR WORKS. (No. 10.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 9, 1919.)

1. NEW TRIAL ⇐168 — NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

A new trial, will not be granted on petition in Supreme Court for newly discovered evidence which is entirely cumulative.

2. NEW TRIAL ⇐168 — NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

A new trial will not be granted on petition in Supreme Court for newly discovered evidence, unless there is something to reasonably indicate that result will be changed.

3. NEW TRIAL ⇐168 — MOTION FOR — DILIGENCE.

A petition in Supreme Court for a new trial on ground of newly discovered evidence must affirmatively show that petitioners were diligent in their efforts to produce testimony at trial, and it is not enough to allege generally that they were not guilty of laches; it being necessary to set forth the facts.

4. EQUITY ⇐67—"LACHES."

"Laches" is negligence consisting in omission of something which a party might do and might reasonably be expected to do towards vindication or enforcement of his rights, being generally a synonym of "remissness," "dilatatoriness," "unreasonable or unexcused delay," the opposite of "vigilance," and means a want of activity and diligence in making a claim or moving for the enforcement of a right, particularly in equity, which will afford ground for presuming against it or for refusing relief where that is discretionary with the court, but laches presupposes, not only lapse of time, but also the existence of circumstances which render negligence imputable.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Laches.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Tyrrell County; Bond, Judge.

Suit for partition by J. E. Alexander and others against the Richmond Cedar Works. From a decree for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Petition by plaintiffs after argument for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered testimony. Petition dismissed.

See, also, 98 S. E. 312.

Aydlett, Simpson & Sawyer, of Elizabeth City, and W. L. Whitley, of Plymouth, for appellants.

J. Crawford Biggs, of Raleigh, and Thompson & Wilson, of Elizabeth City, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. This is a petition for a new trial in the above entitled case, upon the ground of newly discovered testimony. The petition is denied for the following reasons:

[1, 2] First. The proposed testimony appears to be entirely cumulative, there being no new kind of evidence offered, and besides there is nothing to reasonably indicate that the result will be changed.

[3] Second. There is no acceptable excuse given for the delay in procuring the new testimony, and no sufficient reason assigned for not having presented it at the trial of the action.

Third. But another reason, and the main one, is that petitioners do not sufficiently show that they had been diligent in their efforts to produce this testimony at the trial, or to put it conversely, they do not show that they have not been guilty of laches. They allege generally that laches cannot be imputed to them, but this will not do, as the facts should have been set forth, so that we can determine whether laches existed. They could not decide that question for us by merely asserting that there had been no laches.

The petitioners have not brought themselves within the rule, which we have adopted in regard to such applications as this one. We said in Johnson v. Railroad Co., 163 N. C. at page 453, 79 S. E. at page 699, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 598, and its language, in most respects, is peculiarly applicable to this case:

"Since this case was argued, the defendant has moved for a new trial, upon the ground of newly discovered evidence. Applications of this kind, as we have held, should be carefully scrutinized and cautiously examined, and the burden is upon the applicant to rebut the presumption that the verdict is correct and that there has been a lack of due diligence. 14 A. & E. Enc. Pl. & Pr. 790. We require, as a prerequisite to the granting of such motions, that it shall appear by the affidavit: (1) That the witness will give the newly discovered evidence; (2) that it is probably true; (3) that it is competent, material, and relevant; (4) that due diligence has been used and the means employed, or that there has been no laches, in procuring the testimony at the trial; (5) that it is not merely cumulative; (6) that it does not tend only to contradict a former witness or to impeach or discredit him; (7) that it is of such a nature as to show that on another trial a different result will probably be reached and that the right will prevail. Turner v. Davis, 132 N. C. 187 [43 S. E. 637]; State v. Starnes, 97 N. C. 423 [2 S. E. 447]; Brown v. Mitchell, 102 N. C. 347 [9 S. E. 702, 11 Am. St. Rep. 748]; State v. De Graff, 113 N. C. 688 [18 S. E. 507]; Schehan v. Malone, 72 N. C. 59; Mottu v. Davis, 153 N. C. 160 [69 S. E. 63]; Aden v. Doub, 153 N. C. 434 [146 N. C. 10, 59 S. E. 162]. When we examine the affidavits of Hector Austen, and the others upon which the defendant bases its motion for a new trial, we find that they fall short of complying with the rule we have just stated. In some respects the proposed testimony is merely cumulative, and in others it only tends to contradict or impeach the plaintiff's witnesses at the trial. It is not very definite. The witness does not speak with sufficient positiveness and directness to give us the slightest assurance that there will be a different result if we grant the application. * * * It is not satisfactorily shown that the testimony of the witness, if desired, could not have been secured at the trial by the exercise of proper diligence. We are convinced that the testimony, if it had been introduced before, would not have changed the result. We refer now to the second affidavit of Hector Austen, made in behalf of plaintiff."

See Wheeler v. Cole, 164 N. C. 378, 80 S. E. 241; Padgett v. McCoy, 167 N. C. 508, 83 S. E. 756; Gainey v. Godwin, 171 N. C. 754, 88 S. E. 230; Steeley v. Lumber Co., 165 N. C. 35, 80 S. E. 963.

[4] If we should grant this application, upon the case as made out by the petitioners, even giving to it the best possible construction in their favor, we would have to do so in every case which is based upon the ground that there is additional testimony, which might have been produced with reasonable effort, and there would consequently be no end of trials, for there are a very few, if any, cases where it could not be alleged that the losing party has lost the benefit of evidence which they are prepared to introduce if permitted to do so. But we put our decision chiefly upon the ground that a want of laches has not been sufficiently shown. Laches is negligence, consisting in the omission of something which a party might do, and might reasonably be expected to do, towards the vindication or enforcement of his rights. The word is generally a synonym of "remissness," "dilatatoriness," "unreasonable or unexcused delay," the opposite of "vigilance," and means a want of activity and diligence in making a claim or moving for the enforcement of a right (particularly in equity) which will afford ground for presuming against it, or for refusing relief, where that is discretionary with the court. It may be that petitioners were actually free from laches, but, if so, it should have appeared affirmatively; the burden of showing diligence being upon them. It is not sufficient to allege it, but it must be proven with reasonable certainty. Indifference to one's interests will not be excused by the law, as it requires of a party that he should devote that care and attention to his case which a man of ordinary prudence bestows upon his important business affairs. Roberts v. Allman, 106 N. C. 391, 11 S. E. 424; McLeod v. Gooch, 162 N. C. 122, 78 S. E. 4; Dell School v. Pierce, 163 N. C. 424, 79 S. E. 687; Smith v. Duncan, 16 N. J. Eq. 242. Laches presupposes, not only lapse of time, but also the existence of circumstances which render negligence imputable; and, unless reasonable diligence is shown in the prosecution of a claim to relief, the court, acting on the familiar maxim of the law as to giving preference to one who has been watchful of his rights, rather than one who has slept upon them, will decline to interfere.

Petition dismissed.

(177 N. C. 580)

STATE v. HARDEN et al. (No. 348.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 9, 1919.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — §841 — OBJECTIONS TO INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the trial court, in stating the evidence and contentions to the jury, inadvertently refers to an excluded statement by a witness, such reference should be called to the court's attention at the time so that it may be corrected.

2. ROBBERY — §23(1) — EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILITY.

In prosecution for highway robbery testimony by the prosecuting witness that 10 or 15 minutes after the robbery, while he was in a store telephoning to the police, defendants entered "and seemed surprised to see him there," was competent; the fact that defendants were surprised being a relevant circumstance for the jury to consider.

3. COURTS — §66(3) — ORGANIZATION — COMMENCEMENT OF TERM — PRESENCE OF JUDGE — VALIDITY OF ACTS.

Where no judge was present on the first Monday of court upon which the spring term was by statute directed to commence, and court was adjourned by the sheriff from day to day under Revisal 1905, § 1510, but the judge assigned by statute to preside at the spring term appeared as soon as he had qualified, and before the fourth day organized the court and proceeded with its business, the court was regularly constituted, the judge a de jure official, and the proceedings thereafter taken were valid.

4. COURTS — §66(1) — ORGANIZATION — ABSENCE OF JUDGE — ADJOURNMENT BY SHERIFF.

Under the express terms of Revisal 1905, § 1510, when the judge fails to appear on the first day of the term, the sheriff may adjourn court from day to day until the fourth day without any special order from the judge.

5. COURTS — §63 — ORGANIZATION — COMMENCEMENT OF TERM.

Where Pub. Laws 1917, c. 169, prescribed that court should commence on the ninth Monday before the first Monday in March for the spring term, that such Monday occurs in December does not prevent the term from being the spring term, and a judge assigned by statute to such court may properly preside.

6. JUDGES — §26 — DE FACTO JUDGE — RECONVENING ADJOURNED TERM.

Conceding that judge assigned to spring term of court was not authorized to reconvene the court after its adjournment by the sheriff, acts of judge would be valid as a de facto officer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Bryson, Judge.

Tom Harden and another were convicted of highway robbery, and they appeal. No error.

Hastings & Whicker, of Winston-Salem, for appellant Beale.

Fred M. Parrish, of Winston-Salem, for appellant Harden.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. The state's witness, A. J. Edwards, upon whom the assault and robbery were committed, during the course of his testimony stated that about 10 or 15 minutes after the robbery he was in George Anderson's store, telephoning for a policeman, when defendants entered the store [and seemed surprised to see him there]. The last part of this testimony, which we have inclosed in brackets, was excluded by the court on objection by defendants; but, in stating the evidence and contentions to the jury, the learned judge inadvertently referred to it, but gave no instruction in regard to it in his general charge, though at the time it was ruled out the judge told the jury they should not consider it. The reference to this statement of Edwards is now assigned as error.

[1] It is evident that the reference to the excluded statement was made by mistake, and should have been called to the court's attention at the time, so that it might then be corrected. We have repeatedly held that this should be done when the judge is reciting the evidence or the contentions of the parties. State v. Spencer, 176 N. C. 709, 97 S. E. 155, is the most recent case settling this question, and it cites State v. Blackwell, 162 N. C. 672, 78 S. E. 316; State v. Martin, 173 N. C. 808, 92 S. E. 597, and State v. Burton, 172 N. C. 939, 90 S. E. 561; there being numerous cases both before and since they were decided.

[2] But the evidence was competent, as held in State v. Spencer, supra. The surprise or confused appearance of the defendants was natural evidence. A man may show his guilt by his action or conduct, as well as by his words. The witness did not know the defendants before he was robbed, and when they first entered the store he inquired of Van Surratt and Emma Anderson who they were. If he did not know them and they did not know him, there was no reason for them to be surprised at seeing him in the store. The fact that they were surprised is therefore a proper and relevant circumstance for the jury to consider. Whether they were surprised is also for them to determine. We said in State v. Spencer, 176 N. C. at page 712, 97 S. E. at page 157:

"The instantaneous conclusions of the mind as to appearance, condition, or mental or physical state of persons, animals, and things, derived from observation of a variety of facts presented to the senses at one and the same time, are, legally speaking, matters of fact and are admissible in evidence." State v. Leak, 156 N. C. 643, 72 S. E. 567; Renn v. Railroad, 170 N. C. 128, 86 S. E. 864. Within this rule, the opinion of the witness as to the appearance of the dog and his conduct was permissible."

If the defendants exhibited surprise by their conduct, it was because they had been with the witness George Edwards, and recognized him as the victim of their robbery, or rather it is a fair and reasonable inference for a jury to draw. Judge Gaston said, in State v. Swink, 19 N. C. 9 (which was approved in State v. Rowe, 98 N. C. 629, 4 S. E. 506, and State v. Spencer, supra):

"All the surrounding facts of a transaction may be submitted to a jury when they afford any fair presumption or inference as to the question in dispute. Upon this principle it is that the conduct of the accused at the time of the offense, or after being charged with it, such as 'flight, the fabrication of false and contradictory statements, the concealment of the instruments of violence, the destruction or removal of proofs tending to show that an offense had been committed, or to ascertain the offender,' are all receivable in evidence as circumstances connected with, and throwing light upon, the question of imputed guilt."

See State v. Hastings, 86 N. C. 596.

We are of the opinion that the defendants were properly tried, and that the evidence fully sustains the verdict and judgment.

The right of Judge Bryson to preside at the court is questioned by an exception of the defendants, but, we think, without sound reason. We will briefly state the facts: The court calendar in that judicial district is based upon two fixed periods of the year, the first Monday of March for the spring ridings, and the first Monday in September for the fall ridings, and the courts are required to be held commencing on those days, or on a certain designated number of Mondays before and after, for each of the counties in rotation. Public Laws 1917, c. 169, provided that the particular court in question should commence on the ninth Monday before the first Monday in March, which, it so happened, fell upon December 30, 1918, the first week being for the trial of civil cases, there being three weeks of the term. Judge Lane had presided at the fall terms of 1918 of Forsyth superior court, and the contention of the defendants is that he should have held the court at which they were tried and convicted. Judge Bryson was elected for the Twentieth judicial district, and was commissioned and duly qualified as such, and assigned by statute to hold the courts of the Eleventh district. When his right to hold the court was challenged, he made, and ordered to be entered in the minutes, the following findings:

"That the term of superior court for Forsyth county at which the defendants were tried and convicted was the regular term of court fixed by the statute, beginning upon the 30th day of December, 1918, and continuing for a term of three weeks; that, no judge appearing upon Monday, the 30th day of December, 1918, it was the duty of the sheriff of said county, in compliance with the law, to open said court and adjourn the same from day to day for the first four days of said term; that the adjournment of said court on Monday and Tuesday by said Sheriff Flynt was in compliance with the statute; that the direction to the sheriff by wire from Judge Bryson, who was assigned by statute to hold the courts of the Eleventh judicial district of North Carolina for the Spring term of 1919, was lawful and in compliance with the statute; and that the said court was legal and properly constituted."

[3, 4] It appears, therefore, that as no other judge was present on the first Monday of court, it was adjourned by the sheriff from day to day, under Revisal, § 1510, and Judge Bryson "being present" before sunset of the fourth day of the court, he organized the same and proceeded with the trial of causes and the transaction of the other business of the court. This was all regular and within the intent and spirit of the statute, even if not within its letter, and we have so held in State v. McGimsey, 80 N. C. 877, 80 Am. Rep. 90. Under the statute and that case, the sheriff could have adjourned the court from day to day until the fourth day without any special order from the judge, as he is so directed to do by the statute itself, and in Norwood v. Thorp, 64 N. C. 682, it was said:

"The provision" of Code of Civil Procedure, § 396 (Revisal of 1905, § 1510), "that where the judge fails to appear at any term until the fourth day thereof, inclusive, the sheriff shall adjourn the court until the next term, does not avoid the acts of any term, where, upon the nonappearance of the judge, the sheriff did not in fact adjourn the court, and the judge afterwards (here in the second week) actually appeared and held court."

Judge Bryson appeared immediately after he was inducted into office, and we are clearly of the opinion that he rightfully presided at the court, and all of its proceedings thereafter taken were valid, and that he was judge of the court de jure. The record sets forth that a regular term of the superior court was opened and held Wednesday, instead of the Monday preceding, fixed by the statute as the first day, and it has been held by us that upon this recited fact the presumption is that the sheriff adjourned the court from day to day, as he is required to do by the statute, and that the court was legally held, and its proceedings were valid. State v. Weaver, 104 N. C. 758, 10 S. E. 486, where Justice Avery said:

"The record of the term at which the case was tried before Bynum, J., sets forth that 'at superior court, continued and held in and for the county of Granville and state of North Carolina, at the courthouse thereof in Oxford, on Wednesday, the 24th day of April, A. D. 1889, present,' etc. It is contended by counsel that the fact that the court appears to have been first opened on Wednesday is fatal to the jurisdiction. The sheriff is required by section 926 of the Code to 'adjourn the court from day to day until the fourth day of the term inclusive,' etc., if the judge of the superior court shall not be present. It was therefore lawful to open the court as late as Thursday, and it must be presumed that it was adjourned from day to day, as the law directs, by the sheriff."

In any view of the matter, Judge Bryson was a de facto officer, and his acts were valid as such so far, at least, as the public and third persons are concerned. This was expressly held in State v. Lewis, 107 N. C. 967, 970, 12 S. E. 457, 13 S. E. 247, 11 L. R. A. 105, where the question is fully discussed by Justice Avery. Our case is certainly within the third rule stated by Chief Justice Butler in State v. Carroll, 38 Conn. 449, 9 Am. Rep. 409, which authority was cited with approval in the Lewis Case, where Justice Avery said:

"If Judge Whitaker was acting either de jure or de facto as judge of the superior court of Rockingham county in opening and organizing that court, and in presiding at the trial of the defendant until the jury returned a verdict of guilty, it was error to allow the motion of the defendant and enter the order arresting the judgment. Were we to concede not only that the Governor did not have the power, under the Constitution, to appoint him and clothe him with the rightful authority, but that his acts as a de facto officer also ceased to be valid and binding as to the public and third persons, when he declared in open court his purpose to abdicate because he was of opinion that the said term could not have been lawfully held except by a successor regularly appointed and commissioned by the Governor to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Judge Shipp, still his refusal to proceed further with the business of the court would not affect the validity of any previous act done under color of his appointment from the Governor, and when he was holding himself out to the public as the rightful incumbent by virtue of the special commission entered of record. Judge Whitaker was a de facto officer so long as he continued to preside and to assert his power under and by virtue of the commission issued by the Governor, even if we concede, for the sake of the argument, that he was not the rightfully constituted judge of the superior court of Rockingham county, and that his power as a de facto officer continued only so long as he exercised it."

See, also, State v. Hall, 142 N. C. 710, 55 S. E. 806, which cites and approves State v. Lewis, supra; State v. Speaks, 95 N. C. 689; Norfleet v. Staton, 73 N. C. 546, 21 Am. Rep. 479; Burke v. Elliott, 26 N. C. 360, 42 Am. Dec. 142; and Burton v. Patton, 47 N. C. 124, 62 Am. Dec. 194.

We might rest this part of the case upon other reasons, but it is not necessary that we should do so, as we hold that Judge Bryson acted properly and rightly in opening and holding the court, and that his right to do so appertained to him as a de jure officer, designated by the law to hold this particular court, among others, in the district.

[5, 6] While the term of this court commenced in December, next before the last day of that month, it is specifically described by the statute as one of the spring courts in the year 1919, and must be regarded as such; the law having so provided in clear and explicit language.

A careful inspection of the record proper and case on appeal convinces us that no error has been committed, and it will be so certified.

No error.

STATE v. SIMMERSON. (No. 346.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 9, 1919.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS §140 — POSSESSION FOR PURPOSE OF SALE — AMOUNT IN POSSESSION.

In a prosecution for having in possession spirituous liquor for purposes of sale, the amount kept on hand by defendant is immaterial as far as his guilt is concerned; the gist of the offense being to have intoxicating liquor on hand for the purpose of sale.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS §224—POSSESSION OF LIQUOR FOR PURPOSE OF SALE — AMOUNT IN POSSESSION—PRESUMPTIONS.

In a prosecution for having spirituous liquor on hand for purposes of sale, a presumption of guilt is created by the statute where defendant has in his possession more than one gallon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Bryson, Judge.

Bryant Simmerson was convicted of having in possession more than one gallon of spirituous liquor for purposes of sale, and he appeals. No error.

Indictment for having in possession more than one gallon of spirituous liquor for purposes of sale. The defendant was tried and convicted in the municipal court of Forsyth, and on appeal to the superior court was again convicted. He moved in arrest of judgment because that the term which should have been begun December 30, 1918, was continued by the sheriff until January 3d, when Bryson, J., whose term of office began January 1, 1919, arrived and opened court. The plea is presented that the trial, conviction, and sentence were illegal because the court had no jurisdiction. Motion denied, and defendant appealed.

Hastings & Whicker and Benbow, Hall & Benbow, all of Winston-Salem, for appellant.

The Attorney General and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PER CURIAM. The question here raised as to the validity of this same term of the court, which was not opened until Friday January 3, 1919, was presented and fully discussed in State v. Harden, 98 S. E. 782, at this term, and it is not necessary to repeat what is there said.

On almost exactly the same state of facts, the same proposition of law was presented in State v. Wood, 175 N. C. 815, 816, 95 S. E. 1050. Though Judge Bryson was not sworn in till January 3, 1919, he was a judge de jure and de facto when this case was tried. The motion in arrest was properly denied. State v. Hall, 142 N. C. 713, 55 S. E. 806.

[1, 2] The court properly told the jury:

"It is immaterial, in so far as the guilt of the defendant is concerned, whether he had on hand a gallon or a pint of liquor or a gill of liquor; the gist of the offense is having on hand whisky for the purpose of sale, and the amount kept on hand has nothing to do with the crime; but you will further note that by statute, where the state has shown to the jury by evidence which satisfies them beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant had in his possession at one time more than a gallon of whisky, then the statute raises the presumption it was had and possessed for the purpose of sale. That presumption is made so by statute."

"If you find beyond a reasonable doubt that he had in his possession more than one gallon of whisky, then the statute raises a presumption of guilt and makes what the law calls a prima facie case—such a case as the jury may convict upon or should not convict upon, as they would be satisfied therefrom. If you have a reasonable doubt in your mind of any of the material facts to constitute the guilt of the defendant, it is your duty to return a verdict of not guilty."

No error.

STATE v. DAVIS. (No. 347.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 9, 1919.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — 368(2)—EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ.

In a prosecution for murder by a member of a mob, evidence that, as the car in which deceased was riding approached, some one in the crowd said, "Let's hold him," was competent as part of the res gestæ.

2. CRIMINAL LAW — 365(1) — EVIDENCE—ACTS OF CODEFENDANTS—RES GESTÆ.

In a prosecution for a murder committed by a member of a mob, testimony as to an assault on witness made by a codefendant was admissible as res gestæ where there was evidence that accused was with the rioters when such assault was committed.

3. CRIMINAL LAW — 368(1)—EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ—ACTIONS OF MOB.

In a prosecution for murder committed by a member of a mob, evidence that the crowd of rioters when coming up the street said,

"Halt!" was admissible as part of the res gestæ, where it appeared that accused was with the rioters at the time.

4. COURTS — 86(1) — ORGANIZATION — ADJOURNMENT BY SHERIFF — AUTHORITY OF TRIAL JUDGE.

Where the trial judge was unable to be present at the commencement of the term, it is proper for him to notify the sheriff to adjourn court from day to day for four days, although the sheriff had, under Revisal 1905, § 1510, power to do this without notice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; T. D. Bryson, Judge.

Will Davis was convicted of murder, and he appeals. No error.

The prisoner was indicted for the murder of Charles White. In order to understand the questions presented to this court, it will be necessary only to state a portion of the testimony of Jacob Jackson, a witness for the state, and the assignments of errors, as follows:

Jacob Jackson testified:

"On November 17, 1918, in the evening, I was standing on Depot street, in front of Cook's Café, and a crowd of about 50 or 75 people came by, defendant, Will Davis, being in the crowd, and they made me come with them on down Fifth street, and just after crossing the railroad they held up one car, and the man in the car said he was a doctor, and the crowd let him go on by. They went on down to Fifth and Linden streets, and another car came down the hill, and they stopped it; three men went to the middle of the street and stopped the car. Will Davis was one of the three. One of the fellows had on a big overcoat, and the other one was a soldier boy named 'Red'—that being all I know of his name. I do not know the man who had on the big overcoat, nor do I know who was in front, when they stopped the doctor's car, but after stopping that car the crowd went about as far as from me to the end of the courthouse, until they stopped the car that the man was shot in. The car in which the man was shot was coming towards town and down the hill, and the lights on the car were burning. They saw the car coming over the hill, and said, 'Let's stop him.' (The prisoner objected to what was said, unless prisoner said it. Objection overruled. Exception by prisoner). They waited until the car got very near to them, and then Will Davis, the man with the big overcoat on and the soldier named 'Red,' stepped out in the street in front of the car and stopped it. There were two men in the car. Mr. White was at the steering wheel. They made the other man get out of the car until they searched the car and got what they wanted out of it, and then made the man get back in the car. Mr. White said, 'I am the electric light man; let me by.' Some of the boys said, 'Let him by,' and others said, 'Don't let him by,' and about that time a pistol fired, and the man in the car hallooed that he was shot. After these three men got in front of the car and stopped it, Will Davis went on the south side of the car, which was the same side Mr. White was sitting on, the man that was shot, and Will Davis put his gun right through the ribs or arms of the top of the car, the top being up; right at White's side, and the shot was fired, and as the car drove away all of them—I reckon all of them that had pistols—commenced shooting at the car. I have been knowing Will Davis for about a year. I never saw defendant Jim Scales in the crowd that night, as I know of; I didn't know him. Immediately after Mr. White was shot, the crowd went on up the street and held up another man, but I do not know who the man was. The distance from where they held up Mr. White to where they held up the other man was about as far as from witness stand to back end of courthouse. Then the crowd went on towards Jordan's store, and stopped on the corner of Fifth street and Highland avenue, right under the light."

Under the evidence and the charge of the court, to which there was no exception, the jury convicted the prisoner, Will Davis, of murder in the first degree. He was sentenced to death, and appealed from the judgment, assigning the following errors:

"(1) The court erred in overruling the prisoner's objection and allowing the witness Jacob Jackson to testify that some one in the crowd, seeing a car approaching, said, 'Let's stop him,' as shown by the prisoner's first exception.

"(2) There was error in overruling the prisoner's objection, and allowing the witness Jeff H. Jackson to testify that some one in the crowd of colored people said, 'We'll get him,' as shown by the prisoner's second exception.

"(3) There was error in allowing the witness John C. Ayers to testify in regard to an assault made upon him by Jim Scales, over the objection of the prisoner, when there was no evidence that this defendant had anything to do with the assault on Ayers, or that he was in the crowd at that time, as shown by the prisoner's third exception.

"(4) There was error in allowing the witness Ed. Gordon to testify, over the prisoner's objection, that a crowd was coming up Fifth street, and they said, 'Halt!'; as there was no evidence that this defendant was in the crowd at that time, as shown by prisoner's fourth exception."

By consent of the solicitor, a verdict of not guilty was returned as to James Scales.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). There was plenary evidence to show that the prisoner shot the deceased, inflicting a mortal wound from which he died. The charge of the court upon all the different phases of the case was exhaustive and correct in every particular, and there is no exception to it. We will proceed, therefore, to consider the questions of evidence.

[1] First. There is a slight error of fact in this assignment of error, as the witness Jacob Jackson stated, not that "some one in the crowd said 'Let's hold him,'" but that

"they," meaning, of course, the crowd, said so. But, assuming that he had referred to only some one in the crowd, the evidence was competent, and what we say here covers the second assignment of error. For the purpose of showing the admissibility of this evidence, we may well refer to Saunders v. Gilbert, 156 N. C. 468, at pages 470 and 471, 72 S. E. 610, at page 613 (38 L. R. A. [N. S.] 404). In that case it appeared that many persons had gathered in the street and followed the plaintiff to his home, where they stopped in front of his house, some or all of them using abusive and threatening language. The question arose in the trial below whether these outcries of this mob, or unlawful assembly, were competent against each and every one of the crowd. With regard to this we said:

"The testimony as to what was said in the road and in front of the plaintiff's home was clearly competent. The res gestæ includes what was said as well as what was done. The acts and the outcries of this unlawful assembly—for that is, in plain speech and in law, what it was—is held to be competent as pars rei gestæ, and also as tending to show their purpose or quo animo. Nothing is better settled than this rule of evidence. State v. Rawls, 65 N. C. 334; State v. Worthington, 64 N. C. 594. We find it stated in 4 Elliott on Evidence, § 3128, that 'what is said and done by persons during the time they are engaged in a riot (or unlawful assembly) constitutes the res gestæ, and it is, of course, competent, as a rule, to prove all that is said and done—the acts and words of the mob or any members of it, as in Rex v. Gordon, 21 State Trials, 485 (563), wherein evidence of the cries of the mob 'No Popery,' as it was proceeding towards Parliament House, were held competent and admissible as a part of the res gestæ."

This would seem to be a full answer to these objections. The same rule of evidence had been before stated, and applied, by us in Henderson-Snyder Co. v. Polk, 149 N. C. 104, 107, 62 S. E. 904. We there held that, where two prisoners are engaged together in the execution of a common design to defraud others, the declarations of each relating to the enterprise, and in furtherance of it, are evidence against the other, though made in the latter's absence, if a common design has been shown, citing Lincoln v. Clafin, 7 Wall. 132, 19 L. Ed. 106. It is, perhaps, the universal rule that any act done, or any declaration made, by any one of the conspirators in the furtherance or perpetration of the alleged conspiracy may be given in evidence against himself or his coconspirators. This rule has been more aptly stated as follows:

"The law undoubtedly is that, where two or more persons combine or associate together for the prosecution of some fraudulent or illegal purpose, any act or declaration made by one of them in furtherance of the common object, and forming a part of the res gestæ, may be given in evidence against the other."

The principle on which the declarations of other conspirators, and acts done at different times, are admitted in evidence against the persons prosecuted, is that, by the act of conspiring together, the conspirators have jointly assumed to themselves, as a body, the attribute of individuality, so far as regards the prosecution of the common design, thus rendering whatever is done or said by one in furtherance of that design a part of the res gestæ, and therefore the act of all. Substantially the same rule applies in criminal as in civil cases as to the admissibility of the acts or declarations of one conspirator as original evidence against each member of the conspiracy. 4 Elliott on Evidence, § 2939, citing Card v. State, 109 Ind. 415, 9 N. E. 591; Cuyler v. McCartney, 40 N. Y. 221; State v. George, 29 N. C. 327; Cabiness v. Martin, 15 N. C. at page 110. See, also, Lockhart on Evidence, § 210; Blair v. Brown, 116 N. C. 631, 21 S. E. 434. This doctrine as to the competency of the cry, or exclamation, of a mob, or any one of the mob, while it is in the prosecution of its illegal design or purpose, has been of long standing, and was certainly established in the proceedings against Lord George Gordon for high treason, when such evidence was freely admitted by Lord Mansfield and his associates on the King's Bench, Justices Willes, Ashurst, and Buller, who presided at the hearing of that celebrated case (21 St. Trials, 486) for the same riot, so graphically described by Charles Dickens in his Barnaby Rudge.

[2, 3] Second. As to the third and fourth assignments, we must hold that there was evidence that the prisoner was with the rioters when the assault was committed on John O. Ayers, and also when they were marching on Fifth street and crying, "Halt!" These events were but a part of one whole transaction, which was continuous in its nature and essence, from beginning to end, and what was said or done by the mob, or any of its members, was competent to show its unlawful character and motives. It was held, in a case resembling this one in its principal features, that acts and circumstances forming a continuation of the main transaction are admissible as pars rei gestæ. Floyd v. State, 143 Ga. 286, 84 S. E. 971. The several events occurring, one after the other, in close and connected succession, must be viewed as linked together for one purpose, which was a bad one as tending to a breach of the public peace and to strike terror into the travelers on the highway, who had the right to go their way without molestation or being made afraid. It had for its purpose even more than that evil design; it aimed actually, not only to terrify, but to commit highway robbery, or murder, if need be, in order to gratify its fiendish and wanton desire. It was regardless of every duty it owed to society, and fatally bent on mischief. While in the execution of their illegal and high-handed purpose, to hold that any outcry from this band of marauders is not admissible as evidence against each one of them would violate a rule of the law too well established, founded as it is upon a just and adequate reason, to be set at naught where it applies so aptly. Dr. Wharton, in his excellent treatise on Evidence, has said: If in one of our streets there is an unexpected collision between two men, entire strangers to each other, then the res gestæ of the collision are confined within the few moments that it occupies. When again there is a social feud in which two religious factions, as in the case of the Lord George Gordon disturbances or of the Philadelphia riots of 1844, are arrayed against each other for weeks, and so much absorbed in the collision as to be conscious of little else, then all that such parties do and say under such circumstances is as much part of the res gestæ as the blows given in homicides for which particular prosecutions may be brought. 1 Wharton on Evidence, § 258; Lake Shore, etc., Ry. Co. v. Herrick, 49 Ohio St. 25, 29 N. E. 1052; Small v. Williams, 87 Ga. 681, 13 S. E. 589; Linck v. Vorhauer, 104 Mo. App. 368, 79 S. W. 478. And 2 Jones on Ev. § 347, states that in such cases the declarations have been received on the ground that they were but parts of a continuous act which showed the intention of the person or persons whose motives were in question and as explanatory of the act. The rule in this respect is well stated in Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Hillmon, 145 U. S. 285, 12 Sup. Ct. 909, 36 L. Ed. 706:

"Wherever the bodily or mental feelings of an individual are material to be proved, the usual expressions of such feelings are original and competent evidence. Those expressions are the natural reflexes of what it might be impossible to show by other testimony. If there be such other testimony, this may be necessary to set the facts thus developed in their true light, and to give them their proper effect. As independent explanatory or corroborative evidence, it is often indispensable to the due administration of justice. Such declarations are regarded as verbal acts, and are as competent as any other testimony, when relevant to the issue. Their truth or falsity is an inquiry for the jury."

And it is also said that, from whatever point of view a given circumstance is regarded in connection with its admissibility as one of the res gestæ it is absolutely essential that the claim shall be founded on its being one of the immediate family of facts which relevantly constitute the real subject-matter. Does it belong to it, or has it only a distant relation and relevancy? If it is no part, then the admissibility, if at all, must be based on ground other than that of res gestæ. Although, as we have seen, different tribunals do not agree as to the degree of strictness or liberality with which they apply the rule that the declaration should be contemporaneous with the transaction in issue, there is no doubt but that the declaration must be a part of such transaction, and that it must illustrate or explain it. The declarations must be calculated to unfold the nature and quality of the facts which they are intended to explain; they must so harmonize with those facts as to form one transaction, of which they are considered a part; they must be concomitant with the principal act, and so connected with it as to be regarded as the result and consequence of coexisting motives. These declarations, especially when in the form of instantaneous or contemporaneous outcries, or exclamations, are admitted as evidence upon the idea that they are natural and spontaneous utterances, which are prompted by no intention to suppress or conceal the truth, the declarant having no opportunity for deliberation or the fabrication of evidence. This kind of proof is not only very persuasive, but, nearly always, very convincing in its probative force.

In any view we can fairly take of this case and the court's ruling, we find that the trial was entirely free from errors, and that the prisoner's rights have been fully protected. The charge of the court was a remarkably clear, accurate, and forceful one.

[4] The question whether Judge Bryson had lawful authority to preside over the court in which the prisoner was tried and convicted has been fully considered and decided against the prisoner's contention at this term in State v. Harden & Beale, 98 S. E. 782, and State v. Simmerson, 98 S. E. 784, and no further discussion would seem to be necessary. It may be well to state, though, that Judge Lane acted properly and discreetly in abstaining from attendance at the court, as there were only two days for him to preside (December 30th and 31st), because Judge Bryson's term commenced on the 3d day of January 1, 1919, when he duly qualified and was ready to proceed with the business of the court. Judge Bryson acted properly in notifying the sheriff to adjourn the court from day to day for four days until he could qualify and appear to hold the court, although the sheriff had the power, under the statute, to do this without any notice. State v. Wood, 175 N. C. 809, 95 S. E. 1050. That case decides the principal question involved here as to the power of Judge Bryson, as there it was held:

(1) "The provision that the sheriff should adjourn the court from day to day until the fourth day of the term, and then for the term, in the absence of the judge who was to have held it, under the law, is subject to the provision that this shall be done 'unless the sheriff shall be sooner informed that the judge, from any cause, cannot hold the term,' which implies the power of the judge to order an adjournment to a later day in the term. Revisal, § 1510."

(2) "Where the sheriff has not continued a term of the superior court for the absence of the judge to hold the same, the judge may appear at any day within the term, and the proceedings thereafter will be valid. Revisal, § 1510." (If the sheriff had not already adjourned the term under the statute.)

(3) "Where the judge of the district is prevented from holding a term of court, as in case of detention by a trial in another county extending over into such term, the Governor may designate and appoint another judge to hold such term, or a part thereof, though within the same district, and by virtue of his commission he is a judge both de facto and de jure, while so acting."

No error.

(177 N. C. 564)

STATE v. EVANS. (No. 273.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 26, 1919.)

1. HOMICIDE ¶268 — PREMEDITATED KILLING—INTENT—NONSUIT.

In prosecution for murder, resulting in conviction of murder in second degree, there being evidence to justify finding that defendant was aggressor in quarrel with deceased, went home to get his pistol, and did so with purpose to engage in a fight with and slay deceased at the first opportunity, motion for nonsuit was properly overruled.

2. HOMICIDE ¶334, 340(4)—HARMLESS ERROR—RULINGS AND CHARGE.

Where defendant was acquitted of murder in the first degree, and convicted in the second degree, any error in the rulings or the charge relating solely to murder in the first degree was harmless to him.

3. CRIMINAL LAW ¶720(2) — TRIAL — REMARKS OF SOLICITOR—REFERENCE TO EVIDENCE.

In prosecution for murder, remarks of solicitor, in contrasting state's evidence with defendant's, that there was one disinterested white witness whose evidence should be believed, and that it was not necessary to trust to memory for what the witness said, for he had the typewritten evidence of the court stenographer's notes, etc., from which he then read, were proper, though the cross-examination had not been typewritten, he having had the right to refer to the notes for greater accuracy.

4. CRIMINAL LAW ¶1144(12) — APPEAL — PRESUMPTION — CORRECTNESS OF STENOGRAPHER'S NOTES.

It will be presumed, at least prima facie, and in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that notes of the evidence taken by an official stenographer, appointed under authority given by statute, were correct.

5. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡741(1), 742(1)—WEIGHT AND CREDIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

The weight of evidence and the credibility of witnesses in a prosecution for murder are solely questions for the jury's determination.

6. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡730(14)—CURE OF ERROR—REMARKS OF STATE'S ATTORNEY DRAWING COLOR LINE.

The remark of the solicitor that there was one disinterested white witness whose evidence should be believed, if erroneous, was cured by the court's statement that in the administration of the law every citizen stands upon an equality before the bar of justice, irrespective of his color.

7. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡1043(3)—APPEAL—OBJECTION BELOW—RAISING NEW OBJECTION.

Where defendant objected to solicitor's remarks in argument, on ground that it was improper to refer to stenographer's transcripts of testimony, which did not embody cross-examination, defendant cannot raise on appeal objection that remarks were also erroneous as drawing color line adversely to defendant, a negro.

8. HOMICIDE ⚡151(1) — KILLING WITH DEADLY WEAPON—BURDEN TO SHOW MITIGATION OR EXCUSE.

A killing with a deadly weapon, admitted or proven, requires the prisoner to satisfy the jury as to the existence of all matters of mitigation or excuse relied on by him.

9. HOMICIDE ⚡35, 43—"MANSLAUGHTER."

Manslaughter is the unlawful killing of another without malice, as where one unlawfully kills another by reason of the anger suddenly aroused by provocation deemed sufficient in law.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Manslaughter.]

10. HOMICIDE ⚡23(1)—MURDER IN SECOND DEGREE—MALICE.

Where defendant, after quarreling with deceased, cursed him, and went home and got a pistol, returned, and shot deceased, though the latter had a cant-hook with him as a weapon, defendant was guilty at least of murder in the second degree, having killed with malice.

11. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡730(14) — TRIAL — CAUTION AGAINST RACE PREJUDICE.

Even though exception was not properly taken to the solicitor's remarks in argument possibly injecting the race issue into the case, defendant being a negro, it was proper for the trial court fully to caution the jury against the influence of all prejudice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cumberland County; Lyon, Judge.

Dave Evans was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals. No error.

The prisoner was indicted for the murder of Vivian L. Bundy, and was convicted of murder in the second degree.

The state's evidence tended to show that Bundy, the deceased, was woods boss of a gang of sawmill hands, of whom the defendant, Dave Evans, was one. W. M. Dixon, paymaster and general manager of the mill, had loaned the defendant $2.50 the Saturday before, and had told Bundy and Walker, who ran the sawmill, to get the checks for it when Evans came for settlement the following Saturday. The state's witness R. T. Walker testified:

"The defendant worked out enough to pay back the $2.50, and Bundy asked Dave for his checks. Dave said he would give them to Mr. Dixon or pay him the money. Bundy said it was no use to do that, as the others had given him their checks. Bundy told Dave three times to get out of the commissary. Witness thought it was over with, and went into the back part of the store. Dave picked up a bottle. Dave said, 'God damn him, I'll get him; he thinks he is the only bully around here.' Dave then left in his wagon in which there was sawdust. He lives about a mile and a half from the mill. He came back in a short time. He had a brick. The witness talked with him, and Dave gave him the checks. The witness told him he had better go off and not have any trouble about the matter, and Dave walked off. This was outside the commissary. When the witness went in Bundy asked him if he would be there awhile, and Bundy went out. Bundy said, 'You've got a brick for me, have you?' and Bundy came back, picked up a cant-hook, and went out. Witness heard three shots, and went to the door to see what was the matter. He saw Bundy walking away, when Dave shot him again. He heard three shots before he went to the door. Dixon was paymaster at the mill, and Bundy woods boss. It was a new cant-hook handle, with no hook on it."

W. M. Dixon testified as follows:

"He lives eight miles from Dunn, and is general manager of the sawmill, and saw part of the homicide. He was driving a Ford car, and, as he turned in towards the mill, he saw two men who seemed to be in combat. Then he had to look at his car, and heard a shot. Looking up, he saw smoke. Both men were in down position. He saw one of the men shoot again and again. The white man straightened up and started to run off, timid-like, as though he was weak. He got off something like 25 or 30 feet from the other man, and another shot was fired when Bundy was near the logs on the tramroad. The witness was then 60 or 70 yards from the main road. He saw Evans look back and start running down the tramroad. Bundy called to him, saying that he was dying, and came meeting him, and told him to take him to the hospital as quick as he could. The witness told Bundy maybe he was not so bad off, and the witness jumped out of the car and helped Bundy in. He did not see the first shot; at the second shot the men were a few feet apart, and the same at the third shot. He saw nothing in Bundy's hand when he threw up his arms. Bundy got off 30 or 40 feet at the fourth shot. The witness was then about 200 yards away from them. Bundy's back or left side was towards Evans when he shot the last time, Bundy having turned to the left to catch on the logs, and nearly all of the mill hands were at the store during the shooting."

N. H. McGeachy, sheriff of the county, testified that—

"he arrested defendant at his sister's house, and his sister had locked the doors and told him not to enter the house. Dave's pistol was under the pallet on which he was lying, and three bullets had been shot out of it"

Dr. Parker testified that—

"there were three wounds in Bundy's body, one at the left nipple, which in his opinion went straight in, for if it had ranged to the right it would have perforated the heart, and the heart was not perforated; one through the left forearm, which went straight through; and the third, and last, in the left flank, and this ranged to the right, making three perforations in the intestines. This wound, in his opinion, was the chief cause of Bundy's death."

There was evidence on the part of the prisoner tending to show, as it is correctly stated by the counsel of the prisoner, the following facts:

"The deceased and the defendant were working at a sawmill of which W. M. Dixon was paymaster. Dixon had loaned defendant $2.50, which was due the day of the homicide. On being given his time checks deceased asked defendant for his checks, and he replied that he was going to give them to Mr. Dixon when he came. Deceased cursed defendant and ordered him out of the commissary. Evans went home after other checks. While eating dinner his wife called him and told him she heard a car going down the road, which defendant thought was Mr. Dixon's, so he went on back to the mill to pay him, but found he had not arrived. He joined some of the other hands in throwing bricks at other bricks thrown in the air. R. T. Walker, who ran the sawmill, then came out of the commissary, and defendant asked him about turning over the checks to Mr. Bundy, and defendant gave them to Walker, who went back in the commissary, when Bundy asked Walker if he would be there awhile, and Bundy went out to defendant, and he and defendant talked together. Deceased cursed defendant, and ran back in the commissary and got a cant-hook handle and came out again. Defendant ran and deceased ran after him. Defendant ran 75 yards, when deceased knocked him down with the cant-hook handle, near a tramroad. Deceased ran by him, and turned and came back, and was striking defendant, who was on the ground. Defendant pulled out his pistol while on the ground, and shot three times, and at the third shot Bundy had the handle drawn back to strike again. Deceased had three bullet wounds. He died on Monday after the shooting on Saturday."

There was also evidence from which the jury might reasonably infer, if they believed it, that the prisoner, after the first colloquy with the deceased, went to his home, one and a half miles distant from the sawmill, to get his pistol, having picked up the bottle, cursed the deceased, and sworn that he would get him; that he did get the pistol, and returned in a short time to the mill, when the affray took place, the deceased using the cant-hook and the prisoner the pistol; and the jury might also have properly inferred that the prisoner acted with express malice, deliberation, and premeditation, and that his purpose was to arm himself, and then to return to the mill and provoke the fight, with the intent to slay the deceased when he had the chance.

The solicitor, in the course of his argument, was contrasting the evidence of the state with that of the prisoner, and in doing so stated that there was one disinterested white witness whose evidence should be believed, Mr. Dixon's; that it was not necessary to trust to memory as to what this witness said, for he had the typewritten evidence of the court stenographer's notes, which he would read. Upon objection, the court stated that the typewritten evidence had been handed to him by the court stenographer. Defendant again objected and excepted. The solicitor again proceeded to read to the jury from said papers a portion of Dixon's evidence, and again defendant objected and excepted. He also excepted for the further reason that it was incomplete in that only the notes of the direct evidence of the state's witnesses Walker and Dixon had been written out, and not their cross-examination, nor the evidence of any other witness.

Several witnesses testified that the prisoner's character is bad, but the most of them stated that they had not heard anything against him until the other shooting affair, which occurred six months ago.

There was other evidence in the case not necessary to be now stated. The prisoner's testimony tended to show a clear case of self-defense, and this was admitted to be so by the Attorney General in his brief and argument.

The court charged the jury, in part, as follows:

"The defendant, Dave Evans, is indicted for murder. There has been something said about his being a negro and the deceased a white man. I want to say to you, gentlemen of the jury, that it would be a sad day for North Carolina if, in the administration of the law, juries or courts would have two laws—one for the colored man and one for the white man. There is but one law known and recognized among the people of the state, and that law is administered the same for the white man as for the colored man, and the same for the colored man as for the white man, and no brave man, under his oath, will permit the fact that the defendant is a colored man to influence his verdict one way or the other. Only a coward would be guilty of such cowardly perjury. As I have said to you, the defendant is indicted for murder, charged with the murder of Vivian L. Bundy, and every person charged with crime is presumed to be innocent until his guilt is proven, and the de-defendant in this case cannot be convicted unless the state satisfies you from the evidence of his guilt. The law of this state does not permit me to express, either directly or indirectly, to the jury an opinion upon the facts of the case, weight of the evidence, or the credibility of the witnesses. These are matters exclusively for the jury, and the court has not consciously done or said anything to influence you one way or the other. It is the duty of jurors to take the law from the court and the evidence from the witnesses. You are to determine what facts have been established by the evidence, and to such facts apply the rule of law given by the court, and return a verdict accordingly, regardless of consequences either to the state or to the defendant. There are four verdicts that you can render in this case: First, a verdict of murder in the first degree; second, a verdict of murder in the second degree; third, a verdict of manslaughter; and, fourth, a verdict of not guilty."

The court then stated the facts of the case as the jury might find them to be, and explained the law fully and carefully, dwelling upon every phase of the testimony.

The jury found the prisoner guilty of murder in the second degree. Judgment and appeal by him.

W. C. Downing and Sinclair & Dye, all of Fayetteville, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The motion for a nonsuit was properly overruled. As we have said in our statement of the case, there was evidence upon which the jury might well have concluded that the prisoner was the aggressor in the quarrel with the deceased; that he went to his home for the purpose of getting his pistol, and thereby preparing himself for the combat, so that he would have the advantage of his adversary; and that this was done with the purpose and intent of engaging in the fight and slaying the deceased at the first opportunity. He was willing and ready for the fray, and entered into it with deadly purpose. But the jury, it seems, took the lenient view, and convicted him of the lesser crime. There being ample evidence of murder and of manslaughter, the assignment of error, which is based upon the allegation that there was none, cannot be sustained.

[2] The first, second, seventh, eighth, eleventh, thirteenth, and fourteenth exceptions assign errors in the rulings or the charge, relating solely to murder in the first degree; but the prisoner was acquitted of this offense, and therefore error, if there was any, proved to be harmless. State v. Bryson, 173 N. C. 808, 92 S. E. 698; State v. McCourry, 128 N. C. 594, 38 S. E. 883; State v. Casey, 159 N. C. 472, 74 S. E. 625. If there was any error in respect to murder in the first degree, it was favorable to the prisoner, as the charge did not, upon the facts to be inferred from the state's testimony, comply fully with the principle as stated in State v. Brittain, 89 N. C. 481; State v. Garland, 188 N. C. 675, 50 S. E. 853; State v. Kennedy, 169 N. C. 326, 85 S. E. 42; Foster's Crown Law, p. 277; and the rule as formulated by Lord Hale, and quoted by Justice Ashe, in State v. Brittain, supra. There may not have been any positive or affirmative error, even in favor of the prisoner, in this part of the charge, but the court made no distinct reference or application to the principle just stated, and we think there was evidence to warrant it. But, as has been seen, if there was error in this respect, the prisoner assuredly has no reason to complain of it.

[3-5] The exception as to the remarks of the solicitor is without merit. He had the right to refer to the evidence in his argument for the sake of greater accuracy. The notes of the evidence were taken by an official stenographer appointed under the authority given by a statute, and it will be presumed, at least prima facie, and in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that they were correct. There is no suggestion that they were not, but the ground of objection is that the cross-examination had not been typewritten. There is no proof that the solicitor misquoted the testimony, but every reason to believe that he did not. He was careful of the prisoner's rights, and would not trust to his own memory, but, to be just to the prisoner, he referred to the notes, as a safer and more reliable source from which to draw an accurate reproduction of what the witness had said, using his own language. There was nothing wrong in this. The court correctly instructed the jury as to how they should pass upon the evidence, as follows:

"These, weight of evidence and credibility of witnesses, are matters exclusively for the jury, and the court has not consciously done or said anything to influence you one way or the other. It is the duty of jurors to take the law from the court and the evidence from the witnesses. You are to determine what facts have been established by the evidence." (Italics ours.)

[6, 7] If the solicitor should not have attached more importance to the testimony of the witness, W. M. Dixon, because he was a white man, and thereby drawn the color line, as the prisoner's counsel contended, the court very fully, and in emphatic language, counteracted any prejudice that could have been engendered thereby, even to the extent of telling the jury that it would be "cowardly perjury" to be influenced by such consideration. We have no idea that the solicitor intended to arouse any prejudice against the prisoner by his remark. The word was incidentally used rather than intentionally or designedly. The point was that his only witness to the material part of the transaction, who had a clear view of the scene of the tragedy, happened to be a white man, who was entirely disinterested. But, if there was any evil in the argument, as drawing the color line, the court swept it from the case by his trenchant reference to it. In the administration of the law by the courts of this state, every citizen stands upon an equality before the bar of justice, and the judge so stated. It may be further said that the objection to the remarks of the solicitor were general, and there were two distinct propositions, the exception to one of which we have already overruled. State v. Ledford, 133 N. C. 714, 45 S. E. 944; Quelch v. Futch, 175 N. C. 694, 94 S. E. 714; Caldwell County v. George, 176 N. C. 602, 97 S. E. 507. The ground of objection, based upon drawing the color line, was not distinctly assigned until the brief of the prisoner's counsel was filed. The court had the right to infer from the form of the objection when first taken, and the same inference also is to be drawn from the assignment of error, that the sole ground of objection was to the reading of the typewritten notes of the witness' testimony. The objection, therefore, comes substantially within the rule that an appellant is restricted to the ground of objection to evidence stated below (Kidder v. McIlhenny, 81 N. C. 123; Rollins v. Henry, 78 N. C. 342; Ludwick v. Penny, 158 N. C. 104, 73 S. E. 228); and also within the rule stated in State v. Tyson, 133 N. C. at page 699, 45 S. E. 838, where we said that a party will not be permitted to treat with indifference anything said or done during the trial that may injuriously affect his interests, thus taking the chance of a favorable verdict, and afterwards, when he has lost, assert for the first time that he has been prejudiced by what occurred. His silence will be taken as a tacit admission that at the time he thought he was suffering no harm, but was perhaps gaining an advantage, and consequently it will be regarded as a waiver of his right afterwards to object. Having been silent when he should have spoken, we will not permit him to speak when by every consideration of fairness he should be silent. We will not give him two chances. The law helps those who are vigilant, not those who sleep upon their rights. He who would save his rights must be prompt in asserting them. We do not think, in the most favorable view to be taken for the prisoner, in the present case, that there was any such abuse of the judge's discretion, if there was any at all, to require a reversal.

"The conduct of a trial in the court below, including the argument of counsel, must be left largely to the control and direction of the presiding judge, who, to be sure, should be careful to see that nothing is said or done which would be calculated unduly to prejudice any party in the prosecution or defense of his case, and when counsel grossly abuse their privilege at any time in the course of the trial the presiding judge should interfere at once, when objection is made at the time, and correct the abuse. If no objection is made, while it is still proper for the judge to interfere in order to preserve the due and orderly administration of justice and to prevent prejudice, and to secure a fair and impartial trial of the facts, it is not his duty to do so in the sense that his failure to act at the time, or to caution the jury in his charge, will entitle the party who alleges that he has been injured to a new trial. Before that result can follow the judge's inaction, objection must be entered at least before the verdict." State v. Tyson, 133 N. C. at page 698, 45 S. E. 838; Knight v. Houghtalling, 85 N. C. 17.

The trial was perfectly fair and impartial, and the verdict was fully justified by the evidence. There is not the slightest appearance of prejudice or bias, but, on the contrary, it would seem that the jury was merciful to the prisoner.

The charge of the court covered the entire case, in every phase of it, and the instructions were correct and in accordance with the most approved precedents. It was not only an adequate charge, but, in all essential respects, an excellent one. If there was any defect, there was none which prejudiced the prisoner's case in the least degree.

[8] 1. A killing with a deadly weapon, admitted or proven, requires the prisoner to satisfy the jury as to the existence of all matters of mitigation or excuse relied on by him. The latest applications of this doctrine are to be found in State v. Atwood, 176 N. C. 704, 97 S. E. 12; State v. Johnson, 176 N. C. 722, 97 S. E. 14, where the authorities are collected.

[9] 2. Manslaughter is the unlawful killing of another without malice, an instance of the crime so defined being, where one unlawfully kills another by reason of the anger suddenly aroused by provocation, which the law deems sufficient; the anger being naturally aroused from such provocation, and the killing being done before time has elapsed for passion to subside and reason to resume its sway. State v. Merrick, 171 N. C. 788, 88 S. E. 501, and cases there cited.

3. The legal effect of "beginning the fight willingly" and "cooling time" have been recently elaborately discussed in State v. Kennedy, 169 N. C. 326, 85 S. E. 42, and in State v. Crisp, 170 N. C. 785, 87 S. E. 511.

These principles were all fully explained to the jury, and all others pertinent to the case on this appeal. The doctrine of reasonable doubt was correctly stated and applied, and the jury could not have misunderstood the law in regard to it.

[10] The prisoner had no reason to complain of the verdict. He had threatened the deceased upon trivial grounds, saying that he would show him "that he was not the only bully around here," and he cursed him with the imprecation, "God damn him, I will get him," and immediately left the mill, riding to his home in a wagon, and procuring his pistol, which he concealed, and returning to execute his threat "that he would get him" the deceased, which he so quickly did. This may not be true, and the prisoner's version may be the right one, but there was sufficient evidence for a finding that it was true. If so, the prisoner fought, not upon the principle of self-defense, but from malice pre-conceived, and with a definite intent to kill when he engaged in the fight, which, as the testimony shows, he did willingly, if not eagerly. He first secured to himself the safer side of the contemplated affray by arming himself beforehand with a deadly weapon, and then proceeded to the field of the conflict, where the second quarrel occurred which he must have been seeking, and there did his deadly work. It is like State v. Hogue, 51 N. C. 381, 384, where Chief Justice Pearson says for the court:

"The deceased committed a violent assault upon the prisoner as he entered the room. This was legal provocation, and, if the case stopped there, the killing would be manslaughter, and the character of the deceased as a quiet or violent man would be immaterial; but the case did not stop there, for the jury, under instructions of which the prisoner has no right to complain, find that he killed 'of his malice aforethought'—that he had formed the deadly purpose—prepared the weapon, and sought that particular time and place to do the deed. So the character of the deceased was immaterial. It is surely murder to kill with malice, express or aforethought, no matter how violent or wicked the deceased may be. His honor laid down one proposition which we think too favorable to the prisoner, and it is referred to, lest it may mislead. It assumes that the prisoner 'had prepared a deadly weapon with an intention to use it in case he got into a fight with the deceased, and went into the dining room for the purpose of meeting with the deceased, and with an expectation of having a conflict with him,' and the killing is held to be manslaughter. Killing under these circumstances would be murder, because of the preconceived malice, although the deceased made the first assault;" citing State v. Martin, 24 N. C. 101.

It is true the deceased had a cant-hook, which is a wooden lever with a movable iron hook near the end, used for canting or turning over logs; but, according to Hogue's Case, this does not relieve the prisoner of all guilt, or necessarily mitigate the guilt of murder. He fought with malice and a purpose to slay the deceased if he got the chance, and not in self-defense, so the jury found, and there was ample evidence of the fact.

There also was evidence, and, too, strong evidence, that his purpose to kill was pre-conceived, premeditatedly and deliberately formed; but the jury, as we have said, gave the prisoner the benefit of the doubt as to this feature of the case, and acquitted him of murder in the first degree, and convicted him only of slaying the deceased with malice.

[11] We may add that we commend the charge of the court as to race prejudice. It was proper, even though exception was not properly taken, that the jury should have been fully cautioned against the influence of all prejudice. There is but one law, as he stated, for all citizens, and our judges have always been careful to guard against any prejudice, if it exists, on account of racial antipathies. We do not believe such prejudice exists, and our records show that it does not. Our judges will be prompt, as they have been, to eradicate all such evil considerations from the jury box, which are calculated to poison the fountain of truth, and prevent even and exact justice to all men, of whatever state, race, or persuasion. We have striven to this end persistently, and will continue to do so whenever necessary. The presiding judge did not too strongly denounce a juror who would be swayed by any bad motive to do wrong by preventing justice and corrupting his verdict.

Our conclusion is that no error is disclosed by the record.

No error.

PENN v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.
(No. 10172.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 22, 1919.)

1. CARRIERS \S 277(5) — PASSENGERS — REFUSAL TO CARRY ON TICKET SOLD — DAMAGES.

Where the defendant carrier's agent sold a ticket, and the conductor refused because of the routing of the ticket to carry the purchaser, and she sued for the resulting damages, testimony held not at all suggestive of the willful conduct of the conductor, but to merely suggest negligence of the ticket seller for which plaintiff was compensated by a verdict for actual damages.

2. CARRIERS \S 278(1)—CONTRACT OF TRANSPORTATION — BREACH — ACTION FOR NEGLIGENCE AND WILLFULNESS.

In a passenger's action against a railroad company for actual and punitive damages, where there is evidence of negligence in the routing of the ticket but none of the conductor's willfulness in refusing to carry the passenger, the court should so direct the jury, and a nonsuit on the whole case would be improper.

Appeal from Richland County Court; M. S. Whaley, Judge.

Action by Maggie B. Penn against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Directed verdict for the plaintiff for actual damages and for defendant on the question of punitive damages, and plaintiff appeals. Judgment affirmed.

It is agreed that due notice of appeal to the Supreme Court was served with the following exception:

It is respectfully submitted that his honor, Judge M. S. Whaley, erred in directing a verdict as to punitive damages and directing, on motion of defendant's attorney, a verdict for actual damage in the sum of $2.20, in that:

(a) There was but one cause of action and not separable; (b) it should have been submitted to the jury under proper instruction to say whether the action of the ticket agent was willful and not mere inadvertence, and (c) whether the refusal of the conductor to carry plaintiff after her explanation and the circumstances surrounding was willful and wanton.

N. J. Frederick, of Columbia, for appellant.

Barron, McKay, Frierson & Moffatt, of Columbia, for respondent.

GAGE, J. Action by passenger against a carrier for actual and for punitive damages.

Direction of a verdict for the plaintiff on so much of the action as was for actual damages, and for the defendant on so much of the action as was for punitive damages.

Appeal by the plaintiff.

Let the one exception be reported.

The circumstances of the case are these: The plaintiff bought at the Union Station in Columbia a ticket from Columbia to Florence. Betwixt these termini there are two routes by the carrier; the one in common from Columbia to Sumter, and from that point the one diverging directly to Florence, and the other diverging Southward via Manning and Lanes' junction, thence Northward to Florence. For expedition the plaintiff intended to take the latter route, and she testified thus about the transaction:

"Plaintiff testified that she asked the ticket agent of defendant for a ticket to Florence, S. C., her destination, inquiring at the same time the price of the said ticket by way of Lanes, and being told the price by that route, purchased same, paying full fare as demanded by defendant's ticket agent; that being the only route by which plaintiff could go to Florence that hour of the morning. Plaintiff testified substantially as follows: That she did not read the ticket given her by the agent and was not aware that said ticket was not what she had asked for and paid for until her attention was called to it by the conductor on train between Columbia and Sumter, who told her she would have to wait at Sumter for the evening train. That knowing she had paid the proper fare to be carried to her destination that morning by way of Lanes, she boarded defendant's train at Sumter to go on to Florence. That after having put her baggage down, she went out of the car onto the ground and exhibited her ticket to the conductor of said train, who was standing there.

"Q. When you told the conductor that you had your ticket and had paid your fare, what did the conductor say to you? A. He said that he did not have anything to do with that; he could not carry me on it, because it was not routed. Q. And did you show the conductor your ticket? A. I did. Q. And he said it was not routed and he could not take you on it? A. Yes, sir."

[1] The carrier was represented by two agents, the conductor and the ticket seller. The testimony does not at all suggest willful conduct by the conductor; and the most it suggests by the ticket seller is negligence, and for that the plaintiff was compensated by the verdict.

[2] But the appellant contends that the complaint stated but one cause of action and the court had no right to split it; and she cites Griffin v. R. R., 65 S. C. 125, 43 S. E. 445.

It is true that if the complaint alleges both negligence and willfulness, and there be testimony tending to prove the former, then non-suit is not proper on the whole case. Machen v. W. U. T. Co., 72 S. C. 260, 51 S. E. 697; Carter v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 73 S. C. 434, 53 S. E. 539. But when there is some evidence of negligence and no evidence of willfulness, it is the duty of the court to direct the jury that there is no evidence of willfulness. Plainly, a party is not entitled to relief for a wrong unless there be testimony tending to support the allegation of a wrong.

The further contention of the appellant, that the conductor was bound to heed the reasonable explanation of the passenger (Smith v. R. R., 88 S. C. 421, 70 S. E. 1057, 34 L. R. A. [N. S.] 708), had no application to the facts of this case.

Judgment affirmed.

HONEYCUTT v. PACIFIC MILLS.
(No. 10176.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 29, 1919.)

MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨ 279(5) — INJURY TO SERVANT—FELLOW SERVANTS—FURNISHING INSTRUMENTALITIES FOR WORK—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action by a servant for injuries caused by a fellow servant in moving a heavy box by hand, evidence held to sustain finding that proximate cause of injury was moving of box without suitable machinery under direct command of a representative of master.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by D. J. Honeycutt against the Pacific Mills. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. Elliott and James H. Fowles, both of Columbia, for appellants.

James S. Verner and James H. Hammond, both of Columbia, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is an action for personal injury. The plaintiff, Honeycutt, was a mechanic in the employ of the defendant mills. The plaintiff was engaged in removing some boxed machinery from the elevator to the floor of the mill. The plaintiff and his collaborators were using trucks in moving the machinery. The trucks were provided for the purpose. The plaintiff testified that while he was at work moving the machinery by the trucks, Mr. Boling, the master mechanic, came up and ordered them to discontinue the use of the trucks and to move the machinery by hand. That while moving a heavy box of machinery, one of the negro hands was moving another box of machinery, without the use of a truck, in obedience to the order of Mr. Boling, and the negro's box struck the box the plaintiff was moving and injured the plaintiff. The plaintiff admitted that moving the machinery by hand was more dangerous than moving it by use of the trucks. The defendant denied that any such order was given. By its answer the defendant made a general denial, and pleaded that the injury was the act of a fellow servant, contributory negligence, and assumption of risk. The defendant moved for a nonsuit and a direction of a verdict, both of which were refused. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed upon four exceptions, but all are based upon the one proposition that there was no evidence to sustain the verdict. The proposition cannot be sustained. There was evidence that the proximate cause of the injury was the improper handling of another box of machinery by a fellow servant who was moving his box without suitable machinery, and that he was doing his work in this improper manner under the direct command of the representative of the master. It is true that the command is denied by the master but this made a question for the jury, and the presiding judge could neither grant a nonsuit nor direct a verdict.

The judgment is affirmed.

RHEA v. MAXWELL. (No. 10158.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 10, 1919.)

SUBROGATION ⇨ 31(1) — CORPORATE STOCK—PAYMENT BY ONE OF BORROWERS.

Where corporate stock owned by one of two brothers was put up as collateral for loan to both brothers, the one not owning the stock, upon paying the debt, was subrogated to the rights of the lender in the stock certificates until payment to him by the one owning the stock of his part of the debt.

Appeal from Richland County Court; M. S. Whaley, Judge.

Action by Hal H. E. Rhea against Dora Maxwell, as administrator of the estate of Samuel W. Rhea, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Halcott P. Green, of Columbia, for appellant.

Paul A. Cooper, Cole L. Blease, and Geo. A. Alderman, all of Columbia, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is an action in claim and delivery. In some respects the testimony in the case for appeal is not entirely clear. In some respects it is clear.

That part of it that is clear and undisputed is: There were three brothers, Samuel, Thomas, and Hal Rhea. Samuel and Thomas owned stock in the Rhea Live Stock Company. Thomas owned the four certificates of five shares each, now in dispute. When the company was organized, Mr. W. S. Reamer loaned to Thomas and Samuel some money, and took as security, in part, the four certificates of stock owned by Thomas, assigned in blank. Samuel paid the debt to Reamer, and Reamer returned to Samuel the collateral security. When Thomas was on the stand, he was asked:

"Q. Mr. Rhea, you have never paid for your shares of stock, have you? A. I have never paid any cash, but I executed a note for it. Q. You have never paid the note? A. No, sir; I still owe the note."

In 1914 Samuel borrowed $1,000 from the Carolina National Bank of Columbia, and gave his note for it, secured, among other things, by the note of Thomas, and these shares of stock. The proceeds of the Samuel Rhea note were put to the credit of Hal Rhea. Samuel died, and his administratrix, the defendant herein, was required to pay the note. When the note was paid the bank returned all the collateral (including the stock in dispute) to Mrs. Maxwell, the administratrix of Samuel Rhea. In 1916 Thomas Rhea assigned the stock in dispute to Hal Rhea. When the note was paid Hal Rhea demanded the four certificates of stock from the administratrix. This demand was refused, and this action was brought to get possession of the certificates of stock. Mr. Hal Rhea knew at the time of his purchase that the stock was held by the bank as collateral to the Samuel Rhea note.

When the plaintiff, Hal Rhea, was on the stand, he said the consideration was "$1,000 in money and other consideration, of which I have paid him, from month to month, between $700 and $800, and still owe him a little." There are other things in the case that make it doubtful as to whether the witness was referring to a debt to Samuel or Thomas. Be that as it may, when Samuel paid the debt to Reamer and took the collateral indorsed in blank, Samuel was subrogated to the rights of Reamer to hold the certificates of stock until Thomas paid his debt to Samuel. The stock was pledged as security for that debt, and in the absence of an agreement to the contrary Samuel was entitled to hold it until the debt was paid. The undisputed evidence is that that debt has not been paid. Thomas could not have recovered it from Samuel. Thomas could convey no higher right than he had. The assignee of Thomas cannot recover it from the administratrix of Samuel.

The verdict should have been directed for the defendant. This is merely a possessory action. What the ultimate right and equities may be are not affected by this action.

The judgment is reversed.

CUDD v. ROGERS. (No. 10174.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 22, 1919.)

1. PLEADING ¶8(3) — CONCLUSIONS OF LAW—ESTOPPEL.

An allegation of the answer, in a suit for the possession of an automobile, that the conduct of the plaintiff in impliedly permitting his mortgagor to sell the car amounted to estoppel, is immaterial, and a mere legal conclusion.

2. CHATTEL MORTGAGES ¶136—TRANSFER OF PROPERTY BY MORTGAGOR—CONSENT OF MORTGAGEE TO SALE.

One who loans an automobile dealer money with which to buy cars for resale, and takes a mortgage on the cars as security, in the absence of a stipulation to the contrary, impliedly consents to the sale of any such automobile to any buyer thereof, and cannot claim a lien as against such buyer, regardless of whether the buyer knows of the mortgage or not.

3. CHATTEL MORTGAGES ¶157(3)—ACTION AGAINST THIRD PARTY FOR POSSESSION — QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Whether the holder of a mortgage upon an automobile authorized his mortgagor to sell it held, under the evidence, a question for the jury.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; T. S. Sease, Judge.

Action by J. N. Cudd against J. W. Rogers. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Carson, Boyd & Tinsley, of Spartanburg, for appellant.

Sanders & De Pass and C. M. Drummond, all of Spartanburg, for respondent.

GAGE, J. Action to recover the possession of an automobile. There are pending several actions of a like character as this, and dependent upon the decision of this one. The defendant had a verdict, and from the judgment thereon the plaintiff has appealed here.

These are the circumstances of the transaction: Cudd is a citizen of substance at Spartanburg; Johnston is a vendor of cars. Johnston had no money. Johnston purchased six cars, and when the cars arrived at Spartanburg Cudd loaned Johnston the money to pay the drafts drawn against them. In order to secure himself from loss, Cudd took from Johnston a mortgage on the cars. Johnston's practice was to sell the cars, and he sold one to Crimm, and from that person Rogers bought the car.

The defense, inter alia, was:

"That the plaintiff authorized the sale and disposal of the said automobile to the defendant, or to any one else that it could be sold to, and therefore plaintiff has no claim over said car, and is estopped from asserting his lien."

That allegation makes the real issue in the case; for the appellant's brief declares that—

"The issue in this appeal is on the law of mortgagee's consent to sale of mortgaged property, and the exceptions are to the court's rulings on that issue, in charge and on motion for new trial."

Thereabout the court charged the jury in these words:

"Therefore, gentlemen, I charge you this: That if the mortgagee, Mr. Cudd, consented for the mortgagor, W. J. Johnston, to dispose of and sell the automobiles covered by this mortgage, and if Rogers bought the automobile through Johnston, or those acting for W. J. Johnston, then Rogers gets a good title to the automobile. If you find that Mr. Cudd consented to the sale of these automobiles, or to the sale of any one of them, because all of them are in the same condition—what applies to one applies to all, because the condition of the mortgage is the same as to all. If Mr. Cudd consented, either before he took the mortgage or after, that Johnston could sell the property, and in the course of business Johnston did sell the property, a good and complete title, and is entitled to keep the automobile; but the defendant must prove by the preponderance of the evidence, by the greater weight of the evidence, not beyond a reasonable doubt, and not necessarily by the greater number of witnesses, but by the greater weight of the evidence, that Mr. Cudd did so consent for Mr. Johnston to sell."

And thereabout the court refused to charge the jury, at the plaintiff's request, these words:

"I will define to you the issue for your consideration as to the consent of plaintiff to a sale and the release of this automobile from the mortgage. It is this: Did the plaintiff tell the defendant or his predecessors in possession of the automobile that he would not claim the same under his mortgage, or was his conduct toward the defendant or his predecessors in title such as would lead an ordinary prudent man to the belief that he had released the automobile from his mortgage? And you will leave out of consideration anything that Cudd told anybody else, unless it was carried to the defendant or his predecessors in possession before they purchased the car; and you will also disregard anything that anybody other than Cudd or his agent may have told the defendant or his predecessors in possession."

There are eight exceptions, but the brief and the argument at the bar concerned only the issue which arises out of the above charge and refusal to charge.

[1] It is true the before-quoted allegation of the answer, after describing the conduct of Cudd which is set up to defeat his lien, defines that conduct as estoppel. But that is immaterial. The substantial thing is, What did Cudd do? and not what the legal terminology of the act is. The allegation is that Cudd authorized the sale of the automobile to the defendant or to any one else that it could be sold to; the rest of the allegation is a legal conclusion, and it had as well not been recited.

[2] But, if Cudd did so authorize the sale, then he waived his right to claim lien upon the thing sold. Waiver and estoppel are close akin; but their likes and unlikes are not now material. The instant conduct more favors waiver than estoppel; but the conduct is effective without any nomenclature.

No argument is needed to prove that if a mortgagee permits his mortgagor to engage in trade, and to sell the incumbered property to whoever comes to buy, then the buyer takes his goods free from the lien of the mortgage. The charge only stated so much, but in different words.

[3] Indeed, appellant's counsel admitted at the bar that so much was true; his contention was that the testimony did not make such a case. That, though, was a matter for the jury under all the circumstances of the transaction. And in the case stated it is immaterial whether the buyer knew of the existence of the mortgage and relied on the mortgagee's implied consent to the sale.

The mortgage lien is lost, because the lienor consents to a transaction betwixt the lienor and the buying public which implies the lienor's consent to the transaction and consent to the loss of the lien. And the consent by the mortgagee to a sale by the mortgagor to the buying public may be imputed to the mortgagee, without the inference that to conclude otherwise would operate as a fraud on the buyer.

Fraud involves evil intent. In the case supposed a sale by the mortgagor may have been properly intended by the mortgagee. Indeed, it is not uncommon practice for a mortgagee to expressly agree in the mortgage instrument itself that sales by the mortgagee may be had to the public. See Marshall v. Crawford, 45 S. C. 189, 22 S. E. 792, cited by the appellant, and numerous other cases.

In such instances the incumbered property is, as it were, in a state of fluid; all the circumstances indicate that the mortgagor and mortgagee intended that it should move out into the channels of trade. The only way such a mortgagor can get his money is from the proceeds of sale of the incumbered property. The mortgagee in such cases consents to the sale, and trusts to the debtor to apply the proceeds thereof to the mortgage debt.

The judgment is affirmed.

DANIEL et al. v. DANIEL et al. (No. 10175.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 28, 1919.)

APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐1022(4)—REVIEW OF FINDING—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE TO SUPPORT.

In an action tried on the law side of the court on an issue of title, a finding of the trial court adverse to the findings of the master who made the report will not be disturbed on appeal, where there is sufficient evidence to warrant the court's findings.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; T. J. Mauldin, Judge.

Suit by R. E. Daniel and others against E. C. Daniel and S. S. Daniel. From a decree in favor of S. S. Daniel, plaintiffs and E. C. Daniel appeal. Affirmed.

Carlisle & Carlisle, Ralph K. Carson, and Jesse W. Boyd, all of Spartanburg, for appellants.

C. E. Daniel, R. A. Hannon, and I. C. Blackwood, all of Spartanburg, for respondents.

WATTS, J. This action was commenced in the usual form for partition. S. S. Daniel was made a party, under the allegation that he claimed some interest, and answered and claimed 175 acres of land under the provisions of his father's will and deed thereof made to him by the surviving executor. The case was referred to the master, who made his report, holding that S. S. Daniel had no interest in the premises. Exceptions were taken to the master's report. The circuit court sustained the exceptions and overruled the master's report and reversed his findings, and found that S. S. Daniel had fee-simple title to 175¼ acres, conveyed to him by the surviving executor, without any liability to account in any way.

From this decree appellants appeal, and by 22 exceptions impute error and seek reversal. These exceptions challenge the finding of fact of the circuit court, and present two questions; that under the evidence in the case the plaintiffs either have title by adverse possession, or the plaintiffs are mortgagees in possession. The pleadings in the case allege title in plaintiffs in common with E. C. Daniel, and the answer of S. S. Daniel sets up title in himself in severalty. E. C. Daniel by consent was eliminated from the contest, leaving the issue between the plaintiffs and S. S. Daniel as to the land claimed by him. The issue narrowed down to a legal issue of title between the parties, and this court will not review the findings of the circuit court, if there is testimony warranting the court's finding. In this case the circuit court tried the issue of title on the law side of the court, and, no doubt, took into consideration all of the issues involved, and considered the testimony from the various angles as affecting the case, whether the executor was not the trustee until the death of his mother, the life tenant under the will, and whether or not he was not at all times carrying out the provisions of the will, and whether or not there was sufficient evidence at any time that he threw off the trust, and no doubt considered the question whether he, being in possession as executor and trustee, could acquire title by adverse possession, or whether there was evidence of ouster. The evidence before the master was vague and unsatisfactory in many particulars on important issues in the case, but the case was a law case referred to the master, and finally tried by the judge, and his findings are not reversible by this court, as there is evidence to warrant his findings. All exceptions are overruled.

The judgment is affirmed.

BIBER v. DILLINGHAM. (No. 10173.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 22, 1919.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇐310(1)—NOTICE TO VACATE—SUFFICIENCY—EVIDENCE—JUDGMENT.

In an action to eject a tenant, a judgment reciting that "the evidence not only fails to show that notice (to vacate) was given, but, on the contrary, shows that it was not," is not subject to the contention that the court did not decide that no notice was given, but only that sufficient notice was not given, since the words are plain, and, besides, insufficient notice in such case is no notice.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇐37—RENTAL CONTRACT—TERMINATION—PROCEEDINGS.

Where landlord and tenant have entered into a contract as to the time and mode of terminating tenancy, their rights are to be determined by the fair construction of the contract, and not by technical rules applying only to termination of a tenancy at will under statutory provisions.

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇐84(1)—CLOSE OF TENANCY—NOTICE TO VACATE—AGREEMENT—STATUTORY PROCEDURE.

Where landlord and tenant had a rental agreement by which the property was held by the month, requiring on the part of each, 30 days' notice for termination, there could be no termination until the procedure provided by the parties was practiced to end the tenancy, notwithstanding the landlord's procedure under Civ. Code 1912, § 3509.

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT ¶308(1)—PROCEEDING TO EJECT TENANT — BURDEN OF PROOF.

In a landlord's proceeding to eject a tenant, the burden was upon the landlord to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that he had given the notice to vacate required by the rent contract.

5. LANDLORD AND TENANT ¶94(3)—NOTICE TO VACATE—INTENTION—CONTRACT—STATUTE.

It is ordinarily true that landlord's notice to vacate tenancy is not to be strictly construed, it being sufficient if the intention to exercise the option is fairly communicated, but it must amount to a demand to vacate at the time after notice fixed in the rent contract, or, if a tenancy at will, it must conform to statute.

6. LANDLORD AND TENANT ¶308(3)—NOTICE TO VACATE TENANCY — EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an ejection proceeding by a landlord, evidence held not to warrant the conclusion that the landlord had proceeded under the contract by giving notice to quit tenancy 30 days after notice, as required by rent contract.

7. LANDLORD AND TENANT ¶297(2) — EJECTMENT—EXPIRATION OF CONTRACT—NOTICE—STATUTE.

Civ. Code 1912, § 3509, providing for ejection of tenant after notice becomes operative only "after the expiration of . . . contract for rent," so that a statutory demand by the landlord, made in an interview with the tenant before the expiration of such contract, did not entitle the landlord to put in force the remedies of the statute.

8. LANDLORD AND TENANT ¶94(1) — NOTICE TO VACATE TENANCY—CONTRACT RIGHT TO NOTICE—WAIVER—EVIDENCE.

Where a tenant was entitled under a rent contract to 30 days' notice of the termination of tenancy, and with knowledge of such right offered to vacate the tenancy, but did not set a date for so doing, such action did not amount to a waiver of right to 30 days' notice.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; T. S. Sease, Judge.

Suit by Rosalie A. Biber as landlord against W. R. Dillingham, tenant, brought before a magistrate under Civ. Code 1912, § 3509, to eject the defendant, tenant. Judgment for the landlord, which the circuit court, upon appeal, reversed, and the plaintiff appeals. Judgment of the circuit court affirmed.

I. A. Phifer, of Spartanburg, for appellant.
Lyles, Daniel & Drummond, of Spartanburg, for respondent.

GAGE, J. Proceeding before a magistrate, under section 3509 of the Code of Laws, by a landlord to eject a tenant. The magistrate decided the case for the landlord; the circuit court reversed that judgment; and the appeal here is from the judgment of the circuit court.

[1] The pith of the judgment below is that "the evidence not only fails to show that notice was given, but on the contrary shows that it was not," and that is the only issue in the case; and it is largely an issue of fact.

The appellant suggests at the outset that the circuit order does not evidence that which the court decided; that the court in fact did not decide that notice was not given, but only that sufficient notice was not given. But the words of the order constitute the only evidence of what the court decided, and the words we have quoted are plain. Besides that, insufficient notice in a case like this is not notice at all.

[2] The appellant admits that the tenant held "by the month on thirty days' notice; Dillingham (the tenant) to notify Scruggs [the landlord] thirty days, or Scruggs to notify Dillingham thirty days." Such then was the contract betwixt the parties. "As the parties in this case have entered into a contract as to the time and mode of terminating the tenancy, their rights are to be determined by the fair construction of that contract, and not by the technical rules which apply to the termination of a tenancy at will where there is no contract on the subject." May v. Rice, 108 Mass. 152, 11 Am. Rep. 328.

[3-5] The general issue of fact is, was the contract carried out by the landlord? and the particular issue of fact is, did conduct of the landlord, when he went to see the tenant to get possession, amount to a notice by the landlord to the tenant to vacate the house within 30 days after the day of such interview? It is not pretended that the landlord gave to the tenant formal notice in writing that the house must be given up within 30 days from the giving of the formal notice. It is not pretended that at the interview betwixt the parties, set up by the landlord for notice, that the landlord by word of mouth expressly told the tenant to vacate within 30 days thereafter. The only contention is that what was said at the interview was a substantial and sufficient notice of the landlord's demand that the tenant should vacate within 30 days thereafter. Whether that be so is a mixed question of law and fact. The burden was upon the landlord to prove the contention by a preponderance of the evidence. 16 R. C. L. § 628.

It is true that ordinarily a notice is not to be strictly construed; it being sufficient if the intention of the party to exercise the option is fairly communicated. 16 R. C. L. § 629.

The plaintiff had two witnesses, Scruggs, a son of the former landlord, and Biber, the husband of the then present landlord.

It is true the landlord told the tenant she wanted possession of the house, and what was said amounted to a demand for the present possession of the house. But that was not pursuant to the contract which the landlord sets up; by it the landlord was not entitled to possession until 30 days after notice. It was the landlord's duty under the contract to notify the tenant that at least 30 days after such notification the contract would terminate. That procedure would have left no room for the tenant to parley; and, until that procedure (provided by the parties) was practiced, the tenancy continued in force.

[8] It is true Scruggs testified, "I gave 60 days' notice as a matter of courtesy," and "I don't remember the date I gave him notice to vacate." But in the same connection, in answer to his own counsel, he testified that "a day or two after that" he went with the new landlord (Biber) to the tenant's place of business, and told him "he had sold the house and wanted possession, and asked him how soon he could have it; he said he would not say; said he would get out as soon as he could, but would not name any date." And on the cross-examination the witness said the tenant told him "he would get out as quick as he could. I pressed him for a date. He just said he would not set a date. * * * The gist of the reply was that he was going to get out as soon as he could, but would not set any date."

It is true, also, that Biber testified:

"I heard Scruggs give him notice on that occasion, a very heated argument."

But the witness immediately said:

"Scruggs told him he had sold the house, and wanted to know when Dillingham would give up. * * * Dillingham would not tell just when he would give up the house; said he would give it up, but would not say when. Mr. Scruggs said that was very unsatisfactory. In talking Dillingham, as I understood, said he had 30 days, and Charlie (Scruggs) had to give him 30 days."

It is manifest from the testimony of both the witnesses—and that quoted is the heart of it—that the demand and the parley was a notice to quit then, and for a then possession. The witnesses did not expressly or by implication define what was the substance of the notice to quit, whether now or 30 days hence. The testimony does not warrant the conclusion that, proceeding under the contract, the landlord noticed the tenant to quit 30 days after such notice.

[7] The landlord manifestly was proceeding to make the "demand for possession" referred to in the statute. But the "demand for possession" therein referred to becomes operative only "after the expiration of the * * * contract for rent." That contract had not expired; so the demand which the landlord made at the interviews referred to did not entitle him to put in force the remedies of the statute.

[8] It is said, however, that even if the tenant was entitled to have at the hands of the landlord 30 days' notice of the termination of the contract, and the appellant does not deny so much, yet the tenant's conduct amounted to a waiver of such a right.

That amounts to saying that the tenant knew his right to have 30 days' notice, but, while conscious of it, he elected not to rely upon it.

The testimony shows the contrary; Biber expressly testified that the tenant declared to him that "Charlie (Scruggs) had to give him 30 days' notice."

The judgment is affirmed.

FLORENCE W. MCCARTHY CO. et al. v. SAUNDERS et al. (No. 3674.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. March 11, 1919.)

1. QUERE.

Query: Is the written admission or accusation to a creditor by one partner after the dissolution of the partnership that another partner before dissolution fraudulently withdrew his money from the firm assets and conveyed away his land to defraud firm creditors admissible as evidence against such partner in a suit by creditors of the firm against him to set aside his deed?

2. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES §91—CONVEYANCE TO SECURE BARRED DEBT—EVIDENCE.

Where a debtor in failing circumstances conveys his property to a near relative in consideration of old debts then barred by the statute of limitations, such fact constitutes a strong circumstance tending to show fraudulent intent against creditors whose debts were not so barred.

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES §295(2) — FRAUDULENT INTENT—PROOF.

In a suit by a creditor to set aside as fraudulent a deed made by his debtor the circumstances attending the transaction are often not only sufficient to establish the fraudulent intent but the only available evidence, and it is not essential that the fraud be proved thereby beyond a reasonable doubt.

4. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES §14 — BADGES OF FRAUD—FAILURE TO CALL WITNESS.

In a suit by a creditor to set aside as fraudulent a deed made by his debtor, the failure of the debtor to call important witnesses to his transaction relating to such deed constitutes a badge of fraud.

5. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES ¶14—BADGES OF FRAUD.

Circumstances indicating excessive effort to show appearances of fairness or regularity not observed in other transactions by a debtor are to be regarded as badges of fraud.

6. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES ¶300(1) — PAYMENT OF CONSIDERATION—AFFIRMATIVE DEFENSE.

Where fraud on the part of a debtor in the conveyance of his property is established, the payment of a full, fair, and adequate consideration for the property is an affirmative defense for the purchaser to be established by clear proof, and when payments are large, if unaccompanied by receipts, memoranda or other documentary evidence, the evidence must be clear, positive, be fully consistent with all the evidence offered by him and free from self-contradiction.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Greenbrier County.

Bill by the Florence W. McCarthy Company and others against W. H. Saunders and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

J. H. Crosier, of Ronceverte, and S. N. Pace, of Lewisburg, for appellants.

S. M. Austin, of Lewisburg, for appellees.

MILLER, P. Upon the bill of numerous creditors of W. H. Saunders & Bro., the separate demurrers and answers of the defendants W. H. Saunders and T. B. Green, the depositions and proof taken and filed on their behalf, and the final decree below denying the relief prayed for, two principal questions are presented. The first is whether as alleged the deed of April 4, 1917, from W. H. Saunders and wife to T. B. Green for a tract of twelve acres of land near Ronceverte, Greenbrier county, belonging to said Saunders, for the purported consideration of fifteen hundred dollars was fraudulent and made with intent to hinder, delay and defraud the creditors of said firm, a mercantile co-partnership then doing business in Ronceverte in said county. The second question is whether, if said deed was made with the fraudulent intent alleged, the grantee Green participated therein, had notice of the fraud or was an innocent purchaser for value and without notice and took good title to the land free from the claims and the demands of said creditors.

On the first question, of course if there was no fraud practiced on the part of the grantors, the grantee, if a purchaser in good faith and for a consideration deemed valuable in law, took good title to the land free from the claims of the plaintiffs. Was W. H. Saunders guilty of fraud? No evidence to establish fraud was taken by plaintiffs, and fraud is denied by him in his answer. No denial of his liability for plaintiffs' debt is interposed. To establish the fact of fraud plaintiffs rely solely upon the facts and circumstances disclosed by the pleadings and the evidence of the witnesses examined on behalf of the defendants, namely, T. B. Green, W. H. Saunders, W. A. Bratton and P. H. McGrath. The record thus composed shows that the firm of W. H. Saunders & Bro. consisted of W. H. Saunders and H. L. Saunders, the former about thirty-six, the latter about twenty-five years of age. The firm apparently began business in March or April, 1916, succeeding the firm of Dudding & Dudding. It does not appear what actual capital, if any, was invested by the members of the new firm, in the business, but it does appear from a statement by A. L. Saunders, who was constituted and remained the manager of the firm, made to Bradstreet's commercial agency on June 13, 1916, as a basis for credit, that the firm owed then all told for merchandise $100.00, and a mortgage on real estate $250.00, and had assets as follows: merchandise at cost, $600.00; notes receivable, $250.00; cash in bank, $400.00; other assets, $2625.00, which latter item apparently included fixtures, $125.00, and real estate, $2500.00, and altogether aggregating $3875.00. In another statement for credit made on behalf of the firm by A. L. Saunders to the Baltimore Bargain House, July 12, 1916, the assets were listed as follows: merchandise, $900.00; cash in bank, $630.00; real estate, $2500.00, subject to mortgage, $390.00. The liabilities given were, for merchandise, $200.00, Dudding & Dudding note due Nov. 24, 1916, $190.00. In another statement to the Baltimore Bargain House, made on behalf of the firm, purporting to be dated March 3, 1916, and signed by W. H. Saunders, the assets were stated as follows: Merchandise on hand, $600.00; notes and accounts, $500.00; cash on hand, $100.00; real estate, $2500.00. No liabilities were listed. In this statement it is represented that the last inventory was made July 12, 1916, and that the statement was based on that inventory. So that it appears from this statement that the date at the heading thereof, March 27, 1916, must be an error, and that although Saunders in his pleadings and evidence professes ignorance of the actual condition of his firm from the beginning, nevertheless when on April 4, 1917, he made the deed to Green he had knowledge of the affairs of the firm as of July 12, 1916. Just what date the statement was made cannot be determined, but it must have been made after the inventory of July 12, 1916. These statements, though somewhat loosely made up, disclose the fact that the tract of land referred to, constituted the principal asset made the basis of credit. And W. H. Saunders must have had sufficient knowledge of the condition of the business to know that a small concern like his could not have been making much money, and that outside of the land it had little basis for credit. And with firm debts thus accumulated, amounting in the aggregate to over $3000.00, he undertook, on April 4, 1917, to sell and dispose of the land to his brother-in-law Green for a cash consideration acknowledged in the deed, of $1500.00, or one thousand dollars less than the value placed upon it in the several statements for credit, and five hundred dollars less than he swears it was really worth of any man's money, for he says the property including buildings cost $2500.00.

[1] Another piece of evidence made an exhibit with the bill is a letter from A. L. Saunders addressed to the Baltimore Bargain House, dated July 9, 1917, which volunteers the information in effect that his brother had drawn out of the bank all the money he had involved in the firm, and had deeded his land to his brother-in-law Green, and calling his attention to the previous statement made and signed by his brother in regard to the real estate. This letter is objected to as a self-serving declaration and as being incompetent evidence against W. H. Saunders. The facts charged therein are denied in the answer, and upon the introduction of the letter in evidence it was objected to. A. L. Saunders, though a party to this suit, made no appearance, and was not called as a witness. Whether admissions or accusations of this kind, made long after the dissolution of the firm, self-serving as they are, at least against the other defendants, are admissible, is doubtful; indeed we think the great weight of authority is against it. Burdett v. Greer, 63 W. Va. 515, 60 S. E. 497, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1019, 129 Am. St. Rep. 1014, 15 Ann. Cas. 935, and elaborate note at page 938. The case relied on by plaintiffs' counsel is Dickinson's Executors v. Clarke, 5 W. Va. 280. We have not thought it necessary to decide this question, for in our view of the record there is ample other evidence to establish fraud on the part of W. H. Saunders in the disposition of his land to Green. True, he says he did not know the financial condition of the firm, but he knew the small capital invested, he knew the firm had been in existence but a few months, and he knew that the principal asset included in the statements as a basis for credit was this tract of land. Before undertaking to withdraw what land he had from the reach of the firm's creditors was it not his duty to know, if he did not know, the financial condition of his firm? It certainly was. He could not shut his eyes to the facts existing and escape the responsibility incurred to creditors. The proposition seems too plain for controversy. Moreover, his conveyance to Green at once precipitated actions by creditors, as was to be expected. And in a few days after his deed to Green he took the business in his own hands, put his brother out, and on April 21, 1917, procured the execution of a general assignment of the firm's assets to McGrath, trustee. There is no doubt in our minds that before making the deed to Green he had received information from some source of the impending collapse of the firm, for the firm had bought goods from many sources in the few months preceding, and since the last statement sent out for credit. According to the inventory of July 12, 1916, the merchandise on hand was only $600.00, with notes and accounts amounting to $500.00, and cash $100.00. After the assignment the inventory showed in stock and fixtures over $3000.00, no cash, and liabilities to merchandise creditors of about the same amount. Saunders says he thought the assets would pay out, but what ground had he for his belief, considering the natural depreciation in the stock and the necessary expenses? The fact was that the assets realized gross only about $2000.00; the expenses were about $1000.00; preferred debts several hundred dollars, leaving for creditors a sum sufficient for a dividend of only fifteen to twenty per cent. If as ignorant as he professes, Saunders could have had no such opinion based on facts on April 4, 1917, when he deeded his land to Green.

[2] That W. H. Saunders so disposed of his land to hinder, delay and defraud his creditors, we have not the slightest doubt. He conveyed it for one thousand dollars less than he represented it to be worth, and though he acknowledged the receipt of fifteen hundred dollars in cash, the facts admitted are that $585.00 represented an old debt to Green, how old is not disclosed, but part of it was more than ten years old, another part more than five, much of it of later origin, but none of it was represented by any evidence of indebtedness, note, book account, or otherwise, and neither his own nor the memory of any witness would serve to give any definite date, though items ran as high as one and two hundred dollars. If these items had any real existence, and, as seems likely, were over five years old, they were barred by the statute of limitations. Debts so barred may constitute a sufficient moral consideration to support a deed, but when the debtor is insolvent the fact of the transfer of all his property in consideration of such debts constitutes a strong circumstance tending to show fraudulent intent against creditors whose debts were not barred. Crawford v. Carper, 4 W. Va. 56; Bank v. Atkinson, 82 W. Va. 203, 212, 9 S. E. 175; Sturm v. Chalfant, 88 W. Va. 248, 18 S. E. 451; Knight v. Capito, 23 W. Va. 639, 651.

[3-5] Of the residue of the consideration, according to the evidence, $315.00 was paid to W. H. Saunders, not on the date or delivery of the deed but a few days afterwards, and the remaining sum, $600.00, was not paid to W. H. Saunders, but to his wife on April 5, 1917, but whether before or after the delivery of the deed, which according to the evidence of Saunders was about April 5, 1917, does not appear, for he says these sums were paid between the 4th and 10th of April. And we pause to inquire, if any such payments were made, what became of the money? The deed it is claimed was delivered about April 5th, the day after its date. No receipts for prior or subsequent payments were given. There is not a syllable of evidence to show what became of the money, whether deposited, spent, and by whom nowhere appears. It is not pretended that any of it was paid to firm creditors. We think the proof of fraud satisfies every requirement of the law. It comes out of the conduct and the mouths of the defendants themselves. While the burden is on the one charging fraud to prove it, it need not be made out by direct evidence. To impeach a conveyance the fraudulent action of the parties may be shown by the circumstances attending the transaction. And it is said in our books that circumstantial evidence is not only sufficient but often the only evidence that can be adduced. Richardson v. Ralphsnyder, 40 W. Va. 15, 20 S. E. 854. The fraud need not be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Knight v. Nease, 53 W. Va. 50, 44 S. E. 414.

Fraud on the part of the grantors being shown, the next question to be answered is, did the grantee Green participate in or have notice of the fraud, or was he a purchaser for a valuable consideration and without notice of the fraudulent intent? On this question we have the patent facts that the consideration named was little more than half the actual value as reported by Saunders; that Saunders made and had the deed prepared and recorded before delivery, and before payment of any of the purchase money; that no receipts were taken therefor other than the acknowledgment of the whole sum recited in the deed as cash; that more than one-third of this sum was old debts, and if ever owed, probably barred by the statute of limitations; that $315.00 thereof, professedly cash paid to W. H. Saunders, had a very dim existence, Green claimed he had it but could not say how long, where he got it, or how long he had been accumulating it; that the $600.00, the balance which it is claimed was paid Mrs. Saunders in the absence of W. H. Saunders from home, was borrowed from a Mrs. Baxter. Mrs. Baxter was not produced as a witness to this fact. Failure to call her as a witness constituted a badge of fraud. Knight v. Capito, supra. It borrowed from her, upon what terms of payment or on what security is not disclosed.

Another fact tending to show fraud on the part of both parties is that Saunders continued to occupy the property for six months or more after his deed to Green, although he gives it as his reason for selling so suddenly that he had secured a position which would take him away, and that he wanted to get to a place where he could educate his children. His remaining in possession of the property after his deed, if unexplained would constitute a badge of fraud. He and Green do undertake to explain by swearing that it was agreed at the time that Saunders should remain in possession at the rate of $5.00 per month, and the only paper writing offered of any of their transactions besides the deed for the property, is a receipt signed by Green, dated September 20, 1917, a few days before this suit was brought, for thirty dollars, covering the rent to September 1st, the full term of occupancy. The lack of documentary evidence of previous and more important transactions, and the production of written evidence of the alleged payment of rent, suggest, if they do not constitute, strong circumstances tending to show fraud. Circumstances indicating excessive effort to show appearance of fairness or regularity, which are not usually found in such transactions, are to be regarded as badges of fraud. Hart v. Sandy, 39 W. Va. 644, 20 S. E. 665.

Green, it appears, was a young man employed as railroad agent and telegraph operator at Marlinton for about nine years at the rate of from $70.00 to $103.00 per month. He had been married a couple of years, had one child, and had assisted in supporting his father and mother. In the meantime he claims to have purchased the interests of his brother and sister in his father's home farm of 44 acres in Greenbrier county for about $620.00, and claims to have loaned money to Saunders. But not a record book, not a note, not a receipt, nor memorandum of any kind is shown evidencing such transactions.

[6] The rule of law in cases of this kind is that the payment of a full, fair and adequate consideration for the property is an affirmative defense on the part of the purchaser, to be established by clear proof, and when payments are large the testimony of the grantees, if unaccompanied by receipts, memoranda or other documentary evidence, must be clear, positive, be fully consistent with all the evidence offered by him and free from self-contradiction. Colston v. Miller, 55 W. Va. 490, 47 S. E. 268; Bland v. Rigby, 73 W. Va. 61, 65, 79 S. E. 1013; Milling Co. v. Read, 76 W. Va. 557, syl. 9, 85 S. E. 726; North Amer. Coal & Coke Co. v. O'Neal et al., 95 S. E. 822. We do not think Green has made good his defense. Witnesses to some of his alleged transactions were not called. This was of itself a badge of fraud. Knight v. Capito, supra.

Our conclusion is to reverse the decrees and remand the cause.

BRUCETON BANK v. ALEXANDER.
(No. 3599.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 11, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. DEEDS ⇐149—TRUSTS ⇐12—WILLS ⇐649—"SPENDTHRIFT TRUSTS"—RESTRAINT OF ALIENATION.

Though restraints upon the alienation, voluntary or involuntary, of equitable life estates, commonly designated "spendthrift trusts," are valid, a grantor or deviser may not restrain the alienation, voluntary or involuntary, of a legal life estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Spendthrift Trust.]

2. TRUSTS ⇐21(1)—SPENDTHRIFT TRUSTS.

But even where an equitable estate is created in favor of another, in order to constitute it a spendthrift trust, the intention to do so must be expressly stated or clearly disclosed by a reasonable construction of the instrument taken as a whole.

3. WILLS ⇐781—ELECTION.

The provisions of section 11, c. 78, Code (sec. 3911), apply equally to curtesy and dower estates.

4. WILLS ⇐783—ELECTION—PROVISIONS FOR HUSBAND—BAR OF CURTESY.

If a widower fail to renounce the will of his wife, which makes provision for him, within one year from the time of its admission to probate, and it clearly appears from the true construction of the will, and the attendant facts proper to be considered in connection with it, that the provision in his favor was intended by the testatrix to be in lieu of curtesy, his curtesy will be barred, and he shall take no more of her estate than is given him by the will.

5. WILLS ⇐781—ELECTION.

Though section 11, c. 78, Code (sec. 3911), does not expressly require a husband or wife, as the case may be, to elect between rights under a will and under the general law, yet such is the plain spirit and intention of the statute, at least where the provisions of the will were clearly intended to be in lieu of curtesy or dower.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐880(3) — REVIEW — PARTIES.

Where a debtor and another jointly own a life interest in certain property, and a decree is entered in a judgment creditors' suit directing the sale of the entire life interest in satisfaction of the debts of the debtor, it will not be reversed, though erroneous, where the owner of the other half interest is a party to the suit and does not join in the appeal from the decree.

7. CASE OVERRULED.

The case of Cunningham v. Cunningham, 30 W. Va. 599, 5 S. E. 139, is overruled to the extent that it is inconsistent with this opinion.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pocahontas County.

Creditors' suit by the Bruceton Bank against John Alexander. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. R. Hill and L. M. McClintic, both of Marlinton, for appellant.

Andrew Price, of Marlinton, for appellee.

LYNCH, J. John Alexander, appellant here, seeks by this appeal to reverse the decree in a judgment creditors' suit subjecting to sale the life estate jointly vested in him and his son Dwight by the will of Elisa Alexander to satisfy the liens of the plaintiff and others against him. The appellant was the husband of Elisa Alexander, who died testate March 17, 1916, the material provisions of whose will are:

"To Samuel John Alexander [and] Dwight Ingram Alexander I give possession, use and profit of all I die possessed of every kind and wheresoever placed—excepting thirty-five hundred dollars due me by David Lavie, 182 Beverly street, Toronto, Canada—to share and share alike as long as both shall live. If Dwight Alexander is alive at his father's death, all and everything I give to him absolutely and unconditionally. If Dwight Alexander is dead at his father's death, absolutely all and everything is to be divided equally between the children of my sister, Emily Kackham. * * *

Thus the testatrix devised to her husband and their son jointly all her property, except $3,500 which by another clause she bequeathed to her son absolutely.

[1, 2] This language, appellant says, imports the creation of a spendthrift trust to provide for an aged and indigent husband, and that as such it is beyond the reach of his creditors. The power of a testator to create such an equitable life estate by express devise with restraints upon its alienation, voluntary or involuntary, was settled in this state in Guernsey v. Lazear, 51 W. Va. 328, 41 S. E. 405, and later still further broadened in Hoffman v. Beltzhoover, 71 W. Va. 72, 76 S. E. 968. For in the latter case, point 2 of the syllabus, it is said:

"To create a spendthrift trust it is not essential that the instrument should denominate the beneficiary a spendthrift, or give reasons for creating the trust, or contain all restrictions and qualifications incident to such trust, or contain an express declaration that the interest of the cestui que trust in the trust estate shall be beyond the reach of creditors, if the intention of the testator or donor to create such a trust is clearly disclosed by the instrument as a whole."

But it has been held that, though a grantor or deviser may impose such restraints upon equitable life estates, he cannot restrain the alienation, voluntary or involuntary, of a legal life estate. A spendthrift trust is an equitable, not a legal, interest or estate. Kerns v. Carr, 82 W. Va. 78, 95 S. E. 600, L. R. A. 1918E, 568, and note. The estate created by the will of Mrs. Alexander is purely legal. The devise was direct and personal. Between the testatrix and the devisees there is no intermediary; no one named or designated to hold the property for them, thus vesting in them an equitable interest, as in Guernsey v. Lazear and Hoffman v. Beltzhoover, supra. The estate is the possession of the lands of the testatrix for the joint lives of the husband and son, with remainder over.

As further evincing the unsubstantial character of the contention of the appellant, even if the will had created an equitable interest in his favor, the total absence of language indicating an intention to place it beyond the reach of creditors must be noted. To create a spendthrift trust the intention either must be expressed clearly, as in Guernsey v. Lazear, or, as in Hoffman v. Beltzhoover, clearly disclosed by the instrument read as a whole. Here there is nothing to show such an intention; no language from which to infer that the alienation, voluntary or involuntary, of the life estates was restrained. The will involved in the Hoffman Case provided that the property should be "for the sole use and support, and for no other purpose, of James William Kerney during the term of his natural life," and that language, it was held, was sufficient to disclose an intention to bar creditors. There is no such language here.

[3-5] It may also be urged by John Alexander that, since he failed to renounce the will providing for him, as apparently required by section 11, c. 78, Code (sec. 3911), he takes no more of the estate than was given him by that instrument, namely, a life interest in one-half, and, therefore, that the court below erred in holding that regardless of the will defendant had a life interest by curtesy in the whole of the real estate which was liable to be sold for his debts. Section 11 provides:

"When any provision for a wife is made in the husband's will, she may, within one year from the time of the admission of the will to probate, renounce such provision. * * * If such renunciation be made, or if no provision be made for her in the will, she shall have such share of her husband's real and personal estate as she would have had if he had died intestate, leaving children; otherwise she shall have no more thereof than is given her by the will. A husband may, in like manner, renounce a provision made for him in the will of his wife, and in such case, or if no provision for him be made in the will, he shall have such share of his wife's estate, real and personal, as he would have had if she had died intestate leaving children; otherwise, he shall have no more thereof than is given him by the will."

With respect to a widow's dower, that statute has been construed to mean that the failure of a widow to renounce the will of her husband, which makes provision for her, does not bar her dower unless it clearly appears from the true construction of the will, and the attendant facts proper to be considered in connection with it, that the provision in her behalf was intended by the testator to be in lieu of dower; and if it does not so appear, then she may consistently take both dower and the benefit derivable from the provision of the will. Cunningham v. Cunningham, 30 W. Va. 599, 5 S. E. 139; Sperry v. Swiger, 54 W. Va. 283, 46 S. E. 125; Miller v. Miller, 76 W. Va. 352, 85 S. E. 542.

In like manner it has been held that the husband is entitled, without renouncing the will, to take under it without impairing his marital right to curtesy, but with this distinguishing feature: That, unlike the widow's dower, the curtesy of the husband will not be barred by failure to renounce a provision for him in the will, even when expressed to be in lieu of curtesy. Cunningham v. Cunningham, supra. Such bar, it is said, can be made effective only by agreement between husband and wife inter vivos, by which the wife delivers to the husband an estate which he agrees to accept in lieu of his curtesy, not by a provision in her will to that effect.

The court reached that result in the case cited by construing section 11, c. 78, Code (sec. 3911), in connection with sections 4 and 16, c. 65, Code (secs. 3652, 3664), which are:

Section 4: "If any estate, real or personal, intended to be in lieu of her dower, shall be conveyed or devised for the jointure of the wife, such conveyance or devise shall bar her dower of the real estate or the residue thereof."

Section 16: "If any estate, real or personal, be delivered by the wife to the husband in lieu of his curtesy, and he accept the same, he shall be barred of his curtesy in the residue thereof."

Section 4, as construed in Cunningham v. Cunningham, supra, provides for a conveyance or devise of the husband's estate, real or personal, in lieu of the widow's dower, thus enabling him to bar the dower of his wife, or, at least, compel her to elect, under section 11, c. 78 (sec. 3911), whether she will take the provision substituted in lieu of dower, or renounce the will and take under the general law. But, in construing the terms of section 16, c. 65 (sec. 3664), the court concluded that it was only by an estate "delivered by the wife to the husband in lieu of his curtesy," and accepted by him, that she could bar his curtesy. In other words, such bar could be made effectual only by agreement between husband and wife inter vivos. For that reason the court held that the wife could not, by a provision in her will, bar the curtesy of her husband, or compel him to elect whether to take under the will or under the law, even though the instrument expressly stated that such was the intention of the testatrix.

We are unable to concur in this construction of the statute. Such a view does injustice to the language of section 11, c. 78 (sec. 3911), and places an undue stress upon section 16, c. 85 (sec. 3684). It may be conceded that the latter section, standing alone, was properly construed when it was interpreted to mean what its language plainly imports, namely, that a wife can during her life bar the curtesy of her husband by the delivery to him and the acceptance by him of part of her estate, real or personal, in lieu of curtesy. But the latter part of section 11, c. 78 (sec. 3911), gives her still a broader right, enabling her, by a provision in her will for her husband, clearly intended to be in lieu of curtesy, to compel him to elect between the will and the legal curtesy. If he renounces the provision of the will, the statute declares that he may take curtesy; if he does not renounce, he shall have no more of her estate than is given him by the will. True, section 11 does not expressly require the husband or wife, as the case may be, to elect between rights under the will and under the general law, but such is within the plain spirit and intention of the statute, at least where the provision in the will was clearly intended to be in lieu of curtesy or dower.

"A thing within the intention of the makers of the statute is as much within the statute as if it were within the letter." Hasson v. City of Chester, 67 W. Va. 278, 282, 67 S. E. 731, 733.

[7] In other words, our construction of section 11 applies its provisions equally to curtesy and dower estates, and to the extent that Cunningham v. Cunningham, 30 W. Va. 590, 5 S. E. 139, is inconsistent with this opinion it is overruled. As held in Sperry v. Swiger, 54 W. Va. 283, 46 S. E. 125, and Miller v. Miller, 76 W. Va. 352, 85 S. E. 542, that a widow is not required to elect between the provision for her in the will and the law, unless it clearly appears from the true construction of the will and the attendant facts proper to be considered in connection with it that the provision in the will was intended by the testator to be in lieu of dower, so a widower is not put to his election, unless it appears in a similar way that the provision in his favor was intended to be in lieu of curtesy.

Such an intention clearly appears from the true construction of the provision of the will of Mrs. Alexander. By providing that defendant should receive a life estate in one-half of her property, with the exception of the $3,500 bequeathed to their son, when under the law his curtesy interest would have been a life estate in all of her lands and a share in her personalty, she clearly evinced an intention that such provision should be in lieu of curtesy. It was squarely counter to his rights under the law and inconsistent therewith, and utterly meaningless if she also intended him to take his curtesy. If she desired the latter, then there was no occasion for the provision she made, for without it the law would have accorded him double the estate she left for him. Therefore we are compelled to think that it was her intention to curtail his legal estate in her lands, and provide that the other one-half which he otherwise would have taken should go to their son. That being so, he was put to his election. It was not decided in Cunningham v. Cunningham, supra, whether the husband, like the wife, was required by the statute to renounce within one year from the time of the admission of the will to probate. Its language is, "A husband may, in like manner, renounce, * * *" clearly referring to the manner specified in the first part of the section for the wife's renunciation. Therefore we are of opinion that the husband, like the wife, has but one year in which to make his renunciation in the manner specified therefor. Having failed to elect within one year, John Alexander is limited to a life interest in one-half of the estate of his wife.

[8] The decree complained of was erroneous in directing the sale of all of the estate for his debts, since only one-half thereof was his and as such subject to sale in satisfaction of plaintiff's liens. Despite that fact, we are compelled to affirm the ruling of the lower court, because the decree is not prejudicial to John Alexander, his life interest being subject to sale in any event. Dwight Alexander, whose life interest in the other one-half also is being held subject to sale, does not complain of the decree, though prejudicial to him. The former is not hurt by it in any manner. If the decree subjects to sale land in which he has no interest, that is a matter of which he cannot be heard to complain, because not in any wise prejudicial to him. Nor does he assign that as ground for reversal. He claims to be aggrieved only by the finding against the claim of a trust in his favor beyond the reach of his creditors. This claim, as we have seen, rests upon no sound foundation of law or fact.

Decree affirmed.

NESTOR v. NESTOR et al. (No. 3641.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 11, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. HABEAS CORPUS ~~§~~99(4) — CUSTODY OF CHILDREN—AWARD.

In a habeas corpus proceeding by the wife against the husband for the custody of their three year old child, which the husband forcibly carried away from their home in another state to this state, when no divorce had been obtained nor divorce suit pending in either state, the court is justified in awarding the custody of the child to the mother, when the evidence does not show she is morally unfit and does show she is more able to care for it than the father.

*(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)2. HABEAS CORPUS ~~§~~99(1)—CUSTODY OF INFANT CHILDREN—RIGHTS OF FATHER.

The law recognizes the father as the natural guardian of his infant children, and generally prefers him to the mother as the one entitled to their custody, though the rule is not inflexible.

Error from Circuit Court, Tucker County.

Habeas corpus by Carrie Nestor against Thurman Nestor and others for the custody of a minor child. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants bring error. Affirmed.

J. W. Harman, of Parsons, for plaintiff in error.

Chas. D. Smith, of Parsons, for defendants in error.

WILLIAMS, J. This writ of error, awarded on the petition of Thurman Nestor and Jasper Nestor, his father, is to a vacation order of the judge of the circuit court of Tucker county, awarding to Carrie Nestor, the wife of said Thurman Nestor, the custody of their three year old son, Kenneth Nestor, in a habeas corpus proceeding instituted by her. There has been no decree of divorce, and no suit for divorce is pending. The parties were married in Tucker county, W. Va., in May, 1912, and for some time thereafter continued to reside in said county, living a part of the time on the farm of the husband's father and a part of the time on the farm of the wife's father. They then moved to Canton, Ohio, rented some rooms, and did light housekeeping for a while, and later rented a house, and the wife kept boarders and the husband worked and earned from $18 to $27 per week, which, he says, he turned over to his wife. Apparently they lived together amicably until he began to suspect her of improper relations with one of the boarders by the name of John Larson, and, on two occasions, ordered her to leave the house. The second time he ordered her out, she says, she left and stayed at a hotel that night, secured employment, and started to work, but that, in about three days, he came after her and persuaded her to return, which she did, thinking it would be better for the child and themselves. She says he then treated her well until after she had signed his claim of exemption from military duty, and then he again began to mistreat her. He was not feeling well, and she says she persuaded him to come to his father's home in West Virginia on a vacation. He did so, and remained for ten days or two weeks, returned to Canton about the 1st of September, and went to work for the Sanitary Milk Company, and continued working for said company until about the 1st of October, when he left her and returned to his father's home in West Virginia, bringing the child with him. They are living separate and apart, and he and the child were at his father's when this proceeding was begun. He works on his father's farm, but receives no wages, and when he is at work he says his mother takes care of the child. Petitioner swears that, at the time she brought this proceeding, she was earning $10 per week in a restaurant in Canton, is promised $12 per week when she returns, and is able to provide for herself and child. He says he brought the child to his father's because she was not a fit person to raise it. He accuses her of infidelity and of communicating to him the gonorrhea. She denies this, and there is no other evidence to prove the fact. His testimony respecting this charge is wholly inconsistent with his conduct, for he thereafter returned to Canton, and they cohabited as man and wife for a month before he brought the child to West Virginia. He files a letter, purporting to have been written to his wife by John Larson while he was in a military training camp, which he says a friend of his clandestinely procured and sent to him. She denies receiving such a letter. It is not identified as a letter written by Larson, nor is there any evidence to prove she received it, and, of course, it cannot be read as evidence against her.

[1, 2] The welfare of the child is the guiding principle by which the court must be governed, and although the law recognizes the father as the natural guardian of his infant children, and generally prefers him to the mother as the one entitled to their custody, still this is not an inflexible rule. If the mother is better qualified, morally and physically, than the father to perform the trust, the court may properly intrust the child to her. Carlens v. Carlens, 50 W. Va. 113, 40 S. E. 335, 55 L. R. A. 930; Dawson v. Dawson, 57 W. Va. 520, 50 S. E. 618, 110 Am. St. Rep. 800; Buseman v. Buseman, 98 S. E. 574.

If the testimony of the mother in this case is to be taken as true, the father is not morally fit to raise the child; and, on the other hand, if his testimony is true, the mother is equally unfitted for so sacred a responsibility as the proper rearing of a child. But his charges of her immorality are denied by her and are not sustained by him, as he bears the burden of proving them. But her charges against him are, in part at least, admitted by him. He admits he had a loathsome disease, which, generally, originates from immoral habits. True he accuses her of giving him that disease. But she denies it, and there is no other evidence that she ever had such disease.

Furthermore, he has failed utterly to prove his financial ability to provide for the child. He is living with his father and working on his place, and admits he is earning no wages. The mother of the child swears she has a good place to live in Canton, Ohio, the place where she and her husband last cohabited, and is earning $10 per week, and can take good care of the child. It also appears that she is the more intellectual of the two, is fond of reading, and therefore the better qualified to give the child proper mental training.

In view of all these circumstances, the judge was justified in committing the care and custody of the child, Kenneth, to its mother, and we affirm the judgment.

A tax deed purporting on its face to convey an undivided interest in land, other than a town lot, is unauthorized by law, and not conclusive as to any one.

4. TENANCY IN COMMON — 14 — CONVEYANCE—DISSEIZIN.

The deed of one cotenant for the entire property, held under a common title, to a stranger, who takes and holds possession thereunder for the statutory limitation period claiming title to the whole property, may work a disseizin of the ousted tenant.

5. REMAINDERS — 17(3) — CONVEYANCE BY COTENANTS — RIGHT OF ENTRY — LIMITATIONS.

Though such a deed by one cotenant conveying the entire tract may for some purposes work an ouster of the other, a life tenant of an undivided moiety, yet it does not so conclude the right of entry by the remainderman, or set in motion against him the statute of limitations, until his right of entry accrues by the termination of the preceding estate.

6. TENANCY IN COMMON — 14 — STATUTE — LIMITATIONS—PARTITION.

Such ouster does not necessarily mean physical eviction, but simply marks the time when the statute of limitations begins to run, and does not, within the statutory period, destroy the cotenancy, or affect the right of the ousted cotenant to recover possession of the land, or maintain a suit for its partition.

7. WILLS — 495 — CONSTRUCTION — "CHILDREN."

Unless a different intent plainly appear, "children" in a devise is a word of purchase, not of limitation.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Suit by John Hutchens and others against Iantha Denton and others. From a decree dismissing the cause, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Strader & Tallman and Arnold & Arnold, all of Elkins, for appellants.

A. J. Valentine, of Parsons, and W. B. Maxwell, of Elkins, for appellees.

LYNCH, J. The adjudication of the issues raised upon this appeal awarded plaintiff below from the decree dismissing the cause as developed by the pleadings and proof involves to some extent the interpretation of the will of Benjamin Denton, made and probated in Rockingham county, Va., in 1855, and recorded in Randolph county, then in Virginia, now in this state, in 1876, the land devised being in the last-named county. The plaintiffs are the children and heirs at law of Thomas and his wife, Margaret E. Hutchens, the daughter of the testator, and the defendants are Iantha Denton, the widow of Benjamin Denton, and Julia Denton, Louvena Rolsberry, Tabitha A. Gibson, Cornelia

E. Van Eaton, Mattie Moore, Vera Denton, and Eleanor Denton, the children and heirs at law of Lorenzo Denton, a son of the testator. The object of the suit is to partition between the plaintiffs and the defendants, except Iantha Denton, the 200 acres of land devised by Benjamin Denton to Margaret E. Hutchens and Lorenzo Denton. Benjamin Denton died in Rockingham county, Va., in 1855, Thomas Hutchens in 1903, and Margaret E. Hutchens in 1909, both in Nebraska, and Lorenzo Denton in Randolph county in 1911.

The eleventh paragraph of the will, the only paragraph necessary to examine, is embodied in the following language, except as to the words in parentheses substituted or changed to render intelligible its meaning:

"(To) my daughter Margaret E. Hutchens and my son Lorenzo Denton I will a certain tract of land lying in the county of Randolph, Virginia, on the west side of Leading (creek). I will one-half of this tract of land to my daughter Margaret E. Hutchens and her children forever. Then after the death of her and her husband Thomas Hutchens (the land) to be sold and the money to be equally divided amongst her children; but should she (die) without heirs (children surviving), after the death of her husband, to go back to her lawful heirs; and to my son Lorenzo Denton the other half to him and his heirs forever."

[1-3, 7] Severed from other parts of the paragraph and considered alone, the clause, "I will one-half of this tract of land to my daughter Margaret E. Hutchens and her children forever," would, if she had no children living at the death of the testator when the will became effective, seem to confer upon her an unqualified fee in an undivided moiety of the land. The latter died the same year the plaintiff John Hutchens was born, but whether the death of the one or birth of the other first occurred does not appear. If the birth of John Hutchens occurred while the testator was living, he and his mother took a joint estate in equal portions, and not she alone a fee. Because, unless a different intent plainly appear, "children" in a devise is a word of purchase, not of limitation, as held in Wills v. Foltz, 61 W. Va. 262, 56 S. E. 473, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 283, and comprehensive note. See, also, 1917B, L. R. A. 49, note. But in view of the conclusion reached in this case it is not important whether the son was born before or after the death of the testator. In either event he has such estate as entitles him to have partition, unless the right thereto is barred by limitation.

It is not necessary, however, to prolong the discussion upon this phase of the will, because of the thorough discussion of the subject in Wills v. Foltz, supra, and because other provisions of the will are determinative of the intention of the testator in the devise to his daughter and son, when it is read and considered in its entirety. For when so read and considered, its meaning seems quite obvious. It manifests itself in the provision for the sale of the moiety or undivided half devised to Mrs. Hutchens and the equality of the division of the proceeds among any children born to her, provided she survived her husband and had children living at the date of her death. She did survive her husband, and the plaintiffs are her children. Compliance with the conditions does not in any manner affect the estate devised to her, for the will expresses a purpose not to confer a fee simple absolute in the moiety other than Lorenzo's, the largest and most extensive interest that can be enjoyed in land, an interest marked by the unrestricted power of alienation by the possessor. Such an interest was not created by the will. This power to alienate the land in fee the testator did not grant unto her. She took, subject to the restraint so imposed, not an unlimited or unrestricted freehold estate, but a life estate. Of course she could, with the consent of her husband given as required by law, voluntarily dispose of it by sale, but she could not with or without such consent dispose of the fee in the land, because to do so would not be consistent with the inhibition plainly implied in the instrument creating an estate in the land as to her. The jus disponendi is wanting in that respect. A purchaser from her would take only the title conferred by the will. No language except that contained in the second clause purports to empower her to make a complete fee title to the land. It was hers to grant an interest in it only so far as the law, not the will, gave her that power, the power to sell and convey, not the land itself in the sense that the purchaser would acquire the fee simple absolute, the unlimited and permanent dominion over it, but a control limited by the estate she held; that is, subject to sale under the terms of the will. Any other estate in the land, if granted by her, would be inconsistent with the intent declared by the testator. This intent clearly was to limit her interest to a freehold for her life, that is, merely a life estate, with remainder over to her children, or, if there were no children surviving her, then to her heirs. She had only a temporary dominion over the land, a dominion which terminated with her death. This seems to be the only just and reasonable interpretation of the will.

Then we come to the claims set up by the heirs of Lorenzo Denton to an ownership of the whole tract, which they base upon two propositions: (1) An oral partition of the land between him and Mrs. Hutchens; (2) the acquisition of her undivided half interest at a delinquent tax sale on October 27, 1879, and a deed therefor by the clerk of the county court of Randolph county September 25, 1884, and possession under both the partition and tax deed. The proof to support the alleged partition, as the circuit court found, falls far short of establishing an agreement to that effect. There was some discussion between the coparceners respecting a division of the land into two equal parcels, according to some of the witnesses, who at the time of the negotiations detailed must have been quite young and possessed of retentive memories, a thing not impossible, it is true, but extraordinary, if they could after the lapse of more than 60 years, as they seemed to do, recall what was said in 1855 as regards the severance of the common title. It is not improbable that they may have heard some desultory and inconclusive discussion of the subject, but the circumstances disprove the execution of an agreement to partition. "A parol partition of land does not effect a severance of the common title, unless it is followed by possession of the several parcels, in such manner and to such an extent as to effect ousters of the parties by one another, and for such time as is sufficient to vest title by adverse possession." Williamson v. Wayland Oil & Gas Co., 79 W. Va. 754, 92 S. E. 424; Martin v. Clark, 76 W. Va. 115, 85 S. E. 62; Justice v. Lawson, 46 W. Va. 183, 33 S. E. 102. If there was an agreement to partition, there was nothing done under it to give it effect, nothing that would excite the suspicion of a purpose to exclude the right of Mrs. Hutchens to resume possession of the land at any time she might elect to do so. Nothing further need be said regarding the alleged partition, except in so far as the discussion of the statutory bar may also be relevant to possession under the partition, the tax deed, and Denton's deeds to his children.

Furthermore, the claim of title set up by the heirs of Lorenzo Denton to his sister's moiety of the land, predicated solely upon the tax deed, has no inherent merit, barring for the present the discussion of the applicability of the statute of limitations pleaded and relied on by appellees. The tax sale and deed had for a foundation nothing other than a faulty or unauthorized assessment. The law in this state does not recognize an assessment of an undivided interest in land, though otherwise as to a town lot. If any undivided interest should be omitted from the land books for a period of five successive years, the title to the entire tract would become forfeited and vest in the state. Toothman v. Courtney, 62 W. Va. 167, 183, 184, 58 S. E. 915. The same result naturally follows the tax delinquency of a like interest, and, though not working a forfeiture, it does render the entire tract liable to sale by the sheriff, unless previously paid or the land redeemed before the tax deed is made to the purchaser. "A tax deed purporting on its face to convey an undivided interest in land other than a town lot is unauthorized by law, inoperative, and not conclusive as to any one." Cafetta Railway Co. v. Fisher, 74 W. Va. 115, 81 S. E. 710. Toothman v.

Courtney, supra. Nor will a payment by one owner of a portion of the taxes assessed against the whole of a tract of land in which he is interested, corresponding with his interest therein, prevent the delinquency of the entire tract, as we recently held in State v. Central Pocahontas Coal Co., 98 S. E. 214.

To evade or avoid the consequences likely to result from the application of these principles, and to give the semblance of regularity to what ensued, Lorenzo Denton in 1860, without the knowledge and concurrence of his sister or her husband, procured the separate entries of half the acreage of the tract on the land books in his name, and the other half in the name of his sister's husband; and thereafter the taxes were assessed thereon accordingly, though from 1855 to 1860 the land was charged and taxes assessed in the name of and against both Lorenzo Denton and Thomas Hutchens, the former of whom paid the taxes and demanded return of half the amount so paid. This he did, the bill charges, pursuant to an arrangement entered into by Lorenzo Denton and Thomas Hutchens before the departure of the Hutchens for Illinois in 1855. This allegation the appellees deny. But, notwithstanding the denial, it is significant that, until the tax sale relied on by the appellees to defeat partition, Lorenzo Denton did what the bill charges he agreed to do during the absence of his sister. Performance by him to this extent clearly appears from the testimony of his son Douglas A. Denton. The testimony of this witness goes far towards establishing the alleged agreement, though also the breach thereof by the Hutchenses. For he says:

"He [Lorenzo Denton] simply looked after it [the land] and paid it [the taxes] with the understanding that they [the Hutchenses] were to pay him, not because he felt he needed to; and Mr. Hutchens never would pay the taxes [clearly meaning the reimbursement of his father], and that's the reason that he [Lorenzo] let it [the land] go eventually."

A further corroborative fact, testified to by the same witness on cross-examination, is the repayment by the Hutchenses of part at least of the taxes paid by Lorenzo. To that extent his testimony is inconsistent, not to say contradictory. Apparently there was some agreement regarding taxes chargeable to the entire tract, the disregard of which by the Hutchenses did not warrant the course adopted by Lorenzo Denton without the least pretense of legal formality or regularity. There was available for him recourse to approved legal methods by which to enforce repayment of moneys expended for the benefit of his sister. There may indeed be some question whether there was default by the Hutchenses in reimbursing appellees' ancestor. Certainly the extent of the failure on their part is not established. But if it were, that fact alone did not warrant the tax sale or render legal the procedure through which it is claimed Lorenzo Denton acquired the title to the whole tract.

The alteration in the mode of assessment so long acquiesced in by the parties, and the assignment as cause therefor of the oral partition effected in 1855, if at all, is out of harmony with the tax deed. Though its recitals are of a delinquency occasioned by the failure to pay taxes on 100 acres in the name of Thomas Hutchens, the deed describes the land sold, purchased, and conveyed as being the undivided one-half of a tract of 200 acres, the half willed to Margaret Hutchens by Benjamin Denton. And as if to avoid misapprehension, the deed sets out at length the calls of the 200-acre tract as they appear in the conveyance to the testator.

In furtherance of the attempt to sustain the decree, appellees in their answer filed in the cause pleaded and relied on the possession of Lorenzo Denton taken and held under the tax deed, and their possession under his deed to them in 1801. The combined possession of the father and children under these deeds, if the possession so combined had the requisites necessary to constitute an adverse holding, exceeds the statutory 10-year limitation period required to effect an ouster. Upon this phase of the case the proof introduced to show title by operation of the statute is directed exclusively to possession under the alleged partition without regard to the tax deed. This dissociation of the sources of the entry on the land may not be material. Granting that it is not, what of the acts done indicative of an intent to assert a claim hostile to the life tenant, and of which she lawfully was bound to take notice? These acts consisted of the removal and sale of timber, the clearing and fencing of a boundary containing not to exceed 3 acres in a tract of 200 acres not partitioned between the parties interested. Until the severance of the land into two equal parcels, or the acquisition of Mrs. Hutchens' half by some method recognized by law as valid and sufficient to bind the remaindermen, each of the co-owners could lawfully cut and remove such timber as their necessities demanded for use on the land itself, subject, however, to be called to account for an abuse of the privilege. Such are the rights of joint owners of an undivided tract of land, a right as old as the doctrine of tenancies itself. Each tenant is seised "per my et per tout," according to the old Norman-French expression. Nothing done in the cutting and removal of the timber, the quantity cut and removed not being disclosed by the testimony, except by the vague statement, "a good bit," warranted the assumption of a design to create an estate under the statute of limitations; nothing to bar the right of the life tenant or the remainderman after her death to resume possession of the undivided interest, when set off to them as proposed in the suit. For it must be remembered that it is not what Mrs. Hutchens failed to do to protect her rights and the rights of her children, but what Lorenzo Denton did or caused or permitted to be done that counts under the statute. Guthrie v. Beury, 82 W. Va. 443, 96 S. E. 514.

[4-6] Thus far, however, we have spoken only of the abortive partition and tax deed. But what we have said applies with equal force to the alleged possession of the children of Lorenzo Denton under his deeds to them. Their execution, the appellees contend, set in motion the statute of limitations, and their possession thereunder, continued for 10 years, operated to oust her and her children and vest complete title in them before the institution of this suit in 1914. In this connection the character of the land has an important bearing. It is wild and uninclosed, except here and there in small parcels not identified, and it is undivided and uninclosed except as to the parcels cleared and cultivated. With these exceptions and some residences erected by appellees it is in its natural state or condition, we must assume, because there is no evidence to show the contrary. Had the fact been otherwise, certainly the proof to establish it would have been produced. So vital a matter would not have been overlooked.

It is undoubtedly true that if one coparcener or cotenant conveys the entire tract to a stranger, who takes actual possession claiming the whole, it is an ouster of the other coparcener or cotenant. The stranger's possession is adverse to them, and the statute of limitations runs in his favor. Bennett v. Pierce, 50 W. Va. 604, 40 S. E. 395; Lloyd v. Mills, 68 W. Va. 241, 69 S. E. 1094, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 702; Hardman v. Brown, 77 W. Va. 478, 88 S. E. 1016. But in this case the deed relied on as constituting the ouster and beginning the adverse possession was not made to a stranger, but to privies in estate, who later at the death of their father would have become tenants in common with their aunt, and after her death with her children, the plaintiffs. Had Lorenzo Denton not made a deed to his children, they at his death would have become subject to the duties owed by him to his sister and her children respecting the land. A stranger in title would not be bound. A deed to him and possession thereunder would operate as adverse and sufficient to put the statute into operation. But a deed by a cotenant to his heirs who are under such prospective duties is of a different character, and is not presumed to be adverse, for the relations between tenants in common are presumed to be amicable rather than hostile, and the acts of one affecting the common property done for the common benefit.

However, it unnecessary to decide whether the deeds of 1801 and possession under them in fact effected an ouster of Mrs. Hutchens. As we have construed the will under which the parties claim, she took a life estate in one-half only, with remainder over to her children to be sold and the proceeds to be divided among them. Under no circumstances could the statute of limitations run against them, for they had no right of entry until the termination of the life tenancy. "As to rights in land there can be no ouster or the running of the statute of limitations against one until he has right of entry." Lynch v. Brookover, 72 W. Va. 211, 77 S. E. 983; Titchenell v. Titchenell, 74 W. Va. 237, 81 S. E. 978. Hence as to appellants the statute did not begin to run until her death in 1909, even on the assumption that the deeds of 1901 and the possession of the appellees thereunder did disseize the life tenant. From that date, and not before, the ouster became operative against appellants. Such ouster does not necessarily mean physical eviction, but simply marks the time from which the statute begins to run; nor within the period thereby prescribed does it destroy the cotenancy, or affect the remedies of the disseized cotenant to recover possession of the land, or its proceeds, by a suit for partition. Cecil v. Clark, 44 W. Va. 659, 80 S. E. 216; Hardman v. Brown, 77 W. Va. 478, 88 S. E. 1016.

For the reasons stated, our order will reverse the decree, and remand the cause for further proceedings according to the principles herein enunciated.

JOHNSON'S EX'RS v. JOHNSON'S HEIRS
et al. (No. 3541.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 11, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM \S 8(2) — INDEBTEDNESS AGAINST INSOLVENT ESTATE — SURETYSHIP FOR DECEASED.

A debtor of an insolvent estate may, in a court of equity, set off his liability as surety for the deceased, and is entitled to withhold payment of his debt until the amount of such liability is determined.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS \S 416 — TRUSTS \S 136½ — MINGLING TRUST FUNDS — INSOLVENCY OF TRUSTEE — DISTRIBUTION.

One, receiving money from another to be invested for the latter's benefit, who mingles it with his own funds and lends the whole to a third person ignorant of the trust, taking his note therefor payable to himself, thereby becomes a trustee for the person advancing the fund to the extent of the latter's interest, whose equity therein is superior to the rights of general creditors of such trustee; and, in case the trustee dies leaving an insolvent estate, is entitled to prorate, on the full amount of his claim, in the distribution of the assets with other general creditors, provided the trust fund and such pro rata distribution, together, do not result in overpayment of his claim.

3. TRUSTS \S 356(2) — LOAN OF TRUST FUND — RIGHTS OF BORROWER.

The equitable right of the borrower of such funds to set off his liability as surety for the trustee is superior to the equity of the cestui que trust in the fund.

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS \S 416 — INSOLVENCY — CLAIM AGAINST ESTATE OF DECEASED TRUSTEE — STATUTES.

Trust funds, which a deceased trustee has mingled with his own and consumed or dissipated in his lifetime, are not a preferred claim against his insolvent estate. Clause 3, \S 25, c. 85, Barnes' Code (Code 1913, \S 4013), does not embrace such claims; they fall in class 4 with general demands.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM \S 8(1) — ACTIONS AT LAW — COMMON AND STATUTE LAW.

The right of set-off in actions at law was not recognized by the common law, and exists only by virtue of statutes, but a different rule has always obtained in equity, where the doctrine, derived from the civil law, is generally applicable where party seeking its benefit can show some equitable ground entitling him to protection against adversary's demand.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Greenbrier County.

Suit by A. E. Johnson's Executors against A. E. Johnson's Heirs, and others, to judicially determine testator's debts with petition in the cause by May Irons and answer to petition in nature of a cross-bill by W. E. McClung and wife. Decree for May Irons against W. E. McClung, and dissolving an injunction awarded in vacation restraining the trustee's sale, and McClung and wife appeal. Reversed in part and affirmed in part and cause remanded.

See, also, 80 W. Va. 497, 92 S. E. 795.

Thos. N. Read, of Hinton, for appellants.
S. N. Pace, of Lewisburg, and Jno. L. Rowan, of Union, for appellee.

WILLIAMS, J. This appeal by W. E. McClung and Relda McClung, his wife, from a decree made on the 14th of September, 1917, in the suit of A. E. Johnson's executors against A. E. Johnson's heirs and others, for the purpose of having the testator's debts judicially determined and the lands devised by him sold to pay the same, presents the following questions, viz.:

(1) Can a debtor of an insolvent estate set off a debt owing by the estate for which he is liable as surety?

(2) Where the deceased, in his lifetime, accepted money from another to be invested for the latter's benefit and lent it to a third person, taking his note therefor payable to himself, which after his death is listed and appraised as an asset of his estate, is the person advancing the money entitled to the proceeds of such note as against the general creditors of the estate?

(3) The borrower of such fund being also surety for the deceased on a note made in his lifetime, and ignorant of the trust, is his right of equitable set-off superior to the right of the cestui que trust?

All these questions must be answered in the affirmative. In order to understand their relevancy it is necessary to state the facts to which the principles are applicable. Miss May Irons, a niece of A. E. Johnson, deceased, mailed to him her unfilled check, about the 1st of April, 1913, and on the 2d of April he wrote her as follows:

"Your letter with check received—I filled it for $1,000.00. I am going to let McClung have about $1,500.00 and will take trust deed for $2,500.00 and will let you hold note when I get it and will send you check for commission along with note. This will be your receipt for check until the matter is adjusted."

The Mr. McClung mentioned in the letter is W. E. McClung, the appellant. Mr. Johnson did not, apparently lend Mr. McClung as much money as he stated in his letter he intended to lend him, but did lend him $2,000, $1,000 of which was Miss Irons' money, and took McClung's note for $2,000, payable to himself and also a trust deed from McClung and wife on McClung's farm of 100 acres to secure it; and on the 6th of June, 1913, again wrote Miss Irons as follows:

"I received your letter some days ago, I have Mr. McClung's note for \$2,000.00 two thousand dollars secured by deed of trust and the trust deed recorded, one-half of the note is yours and one-half is mine. There is still in my hands something over \$100.00 belonging to Mr. McClung. I have waited for him to call for it but he does not seem to need it badly. The note is in the Farmers' Bank of Union and I will arrange it to suit you. Either give you my note for \$1,000.00 and let you hold the McClung note as collateral or fix you a paper and pin it to the note to show that $\frac{1}{2}$ of it is yours."

Mr. McClung was surety for said Johnson on a note for $2,000 payable to Jesse F. Bright. But whether he became surety before or after he borrowed the $2,000 from Johnson does not appear, nor do we think the time is material. On the face of the note to Bright, McClung appears to be maker and Johnson indorser, but McClung proved by competent witnesses that Johnson was the principal debtor, and that he was accommodation maker, and his suretyship is not now questioned. It is admitted that McClung's note should be credited with the following partial payments made to Johnson in his lifetime, viz.: $1,200 as of April 1, 1914, and $50 as of April 5, 1915. There is no evidence that McClung ever knew Miss Irons had furnished part of the money he borrowed from Johnson, until after the latter's death.

A. E. Johnson died testate, and by his will disposed of a considerable amount of property, real and personal, and his estate is insolvent. His executors brought this suit to settle his estate, and the cause was referred to a commissioner for the purpose of convening the creditors, taking an account of the assets and liabilities of the estate and reporting thereon to the court. The commissioner reported Miss Irons' claim as a debt of the general class against the estate, and she excepted to the report, and also filed her petition in the cause, setting up a trust in the debt due from McClung, based on the facts above stated. The executors waived process and appeared to the petition, and the court sustained Miss Irons' exception to the commissioner's report, and held her to be an equal owner with Johnson's estate in the fund loaned to McClung, and decreed that the executors execute to her a writing acknowledging her right to $1,000 in said McClung debt, with interest thereon from April 1, 1913, and also authorized her to have the McClung trust deed foreclosed for the collection thereof. This decree was entered December 23, 1916, before McClung had appeared to the petition. He was not made a party to it nor served with process thereon, and, of course, the decree as to him was void. The trustee had advertised his property for sale, under the deed of trust. He then presented to the judge, in vacation, his answer to said petition, which answer is also in the nature of a cross-bill, denying the allegations of the petition, averred payment of the note, and prayed for an injunction to restrain the trustee from selling, and also claimed the right to set-off the debt due from Johnson's estate to Jesse F. Bright, on which he was surety, against the debt he owed the estate. Mrs. Relda McClung, wife of W. E. McClung, having acquired title to the land since the execution of the trust deed, is also made a party to the cross-bill answer. On the hearing of the issues thus presented, the court, on the 14th of September, 1917, decreed that there was $1,061.54 of the McClung note unpaid, and gave Miss Irons a decree therefore against W. E. McClung, with interest from that date, and decreed it to be a lien upon 80 acres of the 100-acre tract of land covered by the deed of trust. It appeared that McClung had previously sold and conveyed 20 acres thereof and applied the proceeds, to wit, $1,200, derived therefrom on his debt to Johnson, the latter then releasing his trust lien to that extent. The court also dissolved the injunction previously awarded in vacation restraining the trustee's sale. From that decree McClung and wife have taken this appeal.

[1-3] That Miss Irons was the equitable owner of one-half the McClung debt is fully established by Mr. Johnson's letters to her above quoted; and that she has a right to her portion of the fund, provided so much remains unpaid, as against the general creditors of Johnson's estate, is well settled by our decisions. Hogg v. McGuffin, 72 W. Va. 86, 77 S. E. 552. Her situation is similar to that of a principal who furnishes money to an agent with which to buy land for him, and the agent invests it in land and takes title to himself. There a constructive trust arises in favor of the principal. The same rule is applicable here, and, while Johnson appears on the face of the note to be the owner of the whole of the fund, he was in fact absolute owner of one half only and trustee for Miss Irons for the other half, which gives her an equity in the particular fund, which is superior to the claims of general creditors.

[5] Not having paid the debt to Bright on which he is surety, McClung would not be entitled to set it off against his debt to the estate; in an action at law, it is still his mere liability. Minor v. Minor's Adm'r, 8 Grat. (Va.) 1; Mercein v. Smith, Adm'r, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 210; and Granger's Adm'r v. Granger, 6 Ohio, 35. The right of set-off in actions at law was not recognized by the common law, and it is only by virtue of statutes that the right exists in actions in courts of law. But a different rule has always obtained in equity. The doctrine is derived from the civil law, and is generally applicable whenever the party seeking its benefit can show some equitable ground entitling him to protection against the demand of his adversary. 3 Story's Eq. Jur. (14th Ed.) § 1872.

The insolvency of Johnson's estate, in this instance, supplies the necessary equitable grounds, entitling McClung, who is only surety for the estate, to protection, so far as he can be protected, against the debt due to Mr. Bright. The amount McClung may have to pay Bright on account of his suretyship is not known, as the record does not disclose what per centum of its indebtedness the estate will be able to pay; and McClung has a right to stay collection of his note until that matter is ascertained. He is liable to Bright only for the unpaid portion of Bright's debt, after he has received his pro rata share of the proceeds from the assets of the estate. This principle is established by numerous well-considered cases. Feazle v. Dillard, 5 Leigh (Va.) 30; Beard v. Beard, 25 W. Va. 486, 52 Am. Rep. 219; Scott v. Timberlake, 83 N. C. 382; Tuscumbia, etc., R. R. Co. v. Rhodes, 8 Ala. 206; Coffin v. McLean, 80 N. Y. 560; Smith v. Felton, 43 N. Y. 419; Lindsay v. Jackson, 2 Paige (N. Y.) 581; Beaver v. Beaver, 23 Pa. 167; Becker v. Northway, 44 Minn. 61, 46 N. W. 210, 20 Am. St. Rep. 543; Merwin v. Austin, 58 Conn. 22, 18 Atl. 1029, 7 L. R. A. 84.

Washington v. Castleman, 31 W. Va. 832, 8 S. E. 603, in which the court denied a creditor of an insolvent estate the right of set-off, is distinguishable from the cases above cited. There it appears that the decedent had, in his lifetime, leased his farm to his son for a term of five years, reserving rent payable annually in a certain portion of the crops. The decedent owed the lessee at the time of his death, which amount the lessee sought to set off against the rents accruing subsequently, and was not permitted to do so, apparently on the ground that rents, accruing subsequently to the death of the lessor, passed with the land to the heirs, and was therefore not a debt due to the estate. Moreover, in that case the rents had been sequestered by the appointment of a receiver who had collected them.

It is a condition of the right of equitable set-off against an insolvent debtor's estate that the liability must have existed at the time of decedent's death, and that is the case here. As between McClung and Johnson, the latter acted for himself and an undisclosed principal, and took McClung's note payable to himself. Hence payment to Johnson without knowledge of the secret trust in favor of Miss Irons would have discharged the debt. McClung did in fact pay a little more than half of it, which Miss Irons' counsel admits. We perceive no reason why his right of equitable set-off is not of equal dignity with payments made to Johnson, the liability to be set off having been contracted before he learned of Miss Irons' latent equity, and we think this rule furnishes a correct solution of the controversy. McClung's situation is analogous to that of a person dealing with a factor selling goods for an undisclosed principal. In such cases it is held that, in a suit by the undisclosed principal for the price, the purchaser may set off against his demand a debt due him from the factor. Hogan v. Shorb, 24 Wend. 458; Lime Rock Bank v. Plimpton, 17 Pick. (Mass.) 159, 28 Am. Dec. 286; Waterman on Set-Offs (2d Ed.) § 291. Lord Mansfield, in Rabone, Jun., v. Williams, cited in a note to George v. Clagett, 7 Term Rep. 361, says:

"Where a factor, dealing for a principal but concealing that principal, delivers goods in his own name, the person contracting with him has a right to consider him to all intents and purposes as the principal; and though the real principal may appear and bring an action upon that contract against the purchaser of the goods, yet that purchaser may set off any claim he may have against the factor in answer to the demand of the principal. This has been long settled."

[4] Miss Irons has a right also to participate in the funds belonging to Johnson's estate as a general creditor only. Johnson having taken the note for the whole sum of money lent to McClung in his own name, one-half of which was hers, he thereby became her trustee, and she has a right to participate in the distribution of the assets among the general creditors, on the whole amount of her trust debt, without abandoning her right to pursue the particular fund in McClung's hands, and thereby obtain whatever portion of the fund, if any, that remains in his hands after the set-off has been applied in his favor, provided such sum is not more than sufficient to pay her claim. Williams et al. v. Overholt, 46 W. Va. 339, and cases cited at page 340, 33 S. E. 226. But her claim against the estate is in no sense a preferred one. While it is true her debt is a trust obligation upon the estate, it is not favored any more than general unsecured debts. Section 25, c. 85, Barnes' Code (Code 1913, § 4013), providing for the administration of an insolvent estate, does not prefer debts owing by the deceased in the capacity of trustee. Such debts are not embraced in the terms of clause 3 of said statute. Price's Ex'rs v. Harrison's Ex'rs, 31 Grat. (Va.) 114; and Brown v. Lambert's Adm'r, 33 Grat. (Va.) 256. The statute in Virginia has been amended since 1860, so as to include among preferred claims of the third class debts owing by a trustee, and this has been construed by the Virginia court to mean trustees created by an express trust. But our statute is practically the same as the Virginia statute was in 1860.

So much of the decree appealed from as dissolved the injunction and denied appellant W. E. McClung the right to set off his liability to Bright against the balance due on his note to the estate of A. E. Johnson, deceased, and decreed Miss Irons a recovery against McClung for $1,061.54, will be reversed, and in other respects it will be affirmed, with costs to appellant, and the cause remanded for further proceedings therein according to the principles herein announced, and further according to the rules and principles governing courts of equity.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. March 11, 1919.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — § 697(2) — VACATION OR OBSTRUCTION OF STREET — INJUNCTIVE RELIEF — DAMAGES.

To entitle a property owner to injunctive relief against the vacation or obstruction of a public street or road by public authority, his property must abut on that part of the road so vacated or obstructed, or he must show that he will thereby suffer special or peculiar damage or inconvenience not common to all.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Bill for injunction by the Davis Colliery Company and others against the Town of Harding and others. From a decree dissolving preliminary injunction and dismissing bill, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Samuel T. Spears and W. E. Baker, both of Elkins, for appellants.

MILLER, P. The decree appealed from dissolved the preliminary injunction and dismissed the bill, and plaintiffs have appealed.

The bill asking no other relief sought to perpetually enjoin the defendants, the town of Harding, a municipal corporation, and its mayor and common council, and Otho O. Hayes, from obstructing a part of one of the public streets, once a part of one of the county roads of Randolph county, and to compel them and each of them to remove obstructions already placed in said road, and there was also a prayer for general relief.

Plaintiffs do not claim to be owners of any of the tracts or lots of land abutting on that part of the road alleged to have been obstructed, but they do allege and prove that they are each owner of a lot or tract abutting on other parts of the road so obstructed or on another street reached thereby, and are entitled to the free and unobstructed use thereof in traveling to and from their respective properties.

The bill alleges that defendants seek to justify their interference with the rights of plaintiffs by an ordinance of the common council of said town, passed on April 14, 1916, whereby it was ordered that part of the road in question, further described as "leading across lots of Tony Leber and O. Hayes" should be closed up "on account of the same being declared a nuisance."

It is conceded that section 28 of chapter 47 of the Code (sec. 2400) gives the town council of said town "plenary power and authority therein to * * * vacate, close, open, alter, * * * and keep in good repair, roads, streets, alleys, sidewalks, * * * for the use of the public," and that the action of the town council was had pursuant to this provision of the law. But the claim of counsel for appellants is that the power of the council is limited by the statute to cases where its action will result in a public benefit and not alone in the interest of and for the benefit of a private individual. For this proposition we are cited to Pence v. Bryant, 54 W. Va. 263, 46 S. E. 275, points 6 and 7 of the syllabus.

Conceding for the moment that the action of the town council in closing the road was void for the reasons alleged, the question confronting plaintiffs is, have they any right to enjoin the action of the council or the acts of the other defendants done under it? The general rule obtaining everywhere is that to entitle a property owner to any injunctive relief against the vacation of a street or highway by public authority, he must show that he will suffer some special or peculiar injury or inconvenience not common to all other persons in that neighborhood, and generally he must show that his property joins or abuts on that part of the road or street sought to be vacated, or that the part sought to be vacated furnishes the only means of access to his property, for if he has some other means of access thereto by other streets and public highways he is simply one of the general public suffering an inconvenience common to all. 13 R. C. L. p. 75, § 67; Bryant v. Logan, 56 W. Va. 141, 145, 49 S. E. 21, 3 Ann. Cas. 1011; Fowler v. N. & W. Railway Co., 68 W. Va. 274, 278, 69 S. E. 811.

To bring themselves within the rule of peculiar and special injury not sustained by the public in general, the bill alleges that the town council has provided another road or street in the same vicinity and leading to and from their respective properties, but that the new road or street is not so convenient or useful because of the differences in grade in favor of the old road and that they are not able to haul as large loads over the new as over the old road, the grade of the old road being 6.21 per cent., that of the new 15.27 per cent., and, according to the witnesses, plaintiffs can haul double the amount over the vacated road that they are able to haul over the new road; and other inconveniences of the new road over the old are shown, but they are common to all and not special or peculiar to the plaintiffs, albeit the plaintiffs may be inconvenienced in a different degree.

The answer denies that the action of the council is void for the reasons alleged, or that the plaintiffs have sustained any actual injury or inconvenience not common to the public in general, and affirm that the new road or street was used by the plaintiffs often in preference to the old road when it was still in use; they allege also that the new road has advantages over the old in point of roadbed, etc. But we need not deal with these controverted facts, for in our view of the case plaintiffs neither by pleadings nor proof have made out a case of special damages and for that reason are not entitled to the injunctive relief prayed for. The authorities relied on by them are all inapplicable to the case presented by the bill. All, like that of Pence v. Bryant, supra, either involve the claim of an abutting owner or of one having some right or title to the land occupied by the street or road, or in private easements, and are inapplicable.

Our conclusion is to affirm the decree.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
April 4, 1919.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. BANKS AND BANKING \S 47(1)—STOCKHOLDERS' LIABILITY TO DEPOSITORS.

"Stockholders in a bank incorporated under the laws of this state since the passage of the act of 1893, * * * whether original subscribers, or purchasers of stock from the corporation, or transferees of such stockholders, are individually liable equally and ratably (and not one for another as sureties) to depositors of said corporation for all moneys deposited therein, in an amount equal to the face value of their respective shares of stock." Crawford v. Swicord, 147 Ga. 548, 94 S. E. 1025.

2. BANKS AND BANKING \S 49(4)—INSOLVENCY—SUIT AGAINST STOCKHOLDERS—SET-OFF.

"(1) In a suit brought by the receivers of an insolvent bank, chartered under the laws of Georgia since the act of 1893 (Acts 1893, p. 70), against a stockholder thereof upon his statutory individual liability to depositors of the bank (Civil Code 1910, § 2270), the defendant cannot set off the amount of his individual deposits which he had in the bank when it became insolvent and ceased to operate. (2) Nor can he set off an amount of money which, subsequently to the insolvency and closing of the bank, but prior to the commencement of such suit against him, he voluntarily paid to other depositors of the bank to reimburse them for the loss of their deposits." Swicord v. Crawford et al., 148 Ga. 719, 98 S. E. 343.

3. RULING ON GENERAL DEMURRER.

The ruling in the first headnote was made by the Supreme Court when this case was carried there by certiorari, and the contrary ruling (20 Ga. App. 35, 92 S. E. 394) was thereby reversed and overruled. Under the ruling of the Supreme Court, the trial court did not err in overruling the general demurrer to the plaintiff's petition. The contrary ruling by this court is on review hereby expressly overruled.

4. TRIAL BY COURT—JUDGMENT.

Under the ruling in paragraph 2, supra, the judge, sitting without the intervention of a jury, did not err in rendering a judgment for the plaintiff for the full amount sued for.

5. VACATION OF FORMER JUDGMENT.

The former judgment of reversal rendered by this court and reported in 20 Ga. App. 35, 92 S. E. 394, is ordered vacated, and the plaintiff in error is taxed with all costs of the proceedings in the trial court and in the reviewing courts.

The special ground of the motion for a new trial which complains of the admission of certain documentary evidence cannot be considered, as the evidence is not set forth in the ground, either literally or in substance, or attached thereto as an exhibit. *Gaskins v. COBLE et al. v. WHARTON. (No. 390.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 15, 1919.)

SALES §472(2) — CONDITIONAL SALES —
"PURCHASER FOR VALUE."

Defendant trustee under an assignment for benefit of creditors was a "purchaser for value," within Pell's Revisal, §§ 982, 983, and his title under assignment recorded prior to contract of conditional sale should be preferred to that of seller.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Purchaser for Value.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; H. P. Lane, Judge.

Controversy without action between H. M. Coble and another, partners trading under the firm name of the Coble & Starr Motor Company, and E. P. Wharton, trustee. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. No error.

From the facts submitted, it appears that on March 16, 1918, plaintiff bargained, to Richardson Hay & Grain Company, a motor-truck for $2,950, and that $2,000 of the price remains unpaid; and on February 7, 1919, plaintiffs bargained to same firm another motortruck for $2,500, and that $1,125 of this price remains unpaid; that, in evidence of the contract and in security of the balance due, the plaintiff took from the purchaser, in each case, a written instrument, constituting a conditional sale of the property to secure the respective amounts due, and the property was at the time delivered to the purchaser, who had the same in possession and use till the time hereinafter set forth; that these instruments were duly proved and recorded in said county on March 3, 1919; that on March 1, 1919, said company, having become insolvent, executed to defendant in proper form, etc., a general deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors for all property, real and personal, of the company, including said trucks; that on the same day, March 1, 1919, the said instrument was duly proved, recorded in said county, and the property delivered to defendant, according to its terms, who still has the same in possession; that the assets of the company, the grantor in said deed of assignment, are largely insufficient to pay off and discharge the indebtedness of the company, and the question is as to the ownership and right of possession of the trucks included in the conditional sale to plaintiff.

C. R. Wharton and Chas. A. Hines, both of Greensboro, for appellants.

King & Kimball, of Greensboro, for appellee.

HOKE, J. Since 1883, it has been the law of this state that, in order to be available against creditors or purchasers for value, a conditional sale must be reduced to writing and registered as in case of chattel mortgages. Pell's Revisal, §§ 982, 983. And, in numerous decisions on the subject, it has been held that a trustee, in a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, is a "purchaser for value" within the meaning of the statute; some of them being directly to the effect that such a trustee, when the instrument under which he acts is first registered, will take precedence over the rights of a vendor whose interests are protected and embodied in a conditional sale prior in date but subsequently registered. Observer Co. v. Little, 175 N. C. 42, 94 S. E. 526; Bank v. Cox, 171 N. C. 76-81, 87 S. E. 967; Odom v. Clark, 146 N. C. 544-552, 60 S. E. 513; Drill Co. v. Allison, 94 N. C. 553; Brem v. Lockhart, 98 N. C. 191; Potts v. Blackwell, 57 N. C. 58; s. c., 56 N. C. 449.

In Observer Co. v. Little, the court said:

"By the express terms of the law, * * * and under various decisions construing the same, these conditional sales are to be regarded as chattel mortgages and void as to creditors and purchasers except from registration"—citing Clark v. Hill, 117 N. C. 11, 23 S. E. 91. 53 Am. St. Rep. 574; Brem v. Lockhart, supra. etc.

In Bank v. Cox, supra, it is said:

"They contend that plaintiff was not a purchaser for value within the meaning of the registration laws, because its mortgage was made to secure an antecedent debt; but we have decided otherwise in numerous cases. Odom v. Clark, 146 N. C. 544, 552 [60 S. E. 516], where it was said that 'Claimants who now object to the judgment are holders of pre-existing debts provided for in these deeds. It has been held with us that such debts are sufficient to constitute the holders purchasers for value, within the meaning of our registration laws. Brem v. Lockhart, 98 N. C. 191, cited with approval in Moore v. Sugg, 114 N. C. 292 [19 S. E. 147].'"

See, also, Brown v. Mitchell, 168 N. C. 312, 84 S. E. 404, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 933; Southerland v. Fremont, 107 N. C. 565-572, 12 S. E. 37; Potts v. Blackwell, 57 N. C. 58. And in Brem v. Lockhart, a case decided not long after the enactment of the statute and involving the precise question presented in this record, on an issue between a trustee under a general assignment for creditors and the holders of a conditional sale in writing but not registered, in upholding the title of the trustee, the court said:

"The statute applicable to chattel mortgages or deeds conveying personal property in trust to secure debts, to facilitate the making of which a form is given, thus extended to conditional sales or contracts in which the title remains in the vendor as a security for the purchase money, declares them to be 'good to all intents and purposes when the same shall be duly registered according to law.' Section 1274.

"These instruments are thus brought under the operation of the previous general law, which refuses any validity to deeds of trust or mortgages of real or personal estate as against creditors and purchasers for a valuable consideration from the bargainor and mortgagor until they are registered. Section 1254. The effect produced by this legislation upon conditional sales of personal goods is to render inoperative so much of the contract as undertakes to reserve property in the vendor as a security for the purchase money, unless and until the contract is registered, and, so far as creditors and purchasers for value are concerned, the transfer must be absolute and unconditional."

Under the principle recognized in these cases, and many others could be cited, the court below correctly ruled that the title of the defendant, the trustee, under a general assignment for creditors, registered March 1, 1919, should be preferred to that of the vendor whose interests were secured and embodied in a contract of conditional sale, executed some time before but not registered until March 3d, two days thereafter. It is earnestly contended for plaintiff that Brem v. Lockhart is in such conflict with other decisions of the court, and has been so modified by later cases on the subject, that it can no longer be regarded as authoritative in support of defendant's claim, citing for the position, among others, Bank v. Bank, 158 N. C. 238, 73 S. E. 157; Wallace v. Cohen, 111 N. C. 103, 15 S. E. 892; Southerland v. Fremont, 107 N. C. 565, 12 S. E. 237; Day v. Day, 84 N. C. 408; Small v. Small, 74 N. C. 16. But we do not so interpret the decisions relied upon. They all hold, as plaintiff contends, that, in order to constitute one a purchaser for value, affording protection for his estate against equities, there must be a new consideration moving between the parties and, for such purpose, an existent or antecedent debt will not suffice. But the equities referred to in these and other similar cases are those inherent in the property itself, which antagonize the estate or interest of the alleged or present owner and are superior to it when and to the extent they may be established, and the position does not extend or apply to deeds coming under our registration laws and which expressly provide that priority of right shall depend on the time of registration. A reference to some of the cases to which we were cited by plaintiff will serve to illustrate the kind of equities properly calling for application of the principle upon which he relies. Thus, in Wallace v. Cohen, supra, it was held that a vendor of goods, who had been induced to sell the same by fraudulent representations on the part of the purchaser, was allowed to recover the same or their value from an assignee for the benefit of existent creditors; an equity for rescission of the contract of sale on the ground of fraud. In Day v. Day, a father, induced by the fraud of his son to make the latter a deed in fee without reservation of a life estate as the parties had intended, was allowed to have the deed reformed so as to express the true agreement as against a trustee for the benefit of the son's creditors; the distinction we are discussing being stated as follows:

"A third person to whom the son conveys such land in trust to pay his debts is a purchaser for value [both under 13 and 27 Elizabeth], but takes the land subject to the equity which had attached to it in the hands of his grantor"—an equity for reformation.

And in Small v. Small, where a grandson had purchased and taken title to his ward's land at a sale procured by him and conveyed the same in trust to secure antecedent debts, it was held that such conveyance afforded no protection against the claim of the wards in equity to ingraft a trust on the vendor's title. And in Southerland v. Fremont, 107 N. C. 565, 12 S. E. 237, a case on which plaintiff greatly relies, and which he insists is in direct conflict with Brem v. Lockhart, two cosureties had signed an obligation for the payment of money with a third and primary surety, under an agreement between them that the latter should indemnify the cosureties as to one-half of the debt. In pursuance of such agreement, the primary surety executed a deed of trust on the property to one of the cosureties for the benefit and protection of both. Later, the surety, trustee, wrongfully, without the knowledge of the cosurety and without consideration, so far as appears, executed a deed of release to primary surety, relieving the property from the terms of the deed. The primary surety then mortgaged the land to his wife to secure an antecedent debt. It was held that the facts gave the cosurety an equitable right to have the release set aside, thus restoring his rights under the deed of trust made for his benefit. Here again the principle is stated as follows:

"The mortgages of land * * * to secure a pre-existing debt is a purchaser for value, under * * * 13 and 27 Elizabeth, but he takes subject to any equity that attached to the property in the hands of the debtor."

And in Bank v. Bank a similar ruling was made, the rights of the claimant in the property being made available to him under the equitable doctrine of subrogation.

While some of the expressions in Brem v. Lockhart have been commented on as being too broad, the decision in that case has been in no way modified or disturbed and is to the effect, as stated, that an assignee for benefit of creditors, whether present or antecedent, is a "purchaser for value" within the meaning of our registration acts, and, when such an instrument is first recorded, the title of the assignee will be preferred to that of the original vendor of the property whose rights therein are evidenced and secured by a conditional sale unregistered or which has been registered subsequently to the deed. There is no error, and the judgment for defendant must be affirmed.

No error.

MCINTYRE v. MURPHY, City Manager, et al.
(No. 385.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 15, 1919.)

1. MANDAMUS ⇨87 — DISCRETIONARY ACTS OF CITY COUNCIL—REFUSAL OF LICENSE.

Where, after petition against granting plaintiff a license to conduct a meat market was presented, city manager referred application for license to city council, pursuant to ordinance and city council, not acting arbitrarily or in abuse of its discretion, refused license under ordinance providing that license shall not issue if business will become a nuisance, court will refuse to order license to issue.

2. LICENSES ⇨20—LICENSE FOR MEAT MARKET—DISCRETION.

City manager and city council were vested with a sound legal discretion in refusing to grant plaintiff a license to conduct a meat market at a designated place.

3. LICENSES ⇨5½ — POLICE POWER — LICENSE FOR MEAT MARKET—REFUSAL.

The granting or refusing of a license to retail meats is an exercise of the police power of the city.

4. LICENSES ⇨20—LICENSE FOR MEAT MARKET—DISCRETION.

While there must be no arbitrary exercise of police power vested in city to refuse license to retail meats, the city is authorized to say where the market may be located, having due regard to appropriateness of locality, and whether it would be a nuisance at the point desired.

5. MANDAMUS ⇨87 — DISCRETIONARY ACTS OF CITY COUNCIL—REFUSAL OF LICENSE.

While court will compel an officer to exercise his discretion in passing upon an application for a license, or, if his action is found to be capricious or arbitrary, set it aside and require a reconsideration, it will not direct that city authorities shall locate a meat market at any designated point, which will be a nuisance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; Adams, Judge.

Action by W. M. McIntyre against T. J. Murphy, City Manager, and the City Council of High Point, for a mandamus to require the issuance to plaintiff of a license to operate a meat market upon the payment of the amount required in the ordinances for such license. Mandamus refused, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. Gold, of High Point, and W. P. Bynum and R. C. Strudwick, both of Greensboro, for appellant.

Dred Peacock, of High Point, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. [1] The plaintiff applied to the defendant Murphy, the city manager, for license to conduct a meat market at No. 115 South Main street in High Point. A petition against the grant of said license was filed by 76 citizens of the town, and the city manager referred the application to the city council as authorized by the city ordinance. The judge finds as a fact that the city council, at a meeting regularly and duly held, and after hearing the evidence, refused to grant the license. The judge finds that the plaintiff is a man of good moral character, and is an experienced and efficient market man. The city council refused the license under the provisions of section 6 of the Ordinances, which provides that no license shall issue to engage in any trade or business, mentioned in that section, if the applicant does not possess a good moral character or if the business will be a nuisance. The council evidently found the latter point against the applicant.

The court further found as a fact that—

"Neither the city manager nor the city council acted arbitrarily, or in abuse of the discretion vested in them, as officers of said city."

There was evidence in the record supporting such finding.

[2] The judge held properly, as a conclusion of law, that the city manager and city council were vested with the sound legal discretion to grant or refuse the license applied for, and that, having refused in the exercise of such discretion to issue a license to the plaintiff to conduct a meat market at the point desired by him, the court, in the absence of evidence of arbitrariness, would not compel them to issue the license.

The charter of High Point, Laws 1909, c. 395, § 5, authorized that town to enact and enforce all ordinances necessary to protect the health, life, and property of the inhabitants of that city, not inconsistent with the laws of the state. The ordinances vested the power to grant or refuse licenses for the purpose asked by the plaintiffs in the city manager with authority to refer an application in case of doubt to the city council.

[3,4] The granting or refusing license to retail meats is an exercise of the police power of the city. State v. Bean, 91 N. C. 554. While there must be no arbitrary discrimination in the exercise of such power, the city is authorized to say where the market may be located, having due regard to the appropriateness of the locality, and whether or not it would be a nuisance at the point desired. Hutchins v. Durham, 118 N. C. 457, 24 S. E. 723, 32 L. R. A. 706. The city would also be authorized to reject an application if the party was not of good character or was inefficient for the business, but no question of that kind occurs in this case.

The plaintiff places his appeal chiefly upon the ground that Ordinance 6 provides that no permit shall issue unless the city manager is satisfied that the applicant is of good moral character and that the business will be conducted in such a manner as not to create a nuisance, and contends that, as the plaintiff is a man of good character and the business is legitimate, it cannot be conducted as a nuisance. This is erroneous, for the city council found upon the protest of a large number of citizens that the location of the meat market in the very heart of the retail business district of the city would be a nuisance, notwithstanding the good character of the applicant and the necessary nature of the business.

[5] While the courts will compel an officer to exercise his discretion in passing upon an application, or, if his action is found to be capricious or arbitrary, the court will set his action aside and require a reconsideration, it will not direct that the city authorities shall locate a market at any designated point which will be a nuisance. That would be to substitute the courts for the duly elected authorities of the city.

Upon the findings of Judge Adams, the mandamus was properly refused.

STATE et al. v. BUTLER. (No. 377.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 15, 1919.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS ⚡227—WITNESSES ⚡248(2)—EVIDENCE AS TO REPUTATION—RESPONSIVENESS OF ANSWER.

Where one prosecuted for selling spirituous liquor introduced evidence to show his good character, and a witness for the state was asked if he knew the general character of accused and replied that he did, the court properly refused to strike out, as unresponsive and incompetent, an answer of the witness that "it is bad for selling whisky," to the question, "What is it?"

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS ⚡242—ILLEGAL SALE—SENTENCE.

The law authorizes sentence imposing imprisonment with leave to work upon the public roads upon one convicted for selling spirituous liquor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; Shaw, Judge.

Walter Butler was convicted for selling spirituous liquors, and he appeals. No error.

W. P. Bynum and R. C. Strudwick, both of Greensboro, for appellant.

The Attorney General and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

CLARK, C. J. The defendant introduced evidence to show his good character. The chief of police of Greensboro, Horace Foushee, witness for the state, was asked if he knew the general character of Walter Butler, and replied that he did. He was then asked, "What is it?" The witness replied, "It is bad for selling whisky." The defendant's counsel objected to the answer and moved that it be stricken out as incompetent and not responsive to the question. This the court declined to do, and the defendant excepted.

[1] This is the only question presented by the appeal. The witness doubtless could not answer broadly that the defendant's character was bad. He was on oath, and it was competent for him to state of his own motion, as he did, "It is bad for selling whisky." He doubtless gave the only answer that his conscience permitted. The state could not ask whether it was bad or good for a particular offense, but the witness in the interest of truth could qualify his answer as he did. The witness could not say that the defendant's character was good. Doubtless he could not say it was bad, altogether. He therefore gave the only answer that he could. In the interest of the administration of justice and in the investigation of the truth of the charge before the court, the answer could not be stricken out. The jury were entitled to the information.

This is plain, practical, common sense, and it has been held too often to be questioned. In State v. Summers, 173 N. C. 780, 92 S. E. 328, Hoke, J., for the court said:

"Objection is also made that the court refused to strike out the answer of certain other witnesses as to character, Dr. John R. Erwin and others, who, after saying they knew the character of defendant, qualified their further answer by saying in what respect it was bad. It is the accepted rule that a witness may do this of his own volition, and these exceptions also must be disallowed. Edwards v. Price, 162 N. C. 243 [78 S. E. 145]; State v. Hairston, 121 N. C. 579-582 [28 S. E. 492]."

In State v. Cathey, 170 N. C. 794, 87 S. E. 532, the sheriff in answer to the same question as to the general reputation of the defendant replied, "It is bad for dealing in liquor." It was held by Allen, J., that there was no error.

The state did not introduce evidence of particular acts of misconduct and asked only as to the defendant's general character. It was open to the witness having stated that he knew the defendant's general character to qualify and explain his answer as to what it was by saying it was bad for selling liquor.

[2] The ruling of the judge is so well sustained upon reason and the authorities that doubtless the real ground of the appeal was objection to undergoing the sentence upon the public roads for eight months. The violation of the law in selling intoxicating liquors is deliberate, not impulsive, as is the case in regard to many offenses, and the motive is the large profits accruing from the contemptuous violation of the law. The imposition of fines in such cases in practice amounts to granting license by the courts upon payment by the culprit of a very small part of the illegal profits obtained. The law authorized the sentence imposed of imprisonment with leave to work upon the public roads.

Certainly the taking back by the state of a part of the profits made by violation of its laws can never repress the evil which is the object of the trial and punishment. In fact, it puts the state in the more than questionable attitude of sharing with the criminal the profits derived from the deliberate violation of its own laws, and it is thus in effect a partner suing for a share in the proceeds of the illegal business. The fines imposed always give the state a very minor share in the illicit receipts. This is not the object to be sought by the courts. Such sentences should be imposed as will prevent the repetition of the offense by the defendant and all others offending in like manner.

No error.

BRYAN v. HARPER et al. (No. 285.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 15, 1919.)

1. WILLS §601(3)—INTEREST OF LEGATEES—INCOME.

Where the residuary clause of a will bequeathed to testator's wife and his three children all the residue of the estate, each taking a one-fourth share, and by a codicil providing that, should the wife remarry during the minority of the children, her share should be equally divided among the children, the widow was not entitled to have her share of the personal estate turned over to her; she being merely entitled to the income thereof during the minority of the children or until her remarriage during such time.

2. WILLS §647—BEQUESTS—VALIDITY—RESTRAINT OF MARRIAGE.

A condition in a will providing that a bequest to the testator's widow be equally divided among testator's children in the event that the widow should remarry during the minority of either of the children is not void as a restraint upon marriage.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Calvert, Judge.

Action by E. K. Bryan, executor of J. W. Harper, deceased, against Ella C. Harper and others. From the judgment, the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action instituted by the executor of John W. Harper against certain of the beneficiaries under his will to ascertain their respective interests in the estate of their testator and for instructions to the executor, and the only question presented by the appeal is as follows: Has the widow of John W. Harper the right under his will to have paid over to her the share bequeathed to her, or should it be held in trust, giving her only the income during the minority of her children, or until such time as she might remarry during such minority?

The material parts of the will with the codicil thereto are as follows:

"I give, bequeath and devise all of the residue of my property of whatsoever kind and character or wheresoever situated, to my wife, Ella Chitty Harper, and my three children, Catherine, Ella and James, each to take a one-fourth share thereof."

The will containing this item was subsequently changed by the codicil, a section of which is in the following words:

"In the event my wife, Ella C. Harper, shall remarry after my death, and during the minority of either of my children by her, then the share of my estate given to her by my said will shall be equally divided among my three children, Catherine, Ella and James, in addition to the share given them by my said will."

The property consists of real, personal, and mixed property.

His honor held and rendered judgment accordingly, that the executor should not pay to the widow her share of the personal estate, and that she was only entitled to the income therefrom during the minority of the children of the said John W. Harper, and then only upon her remaining unmarried, but that upon remaining unmarried until the youngest child became 21 she was entitled to her share absolutely, and the widow appealed.

W. B. Campbell, of Wilmington, for appellant Ella C. Harper.

E. K. Bryan, of Wilmington, for appellee. Carr, Polsson & Dickson, of Wilmington, for guardian ad litem.

ALLEN, J. Two cases in our reports (Simmons v. Fleming, 157 N. C. 390, 72 S. E. 1082, and Braswell v. Morehead, 45 N. C. 28, 57 Am. Dec. 586) are decisive of the appeal.

The court said in the first of these cases, citing Ritch v. Morris, 78 N. C. 377, and Britt v. Smith, 86 N. C. 308:

"The rule seems to be that, whenever personal property is given, in terms amounting to a residuary bequest, to be enjoyed by persons in succession, the interpretation the court puts upon the bequest is that the persons indicated are to enjoy the same in succession; and in order to give effect to its interpretation, the court, as a general rule, will direct so much of it as is of a perishable nature to be converted into money by the executor, and the interest paid to the legatee for life, and the principal to the person in remainder, * * * but when the bequest is specific and is not of the residuum, the executor should deliver the property to the one to whom it is given for life, taking an inventory and receipt for the benefit of the remainderman."

And in the second, which is approved in Williams v. Smith, 57 N. C. 256, Gordon v. Lowther, 75 N. C. 195, and Peterson v. Ferrell, 127 N. C. 170, 37 S. E. 189:

"Owners of executory bequests and other contingent interests stand in a position, in this respect, similar to vested remaindermen, and have a similar right to the protective jurisdiction of the court."

[1] The bequest to Mrs. Harper is in a residuary clause, is contingent upon her remaining unmarried until the youngest child becomes 21, and falls directly within these authorities.

The case of Williams v. Cotten, 56 N. C. 395, which contains expressions seemingly at variance with the decision in Braswell v. Morehead, is considered and distinguished in Ritch v. Morris and In re Knowles' Estate, 148 N. C. 461, 62 S. E. 549, and is shown to have rested upon the peculiar character of the property disposed of in the will then under consideration and on the language of the will.

[2] Nor is the condition or limitation in the will providing that the bequest to the widow be equally divided between the children of the testator in the event she shall remarry during the minority of either of the children void as a restraint upon marriage.

"It is very generally held that conditions against the remarriage of the testator's widow are valid, whether the property be real or personal, and whether there is an immediate gift over or not; and the same is true against the remarriage of a widower." 40 Cyc. 1702, citing in support of the text decisions from the Supreme Court of the United States and from the highest courts of 24 states and from the courts of England and Canada.

In the note to the Matter of Seaman, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 1144, after discussing the proposition that a condition in general restraint of marriage is void, the editor says:

"Where, however, a condition subsequent in total restraint of marriage is imposed on the wife or the husband of the testator, the courts will uphold the condition. Daboll v. Moon, 88 Conn. 387, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 164, 91 Atl. 646, L. R. A. 1915A, 811; Nagle v. Hirsch, 59 Ind. App. 282, 108 N. E. 9; Knost v. Knost, 229 Mo. 170, 129 S. W. 665, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 627; Sullivan v. Garesche, 229 Mo. 496, 129 S. W. 949, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 605; Matter of Schriever, 91 Misc. [Rep.] 656, 155 N. Y. S. 826; Littler v. Dielmann, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 392, 106 S. W. 1137; Haring v. Shelton [Tex. Civ. App.] 114 S. W. 389; Re Allen, 7 Dominion L. Rep. 494; Re Lacasse, 24 Ont. W. Rep. 300, 9 Dominion L. Rep. 831, 4 Ont. W. N. 986."

It will be noted that these authorities make no distinction between the widow and the widower, and that the wife has the same right as the husband to make her gift conditional upon remaining single.

The case of In re Miller, 159 N. C. 124, 74 S. E. 888, goes much further, because there a condition attached to a devise of realty to a daughter that upon her death or marriage the estate should go to a son was sustained as a valid conditional limitation, and, commenting on this case in Gard v. Mason, 169 N. C. 508, 86 S. E. 303, L. R. A. 1916B, 1077, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 281, the court says that the fact that there is a limitation over upon marriage, as in this case, is "determinative," "controlling" in favor of the validity of the provision in bequests of personal estate, and "is always allowed much weight in cases of real estate."

In our opinion, his honor properly held that the widow was not entitled to have her share of the personal estate turned over to her, and the judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

HOKE, J., concurs in result.

CLARK, C. J., concurs in result, but not in sustaining the validity of the forfeiture clause added by the codicil to the devise to the widow. The will provides:

"I give, bequeath and devise all the residue of my property of whatsoever kind and character, or wheresoever situated, to my wife, Ella Chitty Harper, and my three children Catherine, Ella, and James, each to take a one-fourth share thereof."

A section in the codicil provides:

"In the event my wife, Ella C. Harper, shall remarry after my death, and during the minority of either of my children by her, then the share of my estate given to her by my said will shall be equally divided among my three children, Catherine, Ella and James, in addition to the share given them by my said will."

I cannot concur in so much of the opinion as holds that the forfeiture imposed by the codicil upon the devise above set out to the wife, should she marry before the youngest child becomes of age is valid.

First. It is not necessary to pass upon the point in this case, and therefore it is obiter, and cannot have any valid force and effect as a precedent.

Second. The precedents in declaration of a sound public policy are quite uniform that, while a devise to a wife "during widowhood" or "so long as she shall remain unmarried" is valid, a devise to her absolutely with a clause of forfeiture in event of her remarriage is a nullity. The difference is not a mere technicality, or an attenuated distinction, but is founded upon sound reason and public policy. In re Miller, 159 N. C. 123, 74 S. E. 888. When the devise is made to the wife with the limitation that it is during widowhood or so long as she shall remain a widow, she can make her election whether to take the devise or her dower, whichever is the larger provision, but when possibly a larger amount is devised to her absolutely, with a provision of forfeiture in case of remarriage, she will be induced to take the devise, not having at that time naturally any thoughts of remarriage. But, should circumstances alter, or if she should subsequently find her affections engaged, the forfeiture will then be called into existence. It is not public policy to discourage marriages, but the contrary. The authorities making the above distinction are numerous.

"A gift in general restraint of marriage is void whether a gift over accompanies it or not." Schouler on Wills (2d Ed.) § 603, and notes; 2 Jarman, Wills, § 45.

To same purport 40 Cyc. 1699, and numerous cases there cited in notes. The distinction is made between a conditional limitation, which is held valid, and a forfeiture, which is invalid.

That this distinction is founded upon a sense of natural justice and a sound public policy is shown by the fact that, while the statutes allotting dower to the widow for her support generally restrict the allowance to her life, there has been not a single country or state which has ever been cruel enough to women or deemed it sound public policy to provide for the forfeiture of dower on remarriage of the widow. What has ever been considered contrary to public policy and unjust in the statute must be the same in a devise, and therefore the decisions which have held that, where the devise is taken in lieu of dower, any provision for forfeiture upon remarriage is invalid, are in accordance with public sentiment of justice to the women and the welfare of the state.

Restraints upon marriage are disfavored because of the tendency to restrict increase of population and encourage immorality; besides, there is the injustice of the imposition upon the living of the will of the dead as a guide of conduct. This is so held in Gard v. Mason, 169 N. C. 508, 86 S. E. 302, L. R. A. 1916B, 1077, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 281; Watts v. Griffin, 137 N. C. 572, 50 S. E. 218.

There is no decision in this state contrary to what is said above. Decisions on both sides pro and con, as on nearly every proposition, can be found elsewhere, but no statute can be found anywhere validating a forfeiture of an estate by the widow for remarriage.

The history of the law shows that in nearly every instance discriminations against women have been created by the courts, especially by the purely judge-made law styled the "common law," and rarely by statute.

The poet of the democracy of justice and equality of opportunity and right to all, Robert Burns, said: "Man, to man so oft unjust, is always so to woman." In India, where the wife was deemed entitled to existence only as an attendant and appanage of the husband, she was doomed to suttee—to be burnt alive upon the funeral pyre of the husband—till this was abolished by the British. There is but a difference in degree, not in principle, if the dead hand of the husband can reach out of the grave and can take from her by a clause of forfeiture the property he devised his wife in fee, in lieu of the dower the law gave her, without liability to forfeiture, for the offense of marrying again.

WALKER, J. (concurring). My view of this case is that the question as to the validity of the clause providing that, in the case of the widow's remarriage during the minority of the children the estate should go to them, is directly involved, and that the opinion of the court upon its legality is not a mere dictum. We are called upon to construe the clause and to decide that very question, as Justice ALLEN says at the outset, in the statement of the case, his language being as follows:

"This is an action instituted by the executor of John W. Harper against certain of the beneficiaries under his will to ascertain their respective interests in the estate of their testator and for instructions to the executor, and the only question presented by the appeal is as follows: Has the widow of John W. Harper the right under his will to have paid over to her the share bequeathed to her, or should it be held in trust, giving her only the income during the minority of her children, or until such time as she might remarry during such minority."

So that we must determine whether the fund must be held by the trustee during the widow's life, or paid over to the children at the time of her marriage, if she does remarry. This is a question of moment, and invokes our decision upon the validity of the remarriage clause. If she does marry, and the clause is valid, the executor or trustee will pay it over to the children at once, and she loses her share of the income of the fund thereafter. If she does not marry, her share does not go to the children. I can perceive no substantial difference between giving her a part of the fund during widowhood (durante viduitate), which may mean an estate for life (for an estate during widowhood is an estate for life, as stated by Blackstone and other writers), and giving it to her for life, or until she marries, for an estate during her widowhood would necessarily mean one for life, unless she remarries, in which event it would go over to others named in the will. The difference between the two expressions is in form, and not in substance. Blackstone (book 2, star page 121) says:

"There are some estates for life which may determine upon future contingencies before the life for which they are created expires. As, if an estate be granted to a woman during her widowhood, or to a man until he be promoted to a benefice; in these and similar cases, whenever the contingency happens, when the widow marries, or when the grantee obtains a benefice, the respective estates are absolutely determined and gone. Yet, while they subsist, they are reckoned estates for life; because, the time for which they will endure being uncertain, they may by possibility last for life, if the contingencies upon which they are to determine do not sooner happen. And, moreover, in case an estate be granted to a man for his life, generally it may also determine by his civil death, as if he enters into a monastery, whereby he is dead in law, for which reason in conveyances the grant is usually made 'for the term of a man's natural life', which can only determine by his natural death."

SHARPE et ux. v. BROWN. (No. 322.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 9, 1919.)

1. DEEDS ⇨127(2), 130—REVERSION AFTER FEE TAIL—EFFECT OF STATUTE.

Where a deed conveyed a fee tail and attempted to pass the reversion to others in default of heirs of the grantor's body, nothing passed by the reversion; estates in tail having been converted by Revisal 1905, § 1578, into estates in fee simple, and the reversion thereby cut off.

2. DEEDS ⇨130 — REVERSION AFTER FEE TAIL—EFFECT OF FAILURE OF HEIRS.

Where a deed conveys realty to one "and to the heirs of her own body," a reversion remains in grantor to be enjoyed upon failure of such heirs and which he can convey to others.

3. DEEDS ⇨127(2) — STATUTORY ABOLITION — EFFECT OF CONVEYANCE IN TAIL.

Where a deed conveys property to grantor's granddaughter "and to the heirs of her own body," the granddaughter takes a fee tail which Revisal 1905, § 1578, converts into a fee simple in her.

4. DEEDS ⇨126—ESTATES ON CONDITION — EFFECT OF BIRTH OF ISSUE.

Where property was conveyed to grantor's granddaughter "and to the heirs of her own body" and a child was born to such granddaughter, the conveyance passed an estate in fee tail converted by Revisal 1905, § 1578, into a fee simple, defeasible if no child was born, but absolute on the birth of such child who was an heir of her body although not technically so.

5. DEEDS ⇨126—ESTATES ON CONDITION — CONSTRUCTION.

If a conveyance to grantor's granddaughter "and to the heirs of her own body" be construed to mean "children" instead of "heirs," no child of grantee's body having been born at the time of the execution of the deed, and there being no intermediate estate, after-born children could not take, and the conveyance would be to the granddaughter alone in fee without words of inheritance, the deed being executed since Revisal 1905, § 946, but defeasible if no child were born and absolute upon the birth of a child.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Devin, Judge.

Action by R. C. Sharpe and wife against N. W. Brown. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action to recover the purchase price of a certain tract of land; the plaintiffs having tendered to the defendant a deed pursuant to a contract of purchase, and the defendant having refused to accept the same upon the ground that the plaintiffs have not an indefeasible title in fee.

The plaintiffs derive their title under a deed from Manly D. Stroud and wife, Martha Stroud, of date the 30th day of December, 1893, which conveys the land described in the complaint upon the following considerations and conditions:

"For and in consideration of one dollar in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and for the further consideration of the natural love and affection which we, the said Manly D. Stroud and his wife, Martha Stroud, hath and beareth towards our granddaughter, Margaret Wellons Stroud, and for other divers good causes and reasons we hereunto moving, and for the better maintenance and preferment, and by these presents hath given, granted, and by these presents do give, grant and convey unto our granddaughter, Margaret Wellons Stroud, and to the heirs of her own body; if she never have any heirs of her own body, then in that event she never does have any, then it is to go to M. M. Stroud and T. W. Stroud their life, and then to their children."

Margaret Wellons Stroud intermarried with R. C. Sharpe on the 1st of June, 1915, and she and the said Sharpe are the plaintiffs in this action. A child was born of said marriage on the 10th day of August, 1917, and is now living.

His honor held that the plaintiffs could convey an indefeasible title to the defendant, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendant excepted and appealed.

S. M. Gattis, of Hillsboro, for appellees,

ALLEN, J. The deed before us, while similar in some respects, does not have its counterpart in any to be found in our reports, and, in the absence of controlling authority, we must have recourse to the principles of the common law, as "these things, though they may seem ancient, are necessary notwithstanding to be known." Coke.

It must be noted that the grantors do not purport to convey the land in controversy to their granddaughter for life and then, or after her death, to the heirs of her body; nor is the limitation over to M. M. and T. W. Stroud in the event of death leaving no heirs of her body, or leaving none surviving her; nor is a similar expression used, illustrations of which may be frequently found in the decided cases.

The conveyance is to "Margaret Wellons Stroud and to the heirs of her own body, if she never have any heirs of her own body, then in that event she never does have any, then it is to go to M. M. Stroud and T. W. Stroud their life, and then to their children."

At common law a grant to one and the heirs of his own body was an estate upon condition, called a fee conditional, which left in the grantor the right to re-enter, upon failure to have heirs of the body, as upon a condition broken.

"But the general propensity which then prevailed to favor a liberty of alienation induced the courts of justice to construe limitations of this kind in a very liberal manner. Instead of declaring that these estates were descendible to those heirs only who were particularly described in the grant, according to the manifest intention of the donors, and the strict principles of the feudal law, and that the donees should not, in any case, be enabled by their alienation to defeat the succession of those who were mentioned in the gift, or the donor's right of reverter, they had recourse to an ingenious device taken from the nature of a condition.

"Now it is a maxim of the common law that, when a condition is once performed, it is henceforth entirely gone; and the thing to which it was before annexed becomes absolute and wholly unconditional. The judge's reasoning upon this ground determined that these estates were conditional fees, that is, were granted to a man and the heirs of his body, upon condition that he had such heirs; therefore as soon as the donee of an estate of this kind had issue born, his estate became absolute by the performance of the condition; at least for these three purposes: (1) To enable him to alien the land, etc." 1 Greenl. R. P. title 2, c. 1, §§ 4 and 5.

In consequence of this construction, which prevented the perpetuation of lands in one family, which was the purpose of the creation of the estate, the statute de donis (13 Edw. 1) was adopted, which converted the fee conditional into a fee tail, which is described as "a particular estate in the donee, called an estate tail, subject to which the reversion in fee remained in the donor," and this estate was one "of inheritance in the donee, and some particular heirs of his body to whom it must descend, notwithstanding any act of the ancestor." 1 Greenl. R. P. pp. 78 and 79.

This brief outline of the estates, which is substantially as stated in 1 Co. Litt. 19a, and Mod. Am. L. vol. 5, p. 66 et seq., shows that a fee conditional was created at common law, and a fee tail under the statute de donis when the estate was granted to one and the heirs of his own body, with reversion to the grantor upon failure of such heirs, and this is the legal effect of the deed before us.

[1] The estate is conveyed to "Margaret Wellons Stroud and to the heirs of her own body," which is clearly a fee tail, and the succeeding words, "if she never have any heirs of her own body then in that event she never does have any," merely gives verbal expression to the condition which would give rise to the operation of the reversion in the grantor, without these words as matter of law, and is no more than the law would declare if not expressed, and the further limitation to M. M. Stroud and T. W. Stroud is an attempt to pass the reversion after the conveyance of the fee tail; but, estates in tail having been converted by our statute into a fee simple and the reversion thereby cut off, nothing passed to them.

[2] In other words, if the deed had stopped at a conveyance to "Margaret Wellons Stroud and to the heirs of her own body," a reversion would have remained in the grantor to be enjoyed upon failure of such heirs, and which under our law he could convey to M. M. and T. W. Stroud (Kornegay v. Miller, 137 N. C. 664, 50 S. E. 315, 107 Am. St. Rep. 505), and if this is true the construction cannot be changed, because the parties saw fit to incorporate these terms in the deed.

[3] It follows that Margaret Wellons Stroud took a fee tail under the language of the deed, and, as this estate has been converted into a fee simple under our statute (Rev. § 1578), she has the right to convey an estate in fee.

There are several cases in our Reports, prior to the act of 1827 (Rev. § 1581), which give this construction to devises, in which the language was much more favorable to the contention of the defendant than that used in the present deed, and the statute has no bearing because the limitation over is not contingent "upon the dying of any person without heirs or heirs of the body, etc.," but upon having an heir of her body, which was met upon the birth of a child, under the authority of Bank v. Murray, 175 N. C. 64, 94 S. E. 666, in which it was held that in a devise to a son and "should he not marry—, or even marry and have no issue," then over, that the condition was performed and the estate absolute upon marriage and birth of issue without regard to the time of the death of the son.

In Sanders v. Hyatt, 8 N. C. 247:

"Devise to A., and if he dies without any lawful begotten heir of his body, then to his brother and sisters. Held that the devise to A. is of an estate tail, which, by the act of 1784, is converted into a fee simple, and the ulterior limitation is therefore void."

In Ross v. Toms, 15 N. C. 376, it was held that—

"A devise of lands to A. for life and after her death to be equally divided among the male or female heirs begotten of her body, and for want of such heirs, then over, gives A. an estate tail in the land, which by the act of 1784 (Rev. c. 204) is converted into a fee."

In Hollowell v. Kornegay, 29 N. C. 261:

"A. by will, in 1786, devised to his son R. a tract of land and then proceeded as follows: 'And my desire is, if my son R. die without heir lawfully begotten of his body, for it to be sold, and equally divided between his own sisters.' Held, that the limitation over was too remote, and that estates tail having by the act of 1784 been converted into fee-simple estate, the son R. took an absolute estate in fee simple in the land devised."

In the last case, Ruffin, O. J., after citing Sanders v. Hyatt and noting the difference in the language, says:

"But that difference is entirely immaterial, as in each case the disposition over is after the death of the first taker 'without heir lawfully begotten of his body,' that is, of a remainder after an estate tail in possession; which the act of '84 makes void. The fee vested in Richard, and is now in the defendant."

[4] Another and simpler method of reaching the same result is that the conveyance to the granddaughter and the heirs of her own body passed an estate in fee tail, which by our statute was converted into a fee simple, defeasible if no child was born to her, but which became absolute upon the birth of a child, who was an "heir" of her body as the term is generally understood, although not technically so, because of the rule that no one can be heir to the living.

[5] If, however, we construed the words "to the heirs of her own body," wherever they appear, to mean children, so that the deed would read "unto our granddaughter, Margaret Wellons Stroud and to her children, if she never have any children then in that event she never does have any," we would reach the same conclusion, because, there being no child born at the time of the execution of the deed and no intermediate estate, after-born children could not take (Powell v. Powell, 168 N. C. 562, 84 S. E. 860), and the conveyance would be to the granddaughter alone, which would be in fee, without words of inheritance, because the deed bears date since the act of 1879 (Rev. § 946), but defeasible if no child was born, and absolute when a child was born, under the Murray Case, which event has taken place.

We therefore conclude in any view of the case the plaintiffs can convey a good title to the defendant, and this carries out and gives effect to the intent of the grantors, manifest on the face of the deed, which was executed 22 years before the marriage of the granddaughter when she was a small child, in consideration "of natural love and affection for her better maintenance and preferment"; the grantors having in mind that she might not reach womanhood, but desiring, if she did so and married, her estate should be absolute upon the birth of a child.

Affirmed.

In re JONES' ESTATE. (No. 324.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 15, 1919.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — 37(3)
— RIGHT TO ADMINISTER — DETERMINATION AS BETWEEN APPLICANTS.

Where application for letters d. b. n. c. t. a. has been made within six months from the death of the first administrator with the will annexed, the rights of applicants for letters are to be determined as regulated by Revisal 1905, § 3, prescribing the order in which persons are entitled to administer without reference to the limitation of six months in section 12.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — 37(3)
— RIGHT TO ADMINISTER — PREFERENCES.

Since Revisal 1905, § 11, contemplates that one having a right to administer can only be deprived thereof by renunciation, that a majority in number of those in the same degree of kinship have nominated a stranger as administrator d. b. n. c. t. a. does not deprive an individual member of such class who is the owner of a larger share of the estate than the others of his preference right to administration.

Appeal from Superior Court, Person County; Lyon, Judge.

Proceedings by J. Lacy Williams to be appointed administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo of the estate of R. Jeff Jones. A decree confirming the appointment of S. P. Williams and dismissing the petition was reversed, and S. P. Williams appeals. No error.

This is a contest over the appointment of an administrator d. b. n. c. t. a. of the estate of R. Jeff Jones.

R. Jeff Jones died in Danville, Va., in 1902 testate, leaving his estate to his wife, Lenora Jones, with the power to sell all his property and invest the proceeds in cotton mill, railroad, or bank stock; she to have the use of it during her lifetime as she wished. She qualified as his administratrix with the will annexed and wound up his estate, converting all the property into Riverside Cotton Mill stocks. Mrs. Lenora Jones, said widow, soon thereafter moved to Roxboro, N. C., and resided there until her death, on August 5, 1918. She had kept the stock, amounting to $8,800 (par value) intact, only using the income.

Upon her death her brother, S. P. Williams, qualified as administrator upon her individual estate, and also applied for letters of administration c. t. a. de bonis non on the estate of R. Jeff Jones on account of said cotton mill stock which he found in the possession of Mrs. Lenora Jones belonging to R. Jeff Jones' estate. At that time none of the next of kin of R. Jeff Jones had applied for letters on his estate, the widow having then been dead five months.

The next of kin and distributees of R. Jeff Jones residing in this state were Hallie Jones, Reade Jones, Mrs. Etta Chambers, and Lacy Williams, and are of equal degree of kin to testator. Two nephews, Bernard Williams and Jack Jones, of same kin, are now in military service. The other next of kin are residents of Virginia.

Three of the next of kin, Hallie Jones, Reade Jones, and Mrs. Etta Chambers, renounced their right to qualify and nominated S. P. Williams, the appellant, and asked that he be appointed as administrator, and S. P. Williams, the appellant, was appointed and gave bond.

J. Lacy Williams, the only remaining next of kin residing in the state, then applied for letters, and asked that S. P. Williams be removed, and upon the hearing the clerk held "that, the three next of kin having filed their renunciation and having nominated S. P. Williams, the court, in the exercise of its discretionary powers to select and to appoint an administrator from among the applicants of equal degree of kin or right to administer, having found S. P. Williams competent and capable to perform the duties of the office," confirmed his appointment, and dismissed the petition.

Upon appeal to the court in term his honor reversed the decision of the clerk, and held that J. Lacy Williams had the right of administration in preference to respondent, and Williams appealed.

Luther M. Carlton, of Roxboro, for appellant.

F. O. Carver, of Roxboro, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. Two questions are presented by the appeal:

(1) Does the provision in section 12 of the Revisal giving discretionary power to the clerk to appoint some suitable person administrator, when no person entitled to administer has made application for letters within six months from the death of the decedent, control in an application for the appointment of an administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo made more than six months after the death of the testator, and within six months of the death of the prior administrator or executor?

(2) Does the nomination of a stranger for appointment by two or more of the next of kin entitled to administer affect the right of another of the next of kin of equal degree who did not join in the nomination?

The statute, which confers jurisdiction on the clerk to appoint some suitable person administrator when no one entitled to administer has made application for letters within six months from the death of the decedent, is found in the second subdivision of chapter 1 of the Revisal, which is devoted to administration. This subdivision clearly recognizes the distinction between letters of administration, which issue in case of intestacy, and letters testamentary, issuing when there is a will.

In section 3 it is provided that "letters of administration, in case of intestacy, shall be granted to the persons entitled thereto and applying for the same, in the following order," and then follows the enumeration of the classes. Section 5: "The clerk shall not issue letters of administration or letters testamentary to any person who, at the time of appearing to qualify" is disqualified, and then the disqualifications are stated. Section 6 provides that, where an executor or any person having a prior right to administer is under the disqualification of nonage or is temporarily absent from the state, "such person is entitled to six months, after coming of age or after his return to the state, in which to make application for letters testamentary or letters of administration." Section 10 makes provision for a renunciation by the executor, and section 11 for a renunciation by those having a prior right to administer. (Italics ours.)

It is thus seen that throughout the subdivision the line is clearly marked between "letters of administration" and "letters testamentary," and between the executor and one entitled to administer, and this distinction is retained in sections 12 and 13, the first being entitled "When Person Entitled Deemed to Have Renounced," and the second "When Executor Deemed to Have Renounced." Section 12 provides: "If any person entitled to letters of administration, fails or refuses," etc. "If no person entitled to administer shall apply for letters of administration"—and was intended to apply to cases of intestacy, and not to those where there is a will. A consideration of the next subdivision in the chapter, entitled "Will Annexed," strengthens this position, because provision is made in section 14 for the appointment of an administrator with the will annexed when there is no executor qualified to act "in the order prescribed in this chapter," and not within the time.

It may be, by analogy, section 12 is broad enough to cover cases where no executor is named in the will, or when one named refuses to qualify, but primarily its purpose is to deal with cases of intestacy, and for the reason that in the vast majority of cases executors are named in wills and qualify, and comparatively few are removed by death or otherwise within six months from the death of the testator, and if it should be held that the limitation of six months applied in such cases, it would be a denial of the right to administer to those placed by law in the preferred classes.

[1] We cannot think such was the intent of the General Assembly, and are of opinion that, the application for letters having been made within six months from the death of the first administrator with the will annexed, the parties should have their rights determined as regulated by section 3, which prescribes the order in which persons are entitled to administer, without reference to the limitation of six months in section 12.

Who, then, has the right to administer under the statute? Three of the four in the preferred class, representing a bequest of $100, have renounced and nominated S. P. Williams, a stranger, and the fourth of the class, J. Lacy Williams, representing practically one-fourth of the estate, has made application for appointment and has been appointed, and the controversy is therefore between the nominee of the majority of the next of kin who have very little pecuniary interest and one of the next of kin owning a large part of the estate.

The right to nominate an administrator is recognized in several decisions in our court, collected and discussed in Boynion v. Heartt, 158 N. C. 488, 74 S. E. 470, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 616, but in none of them has the nomination been approved or sustained when a stranger was nominated by a majority as against one in the preferred class.

The statute gives each of the next of kin in the same class the same right to administer, the interests are frequently antagonistic, as in this case there may be no community of interest, and if numbers are permitted to control three of the next of kin, representing a pecuniary interest of $1 each, could name an administrator as against two entitled to $1,000 or $10,000 each.

[2] We see no reason for permitting a majority to deprive another of his right, and the statute (Revisal, § 11) seems to contemplate that this can only be done by his own act, by renunciation.

In Pennsylvania the register had the power of appointment, and in Swarts' Estate, 189

Pa. 72, 41 Atl. 1001, the court said of the question now before us:

"The discretion vested in the register is limited to a selection from each class entitled in its order, and neither he nor the parties renouncing can pass by one of the children competent to administer and vest the appointment in a stranger. William's Appeal, 7 Pa. 259; McClellan's Appeal, 16 Pa. 110."

Again, in Justice v. Wilkins, 251 Ill. 16, 95 N. E. 1026:

"Any one of the nephews and nieces in this state, and otherwise qualified, was entitled to be appointed as administrator, and the court might have granted letters to any one or more of them. Could he legally appoint a stranger to the class, nominated by one of these nephews or nieces, unless the others who were equally entitled to administer waived their rights? We think not. In our judgment the statute is mandatory to appoint one or more of the next of kin residing in the state, who were otherwise qualified, unless they waived their rights. O'Rear v. Crum, 135 Ill. 294, 25 N. E. 1097; Judd v. Ross, 146 Ill. 40, 34 N. E. 631. When any one heir of the class waives the right and nominates another, the one so nominated is not to stand in the place of the other, with equal rights to administer as against the other heirs of the class, unless the person nominating is the only heir of that class. If all of those who appear of the class entitled to administer waive that right, and another person is appointed at his, her, or their request, if one of the others of the class who are equally entitled to administer appears 'within sixty days from the death of the intestate' and insists upon his right to administer in person, and if he is a competent person, we are of the opinion that it would be the duty of the court to appoint him, provided however, in turning over the estate the court may make all necessary orders for its proper protection, and for the compensation of the person theretofore appointed."

"Code Civ. Proc. § 1365, in fixing the order in which certain classes of persons are entitled to administer a decedent's estate, provides (subdivision 2) that in the absence of a surviving husband or wife children shall be appointed. * * * Section 1379 provides that 'administration may be granted to one or more competent persons, although not otherwise entitled to the same at the written request of the person entitled filed in the court.' Held that, where three daughters survived, and one of them applied for administration, she should be appointed, though a competent person nominated by the other two daughters also applied; the court not having any discretion in such case." In re Myers' Estate, 9 Cal. App. 694, 100 Pac. 712.

The same principle is declared in Cramer v. Sharp, 49 N. J. Eq. 558, 24 Atl. 962.

We are therefore of opinion his honor committed no error in holding that J. Lacy Williams is entitled to the appointment as administrator d. b. n. c. t. a. in preference to S. P. Williams, a stranger.

No error.

(177 N. C. 303)

WILLIAMSON v. RABON et al. (No. 286.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 15, 1919.)

1. MORTGAGES ⇐608½ — DEED ABSOLUTE AS MORTGAGE—ALLEGATION AND PROOF.

A written deed absolute in terms cannot be changed into a mortgage, except upon allegation and proof that the clause of redemption was omitted by reason of ignorance, mistake, fraud, or undue advantage.

2. JUDGMENT ⇐347—SETTING ASIDE—LACK OF ESSENTIAL PROOF.

Where a fact essential to support judgment for plaintiff is entirely lacking, judgment must be set aside.

3. COURTS ⇐90(6)—RULE OF STARE DECISIS.

Where a case does not purport to lay down any definite or different principle or question or disturb the law prevailing and has not since been referred to or cited, a rule therein announced in direct conflict with prior decisions, reaffirmed in later decision, all holding that in order to change a deed into a mortgage it must be alleged and proved that clause of redemption was omitted by mistake, etc., cannot be invoked on the principle of stare decisis.

4. COURTS ⇐89—RULE OF STARE DECISIS.

The doctrine of stare decisis is fully established in North Carolina, and in proper instances the courts will continue to be upheld.

5. COURTS ⇐90(4)—STARE DECISIS—INTERPRETATION OF STATUTE.

In case of an authoritative interpretation of a statute formally made by a court of last resort, a single decision becomes a precedent sufficiently authoritative to protect rights acquired during its continuance.

6. COURTS ⇐89—STARE DECISIS—DECISIONS DECLARATORY OF COMMON LAW.

To establish a precedent sufficiently authoritative to protect rights acquired during its continuance, it is usually required, in case of decisions declaratory of the common law or of general equitable principles, that there be a series of decisions, or, if one, that it be so definite in its terms and so generally acquiesced in and acted on that it has come to be recognized as the accepted rule on a given question.

7. COURTS ⇐90(6)—STARE DECISIS—DECISIONS DECLARATORY OF COMMON LAW.

A Supreme Court decision in a case declaratory of common law, or of general equitable principles, does not constitute the law, but is only evidence thereof, and the general rule is that, when a court of last resort has overruled such decision, it is not thereafter considered bad law, but as never having been the law applicable in such case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Columbus County; C. O. Lyon, Judge.

Action by N. L. H. Williamson against F. J. Rabon and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Error.

The action is to have a written deed for two tracts of land from plaintiff to defendant, absolute in terms and for value, declared and dealt with as a mortgage to secure about $2,000, with accrued interest, exact amount indefinite, on allegation and proof tending to show that, at the time the deed was executed, there was a parol agreement between the parties that the same should stand as mortgage to secure said amount, and plaintiff should have as much as three years to redeem same.

There was denial of the agreement by the defendant, with averment and proof tending to show that the deed was absolute in term for a full and valuable consideration paid to the plaintiff.

On issues submitted, the jury rendered the following verdict:

"(1) Did the defendants procure the deed, dated January 6, 1915, in form a fee simple upon the promise that plaintiff should have the right to redeem the land therein described upon payment of money advanced for plaintiff? Answer: Yes.

"If so, what is amount of debt due by plaintiff to defendants to secure the land in controversy? Answer: $2,862, with interest from January 6, 1915."

Irvin B. Tucker and H. L. Lyon, both of Whiteville, for appellants.

McLean, Varser & McLean, of Lumberton, and Lewis & Powell, of Whiteville, for appellee.

HOKE, J. [1] It is the law of this state that—

"A written deed, absolute in terms, cannot be changed into a mortgage except upon allegation and proof that the clause of redemption was omitted by reason of ignorance, mistake, fraud, or undue advantage."

This position was approved and confirmed in the recent case of Newton v. Clark, 174 N. C. 393, 93 S. E. 951, and it was there further held that—

"Parol evidence that a deed to lands was made on an agreement to reconvey the same to the grantor on a certain contingency is incompetent to establish a parol trust in the grantor's favor," etc., citing a long line of authorities in support of both positions.

The opinion then quotes with approval from Pearson, Judge, in Sowell v. Barrett, 45 N. C. 54, as follows:

"Since Streator v. Jones, 10 N. C. 423, there has been a uniform current of decisions, by which these two principles are established in reference to bills which seek to correct a deed, absolute on its face, into a mortgage or security for a debt: (1) It must be alleged, and of course proven, that the clause of redemption was omitted by reason of ignorance, mistake, fraud, or undue advantage; (2) the intention must be established not merely by proof of declarations, but by proof of facts and circumstances, dehors the deed, inconsistent with the idea of an absolute purchase. Otherwise, titles evidenced by solemn deeds would be at all times exposed to the 'slippery memory of witnesses.'"

And proceeds: "These principles are fully discussed in Kelly v. Bryan, 6 Ired. Eq. 41 N. C. 283, and it is useless to elaborate them again. This excerpt from the opinion has been quoted literally and with approval in Bonham v. Craig, 80 N. C. 224; Watkins v. Williams, 123 N. C. 170 [31 S. E. 888]; Porter v. White, 128 N. C. 43 [38 S. E. 24]. And the same principle is declared in different language in Kelly v. Bryan, 41 N. C. 286; Brown v. Carson, 45 N. C. 272; Briant v. Corpening, 62 N. C. 325; Edgerton v. Jones, 102 N. C. 283 [9 S. E. 2]; Norris v. McLam, 104 N. C. 160 [10 S. E. 140]; Sprague v. Bond, 115 N. C. 532 [20 S. E. 709]."

And in negation of the right to establish a parol trust in favor of the grantor, cites Gaylord v. Gaylord, 150 N. C. p. 228, 63 S. E. 1028.

[2] It is nowhere alleged in the pleadings that the clause of redemption was omitted by mistake, nor do we find that any proof was offered to that effect, nor is it established by the verdict. This is not a case, then, of a defective statement of a cause of action which has been in any way supplemented or cured, but the case presented is one where a fact, essential to support a judgment in plaintiff's favor, is entirely lacking, and the same must therefore be set aside. Warlick v. Plonk, 108 N. C. 81, 9 S. E. 190; Emery et ux. v. R. R., 102 N. C. 209, 9 S. E. 139, 11 Am. St. Rep. 727. In the latter case, the principle is stated as follows:

"The verdict, whether in response to one or many issues, must establish facts sufficient to enable the court to proceed to judgment."

[3,4] We were referred by counsel for plaintiff to the case of Fuller v. Jenkins, 130 N. C. 554, 41 S. E. 706, as an authority to the effect that a deed, absolute in form, may be changed into a mortgage by reason of a contemporaneous parol agreement to that effect and without allegation or proof that the clause of redemption was omitted by mistake or fraud, etc., and it is insisted that the principle of stare decisis may be invoked in support of the present proceedings and in protection of the rights and interests arising to plaintiff while that case expressed the ruling of the Supreme Court on the question presented. The doctrine of stare decisis or the principle of adherence to judicial precedents is fully established in this state and, in proper instances, will continue to be steadfastly upheld. Mason v. Cotton Co., 148 N. C. 492, 62 S. E. 625, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1221, 128 Am. St. Rep. 635, and Hill v. R. R., 143 N. C. 539, 55 S. E. 854, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 606. The position recognized in Fuller v. Jenkins having been entirely disapproved in the later case of Newton v. Clark, supra, the doctrine is not in strictness presented by the record, and the question recurs on the effect to be allowed the case of Fuller v. Jenkins as a precedent in support of the interest which plaintiff is here endeavoring to assert.

[5,6] While a single decision may become a precedent sufficiently authoritative to protect rights acquired during its continuance, such a case more frequently occurs in the construction of statutes applicable, in which case an authoritative interpretation, formally made by a court of last resort, is thereafter considered a part of the law itself and may be invoked to protect titles acquired and investments made on the faith of the principle so recognized and declared. In decisions, however, declaratory of the common law or of general equitable principles, in order to establishment of such a precedent, it is more usually required that there be a series of decisions on a given subject, or, if one, that it be so definitive in its terms and so generally acquiesced in and acted on that it has come to be recognized as the accepted rule on a given question.

[7] It is said that a Supreme Court decision in that class of cases does not constitute the law, but is only evidence of it, and the general rule is that, when a court of last resort has felt called on to overrule such a decision, it is not thereafter considered bad law, but as never having been the law applicable in such case. Mason v. Cotton Co., supra, and authorities cited; Ram on Judgments, c. 3, p. 47. And the question of how far it should serve to protect intervening rights is largely in the discretion of the court that rendered it (Black on the Law of Judicial Precedents, p. 187), dependent on the character of the decision itself, that is, whether it is sufficiently definitive and purports to establish a given principle, the nature of the right for which protection is claimed, and whether it was considered and reasonably relied upon in the case presented, and how far a sound public policy is involved and must be allowed to affect the question. The principle appearing in Fuller v. Jenkins is in direct antagonism to the law of this state, as established by a current of decisions, well-nigh from the beginning of the court, certainly as far back as Streator v. Jones, 10 N. C. 423, in 1824, one of them, Porter v. White, 128 N. C. 42, 38 S. E. 24, just one year prior to the case in question and fully reaffirmed in the later decision of Newton v. Clark, supra; all holding that, in order to change a deed into a mortgage, it must be alleged and proved that the clause of redemption was omitted by mistake, etc. The case does not, in terms, purport to lay down any definite or different principle nor to question or disturb the law as it formerly prevailed. It has not since been cited or referred to as an authoritative precedent and is evidently an inadvertence on the part of the court and of the able and learned judge who wrote the opinion. In the case of Ray v.

Patterson, 170 N. C. p. 226, 87 S. E. 212, to which we were also cited and in which a similar issue appeared, the decision was made to turn principally on an erroneous ruling of the court as to the quantum of proof for which a new trial was allowed, and the instant question was in no way presented or passed upon. Again, there is no rule in our system of jurisprudence that has a greater tendency to maintain the stability of titles and the security of investments than that which upholds the integrity of solemn written deed and protects them from assault by parol testimony except in specified and very restricted instances, and sound public policy which forms the basis of stare decisis and its proper application forbids that, on the facts of this record, the decision relied upon by plaintiff should be in any way recognized as a precedent, rendering, as it would, all muniments of title coming under it liable to be altered or set aside by parol evidence as in ordinary cases. In no aspect of the matter, therefore, can Fuller v. Jenkins be regarded as an authoritative decision available for the protection of the right asserted by plaintiff in the present suit, and the position is fully supported by the decided cases on the subject. Thus, in Mason v. Cotton Co., supra, the court refused to allow the principles of an overruled case in protection of a claimant's rights under an executory contract; the decision being contrary to a general business law and not having been acquiesced in as the settled rule on the subject. And in Quaker Realty Co. v. La Basse, 131 La. 996, 60 South. 661, reported also in Ann. Cas. 1914A, 1073, it was held that—

"A single decision can seldom serve as a basis for stare decisis, and never where opposed to previous decisions, especially where they are overruled without being referred to as if they had escaped the attention of the court."

And, in the editorial note in the publication referred to, there are numbers of cases from courts of the highest authority to the effect that a solitary decision has been held insufficient to change the law on a given subject as it had formerly prevailed. In Heron, Adm'r, v. Whitely Malleable Castings Co. et al., 47 Ind. App. 335, 92 N. E. 555, it was decided, among other things:

"The decisions of the Supreme Court do not constitute the law, but are merely evidence thereof, and people have no right to rely thereon until harmonious and well-advised opinions have been reported and have stood unchallenged for a long time. * * *

"Where the decisions of the Supreme Court are conflicting, or are so recently made that the parties cannot be presumed to have contracted in reference thereto, the doctrine of stare decisis cannot be invoked in support of a contract."

In Stockton, Trustee, v. Dundee Manufacturing Co., 22 N. J. Eq. 56, involving the validity of a tender in United States notes at a time when they were held insufficient for the purpose and the effect of a subsequent decision holding this a valid tender, the court held:

"A change in the law, by decision, is retrospective, and makes the law at the time of the first decision as it is declared in the last decision, as to all transactions that can be reached by it. Hence, a tender having been made in United States notes before the commencement of this suit, the mortgage debt must be considered as legally tendered."

And the cases of Storrie v. Cortes et ux., 90 Tex. 283, 38 S. W. 154, 35 L. R. A. 666, and Allen v. Allen, 95 Cal. 185, 30 Pac. 213, 16 L. R. A. 646, are in affirmance of the same general principle.

For the reasons indicated, we are of opinion, as stated, that the facts established by the verdict and shown in the record are insufficient to support the judgment, and that the same must be set aside and a new trial had, with leave given to plaintiff to amend his pleadings, making further averment of his cause of action if the facts available should justify such a course.

Error.

UNDERWOOD v. JEFFERSON STANDARD LIFE INS. CO. (No. 387.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 15, 1919.)

1. INSURANCE — 587 — LIFE INSURANCE — CHANGE OF BENEFICIARY—EFFECT OF ASSIGNMENT TO INSURER—"ASSIGNED."

The word "assigned," as used in a life insurance policy provision that insured could change beneficiary while policy was unassigned, refers to an assignment to a stranger, and not one to the insurer for a loan thereon, and the insurer, while holding the policy under an assignment, could waive any objections to a change of beneficiary.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Assigned.]

2. INSURANCE — 349(3)—PAYMENT OF PREMIUM NOTE—DEFAULT.

A note given by insured to insurer to cover a life policy premium, not being taken in payment of the premium, but as an agreement for extension of the time of payment of premium from its date, when it was not paid there was a default in the premium payment from the date of the note.

3. INSURANCE — 370 — LIFE INSURANCE — PREMIUMS—PAYMENT FROM LOAN VALUE—LAPSE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence in an action on a life insurance policy held to show that there was not enough indebtedness to have caused a lapse or expiration of the policy before insured's death because the indebtedness to be deducted was less than the loan value, there being enough of the latter to pay premiums due and prevent lapse under the policy provisions.

4. INSURANCE — 179½ — LIFE INSURANCE — POLICY — CONSTRUCTION — LOAN VALUE.

Where nine annual premiums were duly and fully paid under a policy of life insurance, held that the loan value next opposite the figure "9" in the portion of the policy stating the loan values was the loan value at such time.

5. INSURANCE — 367(2) — LIFE INSURANCE — NOTES — COMPUTATION OF LOAN VALUE.

In an action by beneficiary to collect upon a life insurance policy which had been assigned to insurer to secure loans, held that a note given to insurer not secured by an assignment of the policy was not, under the terms thereof, to be computed as an amount to be taken from the loan value in determining whether sufficient loan value remained under policy clause to secure and pay premiums and keep the policy in force.

6. INSURANCE — 146(3) — LIFE INSURANCE — POLICY — CONSTRUCTION.

In construing a life insurance policy for the purpose of ascertaining its legal effect, since the contract is expressed in language selected by the insurer all doubts as to its meaning should be resolved in favor of insured.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; Shaw, Judge.

Action by Mary H. Underwood against the Jefferson Standard Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The case is as follows: The policy was issued by the Greensboro Life Insurance Company August 1, 1905, and on September 12, 1912, this company was merged with defendant. Nine full annual premiums were paid, the last being paid to the defendant on or about August 1, 1913. The premium due on August 1, 1914, was not paid in full, but $68.85 was paid upon it, and a "blue note" for $96 was given, which plaintiff contends by its terms kept the policy in force until February 1, 1915. The policy was originally payable to Ruth Underwood, daughter of insured, as beneficiary, but on October 1, 1907, the beneficiary was changed to the plaintiff. While plaintiff was beneficiary, the insured and plaintiff borrowed $385 from the Greensboro Life Insurance Company and assigned the policy sued on as security for the loan. While the policy was thus assigned to the company the assured changed the beneficiary, this time from plaintiff to his estate; and while his estate was beneficiary he borrowed sums from the Greensboro Life Insurance Company aggregating $342.29, thus bringing his total indebtedness to $727.29, which was charged against the policy, as a lien on it, in the hands of the company by assignment to it. Of this amount plaintiff signed a note for $385, and, of the remaining $342.29, $162.04 was spent in paying the premiums on said policy. After the last loan was obtained by insured he again changed the beneficiary from his estate to the plaintiff.

Insured did not at any time avail himself of the privilege of taking the paid-up policy allowed him by nonforfeiture provision 2 set out below. The policy, among other provisions, contained the following:

[Relevant Portions of Tables A and B.]

Table A.			Table B.
Nonforfeiture Values.			Nonforfeiture Values.
After End of Year.	Loan Value.	Paid-Up Policy.	Ext. Yrs.	Ins. Mos.	After End of Year.

"Tables A and B of nonforfeiture values on the margin of the page show the guaranteed values of this policy corresponding to the number of years for which full annual premiums have been paid, and in the event of any indebtedness against this policy these values will be reduced proportionately."

Nonforfeiture provisions:

"(1) Loans will be made by the company in accordance with Table A upon satisfactory assignment of this policy as sole security, at a rate of interest not to exceed six per cent. per annum, provided premiums are duly paid to the anniversary next succeeding the date when the loan is applied for.

"(2) If provision 2 has not been availed of one month from default in payment of premiums, the company will voluntarily extend this policy in the first-named sum on page one as automatic paid-up term insurance in accordance with Table B."

"Change of Beneficiary: The insured may, while this policy is in force unassigned, change the beneficiary, and such change will take effect when indorsement thereof is made by the company upon this policy."

"Assignment: No assignment of this policy shall be valid unless made in writing, and the original, or a duplicate original, filed in the home office of the company. The company will not be responsible for the validity of any assignment."

"This policy is incontestable after one year from date except for nonpayment of premiums."

On September 2, 1914, the insured paid to the defendant $19.97 unearned interest on the loan of $727.29, as shown by article 19 of the complaint and not denied in the answer. The insured and the plaintiff, on the 21st day of August, 1912, executed a note to the Greensboro Life Insurance Company for $150. This note was unsecured, did not refer to the policy, nor profess to be a lien upon it, nor was the policy assigned to secure it, and was afterwards destroyed by the defendant's vice president.

The following is a copy of note for indebtedness to the company secured by the assignment of the policy:

"$727.29.

No. —.

"This is to certify that I, the undersigned, the insured and beneficiary, respectively, under, and the sole owner of, policy No. 792, issued by the Greensboro Life Insurance Company, have this day borrowed from the said company the sum of seven hundred twenty-seven and $\frac{29}{100}$ dollars, and hereby assign the said policy, and all profits and benefits now due, or which may hereafter become due, thereon, to secure the repayment of said loan and the interest thereon, as herein provided."

The following is a copy of the "blue note":

"Greensboro, N. C., Aug. 1, 1914.

"On or before the 1st day of November, 1914, without grace and without demand or notice, I promise to pay to the order of Jefferson Standard Life Insurance Company one hundred twenty-three $\frac{9}{100}$ dollars, at their home office in Greensboro, N. C., with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum.

"This note is accepted by said company at the request of the maker, together with $38.89 dollars in cash, on the following express agreement:

"That although no part of the premium due on the 1st day of August, 1914, under policy No. 792-G on the life of W. I. Underwood, has been paid, the insurance thereunder shall be continued in force until midnight of the due date of said note; that, if this note is paid on or before the date it becomes due, such payment, together with said cash, will then be accepted by said company as payment of said premium, and all rights under said policy shall thereupon be the same as if said premium had been paid when due; that, if this note is not paid on or before the day it becomes due, it shall thereupon automatically cease to be a claim against the maker, and said company shall retain said cash as part compensation for the rights and privileges hereby granted, and all rights under said policy shall be the same as if said cash had not been paid nor this agreement made."

Judgment for the amount of the policy and interest at six per cent., less $150 and interest thereon, and costs, from which defendant appealed.

Brooks, Sapp & Kelly, of Greensboro, for appellant.

Chas. A. Hines and Thos. C. Hoyle, both of Greensboro, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The plaintiff contends, upon the above-stated facts, that the policy was kept in force until after the death of the insured by the nonforfeiture provisions above set forth. And, for the purpose of calculating the extended insurance, she insists that the value of the policy, at the end of the ninth year, was $1,010, the number set opposite the figure 9 in Table A, and from this sum should be taken the amount for which the policy was liable; and she further contends that this amount was the sum of $385 (the amount of the note she signed); and $162.04 (the sums used in paying premiums on the policy), less $19.97 (the amount of unearned interest), in all $527. The extended insurance, as the plaintiff contends, is therefore $1,010—$527.07 of 17 years, and should be counted from February 1, 1915.

The defendant contends, on the other hand that in calculating the extended insurance the value of the policy at the end of the ninth year was only $875, the number set opposite the figure 8, in Table A, and by the application of the nonforfeiture provision 1. above set forth. It also contends that $727.29 should be deducted from $875, in order that the term of extended insurance may be calculated, and that such extended insurance should be counted from August 1, 1914, the date of the note, and not from the due date of the premium note. It is conceded by the defendant that if $1,010 was the value of the policy at the end of the ninth year (and especially if the amount of the note for $150 due the company is not to be added to the other indebtedness), it was in force at the death of the insured; and, on the other hand plaintiff conceded that if the value of the policy at the end of the ninth year was only $875, and the debt properly chargeable against it was $727.29, then the policy had expired before the death of the insured.

[1] The plaintiff further contends that the only amounts chargeable against the value of the policy in computing the extended insurance is $385, the original loan signed by her, and $162.04, the portions of the other loans used in paying the premiums; and from this, she contends, should be taken $19.97 unearned interest paid to the defendant, and her reasons are as follows:

"(a) The policy provides that the insured may, while this policy is in force and unassigned, change any beneficiary, and that there is no question that this policy was assigned to the company at the time when the attempted change in the beneficiary was indorsed on the policy, and therefore the attempted change was null and void, the rule of law being that where provision is made in a policy for a change of the beneficiary the right must be exercised in strict accordance with the provisions of the policy."

And she cites for this position Lanier v. Insurance Co., 142 N. C. 14, 54 S. E. 786; 14 R. C. L. Insurance, § 554 et seq.; 14 R. C. L. pages 1390, 1391; and that, where an insurance policy provides for a change of the beneficiary, the latter has a vested interest therein subject to be divested, and then only in strict accordance with the provisions of the policy, for which contention she refers to Deal v. Deal, 87 S. C. 395, 69 S. E. 886, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1142; Arnold v. Insurance Co., 3 Ga. App. 685, 60 S. E. 470; Mutual Benefit v. Willoughby, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 838, note. And further she contended that if the attempt to change the beneficiary from the plaintiff to the estate of the insured was a nullity, and the plaintiff continued to be the beneficiary, then loans made against the policy, evidenced by the notes which she did not sign, were invalid as to her, as, "under a policy for the benefit of the wife and children of the insured, an assignment by the insured will not cut off their interest, even though it is contingent at the time the assignment is made." 25 Cyc. 778, 779.

Answering this contention, it may be said that the assured had the right to change the beneficiary, by designating his personal representative, for the use of his estate, as such. The policy had not been "assigned," in the sense that word is used in the contract. The assignment spoken of is one to a stranger, and not one to the company; for the latter could waive any objection to the change of the beneficiary, and did so by assenting to the one which was made in this case. Where a stranger is assignee, his rights could not materially be affected in the absence of his consent, and consequently the company, without authority for that purpose, could not waive for him. The provision was inserted to prevent confusion or complication, and to relieve the company from any danger of liability growing out of changing the beneficiary after the policy had been assigned. These reasons, of course, would not apply where the assignment has been made to the company itself. The debt, therefore, was $727.29 instead of $527.07, as contended by the plaintiff, and we think it was that amount, in any view, as the difference between the two was the amount of the debt contracted while the estate was assignee, and the company had the right to make the loan notwithstanding the assignment and without the plaintiff's consent.

[2] (b) The defendant admits that it did not earn $19.97 of the interest that was paid to it by the insured on September 2, 1914, but contends that this amount should be applied on its unsecured note for $150, which it destroyed. This contention, says plaintiff, is unsound; for it is clear that this payment of unearned interest should be applied to the note upon which it was paid and reduced its amount, and she relies upon this authority for so contending:

"Except when otherwise agreed, a payment made on an indebtedness consisting of principal and interest, and applied by either the debtor or creditor, will be applied first to the interest due, and then to the principal. Payments of interest by mistake, when no interest is due, is applied as payment on the principal debt at the date of maturity of the obligation. When payments of interest are made in excess of the legal interest due, the excess will generally be applied to the principal." 30 Cyc. 1249, 1250.

"Money paid beyond lawful interest on account of the debt is, in legal effect, a payment upon the debt." Loveridge v. Larned (C. C.) 7 Fed. 294.

As to the "blue notes":

(c) Again plaintiff insists that the "blue notes," and payments of cash in connection therewith, kept the policy in force until February 1, 1915.

We need not discuss in detail all of the questions raised on this appeal, as we are satisfied that the admission of the parties as to certain facts are sufficient for our purpose in deciding the case upon one or two grounds alone.

Our opinion is that the extension period of the insurance should be counted from August 1, 1914. The object of the "blue note" was not to fix a new date for this purpose—that is, February 1, 1915—but it was given by the assured, and taken by the company, as an accommodation or indulgence to the former, something like a grace or favor to him in the way of extended time for payment of the premium, and not as in itself a payment of the premium. If the note was not paid, it was the same as if it had never been given, and there was a default in the payment of the premium as of August 1, 1914, in which event the extended insurance would automatically start and prevent a lapse of the policy. We have so held in a case very similar to this, and exactly the same as this case in all of the essential facts relating to this question. The court in Sexton v. Insurance Co., 157 N. C. 142, 72 S. E. 863, s. c., 160 N. C. 597, 76 S. E. 535, was called upon to construe an instrument substantially worded as is the "blue note" in this case and it was said by Justice Brown, 157 N. C. at page 144, 72 S. E. at page 864:

"There is no evidence that the defendant accepted the note as a payment for the premium. It is clearly an extension of the time of payment. In express terms the note on its face declares the policy is void if the note is not paid when due. This note is similar in language to the one construed in Ferebee v. Insurance Co., 68 N. C. 11."

The court further said, at page 145 of 157 N. C., at page 864 of 72 S. E., quoting from 3 Cooley's Briefs on Insurance, p. 2269, and citing Pitt v. Insurance Co., 100 Mass. 500:

"It is commonly stipulated by insurance companies that, if a note is accepted for a premium, a failure to pay the note at maturity shall terminate the insurance. When the policy, or the policy and the note, contained a stipulation to this effect, a failure to pay at maturity a note given for a premium will work a forfeiture of insurance."

See, also, Murphy v. Insurance Co., 187 N. C. 334, 83 S. E. 461.

The extension clause was inserted to save the policy from forfeiture or to prevent one. The giving of the note and payment of cash for the premium did not work an extension. The court in Bank of Commerce v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co., 125 Ga. 552, 54 S. E. 643, deciding the same question, held:

"The fact that $21 was paid in cash upon the premium did not operate to extend the policy; there being in the contract nothing declaring that a payment of a part of an annual premium should give a continuation period proportionate to the fraction of the premium paid. * * * The validity of this contract cannot be successfully questioned. It did not undertake to destroy any existing right of the beneficiary under the policy. The extension of time was a favor, not a right, and the allowance of additional time for payment of a premium beyond its maturity did not operate to confer still further rights, in spite of the terms of the extension."

The same decision was made in Union Mut. Life Ins. Co. of Portland, Me., v. Adler, 38 Ind. App. 530, 73 N. E. 835, 75 N. E. 1088, and the case strongly supports this view.

[3] But if the extended insurance began on August 1, 1914, instead of February 1, 1915, the policy was alive and in full force when the assured died, because when his indebtedness to the company is deducted, or rather properly proportioned to the loan value of the policy, there is enough of the latter left to carry it beyond the day of the death. In other words, there was not enough indebtedness to have caused a lapse, or the expiration of the policy, before that event, and this is certainly true if the note for $150 is not to be counted as a part of the indebtedness.

We may well pause here to again consider the case of Sexton v. Insurance Co., supra, in another aspect, as defendant contends that $875 is the proper loan value of the policy, and not $1,010, because in the Sexton Case, 160 N. C. 597, 600, 76 S. E. 535, 536, the court states:

"It is true the plaintiff claims that under the automatic extension feature of the policy, there having been a payment of three annual premiums, the plaintiff was entitled to an extension to the amount marked on the policy. The policy, which was in evidence, provided that the 'nonforfeiture value on the margin of this page shows the several guaranteed values of this policy corresponding to the number of years for which annual premiums have been paid, and in the event of any indebtedness against this policy these values will be reduced proportionately.' This table shows that where three annual premiums have been paid, as in this case, the loan value was $60, which would have entitled the insured to three years and one month's extension. But it appeared in the evidence of the plaintiff that the insured had borrowed said $60 from the company, which was unpaid, and, therefore, upon the plaintiff's evidence, the insured was entitled to no extension."

[4, 5] Defendant then says that the original record of this case shows that there had been four premiums paid instead of three, and it deduces from this fact that the court adopted the loan value of three payments when there had been four, as it practically says should be done in this case. But that is a non sequitur. It does not follow that, because the court may have made a mistake as to the number of payments, it has held that defendant's contention is right as to what is the loan value, for the law is stated correctly upon the assumption that there were only three payments. "There having been payment of three annual premiums, the plaintiff was entitled to an extension to the amount marked on the policy"—that is the amount set down next opposite the figure 3—and the court so allowed, and adjudged accordingly. It is perfectly clear that the court did not mean otherwise, and that it acted upon the assumption that there had only been three premiums paid. We do not know what the record shows, or whether this was a mistake in fact, but we must take the law to be as declared upon the facts stated by the court, in the absence of any correction of the alleged mistake by petition to rehear. The parties seem to have been contented with the statement of the fact as it was made. But, however that may be, we are decidedly of the opinion that the only construction of the policy is that the figures next opposite to "nine" in the first column of the table are the correct ones to be adopted here.

If there had been no indebtedness, the period of extension, after eight full payments of premiums would have been 15 years, and after nine payments it would have been 17 years. In the former case the "loan value" of the policy would have been $875, and in latter case $1,010. This is according to the table of values of term and paid-up policies, showing the length of extended insurance in the case of the former class, or term insurance. The provision as to the payment of the premium to the anniversary next succeeding the date of a loan cannot operate, by any fair or reasonable construction, to reduce the loan value of the policy to $875, as that provision was a mere condition annexed to the making of the loan, and was evidently not intended to decrease the loan value, or to give any benefit by a reduction of it. It being admitted that nine annual premiums were duly and fully paid, the loan value next opposite the figure 9 must control in estimating the extension period, as we have already shown. The result would be that the policy was in force when the assured died, but this is conclusively so when we hold, as we do, that in estimating the amount of the indebtedness the note for $150 should not be counted. It was not a lien on the policy, and the latter provides:

"Tables A and B of nonforfeiture values on the margin of this page show the guaranteed values of this policy corresponding to the number of years for which full annual premiums have been paid, and in the event of any indebtedness against this policy these values will be reduced proportionately."

This clause, especially the latter part of it, plainly shows that only indebtedness secured by an assignment of the policy shall be considered. The note of $150 was not "a debt against the policy," as contemplated by that provision.

[8] We must not overlook the fact that, in construing a policy for the purpose of ascertaining its legal effect, the contract is expressed in language selected by the company for its purpose, and therefore that all doubts as to its meaning should be resolved in favor of the assured. Bray v. Insurance Co., 139 N. C. 390, 51 S. E. 922; Rayburn v. Casualty Co., 138 N. C. 379, 382, 50 S. E. 762, 107 Am. St. Rep. 548; Arnold v. Insurance Co., 152 N. C. 232, 67 S. E. 574; 14 Ruling Case Law, p. 226; Grabbs v. Insurance Co., 125 N. C. 389, 34 S. E. 503; and Bank v. Insurance Co., 95 U. S. 673, 24 L. Ed. 563. This court said in Bray v. Insurance Co., supra:

"If the clause in question is ambiguously worded, so that there is any uncertainty as to its right interpretation, or if for any reason there is doubt in our minds concerning its true meaning, we should construe it rather against the defendant, who was its author, than against the plaintiffs; and any such doubt should be resolved in favor of the latter, giving, of course, legal effect to the intention, if it can be ascertained, although it may have been imperfectly or obscurely expressed. * * * This is the rule to be adopted for our guidance in all such cases, and one reason, at least, for it is that the company has had the time and opportunity, with a view to its own interests, to make clear its meaning, by selecting with care and precision language fit to convey it, and, if it has failed to do so, the consequences of its failure should not even be shared by the assured, so as to deprive him of the benefit of the contract, as one of indemnity for his loss;" citing Grabbs v. Insurance Co., 125 N. C. 389, 34 S. E. 503.

In applying this just and salutary rule, Justice Harlan, in First National Bank of Kansas v. Hartford Fire Insurance Co., 95 U. S. 673, 679, 24 L. Ed. 563, 565, thus tersely and strongly restated the rule, with the reasons for it:

"When a policy of insurance contains contradictory provisions, or has been so framed as to leave room for construction, rendering it doubtful whether the parties intended the exact truth of the applicant's statements to be a condition precedent to any binding contract, the court should lean against that construction which imposes upon the assured the obligations of a warranty. The company cannot justly complain of such a rule. Its attorneys, officers, or agents prepared the policy for the purpose, we shall assume, both of protecting the company against fraud and of securing the just rights of the assured under a valid contract of insurance. It is its language which the court is invited to interpret, and it is both reasonable and just that its own words should be construed most strongly against itself."

The rule is very pertinent here as to the several questions raised. But we entertain no doubt, without the aid of the rule, as to what the parties meant when they entered into this contract, and especially in regard to the extension clause.

It is not necessary to consider the point as to the application of the unearned interest to the debt (of $779) which is chargeable against the policy, thereby reducing it, as we are of the opinion that, without making such use of it, the policy had not expired at the death of the assured, but was still in force.

The case was admirably argued by both sides, and we are indebted to the learned counsel who appeared before us (Mr. Kelly and Mr. Hines) for having made easier our task in unraveling an apparently complex and intricate case by their very enlightening argument.

We have reached the conclusion that the note for $150 should be omitted from the account in ascertaining the period for the extension of the insurance under Table A, and the stipulation in the policy explanatory of it, which provides for the proportioned reduction of the policy value by the existing indebtedness. And, further, that the loan value was $1,010 instead of $875. These two conclusions carry the policy beyond the death of the assured and entitle plaintiff to recover upon it. We are also inclined to the opinion that the amount of the unearned interest should also be deducted, but it is not necessary to decide that question in view of our other holdings, and we therefore leave it open.

We are of opinion that Judge Shaw gave the correct judgment, and it must be so certified.

Affirmed.

Demurrer to a pleading as a whole will be overruled where a part thereof is good.

4. EVIDENCE ¶180—RELEVANCY—SIMILAR FACTS—RES INTER ALIOS ACTA.

In boarding house keeper's action for failure of defendant's employes to board and room with him as required by defendant's contract, where defense was the inferior quality of food furnished, witness who had eaten food furnished by plaintiff both before and after contract was entered into could testify as to the kind of meals provided by plaintiff for his boarders before employes commenced boarding with him, where there was no agreement to give employes food of better quality than theretofore given; such evidence not being res inter alios acta.

5. EVIDENCE ¶129(1)—RELEVANCY—SIMILAR FACTS.

Evidence of similar facts is admissible to prove particular fact in issue if it rationally tends to prove such fact and is so related to it as to form a reasonably safe basis for a conclusion in regard to such fact.

6. EVIDENCE ¶53—RELEVANCY—SIMILAR FACTS—INFERENCES.

Among inferences which, except under certain conditions, the law will not permit to be drawn, is that a person has done a certain act because he has done a similar act at another time.

7. CONTRACTS ¶335(2)—BREACH—RIGHT OF ACTION.

A party to a contract can maintain an action for its breach upon averring and proving a performance of his own antecedent obligations arising on the contract or that he was prevented from performing it by the other party or those acting for him.

8. DAMAGES ¶40(2)—LOSS OF PROFITS—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

In boarding house keeper's action for damages for failure of defendant's employes to board and room with him as required by defendant's contract, profits which would certainly have been realized but for such breach are recoverable.

9. DAMAGES ¶23—BREACH OF CONTRACT—PROFITS—LOSSES—CONTEMPLATION OF PARTIES.

In action for breach of contract, the injured party is entitled to recover all damages, including gains prevented as well as losses sustained, as were fairly within the contemplation of the parties and capable of being ascertained with a reasonable degree of certainty.

10. TRIAL ¶350(4)—SUBMISSION OF ISSUE—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

In action for breach of contract, where defendant denied having breached the contract, the submission merely of the issue as to the amount, if any, plaintiff was entitled to recover, was insufficient, since there should have been an issue as to whether or not defendant had breached the contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Davidson County; Shaw, Judge.

Action by O. L. Nance against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

Plaintiff sued for damages, alleging that he contracted with the defendant to board and lodge nine of its employes at $1.25 per day for each of them, and that after staying with him a few days they left his home, without any legal or sufficient cause, although he had to incur great expense in preparing to perform his part of the contract, and while they were with him as boarders and lodgers he supplied them with good and wholesome food and comfortable lodging, and was at all times able, ready, and willing to perform the contract throughout the time named therein. The defendant denied the allegations of the complaint.

The jury returned the following verdict:

"What amount, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover of the defendant? Answer: $150."

Judgment and appeal by the defendant.

Francis R. Stark, of New York City, and Walser & Walser, of Lexington, for appellant. J. F. Sprulli, of Lexington, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-3] There is but one question which requires consideration. Mrs. Wafford testified that she had eaten at the plaintiff's boarding house both before and after the employes came there, and saw the supper which was spread for them on the night they did not come, when they agreed to come and were expected by the plaintiff to come, and it "looked nice," was well cooked, and "looked as nice as anybody's." Defendant objected to this testimony, but it will be observed that at least some of it was clearly admissible, and the objection must fail; for where a part of testimony is competent, although the other part of it may not be, and exception is taken to all of it, it will not be sustained. Defendant should have separated the "good from the bad," and objected only to the latter, as the objection must be valid as to the whole of the testimony. We will not set off the bad for him, and consider only that much of it, upon the supposition that his objection was aimed solely at the incompetent part. He must do that for himself. This is the firmly established rule. State v. Ledford, 133 N. C. 722, 45 S. E. 944; Barnhardt v. Smith, 86 N. C. 479; Phillips v. Land Co., 174 N. C. 542, 545, 94 S. E. 12 and cases cited; Caldwell County v. George, 176 N. C. 602, 97 S. E. 507. We have very recently, at this term, approved this rule. It also applies to the charge of the court (Ritter L. Co. v. Moffitt, 157 N. C. 568, 73 S. E. 212; Hendricks v. Ireland, 162 N. C. 523, 77 S. E. 1011; Sigmon v. Shell, 165 N. C. 582, 81 S. E. 739), and also to a demurrer in pleading (Caho v. Railroad Co., 147 N. C. 23, 60 S. E. 640; Hay v. Collins, 118 Ga. 243, 44 S. E. 1002; Sloan v. S. A. L. Ry. Co., 64 S. C. 389, 42 S. E. 197; N. & W. R. Co. v. Stegall's Adm'r, 105 Va. 538, 64 S. E. 19; Va. & N. C. Wheel Co. v. Harris, 103 Va. 708, 49 S. E. 991).

[4] But the testimony as to the kind of meals provided by plaintiff before the boarders came was relevant and competent, not generally or in all cases, but in this case, because of its peculiar facts. Plaintiff kept a boarding house, and agreed for a consideration to take these employes of defendant as boarders, giving them such lodging and table board as he had theretofore furnished to his other boarders. There was no special provision for better board or accommodations. It was competent for the witness, therefore, in stating what kind of table board they received after coming there, to compare it with that furnished before they came, as tending to show that, under the contract, which was general in its terms, and called for the same kind of accommodations and board theretofore supplied, the employes received the ordinary and usual board, and not such as they stated had been received. But, if not substantive evidence, it was, at least, corroborative of the witness, and no special instruction was asked as to how it should be applied by the jury, as required by rule 27 of this court (164 N. C. [Anno. Ed.] 438, 81 S. E. xi).

[5, 6] The question to be decided, when this class of testimony is offered, is whether it is relevant; that is, whether it rationally tends to prove the fact in issue, and is so related to it as to form a reasonably safe basis for a conclusion in regard to the fact. Where the defense in an action brought to recover for labor was that the plaintiff had unskillfully performed such labor, evidence that he had unskillfully performed other labor was held irrelevant. Campbell v. Russell, 139 Mass. 278, 1 N. E. 345; Maguire v. Middlesex R. Co., 115 Mass. 239. Among inferences which, except under certain conditions, the law will not permit to be drawn, is that a person has done a certain act because he has done a similar act at another time. 17 Cyc. 279. The evidence in this case was both relevant and competent—relative because it tended to prove a material fact; and competent because the witness had personal knowledge of the matters to which she testified, and her statement was not res inter allos acta, as suggested by defendant's counsel. It will be noticed that Mrs. Wafford spoke of the table fare both before and after B. H. Moore and the other employes came to board. She saw the supper spread for them, and of which they did not come to partake, and she also had eaten at Mrs. Nance's table before that day. All this evidence tended to rebut that of the defendant, and to show that there had been full compliance with the terms of the contract by the plaintiff.

If the testimony offered in behalf of the plaintiff was found by the jury to be true, which seems to be the case, the plaintiff furnished such meals and substantial food as were sufficient to satisfy the normal appetite, though not, perhaps, suited to those of fastidious tastes. He was not required, under the contract, to gratify the luxurious tastes of an epicurean.

The testimony of Mrs. Wafford that her daughter was employed by plaintiff to help in the house when the new boarders should come, and that she was afterwards told by plaintiffs that her child's service would not be needed, as his wife could do the work after the boarders had left, if not harmless, tended to show that plaintiff, as he stated, had prepared, after making the contract, to receive his guests and have the proper waiters at the table for serving the meals. They could not eat if they could not get the food, and there must be some one to bring it to them. This is not an unusual, but a customary, provision at a boarding house, or a hotel. This proof was offered to show plaintiff's readiness to perform his part of the contract.

[7-8] A party to a contract can maintain an action for its breach upon averring and proving a performance of his own antecedent obligations arising on the contract, or that he was prevented from performing it by the other party or those acting for him. Tussey v. Owen, 139 N. C. 460, 52 S. E. 128. And as to the damages, profits which would certainly have been realized but for the defendant's fault are recoverable. Hardware Co. v. Buggy Co., 167 N. C. 423, 83 S. E. 557. The principal rule in such cases is that the party injured is entitled to recover all the damages, including gains prevented as well as losses sustained, as were fairly within the contemplation of the parties and capable of being ascertained with a reasonable degree of certainty. Gardner v. Telegraph Co., 171 N. C. 405, 407, 88 S. E. 630, L. R. A. 1916E, 481.

The doctrine is thus well stated in Griffin v. Culver, 16 N. Y. 489, 69 Am. Dec. 718:

"The broad, general rule in such cases is that the party injured is entitled to recover all his damages, including gains prevented as well as losses sustained; and this rule is subject to but two conditions: The damages must be such as may fairly be supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties when they made the contract, that is, must be such as might naturally be expected to follow its violation; and they must be certain, both in their nature and in respect to the cause from which they proceed."

This court, when discussing this rule, said in Hardware Co. v. Buggy Co., supra:

"As shown by further reference to the authorities, this certainty referred to by the learned judge does not mean 'mathematical accuracy,' but a reasonable certainty"—citing Sutherland on Damages and Hale on Damages, pp. 70, 71.

The subject is fully considered as to broken contracts in Machine Co. v. Tobacco Co., 141 N. C. 284, 53 S. E. 885, where we held:

"(1) Where one violates his contract, he is liable for such damages, including gains prevented as well as losses sustained, which may fairly be supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties when they made the contract, that is, such as might naturally be expected to follow its violation, and they must be certain, both in their nature and in respect to the cause from which they proceed." Griffin v. Culver, supra.

"(2) The law seeks to give full compensation in damages for breach of contract, and in pursuit of this end, it allows profits to be considered when the contract itself, or any rule of law, or any other element in the case furnishes a standard by which their amount may be determined with sufficient certainty.

"(3) In an action for damages for a breach of contract, in the absence of some standard fixed by the parties when they made their contract, the law will not permit mere profits, depending upon the chances of business and other contingent circumstances and which are perhaps merely fanciful, to be considered by the jury as part of the compensation."

A text-writer thus refers to the rule:

"In an action for damages, the plaintiff must prove, as part of his case, both the amount and the cause of his loss. Absolute certainty, however, is not required, but both the cause and the amount of the loss must be shown with reasonable certainty. Substantial damages may be recovered though plaintiff can only give his loss approximately." Hale on Damages, p. 70, quoted with approval by this court in Bowen v. Harris, 146 N. C. 385, 50 S. E. 1044.

And further, on page 71:

"A difficulty arises, however, where compensation is claimed for prospective losses in the nature of gains prevented, but absolute certainty is not required, compensation for prospective losses may be recovered when they are such, as in the ordinary course of things, are reasonably certain to ensue. Reasonable means reasonable probability. Where the losses claimed are contingent, speculative, or merely possible, they cannot be allowed."

And as to torts the rule applicable to them is stated in Johnson v. Railroad Co., 140 N. C. 574, 53 S. E. 362.

Some of these questions are not presented by the assignments of error, but they are discussed to some extent in the briefs, and we have deemed it proper that we should refer to them.

[10] We will not close without adverting to the form of the issue, which we do not approve. There should have been an issue as to whether there had been a breach of the contract; the defendant having denied that there had been one. The second issue then, should have been in the form of the one submitted, or substantially so. But there was no objection to the form of the issue, and we merely refer to it, because such an issue has been condemned by this court. Denmark v. Railroad Co., 107 N. C. 188, 12 S. E. 54; Hatcher v. Dabbs, 133 N. C. 239, 45 S. E. 562; Shoe Co. v. Hughes, 122 N. C. 298, 29 S. E. 339. If the breach had been admitted, then, of course, the issue submitted would be the proper one.

There was no error in the trial of the case, and we find none in the record.

No error.

(112 S. C. 183)

ELLISON et al. v. MATTISON et al.
(No. 10132.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 25, 1919.)

1. JUDGMENT \S 565 — CONCLUSIVENESS — NONSUIT WITHOUT PREJUDICE.

A judgment of nonsuit entered without prejudice against remaindermen under their grandfather's will, in a suit for partition prematurely brought because their mother, the life tenant, was yet alive, does not bar a subsequent suit brought after termination of the life estate to recover their remainder interest.

2. JUDGMENT \S 576(1)—CONCLUSIVENESS — ERRONEOUS JUDGMENT.

A judgment against remaindermen rendered in a suit for partition does not bar a subsequent suit to recover their remainder interest, where the former judgment was erroneous on its face, in that the court, as a court of equity, failed to grant relief to which the parties were entitled on the case stated by them.

3. WILLS \S 614(8)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATE CREATED—ABSOLUTE ESTATE IN PERSONALTY.

Where testator devised land to his wife for life, at her death the land to be sold and equally divided among his five children, the portion falling to two daughters to be theirs for life, and then to their children forever, the daughters did not take an absolute estate, so as to bar their children from any rights under the will, though the proceeds became personalty.

4. WILLS \S 467—CONSTRUCTION—RECITALS AS TO WISHES OF TESTATOR.

Where a testator devised land to his wife for life, directing that at her death the land be sold, and the proceeds be divided equally among his five children, and expressing his "desire" that the portion falling to two daughters should be theirs during lifetime, then to their children forever, the children of the daughters took in remainder; the disposition, as to the daughters, not being precatory merely.

5. WILLS \S 740(4)—CONVEYANCE BY DEVISEE—EFFECT.

Under a will directing that at the death of the wife, the life tenant, the land be sold, and the proceeds equally divided among five children, two of whom, daughters of testator, were to hold for life with remainder to their children, where the wife, with four of the children, conveyed the land in fee simple to the other child, the deed could not be construed as a family settlement barring the children of the daughters of their interest in remainder.

6. REMAINDERS \S 17(3)—ACTION BY REMAINDERMEN—ACCRUAL OF ACTION.

Action by remaindermen to subject land to payment of their legacy is not barred by limitations, where brought within the statutory period after their cause of action accrued by death of the life tenant.

7. REMAINDERS \S 17(3)—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

Where under a will the grandchildren of testator were entitled to share in the proceeds of the sale of certain land upon the death of their mother, who had a life estate in the land, there could be no adverse holding against the grandchildren until after the death of their mother.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Anderson County; James E. Pearlfloy, Judge.

Action by Jane E. Ellison and others, against W. E. Mattison, individually and as administrator c. t. a. of Peter Johnson, deceased, and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant J. D. Stone appeals. Judgment modified and affirmed in other respects.

J. M. Paget, of Anderson, Carey & Carey, of Pickens, and L. L. Rice and Bonham, Watkins & Allen, all of Anderson, for appellant.

A. H. Dagnall and Sullivan & Cooley, all of Anderson, for respondents.

GAGE, J. The history of this litigation is set out in 90 S. C. 146, 72 S. E. 991, and 99 S. C. 151, 82 S. E. 1046. The action there reported was for partition, and it failed. This action, arising out of the same transaction, is by the children of Mrs. Mary Ellison and Mrs. Carolina Mattison, daughters of Peter Johnson, to subject two-fifths of a title in certain real estate now held by one Stone to the payment of a legacy created by the will of Peter Johnson, who was the source of title common to all the parties.

The circuit court concluded that the land was liable to pay the legacy due to Ellison, but that Mattison was barred by the statute of limitations to claim the payment of his legacy.

The defendant Stone has made fifteen exceptions; but they have been wisely reduced by the argument to five questions. They are these: (1) Res adjudicata; (2) the parties Ellison and Mattison have no right under Peter's will, (a) because their mothers took an absolute estate, and (b) because the words used in the will were not words of command, but merely words of desire; (3) failing in these postulates, Peter's will had been carried out; (4) statute of limitation; and (5) adverse possession.

These in their order.

[1, 2] The plea of res adjudicata is not sound.

When the Ellison children and the Mattison children sued in the action before referred to, the Ellisons were nonsuited because their mother, who was life tenant, was yet alive, and her children therefore had no present right. The order of nonsuit declared that it was "granted without prejudice to their rights to maintain such [action] as and when their rights if any may accrue." By the express words of the order the accruing right of the Ellisons was left intact. Nothing was adjudged as to them save at the time they sued they had no present right. It is true that, so far as the Mattisons are concerned, the cause was not thus arrested, but went on to a final judgment against them.

But in the instant action the Mattisons have set up in their answer and relied upon in the trial no statement of facts that were not stated in the complaint in the first action. The only difference betwixt the two actions lies in the circumstance that in the first action the Mattisons esteemed themselves on the facts alleged to be entitled to partition, and in the instant action, on the same facts alleged, the Mattisons esteem themselves entitled to be paid a legacy out of the proceeds of the sale of land. The whole right was stated in the first action.

It was no fault of Mattisons that they did not get in the first action a remedy; their statement of the facts entitled them to a remedy, as we shall presently show in the instant case. It was no legal fault of theirs that they did not ask the appropriate remedy. Indeed, that cause might have been retained that they might have prosecuted in it the appropriate remedy. That it was not so retained is not now altogether chargeable to the Mattisons.

[3] The appellant's second postulate rests on two assumptions; and they both spring out of this and the relevant section of the will:

"The residue of my estate real and personal I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Nancy A. Johnson, to be hers during her natural life or widowhood, and at her death or marriage then the said realty and personalty to be sold and equally divided among my children, and having an eye in such division and settlement to the advances I have already made to them, which advances are hereinafter stated to date. As well shall an eye be had to advances after the date hereof in said division and settlement. Furthermore I desire that the portion of my estate that may fall to my daughters N. Caroline Mattison and Mary A. E. Ellison to be theirs during their lifetime and then to their children respectively forever."

The appellant contends "that, the bequest to Caroline and Mary being personal property, they take absolute estates," and he cites for authority the words of Judge Nott in Carr v. Porter, 1 McCord, Eq. at page 90. The court there only meant to say that, if a testator should expressly devise a life estate in land, the same words would create an absolute estate in personalty. The court did not intend, of course, to imply that a limited estate in personalty might not be created by express words.

It was suggested in 90 S. C. 146, 72 S. E. 991, that the will of Peter was "a gift of personal property, money, a legacy, to Mrs. Mattison for life with remainder over to her children."

[4] The other assumption of the appellant is also untenable, to wit: That the words of the will under which the plaintiff claims are merely precatory, and confers on him no right of property.

It is true that the expressed "desire" of the testator does not always of itself amount to a direction; it may or it may not amount to a direction according as the intention of the testator may be gathered from the whole instrument. A testator's expressed and lawful desire ought, of course, to be carried out, unless it be inconsistent with other and stronger words contained in the instrument.

In the instant case the will contains no words which are inconsistent with that construction which gives imperative operation to the expressed "desire." The object of the testator's bounty were a wife and five children. He devised land (1) to his wife for her life. He then directed (2) that the land should be sold and the proceeds divided equally between the five children. He went further and expressed (3) the "desire" that the portion which might fall to Caroline and Mary should be "theirs during their lifetime and then to their children respectively forever." The italics are supplied.

The testator made a difference betwixt the children. To three he gave absolutely. To two he gave a right for their life; and he plainly expressed the desire that the children of these two should have the absolute right.

There is nothing in Arnold v. Arnold, 41 S.

C. 298, 19 S. E. 670, relied upon by the appellant, inconsistent with this view, nor in Brunson v. King, 2 Hill, Eq. 490.

[6] The third postulate of the appellant is that the expressed desire of Peter has been carried out; that is to say that the land has been sold and the proceeds paid to the five children, that two of the children received absolutely two-fifths of the proceeds, and that Caroline and Mary received, with limitations, two-fifths, to be enjoyed by them during their lives and forever as trustees for their children, and that the transaction amounts to a family settlement. But the only testimony in the case to prove that is a simple deed of conveyance by the wife, Nancy, and four of the children to the other child, B. Lewis Johnson, who was also executor of the will. Nancy held a freehold title in the land for her life, and she had the right to convey that; and when she did so B. Lewis took from her a like title. Lewis died, and the land was sold for the settlement of his estate three years before the life estate fell in by Nancy's death in 1888. Mauldin bought B. Lewis' title at the estate sale in 1885, and Stone bought from him the same year. Plainly they took at least the freehold life estate which Nancy had conveyed to Lewis.

It is true the deed to Lewis was signed also by the four children other than himself, and that act would manifestly estop Willis and Lara (two of the other children) to make any further claim to land or money, and they have made none, and it would also estop Caroline and Mary to make any further claim for themselves. But there is no evidence that the transaction evidenced by the deed of the four children to Lewis was intended to be in performance of the will, other than the suggestion of counsel that it might have been and probably was of that character. The transaction was had seven years after the executor qualified and three years before the death of the life tenant. There is no proven record of the transaction in the probate court. The executor was never discharged from his trust. No witness testified that the conveyance referred to was done to carry out the provisions of the will.

This case is the same, so far as the proof goes, as if the five children had conveyed the land to a stranger. In such a case it will not be denied, we think, that the stranger would hold the land subject to its sale under the direction of the will. There is no evidence which tends to show that the transaction was intended as a family settlement. Such a settlement rests on contract, express or implied, and there is no testimony that the family intended the transaction to be a contract to settle their interests under the will of Peter. The probability is that it was what the deed suggests it to have been, a sale by the widow and four children of their supposed fee-simple title to B. Lewis Johnson.

[8, 7] The fourth issue is the bar of the statute of limitations. To the Ellisons it is plainly not fit. The Ellison children had no right until the death of their mother in 1916. And for the same reason there was no adverse holding by Stone against the Ellisons.

The circuit court concluded that Mattison's right was barred by the statute, and that judgment was based on the conclusion of fact that Caroline died in 1898; but the testimony of Ambrose Williams and Hewlett Sullivan fixes definitely the death of Caroline on April 29, 1901. The Mattisons are therefore not barred.

In that respect the judgment of the circuit court is modified. In other respects it is affirmed.

KIRKLAND DISTRIBUTING CO. v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. et al.
(No. 10188.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 8, 1919.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES \Leftrightarrow 119(4)—
SURFACE WATERS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where the owner of a warehouse consented to the construction of a certain grade by railroad across a street, and undertook to build its warehouse in accordance with it, it cannot recover damages from the railroad by reason of flooding of basement of warehouse by surface waters due to grade, even though grade was not in accordance with a city ordinance.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \Leftrightarrow 842—TORTS
—SURFACE WATERS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

A city is not liable for the flooding of a basement by reason of defects in the grade of a street, unless the injured party proves that he was not guilty of contributory negligence.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS \Leftrightarrow 842—TORTS
—SURFACE WATERS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where owner of a warehouse consented to construction of a grade across street by a railroad, and undertook to construct its warehouse accordingly, knowing that surface waters would collect by reason of the grade, a city, although negligent in depositing trash in street, which was banked at the defective railroad grade, was not liable by reason of the flooding of the basement of the warehouse, because the negligence of the city and contributory negligence of the owner of the warehouse were inseparable.

Appeal from Richland County Court; M. S. Whaley, Judge.

Action by Kirkland Distributing Company against the Seaboard Air Line Railway and the City of Columbia. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. M. Lumpkin, of Columbia, for appellant.
Lyles & Lyles and C. S. Monteith, of Columbia, for respondents.

FRASER, J. The appellant thus states its case:

"This court will recall that a short time ago an action by this same plaintiff against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company was heard on appeal and decided by this court adversely to the plaintiff. 96 S. E. 122. The city of Columbia was not a party to that action.

"The plaintiff began this action in 1917, and the cause of action alleged in the complaint is based on damage done to the plaintiff's warehouse and property in its basement, as having occurred on account of a rainstorm which fell on the night of June 9, 1917.

"The two actions are entirely different. A nonsuit was granted in favor of both defendants, on the theory that the decision of this court in the former case settled all questions which arose in the case now before the court. The wide difference in the two cases is clearly shown by the exceptions of the appellant in the present case.

"The two defendants herein are charged with joint and concurrent negligence in causing the injury complained of; the Seaboard Air Line Railway, defendant, with failing to comply with the ordinance of the city of Columbia, by the terms of which ordinance they were required to grade all streets across which they laid their tracks in conformity with the grade existing prior to the laying of such track, and the testimony in this case shows that they utterly failed to comply with the requirement, and on that account a ditch was formed across Lady street, which was the direct cause of the damage in question taken in connection with that of the defendant, the city of Columbia, which is charged with unloading a large amount of brickbats and hard lime mortar in Lady street on the northern side thereof, and on the grade above the side track in question, which crosses Lady street; that during the rain in question these brickbats and lime mortar were washed down to the side track, forming a further and higher barrier to the flow of water in the street and turned it with more force and violence out of the street drainage and into this plaintiff's property, and caused the damage.

"The prior case, which was in the Supreme Court and is reported in the advance sheets at this time, did not involve any of these questions, either the violation of the ordinance or the negligence and mismanagement of the city of Columbia in filling up a natural drainage way in the street with brick and other debris, to the damage of plaintiff.

"The testimony in this case certainly clearly shows that the side track in question was laid a considerable distance below the level of Lady street. The testimony further shows that this condition has existed for several years, in violation of the terms of the ordinance. The level of the street has never been readjusted in accordance with the level of the track as laid.

This formed the ditch or sluice which the witnesses say caused the damage. We call the court's special attention to the fact that the spur track is entirely different from the side track which is in question in this case. The side track crosses Lady street toward the north.

"We take it that the city of Columbia is responsible for defects and mismanagement in their streets and the filling up of them with material that would clog drains and cause damage; would such an act on its part make it liable under the Statute? We think the court should have submitted the two cases to the jury for their determination, and its failure to do so is the ground for the exceptions herein."

[1] I. Exception 1:

"In that his honor was in error in granting a nonsuit on behalf of the Seaboard Air Line Railway, defendant, because the evidence showed that under section 536, Revised Ordinance of the City of Columbia, and the ordinances dated March 11, 1913, under which ordinances the side track in question across Lady street was constructed, the railway company did not construct said track in accordance with the city ordinances above mentioned, and negligently left said street in an improper condition and not properly graded for drainage or for travel, and caused the entire flow of water down Lady street to be turned out of its course and thrown in the plaintiff's warehouse, causing the damage alleged."

The appellant employed an architect to make plans for the construction of its warehouse, who said:

"As reported to him when he first took the matter under consideration, the grade of the side track across Lady street had been fixed by the city engineer, but that subsequently the engineers of the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company reported to him that the city engineer had consented to the lowering of the grade across Lady street by one foot, and that subsequently they could give Mr. Kirkland the benefit of that lowering, and a little better; they could lower the spur track to 18 feet at its northern end immediately adjoining Lady street, instead of the 14⁶/₁₀ which they had been standing for. This was done at Mr. Kirkland's request, and he got the benefit of the lower grade. At the time of preparing the plans for the Kirkland building, witness had before him a blueprint of the elevation of the side track across Lady street, and also of the grade of the spur track for the Kirkland building, and knew that it was a continuous descending grade from Lady street to the spur track in question and then from the spur track in question back to the northern edge of the Kirkland building, and that water would run downgrade."

The water entered the warehouse through windows in the basement. During the progress of construction of the warehouse, the plaintiff, at the suggestion of the railroad people, raised the base of these windows about 6 inches. The plaintiff and the defendant railroad knew that surface water was likely to rise along the warehouse and might enter the windows and flood the basement. They knew there was damage and agreed on the means to be used to prevent the consequent damages. As the plaintiff made its case, its damages resulted, not from the presence of the water, but from the volume of water. The plaintiff undertook to fix responsibility on the railroad company by showing that the excess volume of water was caused by the grade of the railroad at Lady street. The plaintiff not only knew what the grade was, but agreed to it and undertook to build its warehouse in accordance with it. The appellant then says the grade was not in accordance with the city ordinance, and therefore it was negligence. As it affects this case, it is wholly immaterial whether the grade was a lawful or an unlawful grade. It is manifest that the plaintiff cannot dig a pit, and recover damages from another because he has fallen into it. It is equally manifest that the plaintiff cannot agree that another shall dig a pit, and then recover damages because he has fallen into it. The grade at Lady street was made, in part, at least, for plaintiff's convenience, with its full knowledge and consent, and the plaintiff cannot recover against a railroad. The nonsuit was properly directed in favor of the defendant railroad. This exception is overruled.

[2] II. The nonsuit in favor of the city must also be sustained. If the flooding of the plaintiff's warehouse was caused by the concurrent negligence of the city of Columbia, in depositing trash in the street which was banked at and caused by the defective grade at the crossing, then the city is not liable, because the statute requires the plaintiff to prove the absence of contributory negligence.

[3] We have seen that the plaintiff and the defendant railroad were jointly responsible for the defective grade, if it was defective, and the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in fixing the grade at the crossing. Here negligence and contributory negligence go hand in hand and are inseparable. Where negligence and contributory negligence are inseparable, a nonsuit must be ordered.

The judgment is affirmed.

(112 S. C. 95)

STATE v. COOLER et al. (No. 10186.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 8, 1919.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW \S 1166½(6) — HARMLESS ERROR—EXAMINATION OF JURORS — STENOGRAPHIC NOTES.

Failure of the stenographer to take notes of the examination of jurors in a prosecution for homicide is not reversible error, where all the essential facts are before the court.

2. CRIMINAL LAW \S 751—WITHDRAWAL OF JUROR SHOWING BIAS.

In a prosecution for homicide, where the jury was completed in the afternoon, the court can, on the next morning before testimony is introduced, withdraw a juror, shown to have expressed an opinion that the defendant was guilty.

3. COURTS \S 45 — ERECTION — "CIRCUIT" COURTS—CONSTITUTIONALITY.

Under Const. art. 5, § 13, providing that the state shall be divided into judicial circuits, Act Feb. 14, 1916 (29 St. at Large, p. 688), creating 14 judicial circuits and leaving Charleston county alone in the Ninth circuit, is valid, since the word "circuit" means a division of the country for judicial business.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Circuit.]

4. CRIMINAL LAW \S 798(½)—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for homicide, it was error for the court to refuse to charge that the jury must base its finding exclusively on the evidence taken in open court, where the bias of one of the jurors had been brought in question.

5. CRIMINAL LAW \S 873(4) — EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF CODEFENDANTS.

Admission in evidence of declarations by a codefendant was not error, in a prosecution for homicide; the judge having properly cautioned the jury that the statements were evidence only against the codefendant.

6. CRIMINAL LAW \S 428—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF CODEFENDANTS — NECESSITY AS TO ENTIRE STATEMENT.

Declarations by a codefendant as to the particulars of the crime must come out in their entirety, if any part is given.

7. CRIMINAL LAW \S 508(1)—TESTIMONY OF CODEFENDANT—ADMISSIBILITY.

A codefendant as a witness in a prosecution for homicide can testify though his testimony includes a statement that his codefendant did the killing.

8. ASSAULT AND BATTERY \S 66—JUSTIFICATION—OPPROBRIOUS LANGUAGE.

Opprobrious language does not justify an assault or furnish legal provocation.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Jasper County; Ernest Moore, Judge.

Aleas Cooler and another were convicted of murder, and they appeal. Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.

Cole L. Blense, of Columbia, W. N. Heyward, J. P. Wise, and H. Klugh Purdy, all of Ridgeland, and J. Fraser Lyon, of Columbia; for appellants.

Geo. Warren, of Hampton, and S. G. Mayfield, of Holbrook, Ariz., for the State.

FRASER, J. The appellants were convicted of murder and sentenced to electrocution. There are 21 exceptions. Several of the exceptions raise the same questions, and, as they have not been separately stated, they need not be separately considered.

[1] I. The first question in logical order refers to the stenographic report in the case. The stenographer did not take notes of the examination of jurors upon their voir dire, and this failure is a subject of appeal. The selection of the jury is a very important part of the trial. They are required to take full stenographic notes of all proceedings. The examination of jurors is an important part of the proceedings. The essential facts, however, are before the court, and this is not reversible error. The exception that raises this question cannot be sustained.

[2] II. One of the jurors, named Papham, was sworn on his voir dire and accepted as a juror. It seems that the jury was completed at the afternoon session, but no evidence was offered until the next morning. When the court was opened, the next morning, counsel for the appellant Cooler called attention of the court to the fact that this juror had expressed an opinion and examined a witness who testified that this juror had expressed the opinion that this appellant was guilty. His honor held that the juror was already accepted and it was too late to withdraw him from the jury and substitute another. At this stage of the case, the presiding judge certainly had the power to withdraw the juror, at the request of the defendant, and substitute another, and it was error not to do so.

[3] III. The appellant raises the question of the constitutionality of the act creating the Fourteenth circuit (Act Feb. 14, 1916 [29 St. at Large, p. 688]). In so far as this case is concerned, the case of State v. McAppus, 107 S. C. 345, 92 S. B. 1053, is conclusive, and this exception is overruled.

[4] IV. The defendant Cooler asked the presiding judge to charge the jury that it must base its findings exclusively on the evidence taken in open court. The presiding judge thought doubtless, that he had included that request in his general charge. Inasmuch as the bias of one of the jurors had been brought in question, this request should have been charged as requested by the defendant.

[5.] V. The appellant Cooler complains of the admission of statements made by his codefendant, Davis, in court and out of court. In both cases his Honor was correct. Davis was a defendant, and the state could prove what Davis said about the case. His honor properly cautioned the jury that the statements were evidence only against Davis. The whole statement must come out if any part is given. The statement must be received, as it was received, in this case, with the caution that it only affected Davis.

[7] As to the statement in court: We say Davis was a witness, and had the right to make his statement, even if it included a statement that his codefendant had done the killing. We have been cited to no authority, and we know of none, that holds to the contrary.

[8] VI. The only other point that need be considered in this case is the effect of opprobrious language. It is too well settled in this state to require the citation of authority that language, no matter how opprobrious, does not justify an assault or furnish legal provocation. To discuss this further would involve the facts, and, as this case must go back for a new trial, the impropriety is manifest.

The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

RICHARDSON v. ELLIS. (No. 10116.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 17, 1919.)

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by James M. Richardson against R. W. Ellis. From an order confirming findings of master, to whom case was referred, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Martin & Henry, of Greenville, for appellant. Lanford & Richardson, of Greenville, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This action arose under section 3543 of the Code of Laws of 1912, which is as follows: "No possession of real property described in any instrument of writing required by law to be recorded shall operate as notice of such instrument; and actual notice shall be deemed and held sufficient to supply the place of registration only when such notice is of the instrument itself or of its nature and purport."

The defendant entered into possession of the land in question, under such an instrument of writing as is required by law to be recorded.

The master, to whom the case was referred, found as matter of fact that the plaintiff, who subsequently purchased the land from the defendant's grantor, neither had notice of the instrument itself, nor of its nature and purport. On appeal these findings of fact were confirmed by his honor the circuit judge, and this appeal is from his order of confirmation.

The appellant has failed to satisfy this court that there was error in said findings.

Affirmed.

COULTER v. HERMITAGE COTTON MILLS. (No. 10177.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 29, 1919.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE \S 209(5)—RIGHTS OF WIFE—SEPARATE ACTION IN TORT.

A married woman may maintain an action for damages for assault and battery committed upon her by her employer's representative without joining her husband as a party plaintiff.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Kershaw County; W. H. Townsend, Judge.

Action by Callie Coulter against the Hermitage Cotton Mills. A nonsuit was allowed, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

M. M. Johnson and B. B. Clarke, both of Camden, for appellant.

W. B. De Loach, of Camden, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. Plaintiff, a married woman, brought this action against defendant for damages for an assault and battery, alleged to have been committed upon her by a representative of defendant in the course of his employment. She did not join her husband as a party plaintiff, nor did she allege that she was a married woman. The answer was a general denial.

At the trial, plaintiff introduced testimony tending to prove the assault and battery alleged, and incidentally it was brought out that she was a married woman. At the conclusion of the testimony, defendant moved for a nonsuit, on the ground that she could not maintain the action without joining her husband. The court granted the motion, and plaintiff appealed.

We think the court was in error. In the case of Messervy v. Messervy, 82 S. C. 559, 64 S. E. 753, it was decided that a married woman could maintain an action for damages for maliciously enticing her husband away from her, without joining the husband as a party. While the circumstances of the two cases are not precisely alike, the right of the wife to maintain an action in tort for injury to her person without joining her husband was affirmed in that case, on the ground that it was "a chose in action," in the broadest sense of those words, which belongs exclusively to her, and therefore she has the right to sue for such injury without joining her husband. Her right of action is separate and distinct from that which her husband may maintain, in such a case, for the loss of her services and other damages resulting to him by reason of her injury—just as a parent and minor child may maintain separate actions for an injury to the child. Judgment reversed.

SALLEY v. PARKER et al. (No. 10180.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 7, 1919.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇨274(3)—WRONGFUL DISTRESS.

A landlord, who took a stove of a tenant for rent, when the tenant in fact owed no rent, was guilty of conversion.

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT ⇨23(2)—RELATION—PROOF.

Agency may be proven by circumstances.

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT ⇨23(5)—CONVERSION—AGENCY—PROOF.

In action against two persons for conversion, evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that one of defendants who took the property was the agent of the other defendant.

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇨274(7)—WRONGFUL DISTRESS—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

In an action against a landlord for conversion of a stove which a tenant had left on the premises, where landlord did nothing beyond asserting his right to hold the stove, punitive damages were improperly allowed.

5. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⇨270(7) — DISTRESS—NECESSITY FOR WARRANT.

One acting for landlord in taking property of a tenant for rent must have a distress warrant to evidence his authority when he takes the property.

Appeal from Richland County Court; M. S. Whaley, Judge.

Action by Mrs. M. S. Salley against E. W. Parker and J. A. H. Geiger. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Halcott P. Green, of Columbia, for appellants.

Cooper & Alderman, of Columbia, for respondent.

GAGE, J. This is a lawsuit about a cooking stove. It arose out of these circumstances:

The plaintiff became a tenant of a dwelling house which was owned by Dent. She had vacated the house, but left behind her the stove. She returned to get the stove and was forbidden to do so by Geiger, who seized it for an alleged balance of rent due by the plaintiff. For this act of alleged conversion the former tenant sued both Parker and Geiger, and had a verdict for both actual and punitive damages.

The exceptions made four questions: (1) There was no proof of conversion, (2) wrong instructions about how agency may be proved, (3) there was no proof of willfulness, and therefore no basis for punitive damages, (4) wrong instructions about the service of a distress warrant.

[1] 1. If Mrs. Salley had paid all the rent she owed, and she testified she had, then the taking of the stove for her alleged debt was a conversion. The jury found there was a conversion.

[2] 2. The court made a correct and admirable statement of the law to guide the jury in finding if Geiger when he seized the stove was agent of Parker. There was no assumption by the court that Geiger was agent. The instruction was: (1) That agency may be proven by all the circumstances of the case; (2) that, if the circumstances do fix agency, then the acts of the agent bind the principal if done within the scope of the employment.

The circumstances suggest that Geiger was agent of Parker. The testimony tends to prove that Parker let the house to Mrs. Salley and collected the rents; that Parker filled out the distress warrant and sent it to Dent to sign; that the signed warrant was returned to Parker to be put into Geiger's hands, and was left at Coker's place for Geiger; that Parker talked to Geiger about the stove; that Parker told Colcock he was holding the stove for rent due, and declined to give it up until payment was made.

[3] This was ample testimony for the jury to have concluded that Parker was principal to collect and Geiger was his agent for that.

[4] 3. The counsel for respondent admitted at the hearing before us that the defendants did nothing beyond the assertion of their right to hold the stove. There was therefore no warrant to assess punitive damages, and so much of the judgment as represents punitive damages is reversed.

[5] 4. The appellant has cited no authority to sustain the contention that Geiger did not need to have a distress warrant to evidence his authority when he seized the stove, and we think there was none.

The remedy by distress was provided by the common law. The statutes have only modified the remedy. 3 Kent, p. 472 et seq.

"A warrant of distress is nothing but a power of attorney. The bailiff, or other person executing the warrant, is only the agent of the landlord." Bagwell v. Jamison, Cheves, 252.

It was the duty of Geiger to have made proof of his agency when he went to act. He knew that, for he swore he had and presented the warrant; but Mrs. Salley denied so much.

By the defendant's testimony the warrant was made out by Parker, signed by the landlord, Dent, and put into Geiger's hand to execute.

The statute law does not declare that the warrant shall be presented to the tenant (the same thing as service); but the warrant is the only evidence of the agent's right, and the agent is bound to show his right to justify his act.

PETERSON v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. (No. 10182.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 7, 1919.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR §1003 — REVIEW — VERDICT.

In law case verdict will not be disturbed upon the ground that it is against the overwhelming weight of the testimony, except where it is wholly unsupported by evidence.

2. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT §92 — AUTHORITY OF ATTORNEY—WAIVER OF ISSUE.

Attorney employed to prosecute or defend an action has authority to waive the submission of an issue to the jury, where he does so in good faith believing that it is for the best interests of his client.

Appeal from Richland County Court; M. S. Whaley, Judge.

Action by I. C. Peterson against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Cobb and Cooper & Alderman, all of Columbia, for appellant.

Barron, McKay, Frierson & Moffatt, of Columbia, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for injuries sustained by him as the result of defendant's alleged negligence in transporting him as a passenger from Columbia to Camp Jackson.

The evidence disclosed the following circumstances: In the summer of 1917 the construction of Camp Jackson, which is about six or seven miles from Columbia, was in progress. Defendant ran a train, composed of an engine and 15 or 20 cattle cars, between the city and the camp for the purpose of conveying workmen to and fro. The train would leave the city early in the morning, signaling its departure by blowing the whistle some minutes before leaving, and would stop at street crossings and other places en route to take up workmen going to the camp, and after work hours in the afternoon it would take up the workmen at the camp and bring them back to the city. It did not appear by what arrangement this train was run, at whose instance or expense. But transportation on it was free to workmen at the camp, and none of them were required to pay fares. The foreman at the camp who employed plaintiff told him to come out on this train, and plaintiff was carried to and from the camp on it for a month or more before he was injured. On September 26, 1917, the car in which plaintiff was riding jumped the track, while running on a high embankment and approaching a trestle. Fearing that it would run off into the deep ravine, plaintiff jumped off, and broke his left leg. There was testimony tending to prove that plaintiff's injury was caused by negligence attributable to defendant. On the other hand, the testimony was susceptible of the inference that defendant was not guilty of actionable negligence.

At the close of all the testimony, defendant moved for a directed verdict on the ground, among others, that there was no evidence of actionable negligence. The motion was refused. The court then asked plaintiff's attorneys if they had any authorities bearing upon the relation between plaintiff and defendant at the time of the injury; that is, as to whether plaintiff was a passenger, and entitled to that degree of care which a carrier owes a passenger. They replied that they had none, and that, as they were uncertain as to whether the evidence was sufficient to establish that relation, they would be satisfied with a charge as to ordinary care, as between a carrier and licensee.

Under instructions to which no exception has been taken, except as hereinafter mentioned, the jury returned a verdict for defendant. Whereupon plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was refused; and from judgment on the verdict he appealed to this court, assigning error in the refusal of a new trial on two grounds.

[1] The first is that the verdict is against the overwhelming weight of the testimony. This ground was not much stressed in argument, and properly so, since it has been decided in so many cases that such a ground cannot be entertained by this court in a law case except where the verdict is wholly unsupported by evidence; and, as has already been said, there was evidence upon which the verdict can be sustained.

The next ground is that, notwithstanding the request of plaintiff's attorneys, the court erred in not submitting to the jury, under proper instructions, the issue as to whether or not plaintiff was a passenger and entitled to the degree of care required by that relation. Plaintiff's attorneys admit that it was at their suggestion that the court withdrew that issue from the jury, and that they asked the court to do so, because they were very confident that the jury would find a verdict for plaintiff, and they did not want to endanger the verdict which they so confidently expected to win by insisting upon the submission to the jury of an issue about which they were in doubt as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a verdict.

[2] They now contend, however, that they had no authority to bind their client by consenting to the withdrawal of that issue from the jury, and that the court was in error, notwithstanding their request, in failing to submit it, under proper instructions. This contention is unsound. It is certainly within the authority of an attorney employed to prosecute or defend an action to waive the submission of an issue to the jury, where he does so in good faith, believing that it is for the best interest of his client. Not only so, but in some circumstances it would be his duty to do so for the protection of the interests of his client; and where he does so in good faith his client is bound. Ex parte Jones, 47 S. C. 393, 25 S. E. 285; Dixon v. Floyd, 73 S. C. 202, 53 S. E. 167; Poore v. Poore, 105 S. C. 206, 89 S. E. 569. Indeed, it is matter of everyday practice; and in numerous cases we have held that a client may be bound even by the implied consent of his attorney, or by his silence, when it was his duty to speak; for instance, when he fails to prefer a request to charge on an important issue, or fails to call the court's attention to an omission in the charge upon such an issue, his client is bound.

BEAM v. CONTINENTAL CASUALTY CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1919.)

INSURANCE — 452 — ACCIDENT INSURANCE — INJURY NOT INCIDENTAL TO OCCUPATION — RECOVERY.

Under accident policy providing that it does not, except as incident to the occupation of railway employes, cover entering or trying to enter a moving conveyance using mechanical power, there could be no recovery for injuries sustained by insured in attempting to board a moving train, not as incident to the occupation of freight conductor, but while he was traveling on a conductor's pass.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County: T. J. Mauldin, Judge.

Action by Samuel M. Beam against the Continental Casualty Company. From the judgment rendered, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Cothran, Dean & Cothran, of Greenville, for appellant.

Bonham & Price, of Greenville, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is an action to recover on an accident insurance policy. The plaintiff took out an accident insurance policy in the Aetna Life Insurance Company, and the policy was assumed by the defendant, Continental Casualty Company.

The risk was classed as hazardous. The occupation was stated as freight conductor and that his average weekly earnings were not less than $30. The application also stated, "I am not deformed, have no bodily infirmity, and have not sustained any severe bodily injury." The admitted facts are that the plaintiff was not at that time in the employ of the railroad as conductor; that he had received an injury about a year before, from which he had been incapacitated to perform the duties as conductor, and had not been restored to work, either at the date of the policy or at the time of the accident. The plaintiff expected to be reinstated, but had not been. He still retained certain privileges as an employe, but was not in service. At the time of the accident, the plaintiff was traveling on a freight train on a conductor's pass. While attempting to board a moving train, the plaintiff fell and was injured.

The pleadings are long. There are 22 exceptions, raising interesting questions, but, in the view this court takes of exception 8, the other questions become academic, and need not be discussed.

Exception 8 reads as follows:

"The presiding judge erred in overruling the defendant's eighth ground of motion for directed verdict, which was as follows: 'That the policy of insurance contains the following provisions: "This insurance does not cover (except as incident to the occupations of railway employes, railway express messengers, and railway mail clerks insured as such) entering or trying to enter or leave a moving conveyance using mechanical power." That at the time of his accident the plaintiff was not employed by and actually working for the Southern Railway Company, and was injured while trying to enter the caboose of a moving freight train for his own convenience, and while not engaged in work incident to the employment of a freight conductor.'"

The plaintiff was trying to enter a moving conveyance, to wit, the cab, using mechanical power, and not as incident to the occupation of freight conductor.

It is manifest that a declaration as to the law of waiver, fraud of the agent, etc., would be mere dicta. The policy did not purport to cover an accident that happened while the insured was trying to enter a moving conveyance, using mechanical power while traveling exclusively on his own business or pleasure.

A verdict should have been directed in favor of the defendant, and the judgment is reversed.

FLOYD et al. v. FLOYD et al. (No. 10184.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 8, 1919.)

1. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS ¶25—DEFENSE—NONPAYMENT OF CONSIDERATION.

Equity will not reform a deed, conveying only a life estate, so as to convey the fee, where the grantee had failed to pay the entire consideration.

2. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS ¶28—PERSONS ENTITLED TO REFORMATION—GRANTEE—NONPAYMENT OF CONSIDERATION.

A subsequent grantee seeking reformation of a deed to the original grantor, barred from relief in equity by his failure to pay the entire consideration, stands in the same shoes as such original grantor.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Horry County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by Samuel Q. Floyd and another against Matthew T. Floyd and others. From a judgment dismissing the complaint, complainants appeal. Affirmed.

H. H. Woodward and Norton & Baker, all of Conway, for appellants.

Hoyt McMillan, of Mullins, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. This is an action to reform a deed, which conveyed only a life estate to the grantee, when, it is alleged, the intention was to convey the fee; the necessary words of inheritance having been omitted by mistake or ignorance of the scrivener.

In 1877, Lewis H. Floyd executed and delivered to his son, Samuel Q. Floyd, the deed in question, which conveyed 427 acres for the consideration of $300. The deed was recorded in August, 1878.

In 1880, Samuel Q. Floyd conveyed 177 acres of the tract to Johnson, who conveyed the same to Burroughs & Collins Company.

Defendants are the heirs of Lewis H. Floyd, who died in 1835.

Defendants denied the allegations of intention to convey the fee, and resisted the prayer for relief on the further grounds that the consideration of the deed had never been paid, and of plaintiffs' laches.

According to the undisputed evidence, only about $100 of the consideration was ever paid. For the balance, Samuel Q. Floyd gave his father his note, which has never been paid. After the death of his father, the administrator of his estate sued him on the note, and he defeated a recovery thereon by pleading the statute of limitation.

[1, 2] It is not worth while to consider the sufficiency of the evidence to prove the alleged intention or mistake, or to sustain the defense of laches, since it is perfectly clear that, upon an ancient and time-honored principle of equity, Samuel Q. Floyd is not entitled to relief. He does not come with clean hands. Nor, even at this late day, does he offer to do equity, by offering to pay what he justly owes for the land. Therefore he is not entitled to ask for equity. His grantee stands in his shoes, and occupies no better position. The complaint was properly dismissed.

Judgment affirmed.

MUSE v. CLARK et al. (No. 10187.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 8, 1919.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES ¶256—DISCHARGE OF INDORSERS—ALTERATION.

Under Negotiable Instruments Act, §§ 124, 125, where note was originally made payable to "Bank of G. * * * at said bank," and indorsed by defendants, its alteration by the maker, after the bank had refused to discount it, by striking out the words "Bank of G." and substituting above it the name of plaintiff, was a material alteration discharging defendants as indorsers.

2. BILLS AND NOTES ¶378—ALTERATION—RECOVERY ACCORDING TO ORIGINAL TENOR.

Where note was originally made payable to "Bank of G. * * * at said bank," and indorsed by defendants, and after the bank had refused to discount it, altered by the maker by striking out the name of the bank as payee and substituting above it the name of plaintiff, plaintiff could not recover from defendant indorsers under the provision of section 124 of the Negotiable Instrument Law that a holder in due course may enforce payment of a materially altered note according to the original tenor.

3. BILLS AND NOTES §537(1)—INDORSERS— ALTERATION—CONSENT.

Whether indorsers consented to alteration of note by changing name of payee held for the jury.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenwood County; James E. Peurifoy and S. W. G. Shipp, Judges.

Action by J. P. Muse against W. B. Clark, George Bailey, Hugh E. Giles, and F. E. Donnalld. From judgment for plaintiff, the first three defendants appeal. Reversed.

Tillman & Mays, of Anderson, and Grier, Park & Nickolson, of Greenwood, for appellants.

Featherstone & McGhee, of Greenwood, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. This is an action on a promissory note. Plaintiff alleges that defendant Donnalld executed his note for $225, dated May 27, 1915, payable to the order of the Bank of Greenwood, on December, 1915, and defendants, Bailey, Clark, and Giles indorsed said note to enable Donnalld to raise said sum; that, thereafter and before maturity, the name of the payee, Bank of Greenwood, was stricken out, and plaintiff's name was inserted in place thereof, as payee, by Donnalld, after which plaintiff took the note, in due course, and advanced the money thereon; that same was due, unpaid, etc.

The indorsers demurred to the complaint for insufficiency, on the grounds that the proposed contract with the bank was not accepted, that the alteration alleged avoided the note as to them, and that no contract between them and plaintiff was alleged. Judge Peurifoy overruled the demurrer, and the case was tried before Judge Shipp and a jury.

The note was written on a blank form of the Bank of Greenwood, and, when indorsed by appellants, it was payable "to the order of Bank of Greenwood * * * at said bank." The words quoted were printed in the body of the note; but the bank refused to discount it, and thereafter it was altered, and accepted by plaintiff, who testified that, when it was presented to him the printed words "Bank of Greenwood" had been stricken out by running a line through them with a pen, and his name had been interlined above those words. He also testified that it appeared that the alteration had been made with different ink and possibly by a different hand from the other writing in the note. But plaintiff's witness Andrews testified that he filled in the blanks in the note for Donnalld, and, when it had been signed and indorsed by appellants, carried it to the bank to get the money for him; and, when the bank refused to accept it, he returned it to Donnalld; and, while he did not remember changing the name of the payee, he said the name "J. P. Muse" looked like his writing. And Donnalld testified that, when he brought the note back to him, Andrews suggested that he might get the money from plaintiff, and said, "Let me change it for you" (as he had filled in the other parts of the note), and that Andrews made the change in the presence of Bailey and Giles, two of the indorsers, both of whom knew of it, and handed the note to him, and he carried it to plaintiff and got the money. Each of the indorsers denied knowledge of the alteration. Bailey and Giles testified that Donnalld told them that he destroyed the note, when the bank refused to discount it, and Clark said that he supposed that it had been destroyed; and each of them said that he knew nothing to the contrary, until the spring of 1917, when demand for payment was made upon them.

After hearing the evidence, Judge Shipp directed a verdict for plaintiff, holding that he was bound by the order of Judge Peurifoy, overruling the demurrer of the indorsers, and that, as plaintiff had proved the allegations of his complaint, he was entitled to recover. From judgment on the verdict, the indorsers appealed.

[1] Respondent contends that the alteration was not material; that the purpose of the indorsers was to enable Donnalld to raise that sum of money, and it could make no difference to them whether he got it from the bank, or from plaintiff, or any one else; and that, in any event, plaintiff, being an innocent holder, in due course, is entitled to recover.

Sections 124 and 125 of the Negotiable Instrument Act (28 Stat. 663) read:

"124. Where a negotiable instrument is materially altered without the assent of all parties liable thereon, it is avoided, except as against a party who has himself made, authorized or assented to the alteration and subsequent indorsers.

"But when an instrument has been materially altered and is in the hands of a holder in due course, not a party to the alteration, he may enforce payment thereof according to its original tenor.

"125. Any alteration which changes:

"(1) The date;

"(2) The sum payable, either for principal or interest;

"(3) The time or place of payment;

"(4) The number or the relation of the parties;

"(5) The medium or currency in which payment is to be made;

"Or which adds a place of payment where no place of payment is specified, or any other change or addition which alters the effect of the instrument in any respect is a material alteration."

Tested by the terms of section 125, the alteration was material. By subdivision 3 of that section, an alteration which changes the place of payment is declared to be material. In its inception, the note was payable "to the order of Bank of Greenwood . . . at said bank." When the words "Bank of Greenwood" were stricken out, the words "at said bank" were left without meaning; so that the note was not then payable at that bank, or any other particular place. It follows that the place of payment was changed by the alteration.

Moreover, the last sentence of subdivision 5 of said section says:

"Any other change or addition which alters the effect of the instrument in any respect is a material alteration."

Prior to the statute, the decided weight of authority was that changing the name of the payee of a note, after its legal inception, without consent of the parties sought to be changed thereon, is a material alteration. 1 R. C. L. 967, § 4; Id. 973, § 7; Holbart v. Lauritson, 34 S. D. 267, 148 N. W. 19, L. R. A. 1915A, 166, and note in which the cases are reviewed. Clearly, changing the name of the payee alters the legal effect of the instrument.

The authorities cited by respondent are not to the contrary. In fact, they are not in point, because in none of them was there any alteration of the instrument sued on. If there had been no alteration of the note here sued on, and if plaintiff had taken it as issued, and afterwards had the bank indorse it, so as to transfer the legal title to him, a different state of facts calling for the application of a different principle would have been made, and to that state of facts the cases cited by respondent would have been pertinent.

[2] Respondent contends, however, that, even though the alteration is material, nevertheless he is entitled to recover under the following provision of section 124:

"But when an instrument has been materially altered and is in the hands of a holder in due course, not a party to the alteration, he may enforce payment thereof according to its original tenor."

According to the testimony, the note bore upon its face such evidence of alteration that the jury might have found that plaintiff was not a holder in due course; therefore, if that were a vital issue, it would be one of fact for the jury.

But, assuming for the purposes of this case that plaintiff was a holder in due course, we do not see how he can enforce payment of the note according to its original tenor, according to which it was payable to the order of the Bank of Greenwood. How would it be possible to enforce payment to the order of that bank, without making it a party to a contract which it expressly refused to enter into? We must conclude that the intention of the Legislature was that the provision above quoted should be applied only in those cases where the contract can be enforced according to its original tenor; and we can readily see how this can be done in a variety of cases, as for instance, where the alteration affects only the negotiability of the instrument, and the amount of principal or interest, and in other respects, which need not be mentioned, it may be enforced according to its original tenor. But where, as in this case, it is of such a nature that, if made without consent of the parties to be charged, it deprived the contract of all legal validity in its inception, it cannot be enforced according to its original tenor. First National Bank v. Gridley, 112 App. Div. 398, 98 N. Y. Supp. 445.

[3] Appellants question the ruling of Judge Peurifoy on their demurrer as well as that of Judge Shipp in directing a verdict against them. It is unnecessary to consider the ruling on demurrer, because without objection plaintiff introduced testimony tending to prove a fact of vital importance in the case which was not specifically alleged in his complaint, though the allegations taken altogether may have been deemed sufficient, by liberal construction and intentment, to have admitted the testimony, even if it had been objected to. The fact alluded to was that the alteration was made with the knowledge and consent of some, if not all, of the indorsers. Perhaps it would be more nearly correct to say that there was testimony tending to prove that the alteration was made under circumstances from which the jury might have drawn an inference of knowledge and consent on the part of some, if not all, of the indorsers. If that be true, that is, if they, or any of them, did know of and consent, expressly or impliedly, to the alteration, those so knowing and consenting are bound. As to them, the note as altered is an original and not an altered contract. Sanders v. Bagwell, 37 S. C. 145, 15 S. E. 714, 16 S. E. 770. If the evidence be sufficient to bring the case within the exception provided for by section 124, plaintiff may recover against the indorsers so consenting. But whether they knew of and consented to the alteration was an issue of fact arising out of the testimony, upon which they were entitled to have the verdict of the jury. It follows that the court erred in directing a verdict for plaintiff, and there must be a new trial.

STRICKLAND v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. CO. (No. 10179.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 7, 1919.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW §56—JURISDICTION—POWER OF LEGISLATURE.

Where the Constitution confers jurisdiction upon a court, the Legislature cannot take it away.

2. COURTS §43—CONSTITUTION—COUNTY COURT—COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Since the Legislature cannot deprive the court of common pleas of the jurisdiction in civil cases or of the appellate jurisdiction in cases within the jurisdiction of magistrates' courts, given by Const. art. 5, § 15, the legislative power, given by section 1, to establish county courts, may be exerted by conferring upon a county court established by the Legislature concurrent jurisdiction with that invested in the court of common pleas, including, in view of section 23, concurrent jurisdiction over appeals from magistrates' courts.

3. STATUTES §64(3)—PARTIAL UNCONSTITUTIONALITY.

In view of Const. art. 5, §§ 1, 15, 23, the act creating a county court for Richland county, Act March 1, 1917 (30 St. at Large, p. 156) § 8, purporting to confer upon that court exclusive jurisdiction over appeals from magistrates' courts, is constitutional so far as it gives such court jurisdiction of such appeals, and unconstitutional and void only so far as it attempts to make that jurisdiction exclusive.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; W. H. Townsend, Judge.

Action by Henry R. Strickland against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George A. Alderman, of Columbia, for appellant.

H. N. Edmunds, of Columbia, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. The question for decision in this case is whether the provision of section 3 of the act creating a county court for Richland county (30 Stat. 156), which confers upon that court exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine appeals in all civil cases from magistrates' courts, is constitutional.

The provisions of the Constitution bearing upon the question are found in sections 1, 15, and 23 of article 5, the pertinent parts of which are:

"Section 1. The judicial power of this state shall be vested in a Supreme Court, in two circuit courts, to wit: A court of common pleas having civil jurisdiction and a court of general sessions with criminal jurisdiction only. The General Assembly may also establish county courts, municipal courts and such courts in any or all of the counties of this state inferior to circuit courts as may be deemed necessary, but none of such courts shall ever be invested with jurisdiction to try cases of murder, manslaughter, rape or attempt to rape, arson, common-law burglary, bribery or perjury."

"Sec. 15. The courts of common pleas shall have original jurisdiction, subject to appeal to the Supreme Court, to issue writs or orders of injunction, mandamus, habeas corpus, and such other writs as may be necessary to carry their powers into full effect. They shall have jurisdiction in all civil cases. They shall have appellate jurisdiction in all civil cases within the jurisdiction of inferior courts, except from such inferior courts from which the General Assembly shall provide an appeal directly to the Supreme Court."

"Sec. 23. Every civil action cognizable by magistrates shall be brought before a magistrate in the county where the defendant resides, and every criminal action in the county where the offense was committed. In all cases tried by them, the right of appeal shall be secured under such rules and regulations as may be provided by law."

[1] Section 15 confers upon the court of common pleas jurisdiction in all civil cases, and appellate jurisdiction in all cases within the jurisdiction of magistrates' courts, since they are inferior courts from which appeals are not allowed directly to the Supreme Court. Where the Constitution confers jurisdiction upon a court, the Legislature cannot take it away. Therefore the Legislature cannot deprive the court of common pleas of jurisdiction in any civil case, nor of appellate jurisdiction in cases within the jurisdiction of magistrates' courts except by providing for a direct appeal from these courts to the Supreme Court.

[2] But the power conferred upon the Legislature (by section 1) to establish county courts, and other courts inferior to circuit courts, carried with it, by necessary implication, the power to invest such courts with jurisdiction, which necessarily must be of cases within the jurisdiction of the circuit courts, since they had already been invested with jurisdiction in all civil and criminal cases, and the exception of certain cases implies power to confer upon them jurisdiction in such others as the Legislature may determine. But the power so implied must be exerted so as to avoid conflict with the express provisions of the Constitution. This may be done by conferring upon such inferior courts concurrent jurisdiction with that vested in the court of common pleas, since that does not deprive the latter of the jurisdiction vested in it by the Constitution. In conformity with this principle, the Legislature made the original jurisdiction of the county court concurrent with that of the court of common pleas; but, in violation of it and of the express provision of the Constitution, it attempted to give the county court exclusive jurisdiction of appeals from the courts of magistrates.

[3] As the Legislature clearly had the power to give the county court concurrent jurisdiction of such appeals, and as the greater includes the less, so much of the act as gives the county court jurisdiction of such appeals is valid, and only so much of it is void as attempts to make that jurisdiction exclusive. It follows that the county court has concurrent jurisdiction with the court of common pleas to hear such appeals.

The provision of section 23 fortifies this conclusion, for, while it is there declared that, in all cases tried by magistrates, the right of appeal shall be secured, no appellate tribunal is specified; and we find no inhibition in that section, or elsewhere, against providing for an appeal to any other than the circuit court. The intention there expressed is that the right of appeal to some higher tribunal shall be secured by law, and that it shall be subject to such rules and regulations as the Legislature may see fit to adopt; that is, such as fix the time within which and the conditions upon which an appeal may be taken, the manner in which it shall be prepared and prosecuted, and so forth.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

SANDERS v. BOYNTON et al. (No. 10183.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 8, 1919.)

1. EVIDENCE \S 461(2) — PAROL EVIDENCE — WARRANTY OF TITLE.

In action for breach of warranty of title, testimony by defendants that they intended to convey to plaintiff only such interest as they had in the land described in the deed, which was in fact less than a sixth interest in each defendant, and to warrant title only to such interest, was not rendered admissible, over the objection that it was parol evidence to vary the terms of a written instrument, by plaintiff's pleading that, notwithstanding the terms of the deed made defendants warrantors of the entire estate, the intention was that each conveyed and warranted the title only to a sixth undivided interest.

2. TRIAL \S 91 — EXCLUDING IRRELEVANT EVIDENCE.

Although plaintiff, by failing to move to strike out irrelevant matter set up as a defense, has no right to have testimony supporting it excluded, the court may and should exclude it either on plaintiff's objection or its own motion.

3. COVENANTS \S 39 — WARRANTY OF TITLE — KNOWLEDGE BY GRANTEE OF DEFECTS.

Knowledge by the grantee of a defect in his grantor's title is no defense to an action on the grantor's warranty of title.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; F. B. Gary, Judge.

Action by George D. Sanders against Emma R. Boynton and another. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

R. A. Ellis and Bates & Simms, all of Barnwell, for appellant.

James M. Patterson, of Allendale, and Holman & Boulware and James A. Willis, all of Barnwell, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. This is an action for damages for breach of warranty of title to land conveyed to plaintiff by defendants. The facts are undisputed. James F. Sanders devised the lands conveyed, among others, to his brother, W. J. Sanders, for life; and he devised the remainder, as follows: One-third to plaintiff, who is the son of the life tenant; one-third to E. L. Sanders, a brother of testator; one-sixth to his sister "Emma R. Boynton and her children"; and one-sixth to his sister "Eliza Hickson and her children." Each of the sisters had a number of children; but each of them believed, as plaintiff did, also, that she was entitled, under the will, to an undivided sixth interest in fee simple in the land so devised; and on January 28, 1909, after the death of the life tenant, E. L. Sanders and the defendants, Mrs. Boynton and Mrs. Hickson, joined in a deed, wherein they conveyed to plaintiff two tracts of the land so devised, with covenant of general warranty. No reference is made in the deed to the fact that plaintiff already owned an undivided third interest in the land conveyed, nor is it specified therein what interest each of the grantors had or intended to convey; but, on its face, the deed purports to be the joint conveyance by the grantors of the entire estate in fee simple with joint covenant of general warranty. The consideration expressed in the deed was $4,000, which according to the testimony, was $2,000 for the one-third interest of E. L. Sanders, and $1,000 for the one-sixth interest of each of the defendants, and they were paid accordingly. Under this deed, plaintiff took exclusive possession of the lands so conveyed, returned them for taxation in his own name, paid the taxes, and made valuable improvements thereon.

A few years after the execution of this deed, E. L. Sanders, as executor of the will of James F. Sanders, brought an action against George D. Sanders and others, including these defendants, as heirs and devisees of his testator, for the construction of his will, and for partition and distribution of his estate. In that action, George D. Sanders set up the deed hereinbefore mentioned, and alleged that, at date thereof, he thought that he was buying, and the grantors therein thought that they were selling, all the rights of every person under the will of James F. Sanders to the land therein described; but that he was then advised, and therefore alleged, that the children of Mrs. Boynton and Mrs. Hickson had an interest in said lands; and he prayed that their interest be determined, and that it be adjudged that the grantors in said deed have no interest in the property therein described. It was adjudged in that action that Mrs. Boynton and her children were tenants in common of the one-sixth of the estate devised to her and her children, and Mrs. Hickson and her children were tenants in common of the one-sixth devised to her and her children, but that plaintiff was entitled to the interests of Mrs. Boynton and Mrs. Hickson in the lands described in the deed. Under the decree of the court, the land which had been conveyed to plaintiff in the deed was sold and bought by plaintiff at that sale for $11,765, and it was adjudged that the share of Mrs. Boynton in the proceeds was $81.51, and the share of Mrs. Hickson was $63.40. These shares were paid to the plaintiff herein, their grantee in the deed.

Plaintiff then brought this action on the covenant of warranty contained in said deed, alleging that, notwithstanding the terms of the deed made the grantors (these defendants) warrantors of the entire estate, the intention was that each conveyed and warranted the title only to a sixth undivided interest in fee simple in the premises described, and that he paid $1,000 to each of the defendants for such interest, and that the warranty had been breached, etc.

The defendants interposed a general denial, and set up the following defenses: First, that it was their intention to convey to plaintiff only such interest as they had in the land, under the will; second, that plaintiff knew as well or better than they did what interest they had, and therefore he is estopped to enforce the covenant of warranty; and, third, that the matter is res adjudicata, under the judgment in the case of E. L. Sanders, as executor, etc., v. George D. Sanders et al. (hereinbefore mentioned), and plaintiff is estopped by that judgment.

[1] Over plaintiff's objection, the defendants were allowed to testify that their intention was to convey to plaintiff only such interest as they had in the land described in the deed, and, of course as corollary thereto, that they intended to warrant the title only to the interest which they intended to convey. This testimony was clearly obnoxious to the rule that parol is inadmissible to vary the terms of a written instrument. The learned judge was mindful of the force of that objection to it, but based his ruling upon the ground that plaintiff had admitted in the allegation of his complaint that the deed did not correctly express the intention of the parties; and, as he had stated therein his version of their intention, it appeared to him that defendants should be allowed to give their version of it. This view overlooked the fact that, in the absence of fraud or mistake of fact, of which there was neither allegation nor proof, plaintiff had the right to enforce the contract according to its terms; and, of course, he had the right to waive, for the benefit of defendants, such provisions of it, favorable to him, as he saw fit; and defendants had no right to insist that the waiver or concession should be more extensive than that agreed to by plaintiff.

Aside from this, the testimony was susceptible of no other reasonable inference than that plaintiff thought he was buying, and defendants thought they were selling and conveying to him, an undivided sixth interest of each in the land described; and they admit their intention to warrant the title to the interests which they conveyed.

While Mrs. Boynton did testify, on her direct examination, that she sold only her interest and that nothing was said about what it was (whether one-third or one-sixth), on cross-examination she testified that she did not know what her interest was, until it was decided in the case of Sanders, Executor, etc., v. Sanders et al., and, further, as follows:

"Q. You had thought all along that your sister Mrs. Hickson had the same interest in it that you had? A. They (meaning her brother Elliott [E. L. Sanders] and plaintiff) said so. Q. That was your understanding? A. That is what they told us. Q. That your interest, along with your sister's, was the same as Elliott's and your brother's? A. Yes, sir. Q. That was the conveyance you made to George? A. No, I sold him my interest in the land."

The testimony of Mrs. Hickson is not set out in the record, but it is therein stated that it was to the same effect as that of Mrs. Boynton. When the testimony of defendants is considered in the light of the undisputed facts and circumstances, to wit, that Elliott and George each had an undivided third, and that the consideration paid to each of the defendants was adequate to an undivided sixth, the inference is irresistible that each of them thought she had and intended to convey an undivided sixth.

The court also admitted, over plaintiff's objection, evidence which defendants contended would support their plea that plaintiff was estopped to enforce the warranty, because he knew as well or better than they did, what interest they had in the land. The objection was based on the ground that the estoppel alleged was no defense. The court based its ruling on the ground that, if it were not a good defense, plaintiff should have moved to strike it from the answer, and, having failed to do so, evidence in support of the plea was admissible.

[2, 3] According to the decisions of this court, while plaintiff, by reason of his failure to move to strike out the irrelevant matter set up in the answer as a defense, had no right to have the testimony excluded, it was, nevertheless, within the power of the court, either on plaintiff's objection, or of its own motion to exclude it. In Martin v. Railway, 70 S. C. 8, 48 S. E. 616, the court said:

"The proposition that a court is obliged to receive evidence which does not tend to establish any fact from which, under the pleadings, a legal conclusion would result, merely because the immediate litigants are not in a position to complain, cannot for a moment be entertained. The court is vested with power to exclude such evidence in the interest of other litigants and of the public. Those who have a cause on trial are entitled to time and opportunity to present the evidence and argument which bear upon the real issue; but, when either party attempts to go beyond this, it is within the power of the trial judge, and a duty he owes to others having business in the court and to the public, either upon the objections of the other party, or of his own motion, to require adherence to the true controversy."

The principle decided in Martin v. Railway was reaffirmed in Bromonia Co. v. Drug Co., 78 S. C. 482, 59 S. E. 363, and in Givens v. Electric Co., 91 S. C. 417, 74 S. E. 1067. Where it clearly appears that, under the law, the evidence offered cannot affect the result, the court should exclude it, since its admission would result only in confusion and useless consumption of time in the administration of justice. That it could not be allowed to avail defendants in this action, without violating well-settled principles of law, is clear beyond doubt. It is settled, upon reason and authority, that knowledge by the grantee of a defect in his grantor's title is no defense to an action on the grantor's warranty of the title. Such knowledge may be the grantee's chief reason for requiring the warranty, and he may rely more upon his grantor's warranty than upon his own knowledge of the title. The precise point was decided in Grice v. Scarborough, 2 Speers, 649, 42 Am. Dec. 391. There the grantor warranted the title to be free from all incumbrances. There was an outstanding lease by the grantor, known to the grantee, but not mentioned, or excepted from the warranty. In the action on the warranty, assigning the existence of the lease as a breach thereof, the defendant pleaded that plaintiff had notice of the lease. The plea was held bad on demurrer. The court said:

"On the question of the insufficiency of the defendant's plea, I think there can be no doubt. The contract is in writing. Parol evidence cannot be received to explain what the parties intended, or to add or subtract anything from

it. It would be to make a new contract, where the grantee covenants against all incumbrances, to show by parol that he did not warrant against a particular incumbrance. And that, I suppose, is the inference to be drawn from the alleged notice. The very object of the covenant may have been to compel the seller to extinguish the incumbrance, that the purchaser might have the full possession and enjoyment of the premises."

To the same effect is Wallace v. Frazier, 2 Nott & McC. 516, Stucky v. Clyburn, Cheves, 186, 34 Am. Dec. 590, and numerous others that might be cited. The principle is thus stated in 11 Cyc. 1066:

"The fact that either or both of the parties knew at the time of the conveyance that the grantor had no title in a part or in the whole of the land does not affect the right to recover for a breach of covenant."

The text is sustained by the citation of cases from many states and from the Supreme Court of the United States.

The court properly overruled the defendants' plea of res adjudicata. There is nothing in the judgment in the case of Sanders, as Executor, etc., v. Sanders, which adjudicates anything as to plaintiff's right to pursue defendants on their covenant of warranty. In fact, it is difficult to see how that issue could have arisen or been adjudicated in that case.

Both parties appealed from the order setting the "case" for appeal; but we find no error in the order.

It follows, from what has been said, that the circuit court erred in refusing plaintiff's motion to direct a verdict, and the judgment is accordingly reversed.

Judgment reversed.

STATE v. BURTON. (No. 10121.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 21, 1919.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — 1166½(8) — HARMLESS ERROR — COMPETENCY OF JURORS — PRIOR SERVICE AS JUROR.

In a prosecution for homicide, presentment by the court of a juror, who had sat on the coroner's jury at the inquest, though error, was not prejudicial, where the defendant rejected the juror by peremptory challenge and did not exhaust his peremptory challenges.

2. CRIMINAL LAW — 470 — EXPERT EVIDENCE — MATTER IN ISSUE.

In a prosecution for homicide, testimony of a physician, who attended deceased after he received his mortal wound, that the deceased knew and realized that he could not live, held not inadmissible on the ground that it was a mere opinion upon the material question as to the admissibility of the deceased's statement as a dying declaration.

3. HOMICIDE \S 205—DYING DECLARATIONS—SOLICITATIONS.

The fact that a physician told deceased that he could not live and that, if he had any statement concerning anything he wanted to come out in his case, to make it to him, would not render inadmissible the statements of deceased.

4. HOMICIDE \S 216—EVIDENCE—DYING DECLARATIONS—COMPETENCY TO SHOW "IN EXTREMIS."

The testimony of a physician who attended deceased after he received his mortal wound to the effect that he told deceased that he could not live, that deceased stated he realized such fact and that it was hard to die, was competent to show that deceased was "in extremis."

5. CRIMINAL LAW \S 366(3)—STATEMENT BY PERSON INJURED—RES GESTÆ.

In prosecution for homicide, testimony by witnesses as to statements made by deceased to them shortly after the shooting held admissible as part of the res gestæ.

6. CRIMINAL LAW \S 683(2) — ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE IN REPLY—DISCRETION OF COURT.

In prosecution for homicide, the court held to have not abused its discretion in allowing the state to introduce evidence in reply.

7. CRIMINAL LAW \S 822(1)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS AS A WHOLE.

The court's charge to the jury in a prosecution for homicide, taken in its entirety, held not to show any error prejudicial to defendant.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Newberry County; James E. Peurlfoy, Judge.

Ira O. Burton was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

The following proceedings were had at the trial:

During the selection of the jury the defendant made nine objections peremptorily. Juror No. 17, sworn, says:

"I am not related by blood or marriage to the defendant. I haven't formed or expressed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence, except I was a member of the coroner's jury. I am not conscious of any bias either for or against him. I know of no reason why I should not bring a true verdict according to the law and the testimony.

"By Mr. Timmerman: The coroner's jury only arrived at the facts as to how the deceased came to his death.

"Yes; I made up my mind as to how the deceased came to his death.

"Q. You didn't make up your mind as to anything else? A. No, sir.

"Q. How do you separate it? How could you separate it from the other testimony?

"By the Court: I don't think a juror has to go into all that.

"By Mr. Timmerman: Your honor please, we except to this juror. He has some knowledge of the case, and must have formed some opinion, having heard the testimony at the coroner's inquest. He has listened to that investigation, and we except to him. We want to examine the juror further, and we except to the ruling of your honor in stopping the examination.

"The Court: I didn't stop the examination. I merely held that I didn't think the juror had to go into and explain how he differentiated between whether or not he passed upon the facts or the cause of his death.

"By Mr. Timmerman: May I ask another question?

"The Court: Yes, sir."

Examined by Mr. Timmerman, juror stated:

"I don't remember how many eyewitnesses were examined, but several; I expect a half dozen or more. Those witnesses went into details and told about the transaction. The members of the jury inquired as to the details of the killing.

"Mr. Timmerman: I would like to make reference to the coroner's inquest.

"Mr. Cromer: We suggest that that couldn't be presented before the jury.

"Mr. Timmerman: Certainly not. I want to present it to your honor.

"Witness: Having heard examination at the coroner's inquest, I am prepared mentally to give the defendant a fair trial. I only remember the testimony submitted in a general way. I feel that I could give him a fair trial. I am not conscious of any bias either for or against him."

(Presented and rejected by defendant.)

Testimony for the state:

Dr. J. K. Gilder, sworn, says:

"I reside in Newberry. I am a practicing physician. I knew David A. Langford, and have known him since he was a boy. I was called to see him about the 29th of January, this last year. I found him in my drug store and examined him. I found a gunshot wound. I didn't make a thorough examination until I carried him to Columbia on the evening train. I made a thorough examination there. He was operated on. We found a pistol wound. It entered the left side, and it penetrated the pancreas and cut the intestine and ranged toward the back. I stayed with him all the time he was in the hospital, except one or two occasions I came to Newberry. The shooting occurred Saturday evening, and he died the following Thursday evening about 8 or 9 o'clock. The bullet entered the left side and ranged back toward the spinal column. We didn't find the bullet that night. He died in Columbia. The wound caused his death. I talked with him the evening before he died and also about 11 o'clock on Thursday before he died. Thursday morning I told him that he couldn't live, and that, if he had any statement to make, to make it to me, anything that he wanted to come out in his case. He said that it was hard to die that way: that there was no cause— * * * He said that he would like to see his son before he died, who was in Newberry; his wife was at the hospital.

I told him he couldn't live; he knew he couldn't live; he realized he couldn't live. After he said that it was hard to die that way, and that he wanted to see his son, he made a statement to this effect— * * *

"The Court: Let me ask him a question. You say that you advised him that he couldn't live? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Do you or not know whether he realized his condition? A. Yes, sir; he realized his condition. * * *

"Mr. Cooper: Q. Just state what he said to you, doctor, about dying. A. When he stated to me that he would like to see his son before he died, it wasn't with any intention to bring the boy to Columbia.

"Mr. Timmerman: We object to that as a mere opinion and move to strike it out.

"The Court: He can state whether or not any arrangements were made, if he knows, to bring the child to Columbia.

"Mr. Cooper: What about that? A. None were made. He did not suggest any. I think most of his family was in Columbia at the time. He did not subsequently to that express any hope of getting well. He sank from that time on. * * *

W. S. Langford, sworn, says:

"I am a brother of the deceased. He was younger than I. (Witness identified clothes of the deceased and the same were offered in evidence.) I was coming from towards the opera house across the street where there is a pinder parcher and a billboard when my brother was shot. When I heard the shot I thought it was an automobile tire or something, and I looked around and saw a man brandishing a pistol. When I got closer I saw it was Burton. I saw my brother on the sidewalk. I went to him as quick as I could. Don't know whether I trotted, ran, or walked. He was standing up with his hands to his side (indicating). When I got near to him his hands kind of dropped, and I realized he was shot. I asked him, 'What's the matter?' * * *

"The Court: Where was the defendant at that time? A. Out on the street.

"The Court: How far from you? A. I guess he was as far from here as to Mr. Timmerman. My brother was about the middle of the sidewalk.

"Q. Had your brother moved from the place where he was shot? A. I don't know. When the crowd opened up, I saw him, and then I ran to him. As soon as I saw him I got to him pretty quick. I went pretty quick—a minute or two I suppose. As soon as I got to him he made a statement. * * * I came up to him and said, 'What is the matter, Dave?' He said, 'Ira Burton shot me in the stomach for nothing.' * * * He said, 'I want you to take care of Lil and Bluford.' That indicated that he was going to die. I says, 'All right; I will get you to the doctor; maybe you are not wounded much.' I took him by the arm, and he said, 'I can walk,' and we walked up the street. Mr. Burton was still there, and I asked him if he had a gun. He said that he did not. I heard some talk, but I didn't catch what it was. I took my brother to the drug store. Just as we started off Mr. Reighly came up and took his right arm. I had his left. It was bleeding. I think the cuff button cut his arm. He began to weaken as he went across the street to the drug store. My brother did not have any weapon of any kind except that he may have had a pocketknife. On the way to the drug store I saw Hayne Abrams. He joined us. I remember seeing Frank Hunter. * * *

Dr. W. G. Houseal, sworn, says:

"I am a practicing physician. I live in Newberry. I saw Langford the day that he was shot a few minutes after he was shot in the drug store. I heard him make a statement. I heard him tell his brother that he knew he had a pistol wound, and that he couldn't live, and that he wanted him to take care of his wife and child.

"Q. After he said that about dying, did he make any statement as to how the matter happened? * * * A. He also stated to his brother that his business was in good shape; that he had a certain amount of life insurance, mentioning the amount. I said, 'Dave, how did this happen?' He said he came in contact with Burton on the street, and he said to Burton, 'I understand that you have been circulating reports about me, that I have been keeping Mayme Harp,' and asked Burton if he had said so. He said Burton said, 'Yes,' and he called Burton a lie, and Burton called him a 'damn lie' and that he had struck Burton, and Burton pulled out a pistol and shot him. He said he had no idea that Burton would shoot him and that he was taken by surprise. He didn't say anything about whether or not he was armed. * * *

"Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, I commend you upon the very patient and careful hearing that you have given the witnesses and also the attorneys in the trial of this case. I have been impressed with your apparent desire to know the truth and your earnest desire to reach a true verdict. I shall ask your indulgence for a moment while I shall give you what I conceive to be the law applicable to the case. You have been sworn to try this case according to the law and the testimony, and I wish to admonish you in the beginning that it is as much your duty to try it according to the law as it is to try it according to the testimony. You are not responsible for the testimony that has been given you by the witnesses; equally you are not responsible for the law. That has come down to us through ages, and I have no more right to make the law in this or any other case than you have to make the law. So you will try this case under the law and under the testimony, and you have approached the case with that condition of mind. You are not related either by blood or marriage to either party, you have not formed any opinion or expressed it as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, and you are not conscious of any bias either for him or against him, and you do not know of any reason whatever why you should not bring in a true verdict according to the law and the testimony. So that you approach the deliberation of this case with a clear mind and a clean heart, prepared to vindicate the law and try the case under the law.

"Now, the defendant at the bar, Ira O. Burton, is charged with one of the most serious crimes known to the law. He is charged with murder. The allegation is that on the 29th of January, 1916, in the town of Newberry, that he shot one David A. Langford with a pistol and wounded him, and from that wound he died in a hospital in Columbia on February 4th, and that the circumstances surrounding the shooting were such as to make out the crime of murder, and therefore the allegation is that it was done willfully, maliciously, feloniously, and with malice aforethought. He is also indicted for at the same time carrying a concealed weapon about his person, against the statutes of this state.

"Now, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, murder is the killing of any person with malice aforethought, either expressed or implied. Murder is the killing of any person with malice aforethought, either expressed or implied. So that the first inquiry that you will make is whether or not the person is dead. That question is not disputed. The next question is, 'Who killed him?' and, finding out who killed him, your next inquiry will be, 'Under what circumstances did he kill him?'

"Human life is sacrificed. Mankind has been able to invent many wonderful things and do many wonderful things, but science has never yet been able to bring back a life that has been shut out. When once the spark has been put out, mankind has been helpless in all ages of the past to bring back or revivify man, and therefore, when any one takes human life, the law places upon that act a fearful penalty, unless it is done under certain circumstances. In olden times, before organized society existed, when a man was killed it was the duty of his nearest relative to seek out and take the life of the man who killed him, and he was called the 'Avenger of Blood,' but in the time of Joshua cities of refuge were made where, if a man killed another by mischance or accident, he might flee to that city and escape the hand of the Avenger of Blood, and that was the first step towards organized courts. That was the first step, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, because many times the Avenger of Blood would kill a man who had the right to take the life of another, and therefore he could flee to the city and there be tried at the gate in a court, and if he was found innocent, he could remain in the city, but that was in the case of an accident. Later on the human race began to slowly improve and develop, and it was known that many cases that were not accidents, yet in which the person in the exercise of the right of self-defense would take the life of another, when he ought not to be slain by the hand of the Avenger of Blood, and this we have in our courts to-day, the second step; that any one who takes life in self-defense will not be punished by the Avenger of Blood.

"So, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, you will investigate in this case and see whether or not the defendant took the life of the deceased, and he admits that he did. Under what circumstances did he take it? If he took it under such circumstances, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, which would indicate a willful intention to take human life and without legal justification or excuse, as I shall charge you, he would be guilty of murder, and, as I charged you, murder is the killing of a human being with malice aforethought, either expressed or implied. So that you will observe that the first element in the definition is malice and malice is that condition of heart—that condition of mind which shows a heart regardless of social duty and fatally bent on mischief. It is the intentional doing of any unlawful act against another without justification or excuse. Malice is synonymous with the criminal intent. Now this malice must exist in the mind of the party who takes human life before and at the time of the act of taking human life; its existence may be expressed or implied. Now, express malice is where any one declares or manifests a positive intention to commit a crime. If you, Mr. Foreman, should say that 'I intend to shoot a man' and proceed to shoot him, your declaration would be express malice. Now, implied malice is inferred from the facts and circumstances proved, because a man is presumed to intend the consequences of his voluntary acts. It may be implied in a number of ways; the kind of weapon used, lying in wait, preparation, deliberation, any number of ways that you may infer that malice exists. I charge you that, where it is shown that a person kills another without anything more the law implies malice or presumes malice without anything else, but, when all the facts and circumstances are proven, then the state must show that malice existed beyond a reasonable doubt.

"So, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, your first inquiry will be whether or not the defendant killed the deceased with malice aforethought, either expressed or implied. If he did do it without justification or legal excuse, then he is guilty of murder. But, if you should find, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, that he did take the life of the deceased, but that he did it under such circumstances of provocation or legal excuse that would tend to de-throne reason and arouse anger, and cause him to strike or shoot under the impulse of that anger, then the killing would not be lawful, but it would be reduced from murder to manslaughter, and manslaughter is the killing of a human being without malice. So you will see the difference in that. In murder the malice must exist; in manslaughter there is an absence of malice. Manslaughter is usually defined as the taking of human life in sudden heat and passion and upon sufficient legal provocation, but even, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, where there is provocation, there is no right to kill, unless the circumstances are such as to justify the person in making the assault to believe that he had to act in self-defense, and I shall charge you on that. So, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, from the testimony which you have heard it is your duty to determine that testimony, the weight of it, and the value of it, and the credibility to be given to each witness, and in reaching your conclusions you will exercise your good judgment, your knowledge of human nature, and in reaching this you will determine whether or not he shot the deceased with malice or without malice.

"Now, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, you should consider further his plea of self-defense. Where a person kills another and admits the killing and comes into court, the law presumes, as I have stated before, that he intended his act and will hold him responsible for his act, but in this case the defendant contends that, while he did kill the deceased, yet he alleges that he did it in defense of his own life and his own person; so it becomes necessary for me to charge you as to the law of self-defense. Now, Mr. Foreman, that is a good defense if it is made out. The right to defend one's life and one's person is a God-given right. It is not only common to man, but it is common to every creature. The law of self-preservation is said to be the first law of nature, and the law recognizes the right, and if a person in the exercise of that right kills his assailant, the law excuses him, but in order to make good this place, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, the burden is on the defendant to prove to your satisfaction by the greater weight of the evidence certain things. Self-defense is based upon necessity, and I charge you in the beginning that human life is so sacred, human life is so sweet, that no man has the right to assault or take human life except that it is necessary to save himself from death or serious bodily harm; so that the whole defense, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, may be condensed into the one word 'necessity.' If it was not necessary, and the other elements of self-defense were present, it is excusable, but it must be necessary, and in order to make out the plea the person setting up the plea must prove by the greater weight of the evidence, first, that he was not at fault in bringing on the difficulty, and that is a reasonable rule. It complies with good common sense and justice, because why should a man bring on a difficulty and then, being placed in that difficulty that he brought on himself, it becomes necessary for him to take the life of the person, for him to come into court and say he had to kill in order to save his own life. So a person must be without fault in bringing on the difficulty; he must come into court with clean hands; and if he should fail to prove to your satisfaction that he was without fault in bringing on the difficulty, then his plea of self-defense fails. Then next is that it was necessary, not only must he be without fault in bringing on the trouble, but it must be necessary for him to take the life of the deceased in order to save himself from death or serious bodily harm. Not only that, but he must believe that he was in danger of suffering death or serious bodily harm, and that a man of ordinary reason and firmness would have believed the same thing placed as he was placed. I say it is not only necessary that he must believe that he was in danger of suffering death or serious bodily harm, but a man of ordinary firmness and reason must believe the same thing under the same circumstances. The standard is the man of ordinary reason and firmness. Some men might think they were in danger when they were not and others might think they were not in danger when they really were. Some men are more courageous than others; some are more timid. So the best the law can do is to take the man of ordinary reason and courage. And then he must prove the additional factor that there was no other reasonably safe means of escape. Even he was without fault, even it was necessary or appeared to be necessary, if there is a reasonably safe means to avoid taking human life, the law imposes upon him to avail himself of that opportunity.

"Of course, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, a man wouldn't be required to run if by running he would more greatly endanger himself, and I charge you further, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, that a man does not have to wait until his antagonist strikes before exercising the fatal blow if he believes he is in danger, and that he was not at fault in bringing on the difficulty, and that a man of ordinary reason and firmness would have believed the same thing placed as the defendant was placed. A man has the right to act upon appearances, provided a man is suffering death or serious bodily harm, and he would not have to wait until he was struck the fatal blow or until he would have been shot before acting. Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, I charge you further that no words, however opprobrious, are sufficient to justify an assault. You have no right to strike a man because he insults you, because he calls you a lie, or because he calls you anything else. No words will justify an assault. I charge you further that a man cannot insult another and bring on a difficulty by insulting words or epithets, and then, after bringing on the difficulty, should he take the life of his assailant, he could not plead self-defense. As I charged you under the general law, he must be without fault in bringing on the difficulty, and if a man should apply opprobrious language to another and bring on a difficulty, and in that difficulty which he brought on himself it becomes necessary for him to take the life of the other, he could not plead self-defense successfully. He must be without fault in bringing on the difficulty; but it is for you to determine under all the facts and circumstances, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, what is the truth here. If you should find that the defendant has proven by the greater weight of the evidence, not beyond a reasonable doubt, but by the greater weight of the evidence, and that means his evidence of self-defense, you put it in the balances and weigh it, and that does not mean, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, that you should believe everything that every witness says or that you should swallow every circumstance that is detailed, but it is for you to weigh it and from your knowledge of human nature to determine what is the truth, and if he has proven to you by the greater weight of the evidence that he was without fault in bringing on the difficulty, that it was necessary for him to take the life of the deceased in order to save his own life or save himself from serious bodily harm, and that he believed that he was in danger of suffering death or serious bodily harm, and that a man of ordinary reason and courage and firmness would have believed the same thing placed as he was placed, and that there was no other reasonable safe means of escape, then it is your duty to find him not guilty. If you find that he has failed to prove any one of these four elements, then his plea of self-defense fails. Then you will determine whether or not the state has proven beyond a reasonable doubt whether he is guilty or not guilty. He is entitled to the benefit of any reasonable doubt growing out of all the circumstances and a reasonable doubt is just what the term implies. It means a doubt for which you can give a reason; not a whimsical doubt, not a flimsy doubt, not a doubt that a man would pick out who is hunting for a doubt, but any doubt that would come up in the mind of an honest man who is earnestly seeking to know the truth. If there is such an honest doubt in your mind, then it is your duty under the law to give the defendant the benefit of it, but, if there is no reasonable doubt in your mind as to his guilt under the law as I have charged you, then it is your duty to find him guilty.

"Now, Mr. Foreman, I think that is about all the law that I want to charge you. The responsibility is yours. It is a duty that no man would crave. It is a duty that no man would seek, and yet there is but one purpose and one course to follow. This word 'verdict' comes from a Latin word meaning truth, and if your verdict should speak anything else, then it would have the wrong name. I think it was Ella Wheeler Wilcox who said, and I think it is a beautiful thought: 'That there are only two things that we should fear in this world. The first is that we may not know our duty, and the second is, knowing it, we might not have the strength to perform it. Only two things that we need fear: That we may not have intelligence to know our duty, or, if we have light to know it, then we haven't got strength to perform it.'

"Now, gentlemen of the jury, you must know your duty from the testimony that you have heard on that stand and under the law as I have given it to you. That is the only way you can get it, and when you have considered the testimony and have found your duty, then you are not responsible for the result. You don't represent the defendant any more than you represent the state, nor do you represent the state any more than you do the defendant. When you shall have found your duty, then may you have the strength to write it on the back of this indictment, and then a clear conscience will be yours and it matters not what comes in after life, when you feel that you have done your duty under the light as God has given you to see the light, then you may fear no man nor devil. If you should find the defendant guilty of murder, you write the word 'guilty' and sign your name as foreman. In that case the penalty will be death by electrocution. If you should find that he is guilty of murder, but there are such circumstances and facts surrounding it that you should think the death penalty should not be imposed, then you find him guilty with recommendation to mercy, and in that case the punishment will be life imprisonment. If you should find that he is not guilty of murder, but that he is guilty of manslaughter under the law as I have charged you, then you will say guilty of manslaughter and sign your name as foreman. In that event the punishment will not be less than 2 years nor more than 30 years in the discretion of the court. If you find that the state has failed to make out its case beyond a reasonable doubt or the defendant has established his plea of self-defense by the greater weight of the evidence, the form of your verdict will be 'Not Guilty,' and sign your name as foreman. Take the record, Mr. Foreman, and find a verdict."

Exceptions:

"(1) His honor erred in not excusing juror No. 17 for the reason: (a) Said juror had been a member of the coroner's jury that originally investigated the death of the deceased; (b) said juror stated he had made up his mind as to how the deceased came to his death; (c) said juror had only heard the state's testimony, and a burden was placed on the defendant to remove any impression adverse to him that had been made; (d) the court accepted the juror's view of whether he was or not indifferent; (e) under all the facts developed on his examination, it did not appear that he was indifferent and did not appear that he was a proper juror to sit in that case.

"(2) His honor erred in allowing the witness Dr. J. K. Gilder to testify that the deceased 'knew he couldn't live; he realized he couldn't live;' the error being that the testimony was a mere expression of an opinion upon the material question as to the admissibility of the deceased's statement as a dying declaration.

"(3) His honor erred in allowing the witness Dr. J. K. Gilder to testify to statements made by the deceased, the error being: (a) The statement was not shown to be a dying declaration; (b) the witness asked the deceased to make a statement for his case; (c) it was not shown that the deceased was without hope of recovery at the time of the alleged statement; (d) there was no competent testimony that the deceased was in extremis at the time of the alleged statement.

"(4) His honor erred in allowing the witness W. S. Langford, a brother of the deceased, to testify to statements made by the deceased upon the witness's arrival at the scene of the difficulty, after it was over, the error being: (a) The statement itself was a mere expression of an opinion or conclusion of the deceased and was not a statement of fact; (b) the statement was not shown to have been a part of the res gestæ, or a dying declaration; (c) the statement was not shown to have been made to or in the presence and hearing of the defendant.

"(5) His honor erred in allowing the witness Dr. W. G. Houseal to testify to statements made to him by the deceased on the day of the difficulty, the error being: (a) That the said statement was not shown to have been a dying declaration, it not appearing that the defendant was in extremis at the time, but, on the contrary, that he was not in extremis, as he lived more than five days thereafter; (b) said declaration was not shown to have been a part of the res gestæ.

"(6) His honor erred in not allowing the defendant to answer the following question: 'Q. Did you know deceased's reputation, that is, D. A. Langford's reputation for going armed in this community?'—the error being that the testimony sought to be elicited was material and bore directly upon the defendant's plea of self-defense, and was in reply to testimony of the witness W. S. Langford and others for the state.

"(7) His honor erred in allowing the witness Mrs. D. A. Langford, wife of the deceased, to testify in reply as follows: 'Q. I wish you would state to the jury what was your husband's habit with reference to carrying a pistol? A. Well, when he came in he often went in the room and played with his little boy. * * * I simply want to tell that when he came in the house he very often played with the little boy. He wouldn't take anything out of his pocket. I shouldn't think he would get on the floor and not take anything out of his pocket'—the error being: (a) The testimony was not in reply; (b) it was an effort to bolster witnesses already offered by the state in its testimony in chief; (c) it was argumentative, and was an expression of an opinion, and was no statement of fact; (d) the court had refused to allow the defendant when on the stand to answer a similar question, although the issue had been made by the state in the opening of its testimony.

"(8) His honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'Human life is sacred. Mankind has been able to invent many wonderful things and do many wonderful things, but science has never yet been able to bring back a life that has been shut out. When once the spark has been put out, mankind has been helpless in all ages of the past to bring back or revivify man, and therefore, when any one takes human life, the law places upon that act a fearful penalty, unless it is done under certain circumstances'—the error being that this was no statement, or clarification, of any principle of law applicable to the issues in the case, and could and did only tend to confuse the minds of the jury, and tended to prejudice them against the defendant.

"(9) His honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'Manslaughter is usually defined as the taking of human life in sudden heat and passion and upon sufficient legal provocation, but even, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, where there is provocation, there is no right to kill, unless the circumstances are such as to justify the person in making the assault to believe that he had to act in self-defense, and I shall charge you on that'—the error being that said charge did not contain a sound proposition of law, was confusing, and tended to leave the jury with the impression that before a killing could be reduced from murder to manslaughter that the defendant would have to show that he struck the deceased in self-defense, and denied the defendant the full benefit of his plea of self-defense.

"(10) His honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'Self-defense is based upon necessity, and I charge you in the beginning that human life is so sacred, human life is so sweet, that no man has the right to assault or take human life, except that it is necessary to save himself from death or serious bodily harm; so that the whole defense, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, may be condensed into the one word "necessity." If it was not necessary to take human life, then it should not have been taken. If it was necessary and the other elements of self-defense were present, it is excusable, but it must be necessary'—the error being that the charge placed upon the defendant the burden of proving an absolute necessity for the taking of the life of the deceased, which the law does not require, in addition to the elements descriptive of self-defense, whereas the legal necessity is inclusive of all of the elements of self-defense.

"(11) His honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'To make out the plea, the person setting up the plea must prove by the greater weight of the evidence, first, that he was not at fault in bringing on the difficulty, and that is a reasonable rule. It complies with good common sense and justice, because why should a man bring on a difficulty and then, being placed in that difficulty that he brought on himself, it becomes necessary for him to take the life of the person, for him to come into court and say he had to kill in order to save his own life'—the error being: (a) Said charge did not state a sound proposition of law; (b) it was argumentative, the judge assuming the roll of advocate; (c) it tended to impress the jury with the idea that the court thought the defendant was not without fault; and (d) it was in effect a charge upon the facts.

"(12) His honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'I charge you further that a man cannot insult another and bring on a difficulty by words, or epithets, and then, after bringing on the difficulty, should he take the life of his assailant, he could not plead self-defense'—the error being that said charge was misleading in that it had no application to any issue involved in the case, and it tended to prejudice the jury against the defendant and to confuse them.

"(13) His honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'If you should find that the defendant has proven by the greater weight of the evidence, not beyond a reasonable doubt, but by the greater weight of the evidence, and that means his evidence of self-defense, you put it in the balances and weigh it, and that doesn't mean, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, that you should believe everything that every witness says or that you should swallow every circumstance that is detailed, but it is for you to weigh it,' etc.—the error being: (a) That said charge tended to impress the jury with the view that the judge did not believe the defendant's witnesses as to self-defense, as he did not use the same language or any similar language, but, to the contrary, in charging as to the state's burden in proving its case beyond a reasonable doubt; (b) it was in effect a charge upon the facts; and (c) it limited the jury to a consideration of the testimony of defendant's witnesses and excluded from the jury consideration of testimony from state's witnesses tending to establish the plea.

"(14) His honor erred in refusing to charge defendant's fourth request, as follows: 'If the jury find that the defendant was without fault in bringing on the difficulty, and that he actually believed that he was in such immediate danger of losing his life or sustaining serious bodily harm, that it was necessary for his own protection to take the life of the deceased, and if further in the opinion of the jury the circumstances in which the accused was placed were such as would justify such a belief in the mind of a person of ordinary reason and firmness, then a case of self-defense is fully made out, and the verdict should be not guilty'—the error being that said request contained a sound proposition of law which was applicable.

"(15) His honor erred in refusing to charge defendant's seventh request, as follows: 'To justify a homicide, or an assault and battery, the danger need not be actual if the accused acted on a reasonable appearance and belief of danger, where all elements of self-defense are present'—the error being that said request contained a sound proposition of law which was applicable.

"(16) His honor erred in refusing to charge defendant's eighth request, as follows: 'Where two men engage in a quarrel, and one of them appears to attempt to draw a pistol or other weapon, the other is not bound to wait until he finds out what he is going to do; for such delay might be fatal to his life'—the error being that said request contained a sound proposition of law that was applicable.

"(17) His honor erred in refusing to charge defendant's tenth request, as follows: 'If one without fault in bringing on the difficulty is assaulted by another apparently intending to do him grievous injury, and of that the jury are the judges, the one assaulted need not wait, but if, under the circumstances surrounding him, he actually believe that his life is in danger or that he is liable to suffer great bodily injury, and if the jury believe that a man of ordinary reason and firmness would have believed himself to be in such danger, and would have acted as the defendant did, then your verdict would be not guilty—the error being that said request contained a sound proposition of law which was applicable.

“(18) His honor erred in refusing to charge defendant's eleventh request, as follows: ‘The jury should not hold the defendant to the same calm and deliberate judgment which you are now able to exercise, but you should put a man of ordinary reason and firmness in his place at the time he fired the fatal shot and judge of the defendant's act situated as he was and confronted as he was at the time he fired the fatal shot, and decide if a man of ordinary reason and firmness would have acted likewise, remembering that the defendant had a perfect right to kill the deceased if he was without fault in bringing on the difficulty, and if appearances reasonably indicated that he was in danger of serious bodily harm, and if a person of ordinary reason and firmness would have had the same belief, and there was no probably safe means of escape’—the error being that said request contained a sound proposition of law which was applicable.

“(19) His honor erred in refusing to charge defendant's fourteenth request, as follows: ‘The jury is charged that, where a plea of self-defense is set up, the defendant is not required to establish such plea beyond a reasonable doubt, but only by the preponderance or greater weight of the testimony’—the error being that said request contained a sound proposition of law which was applicable.

“(20) His honor erred in refusing to charge defendant's fifteenth request, as follows: ‘That the jurors and each of them are required by law to give the prisoner the full benefit of all reasonable doubt; each juror to act on his own doubt, and not the doubt of another juror’—the error being that said request contained a sound proposition of law which was applicable.”

Geo. Bell Timmerman, of Lexington, and B. V. Chapman, of Newberry, for appellant.

H. S. Blackwell, Sol., and R. A. Cooper, both of Laurens, and George B. Cromer and Blease & Blease, all of Newberry, for respondent.

WATTS, J. [1] The defendant was tried under an indictment for murder of Langford at the fall term of the court of general sessions for Newberry county, 1916, before his honor Judge Peurifoy and a jury, and convicted of manslaughter. A motion for a new trial was made and refused, and sentence imposed upon the defendant. After sentence defendant appeals, and by 20 exceptions imputes error, and seeks reversal. These exceptions allege error in presenting the juror No. 17. We think that his honor was in error in presenting this juror, possibly as he had to sit in the coroner's jury at the inquest, and it is not good practice to allow a juror to sit as a petit juror in any case where he has been on the grand jury that returned the bill of indictment, or a coroner's jury, where the return is that the deceased came to his death by the party on trial, or where the juror has been on a panel that resulted in the court ordering a mistrial, or a new trial has been granted by the court after verdict rendered; but in the case at bar the presenting of the juror was not prejudicial, as defendant objected to the juror, and by so doing did not exhaust his peremptory challenges.

The jury was completed without the defendant having exhausted his peremptory challenges, and that excuses any error on the part of his honor in presenting the juror, and the exceptions complaining of error on the part of his honor in reference to this juror are overruled.

[2] The next exceptions to be considered are the exceptions that allege error on the part of his honor in the admission of evidence as dying declarations. The exceptions complaining of error in this particular are overruled. His honor had ample authority to rule as he did under numerous decisions of this court. State v. Johnson, 26 S. C. 155, 1 S. E. 510; State v. Bradley, 34 S. C. 136, 13 S. E. 315; State v. Lee, 58 S. C. 352, 36 S. E. 706; State v. Head, 60 S. C. 520, 39 S. E. 6; State v. Wideman, 96 S. E. 688.

[3] The next questions to be determined are the exceptions which allege the improper admission of evidence as part of the res gestæ. These exceptions are overruled under the authorities of State v. Arnold, 47 S. C. 13, 24 S. E. 926, 58 Am. St. Rep. 867; State v. Thomas, 103 S. C. 316, 88 S. E. 20; State v. Wideman, supra.

[4-7] The next exceptions complain of error in allowing the state to improperly introduce evidence in reply. This was a matter largely in the discretion of the circuit judge, and we see no erroneous exercise of that discretion. The safer practice is to ask the trial judge to be allowed to rebut any new matter that is brought out in reply, but in this case we cannot see that the defendant was prejudiced or deprived of any substantial right. These exceptions are overruled. The other exceptions complain of error on the part of his honor in charging the jury. Taking the charge in its entirety, we fail to see where the defendant was prejudiced to such an extent as to work reversal. He charged the jury in his own language the principles of law governing the case. All exceptions are overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

(112 S. C. 165)

STATE v. BOWEN et al. (No. 10178.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 5, 1919.)

1. EVIDENCE ⚡341—SHERIFF'S BOND—CERTIFIED COPY.

In an action against the sureties on a sheriff's bond, the admission of a certified copy of the bond in place of the original is proper in view of Civ. Code 1912, § 663, providing that such a copy shall be good and sufficient evidence.

2. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES ⚡169—ACTIONS ON BOND—EVIDENCE.

In an action on a sheriff's bond, proof that tax executions turned over to the sheriff were missing was sufficient prima facie to fix liability upon his bondsmen for them; it being the sheriff's duty to collect the executions or return them within 90 days.

3. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES ⚡169 — ACTIONS ON BOND—EVIDENCE.

In an action on a sheriff's bond for a shortage in the sheriff's account, where it appeared that the sheriff had held the same office for the previous term, it will be presumed that the default occurred during the last term, but such presumption may be rebutted.

4. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES ⚡157(2), 169 —ACTIONS ON BOND—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where a sheriff holds two succeeding terms of office, his bondsmen for the last term are not responsible for defalcations committed before the execution of his bond or during the first term, but the burden is upon them to prove that it was so committed.

5. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES ⚡171 — ACTION ON BONDS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action on a sheriff's bond, where it appeared that the sheriff had also held office during the previous term, and the evidence was susceptible of more than one inference as to the term wherein defalcation occurred, the question was for the jury.

6. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES ⚡157(2)—ACTION ON BONDS—LIABILITY OF SURETY FOR SUCCEEDING TERMS.

Where a sheriff has held office for two succeeding terms, and a shortage in his account appears, the bondsmen on the bond covering the last term, although not liable for the primary defalcation, may be liable for secondary default in the sheriff's failure to account for the money held at the beginning of the last term.

7. EVIDENCE ⚡423(5)—PAROL EVIDENCE—PRIMARY AND SECONDARY LIABILITY.

In an action against a sheriff's bondsmen, the question whether the liability of the sureties for the first or second term, as between themselves, is primary or secondary is not founded on contract, but is an equity which may be established by parol testimony.

8. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES ⚡166—ACTIONS ON BOND—PARTIES.

Where a sheriff has held succeeding terms of office, and a shortage appears in his accounts, the sureties on the bonds for both terms should be before the court in order that the rights, equities, and liabilities may be finally determined.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Kershaw County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

Action by the State of South Carolina against E. H. Bowen and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Cole L. Blease, of Columbia, and M. M. Johnson, of Camden, for appellants.

T. H. Peeples, Atty. Gen., C. N. Sapp, Asst. Atty. Gen., and Wade Hampton Cobb, Sol., of Columbia, for the State.

HYDRICK, J. This is an action against the sureties on the last official bond of the late W. W. Huckabee, as sheriff of Kershaw county. He was appointed in October, 1912, to fill an unexpired term, and was elected in November of the same year for a full term, and was commissioned January 1, 1913. He was re-elected, in November, 1916, and commissioned on February 8, 1917, having given the bond here sued on, dated February 1, 1917. He died in office April 18, 1917. On September 17, 1915, the county treasurer turned over to him tax executions for the year 1914, amounting to $11,319.94, and on May 2, 1916, executions for the year 1915, amounting to $11,777.44. On none of these executions did he ever make any return or report to the treasurer.

Upon investigation made after his death, it was found that he had collected $6,492.03 of the executions for 1914, and $4,426.45 of those for 1915, and that he had to his credit in bank $2,149.11, leaving a deficit of $8,769.37. It was also found that some of the executions that had been turned over to him were missing. These amounted to $591.13, making a total shortage of $9,360.50.

The defendants offered no testimony, and the Attorney General moved for a directed verdict for the amount of the shortage proved, contending that it should be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that the entire default occurred during the last term. To this defendants objected, and contended that the evidence adduced made an issue of fact for the jury whether the default occurred during the last or the term previous to the last, and that, if the jury should find that it occurred during the previous term, they would not be liable, but the liability would fall upon the sureties of the bond for that term. The court sustained the contention of the Attorney General and directed a verdict accordingly. From judgment thereon defendants appealed.

[1] There was no error in admitting a certified copy of the bond, instead of requiring production of the original. The statute (section 663, vol. 1, Code 1912) provides that such a copy shall be good and sufficient evidence.

[2] Nor was there error in holding that proof that executions that had been turned over to the sheriff were missing was sufficient prima facie to fix liability for them upon his bondsmen; for, according to the statute, it was the duty of the sheriff to collect the executions turned over to him, or return them to the treasurer, within 90 days, with his reasons for failing to do so. Therefore the burden was upon him and his bondsmen to account for them, or rebut the prima facie proof of liability in some way.

[3-5] But the court was in error in directing the verdict because the evidence made an issue of fact as to whether the defalcation occurred in the last term, or in the term previous to the last. While it is true, as held in State v. Edwards, 89 S. O. 224, 71 S. E. 826, that where an officer has held the same office for two or more terms, and is found short in his accounts, it will be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the default occurred during the last term; yet that is a presumption of fact, which may be rebutted. It arises from the duty of the officer to have in hand all the money which he ought to have at the beginning of his second term. Of course, the bondsmen of the last term are not responsible for a defalcation committed before the execution of their bond; but, in view of the presumption, the burden is upon them to prove that it was so committed. See State v. Edwards supra, and authorities cited. In this case there was evidence tending to show that the defalcation occurred during the previous term, and, as it was susceptible of more than one inference, that issue should have been submitted to the jury.

In State v. Causey, 93 S. C. 308, 76 S. E. 707, it was held that the failure of an officer to pay over money when required by statute, or on demand, pursuant to an order of court, is prima facie evidence of conversion at that time, and that he did not have such funds in his hands at the beginning of the succeeding term. The evidence in this case is that the executions were all turned over to the sheriff during the previous term. The statute (section 476, vol. 1, Code 1912) made it the duty of the sheriff to return all tax executions to the treasurer within 90 days after issue thereof, with his report thereon, and, on default, he was liable to prosecution and to an action on his official bond. The time within which he should have returned the executions, with his report thereon, expired long before the commencement of the last term. Therefore the evidence showed prima facie that the default occurred during the previous term. If so, the sureties on the bond for that term are at least primarily liable, and these defendants are only secondarily liable.

[6] As pointed out in State v. Causey, supra, the sureties on the last bond may be liable, as for a secondary default; that is, for the failure of the sheriff, at the beginning of his last term, to collect from himself, or the sureties on the bond of the previous term, the money which it was his duty to turn over to himself as his own successor. As was there said, if another person had succeeded to the office, this would have been his (the succeeding officer's) obvious duty, and the obligation is the same on one who succeeds himself. If, therefore, it should turn out that loss has occurred from the negligence of the sheriff to perform that duty, as, for instance, if it shall appear that the sureties on that bond have, in the meantime, become insolvent, then the sureties on the last bond would be liable, as for the secondary default.

[7, 8] But obviously that liability cannot be imposed upon them in this case, in the present state of the pleadings and parties; for no such default is alleged in the complaint, and the sureties on the bond of the previous term are not before the court. The sureties on both bonds have the right to be heard upon the issues arising as to their liability as between themselves. As was held in State v. Causey, the question whether the liability of the two sets of sureties, as between themselves is primary or secondary, is not founded on contract, but is an equity which may be established by parol testimony. It follows that the sureties on both bonds should be before the court, in order that the rights, equities, and liabilities of all parties may be finally determined.

The judgment of the circuit court is therefore reversed, and the case is remanded for a new trial, with leave to plaintiff to amend by bringing in the sureties on the previous bond and by alleging the secondary default mentioned.

Judgment reversed.

D. I. DUPONT DE NEMOURS & CO. v. TAYLOR.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 27, 1919.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT §286(40)—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether defendant was negligent in putting plaintiff to work on a tramroad car without notice of an overhead pipe which struck him held, under the evidence, for the jury.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT §289(27) — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether a servant was negligent in standing on a tramroad car and riding backwards when struck by an overhead pipe held, under the evidence, for the jury.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT §288(2)—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether a servant struck by an overhead pipe while riding on a tramroad car assumed the risk held, under the evidence, for the jury.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT §289(19)—KNOWLEDGE OF DANGER—EVIDENCE.

In action for injuries to a servant struck by an overhead pipe while riding on a tramroad car, held, under the evidence, that it could not be said as a matter of law that he knew or was chargeable with knowledge of the danger.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR §930(1)—REVIEWING EVIDENCE AS ON DEMURRER.

On review of verdict for plaintiff attacked as contrary to law and evidence, the truth of all of plaintiff's parol evidence and all inferences therefrom favorable to plaintiff is admitted, regardless of conflicting evidence of defendant.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR §930(1) — CONFLICTING TESTIMONY—DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE.

There being a conflict in the testimony on some of the subjects bearing on the issue whether plaintiff servant knew of or was chargeable with knowledge of danger, the testimony for plaintiff must prevail under the demurrer to the evidence rule.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR §999(3)—QUESTIONS CONCLUDED BY VERDICT.

Subject of imputed knowledge, having been submitted under instructions prepared by defendant company's counsel without objection on the part of plaintiff, is concluded by verdict for plaintiff servant.

8. TRIAL §296(3)—ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTION—CURE BY OTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

If instruction given at request of plaintiff was subject to objection that there was no evidence justifying embodying therein the idea that plaintiff servant had no opportunity of knowledge of any danger, defendant company was not harmed, where such feature of the case was fully and completely covered by instructions given at its request.

9. MASTER AND SERVANT §234(3)—"IMPUTED KNOWLEDGE."

It is only when men of ordinary prudence and observation would have observed, under like circumstances, that a servant's opportunity for knowledge can be held the equivalent of "imputed knowledge."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Imputed Knowledge.]

10. MASTER AND SERVANT §235(1)—NEGLIGENCE OF SERVANT—"NEGLIGENCE"—FAILURE TO OBSERVE.

Mere failure of a servant to observe, when there is no occasion for observation, is not "negligence."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Negligence.]

11. MASTER AND SERVANT §234(3)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—KNOWLEDGE OF DANGER.

It is only negligent ignorance that can be chargeable as the equivalent of knowledge on the part of a servant.

12. TRIAL §412—ERRORS IN ADMISSION OF TESTIMONY—WAIVER.

Defendant's objection to plaintiff's testimony that foreman instructed plaintiff "to take my men and get on the trucks," on the ground that it was not shown that foreman had authority to give such instruction, was waived by defendant proving by its principal witness that "he (plaintiff) was required to ride on the car at some place."

13. NEW TRIAL §74 — VERDICT — SETTING ASIDE.

The measure of damages in personal injury suits must be left to the judgment and discretion of an impartial jury, and no mere difference of opinion on the part of the trial judge will justify any interference with verdict, unless it appears that jury has been influenced by partiality or prejudice or has been misled by some mistaken view of the merits of the case.

14. DAMAGES ¶228—REDUCTION OF VERDICT—WHEN PERMISSIBLE.

If a verdict may be set aside as excessive, but is not so excessive as to evince passion, prejudice, or corruption, the plaintiff may be put upon terms to accept a reduced amount, though there is no measure of damages.

15. DAMAGES ¶228—REDUCTION OF VERDICT—CONSENT OF DEFENDANT.

It is not necessary that the losing party consent to remitter.

16. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶162(1)—SURRENDER OF RIGHT TO APPEAL—ACCEPTANCE OF VERDICT FOR REDUCED AMOUNT.

In view of Acts 1906, c. 167, the plaintiff does not surrender his right of appeal by accepting a judgment for a reduced amount provided it is done under protest.

17. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶1004(3) — JUDGMENT FOR REDUCED AMOUNT.

Judgment will be affirmed on appeal as reduced upon the presumption of its correctness, in the absence of evidence to the contrary; but when the evidence certified shows that the verdict is not so excessive as to warrant the belief that jury was influenced by partiality, prejudice, or corruption, or has been misled by some mistaken view of the merits of the case and also fails to disclose any standard by which trial court could have measured reduction, remitter will be set aside.

Prentiss, J., dissenting in part.

Error to Circuit Court, Prince George County.

Action by A. B. Taylor against the E. I. Dupont De Nemours & Company. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error, plaintiff assigning cross-error on action of trial court requiring him to make a release of $2,000 of the verdict and accept judgment for $8,000. Affirmed, and additional judgment for plaintiff for amount which he was required to release.

Charles E. Plummer and J. Gordon Bohannan, both of Petersburg, for plaintiff in error.

S. M. Brandt, of Norfolk, and R. B. Willcox, Jr., of Petersburg, for defendant in error.

BURKS, J. The plaintiff, A. B. Taylor, a servant of the defendant company, recovered a judgment against the defendant for $8,000 damages, claimed to have been sustained by reason of negligence of the defendant company. To that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

[1-8] The plaintiff was put to work loading gun cotton to be transported from one point to another in the defendant's plant. The cotton was hauled along a tramroad, above which there was a line of pipe. The plaintiff was struck and knocked down, and received the injury complained of. He claims that the place at which he was placed to work was not safe by reason of the fact that the pipe line was too low to admit his safe passage under it, while standing on the car on which the cotton was being transported, and that he had no knowledge of this fact and was not informed thereof by the defendant company. The defendant claims that the place was reasonably safe, as the plaintiff knew or was chargeable with knowledge of the height of the pipe line; that he assumed the risk, and was, furthermore, guilty of such contributory negligence as barred his recovery. Counsel for the company (plaintiff in error) have argued these defenses with their usual ability, and have cited many authorities to sustain their position. The case, however, lies within narrow limits, and the law is not difficult of application. The questions to be determined were: (1) Was the company negligent, under the circumstances, in putting Taylor to work without notice of the low overhead pipe line; and (2) was Taylor negligent in standing on the truck and riding backwards; or (3) did he assume the risk. These were questions of fact to be determined by the jury under proper instructions from the court.

It is apparently conceded that the defendant was negligent unless the place at which Taylor was put to work was reasonably safe, "considering the character of the work and the manner in which it was directed to be done"; but whether conceded or not we are of opinion that such is the law. All of the defenses tendered, therefore, were dependant for success upon showing that Taylor knew, or was chargeable with knowledge, of danger from the overhead pipe line, and the evidence was directed to this situation.

The defendant recognized from the beginning that in order to escape liability it was necessary for it to establish the plaintiff's knowledge, actual or imputed, of the danger to which he would be subjected in the discharge of his duties. It was the foundation upon which rested, not only the defenses of assumption of risk and contributory negligence, but also the defense that the defendant had furnished the plaintiff a reasonably safe place in which to work. This is made manifest from the petition for the writ of error. It begins, in effect, by announcing the following proposition:

"As a basis for the consideration of the affirmative defenses of assumption of the risk and contributory negligence, in detail, it is submitted that the plaintiff knew or was charged with knowledge of conditions that affected his safety as an employé."

After a very full and able discussion of the evidence and of the law applicable thereto, it closes with this statement:

"The same evidence is relied upon to establish the first proposition asserted as a ground for setting aside the verdict of the jury, viz., that the place at which the plaintiff was at work was reasonably safe, considering the character of the work, and the manner in which it was directed to be done."

[4] Of course, if the foundation falls, the superstructure must go with it. The crucial question, therefore, was and is: Did the plaintiff know, or was he chargeable with knowledge, of the danger to which he was subjected, and which resulted in the injury complained of?

[5] It must be borne in mind that the company stands here as on a demurrer to the evidence interposed by it, thereby admitting the truth of all of the plaintiff's parol evidence, and all inferences therefrom favorable to the plaintiff, which a jury might fairly draw, and as waiving all of its own evidence in conflict therewith, and all inferences from the latter, except those which necessarily flow therefrom. Viewed from this standpoint, the jury might have reasonably found, as facts, the following:

Taylor was a man 38 years old, and was first employed by the defendant as a night policeman, in July, 1915, and continued this work until some time in September, when he was discharged for going to sleep while on duty. About October 1, 1915, he was again employed by the defendant, this time as labor foreman, and continued in this position until he was injured December 20, 1915. His duties, at first as night policeman and afterwards as labor foreman, carried him over a very large part of the plant. He went wherever he was ordered to go, and this carried him practically all over the plant, except the portion where he was injured. He testifies that he had never been in this part of the plant before, and was not familiar with it. There were tramroads for transporting different kinds of materials running through many places in the plant. There were, also, overhead pipe lines throughout the plant, and these crossed the tramroads at many points, possibly as high as 25 or 30 in the plant in which the plaintiff was injured. Electric motors, pulling low platform trucks, were operated over these tramroads. The tramroad on which the plaintiff was hurt, and the pipe line over it, were new lines of comparatively recent construction, one witness placing their completion at about two weeks before the accident, and the building to which the plaintiff was to transport gun cotton was new and not entirely completed. The cotton was being transported to it for the first time on the day the plaintiff was injured. The plaintiff was put to the work of transporting gun cotton from No. 1 Purification House, to No. 6 Purification House, about 5 or 5:30 o'clock, on December 20, 1915. He was instructed to load the cotton on the trucks, and, after it was so loaded, to take his men and get on the trucks and carry the cotton to its destination. The train he was loading consisted of a small electric motor and five trucks. The deck or platform of these trucks was about 2 feet, 2½ inches above the top of the rail. Between the point of loading and discharge of the cotton, there was an overhead line 6 feet, 10½ inches above the rail of the track, so that between the deck or platform of the truck, and the overhead pipe line, there was a space of only 4 feet, 8 inches. Of the existence of this overhead pipe line, the plaintiff had no knowledge, and was given no information. The gun cotton was being transported in tin cans between 3 and 4 feet high, and containing about 100 pounds each. There was no guard rail, or other appliance on the trucks to prevent these cans from falling off. After loading the cotton on the trucks, the plaintiff, with his men, got on the trucks and started to Purification House No. 6. After going some little distance, one of the cans fell off the truck, and the train proceeded some little distance before the motorman got notice to stop and have it replaced. Finding it difficult to communicate with the motorman speedily, the plaintiff stood on the motor, next to the motorman, with his back in the direction in which the train was going, so that he could easily see if a can, or any of the men, fell off the trucks, and, if so, reach back and touch the motorman, and notify him to stop at once. This position was taken by the plaintiff for that purpose. After proceeding some little distance in this position, and while the train was moving at a rate of 2 or 3 miles an hour, he was struck by the overhead pipe and knocked down upon the track, and received the injury of which he complains. This injury was not only painful, but was serious and permanent in its nature. There is no evidence as to the height of any of the other pipe lines in the plant above the ground, nor is there any evidence that the other lines were of similar construction overhead to the one which inflicted the injury. For aught that appears in the testimony, the pipe that struck the plaintiff was the only one of low construction in the plant. The plaintiff was required, with his men, to ride on the truck carrying the cotton, in order to be present to unload it when it reached its destination. He denies that he had any other instruction as to how, or where, he was to ride, except as hereinbefore stated or any knowledge of the existence of the overhead pipe which inflicted his injury, or that he was informed thereof. It is testified to by a witness for the defendant that it was "The general order in that plant, all over it, for nobody to ride standing upon the motor. Everybody understood it." But there is no evidence that this general order was either published, or brought to the attention of the plaintiff, and the statement that everybody understood it was, manifestly, only the expression of opinion of the witness.

[6] On some of the subjects above mentioned, there is a conflict of testimony; but, under the demurrer to evidence rule, the testimony for the plaintiff must prevail.

Upon this testimony, it cannot be said as a matter of law that Taylor knew or was chargeable with knowledge of the danger to which he was exposed, and which caused his injury. It was a question of fact to be determined by the jury under proper instruction from the court. The trial court was extremely liberal to the company in the matter of instruction. It gave every instruction requested on its behalf, in all 13. These instructions covered every phase of the case, warranted by the evidence, that able and ingenious counsel could suggest, and yet the jury found for the plaintiff. We are unable to say that the verdict on these questions is either without evidence to support it, or that it is plainly contrary to the evidence.

[7, 8] We do not deem it necessary to discuss further than is hereinafter done the subject of imputed knowledge so ably presented by counsel for the company, as that question was submitted to the jury under instructions prepared by such counsel, without objection on the part of the plaintiff, and is concluded by the verdict. The verdict likewise concluded the question of the negligence of the defendant in the method of constructing its pipe lines and the alleged contributory negligence of the plaintiff in riding backwards. The granting of instruction A on behalf of the plaintiff is likewise assigned as error. This instruction is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that it was the duty of the defendant to use ordinary care to furnish to the plaintiff a reasonably safe place for the performance by the plaintiff of the work of his employment; if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant failed to use ordinary care to furnish the plaintiff a reasonably safe place for the performance of the work of his employment and as a direct consequence and result of said failure the plaintiff was injured without fault on his part and without knowledge of or opportunity of knowledge of any danger, then the jury must find for the plaintiff."

The objection urged to the instruction is that there is no evidence to justify the court in embodying in the instruction the idea that the plaintiff had no opportunity of knowledge of any danger; the view of the defendant being that the plaintiff not only had opportunity to know of the danger, but that his knowledge of general conditions were such as to impute to him actual knowledge thereof. If there was any error in this respect, it was harmless, and the jury could not have been misled thereby, as this feature of the case was fully and completely covered by instructions 11 and 12 given at the instance of the defendant.

[9-11] Much has been said in the argument about "opportunity for knowledge," as though it were always the equivalent of imputed knowledge. But such is not the case. It is only when men of ordinary prudence and observation would have observed under like circumstances that it can be so construed. Mere failure to observe when there is no occasion for observation is not negligence. It is only negligent ignorance that can be chargeable as the equivalent of knowledge. Knowledge of general conditions will not comprehend a particular danger, where men of ordinary care and prudence, placed in the same circumstances, and using their faculties in the usual way, would not have apprehended such danger. If the failure to observe, however, amounts to negligence, then observation will be imputed. Such was the case of Lindsay v. New York, etc., R. Co., 112 Fed. 384, 50 C. C. A. 298, where a brakeman, who has been continuously employed in a railroad yard for over nine months, was injured by falling into a drain which, with 118 other similar drains, had existed in the yard during the whole time of his employment, and Ragon v. Toledo, etc., R. Co., 97 Mich. 265, 56 N. W. 612, 37 Am. St. Rep. 336, where a brakeman who had been employed for a long while, and during all that time had walked over the railroad yard, was injured by stepping into an unfilled space between the ties of a railroad, plainly obvious, and with which the plaintiff was, or ought to have been, familiar, and Green v. Cross, 79 Tex. 130, 15 S. W. 220, where a section hand knew of just such defects in the railroad track, as the one which caused his injury, and continued his employment without notice to the master. Many other cases to the same effect might be cited. In all this class of cases, however, there was something to bring the defect to the attention of the party injured. Some occasion to observe, or the circumstances were such that a man of ordinary care and prudence would have observed. But in the case at bar, where we are required to draw all inferences favorable to the plaintiff which a jury might fairly draw, and to reject all inferences from the defendant's evidence favorable to it, except those which necessarily flow therefrom, we cannot infer that the plaintiff had knowledge of the height of the overhead pipe lines from the ground, in the absence of any evidence of the height of such pipe lines. He had never ridden on one of these trucks before. His previous employment had required him to walk about different parts of the plant, and, while he may have observed the fact that there were overhead pipe lines at various points in the plant, there is no evidence that they interfered in any way with the discharge of his duties, or subjected him to any danger, or that there was any occasion for him to observe their height. If, as a matter of fact, the other overhead crossings were as low as the one which caused the injury complained of, it does not appear from the evidence, and we certainly cannot infer a knowledge of conditions which are not shown to have existed.

[12] While the plaintiff was being examined as a witness as to the instructions he had received immediately before the accident and by whom they were given, he was permitted to testify that Westcott was the foreman through whom he received his orders, that Westcott sent him to Bethel for instructions as to the particular job and the manner of doing it, and that, when he got to the place where the work was to be done, Bethel pointed out a foreman, whose name Taylor did not know, and said the foreman would tell him how to handle the cotton and what to do with it, and this foreman instructed him to load gun cotton on the trucks, and "to take my men and get on the trucks, and that the motorman knew the route; that he would carry me to the building." Objection was made to allowing the witness to give in evidence the statement above quoted, as it was not shown that the foreman was authorized to give any such instructions. The objection, if ever valid, was waived by the defendant proving the same fact by its principal witness. Westcott, who in his examination in chief by the defendant's counsel, and in response to a direct question from him, stated that "he was required to ride on the car at some place." That was the only issue. Taylor v. Mallory, 96 Va. 18, 30 S. E. 472; Va. & S. W. R. Co. v. Bailey, 103 Va. 205, 49 S. E. 33; Norfolk Ry. & L. Co. v. Spratley, 103 Va. 379, 49 S. E. 502; Worrell v. Kinnear Mfg. Co., 103 Va. 719, 49 S. E. 988, 2 Ann. Cas. 997.

There was no error in the rulings of the trial court on other questions involving the admissibility of evidence. These objections have been considered, but they are of minor importance, involving no question of general interest, and need no discussion.

[13] It is assigned as error that the verdict for $10,000 was excessive, and that the error was not cured by requiring the plaintiff to release $2,000, of it, and accept a judgment for $8,000; and the plaintiff assigns as cross-error the action of the trial court in requiring him to make the release. Acts 1906, p. 251. It must be admitted that the evidence would have warranted a verdict for a much smaller amount, and if the jury had so found we could not have disturbed their verdict; but if the statements contained in the testimony on behalf of the plaintiff be accepted as facts, as they must be, there is ample testimony to sustain the verdict. There is no measure of damages in cases of this kind, and there has not yet been discovered any standard by which to measure in dollars and cents the value of physical pain and suffering. It is a matter which must be left to the judgment and discretion of an impartial jury, and no mere difference of opinion of the trial judge, however, decided, will justify an interference with their verdict, unless it appears from the record that the jury has been influenced by partiality or prejudice, or has been misled by some mistaken view of the merits of the case. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Shott, 92 Va. 34, 22 S. E. 811; Hoffman v. Shartle, 113 Va. 262, 74 S. E. 171. What was said by this court in Southern R. Co. v. Smith, 107 Va. 553-560, 59 S. E. 372, 375, is peculiarly applicable to this case. It was there said:

"It is true that $15,000 is a larger verdict than we usually encounter as an award of damages for the loss of an arm; but this furnishes no warrant for our interference with the finding. The question to be considered is, not whether this court, if acting in the place of the jury, would give more or less than the amount of the verdict, but whether the damage awarded by the jury is so large or so small as to indicate that the jury has acted under the impulse of some undue motive, some gross error, or misconception of the subject. There is no rule of law fixing the measure of damages in such cases, and it cannot be reached by any process of computation. It is therefore the established rule, settled by numerous decisions extending from Farish & Co. v. Reigle, 11 Grat. [52 Va.] 697, 62 Am. Dec. 686, to the recent case of N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Carr, 106 Va. 508, 56 S. E. 276, that this court will not disturb the verdict of the jury, unless the damages are so excessive as to warrant the belief that the jury must have been influenced by partiality or prejudice, or have been misled by some mistaken view of the merits of the case. The record in the case at bar furnishes no suggestion that the jury were influenced by partiality or prejudice, or by any misconception of the merits of the case; nor is there anything to indicate that they were not moved to their conclusion from a sense of right and justice."

[14] There has been much difference of opinion among the courts, in the absence of a statute, as to the right of the court to put the plaintiff, in an action of tort, upon terms to accept a verdict for a reduced amount without the consent of the defendant. In England it has been held by the House of Lords that an appellate court had no power, without the consent of both parties, to put the plaintiff upon terms to accept a reduced amount, because it substituted the judgment of the court for the verdict of the jury, and was therefore an invasion of the defendant's right of a trial by jury. Watt v. Watt, L. R. App. Cas. (1906) 115, overruling Belt v. Lawes (1884) 12 Q. B. D. 356. There are sim-liar holdings in a number of the states. See note 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1075. But the decided weight of authority is to the effect that if the verdict may be set aside as excessive, but it is not so excessive as to evince passion, prejudice, or corruption, the plaintiff may be put upon terms to accept a reduced amount, although there is no measure of the damages, and, if he accepts it, the defendant cannot complain. But it is only in such case that the reduction can be made. See cases cited in notes 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1067; Northern P. R. Co. v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 642, 6 Sup. Ct. 590, 29 L. Ed. 755; Arkansas Cattle Co. v. Mann, 130 U. S. 69, 9 Sup. Ct. 458, 32 L. Ed. 854. The basis of this holding is that, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, he is not compelled to accept the reduced amount, but may decline it and accept the alternative of a new trial, and hence is not deprived of his trial by jury, but, if he accepts, he is bound by his acceptance and thus far waives a jury trial and cannot appeal; and, so far as the defendant is concerned, he has had his trial by jury whose adverse finding has been reduced in his favor, without impairing any other defenses he may have had. Such was the law in this state prior to the adoption of the act of 1906. Burks' Pl. & Pr. § 300, and cases cited.

[15-17] It is not necessary in this state that the losing party should consent to the remitter. James River Co. v. Adams, 17 Grat. (58 Va.) 435. But by the act of 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 251) the plaintiff is no longer deprived of his right of appeal. He does not surrender his right of appeal by accepting a judgment for the reduced amount, provided it is done under protest, but retains his right to insist on the verdict of the jury and to contest the correctness of the judgment of the trial court in reducing it. When the case reaches this court, it will affirm the judgment, upon the presumption of its correctness, in the absence of evidence to the contrary; but when the evidence is certified, and it appears that the verdict is not so excessive as to warrant the belief that the jury were influenced by partiality, prejudice, or corruption, or have been misled by some mistaken view of the merits of the case, and it also fails to disclose any standard by which the trial court could have measured the reduction, this court will uphold the verdict of the jury, because it is the tribunal appointed by law to ascertain the damages sustained. Neither the trial court nor this court can act arbitrarily in the matter. It is the peculiar province of the jury to decide such cases under proper instructions from court, and the court cannot substitute its judgment for the verdict of the jury. See cases cited in 2 Sutherland on Damages, § 459. The Legislature has evinced an intention to limit the discretionary power of the trial court, not only by the act aforesaid, but also by the act forbidding directed verdict. Acts 1912, p. 52. If this conclusion is likely to lead to bad results, the appeal should be made to the Legislature, which has placed a limit on the amount of recovery in case of death resulting from the wrongful act or neglect of another, and has likewise fixed the amount of compensation to be paid by employers to their servants who are injured in the service.

In the case at bar, we can perceive no guide by which the trial court could have measured the reduction made, and, while reluctant to interfere with the wise practice of permitting trial courts to reduce verdicts to amounts deemed reasonable and proper, we feel constrained to do so when there is no standard by which such reduction can be measured and the verdict is not plainly without evidence to support it. The judgment of the trial court in favor of the plaintiff for $8,000 will be affirmed, and this court will, in addition thereto, enter a judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant for the further sum of $2,000, with legal interest thereon from the 21st day of June, 1917, the date of the verdict, in accordance with the statute in relation to releases, in such case made and provided.

Affirmed, and additional judgment for amount remitted.

PRENTIS, J. (dissenting). I concur without hesitation in the affirmation of the judgment of the trial court for $8,000. I am constrained, however, to dissent from the conclusion of the majority to enter an additional judgment for $2,000 in favor of the plaintiff.

By the decided weight of authority, trial judges are vested with discretionary power to require a plaintiff to remit a part of his recovery, as ascertained by the verdict of a jury, or else submit to a new trial, in personal injury cases. 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1075, note. The statute (Acts 1906, p. 251), which authorizes a review of that discretion by this court, was not intended either to take away or to diminish that power. Indeed, its existence is thereby expressly recognized. A verdict then which has been disapproved, and which comes to this court without the sanction of the trial judge, has no such sanctity as that which properly attaches to a verdict which is approved by him. While it is true that there are no scales by which to measure human suffering, and the verdicts of juries in personal injury cases are generally approved, still there is a standard, based upon the common or average judgment of mankind, which sanctions and approves large verdicts for serious injuries and smaller verdicts for slight injuries. That standard is recognized by the act limiting the recovery to $10,000 where a negligent injury results in death, and by the amounts fixed in the Virginia Workmen's Compensation Act (Acts 1918, p. 637), under which the maximum recovery is $4,000. It is also manifested in the verdicts which juries generally return, and which trial judges generally approve, for such injuries. In my opinion, all that the act of 1906 intended was to confer jurisdiction on this court to review the action of the trial courts where the verdict is reduced and the plaintiff accepts such reduction under protest. This court then should carefully weigh the evidence in such cases, bearing in mind the fact that the trial judge both saw and heard the plaintiff and his witnesses, and with the usual presumption in favor of the correctness of the judgment under review, and, unless it is clear that the trial judge has abused the discretion vested in him to prevent what seems to him to be an injustice, this court should approve his action.

"There is always a fair presumption that the verdict of the jury is correct, and when the judge who presides at the trial, who has heard all the evidence, witnessed all the proceedings, and the manner of conducting the cause before the jury, is satisfied with the verdict and refuses to set it aside, an appellate court which cannot have an equal opportunity for forming a just judgment ought not to interfere without the strongest reasons for doing so. 'On the other hand,' as was said by Judge Baldwin in Patterson v. Ford, 2 Gratt. 19, 25, 'when the judge' (who presided at the trial) 'is dissatisfied with the verdict and grants a new trial, some latitude must be allowed to his discretion; especially where the propriety of its exercise is affirmed by a verdict on such new trial for the party to whom it was granted.' In setting aside the verdict the trial court must to some extent pass upon the weight of the evidence before the jury; and a stronger case must be made in order to justify an appellate court in disturbing an order granting a new trial, than where it has been refused. The reason usually assigned for this rule is that the refusal to grant a new trial operates as a final adjudication of the rights of the parties, while the granting of the new trial simply invites further investigation, and affords an opportunity for showing the truth without concluding either party. Barton's Law Pr. 725, 726; Ruffner v. Hill, 31 West Va. 428, 431, 432 [7 S. E. 13]."
Chapman v. Va. Real Estate Co., 96 Va. 177, 188, 31 S. E. 74, 78.

"It would, indeed, be a futile and idle thing for the law to give to a court supervisory authority over the proceedings and the manner of conducting a cause before the jury, and the right to set aside the verdict of the jury therein because contrary to the evidence, unless the judge vested with such power could consider to some extent at least the evidence in the cause. * * *" Cardwell v. Norfolk & Western Ry. Co., 114 Va. 500, 506, 77 S. E. 612, 614.

In this case, under the evidence, I think that the trial judge properly reduced the verdict, and that it should not be increased beyond the amount approved by him, $8,000.

RUFFNER et al. v. BROWN et al.*
(No. 3695.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 25, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. POWERS ⇐34(2)—"WRITTEN INSTRUMENT SIGNED, SEALED AND ACKNOWLEDGED"—HOLOGRAPHIC WILL.

A power of appointment, to be exercised by "a written instrument signed, sealed and acknowledged," is well executed by a holographic will of the person in whom the power was vested, making disposition of the subject-matter thereof, by virtue of section 4 of chapter 77 of the Code of 1913 (sec. 3869).

2. POWERS ⇐34(2)—EXECUTION—"WRITTEN INSTRUMENT SIGNED, SEALED AND ACKNOWLEDGED."

It being doubtful whether such a power included in the general terms of said statute can be excepted from their operation, upon any ground recognized by the rules of construction, and the statute itself having been adopted by the Legislature of Virginia from the English Wills Act, 1 Vict. c. 26, § 10, before the organization of this state, and after it had been construed by an English court, as authorizing execution of a power of appointment so given by will, without compliance with prescribed formalities beyond those required by the statute, it is held to be within the statute, notwithstanding subsequent English decisions to the contrary.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

3. POWERS ⇐34(2)—EXECUTION—DEED OR WILL—"WRITTEN INSTRUMENT SIGNED, SEALED, AND ACKNOWLEDGED."

A power of appointment to be exercised by "a written instrument signed, sealed and acknowledged" may be exercised either by deed or will, as a will need not always be acknowledged, though it may be, and sometimes must be, under Code 1913, c. 77, § 3 (sec. 3868).

Williams, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Suit by Joseph Ruffner and others, executors, etc., against E. Fontaine Brown and others. From the decree defendants Maria Brown and others appeal. Affirmed.

Leo Loeb, of Charleston, for appellants.
W. G. Mathews, El. B. Dyer, and Morgan Owen, all of Charleston, for appellee E. Fontaine Brown.

Malcolm Jackson, of Charleston, for appellees Ann Conway Powers and others.

POFFENBARGER, J. If the trusts created by one of the deeds hereinafter described were impliedly revoked and annulled by the exercise of the power of appointment reserved in it to the grantor, there will be no occasion for consideration of the many assignments of error founded upon theories of construction of that deed. The legal basis of the decree giving effect to the will purporting revocation of the trusts, against which the appellants claim title, is not indicated. The learned judge of the trial court may have treated the execution thereof as having wrought such revocation, or he may have construed the deed as having vested complete beneficial ownership of the lands conveyed by it in the grantor, by reservation, and made it possible for him to devise them without having revoked the trusts. Both grounds are urged by counsel for the appellees, in resistance of the attack upon the decree appealed from.

By a deed dated January 14, 1903, Thomas L. Broun and Mary M. Broun, his wife, conveyed to Fontaine Broun and Angus W. McDonald, trustees, certain real estate situated in Boone and Kanawha counties, and consisting of a tract of 2,000 acres and undivided interests in several other tracts, equivalent in all to about 5,000 acres, upon the following terms: For the use and benefit of the wife for the joint lives of herself and her husband; the husband for his life, in case he should survive the wife; their three children in fee, subject to a provision for the wife, in case she should survive the husband; the children in fee without incumbrance, after the death of the husband, he having survived the wife, and McDonald, trustee, being required equally to convey the land to one of them and trustees for the others.

This deed, however, contained indisputable powers of revocation and appointment, which the husband, after the death of his wife, admittedly and effectively exercised by joining one of the trustees, Angus W. McDonald, in the execution of another deed, dated June 10, 1911, by which the lands granted by the deed of January 14, 1903, and other lands, making an aggregate of about 10,000 acres, were conveyed to four trustees, E. Fontaine Broun, Charles M. Broun, Philip S. Powers, and C. Beverly Broun. In this deed he was the party of the first part, Angus W. McDonald, trustee, party of the second part, and the four trustees just named, parties of the third part. It recited the powers of revocation and appointment reserved by the former deed, and conveyed the lands granted by it from Angus W. McDonald, trustee, to Thomas L. Broun, by direction of the latter, who then made the conveyance to the parties of the third part, in four equal parts, subject to reservations, for the use and benefit of his three children and numerous collateral relatives, one undivided fourth going to each child and the other to the collateral relatives. He reserved an estate in the lands for his life, with power to sell timber on them and to lease them for coal, oil, gas, and other minerals, or for any purpose whatsoever, and to apply the proceeds to his own use or to such other uses as he might desire, or as by his will he might designate, and to subject the land, timber, and minerals to any and all charges he might see fit to make by his last will and testament. This deed also contained a reservation of power to revoke and appoint, reading as follows:

"But this conveyance and each and every trust, use, benefit, and estate hereinbefore declared, created or set forth, is upon and subject to the express condition and understanding that the said Thomas L. Broun, may, for his own benefit, and for the benefit of any person or object he may select, at any time, and as often as he shall see fit, and according to his will and pleasure, by a written instrument, signed, sealed and acknowledged by him, revoke, annul, alter, amend or make any substitution for the trusts, uses, benefits, and the estates hereinbefore declared or set forth, or any part thereof, either as to the whole of said real estate or any part thereof."

By an instrument signed, sealed, and acknowledged by him and dated May 8, 1912, Thomas L. Broun made some alterations of the deed of April 10, 1911, among which was one giving his collateral kindred only proceeds of the sale of the lands and timber and rentals and royalties arising from the lands. Charles M. Broun, Philip S. Powers, and E. Fontaine Broun, trustees, were given title to all of the land, but C. Beverly Broun, trustee, was authorized to receive one-fourth of the proceeds of sales of land and timber and the rents and royalties for distribution among the collateral kindred. This instrument repeated the reservation of power of revocation and appointment. It also provided that all donations, contributions, and bequests made by any will or any codicil of said Thomas L. Broun should be parts of the deed of April 10, 1911.

Under the reservations of power above mentioned, Thomas L. Broun either revoked the powers of the trustees and materially altered the dispositions of property made by the deed of April 10, 1911, and the instrument dated May 8, 1912, or modified them as to such dispositions, without abrogation of the powers of the trustees, by his will appointing Joseph Ruffner and Robert E. McCabe executors and giving all of the lands to Louise Fontaine Jackson, Edward Fontaine Broun, and Ann Conway Powers, his three children. The will was dated August 13, 1913, and admitted to probate March 30, 1914.

[3] That the power reserved could be exercised either by will or by deed is put beyond question by the authorities. The designated means of execution thereof is "a written instrument signed, sealed and acknowledged." That may be either a will or a deed, for both are written instruments. A will need not always be acknowledged, but it may be, and sometimes must be. Code, c. 77, § 3 (sec. 3868). There is language in the reservation clause that may import intent to require execution of the power by an instrument taking effect in the lifetime of Thomas L. Broun, which would exclude right to execute it by a will taking effect at the moment of his death; but such a limitation would arise only by implication, an unnecessary implication which the rules of construction do not permit. Graham v. Graham, 23 W. Va. 36, 38, 48 Am. Rep. 364; Beard v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 130, 136; Earle v. Coberly, 65 W. Va. 163, 64 S. E. 628, 17 Ann. Cas. 479; Boisseau v. Aldridges, 5 Leigh (Va.) 222, 27 Am. Dec. 590; Sutherland v. Sydnor, 84 Va. 880, 6 S. E. 480. "The mere question whether a will comes within the words instrument in writing has long ago been decided in the affirmative, and there is neither decision or dictum throwing any doubt on that." Sir R. T. Kindersley, Vice Chancellor, in Orange v. Pickford, 4 Drew. 363, 62 Eng. Reprint, 140. "If a power be created to be executed by a deed or instrument in writing, although the words seem to indicate instruments inter vivos only, yet it is settled that it may be well executed by will." Lord Chancellor Westbury in Taylor v. Meads, 4 De G. J. & S. 597, 46 Eng. Reprint, 1050. "It is quite well settled that a power to be executed by an instrument in writing may be executed by a will, that being an instrument in writing." Lord Romilly, M. P., in Smith v. Adkins, L. R. 14 Eq. Cas. 402. A power to revoke by any writing under hand and seal and to appoint new uses by the same or any other deed is well executed by a will. Countess of Roscommon v. Fowke, decided on appeal by the High Court of Parliament, 6 Bro. 158, 2 Eng. Reprint, 998. [1, 2] Whether a power to be executed by an instrument in writing could be well executed by a will, without compliance with requirements as to form and solemnity beyond those imposed by the statute of wills, has been decided both affirmatively and negatively in England. In Buckell v. Blenkhorn, 5 Hare, 131, 67 Eng. Reprint, 857, and Collard v. Sampson, 16 Beav. 543, it was held that the power could be so executed. Upon an appeal, the latter was reversed by a judgment delivered by Lord Justice Turner, 4 De G. M. & G. 224, 43 Eng. Reprint, 493. About a year later, 1854, the question arose again in West v. Ray, Kay, 385, 69 Eng. Reprint, 163, and was negatively disposed of. This was followed by a like decision in Taylor v. Meads, 4 De G. J. & S. 597, 46 Eng. Reprint, 1050. There can be no doubt, therefore, that the present English construction of the statute excludes the operation of this will as an exercise of the power, if acknowledgment of the instrument is a substantial requirement and has not been complied with. The will is signed and sealed, but it bears no certificate of acknowledgment or other proof thereof.

Section 4 of chapter 77 of our Code (sec. 3869) is substantially the same as section 10 of the English Wills Act, 1 Vict. C. 26. Our statute was taken from the English Wills Act, after the decision in Buckell v. Blenkhorn, rendered in 1846, and before that rendered in Collard v. Sampson on appeal, in 1853. It was incorporated into the Virginia Code of 1849. Hence, strictly speaking, it was borrowed and adopted as construed in Buckell v. Blenkhorn, and falls within the rule that a statute borrowed from another jurisdiction is to be taken in the sense of the construction put upon it in the foreign jurisdiction, at the date of its adoption. The later English decisions giving it a different construction are merely persuasive. N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Old Dom. Baggage Co., 99 Va. 111, 37 S. E. 784, 50 L. R. A. 722; Danville v. Pace, 25 Grat. (Va.) 1, 18 Am. Rep. 663; Doswell v. Buchanan's Ex'rs, 3 Leigh (Va.) 365, 379, 23 Am. Dec. 280.

The rule of construction just referred to rests upon presumption, of course, and may not be absolutely binding upon the courts of the adopting state. In the case of the adoption of a statute of a foreign jurisdiction before its construction has been fully determined by the courts of such jurisdiction, there might be good reason for adoption of the construction ultimately and finally put upon it by the courts of its origin.

There is some technical force in the later English decisions, repudiating the doctrine of Buckell v. Blenkhorn. Wills, not powers of appointment, constitute the subject-matter of the statute. The latter fall within the scope of the act in so far only as they are created by will or susceptible of execution by will. Powers not created by will nor susceptible of such execution do not fall within it at all, either wholly or partially. Being in derogation of the common law and in restraint of liberty, the statute falls under the rule of strict construction. Although these two propositions are not referred to in the opinions, the great jurists who rendered the decisions evidently had them in mind and founded their conclusions largely upon them. In Collard v. Sampson, Lord Justice Turner said:

"The question is, What is the meaning of the words 'power of appointment by will,' contained in that section—whether it embraces every case in which a power of appointment may be exercised by will, or applies only to cases in which the power is in terms given to be so exercised? The language of the act leaves this point in doubt."

After having shown that the interpretation clause of the act defined the word "will" as including a power of appointment by testament or codicil, or writing in the nature of a will, he said:

Then having determined that the terms creating the power were broad enough to permit execution thereof by will, but did not specifically authorize such execution, he proceeded as follows:

"The power mentioned in the statute is therefore included in the power given by the instrument before us, but it does not seem to me to follow that because the power mentioned in the statute is included in the power given by the instrument, the power given by the instrument is therefore a power to which the statute was intended to apply. It would be difficult, I think, to say that a power to appoint by will or other writing is the same thing as a power to appoint by a will or codicil, or writing in the nature of a will."

Vice Chancellor Sir W. Page Wood based the decision in West v. Ray upon the same ground, and concluded his opinion with these words:

"The donor might well say, 'I have not made any direction at all as to a will, and therefore my case is not within the statute. It may be that it was a matter of indifference to me whether the exercise of the power should be by will or not; but it was of the essence of my direction that it should be done with certain solemnities. Where the instrument is a matter of form and the required solemnities are the substantial requisites is not the same case as where the instrument is the substance of what is required by the power, and the solemnities are the accessories, which is the state of circumstances to which the statute applies.' I regret to come to this conclusion because, when persons fetter themselves with these forms, instead of saying simply that the appointment should be by deed or will, which would in most cases fulfill every purpose, they often disappoint themselves, or when they wish to give a power of appointment to third persons they frequently by these means disappoint the object of all parties. The Legislature has made a provision for the evil in cases of wills; but I think that it does not extend to the case where the power requires not a will, but an instrument with certain formalities different to those observed in the execution of a will. The distinction is no doubt narrow; for if the power had been to be executed by a 'writing testamentary or otherwise,' then the case would have fallen within the statute; but in that case the donor would have made a will of the substance of the case, and then the provisions of the statute would apply."

In Taylor v. Meads, Lord Westbury merely adopted the conclusion arrived at in West v. Ray. He submitted no argument to sus-tain it, and invoked no rule or principle of construction in support of it.

On the other hand, Sir James Wigram, in Buckell v. Blenkhorn, expressed the opinion that execution of such a power by will was clearly within the statute. His cogent reasoning follows:

"Now, by the late statute of wills it is provided that in the execution of wills one given form shall be observed, and that such form shall be an equivalent for every arbitrary form of execution which the donor of a power may prescribe. It was not at the expense, but in favor and for the benefit, of such donors, and in order that their intentions might not be disappointed by the neglect of useless forms, that this legislative provision was made. I must presume, in this case, that Sarah McLaughlin made the deed of the 1st of September, 1843, with knowledge of the decisions upon the word 'writing,' and with knowledge also of the provisions of the Wills Act. Why, then, should I deprive her of the benefit of the act, for that is what I am asked to do? I am asked to deprive certain objects of her bounty of the gifts she intended for them only because a form has not been observed which the Legislature has declared to be useless. What reason then is there for saying that a will shall not, since as well as before the statute, be deemed a writing within the terms of the deed? If the testatrix had used the word 'will' instead of the word 'writing,' the statute would equally have applied."

The conclusion expressed in Buckell v. Blenkhorn is manifestly permissible under the rule of strict construction. Lord Justice Turner admits, in Collard v. Sampson, that the power mentioned in the statute is included in the power given by the instrument. Sir James Wigram, in the other case, says a decision against the validity of the execution by will would be "against the spirit and policy, as well as against the letter, of the act." What falls within both the spirit and letter of the statute is deemed, under that rule, to have been within the legislative intent. Bank v. Thomas, 75 W. Va. 321, 83 S. E. 985; Harrison v. Leach, 4 W. Va. 388, Davis v. Commonwealth, 17 Grat. (Va.) 617; State v. Stephenson, 2 Bailey (S. C.) 334, 335; United States v. Hartwell, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 885, 395, 18 L. Ed. 830. Nor does the rule of strict construction restrict the operation of terms actually used in a statute to their narrowest meaning, or to any particular meaning. United States v. Winn, 3 Sumn. 209, Fed. Cas. No. 16740; United States v. Hartwell, cited. As in other cases, the meaning of the words is to be determined in the light of the subject-matter and the context. The only absolute limitation upon the operation of a statute strictly construed is lack of terms expressing intent. This does not always obtain in the application of the rule of liberal construction. Under the former rule, what is authorized or forbidden must be within both the spirit or purpose of the act and its terms, while under the latter, it sometimes suffices that it be within the spirit or purpose only. Execution by will, of a power exercisable by an instrument in writing, admittedly comes within the requirements of that rule.

Through wills and codicils, not deeds or other instruments, constitute the subject-matter of the statute, the execution of powers of appointment by will is expressly included. The uncertainty is limited to the extent of such inclusion. It is not expressly defined, and the context does not necessarily limit it. The first clause of the section is broad enough in its term to include any power that can be exercised by a will. It says no appointment made by will, "in the exercise of any power," shall be valid, unless, etc. The second clause is not definitive of the instrument or provision vesting the power. While it mentions "a power of appointment by will," its terms do not even suggest the necessity of the creation of such a power in specific, as contradistinguished from general, terms, and one created by the use of general terms is as valid and effective as one specifically conferred. Hence the statute seems grammatically, logically, and legally to include both cases. Of course, as suggested and held, there is a difference, but that difference is not made the ground of any express or necessary exception. Besides the uniform holding that a power so given as to be exercisable by an instrument in writing could be validly executed by will must have been known to the Parliament, and also to the Virginia General Assembly, when the statute was enacted.

To say the Legislature has not provided for the case in question necessarily narrows and restricts the meaning and operation of the terms of the act. The judicial observations of lack of provision, therefore, necessarily mean no more than that the act has made no specific provision for it. Such provision was wholly unnecessary, and would have been unusual, in the absence of some principle of public policy or rule of construction working an exception from the operation of the general terms of the act, by implication. No such principle or rule is invoked in any of the decisions overruling Buckell v. Blenkhorn. To give the statute effect commensurate with the extent of its general terms does not permit it perceptibly to innovate upon the law of deeds or other instruments. In case of the execution of such a power by deed, all of the prescribed formalities and solemnities must be complied with. Nothing is abrogated except in the case of execution by will, and that falls directly within the terms of the statute and constitutes part of its subject-matter. It places no restraint upon the liberty of the creator of the power, for he may always limit the mode of execution to a deed or other instrument operating inter vivos, and, if he does not, he may well be presumed to have intended to place it under the operation of the statute. While the distinction between the form of the instrument of execution and the solemnities thereof, marked by Sir W. Page Wood, in West v. Ray, is a perfectly obvious one, it does not profess to stand upon any recognized ground of implied exception from the operation of the general terms of a statute. Some of these grounds, as defined by the English and American decisions, are briefly stated in Conley and Avis v. Coal & Coke Ry. Co., 67 W. Va. 129, 67 S. E. 613, syl. pt. 27, in the following terms:

"In determining the meaning of a statute, it will be presumed, in the absence of words therein, specifically indicating the contrary, that the Legislature did not intend to innovate upon, unsettle, disregard, alter, or violate: (1) The common law; (2) a general statute or system of statutory provisions, the entire subject-matter of which is not directly or necessarily involved in the act; (3) a right or exception based upon settled public policy; (4) the Constitution of the state; nor (5) the Constitution of the United States."

An obvious and radical difference in the nature of the thing excepted from one named in the statute constitutes another ground.

The express terms of this act rebut the presumption against intent to alter the common law as to the execution of powers of appointment given to be exercised by will, whether so given in definite and specific terms or in general terms. The reasons of public policy impelling the enactment of the law apply with equal force to both classes of powers of appointment by will. The evil remedied by the act is the same in each class, as Sir W. Page Wood admitted in his opinion in Collard v. Sampson. Omission to relieve from compliance with useless and harmful formalities in the execution of powers of appointment otherwise than by will, signifies intent not to deal with the subject of execution of powers generally, but it does not import intention to restrain the general terms of the statute to one class of powers susceptible of execution by will. Nor is there any marked difference between the nature of a power given in general terms to be executed by will and one given in specific terms to be so executed. They differ only as to the forms of expression, the language, in which they are created. Each is a power susceptible of execution by will. When executed, each produces exactly the same legal result. If the power is given, in express terms to be executed by deed or by a will made with solemnities not required by the statute, it can be executed by will without compliance with such solemnities. If it is conferred in general terms broad enough to permit both kinds of execution, the words used do not indicate any intention to require such compliance, nor do they point out any circumstance tending to give the instrument a different nature.

Although this question seems never to have been decided by the House of Lords, the court of last resort in England, the conclusion stated in the later decisions referred to may well be taken as settled law in that jurisdiction. There has been a general acquiescence in it for a great many years. The later construction adopted has not called forth any amendment of the act. Hence it may be justly inferred that the bench, bar, and Legislature are satisfied with it. If, in our opinion, it were clearly and firmly sustained by any definite rule or principle of construction and the Legislature of Virginia had not adopted it as formerly construed in England, we would be constrained to give it our assent, and hold the power not to have been well executed. But, in view of our doubt of its soundness when examined in the light of the rules of interpretation and construction, and the adoption of the statute as previously construed, we hold the will to have been a valid execution of the power, and affirm the decree complained of.

WILLIAMS, J. (dissenting). I do not think a power of revocation and reappointment, to be executed "by a written instrument, signed, sealed and acknowledged," is executed properly by a holograph will, not so signed, sealed and acknowledged. By the common law the mode prescribed for the execution of the power must be strictly pursued; if it is to be exercised by will only, a deed will not answer, and vice versa. 2 Min. 741, and Williamson v. Beckham, 8 Leigh (Va.) 20. If Mr. Broun's will had been sealed and acknowledged, it would have been a literal compliance with the condition, for even though it was testamentary in character, it would also have been the kind of a writing designated. But not being acknowledged, it is not such a writing as the donor had prescribed. The court has no right to imply that the acknowledgment is an immaterial requirement that can be dispensed with. There having been no express provision for a revocation and reappointment by will, I do not think section 4, c. 77, Code, has any application, for the reason stated by Lord Justice Turner in Collard v. Sampson, and quoted in the majority opinion. I think the later English decisions, and not the case of Buckell v. Blenkhorn, which the opinion has followed, furnish the correct interpretation of the statute.

PRICHARD v. PRICHARD et al.
(No. 3790.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 25, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. WILLS §523—"GIFT TO A CLASS."

A gift to a class exists when the instrument creating it directs the distribution of an aggregate sum to a body of persons, commonly designated by some general name, as "children," "grandchildren," "nephews," uncertain in number at the time of the gift, to be ascertained at a future time, and who are all to take in equal or in some other definite proportions; the share of each being dependent for its amount upon the ultimate number of persons in the designated class.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Gift to a Class.]

2. WILLS §547—WORDS OF SURVIVORSHIP—CONSTRUCTION.

Words of survivorship contained in a will or trust instrument will be referred to the event plainly intended to accomplish the purposes of the testator or donor, whether that event be before, at the time of, or after his death.

3. WILLS §524(6)—GIFT TO A CLASS—SURVIVORSHIP.

Where, under the provisions of a will or trust instrument, a gift to a class, here described as "surviving grandchildren," is postponed to a particular time, or pending the termination of a preceding estate, generally survivorship is to be referred to the time when the property or fund is divisible, and those members of the class then living will take the whole, unless the particular language used confines the gift to those in existence at the date of the instrument or at the death of the testator or donor.

4. WILLS §524(2)—TESTAMENTARY TRUST—DISTRIBUTION.

So, where such an instrument creating a trust fund provides that the interest therefrom is to be divided among "surviving grandchildren equally," the distribution thereof is not limited to those in existence at the death of the donor, but is to be made to such grandchildren as are living at the time fixed for each period of distribution.

5. WILLS §695(2)—CONSTRUCTION—EQUITY JURISDICTION.

Generally jurisdiction in equity to construe wills arises only in cases where there is necessity for such construction in relation to actual litigation as to matters which are proper subjects of equity jurisdiction. Usually there must be something more in a suit than a mere construction of an instrument.

6. TRUSTS §178—CONSTRUCTION OF TRUST INSTRUMENT—GROUNDS.

Though a trustee or other fiduciary is sometimes permitted to come into a court of equity for a construction of an instrument under which he is acting, he is permitted to do so only for the purpose of guidance in the administration thereof as immediate necessities may require, and the court properly may decline to extend its construction to cover contingencies which may never arise, or, if at all, at some remote date; such points being postponed for future consideration upon the application of the fiduciary or other persons interested when the occasion therefor is presented.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Suit by A. M. Prichard, trustee, etc., of S. B. Prichard, deceased, against Henry Lewis Prichard and others. From a decree adjudicating a question for the trustee's guidance in the administration of the trust fund, defendants appeal. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

A. M. Prichard, of Charleston, pro se.

LYNCH, J. The decree from which this appeal is taken adjudicates for the guidance of the trustee in the administration of the trust fund created by the donor, his mother, for the benefit of her grandchildren, three of whom are his own children, the question whether there is included among the beneficiaries a child born to him and his wife within slightly less than the gestation period of time after the death of his mother, the donor, and whether certain other provisions of the instrument are void by the rule against perpetuities. The instrument creating the trust follows:

"For value received, this 18th day of September, 1917, I, S. B. Prichard, hereby transfer, assign and set over unto my son, A. M. Prichard, as trustee, fifty-five thousand ($55,000.00) dollars, United States 2% bonds due 1930, which I have loaned unto the Fifth-Third National Bank of Cincinnati, Ohio, for an additional 2%, as evidenced by its certificate therefor dated February 14, 1917, standing in my name, but to be forthwith transferred to the name of my said trustee, who is to have and to hold said bonds in trust to keep the principal thereof invested in safe interest-bearing securities, and to collect the income therefrom, and divide the same, less taxes and expenses, among my surviving grandchildren, equally, until the 1st day of January, 1950, when he shall distribute the principal of said bonds equally among such of my grandchildren as shall be then alive; and in case any be then dead leaving issue surviving, then such issue shall be entitled to so much as the parent, if living, would have received; but, provided, however, that the income from ten thousand ($10,000.00) dollars of said bonds shall be paid to Annie Mary Imboden for so long as she shall live unmarried, and this trust shall continue as to said ten thousand ($10,000.00) dollars of said bonds for so long after the 1st day of January, 1950, as the said Annie Mary Imboden shall continue to live unmarried, but this provision for her benefit shall cease and determine immediately upon her death or marriage, whichever shall first occur."

[1-3] Though not, and apparently not intended to be, a formal will, the instrument, it appears, is nevertheless a testamentary adjustment of the whole or a part of the personal property of the donor. It purports an immediate devolution of the title and vests it in trust for grandchildren, of whom four then were, and now are, living, and another born July 26, 1918, since the donor's death, which occurred October 30, 1917, and also now living. The trust so created is an active and continuing trust, and, if lawful, cannot terminate within the time fixed for its continuation, either by the joint and voluntary act of the beneficiaries or by the coercion of a court of equity. Carney v. Kain, 40 W. Va. 758, 23 S. E. 650; Olsen v. Youngerman, 136 Iowa, 404, 113 N. W. 938. Though, as we have said, it is not strictly a will, it has the elementary characteristics of a bequest of personal property, and doubtless the donor had in mind the purpose to part with the title she held in anticipation of her early demise.

The particular language involved in the first question is:

"To collect the income therefrom, and divide the same, less taxes and expenses, among my surviving grandchildren, equally, until the 1st day of January, 1950."

The intent manifested by the trust apparently was to provide for the division of the income among members of a class described as surviving grandchildren. No one is named individually; the number of beneficiaries is uncertain; but the reference is to a group which can be determined at each income period fixed for its distribution. In Jarman on Wills (6th Ed.) p. 336, it is said:

"A number of persons are popularly said to form a class when they can be designated by some general name, as 'children,' 'grandchildren,' 'nephews'; but in legal language the question whether a gift is one to a class depends, not upon these considerations, but upon the mode of the gift itself, namely, that it is a gift of an aggregate sum to a body of persons uncertain in number at the time of the gift, to be ascertained at a future time, and who are all to take in equal or in some other definite proportions; the share of each being dependent for its amount upon the ultimate number of persons."

See, also, 40 Cyc. 1473; Saunders v. Saunders, 109 Va. 191, 63 S. E. 410.

It seems clear, therefore, that this clause of the trust is for the benefit of a class.

The determination of the question who are members of the class entitled to share in the distribution of the income is more important at this time. A grandchild was born after the death of the creator of the trust, and others still may be born, and if the term "surviving grandchildren" is limited to those in being at the creation of the trust, or at the death of the donor, they will be excluded from participation in the distribution. In Schaeffer v. Schaeffer, 54 W. Va. 681, 48 S. E. 150, the question was mooted, but not decided, whether survivorship in a will related to the death of the testator, or to some other point of time. But Dent v. Pickens, 61 W. Va. 488, 58 S. E. 1029, pt. 4, syl., states the rule thus:

"Words of survivorship contained in a will will be construed according to their usual and common acceptation, unless a different meaning plainly appears to have been intended thereby; and will be referred to the event plainly intended to accomplish the purposes of the testator, whether that event be before, at the time of, or after the death of the testator."

See, also, Neal v. Hamilton Co., 70 W. Va. 250, 260, 73 S. E. 971; 40 Cyc. 1511.

In accordance with that rule the intent of the testator is to govern in construing the meaning of words of survivorship in a will; and it is highly proper that such should be the rule of construction, for the purpose of the court in construing a will is to give effect to the wishes of the testator with respect to the disposition of his property after death, subject only to restrictions imposed by established rules of law. Though, as we have said, the instrument here involved is a trust instead of a will, the same rule of construction applies; for the intent of the creator of the trust clearly was to make such disposition of part at least of her estate as is usually made by will.

[4-6] When the term "surviving grandchildren" is read in connection with the second part of the instrument, that providing for the distribution of the "principal of said bonds equally among such of my grandchildren as shall be then alive," it clearly appears that she did not limit the distribution of the income to those only who were living at the date of the instrument or at her death. The principal is to be divided among those of her grandchildren who shall be alive on January 1, 1950, apparently without regard to the date of their birth, provided it occurred prior to 1950. Is it not fair to assume that she intended the distribution of the income from the bonds to be as broad in scope as the division of the principal? Her own intention as deduced from a reasonable and fair interpretation of the entire instrument leads irresistibly to this conclusion.

Further, where under the provisions of a will or trust instrument a gift to a class is postponed to a particular time, or pending the termination of a preceding estate, generally those members of the class take, and those alone, who are in being at the arrival of the time for distribution, unless the particular language used confines the gift to those in existence at the date of the instrument or at the death of the testator or donor. 40 Cyc. 1477; Schouler on Wills, Executors, and Administrators (5th Ed.) § 530; Dole v.

Keyes, 143 Mass. 237, 9 N. E. 625; Byrnes v. Stilwell, 103 N. Y. 453, 90 N. E. 241, 57 Am. Rep. 760; Dulany v. Middleton, 72 Md. 67, 19 Atl. 146; Brewick v. Anderson, 267 Ill. 169, 107 N. E. 878; Theobald on Wills (7th Ed.) p. 681. In the last-named work it is said:

"In simple cases, where the gift is to several or the survivors, or to several and the survivors or the survivors of them, or to a class described as surviving, such as surviving children, or to several of a class with benefit of survivorship between them, the rule is now well settled that survivorship is to be referred to the time when the property or fund is divisible, and those then living will take the whole."

See, also, 2 Jarman on Wills (6th Ed.) pp. 2127-2130.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the distribution of the income from the trust property must be made to such grandchildren as are in being at the time fixed for each period of distribution.

The second question raised on this appeal, namely, the determination of the method for distribution of the principal of the trust property on January 1, 1950, presents a matter of construction which we must decline to consider at this time. There must be something more in a suit than a demand for a mere construction of an instrument. Many contingencies may occur before January 1, 1950, which will render unnecessary, indeed futile, anything we might say at this time. There is no actual litigation in respect of the matter now sought to be determined upon this phase of the subject.

"Jurisdiction in equity to construe wills arises only in cases where there is necessity for such construction in relation to actual litigation as to matters which are proper subjects of equity jurisdiction, such as relief on behalf of an executor, trustee, cestui que trust, or legatee." Buskirk v. Ragland, 65 W. Va. 749, 65 S. E. 101; Martin v. Martin, 52 W. Va. 381, 44 S. E. 198.

It is true that a trustee or other fiduciary is sometimes permitted to come into a court of equity for a construction of an instrument under which he is acting (McDonald v. Jarvis, 64 W. Va. 62, 60 S. E. 990, 131 Am. St. Rep. 889); but this is only for the purpose of guiding him in the administration thereof when the occasion confronts him. The decision which we have announced on the question of the distribution of the income from the trust property is sufficient to guide the trustee as to his duties with respect thereto until the time arrives for the distribution of the principal of the fund. It is unnecessary to decide in advance all of the many possible contingencies which may occur while the trust remains active and continuing. 3 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) § 1157, note 2b; Strawn v. Jacksonville Academy, 240 Ill. 111, 88 N. E. 460; Fuller v. McKim, 187 Mich. 667, 154 N. W. 55; Gebhard v. Lenox Library, 74 N. H. 416, 68 Atl. 540. What we have said, taken in connection with the directions of the instrument itself, answers all the purposes deemed essential for the guidance of the trustee until the time arrives for the termination of the trust estate, at least so far as we can now perceive. If then or sooner any question of administrative right or power under the trust may arise demanding the aid of a court of equity, or involving the right of distribution at the termination of the trust period, nothing herein said will operate to bar the right to resort to the proper tribunal for further directions in the premises.

For these reasons assigned, our order will affirm the decree to the extent that it admits the grandchild born after the creation of the trust to receive a share of the income from the trust estate, and reverse the decree to the extent it attempts to adjudicate other provisions of the trust to be void because violative of the rule against perpetuities, because, and only because, such adjudication is premature as not now being within the power of the court to determine, and probably may not be necessary until the arrival of the date fixed by the donor for the final distribution of the trust property; the costs of the litigation to be taxed as part of the expenses of the administration.

KELLER v. WASHINGTON et al.
(No. 3509.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 25, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇐49½(5)—GIFT TO HUSBAND—CONVEYANCE.

Delivery by a wife of her money or other property to her husband, who uses it in his business without an agreement, oral or written, entered into by them at the time, binding him to account therefor to her, gives rise to the presumption of an intention on her part to bestow it upon him as a gift.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇐49½(5)—HUSBAND AS DEBTOR OR TRUSTEE—PROOF.

In order to create the relation of debtor and creditor, or cestui que trust and trustee, between husband and wife, as to such transaction, to the prejudice of his creditors, the proof must be ample, clear, and satisfactory; and where the facts and circumstances tend to establish an intention on her part to give him her property without limitation or restraint, the mere parol testimony of both to show a private understanding between them of a different character, or that they regarded the transaction as a loan or trust, ordinarily will not suffice, as against creditors of an insolvent husband, to rebut the presumption of a gift.

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⇐49½(5) — GIFT TO HUSBAND—PRESUMPTION.

But where there is other evidence sufficient of itself to show, and corroborative of the statements of the wife coupled with the admissions of the husband tending to show, an intention to create a trust to invest for her benefit the property intrusted to him, and there is no conduct inconsistent with such an intention, and no circumstance warranting the suspicion that, in acknowledging the obligation to repay his wife, the husband was trying to favor or prefer her to the prejudice of his other creditors, the presumption of a gift is deemed to be rebutted.

4. TRUSTS ⇐33—ACCEPTANCE OF MONEY FOR SPECIFIC PURPOSES.

Where a person, not acting merely as agent, has or accepts possession and control of money or other personal property, not to deal with it as his own, but to hold and apply it for certain specific purposes, or for the benefit of certain specified persons, a valid and enforceable trust is created.

5. TRUSTS ⇐1, 62, 91—"EXPRESS TRUST"—"RESULTING TRUST"—"CONSTRUCTIVE TRUST."

An express trust springs from the agreement of the parties; a constructive or resulting trust from the construction of equity, in order to satisfy the demands of justice.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Constructive Trust; Express Trust; Resulting Trust.]

6. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS ⇐103(4)—TRUSTS—REPUDIATION.

The statute of limitations never applies to express trusts until and from the time the trustee repudiates the trust by unequivocal words or acts, and such repudiation is brought to the notice of the beneficiary in such a manner as to require him promptly to assert his rights.

7. TRUSTS ⇐365(2) — EXPRESS TRUSTS — LACHES.

Though there may be instances in which laches will run against express trusts, courts of equity apply the rule in such cases less readily than in cases of constructive or resulting trusts, and rarely ever do so unless the lapse of time is of such duration, and the circumstances of such character, as to indicate clearly a relinquishment or abandonment thereof, or unless a situation has arisen in the nature of an estoppel which will make it clearly inequitable and unjust to enforce it.

8. CREDITORS' SUIT ⇐57 — LIFE CLAIM AGAINST HUSBAND—DISTRIBUTION.

When a wife places her personal property in the hands of her husband in trust to invest for her, and he later becomes insolvent, she may, upon declining to assert any possible lien rights she may have to the detriment of other creditors, present her claim as a general creditor, and is entitled to participate proportionately with other general creditors in the distribution of any fund derived from the sale of the insolvent's real or personal property, after all specific and general liens chargeable thereto are satisfied.

9. HUSBAND AND WIFE ~~§~~144—INDEBTEDNESS OF WIFE—ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

When the husband in such a case, years after he received his wife's money or property, acknowledges by written statement the validity of her claim against him, but seeks to defer payment or restitution until all his other debts are satisfied, her acceptance of such statement, when not based upon a valuable consideration, generally does not operate as a waiver of her right to participate with general creditors of the common debtor.

10. CONTRACTS ~~§~~47—WAIVER—CONSIDERATION.

No agreement to waive an existing legal right is valid unless it rests upon a consideration deemed legally sufficient.

Williams, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hampshire County.

Suit by Louise E. Keller against R. M. Washington, Mary Cavitt Washington, his wife, and others. From a decree overruling her exceptions to the report of the commissioner appointed to ascertain for court's information the realty of R. M. Washington, the liens against his estate, and the priorities thereof, and confirming the report, Mary Cavitt Washington appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

G. K. Kump, of Romney, and Walter C. Capper, of Cumberland, Md., for appellant.
J. S. Zimmerman, of Romney, for appellees.

LYNCH, J. The appellant, Mary Cavitt Washington, acquired through the estate of her deceased father, Josephus Cavitt, valuable real and personal property owned by him in the state of Texas. The land devised or allotted to her she caused to be sold at the instance of her husband, R. M. Washington, to whom she was married in 1886. The proceeds of the sale she likewise at his instance delivered to him, together with all or most of the personal property derived from her father's estate; and such of it as was not converted into money when so received he sold or assigned, and apparently devoted the proceeds to his individual personal use. In this manner her patrimony came into his possession or under his control at various times after the marriage, though the dates of the receipt of all of it are not disclosed. She did not demand any notes or memoranda evidencing the receipt thereof or the purpose of its delivery to him, or if she did make such demand, he did not comply therewith until February 28, 1914, when, by way of recognition of an indebtedness to her for the various sums, aggregating $35,770.81, he executed a paper filed in the record to which we shall have occasion to refer at a later stage of this review.

The decree from which she has appealed overruled her exceptions to the report of the commissioner to whom the cause was referred to ascertain for the information of the court the real estate of R. M. Washington, and the liens chargeable against his estate, and the priorities thereof, and confirmed the report. The report and decree denied the right claimed by her to participate in the distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the lands and personal property of her husband, who, it seems, is hopelessly insolvent. His investments, though large and valuable, are grossly inadequate to meet his liabilities.

The refusal of such right is sought to be sustained by appellees, who are common and lien creditors of the insolvent, upon the grounds: (1) That the delivery of the money or property to the husband did not create the relation of debtor and creditor, but presumably was a gift to him by her; (2) that, if it was a debt, it is barred by the statute of limitations, or, if not by the statute, by her laches. She seeks to reverse the decree, and supplant it by another allowing the claim, on the ground that the money was delivered and received in trust for investment for her at interest, pursuant to an oral agreement entered into between them on the several dates of the delivery. She does not, however, attempt to trace it to any specific property in which it was invested by him, or ask to have it declared to be a lien or charge against any particular part of her husband's lands or personal property, but she does ask to be permitted to join ratably with other creditors of her husband in the distribution of the surplus proceeds remaining after the payment, in whole or in part, of the specific liens on certain parcels of his real estate, not as a trust fund in his hands, but by way of enrichment of his estate to that extent, and merely as a debt entitled to such participation notwithstanding its character as a trust fund. In other words, as she cannot point out with certainty any property, real or personal, not subject to liens created by him with her consent evidenced by her joining with him in creating them, if such there be, she expresses a willingness to accept a share of such surplus ratably with other creditors of her husband.

[1] Delivery by a wife of her money or property to her husband, who uses it in his business without an agreement, oral or written, entered into by them at the time, binding him to account therefor to her, gives rise to the presumption of an intention on her part to bestow it upon him as a gift, and, in order to create the relation between them of debtor and creditor as to such a transaction to the prejudice of his creditors, the proof must be ample, clear and satisfactory. Bank v. Atkinson, 32 W. Va. 203, 9 S. E. 175; Zinn v. Law, 32 W. Va. 447, 9 S. E. 871; Bennett v. Bennett, 37 W. Va. 396, 16 S. E. 638, 38 Am. St. Rep. 47; Crumrine v. Crumrine, 50

Likewise where the facts and circumstances tend to establish an intention on her part to give him her property without limitation or restraint, with the right to appropriate it to any purpose he may desire without regard to any obligation to restore the possession or account therefor to her, and he uses and deals with it as if he were the real and sole owner, the mere parol testimony of both to show a private understanding between them of a different character, or that they considered the transaction as a loan or trust, ordinarily will not suffice, as against creditors of an insolvent husband, to rebut the presumption that a gift was intended. Zinn v. Law, supra; Horner v. Huffman, supra; Cheuvront v. Horner, 62 W. Va. 476; Morris v. Westerman, supra.

[2, 3] The basis for the presumption of a gift as between husband and wife, and the difficulty of overcoming it by proof when the rights of creditors are involved are well stated in Morris v. Westerman, supra, 79 W. Va. page 508, 92 S. E. 570:

"If she had had the property in her possession or the title in her name and within her control, and delivered or conveyed it to him, or permitted him to take possession of it, without any understanding or agreement for return thereof, there would have been a presumption of a gift. * * * But if, under such circumstances, he had contemporaneously given her his note or other obligation, * * * or even verbally promised to pay or return it, no such presumption would have arisen. The transaction would have created the relation of debtor and creditor. In most instances, however, if not all of them, the verbal agreement is rejected for want of sufficient proof or inconsistency with conduct."

Here there is neither such inconsistency of conduct nor want of sufficient proof to rebut the presumption of gift. True there was no written agreement to invest for the wife's benefit; no notes or other documentary evidence of the real character of the transaction given. All the negotiations were oral. The money or property passed directly to Mrs. Washington or to her husband through the hands of her brother, J. B. Cavitt, who acted on behalf of his and Mrs. Washington's mother, the executrix of their father's estate, and as such agent he made all the settlements with the heirs of their father and distributees of the estate, as he also did subsequently with respect to their mother's estate. Mrs. Washington's share of the property inherited from both sources he paid to her personally, or to her husband at her direction, but not without protest in her behalf, manifested by correspondence conducted by him with her and her husband regarding the application of the money, the result of which was as he says that "finally he [the husband] stated to me that he had all of Mrs. Washington's money invested for her in such a way that she would get it back with good earnings."

He also says:

"From many statements made to me by R. M. Washington at the times he received these different sums of money and on many other occasions he induced me to believe that he was getting all this money from my sister to be invested for her, and that he was in duty and honor bound to handle it for her in such a way that it would make her good interest."

The reasonable deduction from this testimony given by a witness having peculiar knowledge of these frequent transactions, and being an active agent participating in them during a period of several years, is that he meant what his language clearly imports, namely, that R. M. Washington received the property upon the agreement to reinvest it for his wife, and not that she had loaned it to him. It is not susceptible of any other reasonable interpretation. The trend of what the witness says, the force of the language he uses, and the implications embodied in it, warrant but one conclusion when finally construed as a whole. So that without accrediting any probative force or value to the oral testimony of Mrs. Washington relative to the purpose for which she delivered the money or its equivalent to her husband, or his recognition in the paper signed by him of the liability and amount thereof, there remains in the record enough to permit us to discern the true character of the negotiations between them in respect to her property. The only effect of the combined testimony is to render more obvious that which is sufficiently apparent for the purpose of reaching a just conclusion as to the merits of her claim.

[9, 10] Certainly in view of the separation before, and the apparent hostility existing between them at the time the paper was executed, and in view of the harsh terms of the paper itself, we perceive no circumstance to excite or warrant the suspicion that, in acknowledging the obligation to repay his wife, Washington was trying to favor or prefer her to the prejudice of his other creditors. Indeed, the terms so prescribed deferred payment to her until after his other debts were satisfied. Clearly this he could not lawfully do without her consent or promise to forebear to urge immediate payment or to sue to enforce payment, and if she had so promised, of which there is not a word of proof, it would not avail because there was no consideration on which the promise could stand. No agreement to waive a legal right is valid unless it rests upon a consideration deemed legally sufficient. Charleston Lumber Co. v. Friedman, 64 W. Va. 151, 61 S. E. 815; Bays v. Johnson, 80 W. Va. 559, 562, 92 S. E. 792. This postponement, he attempted to justify or excuse upon the assumption that an unqualified agreement to pay her would tend to the further embarrassment and complexity of his business relation to other creditors with whom he had contracted the indebtedness, to which he desired to subordinate payment to her, instead of according to her the benefit of a co-ordination justly due her. The mere acceptance of the paper, we think, did not operate as a waiver of the right to press her claim, the justness of which he so acknowledged. Evidently she did not acquiesce in the voluntary restrictions so placed upon her rights, and his stipulation to that effect was inoperative, for he was already in duty bound to return to her the money which he held. Beyond the mere acceptance of the paper, no witness testifies that she agreed to postpone the assertion of her claim. She cannot be prejudiced by the failure to call R. M. Washington to testify in her behalf. She was not bound to do so, though he was within reach of the court's process.

[4-6] The presumption of a gift being overcome or rebutted, we are of opinion that the husband, in accepting the money, assumed to act as trustee for his wife with regard to its investment. The difference between an express and a constructive or resulting trust is clearly set forth in Currence v. Ward, 43 W. Va. 387, 27 S. E. 329, and Newman v. Newman, 60 W. Va. 371, 378, 55 S. E. 377, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 370. The former springs from the agreement of the parties, the latter from the construction of equity in order to satisfy the demands of justice. Clearly the understanding and agreement of the parties here was that the husband should undertake for the wife the investment of her property, and return to her the principal thereof unimpaired, but augmented by the interest it should earn under his management. The elements of a loan are wanting. The agreement was not to pay her interest for the use of her money, but the interest earned by it. Where a person, not acting merely as agent, has or accepts possession and control of money, promissory notes, or other personal property, with the express or implied understanding that he is not to hold it as his own absolute property, but is to hold and apply it for certain specific purposes, or for the benefit of certain specified persons, a valid and enforceable trust exists. 39 Cyc. 70, 71; Stanley v. Pence, 160 Ind. 636, 66 N. E. 51, 67 N. E. 441; Graham's Adm'r. v. English, 160 Ky. 375, 169 S. W. 836; First Natl. Bank v. Hinkle (Okla.) 162 Pac. 1062. It is true that the relation of principal and agent is very similar to that involved in a trust between the cestui and trustee, and it is frequently difficult to mark the dividing line between them. Yet in this case there was more than an agency involved. An agent usually acts in a representative capacity in the name of the principal, and binds the latter by acts done within the scope of the agency. A trustee does not act in such a representative capacity, but not infrequently deals with others, as one having full control and right of disposition of the property intrusted to him, though vested in him for the benefit of another. The nature of the husband's control over the property in this case, and the judgment and discretion required, were such as to constitute an active and continuing administrative trust. First Natl. Bank v. Hinkle, supra.

[7] As a further argument to support the decree, appellees assert that the claim of Mrs. Washington is barred either by the statute of limitations or by laches. It is well settled, however, that the former never applies to express trusts until and from the time the trustee repudiates the trust by unequivocal words or acts, and such repudiation is brought to the notice of the beneficiary in such a manner as to require him promptly to assert his rights. Ruckman v. Cox, 63 W. Va. 74, 59 S. E. 760. And, though there may be instances in which laches will run against express trusts, courts of equity apply the rule in such cases less readily than in cases of constructive or resulting trusts, and rarely ever do so unless the lapse of time has been so long, and the circumstances of such character, as to establish clearly a relinquishment or abandonment thereof, or unless a situation has arisen in the nature of an estoppel which will make it clearly inequitable and unjust to enforce it. Newman v. Newman, 60 W. Va. 371, 55 S. E. 377, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 370; Roush v. Griffith, 65 W. Va. 752, 762, 65 S. E. 168; Ash v. Wells, 76 W. Va. 711, 86 S. E. 750.

Wherein the doctrine of laches applies to exclude the participation demanded by appellant counsel do not point out, except by its mere invocation to their relief from the burden of her claim, or as revealed by the circumstances appearing in the cause. There is nothing to show relinquishment or abandonment of the claim against her husband. The delicate relation subsisting between the parties may have constituted the reason for her long acquiescence in his use of the property unaccompanied by the slightest intention to relinquish or abandon her claim to the property. Morris v. Westerman, supra. Her silence is not a decisive or a clear index to her intention. In going to the inception of this transaction, we find an agreement by the husband to take and invest his wife's property in her behalf, a trust agreement not deprived of its character as such because of the long acquiescence of the wife. With respect to the trust deeds in which she joined her husband, it may well be that she would have been estopped to assert her claim as against those whose claims are secured by such instruments. But no question arises concerning them, for they seem to have been foreclosed, and the liens satisfied to the extent of the sums realized from the property sold. And as against unsecured creditors, she is not attempting to secure preferential treatment to their detriment, as we understand, but expresses willingness to stand equally with them as a general creditor. It cannot be said, therefore, that her claim is barred merely because of delay in the assertion of her right.

[8] Looking into the situation without prejudice against her or any creditor of her husband, or predilection for either or any of them, so far as their legal or equitable rights and interests are involved, and with no object other than to discover the real merits of the controversy, we observe no substantial reason founded upon the circumstances revealed for denying the claim of the wife to have set apart to her what she asks. The theory of a gift being unsupported except by the legal presumption, sufficiently rebutted, as we have seen, these facts stand out prominently as unquestioned by any pretense of a contrary purport. The vast real estate of her husband, most of which he perhaps acquired by disloyalty to the trust reposed in him, she has willingly permitted to be exhausted and applied to the liquidation of his lien liabilities, whereby her heritage has in large measure already gone to reimburse his creditors. Had she required the execution of formal obligations binding him to repay her the money so advanced on trust and expended, she knows not how or where, could the creditors equitably or legally deny or question her right to participate as distributee of his estate, though they may not have known of the documents? This question this court answered in Righter v. Riley, 42 W. Va. 633, 26 S. E. 357, and in point 3 of the syllabus said:

"Where is it clearly shown that a married woman holds a bona fide debt against her husband, she is entitled to the same legal rights as any other creditor, except as to remedy."

Likewise in Bolyard v. Bolyard, 79 W. Va. 554, 91 S. E. 529, L. R. A. 1917D, 440, the discussion preliminary to a decision of the case notes the difference between the right of husband and wife to enter into contracts as between themselves and the enforceability of such contracts in actions at law and suits in equity. And with peculiar aptness and perspicuity the opinion says:

"In the broad sense of the law, including the equity jurisprudence as well as the legal, they are valid. The partial condemnation does not rest upon anything vicious in the sense of immorality. It goes no farther than exclusion from legal cognizance, and this exclusion is effected merely to place them within the exclusive cognizance of that class of courts whose procedure and remedies are sufficiently flexible and varied to enable them to do justice under all circumstances."

Bolyard v. Bolyard and Righter v. Riley are in accord as to the views expressed in both respecting the enforcement of the contracts of husband and wife made with each other during coverture, if just and reasonable, and the forum to which recourse must be had for that purpose. Hence, since such contracts are enforceable only in equity, they are not totally invalid, but only partially so, and their validity, or rather their enforceability, depends to some extent upon the forum in which suit on them is brought, as sometimes is the case with other contracts. This being a suit in a court of equity, there can be no question of the right of Mrs. Washington to enforce the claim asserted by her, at least so far as the forum is concerned, and for the further reason that equity is the proper tribunal in which to enforce trusts.

Though her claim originated as a trust, she is not attempting to assert lien rights paramount to those of other lien creditors, and we do not say that she could have done so to their prejudice. As to any balance remaining unpaid after the foreclosure of all specific liens, her claim stands upon an equality with respect to those of other general creditors, thus making it a contest between general creditors. Other creditors of the insolvent cannot be heard to say that she is estopped to assert her claim because they were ignorant of its existence, when we have already seen that it is not barred by the statute of limitations or by laches. They are not injured by the fact of their ignorance of her rights any more than one of them is injured because of his ignorance of the claim of any other creditor unrelated to the insolvent by blood or marriage. Such defense would be eminently proper in the circumstances presented if the wife was trying to assert a preferred claim.

For these several reasons assigned we are of opinion to reverse the decree and remand the cause, with direction to allow the claim contested to participate proportionally with other general claims in the distribution of any fund derived from the sale of the R. M. Washington property not applied to the discharge of specific liens on each tract subject thereto, and to judgment or other lien incumbrances thereon, and to grant to Mrs. Washington the right to participate pro rata with other creditors as to such excess.

WILLIAMS, J. (dissenting). I do not think the evidence offered by Mrs. Washington to establish the alleged trust between herself and husband is sufficiently certain and definite to overcome the legal presumption that the funds belonging to her, which she permitted him to receive and handle as if they were his own, were mutually understood as a gift. She does not attempt to state any agreement between them, and no note or memorandum was made at the time he received any part of her funds, although he received many thousands of dollars at different times, extending over a period of 30 years. She kept no memoranda of the amounts, and, apparently, had to depend on her brother for the information as to the sums her husband had received. Her brother, the only other witness to any such trust agreement, simply says:

"From many statements made to me by R. M. Washington at the times he received these different sums of money, and on many other occasions he induced me to believe that he was getting all this money from my sister to be invested for her, and that he was in duty and honor bound to handle it for her in such a way that it would make her good interest."

What did his brother-in-law say that induced his belief? Witness does not say. Perhaps his belief was ill-founded. This testimony, I think, falls far short of the rule as to clear and certain evidence required to overcome the presumption of a gift by the wife to the husband, after the lapse of years and the intervention of rights of his creditors. R. D. Johnson Milling Co. v. Read, 76 W. Va. 557, 85 S. E. 726; Miller v. Cox, 38 W. Va. 747, 18 S. E. 960; Bennett v. Bennett, 37 W. Va. 596, 16 S. E. 638, 38 Am. St. Rep. 47; and Bank v. Atkinson, 32 W. Va. 203, 9 S. E. 175.

BELL v. KANAWHA TRACTION & ELECTRIC CO. (No. 3738).*

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. March 25, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CONTRACTS ⚡303(2)—EXCUSE FOR NON-PERFORMANCE—STATUTE.

Where a contract is lawful at the time it is entered into, but before it has been fully executed its further performance is rendered impossible by a valid legislative act, or by some other supervening cause over which the parties have no control, they will be excused from its further performance.

2. CONTRACTS ⚡319(2) — EXCUSE FOR NON-PERFORMANCE—DAMAGES.

In such case neither party may recover the consequential damages which result to him by reason of the failure of performance upon the part of the other.

3. CONTRACTS ⚡319(2)—EXCUSED PERFORMANCE—RECOVERY OF CONSIDERATION.

But in such case, where one party has paid the full consideration for the contract, in accordance with its terms, and the other party has not performed, or has only partially performed, the party so performing will be entitled to recover back the consideration paid by him, or its value, in toto or pro tanto, as the failure to perform by the other party is total or only partial.

4. RAILROADS ⚡64(2) — RIGHT OF WAY—CANCELLATION OF DEED—EFFECT.

Where performance of a railroad's contract, in consideration of a right of way, to transport owner and his family without charge, has been made illegal by Hepburn Act June 29, 1906 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8563-8604aa), and Laws W. Va. 1913, c. 9, §§ 6, 7 (Code 1913, c. 150, §§ 6, 7 [secs. 641, 642]), cannot be rescinded, as the right of way has been dedicated to the public use, and cannot be withdrawn therefrom in the interest of a private individual.

5. RAILROADS ⚡64(1) — RIGHT OF WAY—PAYMENT OF CONSIDERATION.

A railroad, contracting in 1901, in consideration of a right of way, to furnish to the owner free transportation thereover for himself and family, was excused from further performance outside the state by Hepburn Act June 29, 1906, and within the state by Laws W. Va. 1913, c. 9, §§ 6, 7, both making performance illegal and impossible.

Error to Circuit Court, Wood County.

Suit by William Bell against the Kanawha Traction & Electric Company. Demurrer to plaintiff's declaration sustained, and he brings error. Reversed, demurrer overruled, and case remanded.

C. M. Hanna, R. E. Bills, and Reese Blizard, all of Parkersburg, for plaintiff in error.

Van Winkle & Ambler, of Parkersburg, for defendant in error.

RITZ, J. This writ of error is prosecuted to review a judgment of the circuit court of Wood county sustaining a demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration.

In the year 1901 the defendant secured from the plaintiff a right of way for its car track through a certain tract of land owned by him in the county of Wood; the sole consideration therefor being that the defendant, when its road was constructed, would furnish to the plaintiff free transportation thereover for himself and his family. In accordance with the agreement, such free transportation was furnished until the year 1906, when the Congress of the United States, by the passage of the Hepburn Act (Act Cong. June 29, 1906, c. 3591, 34 Stat. 584 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8563-8604aa]), made it impossible for the defendant to comply with its contract. The agreement was, however, modified at that time so as to provide for the furnishing of such transportation only within the state of West Virginia, and as modified was performed by the defendant until the year 1913, when the Legislature of West Virginia, by an act (Laws 1913, c. 9, §§ 6, 7 [Code 1913, c. 150, §§ 6, 7, (secs. 641, 642)], made it unlawful for the defendant to further perform the contract even to that extent. This suit was thereafter brought to recover the value of the consideration given by the plaintiff for such free transportation to the extent that the same had not already been furnished.

The substantial question involved is whether the declaration presents a cause of action. It is not contended that the contract in its inception was not entirely legal and proper, such a contract as the parties had a right to make, and enforceable as the law then stood.

[1, 2, 4] It is very well settled that, where the further performance of a contract, legal at the time it was made, is rendered unlawful by a subsequent act of Congress or of the Legislature of the state, the parties will be excused from further performance. Elliott on Contracts, §§ 685, 1901; 13 Cor. Jur. 646; 6 R. C. L. 366; Railroad Co. v. Mottley, 219 U. S. 467, 31 Sup. Ct. 265, 55 L. Ed. 297, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 671; American Mercantile Exchange v. Blunt, 102 Me. 128, 66 Atl. 212, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 414, 120 Am. St. Rep. 463, 10 Ann. Cas. 1022; Dorr v. Railway Co., 78 W. Va. 150, 88 S. E. 666, L. R. A. 1916E, 622; Baily v. De Crespigny, L. R. 4 Q. B. 180; Scovill v. McMahon, 62 Conn. 378, 26 Atl. 479, 21 L. R. A. 58, 36 Am. St. Rep. 350. Nor can it be doubted that the inhibitions of the Hepburn Act are such as to prevent the legal performance by the railway company of this contract. A common carrier by that act is prohibited from receiving such compensation for transportation furnished by it. Railroad Co. v. Mottley, 219 U. S. 467, 31 Sup. Ct. 265, 55 L. Ed. 297, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 671; Dorr v. Railway Co., 78 W. Va. 150, 88 S. E. 666, L. R. A. 1916E, 622. For this reason specific performance of the contract cannot be compelled, and, as was held in the case of Dorr v. Railway Co., supra, rescission cannot be had, for the very obvious reasons that the railway company has partially performed the same, and, further, the right of way thus secured has been dedicated to the public use, and cannot be withdrawn therefrom in the interest of a private individual.

[3, 5] It is also very well settled that no action will lie to recover any consequential damages which may result from the failure to perform a contract the performance of which is forbidden by law, or prevented by some uncontrollable supervening cause. Butterfield v. Byron, 153 Mass. 517, 27 N. E. 667, 12 L. R. A. 571, 25 Am. St. Rep. 654, and many authorities there cited. But these conclusions do not answer the question involved here. The plaintiff does not seek specific performance, but, on the contrary, admits that he cannot have it. He does not seek the cancellation or rescission of the contract, nor does he seek to recover any consequential damages for its nonperformance. The whole theory upon which the case proceeds is the recovery of that part of the consideration received by the defendant for which it has not made compensation. It is quite true that the defendant is excused from the further performance of the contract, and that no action can be maintained thereon for its breach, for its rescission, or for its specific execution, but does this mean that one of the parties who has received full performance from the other can retain that full performance? Many authorities are cited in argument, but few of them answer the specific inquiry. Most of them simply hold that specific execution will not be decreed, or that no action can be maintained for consequential damages for the breach of the contract, or that the party who has not performed is excused therefrom.

The exact question presented here seems not to have been passed upon by the courts of last resort of many of the American states. It was before the Supreme Court of the state of Kentucky in the case of Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. Crowe, 156 Ky. 27, 160 S. W. 759, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 848. Crowe had granted to the railroad company a strip of land for a right of way in consideration that the railroad company would issue to him free transportation over its lines during his life. The railroad company refused to issue the transportation for the reason that it was forbidden to do so by the provisions of the Hepburn Act. It was then sued to recover compensation for the consideration given it, just as was done in this case, and it was contended by the railroad company that not only was it excused from the further performance of its contract, but that it had a right to keep the consideration without making any compensation therefor. This contention, however, was denied by the court, and the railroad company held liable for the value of the consideration received by it to the extent that it had not already made compensation therefor. In the case of Cowley v. Northern Pacific Railroad Co., 68 Wash. 558, 123 Pac. 998, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 559, exactly the same question was involved, and the Supreme Court of the state of Washington reached a contrary conclusion, holding that the railroad company was entitled to keep the land conveyed to it for a right of way without paying for it; that it was not only excused from performing its contract, but might keep the full consideration received by it without making compensation.

Questions involving the rights of parties to contracts, where performance has been rendered impossible, either by an act of law or some other uncontrollable supervening cause, have been considered by many of the American courts, and while the authorities may not be entirely uniform, we think the doctrine to be deduced therefrom is that, where a contract, lawful when made, is rendered impossible of performance from some cause beyond the control of the parties, neither party can be required to further perform, but where one party has paid the full consideration, and in many of the cases where he has furnished only part of the consideration agreed upon, the other party will be compelled to return so much thereof as he has not rendered compensation for.

In 3 Elliott on Contracts, § 1902, it is held that:

"Although by the terms of a contract for work and labor the full price is not to be paid until the work is completed, if a complete performance becomes impossible by act of the law, the contractor may recover for the work actually done at the full price agreed on."

Now, if the doctrine of the Washington court in the case above referred to is correct, there could be no such recovery as is indicated by this authority. The doctrine of that case is that, whenever by an act of the law the performance of the contract is rendered impossible, each party keeps whatever he was fortunate enough to get. The doctrine of the text above quoted is approved in 6 R. C. L. p. 981, § 350, under the title "Contracts," and seems to be well supported by the authorities there cited. In 13 Corp. Jur. at page 644, it is said:

"One who has contracted to do a particular thing and has received payment therefor cannot retain the payment made to him in advance for his work, when by reason of an unavoidable accident he is excused from the performance of his contract."

What difference is there in principle whether the excuse for nonperformance is an unavoidable accident or an act of Congress making further performance unlawful? So in the case of Jones-Gray Construction Co. v. Stephens, 167 Ky. 765, 181 S. W. 659, it is held that a party who has received in advance payment for work to be performed by him upon the barn of another, which is destroyed before performance of the contract by an accident for which neither is responsible, is liable to the party having made the payment for the repayment of the unearned consideration. In Jones & Jones v. Judd, 4 N. Y. 411, it was held that, where by the terms of a contract for work and labor the full price is not to be paid until the work is completed, and complete performance becomes impossible by act of the law, the contractor may recover for the work actually done at the full price agreed on. It is a little difficult for us to understand why a party who has furnished only part of the consideration would be allowed to recover to the extent that he has furnished it when further performance is prevented by the law, but would not be allowed to recover when he has furnished the whole consideration for the contract to the extent that he has not received compensation. In the case of Helne v. Meyer, 61 N. Y. 171, it was held that, where the prosecution of work in the alteration of a building is forbidden by an officer having authority to do so, and a contractor is thus prevented from performing his contract, he is discharged therefrom, but is entitled to recover for the work done. A very instructive case dealing with this question is that of Butterfield v. Byron, 153 Mass. 517, 27 N. E. 667, 12 L. R. A. 571, 25 Am. St. Rep. 654. In that case both the English and American authorities are cited and reviewed by the court, and the conclusion is reached that, where the full performance of a contract is rendered impossible by an act of God, neither party can recover damages for nonperformance of the contract, but either might recover from the other; in that case the landowner for what he had paid in excess of the value of the work done, or the builder for what he had done in excess of the amount he had been paid. Another case which is quite instructive is that of Thomas v. Hartshorne, 45 N. J. Eq. 215, 16 Atl. 916, 3 L. R. A. 381. In that case Thomas entered into an agreement with the Secretary of the Treasury by which he was given permission to make explorations in New York Harbor with a view to recovering certain sunken treasure. Hartshorne, under an agreement with Thomas, furnished certain money to be used for the purpose of prosecuting the work of recovering the treasure. Before the purpose was accomplished, and before all of the money so furnished was spent in the work, the license under which Thomas was acting was revoked by the Secretary of the Treasury; and it was held that Hartshorne was entitled to recover back from Thomas so much of the money as had not been spent in the prosecution of the work; that Thomas was relieved from further prosecuting his contract; that he would not be liable in damages for failure in that regard, but that he could not keep the money furnished to him which he had not used. Other authorities might be cited to support this view, but we think these are quite sufficient to establish the proposition that, where a contract is entered into, perfectly lawful at the time, and performance thereof is subsequently prevented, either by a change in the law or by any other uncontrollable supervening cause, the parties will be excused from performance, but if one of the parties has received full consideration from the other who has not fully executed the contract on his part, he will not be allowed to keep the same. This would be unconscionable and inequitable. To allow the defendant in this case to retain the plaintiff's property would be admittedly unjust and inequitable. It would be receiving what the declaration alleges is a very valuable strip of land without paying therefor what it agreed to pay. We are of the opinion that the declaration states a cause of action, and that the plaintiff in this case is entitled to recover the value of the consideration delivered by him to the defendant to the extent that he has not received compensation by the performance of this contract on the part of the defendant.

Some criticism is made of the declaration because the pleader styles the action one of trespass on the case, when, if he has any right to recover, it must be an implied assumption. The declaration fully sets out all of the facts as we have stated them, and it is made very clear therefrom the theory upon which the plaintiff seeks to recover. Language is used which ordinarily is used in a declaration filed in an action of trespass on the case, but this matter may be treated as surplusage; it is nonessential. The defendant is fully informed of the cause of action against him, and because the pleader improperly styles it an action of trespass on the case we will not hold it bad. Though inartistically drawn, it is sufficient in form to fully advise the defendant of the ground upon which recovery is sought. Kennaird v. Jones, 9 Grat. (Va.) 183; Gray v. Kemp, 88 Va. 201, 16 S. E. 225; Grass v. Development Co., 75 W. Va. 719, 84 S. E. 750, L. R. A. 1915E, 1057.

Our order will reverse the judgment of the circuit court of Wood county, overrule the demurrer to the declaration, and remand the cause.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT ⇐ 1, 2—ADMISSION TO PRACTICE—JOINT LEGISLATIVE RESOLUTION.

The Legislature cannot, by the passage of a joint resolution requiring the court to grant licenses to certain named individuals to practice law, avoid the requirements of a general statute, and rules of the court made and promulgated pursuant thereto, regulating the granting of such licenses and prescribing the length of study and degree of preparation required of the applicant in order to entitle him thereto.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT ⇐ 7 — ADMISSION TO PRACTICE—POLICE POWER — JUDICIAL ACT.

The right to practice law is not one of a citizen's inherent rights, but is a privilege which may be granted within prescribed regulations under the exercise of the state's police power, and the granting of a license is a judicial and not a mere ministerial act.

Application by Boyd Adkins and others for licenses to practice law. Licenses refused.

J. H. Meek, of Huntington, and J. M. Rigg, of Wayne, for applicants.

R. S. Spilman, of Charleston, for protestants.

WILLIAMS, J. Boyd Adkins of Wayne county, W. R. Meservie of Ritchie county, and W. M. Hefner of Braxton county, have applied for license to practice law. They present no certificates from the state board of law examiners to show that they have passed the required examination entitling them to a license, according to section 1, c. 119, of the Code, and an order of this court made pursuant thereto on the 6th of May, 1915, prescribing a certain standard of preliminary education to be attained by all candidates, and also prescribing the length of time they should devote to the study of law, either in a law office under the direction of some member of the bar, or as a student in some approved law school. Instead of such certificates, they have presented joint resolutions of the House and Senate of the Legislature, reciting facts which show they possess all the requisite qualifications now required of candidates for license, except those relating to their educational preparation and length of time they have studied law. Respecting such preparation, the resolutions say, it is impracticable, because of their age, for them now to prepare to take the state bar examination, but that they possess the qualifications of good lawyers, in consideration whereof the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia is "requested" to issue license to M. W. Hefner and "required" to issue licenses to said Boyd Adkins and W. R. Meservie.

[1] It is not contended that these joint resolutions have the force or effect of a statute, or that they amount to more than an ascertainment by the Legislature of the qualifications of the applicants to practice law, and their recommendation to the court for licenses. Even if the resolutions had the form required by section 1, art. 6, of the Constitution, for an act of the Legislature, it would nevertheless be unconstitutional for three reasons: (1) It was not read on three separate days in each House as required by section 29, art. 6, of the Constitution; (2) it was not presented to the Governor for his approval or disapproval as required by section 14, art. 7, of the Constitution; and (3) it contravenes section 39, art. 6, of the Constitution. After forbidding the passage of special laws covering a large number of enumerated subjects, the section last cited concludes with this general provision:

"And in no case shall a special act be passed, where a general law would be proper, and can be made applicable to the case, nor in any other case in which the courts have jurisdiction, and are competent to give the relief asked for."

There is now and for several years has been, a general statute intended to cover every case of application for license to practice law in this state. It is not necessary in this opinion to enter upon a discussion of the question to what extent the Legislature may, in the exercise of its police power, regulate the granting of licenses to practice law. It is enough to say that, whatever may be the extent of its power in this respect, it must exercise it by general, and not by special, laws. Section 1, c. 119, of the Code (sec. 4699), amended and re-enacted by chapter 50, Acts 1897, authorizing this court to prescribe the degree of preparation and the period of study required of applicants and to provide for their examinations, either by the court or otherwise, is such a general regulatory statute; and pursuant thereto this court, by an order entered of record on the 6th of May, 1915, prescribed certain general rules which have been widely published throughout the state and are pretty generally understood. So far as we know, this is the first attempt on the part of an applicant for license to evade or avoid those requirements. They are now the general law on the subject and must be observed, so long as they are continued as such.

[2] The right to practice the law is not one of the citizen's inherent rights, but is a privilege which may be granted him within prescribed regulations, under the exercise of the state's police power (6 O. J. 571); and the granting of the license is a judicial, and not a mere ministerial, act (In re Application to Practice Law, 67 W. Va. 213, and cases cited at page 218, 67 S. E. 597).

For a number of years, the State Bar Association has been diligently striving to elevate the educational standard of the legal profession; in fact, this movement has been general over the country, both in the American Bar Association and in the various state bar associations. The most approved law schools also have been gradually increasing the degree of preparation required of students before their graduation. Nearly all of the first-class colleges of law now require at least three years' study in law before a student is entitled to receive his diploma, and, in addition thereto, some of them require the student to be an academic graduate of some reputable college. To comply with the request of the Legislature in the present instances would seem to be a step backward, which the court is not inclined to take. It is no hardship upon the applicants to require them to comply with the present regulations. If a man has sufficient ability to make a good lawyer, with a limited amount of literary preparation, as the Legislature has said respecting these gentlemen, he can surely make a much better lawyer if he contents himself for a while, in order to pursue the required preliminary studies, until he is able to comply with the present reasonable requirements for admission to the practice. He will be a little longer in obtaining his license, but he will be all the better qualified when he begins, and consequently will make more rapid and successful progress, and in the end will have no regrets.

We are constrained to refuse the licenses.

POFFENBARGER, J. (concurring in the conclusion). I agree that the joint resolutions relied upon by the applicants do not have the force of legislative acts, and therefore that they constitute no legal basis for these applications.

As mere memorials to the court in behalf of the applicants, they do not justify any departure on the part of the court, from the requirements of the statute regulating the licensing of attorneys. Like all other statutory regulations of professions, this one binds the officers and tribunals charged with its administration, to apply it without discrimination, to the end that all may know what their rights are and may stand equal before the law. To grant licenses upon mere petitions in the form of legislative resolutions would be tantamount to the setting aside of a law providing a different method designed to systematize the granting of such licenses, procure a reasonable degree of proficiency in persons practicing law in the courts, and prevent discrimination in the granting thereof by the court or anybody else.

If these applicants are able lawyers, and, by reason of their ages, find it impracticable to comply with the requirements as to preliminary education, they must have been able to pass bar examinations on purely legal questions, before these very recent regulations were put into effect. When they were prescribed, they contained a saving clause in favor of applicants deficient in point of standard literary and legal preparation. A reasonable period of time was allowed them for examination before the regulations became effective, and published notice thereof given. Their neglect to avail themselves of it constitutes a very large obstacle to their appeal for a special rule or exception in their favor, if the court had discretionary power to grant it.

Nothing in these applications or the resolutions upon which they are predicated calls for any declaration, on the part of the court, as to any real or supposed limitations upon the powers of the Legislature over the subjects of licenses of attorneys and admissions to practice the legal profession. The Legislature has passed no law purporting to innovate upon the judicial claim of exclusive authority over these subjects. I decline either to sound a warning to a co-ordinate branch of the government against an act it has not performed nor threatened to perform, or to enter upon a discussion of a question not submitted to us upon any pleadings or other procedure raising it. Therefore I do not concur in what has been said on this subject, in the opinion prepared by Judge

WILLIAMS and adopted by a majority of the court; but I concur in the refusal of the licenses applied for.

WETTERWALD et al. v. WOODALL
(No. 3640.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 25, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CONTRACTS ⇐147(1)—CONSTRUCTION.

In the construction of contracts the purpose is to arrive at the real intention of the parties.

2. CONTRACTS ⇐152—MEANING OF WORDS—CONSTRUCTION.

In determining the meaning of words not of certain and definite import used in a contract, consideration will be given to the situation of the parties, the subject-matter of the contract, the acts of the parties thereunder, and the purpose sought to be accomplished thereby.

3. PATENTS ⇐216 — SALE OF LICENSE — BREACH—DAMAGES.

Where a building contractor agrees to purchase a license for the use of a patented process for the construction of a floor, such license to be paid for upon the construction of a satisfactory sample floor, and such sample floor is constructed and is satisfactory, except that the proposed purchaser of the license finds that the cost is greatly in excess of the representations made to him in that regard, and refuses to further execute the contract because of such dissatisfaction, there can be no recovery against him because of such refusal, where it appears that he could not inform himself in advance of the cost of construction of such a floor, because of the secret process used therein.

Error to Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Suit by Walter A. Wetterwald and others against R. J. Woodall. Verdict for plaintiffs, and from judgment setting aside the verdict, they bring error. Affirmed.

Morton & Mohler, of Charleston, for plaintiffs in error.

C. W. Good, of Charleston, for defendant in error.

RITZ, J. Plaintiffs are the owners of a patent process for constructing floors, and the defendant is a building contractor doing business at Charleston, W. Va. On the 9th of July, 1914, they entered into a contract in writing by which the plaintiffs agreed to sell to the defendant, and the defendant agreed to buy from the plaintiffs, a license to manufacture this floor within the county of Kanawha, for which the defendant was to pay the sum of $300, $100 to be deposited in the bank to be paid over and delivered, together with defendant's two notes for $100 each, due at three and six months, upon the completion of a satisfactory sample floor, according to the patented process. The contract further provided that the defendant should order the material for the construction of this sample floor and pay the plaintiffs' workman for doing the work. It also provided that upon the payment of the $100 in cash, and the delivery of the two notes referred to, the secret process would be disclosed to the defendant, and a license to manufacture the same under plaintiffs' patent delivered to him. The defendant, of course, did not know, as is shown by the contract, what materials were necessary in order to construct the sample floor called for in the contract, and the plaintiffs for this reason ordered on his behalf the materials required for the purpose. These materials were shipped to the defendant, and the plaintiffs sent their workman to Charleston to construct the sample floor in accordance with the patent process. The floor was constructed, and after it was completed was inspected by the defendant. He found that, so far as its serviceability was concerned, it was entirely satisfactory, but it was unsatisfactory from the standpoint of cost, and for this reason he refused to deliver the $100 to the plaintiffs, or to execute to them his two notes in accordance with the terms of the contract. Plaintiffs thereupon sued him for the sum of $300, being the amount he was to pay for the license to manufacture this floor. The case was tried in the circuit court of Kanawha county, and a verdict returned in favor of the plaintiffs for the full sum of $300, which, on motion, was set aside, and from the judgment of the circuit court in setting aside the verdict this writ of error is prosecuted.

[1, 2] The defendant paid all of the expense entailed in constructing the sample floor, as he had agreed to do under the contract, and the only question involved here is whether or not he can be made to respond to the plaintiffs in damages for failure to take the license and pay therefor. It was shown upon the trial of the case that, when the plaintiffs' agent procured the contract from the defendant, the question of the cost of the floor was discussed, and it was represented to the defendant that it would cost from 14 to 16 cents per square foot. While this representation is not a part of the contract, there is no doubt that it was influential in procuring the defendant to sign it. That this representation was made is proved not only by the defendant, but by another witness who was present, and there is no substantial denial thereof. It is further shown without material contradiction that the plaintiffs had a free hand in constructing the sample floor, they procuring the material for the defendant at his expense, and furnishing their own workman for the purpose, and that the cost of this sample floor, instead of being 14 to 16 cents per square foot, was more than 25 cents a square foot, and it was because of the excessive cost that the same was unsatisfactory to the defendant. There is a great deal of evidence introduced concerning the increased cost of the materials from which the floor was made subsequent to the breaking out of the European war. It does not occur to us, however, that this evidence is very material in view of the fact that the materials which were furnished, as is shown by the testimony of the people who furnished them, were sold at prewar prices, and the cost of the sample floor actually made was not rendered unsatisfactory because of increase in the price of materials brought about by the existence of the war. It is contended that the provision in the contract for the construction of a satisfactory sample floor does not include the element of the cost of such floor, but that the qualification only extends to the serviceability or character of the floor, as such. In determining what significance should be given to language when used in a contract, the situation of the parties, the nature of the subject-matter with which they are dealing, and the purpose to be accomplished are all matters to be considered by the court. Lumber Co. v. Wilson, 69 W. Va. 598, 72 S. E. 651; White v. White, 64 W. Va. 30-35, 60 S. E. 885; Snider v. Robinett, 78 W. Va. 88, 88 S. E. 599. It cannot be said that the word "satisfactory" has an inflexible meaning attributable to it in every connection in which it may be used. The purpose of all construction is to arrive at the real intention of the parties. Of course, where the language is plain and the words are of certain and definite import, there is no room for construction, but where, as in this case, the language used may be capable of different meanings in different connections, and when used under varying circumstances, the situation of the parties, the subject-matter with which they are dealing, as well as the purpose sought to be accomplished, are all material inquiries.

[3] In this case the defendant was a building contractor, and admittedly desired to procure the license to make this patent floor in order that he might use the same in his business. The contract shows on its face that he did not know the materials from which the floor was made, nor the process of manufacturing the same. This was to be divulged to him when he paid the money, so that it is quite clear that he could not know in advance what the cost of the floor would be. It was quite as important to him that the floor should be one which could be constructed at a price that would enable him to use it in his business of building, as it was that it should be a serviceable floor, and we are quite well satisfied that, when this language is construed in the light of the situation of the parties at the time, they meant that the floor would satisfy the defendant from the standpoint of cost of construction, as well as in every other regard. This was the view taken of the contract by the court below, and he instructed the jury to that effect. The instructions are, however, a little indefinite, and were, no doubt, misunderstood by the jury, else they could not have rendered the verdict which they did. There is no question here of any capricious dissatisfaction of the defendant because of the cost of this floor. The evidence is clear that he was dissatisfied therewith immediately upon discovering the cost thereof. There was nothing equivocal in his conduct. Just as soon as the floor was laid and the cost determined, he at once notified the plaintiffs that it was not satisfactory in this regard. His failure to accept the license under these terms is based upon a substantial reason. It is shown without contradiction that the actual cost of the floor was more than 50 per cent. in excess of what the defendant believed it would cost from the representation made to him by the plaintiffs' agent. It must be assumed that the plaintiffs were fully advised as to the cost of constructing floors under this patent process. They, or rather their agent, knew the purpose for which the defendant desired the license, and with full knowledge on their part of all these things, of which the defendant had no knowledge, they undertook to satisfy him that this floor would meet his requirements, not only as to its serviceability and durability as a floor, but as to the cost of its construction. It is suggested that, even though the floor cost as much as the defendant claims, still the process can be used advantageously. This is not material. The plaintiffs did not put any limit of cost thereon in the contract. This was to be determined by the defendant when the floor was laid and the actual cost determined. His conclusion in that regard honestly and reasonably arrived at binds the parties.

It is argued that the defendant cannot refuse to accept the license for which he contracted because of the increased cost of materials due to the conditions existing on account of the breaking out of the European war. As before stated, this element does not enter into this case. The sample floor actually constructed was constructed of materials purchased at prewar prices, and the defendant's dissatisfaction therewith on account of the price was not based on any increase in the element of cost because of war prices.

Whether the defendant could arbitrarily and without any reason refuse to comply with his contract we need not inquire. We think in this case his evidence comes clearly within what seems to be the rule supported by the great weight of authority on this question, and that is that, where one seeks to furnish an article or to do work to the satisfaction of another, and such article or such work is rejected because the same is not satisfactory upon reasonable grounds for such dissatisfaction, there is no basis for recovery. 3 Page on Contracts, § 1390; 3 Elliott on Contracts, § 1881.

It follows from what we have said that there is no error in the judgment of the circuit court setting aside the verdict of the jury, and the same will be affirmed.

GATES et al. v. FRIEDMAN et al.
(No. 3578.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 25, 1919.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PARTY WALLS ⇨7—AGREEMENT.

Party walls are as a general rule the subject of agreement, express or implied, between adjoining owners.

2. PARTY WALLS ⇨4(1) — CROSS-EASEMENTS — USE.

Where adjoining owners are grantees of a common grantor, and the deed to the first conveys to him to the center line an equal moiety in the wall of the building on the adjoining lot divided longitudinally, with the right and authority to use said wall as a part of the building to be constructed by him, and the deed to the other grantee conveys to him the said adjoining lot and the building thereon to the center line of said dividing wall, subject only to the rights of the first grantee, cross easements in the whole of said wall are thereby reserved and vested in each grantee, and said wall is thereby constituted a party wall, and each is entitled to make use thereof as a party wall.

3. PARTY WALLS ⇨8(3)—USE—REPAIRS.

Where a party wall so exists, either of the owners has the right to enter upon it for the purpose of building up, extending or repairing said wall for his building, if it can be done without injury to the adjoining building and said wall is clearly of sufficient strength to bear the additional burden, unless he is restrained by the provisions of his contract or deed.

4. PARTY WALLS ⇨10—USE—EJECTMENT.

Where such party wall exists between adjoining owners, ejectment will not lie by the one against the other to recover any part of the wall so entered upon and occupied by the other for the upbuilding and extension thereof for his building.

Error from Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Ejectment by A. P. Gates and others against Jacob Friedman and others. De-murrer to plaintiffs' evidence overruled by the court of common pleas, and judgment for plaintiffs, and from a judgment of the circuit court, rejecting the writ of error prayed for by Jacob Friedman, he brings error. Reversed, and judgment rendered, that the demurrer be sustained and the action dismissed.

Linn & Byrne, of Charleston, for plaintiff in error.

L. D. Vickers and W. G. Mathews, both of Charleston, for defendants in error.

MILLER, P. In ejectment, the defendants demurred to plaintiffs' evidence, and upon the conditional verdict found by the jury the court found the law to be for the plaintiffs and pronounced the judgment to which, upon the petition of the defendant Jacob Friedman, the present writ of error was awarded.

The declaration averred that plaintiffs on February 1, 1883, and continuously since then were owners in fee of a certain lot in the city of Charleston, bounded as follows:

Beginning on Capitol Street in the center of the side wall nearest to Virginia Street, of what on the date of said deed was known as the Courier Building; thence with Capitol Street towards Virginia Street, fifty-nine feet and one inch to the center of the side wall nearest to Kanawha Street, of what on the same date was known as the Rust Building; thence with the center of said wall to the side line of the lot formerly owned by Dulce Rowena Laidley; thence with a line of said Laidley's lot to a point opposite the beginning corner; thence a straight line passing through the center of the side wall of the said Courier Building to the place of beginning.

And it is further averred that being the owner and in possession of said lot and of every part thereof as aforesaid from the date of their said deed, defendants on August 13, 1904, unlawfully entered and took possession of a portion thereof described as follows:

Being a strip of land and building wall nine inches wide adjoining the lot then owned by the defendant Jacob Friedman, and extending from Capitol Street aforesaid back along said Friedman's lot a distance of sixty-two feet, the entire length of plaintiffs' said lot.

So that what plaintiffs seek to recover is not the whole of their said lot but only the portion thereof upon which it is alleged defendants had so unlawfully entered and were then unlawfully withholding from them.

The evidence of plaintiffs showed that they and Jacob Friedman derived title to their respective lots from a common source, namely, the Kanawha Valley Bank, the plaintiffs by deed dated February 5, 1883, the defendant Friedman by deed dated March 26, 1904, the difference in the time of the two deeds being over twenty-one years. The deed to Friedman covered what is known as the Courier Building, the side wall of which nearest Virginia Street was one of the monuments called for in plaintiffs' deed, and the lot on which the same was situated is described therein as follows:

Beginning on Capitol Street at the corner of said Courier Building; thence with a line of said building on Capitol Street about twenty-eight feet and one inch to the center of the side wall of said Courier Building; thence leaving Capitol Street and running from same towards Summers Street, with the center of said wall two feet ten inches to the line of the Gates Building; thence continuing said line back from Capitol Street following the center of said north-east wall of said Courier Building to the rear thereof, and further continuing said line nine feet to a ten-foot alley-way in the rear of the "Wood" property; thence with the said alley towards the Kanawha River about ten feet to the corner of the old foundation wall of the Arnold Building; thence with the outside of said foundation wall towards Summers Street twenty-six feet to the corner thereof; thence with the outside of said foundation walls towards the Kanawha River to a point where the south side line so extended reversed to the place of beginning on Capitol Street.

The deed to plaintiffs contains in the granting clause this very important provision:

"Together with the right and authority on the part of the grantees to use the side wall of the Courier Building and the Rust Building adjacent to the lot herein conveyed as parts of the building to be constructed by said grantees on the lot herein conveyed."

And the deed to Friedman contains in the granting clause thereof the following provision, which we think must be given special consideration in determining the rights of the parties to the present controversy, namely:

"Subject to the conveyance by the party of the first part to A. P. and C. A. Gates, by deed dated February 1, 1883, of record in the office of the clerk of the county court of Kanawha County, West Virginia, in Deed Book 39, page 144, in regard to the east wall of said building and the rights therein granted."

The present suit was not brought, as the record shows, until April 3, 1914, nearly ten years after the alleged trespass by defendants upon that portion of plaintiffs' lot sued for. The act of trespass by defendants, according to the evidence on both sides, or proven by that of the plaintiffs and not controverted by the evidence of defendants, consisted in the entry by defendants upon the top of said north-east wall of the Courier Building, an interest in which was conveyed to them as aforesaid, then a three-story building, taking off the top of the wall down to solid courses, and then building upon the original wall, which was about eighteen inches, a twelve inch wall, on plaintiffs' side, for a fourth story of his building, leaving a clear space of six inches on his side of the wall, to the injury may it be said of plaintiffs in point of inside space and strength of the wall, if they should ever wish to build higher on their lot; also in digging down and extending said side wall from the rear end thereof to the back line of defendant's lot a distance of ten to twelve feet and carrying the same upon the plaintiffs' side corresponding in width and height to the original wall as built for the fourth story; also in occupying the whole of the wall of the original Courier Building fronting on Capitol Street by facing the same with the same kind of brick used by him in rebuilding or repairing the same.

There is no evidence that plaintiffs were not fully advised at the time of the use defendant was making of said original walls and the way they were being extended and built up on their side of the center line. Nor was there any effort on the part of plaintiffs to explain their silence for so many years after the alleged trespass by defendant.

On the demurrer to the evidence several points are presented. But the turning point, we think, is whether the wall in question is or is not a party wall; if a party wall, one set of rules and principles control; if not, other rules and principles govern the rights of the parties. The plaintiffs contend that the wall is not a party wall; that by their respective deeds each owns to the center line thereof, with no rights in the other to any cross easements or rights in that part of the wall beyond the center line thereof, and with respect to which they are entitled to be protected the one against the other.

[1, 2] We have no statute defining or governing the subject of party walls, local or general as in England by act of Parliament, and in some of the states. Rudall on Party Walls (2d Ed.) 36, Ch. II.; Jones on Easements, secs. 635-640. Usually party walls are the subject of agreement, express or implied, between adjoining owners. Jones on Easements, sec. 641 et seq. For definition we find that the text writers and the adjudicated cases generally refer to the decision of Mr. Justice Fry in Watson v. Gray, 14 Ch. Div. 194, as follows:

"The words appear to me to express a meaning rather popular than legal, and they may, I think, be used in four different senses. They may mean, first, a wall of which the two adjoining owners are tenants in common, as in Wiltshire v. Sidford, (1 Man. & Ry. 404,) and Corbitt v. Porter, (8 B. & C. 257, 265.) I think that the judgments in those cases show that that is the most common and primary meaning of the term. In the next place the term may be used to signify a wall divided longitudinally into two strips, one belonging to each of the neighboring owners, as in Matts v. Hawkins, (5 Taunt. 20.) Then, thirdly, the term may mean a wall which belongs entirely to one of the adjoining owners, but is subject to an easement or right in the other to have it maintained as a dividing wall between the two tenements. The term is so used in some of the building acts. Lastly, the term may designate a wall divided longitudinally into two moieties, each moiety being subject to a cross easement in favor of the owner of the other moiety. This last is the sense in which the term is more frequently used in the United States." Jones on Easements, sec. 632.

See also Rudall on Party Walls, 1; Carson's Gale on Easements (9th Ed.) 406.

According to Rudall the primary meaning of the term "party wall" is one of which two adjoiners are tenants in common; but a wall in common use by two adjoining land owners prima facie makes them tenants in common thereof. Rudall on Party Walls, supra, p. 2. Generally the rights of the parties are by contract. The case of Matts v. Hawkins, 5 Taunt. 20, is cited and relied on by plaintiffs' counsel as opposed to this proposition and as sustaining the contention that the wall here involved is not a party wall. But as pointed out by Mr. Rudall, the wall in that case was not within the county, but within the party wall act then in force.

Our conclusion is that the rights of the parties in the case at bar are governed by the provisions in their respective deeds, above emphasized, and that the wall in question falls plainly within the last or fourth class defined by the text writers and judicial decisions cited, that is where the wall is divided longitudinally into two moieties, each moiety being subject to a cross easement in favor of the owner of the other moiety. This, say the authorities cited, is the sense in which the term is more frequently used in the United States.

As we have observed, the deed to plaintiffs not only conveyed to them the fee in the land to the center line of the easterly wall of the Courier Building, but also the right and authority to use said wall and also the side wall of the Rust Building "as parts of the building to be constructed by them." It may be said, however, that no such cross easements were reserved to the plaintiffs and that the defendant Friedman by his subsequent deed acquired no right or rights to any use of said wall beyond the center line of said wall to which his grant extended. But did he not get by his deed everything and every right remaining vested in the bank, the common grantor? It seems to be well settled, at least in England, that where one grants a divided moiety of an outside wall of his own house with the intention of making such wall a party wall between his house and an adjoining one to be built by the grantee, the law implies the grant and reservation in favor of the grantor and grantee respectively of such easements as may be necessary to carry out what was the original intention of the parties with regard to the use of the wall, the nature of those easements varying with the particular circumstances of each case. Carson's Gale on Easements, supra, pp. 407, 408; Washburn on Easements (4th Ed.) pp. 606 et seq. The Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia says:

"A party wall is a dividing wall between two houses, to be used equally, for all the purposes of an exterior wall, by the respective owners of both houses." Bellenot v. Laube's Ex'r, 104 Va. 842, 52 S. E. 698.

While the right may not exist as a common law or statutory right, it exists in this State as the result of contract, express or implied. List v. Hornbrook, 2 W. Va. 340, 345. So that whatever rights were reserved by the grantor, were granted to Friedman in the deed to him, and were those which in this country have been held to appertain to the owners of a party wall.

[3, 4] The wall in controversy then being a party wall, with the usual rights of each owner appertaining thereto, the question remains: Did Friedman have the right to enter upon it in the way and manner alleged and proven, to build up and extend it in the repair and extension of his building? The authorities on this question seem to be uniform in holding that either of the adjacent owners may increase the height or extend the length of such wall if it can be done without injury to the adjoining building and the wall is clearly of sufficient strength to bear the addition. This seems to be the general rule unless limited by the provisions of the contract or deed. Jones on Easements, secs. 696-699, and cases cited in notes. Bloch v. Isham, 28 Ind. 37, 92 Am. Dec. 287, and elaborate note; Calmelet v. Sichel, 48 Neb. 505, 67 N. W. 467, 58 Am. St. Rep. 700, and note; Bright v. Bacon, 131 Ky. 848, 116 S. W. 268, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 386, and note. In this note a long line of decisions is cited for the proposition that in this country, in the absence of agreement, express or implied, regulating the respective rights of the owners of a party wall, either one may increase the height if the wall is of sufficient strength and can be raised without injury to the adjoining building and without impairing the cross easement to which the other owner is entitled, and it is there said that no American authority can be found, and we find none, which disputes the proposition. And upon the same principle and for like reasons the rule permitting the raising of a party wall permits the extension thereof unless restrained by the contract. Matthews v. Dixey, 149 Mass. 595, 22 N. E. 61, 5 L. R. A. 102; Everett v. Edwards, 149 Mass. 588, 22 N. E. 52, 5 L. R. A. 110, 14 Am. St. Rep. 462.

So that it now seems clear that plaintiffs have no right by ejectment to recover from defendants the nine inches of the party wall situated on their side of the division line thereof. If under the law of party walls Friedman had the right to extend the wall upwards and longitudinally, as we hold he had, he had the right to go upon the wall and occupy it as far as necessary and reasonably convenient to accomplish the work and he cannot be ejected therefrom. In justice and equity when defendant elected to build only a twelve inch wall he should have built the same on his side of the original wall so as to leave plaintiffs free when they came to use the wall on their side to build up and strengthen it for their purposes. But we do not think ejectment is the proper remedy, if any they have, to right their wrongs in the premises.

Our conclusion is to reverse the judgment of the circuit court rejecting the writ of error prayed for, and also the judgment of the court of common pleas overruling the defendants' demurrer to the evidence, and to enter such judgment thereon as we think the trial court and the circuit court should have entered, namely, that the demurrer be sustained and that the action be dismissed for want of jurisdiction in ejectment, and that defendants recover their costs in the trial court as well as in this court herein sustained.
